34 Because this Reference deals with questions fundamental to the nature of Canada, it should not be surprising that it is necessary to review the context in which the Canadian union has evolved. To this end, we will briefly describe the legal evolution of the Constitution and the foundational principles governing constitutional amendments. Our purpose is not to be exhaustive, but to highlight the features most relevant in the context of this Reference.

35 Confederation was an initiative of elected representatives of the people then living in the colonies scattered across part of what is now Canada. It was not initiated by Imperial fiat. In March 1864, a select committee of the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Canada, chaired by George Brown, began to explore prospects for constitutional reform. The committee's report, released in June 1864, recommended that a federal union encompassing Canada East and Canada West, and perhaps the other British North American colonies, be pursued. A group of Reformers from Canada West, led by Brown, joined with Étienne P. Taché and John A. Macdonald in a coalition government for the purpose of engaging in constitutional reform along the lines of the federal model proposed by the committee's report.

36 An opening to pursue federal union soon arose. The leaders of the maritime colonies had planned to meet at Charlottetown in the fall to discuss the perennial topic of maritime union. The Province of Canada secured invitations to send a Canadian delegation. On September 1, 1864, 23 delegates (five from New Brunswick, five from Nova Scotia, five from Prince Edward Island, and eight from the Province of Canada) met in Charlottetown. After five days of discussion, the delegates reached agreement on a plan for federal union.

37 The salient aspects of the agreement may be briefly outlined. There was to be a federal union featuring a bicameral central legislature. Representation in the Lower House was to be based on population, whereas in the Upper House it was to be based on regional equality, the regions comprising Canada East, Canada West and the Maritimes. The significance of the adoption of a federal form of government cannot be exaggerated. Without it, neither the agreement of the delegates from Canada East nor that of the delegates from the maritime colonies could have been obtained.

38 Several matters remained to be resolved, and so the Charlottetown delegates agreed to meet again at Quebec in October, and to invite Newfoundland to send a delegation to join them. The Quebec Conference began on October 10, 1864. Thirty-three delegates (two from Newfoundland, seven from New Brunswick, five from Nova Scotia, seven from Prince Edward Island, and twelve from the Province of Canada) met over a two and a half week period. Precise consideration of each aspect of the federal structure preoccupied the political agenda. The delegates approved 72 resolutions, addressing almost all of what subsequently made its way into the final text of the Constitution Act, 1867. These included guarantees to protect French language and culture, both directly (by making French an official language in Quebec and Canada as a whole) and indirectly (by allocating jurisdiction over education and "Property and Civil Rights in the Province" to the provinces). The protection of minorities was thus reaffirmed.

39 Legally, there remained only the requirement to have the Quebec Resolutions put into proper form and passed by the Imperial Parliament in London. However, politically, it was thought that more was required. Indeed, Resolution 70 provided that "The Sanction of the Imperial and Local Parliaments shall be sought for the Union of the Provinces, on the principles adopted by the Conference." (Cited in J. Pope, ed., Confederation: Being a Series of Hitherto Unpublished Documents Bearing on the British North America Act (1895), at p. 52 (emphasis added).)

40 Confirmation of the Quebec Resolutions was achieved more smoothly in central Canada than in the Maritimes.

In February and March 1865, the Quebec Resolutions were the subject of almost six weeks of sustained debate in both houses of the Canadian legislature. The Canadian Legislative Assembly approved the Quebec Resolutions in March 1865 with the support of a majority of members from both Canada East and Canada West. The governments of both Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland chose, in accordance with popular sentiment in both colonies, not to accede to the Quebec Resolutions. In New Brunswick, a general election was required before Premier Tilley's pro-Confederation party prevailed. In Nova Scotia, Premier Tupper ultimately obtained a resolution from the House of Assembly favouring Confederation.

41 Sixteen delegates (five from New Brunswick, five from Nova Scotia, and six from the Province of Canada) met in London in December 1866 to finalize the plan for Confederation. To this end, they agreed to some slight modifications and additions to the Quebec Resolutions. Minor changes were made to the distribution of powers, provision was made for the appointment of extra senators in the event of a deadlock between the House of Commons and the Senate, and certain religious minorities were given the right to appeal to the federal government where their denominational school rights were adversely affected by provincial legislation. The British North America Bill was drafted after the London Conference with the assistance of the Colonial Office, and was introduced into the House of Lords in February 1867. The Act passed third reading in the House of Commons on March 8, received royal assent on March 29, and was proclaimed on July 1, 1867. The Dominion of Canada thus became a reality.

42 There was an early attempt at secession. In the first Dominion election in September 1867, Premier Tupper's forces were decimated: members opposed to Confederation won 18 of Nova Scotia's 19 federal seats, and in the simultaneous provincial election, 36 of the 38 seats in the provincial legislature. Newly-elected Premier Joseph Howe led a delegation to the Imperial Parliament in London in an effort to undo the new constitutional arrangements, but it was too late. The Colonial Office rejected Premier Howe's plea to permit Nova Scotia to withdraw from Confederation. As the Colonial Secretary wrote in 1868:

The neighbouring province of New Brunswick has entered into the union in reliance on having with it the sister province of Nova Scotia; and vast obligations, political and commercial, have already been contracted on the faith of a measure so long discussed and so solemnly adopted. . . . I trust that the Assembly and the people of Nova Scotia will not be surprised that the Queen's government feel that they would not be warranted in advising the reversal of a great measure of state, attended by so many extensive consequences already in operation. . . .

(Quoted in H. Wade MacLauchlan, "Accounting for Democracy and the Rule of Law in the Quebec Secession Reference" (1997), 76 Can. Bar Rev. 155, at p. 168.)

The interdependence characterized by "vast obligations, political and commercial", referred to by the Colonial Secretary in 1868, has, of course, multiplied immeasurably in the last 130 years.

43 Federalism was a legal response to the underlying political and cultural realities that existed at Confederation and continue to exist today. At Confederation, political leaders told their respective communities that the Canadian union would be able to reconcile diversity with unity. It is pertinent, in the context of the present Reference, to mention the words of George-Étienne Cartier (cited in the Parliamentary Debates on the subject of the Confederation (1865), at p. 60):

Now, when we [are] united together, if union [is] attained, we [shall] form a political nationality with which neither the national origin, nor the religion of any individual, [will] interfere. It was lamented by some that we had this diversity of races, and hopes were expressed that this distinctive feature would cease. The idea of unity of races [is] utopian -- it [is] impossible. Distinctions of this kind [will] always exist. Dissimilarity, in fact, appear[s] to be the order of the physical world and of the moral world, as well as in the political world. But with regard to the objection based on this fact, to the effect that a great nation [can]not be formed because Lower Canada [is] in great part French and Catholic, and Upper Canada [is] British and Protestant, and the Lower Provinces [are] mixed, it [is] futile and worthless in the extreme. . . . In our own Federation we [will] have Catholic and Protestant, English, French, Irish and Scotch, and each by his efforts and his success

[will] increase the prosperity and glory of the new Confederacy. . . . [W]e [are] of different races, not for the purpose of warring against each other, but in order to compete and emulate for the general welfare.

The federal-provincial division of powers was a legal recognition of the diversity that existed among the initial members of Confederation, and manifested a concern to accommodate that diversity within a single nation by granting significant powers to provincial governments. The Constitution Act, 1867 was an act of nation-building. It was the first step in the transition from colonies separately dependent on the Imperial Parliament for their governance to a unified and independent political state in which different peoples could resolve their disagreements and work together toward common goals and a common interest. Federalism was the political mechanism by which diversity could be reconciled with unity.

44 A federal-provincial division of powers necessitated a written constitution which circumscribed the powers of the new Dominion and Provinces of Canada. Despite its federal structure, the new Dominion was to have "a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom" (Constitution Act, 1867, preamble). Allowing for the obvious differences between the governance of Canada and the United Kingdom, it was nevertheless thought important to thus emphasize the continuity of constitutional principles, including democratic institutions and the rule of law; and the continuity of the exercise of sovereign power transferred from Westminster to the federal and provincial capitals of Canada.

45 After 1867, the Canadian federation continued to evolve both territorially and politically. New territories were admitted to the union and new provinces were formed. In 1870, Rupert's Land and the Northwest Territories were admitted and Manitoba was formed as a province. British Columbia was admitted in 1871, Prince Edward Island in 1873, and the Arctic Islands were added in 1880. In 1898, the Yukon Territory and in 1905, the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan were formed from the Northwest Territories. Newfoundland was admitted in 1949 by an amendment to the Constitution Act, 1867. The new territory of Nunavut was carved out of the Northwest Territories in 1993 with the partition to become effective in April 1999.

46 Canada's evolution from colony to fully independent state was gradual. The Imperial Parliament's passage of the Statute of Westminster, 1931 (U.K.), 22 & 23 Geo. 5, c. 4, confirmed in law what had earlier been confirmed in fact by the Balfour Declaration of 1926, namely, that Canada was an independent country. Thereafter, Canadian law alone governed in Canada, except where Canada expressly consented to the continued application of Imperial legislation. Canada's independence from Britain was achieved through legal and political evolution with an adherence to the rule of law and stability. The proclamation of the Constitution Act, 1982 removed the last vestige of British authority over the Canadian Constitution and re-affirmed Canada's commitment to the protection of its minority, aboriginal, equality, legal and language rights, and fundamental freedoms as set out in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

47 Legal continuity, which requires an orderly transfer of authority, necessitated that the 1982 amendments be made by the Westminster Parliament, but the legitimacy as distinguished from the formal legality of the amendments derived from political decisions taken in Canada within a legal framework which this Court, in the Patriation Reference, had ruled was in accordance with our Constitution. It should be noted, parenthetically, that the 1982 amendments did not alter the basic division of powers in ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which is the primary textual expression of the principle of federalism in our Constitution, agreed upon at Confederation. It did, however, have the important effect that, despite the refusal of the government of Quebec to join in its adoption, Quebec has become bound to the terms of a Constitution that is different from that which prevailed previously, particularly as regards provisions governing its amendment, and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. As to the latter, to the extent that the scope of legislative powers was thereafter to be constrained by the Charter, the constraint operated as much against federal legislative powers as against provincial legislative powers. Moreover, it is to be remembered that s. 33, the "notwithstanding clause", gives Parliament and the provincial legislatures authority to legislate on matters within their jurisdiction in derogation of the fundamental freedoms (s. 2), legal rights (ss. 7 to 14) and equality rights (s. 15) provisions of the Charter.

48 We think it apparent from even this brief historical review that the evolution of our constitutional arrangements has been characterized by adherence to the rule of law, respect for democratic institutions, the accommodation of minorities, insistence that governments adhere to constitutional conduct and a desire for continuity and stability. We now turn to a discussion of the general constitutional principles that bear on the present Reference.

(3) Analysis of the Constitutional Principles

(a) Nature of the Principles

49 What are those underlying principles? Our Constitution is primarily a written one, the product of 131 years of evolution. Behind the written word is an historical lineage stretching back through the ages, which aids in the consideration of the underlying constitutional principles. These principles inform and sustain the constitutional text: they are the vital unstated assumptions upon which the text is based. The following discussion addresses the four foundational constitutional principles that are most germane for resolution of this Reference: federalism, democracy, constitutionalism and the rule of law, and respect for minority rights. These defining principles function in symbiosis. No single principle can be defined in isolation from the others, nor does any one principle trump or exclude the operation of any other.

50 Our Constitution has an internal architecture, or what the majority of this Court in OPSEU v. Ontario (Attorney General), [1987] 2 S.C.R. 2, at p. 57, called a "basic constitutional structure". The individual elements of the Constitution are linked to the others, and must be interpreted by reference to the structure of the Constitution as a whole. As we recently emphasized in the Provincial Judges Reference, certain underlying principles infuse our Constitution and breathe life into it. Speaking of the rule of law principle in the Manitoba Language Rights Reference, supra, at p. 750, we held that "the principle is clearly implicit in the very nature of a Constitution". The same may be said of the other three constitutional principles we underscore today.

51 Although these underlying principles are not explicitly made part of the Constitution by any written provision, other than in some respects by the oblique reference in the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867, it would be impossible to conceive of our constitutional structure without them. The principles dictate major elements of the architecture of the Constitution itself and are as such its lifeblood.

52 The principles assist in the interpretation of the text and the delineation of spheres of jurisdiction, the scope of rights and obligations, and the role of our political institutions. Equally important, observance of and respect for these principles is essential to the ongoing process of constitutional development and evolution of our Constitution as a "living tree", to invoke the famous description in Edwards v. Attorney-General for Canada, [1930] A.C. 124 (P.C.), at p. 136. As this Court indicated in New Brunswick Broadcasting Co. v. Nova Scotia (Speaker of the House of Assembly), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 319, Canadians have long recognized the existence and importance of unwritten constitutional principles in our system of government.

53 Given the existence of these underlying constitutional principles, what use may the Court make of them? In the Provincial Judges Reference, supra, at paras. 93 and 104, we cautioned that the recognition of these constitutional principles (the majority opinion referred to them as "organizing principles" and described one of them, judicial independence, as an "unwritten norm") could not be taken as an invitation to dispense with the written text of the Constitution. On the contrary, we confirmed that there are compelling reasons to insist upon the primacy of our written constitution. A written constitution promotes legal certainty and predictability, and it provides a foundation and a touchstone for the exercise of constitutional judicial review. However, we also observed in the Provincial Judges Reference that the effect of the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867 was to incorporate certain constitutional principles by reference, a point made earlier in Fraser v. Public Service Staff Relations Board, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 455, at pp. 462-63. In the Provincial Judges Reference, at para. 104, we determined that the preamble "invites the courts to turn those principles into the premises of a constitutional argument that culminates in the filling of gaps in the express terms of the constitutional text".

54 Underlying constitutional principles may in certain circumstances give rise to substantive legal obligations (have "full legal force", as we described it in the Patriation Reference, supra, at p. 845), which constitute substantive limitations upon government action. These principles may give rise to very abstract and general obligations, or they may be more specific and precise in nature. The principles are not merely descriptive, but are also invested with a powerful normative force, and are binding upon both courts and governments. "In other words", as this Court confirmed in the Manitoba Language Rights Reference, supra, at p. 752, "in the process of Constitutional adjudication, the Court may have regard to unwritten postulates which form the very foundation of the Constitution of Canada". It is to a discussion of those underlying constitutional principles that we now turn.

(b) Federalism

55 It is undisputed that Canada is a federal state. Yet many commentators have observed that, according to the precise terms of the Constitution Act, 1867, the federal system was only partial. See, e.g., K. C. Wheare, Federal Government (4th ed. 1963), at pp. 18-20. This was so because, on paper, the federal government retained sweeping powers which threatened to undermine the autonomy of the provinces. Here again, however, a review of the written provisions of the Constitution does not provide the entire picture. Our political and constitutional practice has adhered to an underlying principle of federalism, and has interpreted the written provisions of the Constitution in this light. For example, although the federal power of disallowance was included in the Constitution Act, 1867, the underlying principle of federalism triumphed early. Many constitutional scholars contend that the federal power of disallowance has been abandoned (e.g., P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (4th ed. 1997), at p. 120).

56 In a federal system of government such as ours, political power is shared by two orders of government: the federal government on the one hand, and the provinces on the other. Each is assigned respective spheres of jurisdiction by the Constitution Act, 1867. See, e.g., Liquidators of the Maritime Bank of Canada v. Receiver-General of New Brunswick, [1892] A.C. 437 (P.C.), at pp. 441-42. It is up to the courts "to control the limits of the respective sovereignties": Northern Telecom Canada Ltd. v. Communication Workers of Canada, [1983] 1 S.C.R. 733, at p. 741. In interpreting our Constitution, the courts have always been concerned with the federalism principle, inherent in the structure of our constitutional arrangements, which has from the beginning been the lodestar by which the courts have been guided.

57 This underlying principle of federalism, then, has exercised a role of considerable importance in the interpretation of the written provisions of our Constitution. In the Patriation Reference, supra, at pp. 905-9, we confirmed that the principle of federalism runs through the political and legal systems of Canada. Indeed, Martland and Ritchie JJ., dissenting in the Patriation Reference, at p. 821, considered federalism to be "the dominant principle of Canadian constitutional law". With the enactment of the Charter, that proposition may have less force than it once did, but there can be little doubt that the principle of federalism remains a central organizational theme of our Constitution. Less obviously, perhaps, but certainly of equal importance, federalism is a political and legal response to underlying social and political realities.

58 The principle of federalism recognizes the diversity of the component parts of Confederation, and the autonomy of provincial governments to develop their societies within their respective spheres of jurisdiction. The federal structure of our country also facilitates democratic participation by distributing power to the government thought to be most suited to achieving the particular societal objective having regard to this diversity. The scheme of the Constitution Act, 1867, it was said in Re the Initiative and Referendum Act, [1919] A.C. 935 (P.C.), at p. 942, was not to weld the Provinces into one, nor to subordinate Provincial Governments to a central authority, but to establish a central government in which these Provinces should be represented, entrusted with exclusive authority only in affairs in which they had a common interest. Subject to this each Province was to retain its independence and autonomy and to be directly under the Crown as its head.

More recently, in Haig v. Canada, [1993] 2 S.C.R. 995, at p. 1047, the majority of this Court held that differences between provinces "are a rational part of the political reality in the federal process". It was referring to the differential application of federal law in individual provinces, but the point applies more generally. A unanimous Court expressed similar views in R. v. S. (S.), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 254, at pp. 287-88.

59 The principle of federalism facilitates the pursuit of collective goals by cultural and linguistic minorities which form the majority within a particular province. This is the case in Quebec, where the majority of the population is

French-speaking, and which possesses a distinct culture. This is not merely the result of chance. The social and demographic reality of Quebec explains the existence of the province of Quebec as a political unit and indeed, was one of the essential reasons for establishing a federal structure for the Canadian union in 1867. The experience of both Canada East and Canada West under the Union Act, 1840 (U.K.), 3-4 Vict., c. 35, had not been satisfactory. The federal structure adopted at Confederation enabled French-speaking Canadians to form a numerical majority in the province of Quebec, and so exercise the considerable provincial powers conferred by the Constitution Act, 1867 in such a way as to promote their language and culture. It also made provision for certain guaranteed representation within the federal Parliament itself.

60 Federalism was also welcomed by Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, both of which also affirmed their will to protect their individual cultures and their autonomy over local matters. All new provinces joining the federation sought to achieve similar objectives, which are no less vigorously pursued by the provinces and territories as we approach the new millennium.

(c) Democracy

61 Democracy is a fundamental value in our constitutional law and political culture. While it has both an institutional and an individual aspect, the democratic principle was also argued before us in the sense of the supremacy of the sovereign will of a people, in this case potentially to be expressed by Quebecers in support of unilateral secession. It is useful to explore in a summary way these different aspects of the democratic principle.

62 The principle of democracy has always informed the design of our constitutional structure, and continues to act as an essential interpretive consideration to this day. A majority of this Court in OPSEU v. Ontario, supra, at p. 57, confirmed that "the basic structure of our Constitution, as established by the Constitution Act, 1867, contemplates the existence of certain political institutions, including freely elected legislative bodies at the federal and provincial levels". As is apparent from an earlier line of decisions emanating from this Court, including Switzman v. Elbling, [1957] S.C.R. 285, Saumur v. City of Quebec, [1953] 2 S.C.R. 299, Boucher v. The King, [1951] S.C.R. 265, and Reference re Alberta Statutes, [1938] S.C.R. 100, the democracy principle can best be understood as a sort of baseline against which the framers of our Constitution, and subsequently, our elected representatives under it, have always operated. It is perhaps for this reason that the principle was not explicitly identified in the text of the Constitution Act, 1867 itself. To have done so might have appeared redundant, even silly, to the framers. As explained in the Provincial Judges Reference, supra, at para. 100, it is evident that our Constitution contemplates that Canada shall be a constitutional democracy. Yet this merely demonstrates the importance of underlying constitutional principles that are nowhere explicitly described in our constitutional texts. The representative and democratic nature of our political institutions was simply assumed.

63 Democracy is commonly understood as being a political system of majority rule. It is essential to be clear what this means. The evolution of our democratic tradition can be traced back to the Magna Carta (1215) and before, through the long struggle for Parliamentary supremacy which culminated in the English Bill of Rights of 1689, the emergence of representative political institutions in the colonial era, the development of responsible government in the 19th century, and eventually, the achievement of Confederation itself in 1867. "[T]he Canadian tradition", the majority of this Court held in Reference re Provincial Electoral Boundaries (Sask.), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 158, at p. 186, is "one of evolutionary democracy moving in uneven steps toward the goal of universal suffrage and more effective representation". Since Confederation, efforts to extend the franchise to those unjustly excluded from participation in our political system - such as women, minorities, and aboriginal peoples - have continued, with some success, to the present day.

64 Democracy is not simply concerned with the process of government. On the contrary, as suggested in Switzman v. Elbling, supra, at p. 306, democracy is fundamentally connected to substantive goals, most importantly, the promotion of self-government. Democracy accommodates cultural and group identities: Reference re Provincial Electoral Boundaries, at p. 188. Put another way, a sovereign people exercises its right to self-government through the democratic process. In considering the scope and purpose of the Charter, the Court in R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103, articulated some of the values inherent in the notion of democracy (at p. 136):

The Court must be guided by the values and principles essential to a free and democratic society which I believe to embody, to name but a few, respect for the inherent dignity of the human person, commitment to social justice and equality, accommodation of a wide variety of beliefs, respect for cultural and group identity, and faith in social and political institutions which enhance the participation of individuals and groups in society.

65 In institutional terms, democracy means that each of the provincial legislatures and the federal Parliament is elected by popular franchise. These legislatures, we have said, are "at the core of the system of representative government": New Brunswick Broadcasting, supra, at p. 387. In individual terms, the right to vote in elections to the House of Commons and the provincial legislatures, and to be candidates in those elections, is guaranteed to "Every citizen of Canada" by virtue of s. 3 of the Charter. Historically, this Court has interpreted democracy to mean the process of representative and responsible government and the right of citizens to participate in the political process as voters (Reference re Provincial Electoral Boundaries, supra) and as candidates (Harvey v. New Brunswick (Attorney General), [1996] 2 S.C.R. 876). In addition, the effect of s. 4 of the Charter is to oblige the House of Commons and the provincial legislatures to hold regular elections and to permit citizens to elect representatives to their political institutions. The democratic principle is affirmed with particular clarity in that s. 4 is not subject to the notwithstanding power contained in s. 33.

66 It is, of course, true that democracy expresses the sovereign will of the people. Yet this expression, too, must be taken in the context of the other institutional values we have identified as pertinent to this Reference. The relationship between democracy and federalism means, for example, that in Canada there may be different and equally legitimate majorities in different provinces and territories and at the federal level. No one majority is more or less "legitimate" than the others as an expression of democratic opinion, although, of course, the consequences will vary with the subject matter. A federal system of government enables different provinces to pursue policies responsive to the particular concerns and interests of people in that province. At the same time, Canada as a whole is also a democratic community in which citizens construct and achieve goals on a national scale through a federal government acting within the limits of its jurisdiction. The function of federalism is to enable citizens to participate concurrently in different collectivities and to pursue goals at both a provincial and a federal level.

67 The consent of the governed is a value that is basic to our understanding of a free and democratic society. Yet democracy in any real sense of the word cannot exist without the rule of law. It is the law that creates the framework within which the "sovereign will" is to be ascertained and implemented. To be accorded legitimacy, democratic institutions must rest, ultimately, on a legal foundation. That is, they must allow for the participation of, and accountability to, the people, through public institutions created under the Constitution. Equally, however, a system of government cannot survive through adherence to the law alone. A political system must also possess legitimacy, and in our political culture, that requires an interaction between the rule of law and the democratic principle. The system must be capable of reflecting the aspirations of the people. But there is more. Our law's claim to legitimacy also rests on an appeal to moral values, many of which are imbedded in our constitutional structure. It would be a grave mistake to equate legitimacy with the "sovereign will" or majority rule alone, to the exclusion of other constitutional values.

68 Finally, we highlight that a functioning democracy requires a continuous process of discussion. The Constitution mandates government by democratic legislatures, and an executive accountable to them, "resting ultimately on public opinion reached by discussion and the interplay of ideas" (Saumur v. City of Quebec, supra, at p. 330). At both the federal and provincial level, by its very nature, the need to build majorities necessitates compromise, negotiation, and deliberation. No one has a monopoly on truth, and our system is predicated on the faith that in the marketplace of ideas, the best solutions to public problems will rise to the top. Inevitably, there will be dissenting voices. A democratic system of government is committed to considering those dissenting voices, and seeking to acknowledge and address those voices in the laws by which all in the community must live.

69 The Constitution Act, 1982 gives expression to this principle, by conferring a right to initiate constitutional change on each participant in Confederation. In our view, the existence of this right imposes a corresponding duty on the participants in Confederation to engage in constitutional discussions in order to acknowledge and address democratic expressions of a desire for change in other provinces. This duty is inherent in the democratic principle which is a fundamental predicate of our system of governance.

(d) Constitutionalism and the Rule of Law

70 The principles of constitutionalism and the rule of law lie at the root of our system of government. The rule of law, as observed in Roncarelli v. Duplessis, [1959] S.C.R. 121, at p. 142, is "a fundamental postulate of our constitutional structure". As we noted in the Patriation Reference, supra, at pp. 805-6, "[t]he 'rule of law' is a highly textured expression, importing many things which are beyond the need of these reasons to explore but conveying, for example, a sense of orderliness, of subjection to known legal rules and of executive accountability to legal authority". At its most basic level, the rule of law vouchsafes to the citizens and residents of the country a stable, predictable and ordered society in which to conduct their affairs. It provides a shield for individuals from arbitrary state action.

71 In the Manitoba Language Rights Reference, supra, at pp. 747-52, this Court outlined the elements of the rule of law. We emphasized, first, that the rule of law provides that the law is supreme over the acts of both government and private persons. There is, in short, one law for all. Second, we explained, at p. 749, that "the rule of law requires the creation and maintenance of an actual order of positive laws which preserves and embodies the more general principle of normative order". It was this second aspect of the rule of law that was primarily at issue in the Manitoba Language Rights Reference itself. A third aspect of the rule of law is, as recently confirmed in the Provincial Judges Reference, supra, at para. 10, that "the exercise of all public power must find its ultimate source in a legal rule". Put another way, the relationship between the state and the individual must be regulated by law. Taken together, these three considerations make up a principle of profound constitutional and political significance.

72 The constitutionalism principle bears considerable similarity to the rule of law, although they are not identical. The essence of constitutionalism in Canada is embodied in s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, which provides that "[t]he Constitution of Canada is the supreme law of Canada, and any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect." Simply put, the constitutionalism principle requires that all government action comply with the Constitution. The rule of law principle requires that all government action must comply with the law, including the Constitution. This Court has noted on several occasions that with the adoption of the Charter, the Canadian system of government was transformed to a significant extent from a system of Parliamentary supremacy to one of constitutional supremacy. The Constitution binds all governments, both federal and provincial, including the executive branch (Operation Dismantle Inc. v. The Queen, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 441, at p. 455). They may not transgress its provisions: indeed, their sole claim to exercise lawful authority rests in the powers allocated to them under the Constitution, and can come from no other source.

73 An understanding of the scope and importance of the principles of the rule of law and constitutionalism is aided by acknowledging explicitly why a constitution is entrenched beyond the reach of simple majority rule. There are three overlapping reasons.

74 First, a constitution may provide an added safeguard for fundamental human rights and individual freedoms which might otherwise be susceptible to government interference. Although democratic government is generally solicitous of those rights, there are occasions when the majority will be tempted to ignore fundamental rights in order to accomplish collective goals more easily or effectively. Constitutional entrenchment ensures that those rights will be given due regard and protection. Second, a constitution may seek to ensure that vulnerable minority groups are endowed with the institutions and rights necessary to maintain and promote their identities against the assimilative pressures of the majority. And third, a constitution may provide for a division of political power that allocates political power amongst different levels of government. That purpose would be defeated if one of those democratically elected levels of government could usurp the powers of the other simply by exercising its legislative power to allocate additional political power to itself unilaterally.

75 The argument that the Constitution may be legitimately circumvented by resort to a majority vote in a province-wide referendum is superficially persuasive, in large measure because it seems to appeal to some of the same principles that underlie the legitimacy of the Constitution itself, namely, democracy and self-government. In short, it is suggested that as the notion of popular sovereignty underlies the legitimacy of our existing constitutional arrangements, so the same popular sovereignty that originally led to the present Constitution must (it is argued) also permit "the people" in their exercise of popular sovereignty to secede by majority vote alone. However, closer analysis reveals that this argument is unsound, because it misunderstands the meaning of popular sovereignty and the essence of a constitutional democracy.

76 Canadians have never accepted that ours is a system of simple majority rule. Our principle of democracy, taken in conjunction with the other constitutional principles discussed here, is richer. Constitutional government is necessarily predicated on the idea that the political representatives of the people of a province have the capacity and the power to commit the province to be bound into the future by the constitutional rules being adopted. These rules are "binding" not in the sense of frustrating the will of a majority of a province, but as defining the majority which must be consulted in order to alter the fundamental balances of political power (including the spheres of autonomy guaranteed by the principle of federalism), individual rights, and minority rights in our society. Of course, those constitutional rules are themselves amenable to amendment, but only through a process of negotiation which ensures that there is an opportunity for the constitutionally defined rights of all the parties to be respected and reconciled.

77 In this way, our belief in democracy may be harmonized with our belief in constitutionalism. Constitutional amendment often requires some form of substantial consensus precisely because the content of the underlying principles of our Constitution demand it. By requiring broad support in the form of an "enhanced majority" to achieve constitutional change, the Constitution ensures that minority interests must be addressed before proposed changes which would affect them may be enacted.

78 It might be objected, then, that constitutionalism is therefore incompatible with democratic government. This would be an erroneous view. Constitutionalism facilitates - indeed, makes possible - a democratic political system by creating an orderly framework within which people may make political decisions. Viewed correctly, constitutionalism and the rule of law are not in conflict with democracy; rather, they are essential to it. Without that relationship, the political will upon which democratic decisions are taken would itself be undermined.

(e) Protection of Minorities

79 The fourth underlying constitutional principle we address here concerns the protection of minorities. There are a number of specific constitutional provisions protecting minority language, religion and education rights. Some of those provisions are, as we have recognized on a number of occasions, the product of historical compromises. As this Court observed in Reference re Bill 30, An Act to amend the Education Act (Ont.), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 1148, at p. 1173, and in Reference re Education Act (Que.), [1993] 2 S.C.R. 511, at pp. 529-30, the protection of minority religious education rights was a central consideration in the negotiations leading to Confederation. In the absence of such protection, it was felt that the minorities in what was then Canada East and Canada West would be submerged and assimilated. See also Greater Montreal Protestant School Board v. Quebec (Attorney General), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 377, at pp. 401-2, and Adler v. Ontario, [1996] 3 S.C.R. 609. Similar concerns animated the provisions protecting minority language rights, as noted in Société des Acadiens du Nouveau-Brunswick Inc. v. Association of Parents for Fairness in Education, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 549, at p. 564.

80 However, we highlight that even though those provisions were the product of negotiation and political compromise, that does not render them unprincipled. Rather, such a concern reflects a broader principle related to the protection of minority rights. Undoubtedly, the three other constitutional principles inform the scope and operation of the specific provisions that protect the rights of minorities. We emphasize that the protection of minority rights is itself an independent principle underlying our constitutional order. The principle is clearly reflected in the Charter's provisions for the protection of minority rights. See, e.g., Reference re Public Schools Act (Man.), s. 79(3), (4) and (7), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 839, and Mahe v. Alberta, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 342.

81 The concern of our courts and governments to protect minorities has been prominent in recent years, particularly following the enactment of the Charter. Undoubtedly, one of the key considerations motivating the enactment of the Charter, and the process of constitutional judicial review that it entails, is the protection of minorities. However, it should not be forgotten that the protection of minority rights had a long history before the enactment of the Charter. Indeed, the protection of minority rights was clearly an essential consideration in the design of our constitutional structure even at the time of Confederation: Senate Reference, supra, at p. 71. Although Canada's record of upholding the rights of minorities is not a spotless one, that goal is one towards which Canadians have been striving since Confederation, and the process has not been without successes. The principle of protecting minority rights continues to exercise influence in the operation and interpretation of our Constitution.

82 Consistent with this long tradition of respect for minorities, which is at least as old as Canada itself, the framers of the Constitution Act, 1982 included in s. 35 explicit protection for existing aboriginal and treaty rights, and in s. 25, a non-derogation clause in favour of the rights of aboriginal peoples. The "promise" of s. 35, as it was termed in R. v. Sparrow, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1075, at p. 1083, recognized not only the ancient occupation of land by aboriginal peoples, but their contribution to the building of Canada, and the special commitments made to them by successive governments. The protection of these rights, so recently and arduously achieved, whether looked at in their own right or as part of the larger concern with minorities, reflects an important underlying constitutional value.

(4) The Operation of the Constitutional Principles in the Secession Context

83 Secession is the effort of a group or section of a state to withdraw itself from the political and constitutional authority of that state, with a view to achieving statehood for a new territorial unit on the international plane. In a federal state, secession typically takes the form of a territorial unit seeking to withdraw from the federation. Secession is a legal act as much as a political one. By the terms of Question 1 of this Reference, we are asked to rule on the legality of unilateral secession "[u]nder the Constitution of Canada". This is an appropriate question, as the legality of unilateral secession must be evaluated, at least in the first instance, from the perspective of the domestic legal order of the state from which the unit seeks to withdraw. As we shall see below, it is also argued that international law is a relevant standard by which the legality of a purported act of secession may be measured.

84 The secession of a province from Canada must be considered, in legal terms, to require an amendment to the Constitution, which perforce requires negotiation. The amendments necessary to achieve a secession could be radical and extensive. Some commentators have suggested that secession could be a change of such a magnitude that it could not be considered to be merely an amendment to the Constitution. We are not persuaded by this contention. It is of course true that the Constitution is silent as to the ability of a province to secede from Confederation but, although the Constitution neither expressly authorizes nor prohibits secession, an act of secession would purport to alter the governance of Canadian territory in a manner which undoubtedly is inconsistent with our current constitutional arrangements. The fact that those changes would be profound, or that they would purport to have a significance with respect to international law, does not negate their nature as amendments to the Constitution of Canada.

85 The Constitution is the expression of the sovereignty of the people of Canada. It lies within the power of the people of Canada, acting through their various governments duly elected and recognized under the Constitution, to effect whatever constitutional arrangements are desired within Canadian territory, including, should it be so desired, the secession of Quebec from Canada. As this Court held in the Manitoba Language Rights Reference, supra, at p. 745, "[t]he Constitution of a country is a statement of the will of the people to be governed in accordance with certain principles held as fundamental and certain prescriptions restrictive of the powers of the legislature and government". The manner in which such a political will could be formed and mobilized is a somewhat speculative exercise, though we are asked to assume the existence of such a political will for the purpose of answering the question before us. By the terms of this Reference, we have been asked to consider whether it would be constitutional in such a circumstance for the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally.

86 The "unilateral" nature of the act is of cardinal importance and we must be clear as to what is understood by this term. In one sense, any step towards a constitutional amendment initiated by a single actor on the constitutional stage is "unilateral". We do not believe that this is the meaning contemplated by Question 1, nor is this the sense in which the term has been used in argument before us. Rather, what is claimed by a right to secede "unilaterally" is the right to effectuate secession without prior negotiations with the other provinces and the federal government. At issue is not the legality of the first step but the legality of the final act of purported unilateral secession. The supposed juridical basis for such an act is said to be a clear expression of democratic will in a referendum in the province of Quebec. This claim requires us to examine the possible juridical impact, if any, of such a referendum on the functioning of our Constitution, and on the claimed legality of a unilateral act of secession.

87 Although the Constitution does not itself address the use of a referendum procedure, and the results of a referendum have no direct role or legal effect in our constitutional scheme, a referendum undoubtedly may provide a democratic method of ascertaining the views of the electorate on important political questions on a particular occasion. The democratic principle identified above would demand that considerable weight be given to a clear expression by the people of Quebec of their will to secede from Canada, even though a referendum, in itself and without more, has no direct legal effect, and could not in itself bring about unilateral secession. Our political institutions are premised on the democratic principle, and so an expression of the democratic will of the people of a province carries weight, in that it would confer legitimacy on the efforts of the government of Quebec to initiate the Constitution's amendment process in order to secede by constitutional means. In this context, we refer to a "clear" majority as a qualitative evaluation. The referendum result, if it is to be taken as an expression of the democratic will, must be free of ambiguity both in terms of the question asked and in terms of the support it achieves.

88 The federalism principle, in conjunction with the democratic principle, dictates that the clear repudiation of the existing constitutional order and the clear expression of the desire to pursue secession by the population of a province would give rise to a reciprocal obligation on all parties to Confederation to negotiate constitutional changes to respond to that desire. The amendment of the Constitution begins with a political process undertaken pursuant to the Constitution itself. In Canada, the initiative for constitutional amendment is the responsibility of democratically elected representatives of the participants in Confederation. Those representatives may, of course, take their cue from a referendum, but in legal terms, constitution-making in Canada, as in many countries, is undertaken by the democratically elected representatives of the people. The corollary of a legitimate attempt by one participant in Confederation to seek an amendment to the Constitution is an obligation on all parties to come to the negotiating table. The clear repudiation by the people of Quebec of the existing constitutional order would confer legitimacy on demands for secession, and place an obligation on the other provinces and the federal government to acknowledge and respect that expression of democratic will by entering into negotiations and conducting them in accordance with the underlying constitutional principles already discussed.

89 What is the content of this obligation to negotiate? At this juncture, we confront the difficult inter-relationship between substantive obligations flowing from the Constitution and questions of judicial competence and restraint in supervising or enforcing those obligations. This is mirrored by the distinction between the legality and the legitimacy of actions taken under the Constitution. We propose to focus first on the substantive obligations flowing from this obligation to negotiate; once the nature of those obligations has been described, it is easier to assess the appropriate means of enforcement of those obligations, and to comment on the distinction between legality and legitimacy.

90 The conduct of the parties in such negotiations would be governed by the same constitutional principles which give rise to the duty to negotiate: federalism, democracy, constitutionalism and the rule of law, and the protection of minorities. Those principles lead us to reject two absolutist propositions. One of those propositions is that there would be a legal obligation on the other provinces and federal government to accede to the secession of a province, subject only to negotiation of the logistical details of secession. This proposition is attributed either to the supposed implications of the democratic principle of the Constitution, or to the international law principle of self-determination of peoples.

91 For both theoretical and practical reasons, we cannot accept this view. We hold that Quebec could not purport to invoke a right of self-determination such as to dictate the terms of a proposed secession to the other parties: that would not be a negotiation at all. As well, it would be naive to expect that the substantive goal of secession could readily be distinguished from the practical details of secession. The devil would be in the details. The democracy principle, as we have emphasized, cannot be invoked to trump the principles of federalism and rule of law, the rights of individuals and minorities, or the operation of democracy in the other provinces or in Canada as a whole. No negotiations could be effective if their ultimate outcome, secession, is cast as an absolute legal entitlement based upon an obligation to give effect to that act of secession in the Constitution. Such a foregone conclusion would actually undermine the obligation to negotiate and render it hollow.

92 However, we are equally unable to accept the reverse proposition, that a clear expression of self-determination by the people of Quebec would impose no obligations upon the other provinces or the federal government. The continued existence and operation of the Canadian constitutional order cannot remain indifferent to the clear expression of a clear majority of Quebecers that they no longer wish to remain in Canada. This would amount to the assertion that other constitutionally recognized principles necessarily trump the clearly expressed democratic will of the people of Quebec. Such a proposition fails to give sufficient weight to the underlying constitutional principles that must inform the amendment process, including the principles of democracy and federalism. The rights of other provinces and the federal government cannot deny the right of the government of Quebec to pursue secession, should a clear majority of the people of Quebec choose that goal, so long as in doing so, Quebec respects the rights of others. Negotiations would be necessary to address the interests of the federal government, of Quebec and the other provinces, and other participants, as well as the rights of all Canadians both within and outside Quebec.

93 Is the rejection of both of these propositions reconcilable? Yes, once it is realized that none of the rights or principles under discussion is absolute to the exclusion of the others. This observation suggests that other parties cannot exercise their rights in such a way as to amount to an absolute denial of Quebec's rights, and similarly, that so long as Quebec exercises its rights while respecting the rights of others, it may propose secession and seek to achieve it through negotiation. The negotiation process precipitated by a decision of a clear majority of the population of Quebec on a clear question to pursue secession would require the reconciliation of various rights and obligations by the representatives of two legitimate majorities, namely, the clear majority of the population of Quebec, and the clear majority of Canada as a whole, whatever that may be. There can be no suggestion that either of these majorities "trumps" the other. A political majority that does not act in accordance with the underlying constitutional principles we have identified puts at risk the legitimacy of the exercise of its rights.

94 In such circumstances, the conduct of the parties assumes primary constitutional significance. The negotiation process must be conducted with an eye to the constitutional principles we have outlined, which must inform the actions of all the participants in the negotiation process.

95 Refusal of a party to conduct negotiations in a manner consistent with constitutional principles and values would seriously put at risk the legitimacy of that party's assertion of its rights, and perhaps the negotiation process as a whole. Those who quite legitimately insist upon the importance of upholding the rule of law cannot at the same time be oblivious to the need to act in conformity with constitutional principles and values, and so do their part to contribute to the maintenance and promotion of an environment in which the rule of law may flourish.

96 No one can predict the course that such negotiations might take. The possibility that they might not lead to an agreement amongst the parties must be recognized. Negotiations following a referendum vote in favour of seeking secession would inevitably address a wide range of issues, many of great import. After 131 years of Confederation, there exists, inevitably, a high level of integration in economic, political and social institutions across Canada. The vision of those who brought about Confederation was to create a unified country, not a loose alliance of autonomous provinces. Accordingly, while there are regional economic interests, which sometimes coincide with provincial boundaries, there are also national interests and enterprises (both public and private) that would face potential dismemberment. There is a national economy and a national debt. Arguments were raised before us regarding boundary issues. There are linguistic and cultural minorities, including aboriginal peoples, unevenly distributed across the country who look to the Constitution of Canada for the protection of their rights. Of course, secession would give rise to many issues of great complexity and difficulty. These would have to be resolved within the overall framework of the rule of law, thereby assuring Canadians resident in Quebec and elsewhere a measure of stability in what would likely be a period of considerable upheaval and uncertainty. Nobody seriously suggests that our national existence, seamless in so many aspects, could be effortlessly separated along what are now the provincial boundaries of Quebec. As the Attorney General of Saskatchewan put it in his oral submission:

A nation is built when the communities that comprise it make commitments to it, when they forego choices and opportunities on behalf of a nation, . . . when the communities that comprise it make compromises, when they offer each other guarantees, when they make transfers and perhaps most pointedly, when they receive from others the benefits of national solidarity. The threads of a thousand acts of accommodation are the fabric of a nation. . . .

97 In the circumstances, negotiations following such a referendum would undoubtedly be difficult. While the negotiators would have to contemplate the possibility of secession, there would be no absolute legal entitlement to it and no assumption that an agreement reconciling all relevant rights and obligations would actually be reached. It is foreseeable that even negotiations carried out in conformity with the underlying constitutional principles could reach an impasse. We need not speculate here as to what would then transpire. Under the Constitution, secession requires that an amendment be negotiated.

98 The respective roles of the courts and political actors in discharging the constitutional obligations we have identified follows ineluctably from the foregoing observations. In the Patriation Reference, a distinction was drawn between the law of the Constitution, which, generally speaking, will be enforced by the courts, and other constitutional rules, such as the conventions of the Constitution, which carry only political sanctions. It is also the case, however, that judicial intervention, even in relation to the law of the Constitution, is subject to the Court's appreciation of its proper role in the constitutional scheme.

99 The notion of justiciability is, as we earlier pointed out in dealing with the preliminary objection, linked to the notion of appropriate judicial restraint. We earlier made reference to the discussion of justiciability in Reference re Canada Assistance Plan, supra, at p. 545:

In exercising its discretion whether to determine a matter that is alleged to be non-justiciable, the Court's primary concern is to retain its proper role within the constitutional framework of our democratic form of government.

In Operation Dismantle, supra, at p. 459, it was pointed out that justiciability is a "doctrine . . . founded upon a concern with the appropriate role of the courts as the forum for the resolution of different types of disputes". An analogous doctrine of judicial restraint operates here. Also, as observed in Canada (Auditor General) v. Canada (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 49 (the Auditor General's case), at p. 91:

There is an array of issues which calls for the exercise of judicial judgment on whether the questions are properly cognizable by the courts. Ultimately, such judgment depends on the appreciation by the judiciary of its own position in the constitutional scheme.

100 The role of the Court in this Reference is limited to the identification of the relevant aspects of the Constitution in their broadest sense. We have interpreted the questions as relating to the constitutional framework within which political decisions may ultimately be made. Within that framework, the workings of the political process are complex and can only be resolved by means of political judgments and evaluations. The Court has no supervisory role over the political aspects of constitutional negotiations. Equally, the initial impetus for negotiation, namely a clear majority on a clear question in favour of secession, is subject only to political evaluation, and properly so. A right and a corresponding duty to negotiate secession cannot be built on an alleged expression of democratic will if the expression of democratic will is itself fraught with ambiguities. Only the political actors would have the information and expertise to make the appropriate judgment as to the point at which, and the circumstances in which, those ambiguities are resolved one way or the other.

101 If the circumstances giving rise to the duty to negotiate were to arise, the distinction between the strong defence of legitimate interests and the taking of positions which, in fact, ignore the legitimate interests of others is one that also defies legal analysis. The Court would not have access to all of the information available to the political actors, and the methods appropriate for the search for truth in a court of law are ill-suited to getting to the bottom of constitutional negotiations. To the extent that the questions are political in nature, it is not the role of the judiciary to interpose its own views on the different negotiating positions of the parties, even were it invited to do so. Rather, it is the obligation of the elected representatives to give concrete form to the discharge of their constitutional obligations which only they and their electors can ultimately assess. The reconciliation of the various legitimate constitutional interests outlined above is necessarily committed to the political rather than the judicial realm, precisely because that reconciliation can only be achieved through the give and take of the negotiation process. Having established the legal framework, it would be for the democratically elected leadership of the various participants to resolve their differences.

102 The non-justiciability of political issues that lack a legal component does not deprive the surrounding constitutional framework of its binding status, nor does this mean that constitutional obligations could be breached without incurring serious legal repercussions. Where there are legal rights there are remedies, but as we explained in the Auditor General's case, supra, at p. 90, and New Brunswick Broadcasting, supra, the appropriate recourse in some circumstances lies through the workings of the political process rather than the courts.

103 To the extent that a breach of the constitutional duty to negotiate in accordance with the principles described above undermines the legitimacy of a party's actions, it may have important ramifications at the international level. Thus, a failure of the duty to undertake negotiations and pursue them according to constitutional principles may undermine that government's claim to legitimacy which is generally a precondition for recognition by the international community. Conversely, violations of those principles by the federal or other provincial governments responding to the request for secession may undermine their legitimacy. Thus, a Quebec that had negotiated in conformity with constitutional principles and values in the face of unreasonable intransigence on the part of other participants at the federal or provincial level would be more likely to be recognized than a Quebec which did not itself act according to constitutional principles in the negotiation process. Both the legality of the acts of the parties to the negotiation process under Canadian law, and the perceived legitimacy of such action, would be important considerations in the recognition process. In this way, the adherence of the parties to the obligation to negotiate would be evaluated in an indirect manner on the international plane.

104 Accordingly, the secession of Quebec from Canada cannot be accomplished by the National Assembly, the legislature or government of Quebec unilaterally, that is to say, without principled negotiations, and be considered a lawful act. Any attempt to effect the secession of a province from Canada must be undertaken pursuant to the Constitution of Canada, or else violate the Canadian legal order. However, the continued existence and operation of the Canadian constitutional order cannot remain unaffected by the unambiguous expression of a clear majority of Quebecers that they no longer wish to remain in Canada. The primary means by which that expression is given effect is the constitutional duty to negotiate in accordance with the constitutional principles that we have described herein. In the event secession negotiations are initiated, our Constitution, no less than our history, would call on the participants to work to reconcile the rights, obligations and legitimate aspirations of all Canadians within a framework that emphasizes constitutional responsibilities as much as it does constitutional rights.

105 It will be noted that Question 1 does not ask how secession could be achieved in a constitutional manner, but addresses one form of secession only, namely unilateral secession. Although the applicability of various procedures to achieve lawful secession was raised in argument, each option would require us to assume the existence of facts that at this stage are unknown. In accordance with the usual rule of prudence in constitutional cases, we refrain from pronouncing on the applicability of any particular constitutional procedure to effect secession unless and until sufficiently clear facts exist to squarely raise an issue for judicial determination.

(5) Suggested Principle of Effectivity

106 In the foregoing discussion we have not overlooked the principle of effectivity, which was placed at the forefront in argument before us. For the reasons that follow, we do not think that the principle of effectivity has any application to the issues raised by Question 1. A distinction must be drawn between the right of a people to act, and their power to do so. They are not identical. A right is recognized in law: mere physical ability is not necessarily given status as a right. The fact that an individual or group can act in a certain way says nothing at all about the legal status or consequences of the act. A power may be exercised even in the absence of a right to do so, but if it is, then it is exercised without legal foundation. Our Constitution does not address powers in this sense. On the contrary, the Constitution is concerned only with the rights and obligations of individuals, groups and governments, and the structure of our institutions. It was suggested before us that the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec could unilaterally effect the secession of that province from Canada, but it was not suggested that they might do so as a matter of law: rather, it was contended that they simply could do so as a matter of fact. Although under the Constitution there is no right to pursue secession unilaterally, that is secession without principled negotiation, this does not rule out the possibility of an unconstitutional declaration of secession leading to a de facto secession. The ultimate success of such a secession would be dependent on effective control of a territory and recognition by the international community. The principles governing secession at international law are discussed in our answer to Question 2.

107 In our view, the alleged principle of effectivity has no constitutional or legal status in the sense that it does not provide an ex ante explanation or justification for an act. In essence, acceptance of a principle of effectivity would be tantamount to accepting that the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec may act without regard to the law, simply because it asserts the power to do so. So viewed, the suggestion is that the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec could purport to secede the province unilaterally from Canada in disregard of Canadian and international law. It is further suggested that if the secession bid was successful, a new legal order would be created in that province, which would then be considered an independent state.

108 Such a proposition is an assertion of fact, not a statement of law. It may or may not be true; in any event it is irrelevant to the questions of law before us. If, on the other hand, it is put forward as an assertion of law, then it simply amounts to the contention that the law may be broken as long as it can be broken successfully. Such a notion is contrary to the rule of law, and must be rejected.

B. Question 2

Does international law give the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec the right to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally? In this regard, is there a right to self-determination under international law that would give the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec the right to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally?

109 For reasons already discussed, the Court does not accept the contention that Question 2 raises a question of "pure" international law which this Court has no jurisdiction to address. Question 2 is posed in the context of a Reference to address the existence or non-existence of a right of unilateral secession by a province of Canada. The amicus curiae argues that this question ultimately falls to be determined under international law. In addressing this issue, the Court does not purport to act as an arbiter between sovereign states or more generally within the international community. The Court is engaged in rendering an advisory opinion on certain legal aspects of the continued existence of the Canadian federation. International law has been invoked as a consideration and it must therefore be addressed.

110 The argument before the Court on Question 2 has focused largely on determining whether, under international law, a positive legal right to unilateral secession exists in the factual circumstances assumed for the purpose of our response to Question 1. Arguments were also advanced to the effect that, regardless of the existence or non-existence of a positive right to unilateral secession, international law will in the end recognize effective political realities -- including the emergence of a new state -- as facts. While our response to Question 2 will address considerations raised by this alternative argument of "effectivity", it should first be noted that the existence of a positive legal entitlement is quite different from a prediction that the law will respond after the fact to a then existing political reality. These two concepts examine different points in time. The questions posed to the Court address legal rights in advance of a unilateral act of purported secession. While we touch below on the practice governing the international recognition of emerging states, the Court is as wary of entertaining speculation about the possible future conduct of sovereign states on the international level as it was under Question 1 to speculate about the possible future course of political negotiations among the participants in the Canadian federation. In both cases, the Reference questions are directed only to the legal framework within which the political actors discharge their various mandates.

(1) Secession at International Law

111 It is clear that international law does not specifically grant component parts of sovereign states the legal right to secede unilaterally from their "parent" state. This is acknowledged by the experts who provided their opinions on behalf of both the amicus curiae and the Attorney General of Canada. Given the lack of specific authorization for unilateral secession, proponents of the existence of such a right at international law are therefore left to attempt to found their argument (i) on the proposition that unilateral secession is not specifically prohibited and that what is not specifically prohibited is inferentially permitted; or (ii) on the implied duty of states to recognize the legitimacy of secession brought about by the exercise of the well-established international law right of "a people" to self-determination. The amicus curiae addressed the right of self-determination, but submitted that it was not applicable to the circumstances of Quebec within the Canadian federation, irrespective of the existence or non-existence of a referendum result in favour of secession. We agree on this point with the amicus curiae, for reasons that we will briefly develop.

(a) Absence of a Specific Prohibition

112 International law contains neither a right of unilateral secession nor the explicit denial of such a right, although such a denial is, to some extent, implicit in the exceptional circumstances required for secession to be permitted under the right of a people to self-determination, e.g., the right of secession that arises in the exceptional situation of an oppressed or colonial people, discussed below. As will be seen, international law places great importance on the territorial integrity of nation states and, by and large, leaves the creation of a new state to be determined by the domestic law of the existing state of which the seceding entity presently forms a part (R. Y. Jennings, The Acquisition of Territory in International Law (1963), at pp. 8-9). Where, as here, unilateral secession would be incompatible with the domestic Constitution, international law is likely to accept that conclusion subject to the right of peoples to self-determination, a topic to which we now turn.

(b) The Right of a People to Self-determination

113 While international law generally regulates the conduct of nation states, it does, in some specific circumstances, also recognize the "rights" of entities other than nation states -- such as the right of a people to self-determination.

114 The existence of the right of a people to self-determination is now so widely recognized in international conventions that the principle has acquired a status beyond "convention" and is considered a general principle of international law. (A. Cassese, Self-determination of peoples: A legal reappraisal (1995), at pp. 171-72; K. Doehring, "Self-Determination", in B. Simma, ed., The Charter of the United Nations: A Commentary (1994), at p. 70.)

115 Article 1 of the Charter of the United Nations, Can. T.S. 1945 No. 7, states in part that one of the purposes of the United Nations (U.N.) is:

2. To develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, and to take other appropriate measures to strengthen universal peace;

116 Article 55 of the U.N. Charter further states that the U.N. shall promote goals such as higher standards of living, full employment and human rights "[w]ith a view to the creation of conditions of stability and well-being which are necessary for peaceful and friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples".

117 This basic principle of self-determination has been carried forward and addressed in so many U.N. conventions and resolutions that, as noted by Doehring, supra, at p. 60:

The sheer number of resolutions concerning the right of self-determination makes their enumeration impossible.

118 For our purposes, reference to the following conventions and resolutions is sufficient. Article 1 of both the U.N.'s International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 999 U.N.T.S. 171, and its International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, 993 U.N.T.S. 3, states:

1. All peoples have the right of self-determination. By virtue of that right they freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development.

119 Similarly, the U.N. General Assembly's Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, GA Res. 2625 (XXV), 24 October 1970 (Declaration on Friendly Relations), states:

By virtue of the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations, all peoples have the right freely to determine, without external interference, their political status and to pursue their economic, social and cultural development, and every State has the duty to respect this right in accordance with the provisions of the Charter.

120 In 1993, the U.N. World Conference on Human Rights adopted the Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action, A/CONF.157/24, 25 June 1993, that reaffirmed Article 1 of the two above-mentioned covenants. The U.N. General Assembly's Declaration on the Occasion of the Fiftieth Anniversary of the United Nations, GA Res. 50/6, 9 November 1995, also emphasizes the right to self-determination by providing that the U.N.'s member states will:

1. . . .

Continue to reaffirm the right of self-determination of all peoples, taking into account the particular situation of peoples under colonial or other forms of alien domination or foreign occupation, and recognize the right of peoples to take legitimate action in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations to realize their inalienable right of self-determination. This shall not be construed as authorizing or encouraging any action that would dismember or impair, totally or in part, the territorial integrity or political unity of sovereign and independent States conducting themselves in compliance with the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples and thus possessed of a Government representing the whole people belonging to the territory without distinction of any kind. . . . [Emphasis added.]

121 The right to self-determination is also recognized in other international legal documents. For example, the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, 14 I.L.M. 1292 (1975) (Helsinki Final Act), states (in Part VIII):

The participating States will respect the equal rights of peoples and their right to self-determination, acting at all times in conformity with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and with the relevant norms of international law, including those relating to territorial integrity of States.

By virtue of the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, all peoples always have the right, in full freedom, to determine, when and as they wish, their internal and external political status, without external interference, and to pursue as they wish their political, economic, social and cultural development. [Emphasis added.]

122 As will be seen, international law expects that the right to self-determination will be exercised by peoples within the framework of existing sovereign states and consistently with the maintenance of the territorial integrity of those states. Where this is not possible, in the exceptional circumstances discussed below, a right of secession may arise.

(i) Defining "Peoples"

123 International law grants the right to self-determination to "peoples". Accordingly, access to the right requires the threshold step of characterizing as a people the group seeking self-determination. However, as the right to self-determination has developed by virtue of a combination of international agreements and conventions, coupled with state practice, with little formal elaboration of the definition of "peoples", the result has been that the precise meaning of the term "people" remains somewhat uncertain.

124 It is clear that "a people" may include only a portion of the population of an existing state. The right to self-determination has developed largely as a human right, and is generally used in documents that simultaneously contain references to "nation" and "state". The juxtaposition of these terms is indicative that the reference to "people" does not necessarily mean the entirety of a state's population. To restrict the definition of the term to the population of existing states would render the granting of a right to self-determination largely duplicative, given the parallel emphasis within the majority of the source documents on the need to protect the territorial integrity of existing states, and would frustrate its remedial purpose.

125 While much of the Quebec population certainly shares many of the characteristics (such as a common language and culture) that would be considered in determining whether a specific group is a "people", as do other groups within Quebec and/or Canada, it is not necessary to explore this legal characterization to resolve Question 2 appropriately. Similarly, it is not necessary for the Court to determine whether, should a Quebec people exist within the definition of public international law, such a people encompasses the entirety of the provincial population or just a portion thereof. Nor is it necessary to examine the position of the aboriginal population within Quebec. As the following discussion of the scope of the right to self-determination will make clear, whatever be the correct application of the definition of people(s) in this context, their right of self-determination cannot in the present circumstances be said to ground a right to unilateral secession.

(ii) Scope of the Right to Self-determination

126 The recognized sources of international law establish that the right to self-determination of a people is normally fulfilled through internal self-determination -- a people's pursuit of its political, economic, social and cultural development within the framework of an existing state. A right to external self-determination (which in this case potentially takes the form of the assertion of a right to unilateral secession) arises in only the most extreme of cases and, even then, under carefully defined circumstances. External self-determination can be defined as in the following statement from the Declaration on Friendly Relations as

127 The international law principle of self-determination has evolved within a framework of respect for the territorial integrity of existing states. The various international documents that support the existence of a people's right to self-determination also contain parallel statements supportive of the conclusion that the exercise of such a right must be sufficiently limited to prevent threats to an existing state's territorial integrity or the stability of relations between sovereign states.

128 The Declaration on Friendly Relations, the Vienna Declaration and the Declaration on the Occasion of the Fiftieth Anniversary of the United Nations are specific. They state, immediately after affirming a people's right to determine political, economic, social and cultural issues, that such rights are not to be construed as authorizing or encouraging any action that would dismember or impair, totally or in part, the territorial integrity or political unity of sovereign and independent States conducting themselves in compliance with the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples and thus possessed of a Government representing the whole people belonging to the territory without distinction. . . . [Emphasis added.]

operation in Europe on the follow-up to the Helsinki Final Act again refers to peoples having the right to determine "their internal and external political status" (emphasis added), that statement is immediately followed by express recognition that the participating states will at all times act, as stated in the Helsinki Final Act, "in conformity with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and with the relevant norms of international law, including those relating to territorial integrity of States" (emphasis added). Principle 5 of the concluding document states that the participating states (including Canada):

. . . confirm their commitment strictly and effectively to observe the principle of the territorial integrity of States. They will refrain from any violation of this principle and thus from any action aimed by direct or indirect means, in contravention of the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations, other obligations under international law or the provisions of the [Helsinki] Final Act, at violating the territorial integrity, political independence or the unity of a State. No actions or situations in contravention of this principle will be recognized as legal by the participating States. [Emphasis added.]

Accordingly, the reference in the Helsinki Final Act to a people determining its external political status is interpreted to mean the expression of a people's external political status through the government of the existing state, save in the exceptional circumstances discussed below. As noted by Cassese, supra, at p. 287, given the history and textual structure of this document, its reference to external self-determination simply means that "no territorial or other change can be brought about by the central authorities of a State that is contrary to the will of the whole people of that State".

130 While the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights do not specifically refer to the protection of territorial integrity, they both define the ambit of the right to self-determination in terms that are normally attainable within the framework of an existing state. There is no necessary incompatibility between the maintenance of the territorial integrity of existing states, including Canada, and the right of a "people" to achieve a full measure of self-determination. A state whose government represents the whole of the people or peoples resident within its territory, on a basis of equality and without discrimination, and respects the principles of self-determination in its own internal arrangements, is entitled to the protection under international law of its territorial integrity.

(iii) Colonial and Oppressed Peoples

131 Accordingly, the general state of international law with respect to the right to self-determination is that the right operates within the overriding protection granted to the territorial integrity of "parent" states. However, as noted by Cassese, supra, at p. 334, there are certain defined contexts within which the right to the self-determination of peoples does allow that right to be exercised "externally", which, in the context of this Reference, would potentially mean secession:

. . . the right to external self-determination, which entails the possibility of choosing (or restoring) independence, has only been bestowed upon two classes of peoples (those under colonial rule or foreign occupation), based upon the assumption that both classes make up entities that are inherently distinct from the colonialist Power and the occupant Power and that their 'territorial integrity', all but destroyed by the colonialist or occupying Power, should be fully restored. . . .

132 The right of colonial peoples to exercise their right to self-determination by breaking away from the "imperial" power is now undisputed, but is irrelevant to this Reference.

133 The other clear case where a right to external self-determination accrues is where a people is subject to alien subjugation, domination or exploitation outside a colonial context. This recognition finds its roots in the Declaration on Friendly Relations:

Every State has the duty to promote, through joint and separate action, realization of the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, in accordance with the provisions of the Charter, and to render assistance to the United Nations in carrying out the responsibilities entrusted to it by the Charter regarding the implementation of the principle, in order:

- (a) To promote friendly relations and co-operation among States; and

- (b) To bring a speedy end to colonialism, having due regard to the freely expressed will of the peoples concerned; and bearing in mind that subjection of peoples to alien subjugation, domination and exploitation constitutes a violation of the principle, as well as a denial of fundamental human rights, and is contrary to the Charter.

134 A number of commentators have further asserted that the right to self-determination may ground a right to unilateral secession in a third circumstance. Although this third circumstance has been described in several ways, the underlying proposition is that, when a people is blocked from the meaningful exercise of its right to self-determination internally, it is entitled, as a last resort, to exercise it by secession. The Vienna Declaration requirement that governments represent "the whole people belonging to the territory without distinction of any kind" adds credence to the assertion that such a complete blockage may potentially give rise to a right of secession.

135 Clearly, such a circumstance parallels the other two recognized situations in that the ability of a people to exercise its right to self-determination internally is somehow being totally frustrated. While it remains unclear whether this third proposition actually reflects an established international law standard, it is unnecessary for present purposes to make that determination. Even assuming that the third circumstance is sufficient to create a right to unilateral secession under international law, the current Quebec context cannot be said to approach such a threshold. As stated by the amicus curiae, Addendum to the factum of the amicus curiae, at paras. 15-16:

[Translation] 15. The Quebec people is not the victim of attacks on its physical existence or integrity, or of a massive violation of its fundamental rights. The Quebec people is manifestly not, in the opinion of the amicus curiae, an oppressed people.

16. For close to 40 of the last 50 years, the Prime Minister of Canada has been a Quebecer. During this period, Quebecers have held from time to time all the most important positions in the federal Cabinet. During the 8 years prior to June 1997, the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Official Opposition in the House of Commons were both Quebecers. At present, the Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Honourable Chief Justice and two other members of the Court, the Chief of Staff of the Canadian Armed Forces and the Canadian ambassador to the United States, not to mention the Deputy Secretary-General of the United Nations, are all Quebecers. The international achievements of Quebecers in most fields of human endeavour are too numerous to list. Since the dynamism of the Quebec people has been directed toward the business sector, it has been clearly successful in Quebec, the rest of Canada and abroad.

136 The population of Quebec cannot plausibly be said to be denied access to government. Quebecers occupy prominent positions within the government of Canada. Residents of the province freely make political choices and pursue economic, social and cultural development within Quebec, across Canada, and throughout the world. The population of Quebec is equitably represented in legislative, executive and judicial institutions. In short, to reflect the phraseology of the international documents that address the right to self-determination of peoples, Canada is a "sovereign and independent state conducting itself in compliance with the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples and thus possessed of a government representing the whole people belonging to the territory without distinction".

137 The continuing failure to reach agreement on amendments to the Constitution, while a matter of concern, does not amount to a denial of self-determination. In the absence of amendments to the Canadian Constitution, we must look at the constitutional arrangements presently in effect, and we cannot conclude under current circumstances that those arrangements place Quebecers in a disadvantaged position within the scope of the international law rule.

138 In summary, the international law right to self-determination only generates, at best, a right to external self-determination in situations of former colonies; where a people is oppressed, as for example under foreign military occupation; or where a definable group is denied meaningful access to government to pursue their political, economic, social and cultural development. In all three situations, the people in question are entitled to a right to external self-determination because they have been denied the ability to exert internally their right to self-determination. Such exceptional circumstances are manifestly inapplicable to Quebec under existing conditions.

Accordingly, neither the population of the province of Quebec, even if characterized in terms of "people" or "peoples", nor its representative institutions, the National Assembly, the legislature or government of Quebec, possess a right, under international law, to secede unilaterally from Canada.

139 We would not wish to leave this aspect of our answer to Question 2 without acknowledging the importance of the submissions made to us respecting the rights and concerns of aboriginal peoples in the event of a unilateral secession, as well as the appropriate means of defining the boundaries of a seceding Quebec with particular regard to the northern lands occupied largely by aboriginal peoples. However, the concern of aboriginal peoples is precipitated by the asserted right of Quebec to unilateral secession. In light of our finding that there is no such right applicable to the population of Quebec, either under the Constitution of Canada or at international law, but that on the contrary a clear democratic expression of support for secession would lead under the Constitution to negotiations in which aboriginal interests would be taken into account, it becomes unnecessary to explore further the concerns of the aboriginal peoples in this Reference.

(2) Recognition of a Factual/Political Reality: the "Effectivity" Principle

140 As stated, an argument advanced by the amicus curiae on this branch of the Reference was that, while international law may not ground a positive right to unilateral secession in the context of Quebec, international law equally does not prohibit secession and, in fact, international recognition would be conferred on such a political reality if it emerged, for example, via effective control of the territory of what is now the province of Quebec.

141 It is true that international law may well, depending on the circumstances, adapt to recognize a political and/or factual reality, regardless of the legality of the steps leading to its creation. However, as mentioned at the outset, effectivity, as such, does not have any real applicability to Question 2, which asks whether a right to unilateral secession exists.

142 No one doubts that legal consequences may flow from political facts, and that "sovereignty is a political fact for which no purely legal authority can be constituted . . .", H. W. R. Wade, "The Basis of Legal Sovereignty", [1955] Camb. L.J. 172, at p. 196. Secession of a province from Canada, if successful in the streets, might well lead to the creation of a new state. Although recognition by other states is not, at least as a matter of theory, necessary to achieve statehood, the viability of a would-be state in the international community depends, as a practical matter, upon recognition by other states. That process of recognition is guided by legal norms. However, international recognition is not alone constitutive of statehood and, critically, does not relate back to the date of secession to serve retroactively as a source of a "legal" right to secede in the first place. Recognition occurs only after a territorial unit has been successful, as a political fact, in achieving secession.

143 As indicated in responding to Question 1, one of the legal norms which may be recognized by states in granting or withholding recognition of emergent states is the legitimacy of the process by which the de facto secession is, or was, being pursued. The process of recognition, once considered to be an exercise of pure sovereign discretion, has come to be associated with legal norms. See, e.g., European Community Declaration on the Guidelines on the Recognition of New States in Eastern Europe and in the Soviet Union, 31 I.L.M. 1486 (1992), at p. 1487. While national interest and perceived political advantage to the recognizing state obviously play an important role, foreign states may also take into account their view as to the existence of a right to self-determination on the part of the population of the putative state, and a counterpart domestic evaluation, namely, an examination of the legality of the secession according to the law of the state from which the territorial unit purports to have seceded. As we indicated in our answer to Question 1, an emergent state that has disregarded legitimate obligations arising out of its previous situation can potentially expect to be hindered by that disregard in achieving international recognition, at least with respect to the timing of that recognition. On the other hand, compliance by the seceding province with such legitimate obligations would weigh in favour of international recognition. The notion that what is not explicitly prohibited is implicitly permitted has little relevance where (as here) international law refers the legality of secession to the domestic law of the seceding state and the law of that state holds unilateral secession to be unconstitutional.

144 As a court of law, we are ultimately concerned only with legal claims. If the principle of "effectivity" is no more than that "successful revolution begets its own legality" (S. A. de Smith, "Constitutional Lawyers in Revolutionary Situations" (1968), 7 West. Ont. L. Rev. 93, at p. 96), it necessarily means that legality follows and does not precede the successful revolution. Ex hypothesi, the successful revolution took place outside the constitutional framework of the predecessor state, otherwise it would not be characterized as "a revolution". It may be that a unilateral secession by Quebec would eventually be accorded legal status by Canada and other states, and thus give rise to legal consequences; but this does not support the more radical contention that subsequent recognition of a state of affairs brought about by a unilateral declaration of independence could be taken to mean that secession was achieved under colour of a legal right.

145 An argument was made to analogize the principle of effectivity with the second aspect of the rule of law identified by this Court in the Manitoba Language Rights Reference, supra, at p. 753, namely, avoidance of a legal vacuum. In that Reference, it will be recalled, this Court declined to strike down all of Manitoba's legislation for its failure to comply with constitutional dictates, out of concern that this would leave the province in a state of chaos. In so doing, we recognized that the rule of law is a constitutional principle which permits the courts to address the practical consequences of their actions, particularly in constitutional cases. The similarity between that principle and the principle of effectivity, it was argued, is that both attempt to refashion the law to meet social reality. However, nothing of our concern in the Manitoba Language Rights Reference about the severe practical consequences of unconstitutionality affected our conclusion that, as a matter of law, all Manitoba legislation at issue in that case was unconstitutional. The Court's declaration of unconstitutionality was clear and unambiguous. The Court's concern with maintenance of the rule of law was directed in its relevant aspect to the appropriate remedy, which in that case was to suspend the declaration of invalidity to permit appropriate rectification to take place.

146 The principle of effectivity operates very differently. It proclaims that an illegal act may eventually acquire legal status if, as a matter of empirical fact, it is recognized on the international plane. Our law has long recognized that through a combination of acquiescence and prescription, an illegal act may at some later point be accorded some form of legal status. In the law of property, for example, it is well known that a squatter on land may ultimately become the owner if the true owner sleeps on his or her right to repossess the land. In this way, a change in the factual circumstances may subsequently be reflected in a change in legal status. It is, however, quite another matter to suggest that a subsequent condonation of an initially illegal act retroactively creates a legal right to engage in the act in the first place. The broader contention is not supported by the international principle of effectivity or otherwise and must be rejected.

C. Question 3

In the event of a conflict between domestic and international law on the right of the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally, which would take precedence in Canada?

147 In view of our answers to Questions 1 and 2, there is no conflict between domestic and international law to be addressed in the context of this Reference.

IV. Summary of Conclusions

148 As stated at the outset, this Reference has required us to consider momentous questions that go to the heart of our system of constitutional government. We have emphasized that the Constitution is more than a written text. It embraces the entire global system of rules and principles which govern the exercise of constitutional authority. A superficial reading of selected provisions of the written constitutional enactment, without more, may be misleading. It is necessary to make a more profound investigation of the underlying principles that animate the whole of our Constitution, including the principles of federalism, democracy, constitutionalism and the rule of law, and respect for minorities. Those principles must inform our overall appreciation of the constitutional rights and obligations that would come into play in the event a clear majority of Quebecers votes on a clear question in favour of secession.

149 The Reference requires us to consider whether Quebec has a right to unilateral secession. Those who support the existence of such a right found their case primarily on the principle of democracy. Democracy, however, means more than simple majority rule. As reflected in our constitutional jurisprudence, democracy exists in the larger context of other constitutional values such as those already mentioned. In the 131 years since Confederation, the people of the provinces and territories have created close ties of interdependence (economically, socially, politically and culturally) based on shared values that include federalism, democracy, constitutionalism and the rule of law, and respect for minorities. A democratic decision of Quebecers in favour of secession would put those relationships at risk. The Constitution vouchsafes order and stability, and accordingly secession of a province "under the Constitution" could not be achieved unilaterally, that is, without principled negotiation with other participants in Confederation within the existing constitutional framework.

150 The Constitution is not a straitjacket. Even a brief review of our constitutional history demonstrates periods of momentous and dramatic change. Our democratic institutions necessarily accommodate a continuous process of discussion and evolution, which is reflected in the constitutional right of each participant in the federation to initiate constitutional change. This right implies a reciprocal duty on the other participants to engage in discussions to address any legitimate initiative to change the constitutional order. While it is true that some attempts at constitutional amendment in recent years have faltered, a clear majority vote in Quebec on a clear question in favour of secession would confer democratic legitimacy on the secession initiative which all of the other participants in Confederation would have to recognize.

151 Quebec could not, despite a clear referendum result, purport to invoke a right of self-determination to dictate the terms of a proposed secession to the other parties to the federation. The democratic vote, by however strong a majority, would have no legal effect on its own and could not push aside the principles of federalism and the rule of law, the rights of individuals and minorities, or the operation of democracy in the other provinces or in Canada as a whole. Democratic rights under the Constitution cannot be divorced from constitutional obligations. Nor, however, can the reverse proposition be accepted. The continued existence and operation of the Canadian constitutional order could not be indifferent to a clear expression of a clear majority of Quebecers that they no longer wish to remain in Canada. The other provinces and the federal government would have no basis to deny the right of the government of Quebec to pursue secession, should a clear majority of the people of Quebec choose that goal, so long as in doing so, Quebec respects the rights of others. The negotiations that followed such a vote would address the potential act of secession as well as its possible terms should in fact secession proceed. There would be no conclusions predetermined by law on any issue. Negotiations would need to address the interests of the other provinces, the federal government, Quebec and indeed the rights of all Canadians both within and outside Quebec, and specifically the rights of minorities. No one suggests that it would be an easy set of negotiations.

152 The negotiation process would require the reconciliation of various rights and obligations by negotiation between two legitimate majorities, namely, the majority of the population of Quebec, and that of Canada as a whole. A political majority at either level that does not act in accordance with the underlying constitutional principles we have mentioned puts at risk the legitimacy of its exercise of its rights, and the ultimate acceptance of the result by the international community.

153 The task of the Court has been to clarify the legal framework within which political decisions are to be taken "under the Constitution", not to usurp the prerogatives of the political forces that operate within that framework. The obligations we have identified are binding obligations under the Constitution of Canada. However, it will be for the political actors to determine what constitutes "a clear majority on a clear question" in the circumstances under which a future referendum vote may be taken. Equally, in the event of demonstrated majority support for Quebec secession, the content and process of the negotiations will be for the political actors to settle. The reconciliation of the various legitimate constitutional interests is necessarily committed to the political rather than the judicial realm precisely because that reconciliation can only be achieved through the give and take of political negotiations. To the extent issues addressed in the course of negotiation are political, the courts, appreciating their proper role in the constitutional scheme, would have no supervisory role.

154 We have also considered whether a positive legal entitlement to secession exists under international law in the factual circumstances contemplated by Question 1, i.e., a clear democratic expression of support on a clear question for Quebec secession. Some of those who supported an affirmative answer to this question did so on the basis of the recognized right to self-determination that belongs to all "peoples". Although much of the Quebec population certainly shares many of the characteristics of a people, it is not necessary to decide the "people" issue because, whatever may be the correct determination of this issue in the context of Quebec, a right to secession only arises under the principle of self-determination of peoples at international law where "a people" is governed as part of a colonial empire; where "a people" is subject to alien subjugation, domination or exploitation; and possibly where "a people" is denied any meaningful exercise of its right to self-determination within the state of which it forms a part. In other circumstances, peoples are expected to achieve self-determination within the framework of their existing state. A state whose government represents the whole of the people or peoples resident within its territory, on a basis of equality and without discrimination, and respects the principles of self-determination in its internal arrangements, is entitled to maintain its territorial integrity under international law and to have that territorial integrity recognized by other states. Quebec does not meet the threshold of a colonial people or an oppressed people, nor can it be suggested that Quebecers have been denied meaningful access to government to pursue their political, economic, cultural and social development. In the circumstances, the National Assembly, the legislature or the government of Quebec do not enjoy a right at international law to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally.

155 Although there is no right, under the Constitution or at international law, to unilateral secession, that is secession without negotiation on the basis just discussed, this does not rule out the possibility of an unconstitutional declaration of secession leading to a de facto secession. The ultimate success of such a secession would be dependent on recognition by the international community, which is likely to consider the legality and legitimacy of secession having regard to, amongst other facts, the conduct of Quebec and Canada, in determining whether to grant or withhold recognition. Such recognition, even if granted, would not, however, provide any retroactive justification for the act of secession, either under the Constitution of Canada or at international law.

156 The reference questions are answered accordingly.

Frank Roncarelli (plaintiff), appellant; and The Honourable Maurice Duplessis (defendant), respondent.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH, APPEAL SIDE, PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Case Summary

Crown — Officers of the Crown — Powers and responsibilities — Prime Minister and Attorney-General — Quebec Liquor Commission — Cancellation of licence to sell liquor — Whether made at instigation of Prime Minister and Attorney-General — The Alcoholic Liquor Act, R.S.Q. 1941, c. 255 — The Attorney-General's Department Act, R.S.Q. 1941, c. 46 — The Executive Power Act, R.S.Q. 1941, c. 7.

Licences — Cancellation — Motives of cancellation — Done on instigation of Prime Minister and Attorney-General — Whether liability in damages — Whether notice under art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure required.

The plaintiff, the proprietor of a restaurant in Montreal and the holder of a licence to sell intoxicating liquor, sued the defendant personally for damages arising out of the cancellation of his licence by the Quebec Liquor Commission. He alleged that the licence had been arbitrarily cancelled at the instigation of the defendant who, without legal powers in the matter, had given orders to the Commission to cancel it before its expiration. This was done, it was alleged, to punish the plaintiff, a member of the Witnesses of Jehovah, because he had acted as bailman for a large number of members of his sect charged with the violation of municipal by-laws in connection with the distribution of literature. The trial judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for part of the damages claimed. The defendant appealed and the plaintiff, seeking an increase in the amount of damages, cross-appealed. The Court of Appeal dismissed the action and the cross-appeal.

Held (Taschereau, Cartwright and Fauteux JJ. dissenting): The action should be maintained and the amount awarded at trial should be increased by $25,000. By wrongfully and without legal justification causing the cancellation of the permit, the defendant became liable for damages under art. 1053 of the Civil Code.

Per Kerwin C.J.: The trial judge correctly decided that the defendant ordered the Commission to cancel the licence, and no satisfactory reason has been advanced for the Court of Appeal setting aside that finding of fact.

Per Kerwin C.J. and Locke and Martland JJ.: There was ample evidence to sustain the finding of the trial judge that the cancellation of the permit was the result of an order given by the defendant to the manager of the Commission. There was, therefore, a relationship of cause and effect between the defendant's acts and the cancellation of the permit.

The defendant was not acting in the exercise of any of his official powers. There was no authority in the Attorney-General's Department Act, the Executive Power Act, or the Alcoholic Liquor Act enabling the defendant to direct the cancellation of a permit under the Alcoholic Liquor Act. The intent and purpose of that Act placed complete control over the liquor traffic in the hands of an independent commission.

Cancellation of a permit by the Commission, at the request or upon the direction of a third party, as was done in this case, was not a proper and valid exercise of the powers conferred upon the Commission by s. 35 of the Act.

The defendant was not entitled to the protection provided by art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure since what he did was not "done by him in the exercise of his functions". To interfere with the administration of the Commission by causing the cancellation of a liquor permit was entirely outside his legal functions. It involved the exercise of powers which in law he did not possess at all. His position was not altered by the fact that he thought it was his right and duty to act as he did.

Per Rand J.: To deny or revoke a permit because a citizen exercises an unchallengeable right totally irrelevant to the sale of liquor in a restaurant is beyond the scope of the discretion conferred upon the Commission by the Alcoholic Liquor Act. What was done here was not competent to the Commission and a fortiori to the government or the defendant. The act of the defendant, through the instrumentality of the Commission, brought about a breach of an implied public statutory duty toward the plaintiff. There was no immunity in the defendant from an action for damages. He was under no duty in relation to the plaintiff and his act was an intrusion upon the functions of a statutory body. His liability was, therefore, engaged. There can be no question of good faith when an act is done with an improper intent and for a purpose alien to the very statute under which the act is purported to be done. There was no need for giving a notice of action as required by art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as the act done by the defendant was quite beyond the scope of any function or duty committed to him so far so that it was one done exclusively in a private capacity however much, in fact, the influence of public office and power may have carried over into it.

Per Abbott J.: The cancellation of the licence was made solely because of the plaintiff's association with the Witnesses of Jehovah and with the object and purpose of preventing him from continuing to furnish bail for members of that sect. This cancellation was made with the express authorization and upon the order of the defendant. In purporting to authorize and instruct the Commission to cancel the licence the defendant was acting, as he was bound to know, without any legal authority whatsoever. A public officer is responsible for acts done by him without legal justification. The defendant was not entitled to avail himself of the exceptional provision of art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure since the act complained of was not "done by him in the exercise of his functions" but was an act done when he had gone outside his functions to perform it. Before a public officer can be held to be acting "in the exercise of his functions" within the meaning of art. 88, it must be established that at the time he performed the act complained of such public officer had reasonable ground for believing that such act was within his legal authority to perform.

Per Taschereau J., dissenting: The action cannot succeed because the plaintiff did not give the notice required by art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure to the defendant who was a public officer performing his functions. The failure to fulfill this condition precedent was a total bar to the claim. That failure may be raised by exception to the form or in the written plea to the action, and the words "no judgment may be rendered" indicate that the Court may raise the point proprio motu. Even if what was said by the defendant affected the decision taken by the Commission, the defendant remained, nevertheless, a public officer acting in the performance of his duties. He was surely a public officer, and it is clear that he did not act in his personal quality. It was as legal adviser of the Commission and also as a public officer entrusted with the task of preventing disorders and as protector of the peace in the province, that he was consulted. It was the Attorney-General, acting in the performance of his functions, who was required to give his directives to a governmental branch. It is a fallacious principle to hold that an error, committed by a public officer in doing an act connected with the object of his functions, strips that act of its official character and that its author must then be considered as having acted outside the scope of his duties.

Per Cartwright J., dissenting: The loss suffered by the plaintiff was damnum sine injuria. Whether the defendant directed or merely approved the cancellation of the licence, he cannot be answerable in damages since the act of the Commission in cancelling the licence was not an actionable wrong. The Courts below have found, on ample evidence, that the defendant and the manager of the Commission acted throughout in the honest belief that they were fulfilling their duty to the province. On the true construction of the Alcoholic Liquor Act, the Legislature, except in certain specified circumstances which are not present in the case at bar, has not laid down any rules as to the grounds on which the Commission may decide to cancel a permit; that decision is committed to the unfettered discretion of the Commission and its function in making the decision is administrative and not judicial or quasi-judicial. Consequently, the Commission was not bound to give the plaintiff an opportunity to be heard and the Court cannot be called upon to determine whether there existed sufficient grounds for its decision. Even if the function of the Commission was quasi-judicial and its order should be set aside for failure to hear the plaintiff, it is doubtful whether any action for damages would lie.

Per Fauteux J., dissenting: The right to exercise the discretion with respect to the cancellation of the permit, which under the Alcoholic Liquor Act was exclusively that of the Commission, was abdicated by it in favour of the defendant when he made the decision executed by the Commission. The cancellation being illegal, imputable to the defendant, and damageable for the plaintiff, the latter was entitled to succeed on an action under art. 1053 of the Civil Code.

As the notice required by art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure was not given, the action, however, could not be maintained. The failure to give notice, when it should be given, imports nullity and limits the very jurisdiction of the Court. In the present case, the defendant was entitled to the notice since the illegality reproached was committed "in the exercise of his functions". The meaning of this expression in art. 88 was not subject to the limitations attending expressions more or less identical appearing in art. 1054 of the Civil Code. The latter article deals with responsibility whereas art. 88 deals with procedure. Article 88 has its source in s. 8 of An Act for the Protection of Justices of the Peace, Cons. Stat. L.C., c. 101, which provided that the officer "shall be entitled" to the protection of the statute although "he has exceeded his powers or jurisdiction, and has acted clearly contrary to law". That section peremptorily establishes that, in pari materia, a public officer was not considered as having ceased to act within the exercise of his functions by the sole fact that the act committed by him might constitute an abuse of power or excess of jurisdiction, or even a violation of the law. An illegality is assumed under art. 88. The jurisprudence of the province, which has been settled for many years, is to the effect that the incidence of good or bad faith has no bearing on the right to the notice.

The illegality committed by the defendant did not amount to an offence known under the penal law or a delict under art. 1053 of the Civil Code. He did not use his functions to commit this illegality. He did not commit it on the occasion of his functions, but committed it because of his functions. His good faith has not been doubted, and on this fact there was a concurrent finding in the Courts below.

APPEALS from two judgments of the Court of Queen's Bench, Appeal Side, Province of Quebec [[1956] Que. Q.B. 447], reversing a judgment of Mackinnon J. Appeals allowed, Taschereau, Cartwright and Fauteux JJ. dissenting. F. R. Scott and A.L. Stein, for the plaintiff, appellant. L.E. Beaulieu, Q.C., and L. Tremblay, Q.C., for the defendant, respondent.

Attorneys for the plaintiff, appellant: A.L. Stein and F.R. Scott, Montreal. Attorneys for the defendant, respondent: L.E. Beaulieu and Edouard Asselin, Montreal.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE

No satisfactory reason has been advanced for the Court of Queen's Bench (Appeal Side) [[1956] Que. Q.B. 447] setting aside the finding of fact by the trial judge that the respondent ordered the Quebec Liquor Commission to cancel the appellant's licence. A reading of the testimony of the respondent and of the person constituting the commission at the relevant time satisfies me that the trial judge correctly decided the point. As to the other questions, I agree with Mr. Justice Martland.

The appeals should be allowed with costs here and below and judgment directed to be entered for the appellant against the respondent in the sum of $33,123.53 with interest from the date of the judgement of the Superior Court, together with the costs of the action.

TASCHEREAU J. (dissenting)

TASCHEREAU J. (dissenting):-- L'intimé est Premier Ministre et Procureur Général de la province de Québec, et il occupait ces hautes fonctions dans le temps où les faits qui ont donné naissance à ce litige se sont passés.

L'appelant, un restaurateur de la Cité de Montréal, et porteur d'un permis de la Commission des Liqueurs pour la vente des spiritueux, lui a réclamé personnellement devant la Cour supérieure la somme de $118,741 en dommages. Il a allégué dans son action qu'il est licencié depuis de nombreuses années, qu'il a toujours respecté les lois de la Province se rapportant à la vente des liqueurs alcooliques, que son restaurant avait une excellente réputation, et jouissait de la faveur d'une clientèle nombreuse et recherchée.

Il a allégué en outre qu'il faisait et fait encore partie de la secte religieuse des "Témoins de Jéhovah", et que parce qu'il se serait rendu caution pour quelque 390 de ses coreligionnaires, traduits devant les tribunaux correctionnels de Montréal et accusés de distribution de littérature, sans permis, l'intimé serait illégalement intervenu auprès du gérant de la Commission pour lui faire perdre son permis, qui d'ailleurs lui a été enlevé le 4 décembre 1946. Ce serait comme résultat de l'intervention injustifiée de l'intimé que l'appelant aurait été privé de son permis, et aurait ainsi souffert les dommages considérables qu'il réclame.

La Cour supérieure a maintenu l'action jusqu'à concurrence de $8,123.53, et la Cour du banc de la reine [[1956] Que. Q.B. 447.], M. le Juge Rinfret étant dissident, aurait pour divers motifs maintenu l'appel et rejeté l'action.

L'intimé a soulevé plusieurs moyens à l'encontre de cette réclamation, mais je n'en examinerai qu'un seul, car je crois qu'il est suffisant pour disposer du présent appel. Le Code de procédure civile de la province de Québec contient la disposition suivante:

Art. 88 C.P. -- Nul officier public ou personne remplissant des fonctions ou devoirs publics ne peut être poursuivi pour dommages à raison d'un acte par lui fait dans l'exercice de ses fonctions, et nul verdict ou jugement ne peut être rendu contre lui à moins qu'avis de cette poursuite ne lui ait été donné au moins un mois avant l'émission de l'assignation.

Cet avis doit être par écrit; il doit exposer les causes de l'action, contenir l'indication des noms et de l'étude du procureur du demandeur ou de son agent et être signifié au défendeur personnellement ou à son domicile.

Le défaut de donner cet avis peut être invoqué par le défendeur, soit au moyen d'une exception à la forme ou soit par plaidoyer au fond. Charland v. Kay [(1933), 54 Que. K.B. 377.]; Corporation de la Paroisse de St-David v. Paquet [(1937), 62 Que. K.B. 140.]; Houde v. Benoit [[1943] Que. K.B. 713].

Les termes mêmes employés par le législateur dans l'art. 88 C.P.C., "nul jugement ne peut être rendu" contre le défendeur, indiquent aussi que la Cour a le devoir de soulever d'office ce moyen, si le défendeur omet ou néglige de le faire par exception à la forme, ou dans son plaidoyer écrit. La signification de cet avis à un officier public, remplissant des devoirs publics, est une condition préalable, essentielle à la réussite d'une procédure judiciaire. S'il n'est pas donné, les tribunaux ne peuvent prononcer aucune condamnation en dommages. Or, dans le cas présent, il est admis qu'aucun avis n'a été donné.

Mais, c'est la prétention de l'appelant que l'intimé ne peut se prévaloir de ce moyen qui est une fin de non recevoir, car, les conseils ou avis qu'il aurait donnés et qui auraient été la cause déterminante de la perte de son permis, ne l'ont pas été en raison d'un acte posé par lui dans l'exercice de ses fonctions.

La preuve révèle que l'appelant était bien licencié de la Commission des Liqueurs depuis de nombreuses années, que la tenue de son restaurant était irréprochable, et que dans le cours du mois de décembre de l'année 1946, alors qu'il était toujours porteur de son permis, celui-ci lui a été enlevé parce qu'il se rendait caution pour plusieurs centaines de ses coreligionnaires, distributeurs de littérature que l'on croyait séditeuse.

C'était avant le jugement de cette Cour dans la cause de Boucher v. Le Roi [[1951] S.C.R. 265, 2 D.L.R. 369, 11 C.R. 85, 99 C.C.C. 1.], alors que la conviction était profondément ancrée parmi la population, que les "Témoins de Jéhovah" étaient des perturbateurs de la paix publique, des sources constantes de trouble et de désordre dans la Province. On jugeait leur mouvement dangereux, susceptible de soulever une partie de la population contre l'autre, et de provoquer de sérieuses agitations. On parlait même de conspiration séditeuse, et ce n'est sûrement pas sans cause raisonnable, car cette opinion fut plus tard unanimement confirmée par cinq juges de la Cour du Banc de la Reine dans l'affaire Boucher v. Le Roi [[1949] Que. K.B. 238.], et également par quatre juges dissidents devant cette Cour (Boucher v. Le Roi cité supra).

M. Archambault, alors gérant général de la Commission des Liqueurs, soupçonnait fortement que le "Frank Roncarelli" qui par ses cautionnements aidait financièrement ce mouvement qu'il croyait subversif, était détenteur d'un permis de restaurateur pour la vente de liqueurs alcooliques. Il pensait évidemment qu'il ne convenait pas que les bénéfices que Roncarelli retirait de son permis de la Commission, soient utilisés à servir la cause d'agitateurs religieux, dont les enseignements et les méthodes venaient en conflit avec les croyances populaires. Il en informa l'intimé, procureur général, qui en cette qualité est l'aviseur légal officiel de la province pour toutes les affaires juridiques.

Au cours d'une première conversation téléphonique, M. Archambault suggéra à l'intimé que le permis de Roncarelli lui soit enlevé, ce que d'ailleurs il avait personnellement le droit de faire, en vertu de l'art. 35 de la Loi des Liqueurs, qui est ainsi rédigé:

35. -- La Commission peut à sa discrétion annuler un permis en tout temps.

Or, comme l'exécutif de la Commission des Liqueurs ne se compose que d'un gérant général qui était M. Archambault, cette discrétion reposait entièrement sur lui.

L'intimé lui suggéra la prudence, et lui proposa de s'enquérir avec certitude si le Roncarelli, détenteur de permis, était bien le même Roncarelli qui prodiguait ses cautionnements d'une façon si généreuse. Après enquête, l'affirmative ayant été établie, M. Archambault communiqua de nouveau avec l'intimé, et voici ce que nous dit M. Archambault dans son témoignage au sujet de ces conversations:

- Q. Maintenant, ce jour-là où vous avez reçu une lettre, le 30 novembre 1946, avez-vous décidé, ce jour-là, d'enlever la licence?
- R. Certainement, ce jour-là, j'avais appelé le Premier Ministre, en l'occurrence le procureur général, lui faisant part des constatations, c'est-à-dire des renseignements que je possédais, et de mon intention d'annuler le privilège, et le Premier Ministre m'a répondu de prendre mes précautions, de bien vérifier s'il s'agissait bien de la même personne, qu'il pouvait y avoir plusieurs Roncarelli, et coetera. Alors, quand j'ai eu la confirmation de Y3 à l'effet que c'était la même personne, j'ai appelé le Premier Ministre pour l'assurer qu'il s'agissait bien de Frank Roncarelli, détenteur d'un permis de la Commission des Liqueurs; et, là, le Premier Ministre m'a autorisé, il m'a donné son consentement, son approbation, sa permission, et son ordre de procéder.

Voici maintenant la version de l'intimé:

Probablement, à la suite du rapport que l'indicateur Y-3 a fait, le rapport qui est produit, M. le Juge Archambault m'a téléphoné et m'a dit: 'On est sûr, c'est cette personne-là.' Et comme dans l'intervalle j'avais étudié le problème et parcouru les statuts depuis l'institution de la Commission des Liqueurs et tous les amendements qui avaient eu lieu, et j'avais consulté, j'en suis arrivé à la conclusion qu'en mon âme et conscience, mon impérieux devoir c'était d'approuver la suggestion très au point du Juge et d'autoriser la cancellation d'un privilège que cet homme-là ne méritait pas, à mon sens, et dont il n'était pas digne.

Et:

Après avoir mûrement délibéré et conscient et sûr de faire mon devoir, j'ai dit à M. Archambault que j'approuvais sa suggestion d'annuler le permis, d'annuler le privilège.

Et, plus loin:

... j'ai dit au Juge Archambault que j'étais de son opinion, que je ne croyais pas que Roncarelli fût digne d'obtenir des privilèges de la province après son attitude que j'ai mentionnée tout à l'heure.

... et lorsque le Juge Archambault m'a dit, après vérification, que c'était la même personne, j'ai dit: 'Vous avez raison, ôtez le permis, ôtez le privilège'.

Quand on demande à l'intimé s'il a donné un ordre à M. Archambault, voici ce qu'il dit:

Non, je n'ai pas donné un ordre à M. Archambault, je viens de conter ce qui s'est passé.

Que le permis ait été enlevé à Roncarelli comme conséquence de la seule décision de M. Archambault, ce qu'il avait le droit de faire à sa discrétion, ou que cette discrétion ait été influencée par les paroles de l'intimé, n'a pas je crois d'effet décisif dans la détermination de la présente cause. Je demeure convaincu que même si les paroles de l'intimé ont pu avoir quelque influence sur la décision qui a été prise, ce dernier demeurerait quand même un officier public, agissant dans l'exercice de ses fonctions, et qu'il était essentiel de lui donner l'avis requis par l'art. 88 C.P.C. L'absence de cet avis interdit aux tribunaux de prononcer aucune condamnation.

L'intimé est sûrement un officier public, et il me semble clair qu'il n'a pas agi en sa qualité personnelle. C'est bien comme aviseur légal de la Commission des Liqueurs, et aussi comme officier public chargé de la prévention des troubles, et gardien de la paix dans la province, qu'il a été consulté. C'est le Procureur Général, agissant dans l'exercice de ses fonctions, qui a été requis de donner ses directives à une branche gouvernementale dont il est l'aviseur. Vide: Loi concernant le Département du Procureur Général, R.S.Q. 1941, c. 46, art. 3, Loi des liqueurs alcooliques, S.R.Q. 1941, c. 255, art 138.

Certains, à tort ou à raison, peuvent croire que l'intimé se soit trompé, en pensant qu'il devait, pour le maintien de la paix publique et la suppression de troubles existants, et qui menaçaient de se propager davantage, conseiller l'enlèvement du permis de l'appelant. Pour ma part, je ne puis admettre le fallacieux principe qu'une erreur commise par un officier public, en posant un acte qui se rattache cependant à l'objet de son mandat, enlève à cet acte son caractère officiel, et que l'auteur de ce même acte fautif cesse alors d'agir dans l'exécution de ses fonctions.

Parce que l'appelant ne s'est pas conformé aux exigences de l'art. 88 C.P.C., en ne donnant pas l'avis requis à l'intimé qui est un officier public, agissant dans l'exercice de ses fonctions, je crois que l'action ne peut réussir. Le défaut de remplir cette condition préalable, constitue une fin de non recevoir, qui me dispense d'examiner les autres aspects de cette cause.

Je crois donc que l'appel principal, de même que l'appel logé pour faire augmenter le montant accordé par le juge de première instance, doivent être rejetés avec dépens de toutes les Cours.

The judgement of Rand and Judson JJ. was delivered by RAND J.

RAND J.:-- The material facts from which my conclusion is drawn are these. The appellant was the proprietor of a restaurant in a busy section of Montreal which in 1946 through its transmission to him from his father had been continuously licensed for the sale of liquor for approximately 34 years; he is of good education and repute and the restaurant was of a superior class. On December 4 of that year, while his application for annual renewal was before the Liquor Commission, the existing license was cancelled and his application for renewal rejected, to which was added a declaration by the respondent that no future license would ever issue to him. These primary facts took place in the following circumstances.

For some years the appellant had been an adherent of a rather militant Christian religious sect known as the Witnesses of Jehovah. Their ideology condemns the established church institutions and stresses the absolute and exclusive personal relation of the individual to the Deity without human intermediation or intervention.

The first impact of their proselytizing zeal upon the Roman Catholic church and community in Quebec, as might be expected, produced a violent reaction. Meetings were forcibly broken up, property damaged, individuals ordered out of communities, in one case out of the province, and generally, within the cities and towns, bitter controversy aroused. The work of the Witnesses was carried on both by word of mouth and by the distribution of printed matter, the latter including two periodicals known as "The Watch Tower" and "Awake", sold at a small price.

In 1945 the provincial authorities began to take steps to bring an end to what was considered insulting and offensive to the religious beliefs and feelings of the Roman Catholic population. Large scale arrests were made of young men and women, by whom the publications mentioned were being held out for sale, under local by-laws requiring a licence for peddling any kind of wares. Altogether almost one thousand of such charges were laid. The penalty involved in Montreal, where most of the arrests took place, was a fine of $40, and as the Witnesses disputed liability, bail was in all cases resorted to.

The appellant, being a person of some means, was accepted by the Recorder's Court as bail without question, and up to November 12, 1946, he had gone security in about 380 cases, some of the accused being involved in repeated offences. Up to this time there had been no suggestion of impropriety; the security of the appellant was taken as so satisfactory that at times, to avoid delay when he was absent from the city, recognizances were signed by him in blank and kept ready for completion by the Court officials. The reason for the accumulation of charges was the doubt that they could be sustained in law. Apparently the legal officers of Montreal, acting in concert with those of the Province, had come to an agreement with the attorney for the Witnesses to have a test case proceeded with. Pending that, however, there was no stoppage of the sale of the tracts and this became the annoying circumstance that produced the volume of proceedings.

On or about November 12 it was decided to require bail in cash for Witnesses so arrested and the sum set ranged from $100 to $300. No such bail was furnished by the appellant; his connection with giving security ended with this change of practice; and in the result, all of the charges in relation to which he had become surety were dismissed.

At no time did he take any part in the distribution of the tracts: he was an adherent of the group but nothing more. It was shown that he had leased to another member premises in Sherbrooke which were used as a hall for carrying on religious meetings: but it is unnecessary to do more than mention that fact to reject it as having no bearing on the issues raised. Beyond the giving of bail and being an adherent, the appellant is free from any relation that could be tortured into a badge of character pertinent to his fitness or unfitness to hold a liquor licence.

The mounting resistance that stopped the surety bail sought other means of crushing the propagandist invasion and among the circumstances looked into was the situation of the appellant. Admittedly an adherent, he was enabling these protagonists to be at large to carry on their campaign of publishing what they believed to be the Christian truth as revealed by the Bible; he was also the holder of a liquor licence, a "privilege" granted by the Province, the profits from which, as it was seen by the authorities, he was using to promote the disturbance of settled beliefs and arouse community disaffection generally. Following discussions between the then Mr. Archambault, as the personality of the Liquor Commission, and the chief prosecuting officer in Montreal, the former, on or about November 21, telephoned to the respondent, advised him of those facts, and queried what should be done. Mr. Duplessis answered that the matter was serious and that the identity of the person furnishing bail and the liquor licensee should be put beyond doubt. A few days later, that identity being established through a private investigator, Mr. Archambault again communicated with the respondent and, as a result of what passed between them, the licence, as of December 4, 1946, was revoked.

In the meantime, about November 25, 1946, a blasting answer had come from the Witnesses. In an issue of one of the periodicals, under the heading "Quebec's Burning Hate", was a searing denunciation of what was alleged to be the savage persecution of Christian believers. Immediately instructions were sent out from the department of the Attorney-General ordering the confiscation of the issue and proceedings and were taken against one Boucher charging him with publication of a seditious libel.

It is then wholly as a private citizen, an adherent of a religious group, holding a liquor licence and furnishing bail to arrested persons for no other purpose than to enable them to be released from detention pending the determination of the charges against them, and with no other relevant considerations to be taken into account, that he is involved in the issues of this controversy.

The complementary state of things is equally free from doubt. From the evidence of Mr. Duplessis and Mr. Archambault alone, it appears that the action taken by the latter as the general manager and sole member of the Commission was dictated by Mr. Duplessis as Attorney-General and Prime Minister of the province; that that step was taken as a means of bringing to a halt the activities of the Witnesses, to punish the appellant for the part he had played not only by revoking the existing licence but in declaring him barred from one "forever", and to warn others that they similarly would be stripped of provincial "privileges" if they persisted in any activity directly or indirectly related to the Witnesses and to the objectionable campaign. The respondent felt that action to be his duty, something which his conscience demanded of him; and as representing the provincial government his decision became automatically that of Mr. Archambault and the Commission. The following excerpts of evidence make this clear:

M. DUPLESSIS:

R.... Au mois de novembre 1946, M. Edouard Archambault, qui était alors le gérant général de la Commission des Liqueurs m'a appelé à Québec, téléphone longue distance de Montréal, et il m'a dit que Roncarelli qui multipliait les cautionnements à la Cour du Recorder d'une façon désordonnée, contribuant à paralyser les activités de la Police et à congestionner les tribunaux, que ce nommé Roncarelli détenait un privilège de la Commission des Liqueurs de Québec. De fait, Votre Seigneurie, un permis est un privilège, ce n'est pas un droit. L'article 35 de la Loi des Liqueurs alcooliques, paragraphe 1, a été édicté en 1921 par le statut II, Geo. V, chap. 24, qui déclare ceci:

"La Commission peut, à sa discrétion annuler le permis en tout temps."

"Je vais m'en informer et je vous le dirai." J'ai dit au Juge: "Dans l'intervalle, je vais examiner la question avec des officiers légaux, je vais y penser, je vais réfléchir et je vais voir ce que devrai faire." Quelques jours après, et pendant cet intervalle j'ai étudié le problème, j'ai étudié des dossiers, comme Procureur Général et comme Premier Ministre, quelques jours après le Juge Archambault, M. Edouard Archambault, m'a téléphoné pour me dire qu'il était certain que le Roncarelli en question, qui paralysait les activités de la Cour du Recorder qui accaparait dans une large mesure les services de la force constabulaire de Montréal, dont les journaux disaient avec raison qu'elle n'avait pas le nombre suffisant de policiers, était bien la personne qui détenait un permis. Je lui ai dit: "Dans ces circonstances, je considère que c'est mon devoir, comme Procureur Général et comme Premier Ministre, en conscience, dans l'exercice de mes fonctions officielles et pour remplir le mandat que le peuple m'avait confié et qu'il m'a renouvelé avec une immense majorité en 1948, après la cancellation du permis et après la poursuite intentée contre moi, j'ai cru que c'était mon devoir, en conscience, de dire au Juge que ce permis-là, le Gouvernement de Québec ne pouvait pas accorder un privilège à un individu comme Roncarelli qui tenait l'attitude qu'il tenait".

J'ai dit: "Il y a peut-être de pauvres personnes, de bonne foi, plus riches d'idéal que d'esprit, de jugement, ces personnes-là sont probablement à la merci de quelques-uns qui les exploitent, je vais donner une entrevue pour attirer l'attention de tout le monde sur l'article 69 du Code Criminel, qui déclare que les complices sont responsables au même titre que la personne qui a commis l'offense."

D. Vous n'avez pas reçu d'autres documents, c'est seulement les communications téléphoniques de M. le Juge Archambault?

R. Oui, certainement, un message du Juge Archambault, un autre téléphone au Juge Archambault, des examens de la situation, on en a même parlé au Conseil des Ministres, j'ai discuté le cas, j'ai consulté des officiers en loi et en mon âme et conscience j'ai fait mon devoir comme Procureur Général, j'ai fait la seule chose qui s'imposait, si c'était à recommencer je ferais pareil.

D. Monsieur le Premier Ministre, le 8 février 1947, dans le journal La Presse, paraissait un article intitulé: "Roncarelli subit un second refus". Le sous-titre de cet article se lit comme suit: "L'honorable M. Duplessis refuse au restaurateur, protecteur des Témoins de Jéhovah, la permission de poursuivre la Commission des Liqueurs." Vous trouverez, monsieur le Premier Ministre, presque à la fin de ce rapport, les mots suivants:

"C'est moi-même, à titre de Procureur Général, et de responsable de l'ordre dans cette province, qui ai donné l'ordre à la Commission des Liqueurs d'annuler son permis référant à Roncarelli."

Je vous demande, monsieur le Premier Ministre, si c'est un rapport exact de vos paroles à cette conférence de presse?

R. Ce que j'ai dit lors de la conférence de presse, c'est ce que je viens de déclarer. Je ne connaissais pas Roncarelli, je ne savais pas que Roncarelli avait un permis,... lorsqu'il a attiré mon attention sur la situation absolument anormale d'un homme bénéficiant d'un privilège de la province, et multipliant les actes de nature à paralyser les tribunaux de la province et la police municipale de Montréal, c'est là que j'ai approuvé sa suggestion et que j'ai dit, comme Procureur général...

LA COUR

C'est une autre question que l'on vous pose, Monsieur le Premier Ministre. Voulez-vous relire la question. (La demande précédente est alors relue.)

R. Ce que j'ai dit à la presse, c'est ce que je viens de dire tout à l'heure. L'article tel que produit n'est pas conforme textuellement à ce que j'ai dit. Ce que j'ai dit, ce que je répète, c'est que le Juge Archambault, gérant de la Commission des Liqueurs m'a mis au fait d'une situation que j'ignorais et comme Procureur Général, pour accomplir mon devoir, j'ai dit au Juge Archambault que j'étais de son opinion, que je ne croyais pas que Roncarelli fut digne d'obtenir des privilèges de la province après son attitude que j'ai mentionnée tout à l'heure.

D. Les mots que je viens de vous lire tout à l'heure, c'est censé être textuellement les mots que vous avez donnés, parce que c'est précédé d'une indication d'un rapport textuel:

"Nous n'avons fait qu'exercer en ce faisant un droit formel et incontestable, nous avons rempli un impérieux devoir. Le permis de Roncarelli a été annulé non pas temporairement mais bien pour toujours."

LE TÉMOIN: Si j'ai dit cela?

L'AVOCAT: Oui.

R. Oui. Le permis de Roncarelli a été annulé pour ce temps-là et pour toujours. Je l'ai dit et je considérais que c'était mon devoir et en mon âme et conscience j'aurais manqué à mon devoir si je ne l'avais pas fait.

D. Avec ces renseignements additionnels diriez-vous que les mots: "C'est moi-même, à titre de Procureur Général et de responsable de l'ordre dans cette province qui ai donné l'ordre à la Commission des Liqueurs d'annuler son permis." Diriez-vous que c'est exact?

R. J'ai dit tout à l'heure ce qui en était. J'ai eu un téléphone de M. Archambault me mettant au courant de certains faits que j'ignorais au sujet de Roncarelli. Vérification, identification pour voir si c'était bien la même personne, étude, réflexion, consultation et décision d'approuver la suggestion du gérant de la Commission des Liqueurs d'annuler le privilège de Roncarelli.

LA COUR:

D. M. Stein veut savoir si vous avez donné un ordre à M. Archambault?

R. Non, je n'ai pas donné un ordre à M. Archambault, je viens de conter ce qui s'est passé. Le juge Archambault m'a mis au courant d'un fait que je ne connaissais pas, je ne connaissais pas les faits, c'est lui qui m'a mis au courant des faits. Je ne sais pas comment on peut appeler ça, quand la Procureur Général, qui est à la tête d'un département, parle à un officier, même à un officier supérieur, et qu'il émet une opinion, ce n'est pas directement un ordre, c'en est un sans l'être. Mais c'est à la suggestion du Juge Archambault, après qu'il eut porté à ma connaissance des faits que j'ignorais, que la décision a été prise.

D. Monsieur le Premier Ministre, excusez-moi si je répète encore la question, mais il me semble que vous n'avez pas répondu à la question que j'ai posée. Il paraît, non seulement dans ce journal, mais aussi dans d'autres journaux, et cela est répété exactement dans les mêmes paroles, dans le Montreal Star, en anglais, dans la Gazette, en anglais, dans Le Canada, en français et aussi dans La Patrie, en français, textuellement les mêmes mots: "C'est moi-même, à titre de Procureur Général, chargé d'assurer le respect de l'ordre et le respect des citoyens paisibles qui ai donné à la Commission des Liqueurs, l'ordre d'annuler le permis." Je vous demande si c'est possible que vous ayez employé presque exactement ces mots en discutant l'affaire avec les journalistes, ce jour-là?

R. Lorsque les journalistes viennent au bureau pour avoir des entrevues, des fois les entrevues durent une demi-heure, des fois une heure, des fois une heure et demie; quels sont les termes exacts qui sont employés, on ne peut pas se souvenir exactement des termes. Mais la vérité vraie c'est ce que j'ai dit tout à l'heure, et c'est cela que j'ai dit aux journalistes, comme Premier Ministre et comme Procureur Général, je prends la responsabilité. Si j'avais dit au Juge Archambault: "Vous ne le ferez pas", il ne l'aurait probablement pas fait. Comme il me suggérait de le faire et qu'après réflexion et vérification je trouvais que c'était correct, que c'était conforme à mon devoir, j'ai approuvé et c'est toujours un ordre que l'on donne. Quand l'officier supérieur parle, c'est un ordre que l'on donne, même s'il accepte la suggestion de l'officier dans son département, c'est un ordre qu'il donne indirectement. Je ne me rappelle pas des expressions exactes, mais ce sont les faits.

D. Référant à l'article contenue dans la Gazette du 5 décembre, c'est-à-dire le jour suivant l'annulation du permis, vous trouvez là les mots en anglais:

"In statement to the press yesterday, the Premier recalled that: 'Two weeks ago, I pointed out that the Provincial Government had the firm intention to take the most rigorous and efficient measures possible to get rid of those who under the names of Witnesses of Jehovah, distribute circulars which in my opinion, are not only injurious for Quebec and its population, but which are of a very libellous and seditious character. The propaganda of the Witnesses of Jehovah cannot be tolerated and there are more than 400 of them now before the courts in Montreal, Quebec, Three Rivers and other centers.'

'A certain Mr. Roncarelli has supplied bail for hundreds of witnesses of Jehovah. The sympathy which this man has shown for the Witnesses, in such an evident, repeated and audacious manner, is a provocation to public order, to the administration of justice and is definitely contrary to the aims of justice.'"

D. Je vous demande, monsieur le Premier Ministre, si ce sont les paroles presque exactes ou exactes que vous avez dites à la conférence de presse?

R. Que j'ai dit ici: "A certain Mr. Roncarelli has supplied bail for hundreds of witnesses of Jehovah. The Sympathy which this man has shown for the Witnesses, in such an evident, repeated and audacious manner, is a provocation to public order, to the administration of justice and is definitely contrary to the aims of justice." Je l'ai dit et je considère que c'est vrai.

M. ARCHAMBAULT:

D. Maintenant, ce jour-là où vous avez reçu une lettre, le 30 novembre 1946, avez-vous décidé, ce jour-là, d'enlever la licence?

R. Certainement, ce jour-là, j'avais appelé le Premier Ministre, en l'occurrence le procureur général, lui faisant part des constatations, c'est-à-dire des renseignements que je possédais, et de mon intention d'annuler le privilège, et le Premier Ministre m'a répondu de prendre mes précautions, de bien vérifier s'il s'agissait bien de la même personne, qu'il pouvait y avoir plusieurs Roncarelli, et coetera. Alors, quand j'ai eu la confirmation de Y3 à l'effet que c'était la même personne, j'ai rappelé le Premier Ministre pour l'assurer qu'il s'agissait bien de Frank Roncarelli, détenteur d'un permis de la Commission des Liqueurs; et, là, le Premier Ministre m'a autorisé, il m'a donné son consentement, son approbation, sa permission, et son ordre de procéder.

In these circumstances, when the de facto power of the Executive over its appointees at will to such a statutory public function is exercised deliberately and intentionally to destroy the vital business interests of a citizen, is there legal redress by him against the person so acting? This calls for an examination of the statutory provisions governing the issue, renewal and revocation of liquor licences and the scope of authority entrusted by law to the Attorney-General and the government in relation to the administration of the Act.

The liquor law is contained in R.S.Q. 1941, c. 255, entitled An Act Respecting Alcoholic Liquor. A Commission is created as a corporation, the only member of which is the general manager. By s.5

The exercise of the functions, duties and powers of the Quebec Liquor Commission shall be vested in one person alone, named by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, with the title of Manager. The remuneration of such person shall be determined by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council and be paid out of the revenues of the Liquor Commission. R.S. 1925, c.37, s.5; 1 Ed. VII (2), c. 14, ss. 1 and 5; 1 Geo. VI, c. 22, ss. 1 and 5.

The entire staff for carrying out the duties of the Commission are appointed by the general manager -- here Mr. Archambault -- who fixes salaries and assigns functions, the Lieutenant-Governor in Council reserving the right of approval of the salaries. Besides the general operation of buying and selling liquor throughout the province and doing all things necessary to that end, the Commission is authorized by s. 9 (e) to "grant, refuse or cancel permits for the sale of alcoholic liquors or other permits in regard thereto and to transfer the permit of any person deceased". By s. 12 suits against the general manager for acts done in the exercise of his duties require the authority of the Chief Justice of the province, and the Commission can be sued only with the consent of the Attorney-General. Every officer of the Commission is declared to be a public officer and by R.S.Q. 1941, c. 10, s. 2, holds office during pleasure. By s. 19 the Commission shall pay over to the Provincial Treasurer any moneys which the latter considers available and by s. 20 the Commission is to account to the Provincial Treasurer for its receipts, disbursements, assets and liabilities. Sections 30 and 32 provide for the issue of permits to sell; they are to be granted to individuals only, in their own names; by s. 34 the Commission "may refuse to grant any permit"; subs. (2) provides for permits in special cases of municipalities where prohibition of sale is revoked in whole or part by by-law; subs. (3) restricts or refuses the grant of permits in certain cities the Council of which so requests; but it is provided that ... If the fying of such by-law takes place after the Commission has granted a permit in such city or town, the Commission shall be unable to give effect to the request before the first of May next after the date of fying.

Subsection (4) deals with a refusal to issue permits in small cities unless requested by a by-law, approved by a majority vote of the electors. By subs. (6) special power is given the Commission to grant permits to hotels in summer resorts for five months only notwithstanding that requests under subss. (2) and (4) are not made. Section 35 prescribes the expiration of every permit on April 30 of each year. Dealing with cancellation, the section provides that the "Commission may cancel any permit at its discretion". Besides the loss of the privilege and without the necessity of legal proceedings, cancellation entails loss of fees paid to obtain it and confiscation of the liquor in the possession of the holder and the receptacles containing it. If the cancellation is not followed by prosecution for an offence under the Act, compensation is provided for certain items of the forfeiture. Subsection (5) requires the Commission to cancel any permit made use of on behalf of a person other than the holder; s. 36 requires cancellation in specified cases. The sale of liquor is, by s. 42, forbidden to various persons. Section 148 places upon the Attorney-General the duty of

1. Assuring the observance of this Act and of the Alcoholic Liquor Possession and Transportation Act (Chap. 256), and investigating, preventing and suppressing the infringements of such acts, in every way authorized thereby;
2. Conducting the suits or prosecutions for infringements of this Act or of the said Alcoholic Liquor Possession and Transportation Act. R.S. 1925, c. 37, s. 78a; 24 Geo. V, c. 17, s. 17.

The provisions of the statute, which may be supplemented by detailed regulations, furnish a code for the complete administration of the sale and distribution of alcoholic liquors directed by the Commission as a public service, for all legitimate purposes of the populace. It recognizes the association of wines and liquors as embellishments of food and its ritual and as an interest of the public. As put in Macbeth, the "sauce to meat is ceremony", and so we have restaurants, cafés, hotels and other places of serving food, specifically provided for in that association.

At the same time the issue of permits has a complementary interest in those so catering to the public. The continuance of the permit over the years, as in this case, not only recognizes its virtual necessity to a superior class restaurant but also its identification with the business carried on. The provisions for assignment of the permit are to this most pertinent and they were exemplified in the continuity of the business here. As its exercise continues, the economic life of the holder becomes progressively more deeply implicated with the privilege while at the same time his vocation becomes correspondingly dependent on it.

The field of licensed occupations and businesses of this nature is steadily becoming of greater concern to citizens generally. It is a matter of vital importance that a public administration that can refuse to allow a person to enter or continue a calling which, in the absence of regulation, would be free and legitimate, should be conducted with complete impartiality and integrity; and that the grounds for refusing or cancelling a permit should unquestionably be such and such only as are incompatible with the purposes envisaged by the statute: the duty of a Commission is to serve those purposes and those only. A decision to deny or cancel such a privilege lies within the "discretion" of the Commission; but that means that decision is to be based upon a weighing of considerations pertinent to the object of the administration.

In public regulation of this sort there is no such thing as absolute and untrammelled "discretion", that is that action can be taken on any ground or for any reason that can be suggested to the mind of the administrator; no legislative Act can, without express language, be taken to contemplate an unlimited arbitrary power exercisable for any purpose, however capricious or irrelevant, regardless of the nature or purpose of the statute. Fraud and corruption in the Commission may not be mentioned in such statutes but they are always implied as exceptions. "Discretion" necessarily implies good faith in discharging public duty; there is always a perspective within which a statute is intended to operate; and any clear departure from its lines or objects is just as objectionable as fraud or corruption. Could an applicant be refused a permit because he had been born in another province, or because of the colour of his hair? the legislature cannot be so distorted.

To deny or revoke a permit because a citizen exercises an unchallengeable right totally irrelevant to the sale of liquor in a restaurant is equally beyond the scope of the discretion conferred. There was here not only revocation of the existing permit but a declaration of a future, definitive disqualification of the appellant to obtain one: it was to be "forever". This purports to divest his citizenship status of its incident of membership in the class of those of the public to whom such a privilege could be extended. Under the statutory language here, that is not competent to the Commission and a fortiori to the government or the respondent: McGillivray v. Kimber [(1915), 52 S.C.R. 146, 26 D.L.R. 164.]. There is here an administrative tribunal which, in certain respects, is to act in a judicial manner; and even on the view of the dissenting justices in McGillivray, there is liability: what could be more malicious than to punish this licensee for having done what he had an absolute right to do in a matter utterly irrelevant to the Liquor Act? Malice in the proper sense in simply acting for a reason and purpose knowingly foreign to the administration, to which was added here the element of intentional punishment by what was virtually vocation outlawry.

It may be difficult if not impossible in cases generally to demonstrate a breach of this public duty in the illegal purpose served; there may be no means, even if proceedings against the Commission were permitted by the Attorney-General, as here they were refused, of compelling the Commission to justify a refusal or revocation or to give reasons for its action; on these questions I make no observation; but in the case before us that difficulty is not present: the reasons are openly avowed.

The act of the respondent through the instrumentality of the Commission brought about a breach of an implied public statutory duty toward the appellant; it was a gross abuse of legal power expressly intended to punish him for an act wholly irrelevant to the statute, a punishment which inflicted on him, as it was intended to do, the destruction of his economic life as a restaurant keeper within the province. Whatever may be the immunity of the Commission or its member from an action for damages, there is none in the respondent. He was under no duty in relation to the appellant and his act was an intrusion upon the functions of a statutory body. The injury done by him was a fault engaging liability within the principles of the underlying public law of Quebec: Mostyn v. Fabrigas [98 E.R. 1021], and under art. 1053 of the Civil Code. That, in the presence of expanding administrative regulation of economic activities, such a step and its consequences are to be suffered by the victim without recourse or remedy, that an administration according to law is to be superseded by action dictated by and according to the arbitrary likes, dislikes and irrelevant purposes of public officers acting beyond their duty, would signalize the beginning of disintegration of the rule of law as a fundamental postulate of our constitutional structure. An administration of licences on the highest level of fair and impartial treatment to all may be forced to follow the practice of "first come, first served", which makes the strictest observance of equal responsibility to all of even greater importance; at this stage of developing government it would be a danger of high consequence to tolerate such a departure from good faith in executing the legislative purpose. It should be added, however, that that principle is not, by this language, intended to be extended to ordinary governmental employment: with that we are not here concerned.

It was urged by Mr. Beaulieu that the respondent, as the incumbent of an office of state, so long as he was proceeding in "good faith", was free to act in a matter of this kind virtually as he pleased. The office of Attorney-General traditionally and by statute carries duties that relate to advising the Executive, including here, administrative bodies, enforcing the public law and directing the administration of justice. In any decision of the statutory body in this case, he had no part to play beyond giving advice on legal questions arising. In that role his action should have been limited to advice on the validity of a revocation for such a reason or purpose and what that advice should have been does not seem to me to admit of any doubt. To pass from this limited scope of action to that of bringing about a step by the Commission beyond the bounds prescribed by the legislature for its exclusive action converted what was done into his personal act.

"Good faith" in this context, applicable both to the respondent and the general manager, means carrying out the statute according to its intent and for its purpose; it means good faith in acting with a rational appreciation of that intent and purpose and not with an improper intent and for an alien purpose; it does not mean for the purposes of punishing a person for exercising an unchallengeable right; it does not mean arbitrarily and illegally attempting to divest a citizen of an incident of his civil status.

I mention, in order to make clear that it has not been overlooked, the decision of the House of Lords in Allen v. Flood [[1898] A.C. 1.], in which the principle was laid down that an act of an individual otherwise not actionable does not become so because of the motive or reason for doing it, even maliciously to injure, as distinguished from an act done by two or more persons. No contention was made in the present case based on agreed action by the respondent and Mr. Archambault. In Allen v. Flood, the actor was a labour leader and the victims non-union workmen who were lawfully dismissed by their employer to avoid a strike involving no breach of contract or law. Here the act done was in relation to a public administration affecting the rights of a citizen to enjoy a public privilege, and a duty implied by the statute toward the victim was violated. The existing permit was an interest for which the appellant was entitled to protection against any unauthorized interference, and the illegal destruction of which gave rise to a remedy for the damages suffered. In Allen v. Flood there were no such elements.

Nor is it necessary to examine the question whether on the basis of an improper revocation the appellant could have compelled the issue of a new permit or whether the purported revocation was a void act. The revocation was de facto, it was intended to end the privilege and to bring about the consequences that followed. As against the respondent, the appellant was entitled to treat the breach of duty as effecting a revocation and to elect for damages.

Mr. Scott argued further that even if the revocation were within the scope of discretion and not a breach of duty, the intervention of the respondent in so using the Commission was equally a fault. The proposition generalized is this: where, by a statute restricting the ordinary activities of citizens, a privilege is conferred by an administrative body, the continuance of that enjoyment is to be free from the influence of third persons on that body for the purpose only of injuring the privilege holder. It is the application to such a privilege of the proposition urged but rejected in Allen v. Flood in the case of a private employment. The grounds of distinction between the two cases have been pointed out; but for the reasons given consideration of this ground is unnecessary and I express no opinion for or against it.

A subsidiary defence was that notice of action had not been given as required by art. 88 C.C.P. This provides generally that, without such notice, no public officer or person fulfilling any public function or duty is liable in damages "by reason of any act done by him in the exercise of his functions". Was the act here, then, done by the respondent in the course of that exercise? The basis of the claim, as I have found it, is that the act was quite beyond the scope of any function or duty committed to him, so far so that it was one done exclusively in a private capacity, however much in fact the influence of public office and power may have carried over into it. It would be only through an assumption of a general overriding power of executive direction in statutory administrative matters that any colour of propriety in the act could be found. But such an assumption would be in direct conflict with fundamental postulates of our provincial as well as dominion government; and in the actual circumstances there is not a shadow of justification for it in the statutory language.

The damages suffered involved the vocation of the appellant within the province. Any attempt at a precise computation or estimate must assume probabilities in an area of uncertainty and risk. The situation is one which The Court should approach as a jury would, in a view of its broad features; and in the best consideration I can give to them, the damages should be fixed at the sum of $25,000 plus that allowed by the trial court.

I would therefore allow the appeals, set aside the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench and restore the judgment at trial modified by increasing the damages to the sum of $33,123.53. The appellant should have his costs in the Court of Queen's Bench and in this Court.

The judgment of Locke and Martland JJ. was delivered by

MARTLAND J.

MARTLAND J.:-- This is an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, Appeal Side, for the Province of Quebec [[1956] Que. Q.B. 447.], District of Montreal, rendered on April 12, 1956, overruling the judgment of the Superior Court rendered on May 2, 1951, under the terms of which the appellant had been awarded damages in the sum of $8,123.53 and costs.

The appellant had appealed from the judgment of the Superior Court in respect of the amount of damages awarded. This appeal was dismissed.

The facts which give rise to this appeal are as follows:

The appellant, on December 4, 1946, was the owner of a restaurant and café situated at 1429 Crescent Street in the City of Montreal. At that time he was the holder of a liquor permit, no. 68, granted to him on May 1, 1946, pursuant to the provisions of the Alcoholic Liquor Act of the Province of Quebec and which permitted the sale of alcoholic liquors in the restaurant and café. The permit was valid until April 30, 1947, subject to possible cancellation by the Quebec Liquor Commission (hereinafter sometimes referred to as "the Commission") in accordance with the provisions of s. 35 of that Act. The business operated by the appellant had been founded by his father in the year 1912 and it had been continuously licensed until December 4, 1946. The evidence is that prior to that date the appellant had complied with the requirements of the Alcoholic Liquor Act and had conducted a high-class restaurant business.

The appellant was an adherent of the Witnesses of Jehovah. From some time in 1944 until November 12, 1946, he had, on numerous occasions, given security for Witnesses of Jehovah who had been prosecuted under City of Montreal By-laws numbered 270 and 1643 for minor offences of distributing, peddling and canvassing without a licence. The maximum penalty for these offences was a fine of $40 and costs, or imprisonment for 60 days. The total number of bonds furnished by the appellant was 390. These security bonds were accepted by the City attorney and the Recorder of the City of Montreal without remuneration to the appellant. None of the accused who had been bonded ever defaulted. Subsequently the appellant was released from these bonds at his own request and new security was furnished by others.

As a result of a change of procedure in the Recorder's Court in Montreal by the Attorney in Chief of that Court, the appellant was not accepted as a bondsman in any cases before that Court after November 12, 1946.

Up to November 12, 1946, the security bonds furnished by the appellant were accepted without question. These bonds were based upon the appellant's immovable property containing the restaurant. The appellant did not give any security in any criminal case involving a charge of sedition.

About the 24th or 25th of November 1946 the pamphlet "Quebec's Burning Hate" began to be distributed in the Province of Quebec by the Witnesses of Jehovah. The Chief Crown Prosecutor in Montreal, then Mtre. Oscar Gagnon, K.C., decided that the distribution of this pamphlet should be prevented. There is no evidence that the appellant was at any time a distributor of this pamphlet and his restaurant and café in Montreal was not used for the distribution or storage of these pamphlets by himself or by anyone else. The appellant had ceased to be a bondsman before the distribution of this pamphlet in the Province of Quebec had commenced.

On November 25, 1946, a number of pamphlets was seized in a building in the City of Sherbrooke owned by the appellant and leased from him, as a place of worship, by Witnesses of Jehovah under the control of the local minister Mr. Raymond Browning. There is no evidence that the appellant was in any way responsible for the activities of this congregation, or that he knew that the pamphlet "Quebec's Burning Hate" was in those premises.

In the course of his inquiries about the distribution of this pamphlet, Mr. Gagnon learned that the appellant had been giving bail in a large number of cases in the Recorder's Court and also that he was the holder of the liquor permit for his restaurant. These facts were brought by Mr. Gagnon to the attention of Mr. Edouard Archambault, then Chairman of the Quebec Liquor Commission and subsequently Chief Judge of the Court of Sessions of the Peace. Mr. Archambault then interviewed Recorder Paquette, who informed him that the appellant held a licence from the Quebec Liquor Commission; that he was furnishing bail in a large number of cases of infractions of municipal by-laws; that these were so numerous that a great part of the police of Montreal had been taken from their duties as a consequence and that his Court was congested by the large number of cases pending before it.

Subsequent to the receipt of this information, Mr. Archambault communicated by telephone with the respondent. The discussion which took place on that occasion and on the occasion of a subsequent telephone call will be reviewed later. Following the two telephone conversations between Mr. Archambault and the respondent, Mr. Archambault, as manager of the Quebec Liquor Commission, issued an order for the cancellation of the appellant's permit without any prior notice to the appellant. All the liquor in the possession of the appellant on his restaurant premises was seized and was taken into the custody of the Commission.

The appellant carried on his restaurant business without a liquor licence for a period of approximately six months, after which, finding that the business could not be thus operated profitably, he closed it down and later effected a sale of the premises.

The appellant commenced action against the respondent on June 3, 1947, claiming damages in the total sum of $118,741. He alleged that the respondent, without legal or statutory authority, had caused the cancellation of his liquor permit as an act of reprisal because of his having acted as surety or bondsman for the Witnesses of Jehovah in connection with the charges above mentioned. He alleged that the permit had been arbitrarily and unlawfully cancelled and that, as a result, he had sustained the damages claimed.

By his defence the respondent alleged that the Witnesses of Jehovah, in the years 1945 and 1946, had, with the consent and encouragement of the appellant, organized a propaganda campaign in the Province of Quebec, and particularly in the City of Montreal, where they had distributed pamphlets of a seditious character. The respondent referred to the fact that the appellant had acted as surety for a number of persons under arrest and thus permitted them to repeat their offences and to continue their campaign. He alleged that in his capacity as Attorney-General of the Province of Quebec, after becoming cognizant of the conduct of the appellant and of the fact that he held a permit issued by the Quebec Liquor Commission, he had decided, after careful reflection, that it was contrary to public order to permit the appellant to enjoy the benefit of the privileges of this permit and that he, the respondent, had recommended to the manager of the Quebec Liquor Commission the cancellation of that permit. It was alleged that the permit did not give any right, but constituted a privilege available only during the pleasure of the Commission. He alleged that in the matter he had acted in his quality of Prime Minister and Attorney-General of the Province of Quebec and accordingly, could not incur any personal responsibility. He further pleaded the provisions of art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure and alleged that he had not received notice of the action as required by the provisions of that article.

The case came on for trial in the Superior Court before MacKinnon J., who made findings of fact and reached conclusions in law as follows:

1. that the respondent gave an order to the manager of the Commission, Mr. Archambault, to cancel the appellant's permit and that it was the respondent's order which was the determining factor in relation to the cancellation of that permit;
2. that the Commission had acted arbitrarily when it cancelled the permit and had disregarded the rules of reason and justice;
3. that the respondent had failed to show that, in law, he had any authority to interfere with the administration of the Commission, or to order it to cancel a permit;

4. that the respondent was not entitled to receive notice of the action pursuant to art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure because his acts which were complained of were not done in the exercise of his functions.

Damages were awarded in the total amount of $8,123.53.

From this judgment the respondent appealed. The appellant cross-appealed in respect of the matter of damages, asking for an award in an increased amount.

The respondent's appeal on the issue of liability was allowed and the appellant's appeal was dismissed. Rinfret J. dissented in respect of the allowance of the respondent's appeal.

Various reasons were given for the allowance of the appeal by the majority of the Court [[1956] Que. Q.B. 447.]. They may be summarized as follows:

Bissonnette J. reached the conclusion that, upon the evidence, the decision to cancel the permit had been made by Mr. Archambault before taking the respondent's advice. He also held that, according to the strict interpretation of the Alcoholic Liquor Act, the Commission was not obliged to justify before any Court the wisdom of its acts in cancelling a liquor permit.

Pratte J. allowed the appeal of the respondent on the first ground advanced by Bissonnette J., finding that there was no relationship of cause and effect as between the acts of the respondent and the cancellation of the permit because Mr. Archambault had already made his decision to cancel before consulting with the respondent.

Casey J. was of the same view with respect to this point. He also held that, although the discretion of the Commission to cancel a permit should not be exercised arbitrarily or capriciously, no individual has an inherent right to engage in the business regulated by the Act and the continuance of a permit was conditional upon the holder being of good moral character and a suitable person to exercise that privilege. In his view the chairman of the Commission had reasonable grounds for believing that the Witnesses of Jehovah were engaged in a campaign of libel and sedition and that the appellant, an active member of the sect, was participating in the group's activities. His view was that, in the light of this, the Commission could properly cancel the permit.

Martineau J., like the other majority judges in the Court, found that there was no relationship of cause and effect as between what the respondent had done and the cancellation of the permit, also holding that Mr. Archambault had decided to cancel it before communicating with the respondent. He was also of the view that a Minister of the Crown is not liable if, in the exercise of powers granted to him by law, he makes an erroneous decision upon reliable information. He also held that, while the Commission's discretion to cancel a permit was not absolute and had to be exercised in good faith, the discretion is not quasi-judicial but "quasi-illimited" and only restricted by the good faith of its officers. He was of the opinion that the good faith of both the respondent and Mr. Archambault could not be doubted. He found that no order to cancel the permit had been given by the respondent to Mr. Archambault. He also held that, even if an order had been given and had been the determining factor in procuring the cancellation of the permit, there would be no liability upon the respondent, in view of the appellant's participation in the propaganda of the Witnesses of Jehovah.

Rinfret J., who dissented and who would have dismissed the respondent's appeal, in general agreed with the conclusions reached by the trial judge.

In view of the foregoing, it appears that there are four main points which require to be considered in the present appeal, which are as follows:

1. Was there a relationship of cause and effect as between the respondent's acts and the cancellation of the appellant's permit?
2. If there was such a relationship, were the acts of the respondent justifiable on the ground that he acted in good faith in the exercise of his official functions as Attorney-General and Prime Minister of the Province of Quebec?
3. Was the cancellation of the appellant's permit a lawful act of the Commission, acting within the scope of its powers as defined in the Alcoholic Liquor Act?

4. Was the respondent entitled to the protection provided by art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure?

It is proposed to consider each of these points in the above sequence.

With respect to the first point, after reviewing the evidence, I am satisfied that there was ample evidence to sustain the finding of the trial judge that the cancellation of the appellant's permit was the result of instructions given by the respondent to the manager of the Commission.

Two telephone calls were made by Mr. Archambault to the respondent. According to the evidence of the respondent, Mr. Archambault telephoned him in November 1946 "et il m'a dit que Roncarelli qui multipliait les cautionnements à la Cour du Recorder d'une façon désordonnée, contribuant à paralyser les activités de la police et à congestionner les tribunaux, que ce nommé Roncarelli détenait un privilège de la Commission des Liqueurs de Québec."

In reply the respondent says that he said to Mr. Archambault:

C'est une chose très grave, êtes-vous sûr qu'il s'agit de Roncarelli qui a un permis de la Commission des Liqueurs?

Mr. Archambault then replied that he would inform himself and would communicate with the respondent.

Some time after the first telephone conversation, and apparently about November 30 or December 1, 1946, Mr. Archambault again telephoned the respondent to say:

qu'il était certain que le Roncarelli en question, qui paralysait les activités de la Cour du Recorder, qui accaparait dans une large mesure les services de la force constabulaire de Montréal, dont les journaux disaient avec raison qu'elle n'avait pas le nombre suffisant de policiers, était bien la personne qui détenait un permis.

To this the respondent replied:

Dans ces circonstances, je considère que c'est mon devoir, comme Procureur Général et comme Premier Ministre, en conscience, dans l'exercice de mes fonctions officielles et pour remplir le mandat que le peuple m'avait confié et qu'il m'a renouvelé avec une immense majorité en 1948, après la cancellation du permis et après la poursuite intentée contre moi, j'ai cru que c'était mon devoir, en conscience, de dire au Juge que ce permis-là le Gouvernement de Québec ne pouvait pas accorder un privilège à un individu comme Roncarelli qui tenait l'attitude qu'il tenait.

The respondent further says that he told Mr. Archambault:

Vous avez raison, ôtez le permis, ôtez le privilège.

In February 1947 the respondent, in an interview with the press, stated that the appellant's permit had been cancelled on orders from him. His statement on this point appeared in a news dispatch to the Canadian Press from its Quebec correspondent:

It was I, as Attorney-General of the Province charged with the protection of good order, who gave the order to annul Frank Roncarelli's permit.

Mr. Duplessis said:

By so doing, not only have we exercised a right but we have fulfilled an imperious duty. The permit was cancelled not temporarily but definitely and for always.

It seems to me that the only reason Mr. Archambault could have had for telephoning the respondent in the first place, after his receipt of the information given by Mr. Gagnon and Recorder Paquette, was to obtain the respondent's direction as to what should be done. I find it difficult to accept the proposition that there was no relationship of cause and effect as between what the respondent said to Mr. Archambault and the cancellation of the permit. While it is true that in his evidence Mr. Archambault states that he had decided to cancel the permit on the day he received the written report from his secret agent Y3, dated November 30, 1946 (which was subsequent to the first telephone conversation), he goes on to say:

D. Maintenant, ce jour-là où vous avez reçu une lettre, le 30 novembre 1946, avez-vous décidé, ce jour-là, d'enlever la licence?

R. Certainement, ce jour-là, j'avais appelé le Premier Ministre, en l'occurrence le procureur général, lui faisant part des constatations, c'est-à-dire des renseignements que je possédais, et de mon intention d'annuler le privilège, et le Premier Ministre m'a répondu de prendre mes précautions, de bien vérifier s'il s'agissait bien de la même personne, qu'il pouvait y avoir plusieurs Roncarelli, et coetera. Alors, quand j'ai eu la confirmation de Y3 à l'effet que c'était la même personne, j'ai rappelé le Premier Ministre pour l'assurer qu'il s'agissait bien de Frank Roncarelli, détenteur d'un permis de la Commission des Liqueurs; et, là, le Premier Ministre m'a autorisé, il m'a donné son consentement, son approbation, sa permission, et son ordre de procéder.

I conclude from this evidence that any "decision" of Mr. Archambault's was at most tentative and would only be made effective if he received direction from the respondent to carry it out. I would doubt that, if the respondent had advised against the cancellation of the permit, Mr. Archambault's decision would have been implemented.

The respondent appears to have shared this view because in his evidence he states as follows:

Si j'avais dit au Juge Archambault: "Vous ne le ferez pas", il ne l'aurait probablement pas fait. Comme il me suggérait de le faire et qu'après réflexion et vérification je trouvais que c'était correct, que c'était conforme à mon devoir, j'ai approuvé et c'est toujours un ordre que l'on donne. Quand l'officier supérieur parle, c'est un ordre que l'on donne, même s'il accepte la suggestion de l'officier dans son département, c'est un ordre qu'il donne indirectement. Je ne me rapelle pas des expressions exactes, mais ce sont les faits.

I, therefore, agree with the learned trial judge that the cancellation of the appellant's permit was the result of an order given by the respondent.

The second point for consideration is as to whether the respondent's acts were justifiable as having been done in good faith in the exercise of his official function as Attorney-General and Prime Minister of the Province of Quebec.

In support of his contention that the respondent had so acted, we were referred by his counsel to the following statutory provisions:

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT ACT, R.S.Q. 1941, c. 46

3. The Attorney-General is the official legal adviser of the Lieutenant-Governor, and the legal member of the Executive Council of the Province of Quebec.

4. The duties of the Attorney-General are the following:

1. To see that the administration of public affairs is in accordance with the law;
2. To exercise a general superintendence over all matters connected with the administration of justice in the Province.

5. The function and powers of the Attorney-General are the following:

1. He has the functions and powers which belong to the office of Attorney-General of England, respectively, by law or usage, insofar as the same are applicable to this Province, and also the functions and powers, which, up to the Union, belonged to such offices in the late Province of Canada, and which, under the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, are within the powers of the Government of this Province;
2. He advises the heads of the several departments of the Government of the Province upon all matters of law concerning such departments, or arising in the administration thereof;

7. He is charged with superintending the administration or the execution, as the case may be, of the laws respecting police.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER ACT, R.S.Q. 1941, c. 7

5. The Lieutenant-Governor may appoint, under the Great Seal, from among the members of the Executive Council, the following officials, who shall remain in office during pleasure:

1. A Prime Minister who shall, ex-officio, be president of the Council.

THE ALCOHOLIC LIQUOR ACT, R.S.Q. 1941, c. 255

DIVISION XII

INVESTIGATION AND PROSECUTION OF OFFENCES

148. The Attorney-General shall be charged with:

1. Assuring the observance of this act and of the Alcoholic Liquor Possession and Transportation Act (Chap. 256), and investigating, preventing and suppressing the infringements of such acts, in every way authorized thereby;
2. Conducting the suits or prosecutions for infringements of this act or of the said Alcoholic Liquor Possession and Transportation Act.

I do not find, in any of these provisions authority to enable the respondent, either as Attorney-General or Prime Minister, to direct the cancellation of a permit under the Alcoholic Liquor Act. On the contrary, the intent and purpose of that Act appears to be to place the complete control over the liquor traffic in Quebec in the hands of an independent commission. The only function of the Attorney-General under that statute is in relation to the assuring of the observance of its provisions. There is no evidence of any breach of that Act by the appellant.

However, it is further argued on behalf of the respondent that, as Attorney-General, in order to suppress or to prevent crimes and offences, "He may do so by instituting legal proceedings; he may do so by other methods." This amounts to a contention that he is free to use any methods he chooses; that, on suspicion of participation in what he thinks would be an offence, he may sentence a citizen to economic ruin without trial. This seems to me to be a very dangerous proposition and one which is completely alien to the legal concepts applicable to the administration of public office in Quebec, as well as in the other provinces of Canada.

In my view, the respondent was not acting in the exercise of any official powers which he possessed in doing what he did in this matter.

The third point to be considered is as to whether the appellant's permit was lawfully cancelled by the Commission under the provisions of the Alcoholic Liquor Act. Section 35 of that Act makes provision for the cancellation of a permit in the following terms:

35. 1. Whatever be the date of issue of any permit granted by the Commission, such permit shall expire on the 30th of April following, unless it be cancelled by the Commission before such date, or unless the date at which it must expire be prior to the 30th of April following.

The Commission may cancel any permit at its discretion.

It is contended by the respondent, and with considerable force, that this provision gives to the Commission an unqualified administrative discretion as to the cancellation of a permit issued pursuant to that Act. Such a discretion, it is contended, is not subject to any review in the Courts.

The appellant contends that the Commission's statutory discretion is not absolute and is subject to legal restraint. He cites the statement of the law by Lord Halsbury in Sharp v. Wakefield [[1891] A.C. 173 at 179.]:

An extensive power is confided to the justices in their capacity as justices to be exercised judicially; and "discretion" means when it is said that something is to be done within the discretion of the authorities that that something is to be done according to the rules of reason and justice, not according to private opinion: Rooke's Case; according to law, and not humour. It is to be, not arbitrary, vague, and fanciful, but legal and regular. And it must be exercised within the limit, to which an honest man competent to the discharge of his office ought to confine himself.

That was a case dealing with the discretionary powers of the licensing justices to refuse renewal of a licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors. This statement of the law was approved by Lord Greene M.R. in Minister of National Revenue v. Wrights' Canadian Ropes, Limited [[1947] A.C. 109 at 122.].

The appellant further contends that, in exercising this discretion, the rules of natural justice must be observed and points out that no notice of the intention of the Commission to cancel his permit was ever given to the appellant, nor was he given a chance to be heard by the Commission before the permit was cancelled.

With respect to this latter point, it would appear to be somewhat doubtful whether the appellant had a right to a personal hearing, in view of the judgment of Lord Radcliffe in Nakkuda Ali v. Jayaratne [[1951] A.C. 66.]. However, regardless of this, it is my view that the discretionary power to cancel a permit given to the Commission by the Alcoholic Liquor Act must be related to the administration and enforcement of that statute. It is not proper to exercise the power of cancellation for reasons which are unrelated to the carrying into effect of the intent and purpose of the Act. The association of the appellant with the Witnesses of Jehovah and his furnishing of bail for members of that sect, which were admitted to be the reasons for the cancellation of his permit and which were entirely lawful, had no relationship to the intent and purposes of the Alcoholic Liquor Act.

Furthermore, it should be borne in mind that the right of cancellation of a permit under that Act is a substantial power conferred upon what the statute contemplated as an independent commission. That power must be exercised solely by that corporation. It must not and cannot be exercised by any one else. The principle involved is stated by the Earl of Selborne in the following passage in his judgment in Spackman v. Plumstead Board of Works [(1885), 10 App. Cas. 229 at 240.]:

No doubt, in the absence of special provisions as to how the person who is to decide is to proceed, the law will imply no more than that the substantial requirements of justice shall not be violated. He is not a judge in the proper sense of the word; but he must give the parties an opportunity of being heard before him and stating their case and their view. He must give notice when he will proceed with the matter, and he must act honestly and impartially and not under the dictation of some other person or persons to whom the authority is not given by law. There must be no malversation of any kind. There would be no decision within the meaning of the statute if there were anything of that sort done contrary to the essence of justice.

While the Earl of Selborne is here discussing the rules applicable to a quasi-judicial tribunal, that portion of his statement which requires such a tribunal to act honestly and impartially and not under the dictation of some other person or persons is, I think, equally applicable to the performance of an administrative function.

The same principle was applied in respect of the performance of an administrative function by Chief Justice Greenshields in Jaillard v. City of Montreal [(1934), 72 Que. S.C. 112.].

In the present case it is my view, for the reasons already given, that the power was not, in fact, exercised by the Commission, but was exercised by the respondent, acting through the manager of the Commission. Cancellation of a permit by the Commission at the request or upon the direction of a third party, whoever he may be, is not a proper and valid exercise of the power conferred upon the Commission by s. 35 of the Act. The Commission cannot abdicate its own functions and powers and act upon such direction.

Finally, there is the question as to the giving of notice of the action by the appellant to the respondent pursuant to art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows:

ACTIONS AGAINST PUBLIC OFFICERS

88. No public officer or other person fulfilling any public function or duty can be sued for damages by reason of any act done by him in the exercise of his functions, nor can any verdict or judgment be rendered against him, unless notice of such action has been given him at least one month before the issue of the writ of summons.

Such notice must be in writing; it must state the grounds of the action, and the name of the plaintiff's attorney or agent, and indicate his office; and must be served upon him personally or at his domicile.

The contention of the respondent is that, as Attorney-General, he was a public official whose function was to maintain law and order in the Province; that he acted as he did in the intended exercise of that function and that he is not deprived of the protection afforded by the article because he had exceeded the powers which, in law, he possessed.

The issue is as to whether those acts were "done by him in the exercise of his functions." For the reasons already given in dealing with the second of the four points under discussion, I do not think that it was a function either of the Prime Minister or of the Attorney-General to interfere with the administration of the Commission by causing the cancellation of a liquor permit. That was something entirely outside his legal functions. It involved the exercise of powers which, in law, he did not possess at all.

Is the position altered by the fact that apparently he thought it was his right and duty to act as he did? I do not think that it is. The question of whether or not his acts were done by him in the exercise of his functions is not to be determined on the basis of his own appreciation of those functions, but must be determined according to law. The respondent apparently assumed that he was justified in using any means he thought fit to deal with the situation which confronted him. In my view, when he deliberately elected to use means which were entirely outside his powers and were unlawful, he did not act in the exercise of his functions as a public official.

The principle which should be applied is stated by Lopes J. in Agnew v. Jobson [(1877), 47 L.J.M.C. 67, 13 Cox C.C. 625.]. That was an action for assault against a justice of the peace who had ordered a medical examination of the person of the plaintiff. There was no legal authority to make such an order, but it was admitted that the defendant bona fide believed that he had the authority to do that which he did. The defendant relied on absence of notice of the action as required by 11 & 12 Vic., c. 44. Section 8 of that Act provided that "no action shall be brought against any justice of the peace for anything done by him in the execution of his office" unless within six calendar months of the act complained of. Section 9, the one relied on by the defendant, provided that "no such action shall be commenced against any such justice" until a month after notice of action. Lopes J. held that "such justice" in s. 9 referred to a justice in execution of his office in s. 8. He held that s. 9 did not provide a defence to the defendant in these words (p. 68):

I am of opinion that the defendant Jobson is not entitled to notice of action. There was a total absence of any authority to do the act, and although he acted bona fide, believing he had authority, there was nothing on which to ground the belief, no knowledge of any fact such a belief might be based on.

Similarly here there was nothing on which the respondent could found the belief that he was entitled to deprive the appellant of his liquor permit.

On the issue of liability, I have, for the foregoing reasons, reached the conclusion that the respondent, by acts not justifiable in law, wrongfully caused the cancellation of the appellant's permit and thus caused damage to the appellant. The respondent intentionally inflicted damage upon the appellant and, therefore, in the absence of lawful justification, which I do not find, he is liable to the appellant for the commission of a fault under art. 1053 of the Civil Code.

I now turn to the matter of damages.

The learned trial judge awarded damages to the appellant in the sum of $8,123.53, made up of $1,123.53 for loss of value of liquor seized by the Commission, $6,000 for loss of profits from the restaurant from December 4, 1946, the date of the cancellation of the permit, to May 1, 1947, the date when the permit would normally have expired, and $1,000 for damages to his personal reputation. No objection is taken by the appellant in respect of these awards, but he contends that he is also entitled to compensation under certain other heads of damage in respect of which no award was made by the learned trial judge. These are in respect of damage to the good will and reputation of his business, loss of property rights in his permit and loss of future profits for a period of at least one year from May 1, 1947. Damages in respect of these items were not allowed by the learned trial judge because of the fact that the appellant's permit was "only a temporary asset."

The appellant contends that, although his permit was not permanent, yet, in the light of the long history of his restaurant and the continuous renewals of the permit previously, he had a reasonable expectation of renewal in the future, had not the cancellation been effected in December 1946. He contends that the value of the good will of his business was substantially damaged by that cancellation.

His position on this point is supported by the reasoning of Duff J. (as he then was) in McGillivray v. Kimber [(1915), 52 S.C.R. 146, 26 D.L.R. 164.]. That was an action claiming damages for the wrongful cancellation of the appellant's pilot's licence by the Sydney Pilotage Authority. At p. 163 he says:

The statement of defence seems to proceed upon the theory that for the purpose of measuring legal responsibility the consequences of this dismissal came to an end with the expiry of the term and that I shall discuss; but for the present it is sufficient to repeat that the dismissal was an act which being not only calculated, but intended to prevent the appellant continuing the exercise of his calling had in fact this intended effect; and the respondents are consequently answerable in damages unless there was in law justification or excuse for what they did. Per Bowen L.J., Mogul S.S. Co. v. McGregor, 23 Q.B.D. 598.

The statement by Bowen L.J. to which he refers appears at p. 613 of the report and is also of significance in relation to the appellant's right of action in this case. It is as follows:

Now, intentionally to do that which is calculated in the ordinary course of events to damage, and which does, in fact, damage another in that other person's property or trade, is actionable if done without just cause or excuse.

The evidence establishes that there was a substantial reduction in the value of the good will of the appellant's restaurant business as a result of what occurred, apart from the matter of any loss which might have resulted on the sale of the physical assets. It is difficult to assess this loss and there is not a great deal of evidence to assist in so doing. The appellant did file, as exhibits, income tax returns for the three years prior to 1946, which showed in those years a total net income from the business of $23,578.88. The profit-making possibilities of the business are certainly an item to be considered in determining the value of the good will.

However, in all the circumstances, the amount of these damages must be determined in a somewhat arbitrary fashion. I consider that $25,000 should be allowed as damages for the diminution of the value of the good will and for the loss of future profits.

I would allow both appeals, with costs here and below, and order the respondent to pay to the appellant damages in the total amount of $33,123.53, with interest from the date of the judgment in the Superior Court, and costs.

CARTWRIGHT J. (dissenting)

CARTWRIGHT J. (dissenting):-- This appeal is from two judgments of the Court of Queen's Bench (Appeal Side) for the Province of Quebec [[1956] Que. Q.B. 447.], of which the first allowed an appeal from a judgment of MacKinnon J. and dismissed the appellant's action, and the second dismissed a cross-appeal asking that the damages awarded by the learned trial judge be increased.

The respondent is, and was at all relevant times, the Prime Minister and Attorney-General of the Province of Quebec.

The appellant on December 4, 1946, was the owner of an immovable property, known as 1429 Crescent Street in the City of Montreal, where he had for many years successfully carried on the business of a restaurant and cafe. He was the holder of liquor permit no. 68 granted to him on May 1, 1946, for the sale of alcoholic liquors in his restaurant and cafe pursuant to the provisions of the Alcoholic Liquor Act, R.S.Q. 1941, c. 255, hereinafter referred to as "the Act". This permit would normally have expired on April 30, 1947. The business carried on by the appellant had been founded by his father in 1912 and had been licensed uninterruptedly from that time until 1946. Prior to December 4, 1946, the appellant had complied with all the requirements of the Act and had carried on his restaurant business in conformity with the laws of the Province.

The appellant was at all relevant times a member of a sect known as "The Witnesses of Jehovah" and from some time in 1944 up to November 12, 1946, had on about 390 occasions, acted as bailman for numbers of his co-religionists prosecuted under by-laws of the City of Montreal for distributing literature without a licence. None of those for whom he acted as bailman defaulted in appearance, and all of them were ultimately discharged upon the by-laws under which they were charged being held to be invalid.

About the 24th or 25th of November 1946 members of the sect commenced distributing copies of a circular entitled "Quebec's burning hate for God and Christ and Freedom is the shame of all Canada". Copies of this circular are printed in the record, the English version being exhibit D7 and the French version exhibit D11. The then senior Crown Prosecutor in Montreal, Mtre Oscar Gagnon, formed the opinion that the circular was a seditious libel and that its distribution should be prevented. It results from the judgment of this Court in Boucher v. The King [[1951] S.C.R. 265, 2 D.L.R. 369, 11 C.R. 85, 99 C.C.C. 1.] that the learned Crown Prosecutor was in error in forming the opinion that the circular could be regarded as seditious. It, however, can hardly be denied that it was couched in terms which would outrage the feelings of the great majority of the inhabitants of the Province of Quebec; and the same may be said of a number of other documents circulated by the sect, copies of which form part of the record in the case at bar.

The evidence does not show that the appellant took part in the distribution of any of the circulars mentioned or that he was a leader or chief of the sect. He did not act as bailman for any member of the sect charged in connection with the distribution of the circular, "Quebec's burning hate".

On November 25, 1946, pamphlets, including copied of "Quebec's burning hate" were sized in a building in the City of Sherbrooke owned by the appellant and leased by him to a congregation of Witnesses of Jehovah as a "Kingdom Hall" or place of worship. The appellant was not aware that the pamphlets were in this building.

From his investigations and the reports which he received M. Gagnon concluded that the distribution of the pamphlets "convergeait autour de M. Roncarelli ou de personnes qui étaient près de lui" and he so informed M. Edouard Archambault, the manager of the Quebec Liquor Commission. It may well be that M. Gagnon reached the conclusion mentioned on insufficient evidence. M. Gagnon also informed M. Archambault that the appellant had acted as bailman for a great number of Witnesses of Jehovah.

On receiving this information from M. Gagnon, M. Archambault read the circular, "Quebec's burning hate" and had a conversation with M. Paquette, the Recorder-in-Chief at Montreal, who confirmed the statements as to the appellant furnishing bail.

At this point M. Archambault formed the opinion that he should cancel the permit held by the appellant, but before taking any action he telephoned the respondent at Quebec, told him what information he had received and that he proposed cancelling the permit. The respondent told him to be careful to make sure that the Roncarelli who had furnished bail was in fact the appellant. M. Archambault satisfied himself as to this through the report of an agent "Y3", in whom he had confidence, and thereupon, according to his uncontradicted evidence, decided to cancel the permit. The reasons which brought him to this decision were stated by him as follows:

D. Alors, à ce moment-là, vous aviez déjà décidé d'enlever cette licence?

R. Oui

D. Vous basant, je suppose, sur les rapports que vous aviez déjà reçus de monsieur Oscar Gagnon et du recorder-en-chef Paquette que monsieur Roncarelli avait fourni des cautionnements?

R. Oui; et, à part de cela, de la littérature que j'avais lue.

D. Et le pamphlet auquel vous avez référé: "Quebec's Burning Hate"?

R. Oui, monsieur.

M. Archambault then telephoned the respondent. The substance of the two telephone conversations between M. Archambault and the respondent is summarized by the former as follows:

D. Maintenant, ce jour-là où vous avez reçu une lettre, le 30 novembre 1946, avez-vous décidé, ce jour-là, d'enlever la licence?

R. Certainement, ce jour-là, j'avais appelé le Premier Ministre, en l'occurrence le procureur général, lui faisant part des constatations, c'est-à-dire des renseignements que je possédais, et de mon intention d'annuler le privilège, et le Premier Ministre m'a répondu de prendre mes précautions, de bien vérifier s'il s'agissait bien de la même personne, qu'il pouvait y avoir plusieurs Roncarelli, et coetera. Alors, quand j'ai eu la confirmation de Y3 à l'effet que c'était la même personne, j'ai rappelé le Premier Ministre pour l'assurer qu'il s'agissait bien de Frank Roncarelli, détenteur d'un permis de la Commission des Liqueurs; et, là le Premier Ministre m'a autorisé, il m'a donné son consentement, son approbation, sa permission, et son ordre de procéder.

The evidence of the respondent is also that the suggestion of cancelling the permit was made by M. Archambault, and there is no evidence to the contrary.

There has been a difference of opinion in the Courts below as to whether what was said by the respondent to M. Archambault amounted to an order to cancel or merely to an "approbation énergique" of a decision already made. I do not find it necessary to choose between these conflicting views as I propose to assume for the purposes of this appeal that what was said by the respondent was so far a determining factor in the cancellation of the permit as to render him liable for the damages caused thereby to the appellant if the cancellation was an actionable wrong giving rise to a right of action for damages.

All of the Judges in the Courts below who have dealt with that aspect of the matter have concluded that the respondent acted throughout in the honest belief that he was fulfilling his duty to the Province, and this conclusion is supported by the evidence.

The opinion of M. Archambault and of the respondent appears to have been that a permit to sell liquor under the Act is a privilege in the gift of the Province which ought not to be given to, or allowed to continue to be enjoyed by, one who was actively supporting members of a group of persons who were engaged in a concerted campaign to vilify the Province and were persistently acting in contravention of existing by-laws. Once it is found, as I think it must be on the evidence, that this opinion was honestly entertained, I have reached the conclusion, for reasons that will appear, that the Court cannot inquire as to whether there was sufficient evidence to warrant its formation or as to whether it constituted a reasonable ground for cancellation of the permit.

The permit was cancelled on December 4, 1946, without any prior notice to the appellant and without his being given any opportunity to show cause why it ought not to be cancelled. It is clear that the appellant suffered substantial financial loss as a result of the cancellation.

In determining whether the cancellation of the permit in these circumstances was an actionable wrong on the part of the commission or of M. Archambault, its manager, it is necessary to consider the relevant provisions of the Act. These appear to me to be as follows:

S.5 A Commission is by this act created under the name of "The Quebec Liquor Commission", or "Commission des liqueurs de Québec", and shall constitute a corporation, vested with all the rights and powers belonging generally to corporations. The exercise of the functions, duties and powers of the Quebec Liquor Commission shall be vested in one person alone, named by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, with the title of manager. The remuneration of such person shall be determined by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council and be paid out of the revenues of the Liquor Commission.

S.9 The function, duties and powers of the Commission shall be the following:

d. To control the possession, sale and delivery of alcoholic liquor in accordance with the provisions of this act;

e. To grant, refuse, or cancel permits for the sale of alcoholic liquor or other permits in regard thereto, and to transfer the permit of any person deceased;

S.32 No permit shall be granted other than to an individual, and in his personal name.

The application for a permit may be made only by a British subject, must be signed by the applicant before witnesses, and must give his surname, Christian names, age, occupation, nationality and domicile, the kind of permit required and the place where it will be used, and must be accompanied by the amount of the duties payable upon the application for the permit. The applicant must furnish all additional information which the commission may deem expedient to ask for.

If the permit is to be used for the benefit of a partnership or corporation, the application therefore must likewise be accompanied by a declaration to that effect, and duly signed by such partnership or corporation.

Roncarelli v. Duplessis, [1959] S.C.R. 121

In such case, the partnership or corporation shall be responsible for any fine and costs, to which the holder of the permit may be condemned; and the amount thereof may be recovered before any court having jurisdiction, without prejudice to imprisonment, if any.

All applications for permits must be addressed to the Commission before the 10th of January in each year, to take effect on the 1st of May in the same year.

S.34 1. The Commission may refuse to grant any permit.

2. The Commission must refuse to grant any permit for the sale of alcoholic liquor in any municipality where a prohibition by-law is in force.

Subsections 2 to 6 of s. 34 enumerate special cases in which the commission must refuse a permit.

S.35 1. Whatever be the date of issue of any permit granted by the Commission, such permit shall expire on the 30th day of April following, unless it be cancelled by the Commission before such date, or unless the date at which it must expire be prior to the 30th of April following.

The Commission may cancel any permit at its discretion.

2. Saving the provisions of subsection 4 of this section, the cancellation of a permit shall entail the loss of the privilege conferred by such permit, and of the duties paid to obtain it, and the seizure and confiscation by the Commission of the alcoholic liquor found in the possession of the holder thereof, and the receptacles containing it, without any judicial proceedings being required for such confiscation.

The cancellation of a permit shall be served by a bailiff leaving a duplicate of such order of cancellation, signed by three members of the Commission, with the holder of such permit or with any other reasonable person at his domicile or place of business.

The cancellation shall take effect as soon as the order is served.

S.35 4. If the cancellation of the permit be not preceded or followed by a conviction for any offence under this act committed by the holder of such permit while it was in force, the Commission shall remit to such holder.

a. Such part of the duties which such person has paid upon the granting of such permit, proportionate to the number of full calendar months still to run up to the 1st of May following;

b. The proceeds of every sale by the Commission, after the seizure and confiscation thereof, of beer having an alcoholic content of not more than four per cent, in weight, less ten per cent of such proceeds;

c. The value, as determined by the Commission, of the other alcoholic liquor seized and confiscated, less ten per cent of such value.

5. Save in the case where a permit is granted to an individual on behalf of a partnership or corporation, in accordance with section 32, the Commission must cancel every permit made use of on behalf of any person other than the holder.

S.36 The Commission must cancel a permit:

1. Upon the production of a final condemnation, rendered against the permit-holder, his agent or employee, for selling, in the establishment, alcoholic liquor manufactured illegally or purchased in violation of this act;

2. Upon the production of three final condemnations rendered against the permit-holder for violation of this act;

3. If it appears that the permit-holder has, without the Commission's authorization, transferred, sold, pledged, or otherwise alienated the rights conferred by the permit.

On a consideration of these sections and of the remainder of the Act I am unable to find that the Legislature has, either expressly or by necessary implication, laid down any rules to guide the commission as to the circumstances under which it may refuse to grant a permit or may cancel a permit already granted. In my opinion the intention of the legislature, to be gathered from the whole Act, was to enumerate (i) certain cases in which the granting of a permit is forbidden, and (ii) certain cases in which the cancellation of a permit is mandatory, and, in all other cases to commit the decision as to whether a permit should be granted, refused or cancelled to the unfettered discretion of the commission. I conclude that the function of the commission in making that decision is administrative and not judicial or quasi-judicial. The submission of counsel for the respondent, made in the following words, appears to me to be well founded:

Under the Statute, no one has a pre-existing right to obtain a permit, and the permit being granted under the condition that it may be cancelled at any time, and no cause of cancellation being mentioned and no form of procedure being indicated, the cancellation is a discretionary decision of a purely administrative character.

I accept as an accurate statement of the distinction between a judicial and an administrative tribunal that adopted by Masten J.A. in giving the judgment of the Court of Appeal for Ontario in re Ashby et al [[1934] O.R. 421 at 428, 3 D.L.R. 565, 62 C.C.C. 132.]:

The distinction between a judicial tribunal and an administrative tribunal has been well pointed out by a learned writer in 49 Law Quarterly Review at pp. 106, 107 and 108:

"A tribunal that dispenses justice, i.e. every judicial tribunal, is concerned with legal rights and liabilities, which means rights and liabilities conferred or imposed by 'law'; and 'law' means statute or long-settled principles. These legal rights and liabilities are treated by a judicial tribunal as pre-existing; such a tribunal professes merely to ascertain and give effect to them; it investigates the facts by hearing 'evidence' (as tested by long-settled rules), and it investigates the law by consulting precedents. Rights or liabilities so ascertained cannot, in theory, be refused recognition and enforcement, and no judicial tribunal claims the power of refusal.

In contrast, non-judicial tribunals of the type called 'administrative' have invariably based their decisions and orders, not on legal rights and liabilities, but on policy and expediency.

Leeds (Corp.) v. Ryder (1907) A.C. 420, at 423, 424, per Lord Loreburn L.C.; Shell Co. of Australia v. Federal Commissioner of Taxation (1931) A.C. 275, at 295; Boulter v. Kent JJ. (1897) A.C. 556, at 564.

A judicial tribunal looks for some law to guide it; an 'administrative' tribunal, within its province, is a law unto itself."

In re Ashby the Court found that the statute there under consideration set up certain fixed standards and prescribed conditions on which persons might have their certificates revoked by the board, and accordingly held its function to be quasi-judicial; in the case at bar, on the contrary, no standards or conditions are indicated and I am forced to conclude that the Legislature intended the commission "to be a law unto itself".

If I am right in the view that in cancelling the permit M. Archambault was performing an administrative act in the exercise of an unfettered discretion given to him by the statute it would seem to follow that he was not bound to give the appellant an opportunity to be heard before deciding to cancel and that the Court cannot be called upon to determine whether there existed sufficient grounds for his decision. If authority is needed for this conclusion it may be found in the judgment of the Judicial Committee, delivered by Lord Radcliffe, in Nakkuda Ali v. M.F. De S. Jayaratne [[1951] A.C. 66.] and in the reasons of my brother Martland on Calgary Power Limited et al v. Copithorne [[1959] S.C.R. 24, 16 D.L.R. (2d) 241.]. The wisdom and desirability of conferring such a power upon an official without specifying the ground upon which it is to be exercised are matters for the consideration of the Legislature not of the Court.

If, contrary to my conclusion, the function of the commission was quasi-judicial, it may well be that its decision to cancel the permit would be set aside by the Court for failure to observe the rules as to how such tribunals must proceed which are laid down in many authorities and are compendiously stated in the following passage in the judgment of the Earl of Selborne in Spackman v. Plumstead Board of Works [(1885), 10 App. Cas. 229 at 240.]:

No doubt, in the absence of special provisions as to how the person who is to decide is to proceed, the law will imply no more than that the substantial requirements of justice shall not be violated. He is not a judge in the proper sense of the word; but he must give the parties an opportunity of being heard before him and stating their case and their view. He must give notice when he will proceed with the matter, and he must act honestly and impartially and not under the dictation of some other person or persons to whom the authority is not given by law. There must be no malversation of any kind. There would be no decision within the meaning of the Statute if there were anything of that sort done contrary to the essence of justice.

But even if it were assumed that the function of the commission was quasi-judicial and that its order cancelling the permit should be set aside for failure to observe the rules summarized in the passage quoted, I would be far from satisfied that any action for damages would lie.

If that question arose for decision it would be necessary to consider the judgments delivered in this Court in McGillivray v. Kimber [(1915), 52 S.C.R. 146, 26 D.L.R. 164.], the cases cited in Halsbury, 2nd ed., vol. 26, pp. 284 and 285, in support of the following statement:

Persons exercising such quasi-judicial powers ... in the absence of fraud, collusion, or malice, are not liable to any civil action at the suit of any person aggrieved by their decisions...

and the judgment of Wilmot C.J., concurred in by Gould J. and Blackstone J., in Bassett v. Godschall [(1770), 3 Wils. 121 at 123, 95 E.R. 967.]:

The legislature hath intrusted the justices of peace with a discretionary power to grant or refuse licences for keeping inns and alehouses; if they abuse that power, or misbehave themselves in the execution of their office or authority, they are answerable criminally, by way of information, in B.R. I cannot think a justice of peace is answerable in an action to every individual who asks him for a licence to keep an inn or an alehouse, and he refuses to grant one; if he were so, there would be an end of the commission of the peace, for no man would act therein. Indeed he is answerable to the public if he misbehaves himself, and wilfully, knowingly and maliciously injures or oppresses the King's subjects, under colour of his office, and contrary to law: but he cannot be answerable to every individual, touching the matter in question, in an action. Every plaintiff in an action must have an antecedent right to bring it; the plaintiff here has no right to have a licence, unless the justices think proper to grant it, therefore he can have no right of action against the justices for refusing it.

For the above reasons I have reached the conclusion that the heavy financial loss undoubtedly suffered by the appellant was damnum sine injuria. The whole loss flowed directly from the cancellation of the permit which was an act of the commission authorized by law. I have formed this opinion entirely apart from any special statutory protection afforded to the commission or to its manager, M. Archambault, as, for example, by s. 12 of the Act.

The case of James v. Cowan [[1932] A.C. 542.] relied upon by counsel for the appellant as supporting the existence of a right of action for damages seems to me to be clearly distinguishable. In that case the right of action asserted was for damages for the wrongful taking of the plaintiff's goods. The only justification put forward was an order held to be ultra vires and therefore void. It may be mentioned in passing that if, contrary to my view, the decision of the commission in the case at bar was made in the exercise of a judicial function, its failure to follow a rule of natural justice would appear to render the order voidable but not void; Dimes v. Grand Junction Canal Proprietors [(1852), 3 H.L. Cas. 759, 10 E.R. 301.].

Having concluded that the act of the commission in cancelling the permit was not an actionable wrong, it appears to me to follow that the respondent cannot be answerable in damages for directing or approving, as the case may be, the doing of that act.

As it was put by Bissonnette J. [[1956] Que. Q.B. 447 at 457]:

D'où il découle, en saine logique, que si dans l'exercice de son pouvoir discrétionnaire, il (M. Archambault) ne commettait ni faute, ni illégalité, personne n'est justifié à chercher à atteindre, au delà de sa personne, un conseiller, voire un chef ou supérieur politique, pour le motif que sans la faute du premier, celle qu'on veut imputer au second ne peut exister.

On this branch of the matter, I should perhaps mention that there is, in the record, no room for any suggestion that the respondent coerced an unwilling Commission into making a decision contrary to the view of the latter as to what that decision should be.

For the above reasons it is my opinion that the appeal fails and it becomes unnecessary for me to consider the alternative defence as to lack of notice of action, based upon art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure or the question of the quantum of damages.

The appeal, as to both of the judgments of the Court of Queen's Bench, should be dismissed with costs.

FAUTEUX J. (dissenting)

FAUTEUX J. (dissenting):-- L'appelant se pourvoit à l'encontre de deux décisions majoritaires de la Cour du banc de la reine [[1956] Que. Q.B. 447.], dont la première infirme un jugement de la Cour supérieure condamnant l'intimé à lui payer une somme de $8,123.53 à titre de dommages-intérêts, et dont la seconde rejette l'appel logé par lui-même pour faire augmenter le quantum des dommages ainsi accordés.

Les faits donnant lieu à ce litige se situent dans le cadre des activités poursuivies dans la province de Québec, au cours particulièrement des années 1944, 1945 et 1946, par la secte des Témoins de Jéhovah. Ces activités prenaient forme d'assemblées, de distribution de circulaires, de pamphlets et de livres, et de sollicitation, dans les rues et à domicile. Dirigée ouvertement contre les pratiques des religions professées dans la province et, plus particulièrement, de la religion catholique, les enseignements de cette secte étaient diffusés dans un langage manifestement, sinon délibérément, insultant et, par suite, provoquèrent dans les cités et les villages où ils étaient propagés, des troubles à la paix publique. Il y eut bris d'assemblées, assauts de personnes et dommages à la propriété. De plus, et partageant l'opinion généralement acceptée que cette campagne provocatrice était l'oeuvre de la licence et non de la liberté sous la loi, plusieurs autorités civiles refusaient d'accorder la protection recherchée par les membres de la secte ou adoptaient des moyens pour paralyser ces activités considérées comme une menace à la paix publique. L'intimé, comme Procureur Général, eut en son ministère où des plaintes nombreuses affluèrent, tous les échos de cette situation. Devant les tribunaux, actions ou poursuites se multiplièrent. A Montréal, les arrestations pour distribution de littérature, sans permis, atteignirent et dépassèrent plusieurs centaines. Devant la Cour du Recorder, où furent traduits ceux qu'on accusait de violer le règlement municipal, on plaidait l'invalidité ou l'inapplication du règlement et attendant le prononcé d'un tribunal supérieur sur le bien-fondé de ces prétentions on ajournait les causes. C'était l'appelant, l'un des membres de la secte, qui, dans la plupart de ces arrestations, à Montréal, fournissait le cautionnement garantissant la comparution des accusés. Une entente était même intervenue entre lui et les avocats chargés des poursuites, suivant laquelle on le considérait en quelque sorte comme la caution officielle des membres de la secte. L'appelant continua d'agir comme caution jusqu'au 12 novembre 1946 alors que les autorités de la Cour du Recorder, s'inquiétant de la congestion du rôle des causes résultant de la progressive multiplication des arrestations, aussi bien que du fait que le temps de nombre de constables était absorbé par ces enquêtes et ces poursuites, au préjudice de leurs autres devoirs, tentèrent de décourager les activités de la secte en exigeant des cautionnements en argent et plus substantiels, soit de $100 à $300.

Deux semaines après cette décision, apparut dans la province une nouvelle publication de la secte, intitulée: "La haine ardente du Québec pour Dieu, le Christ et la liberté." Ce livre, publié en français, en anglais et en ukrainien, étant, dans les termes les plus provocateurs, une attaque dirigée particulièrement contre les pratiques religieuses de la majorité de la population et contre l'administration de la justice dans la province, fut soumis par la police à la considération de l'avocat en chef de la Couronne, à Montréal, Me Gagnon, c.r., lequel émit l'opinion que cette publication constituait, au sens de la loi criminelle, un libelle séditieux.

Ajoutons immédiatement que le mérite de cette opinion fut par la suite judiciairement considéré avec le résultat qui suit. Un certain Aimé Boucher, distributeur de ce livre dans le district judiciaire de St-Joseph de Beauce, fut accusé sous les articles 133, 134 et 318 du Code Criminel et fut trouvé coupable par un jury dont le verdict fut confirmé par une décision majoritaire de la Cour du banc du roi en appel [[1949] Que. K.B. 238.]. Sur un pourvoi subséquent devant cinq des membres de cette Cour, une majorité, trouvant justifiés les griefs fondés sur l'adresse du juge au procès, mais étant d'opinion qu'il était loisible à un jury légalement dirigé de juger cette publication séditieuse, ordonna un nouveau procès. Sur une seconde audition du même appel, -- cette fois devant les neuf Juges de cette Cour [[1951] S.C.R. 265, 2 D.L.R. 369, 11 C.R. 85, 99 C.C.C. 1.] -- ces vues furent partagées par quatre des membres de cette Cour. Les cinq autres, d'autre part, acquittèrent l'accusé, en déclarant en substance suivant le sommaire fidèle du jugé, qu'en droit:

Neither language calculated to promote feelings of ill-will and hostility between different classes of His Majesty's subjects nor criticizing the courts is seditious unless there is the intention to incite to violence or resistance to or defiance of constituted authority.

En somme, la majorité écarta, comme étant la loi en la matière, la définition de l'intention séditeuse, donnée à la page 94 de la 8e édition de Stephen's Digest of Criminal Law, dans la mesure où cette définition différait de la loi telle que précisée au sommaire ci-dessus. Boucher v. His Majesty the King [[1951] S.C.R. 265, 2 D.L.R. 369, 11 C.R. 85, 99 C.C.C. 1.]. Ainsi appert-il que l'opinion émise par le représentant du Procureur Général à Montréal lors de l'apparition de ce livre en fin de 1946, fut par la suite partagée par une majorité de tous les juges qui eurent à considérer la question mais rejetée par ce qui constitue, depuis 1951, le jugement de cette Cour sur la question.

Ayant donc formé l'opinion que cette publication constituait un libelle séditeux, Me Gagnon participa à l'enquête faite pour en rechercher les distributeurs et les traduire en justice. Vers le même temps, la police saisissait en la cité de Sherbrooke, un nombre considérable de pamphlets, livres, y compris le livre en question dans un établissement appartenant à l'appelant et par lui loué aux membres de la secte. Un examen de la situation et du rôle joué par l'appelant dans les procédures mues devant la Cour du Recorder à Montréal, amena Me Gagnon à conclure à sa participation dans la distribution. Apprenant, en la même occasion, que ce dernier était propriétaire d'un restaurant et détenteur de permis de la Commission des Liqueurs pour y vendre des spiritueux, il communiqua les faits ci-dessus à M. Archambault, alors gérant général de la Commission des Liqueurs. Après avoir conféré avec le recorder en chef de la cité de Montréal et Me Gagnon, M. Archambault téléphona au Procureur Général pour lui faire part de ces agissements des membres de la secte, et de l'appelant en particulier, et de son intention d'annuler le permis en faveur de l'appelant. L'intimé demanda à M. Archambault de bien s'assurer que le détenteur du permis était bien la même personne qui, au dire de M. Archambault, "multipliait les cautionnements à la Cour du Recorder de façon désordonnée, contribuait à désorganiser les activités de la police et à congestionner les tribunaux". Et l'intimé ajouta: "Dans l'intervalle, je vais examiner les questions avec des officiers légaux, je vais y penser, je vais réfléchir et je vais voir à ce que je devrai faire." M. Archambault vérifia l'identité de l'appelant et, de son côté, le Procureur Général étudia le problème, la Loi de la Commission des Liqueurs et ses amendements, discuta de la question au Conseil des Ministres et avec des officiers en loi de son ministère. Quelques jours plus tard, M. Archambault téléphona au Procureur Général confirmant l'identité du détenteur de permis et, témoigne M. Archambault, "là, le Premier Ministre m'a autorisé, il m'a donné son consentement, son approbation, sa permission et son ordre de procéder".

A la suite de cette conversation téléphonique, le permis fut annulé et tous les spiritueux du restaurant furent confisqués. En raison de la perte d'opérations résultant de l'absence de permis, l'appelant, quelques mois plus tard, vendait ce restaurant, licencié pour vente de spiritueux depuis nombre d'années et exploité par son père, d'abord, et lui, par la suite. C'est alors que l'appelant institua la présente action en dommages contre l'intimé personnellement invoquant en substance que, dans les circonstances, le fait de cette annulation constituait, suivant les dispositions de l'art. 1053 du Code Civil, un fait dommageable, illicite et imputable à l'intimé et, dès lors, donnant droit à réparation.

En défense, et en outre des moyens plaidés sur le mérite de l'action, l'intimé invoqua spécifiquement le défaut de l'appelant de s'être conformé aux prescriptions de l'art. 88 du Code de procédure civile, lequel conditionne impérativement l'exercice du droit d'action contre un officier public à la signification d'un avis d'au moins un mois avant l'émission de l'assignation.

Après considération attentive de la question et pour les motifs donnés ci-après, je suis arrivé à la conclusion que ce moyen est bien fondé. Il convient de dire, cependant, que n'eût été ce défaut de l'appelant, j'aurais, au mérite, conclu au bien-fondé de son action et ce, pour des raisons qu'il suffit, dans les circonstances, de résumer comme suit. Personne ne met en doute que le fait invoqué au soutien de l'action en dommages, c'est-à-dire l'annulation du permis, ait constitué un fait dommageable pour l'appelant. De plus, et suivant la preuve au dossier, il est manifeste que ce fait est imputable, et exclusivement imputable, à l'intimé. Sans doute, lorsque le gérant général de la Commission des Liqueurs téléphona au Procureur Général pour le mettre au courant des faits ci-dessus, il lui indiqua au même temps son intention d'annuler le permis. Il y a loin, cependant, de l'indication d'une intention à la réalisation de cette intention; et à la vérité, dès cette première conversation téléphonique, c'est le Procureur Général qui prit l'entière responsabilité. Tel que déjà indiqué, il demanda à M. Archambault de vérifier l'identité de personne, l'avisant que, pendant ce temps-là, il étudierait le problème et verrait ce que lui devait faire. C'est d'ailleurs précisément pour décider de l'action à prendre qu'il examina la loi et discuta de l'affaire au Conseil des Ministres et avec ses officiers en loi. Lorsque, subséquemment, M. Archambault le rappela pour lui affirmer qu'il s'agissait de la même personne, "c'est là", dit le gérant général, que le Procureur Général "m'a autorisé, il m'a donné son consentement, son approbation, sa permission et son ordre de procéder". Le Juge de la Cour supérieure et tous les Juges de la Cour d'Appel n'ont jeté, et je crois avec raison, aucun doute sur la bonne foi du Procureur Général, pas plus qu'on n'en saurait avoir sur celle du gérant général, de la Commission des Liqueurs. Ni l'un ni l'autre n'ont agi malicieusement. Mais, en témoignant que l'intimé l'avait autorisé, lui avait donné son consentement, son approbation, sa permission et son ordre de procéder, le gérant général de la Commission a bien indiqué, à mon avis, que, dans un esprit de subordination, il avait, dès la première conversation téléphonique, abdiqué, en faveur du Procureur Général s'en chargeant, le droit d'exercer la discrétion, qu'à l'exclusion de tous autres, il avait suivant l'esprit de la Loi des Liqueurs Alcooliques. Il a exécuté, mais non rendu, une décision arrêtée par le Procureur Général. D'ailleurs, ce dernier ne s'en est pas caché; il s'en est ouvert au public par la voix des journaux. En prenant lui-même cette décision, comme Premier Ministre et Procureur Général, il s'est arrogé un droit que lui nie virtuellement la Loi des Liqueurs Alcooliques; il a commis une illégalité. Dans l'espèce, l'annulation du permis est exclusivement imputable à l'intimé et précisément pour cette raison, constitue, dans les circonstances, un acte illicite donnant droit à l'appelant d'obtenir réparation pour les dommages lui en résultant.

L'article 88 du Code de procédure civile. -- Cet article se lit comme suit:

Nul officier public ou personne remplissant des fonctions ou devoirs publics ne peut être poursuivi pour dommages à raison d'un acte par lui fait dans l'exercice de ses fonctions, et nul verdict ou jugement ne peut être rendu contre lui, à moins qu'avis de cette poursuite ne lui ait été donné au moins un mois avant l'émission de l'assignation.

Cet avis doit être par écrit; il doit exposer les causes de l'action, contenir l'indication des noms et de l'étude du procureur du demandeur ou de son agent et être signifié au défendeur personnellement ou à son domicile.

Vu la forme prohibitive de la disposition et la règle de droit édictée en l'art. 14 du Code Civil, le défaut de donner cet avis, lorsqu'il y a lieu de ce faire, emporte nullité. Cette règle de droit est ainsi exprimée:

14. Les lois prohibitives emportent nullité, quoiqu'elle n'y soit pas prononcée.

De plus, et en raison de la prescription que "...nul verdict ou jugement ne peut être rendu...", ce défaut limite la juridiction même du tribunal. Aussi bien, non seulement, comme il a été reconnu au jugement de première instance, ce défaut peut-il être soulevé dans les plaidoiries, mais la Cour elle-même doit agir proprio motu et se conformer à la prescription.

En l'espèce, il est admis qu'aucun avis ne fut donné au Procureur Général. L'intimé a plaidé spécifiquement ce moyen dans sa défense et il l'a invoqué tant en Cour supérieure et en Cour d'Appel que devant cette Cour. Le juge au procès en disposa dans les termes suivants, dont les soulignés sont siens:

Defendant is not entitled to avail himself of this exceptional provision as the acts complained of were not "done by him in the exercise of his functions", but they were acts performed by him when he had gone outside his functions to perform them. They were not acts "in the exercise of" but "on the occasion of public duties". Defendant was outside his functions in the acts complained of.

En Cour d'Appel [[1956] Que. Q.B. 447], seul le Juge dissident, M. le Juge Rinfret, se prononce sur la question. S'inspirant, je crois, de l'interprétation donnée par la jurisprudence à l'expression "dans l'exécution de ses fonctions", apparaissant à l'art. 1054 C.C. et plus particulièrement du critère indiqué dans Plumb v. Cobden Flour Mills [[1914] A.C. 62.], il prononce d'abord comme suit, sur le mérite même de l'action:

L'action du défendeur, on l'a vu, ne peut pas être classifiée parmi les actes permis, par les statuts, au procureur général, ni au premier ministre; elle ne peut pas être considérée comme ayant été faite dans l'exercice ou dans l'exécution de ses fonctions comme telles; elle entre dans la catégorie des actes prohibés, des actes commis hors les limites des fonctions, et comme telle, elle engendre la responsabilité personnelle.

puis, précisant que l'art. 88 C.P.C. pose comme condition que le défendeur soit poursuivi "à raison d'un acte par lui fait dans l'exercice de ses fonctions", déclare que l'art. 88 n'a pas d'application en l'espèce.

Les juges de la majorité ont référé à ce moyen sans cependant s'y arrêter vu que dans leur opinion l'action, de toutes façons était mal fondée.

D'où l'on voit que le droit de l'intimé à l'avis dépend uniquement, dans la présente cause, de la question de savoir si l'acte reproché a été fait par lui "dans l'exercice de ses fonctions" au sens qu'il faut donner à ces expressions dans le contexte de l'art. 88 C.P.C., et suivant l'esprit et la fin véritables de cet article.

L'article 1054 C.C. prescrit que les maîtres et les commettants sont responsables du dommage causé par leurs domestiques ou ouvriers dans l'exécution des fonctions auxquelles ces derniers sont employés. On est dès lors porté à donner aux expressions, plus ou moins identiques, apparaissant à l'art. 88 C.P.C., le même sens que donne la jurisprudence sur l'art. 1054 C.C. La règle d'interprétation visant la similarité des expressions n'établit qu'une présomption; cette présomption étant que les expressions similaires ont le même sens lorsqu'elles se trouvent, -- ce qui n'est pas le cas en l'espèce, -- dans une même loi. On accorde, d'ailleurs, peu de poids à cette présomption. Maxwell, On Interpretation of Statutes, 9e ed., p. 322 et seq. Les considérations présidant à l'établissement, la fin et la portée de l'art 88 C.P.C., d'un part, et de l'art. 1054 C.C., d'autre part, sont totalement différents. Sanctionnant la doctrine Respondeat superior, l'art 1054 c.c., établit la responsabilité du commettant pour l'acte de son préposé, ce dernier étant considéré le continuateur de la personne juridique du premier. L'intimé, agissant en sa qualité de Procureur Général, n'est le préposé de personne. Il n'a pas de commettant. La fonction qu'il exerce, il la tient de la loi. L'article 88 C.P.C. n'affecte en rien la question de responsabilité. Il accorde, en ce qui concerne la procédure seulement, un traitement spécial au bénéfice des officiers publics en raison de la nature même de la fonction. Les motifs apportés par la jurisprudence pour limiter le champ de l'exercice des fonctions, quant à la responsabilité édictée en l'art. 1054 C.C., sont étrangers à ceux conduisant la Législature à donner, quant à la procédure seulement, une protection aux officiers publics. Aussi bien, et en toute déférence, je ne crois pas que la portée de cette protection soit assujettie aux limitations de la responsabilité frappant les dispositions de l'art. 1054 C.C. L'article 8 du c. 101 des Statuts Refondus du Bas Canada, loi-source de l'art. 88 C.P.C., établit péremptoirement à mon avis que, in pari materia, un officier public n'est pas tenu comme ayant cessé d'agir dans l'exercice de ses fonctions du seul fait que l'acte reproché constitue un excès de pouvoir, ou de juridiction, ou une violation à la loi. La version française de cette loi n'étant pas en disponibilité, je cite de la version anglaise qu'on trouve dans Consolidated Statutes, Lower Canada, 1860, l'art. 8:

Protection to extend to the magistrate only etc., and in what cases to him.

8. The privileges and protection given by this Act, shall be given to such justice, officer of other person acting as aforesaid, only, and to no other person or persons whatever, and any such justice, officer and other person shall be entitled to such protection and privileges in all cases where he has acted bona fide in the execution of his duty, although in such act done, he has exceeded his powers or jurisdiction, and has acted clearly contrary to law.

L'article 88 C.P.C. assume que ceux au bénéfice desquels il est établi se sont rendus coupables d'une illégalité pour laquelle ils doivent répondre. Tout doute qu'on pourrait avoir sur le point est dissipé par le texte même de l'art. 429 C.P.C. lequel, pourvoyant à un changement de venue dans le cas du procès d'un officier public, édicte:

429. Dans toute poursuite en dommages contre un officier public, à raison de quelque illégalité dans l'exécution de ses fonctions, le juge peut ordonner que le procès ait lieu dans un autre district, s'il est démontré que la cause ne peut être instruite avec impartialité dans le district où l'action a été portée.

On doit donc se garder d'associer au droit à l'avis toute idée de justification pour l'acte reproché ou de déduire du seul fait que l'officier public doive au mérite d'être tenu personnellement responsable, qu'il ait perdu tout droit à l'avis. Dans Beattley v. Kozak [[1958] S.C.R. 177 at 188, 13 D.L.R. (2d) 1, 120 C.C.C. 1.], où la nécessité d'éviter cette confusion se présentait, une semblable observation est faite par notre collègue M. le Juge Rand. Il faut ajouter, cependant, que cette décision n'est d'aucune autre assistance sur la question qui nous intéresse; le litige portait, en droit, sur l'interprétation d'une loi différente et fut décidé en donnant effet à la jurisprudence d'un droit également différent sur l'incidence, en la matière, du rôle de la bonne foi.

L'incidence du rôle de la bonne foi de l'officier public dans la commission d'un acte reproché, en ce qui concerne la portée de l'art. 88 C.P.C., et non en ce qui a trait au mérite de l'action, a fait, dans la province de Québec, depuis le jour où la disposition fut établie par l'art. 22 du Code de procédure civile de 1867, dont les termes sont reproduits à l'art. 88 du Code de 1897, l'objet d'un conflit dans la jurisprudence. Suivant certains jugements, la bonne foi conditionnait le droit à l'avis et dès que la déclaration contenait une allégation de mauvaise foi, le défendeur se voyait privé du droit d'invoquer le défaut de l'avis, même si, au mérite, la preuve, révélant que cette allégation était mal fondée, on devait alors rejeter l'action parce que l'avis n'avait pas été donné. Suivant d'autres jugements, on tenait le droit à l'avis absolu dans tous les cas. La bonne foi, disait-on, en s'appuyant sur le principe sanctionné par l'art. 2202 C.C., est toujours présumée et cette présomption ne peut être écartée par une simple allégation mais par une preuve de mauvaise foi. On jugeait qu'une simple allégation aux plaidoiries ne pouvait virtuellement abroger le droit au bénéfice de l'art. 88. Considérant que cet article conditionnait l'exercice même du droit d'action, on décidait que ce droit d'action devait être nié ab initio et non à la fin du procès. Ce conflit n'existe plus. Depuis plus de vingt-cinq ans, la Cour d'Appel y a mis fin en décidant que l'incidence de la bonne ou de la mauvaise foi n'a aucune portée sur le droit à l'avis et que, dans tous les cas, il doit être donné. Acceptant les arguments déjà exprimés en ce sens, la Cour d'Appel s'est particulièrement basée sur la source historique de cette disposition et sur la modification qui y fut apportée lors et par suite de son insertion au Code de procédure civile. Les sources de l'article sont indiquées dans Dame Chaput v. Crépeau [(1917), 57 Que. S.C. 443.] par M. le Juge Bruneau et les modifications faites à la situation antérieure par l'insertion de l'article dans le Code, afin d'en généraliser l'application à tous les officiers publics, sont indiquées dans cette jurisprudence définitivement arrêtée par la Cour d'Appel dans Charland v. Kay [(1933), 50 Que. K.B. 377.]; Corporation de la Paroisse de St-David-de-l'Auberivière v. Paquette et autres [(1937), 62 Que. K.B. 143.] et Houde v. Benoît [[1943] Que. K.B. 713.].

En somme, et comme le note M. le Juge Hall dans Corporation de la Paroisse de St-David-de-l'Auberivière v. Paquette et autres, supra, l'art. 22 du Code de procédure de 1867, prédécesseur de l'art. 88 du Code de 1897, a sa source dans la Loi pour la protection des juges de paix, c. 101 des Statuts Refondus du Bas Canada. Le premier article de cette loi prescrivait l'avis d'action, alors que dans les autres dispositions, d'autres privilèges étaient établis, y compris celui fixant la prescription à six mois. L'article 8 conditionnait le droit aux privilèges y accordés à la bonne foi. Lors de la confection du Code de procédure, la disposition ayant trait à l'avis fut extraite de la loi pour devenir l'art. 22 du Code de procédure et être déclarée applicable à tous les officiers publics. Dans le procédé, cependant, on laissa la disposition touchant la bonne foi dans la Loi pour la protection des juges de paix et on évita de l'inclure dans l'art. 22 C.P.C. comme condition de l'opération de cet article. D'autres considérations, tel, par exemple, le changement apporté par la Législature, le 4 août 1929, à l'art. 195 C.P.C. par la Loi 19 George V, c. 81, ayant pour effet de prohiber toute ordonnance de preuve avant faire droit qui jusqu'alors réservait au mérite les questions soulevées par l'inscription en droit, militent en faveur de ces vues. C'est ce changement, je crois, qui a provoqué l'occasion amenant la Cour d'Appel à fixer définitivement la jurisprudence. Les motifs déjà mentionnés suffisent pour partager les vues exprimées par la Cour d'Appel dans les causes précitées et pour conclure, comme M. le Juge Dorion dans Charland v. Kay, supra, qu'il faut s'en tenir au texte de la loi et lui donner son effet.

En assumant l'exercice d'un pouvoir discrétionnaire conféré au gérant général par la loi, l'intimé a commis une illégalité mais aucune offense connue de la loi pénale et aucun délit au sens de l'art. 1053 C.C. Il a fait ce qu'il n'avait pas le droit de faire, fermement et sincèrement convaincu, a-t-il affirmé sous serment, que non seulement il en avait le droit, mais qu'il y était tenu pour s'acquitter de ses responsabilités comme Procureur Général chargé de l'administration de la justice, du maintien de l'ordre et de la paix dans la province et de ses devoirs comme conseiller juridique du gouvernement de la province. Il n'a pas pris occasion de sa fonction pour commettre cette illégalité. Il ne l'a pas commise à l'occasion de l'exercice de ses fonctions. Il l'a commise à cause de ses fonctions. Sa bonne foi n'a pas été mise en doute, et sur ce fait, les Juges de la Cour d'Appel, qui ont considéré la question, sont d'accord avec le Juge de première instance. Suivant les décisions considérées par cette Cour dans Beatty v. Kozak, supra, on retient, sous un droit différent de celui de la province de Québec, l'incidence de la bonne foi lorsque celle-ci se fonde sur l'erreur de fait, ou sur l'erreur de fait et de droit à la fois, sinon uniquement sur l'erreur de droit, pour décider du caractère exculpatoire de l'illégalité commise, voir même du droit à l'avis. Exclusivement compétente à légiférer sur la procédure civile, la Législature de Québec par l'art. 88 C.P.C., n'a pas voulu assujettir le droit à l'avis d'action à l'incidence de la bonne ou de la mauvaise foi. Dans les circonstances de cette cause, je suis d'opinion que l'illégalité commise par l'intimé l'a été dans l'exercice de ses fonctions et que, de plus, ce serait faire indirectement ce que l'art. 88 C.P.C., ne permet pas, suivant l'interprétation de la Cour d'Appel, que de s'appuyer sur la bonne ou la mauvaise foi, que ce soit au sens vulgaire ou technique du mot, pour conclure que l'intimé est sorti de l'exercice de ses fonctions, au sens qu'ont ces expressions dans l'art. 88 C.P.C., et qu'il ait perdu le droit à l'avis d'action.

Pour ces raisons, l'appelant aurait dû être débouté de son action. Je renverrais les appels avec dépens.

ABBOTT J.

ABBOTT J.:-- In his action appellant claimed from respondent the sum of $118,741 as damages alleged to have been sustained as a result of the cancellation of a licence or permit for the sale of alcoholic liquors held by appellant. The action was maintained by the learned trial judge to the extent of $8,123.53. From that judgment two appeals were taken, one by respondent asking that the action be dismissed in its entirety, the other by appellant asking that the amount allowed as damages be increased by an amount of $90,000. The Court of Queen's Bench [[1956] Que. Q.B. 447.] allowed the respondent's appeal, Rinfret J. dissenting, and dismissed the action. The appeal taken by appellant to increase the amount of the trial judgment was dismissed unanimously. The present appeals are from those two judgments.

The facts are these. On December 4, 1946, appellant was conducting a restaurant business in the City of Montreal, a business which he and his father and mother before him had been carrying on continuously for some thirty-four years prior to that date. The restaurant had been licensed for the sale of alcoholic beverages throughout the entire period.

In 1946 and for many years prior thereto, persons operating establishments of this kind and selling alcoholic beverages had been required to obtain a licence or permit under the Alcoholic Liquor Act, R.S.Q. 1941, c. 255. Unless granted for a shorter period, these were annual licences and expired on April 30 in each year. Moreover, s. 35, subs. 1., of the Act provides as follows:

The Commission may cancel any permit at its discretion.

The Commission referred to is the "Quebec Liquor Commission" established as a corporation under the Act in question and, generally speaking, it has been entrusted by the Legislature with the responsibility of directing and administering the provincial monopoly of the sale and distribution of alcoholic beverages.

On December 4, 1946, without previous notice to the appellant, his licence to sell alcoholic beverages was cancelled by the Quebec Liquor Commission, and at about 2 p.m. on that date the stock of liquor on his premises was seized and removed. The licence was not restored and after operating for some months without such a licence, in 1947 appellant sold the restaurant and the building in which it was located.

Appellant learned from press reports either in the afternoon of December 4 or early the following day, that his licence had been cancelled and the stock of liquor seized because he was an adherent of a religious sect or group known as the Witnesses of Jehovah. It soon became clear from statements made by the respondent to the press and confirmed by him at the trial as having been made by him, that the cancellation of the licence had been made because of the appellant's association with the sect in question and in order to prevent him from continuing to furnish bail for members of that sect summoned before the Recorder's Court on charges of contravening certain city by-laws respecting the distribution of printed material.

It might be added here that in December 1946 and for some time prior thereto the Witnesses of Jehovah appear to have been carrying on in the Montreal district and elsewhere in the Province of Quebec, an active campaign of meetings and the distribution of printed pamphlets and other like material of an offensive character to a great many people of most religious beliefs, and I have no doubt that at that time many people believed this material to be seditious.

The evidence is referred to in detail in the Courts below and I do not propose to do so here. I am satisfied from a consideration of this evidence: First: that the cancellation of the appellant's licence was made for the sole reason which I have mentioned and with the object and purpose to which I have referred; Second: that such cancellation was made with the express authorization and upon the order of the respondent; Third: that the determining cause of the cancellation was that order, and that the manager of the Quebec Liquor Commission would not have cancelled the licence without the order and authorization given by the respondent.

There can be no question as to the first point. It was conceded by respondent in his evidence at the trial and by his counsel at the hearing before us. As to the second and third points, I share the view of the learned trial judge and of Rinfret J. that both were clearly established.

The religious beliefs of the appellant and the fact that he acted as bondsman for members of the sect in question had no connection whatever with his obligations as the holder of a licence to sell alcoholic liquors. The cancellation of his licence upon this ground alone therefore was without any legal justification. Moreover, the religious beliefs of the appellant and his perfectly legal activities as a bondsman had nothing to do with the object and purposes of the Alcoholic Liquor Act, and the powers and responsibilities of the manager of the Quebec Liquor Commission are confined to the administration and enforcement of the provisions of the said Act. This may be one explanation of the latter's decision to consult the respondent before taking the action which he did to cancel appellant's licence.

At all events a careful reading of the evidence and a consideration of the surrounding circumstances has convinced me that without having received the authorization, direction, order, or "approbation énergique" of the respondent -- however one chooses to describe it -- the manager of the Quebec Liquor Commission would not have cancelled the licence.

The proposition that in Canada a member of the executive branch of government does not make the law but merely carries it out or administers it requires no citation of authority to support it. Similarly, I do not find it necessary to cite from the wealth of authority supporting the principle that a public officer is responsible for acts done by him without legal justification. I content myself with quoting the well known passage from Dicey's "Law of the Constitution", 9th ed., p. 193, where he says

... every official, from the Prime Minister down to a constable or a collector of taxes, is under the same responsibility for every act done without legal justification as any other citizen. The Reports abound with cases in which officials have been brought before the courts, and made, in their personal capacity, liable to punishment, or to the payment of damages, for acts done in their official character but in excess of their lawful authority. A colonial governor, a secretary of state, a military officer, and all subordinates, though carrying out the commands of their official superiors, are as responsible for any act which the law does not authorize as is any private and unofficial person.

In the instant case, the respondent was given no statutory power to interfere in the administration or direction of the Quebec Liquor Commission although as Attorney-General of the Province the Commission and its officers could of course consult him for legal opinions and legal advice. The Commission is not a department of government in the accepted sense of that term. Under the Alcoholic Liquor Act the Commission is an independent body with corporate status and with the powers and responsibilities conferred upon it by the Legislature. The Attorney-General is given no power under the said Act to intervene in the administration of the affairs of the Commission nor does the Attorney-General's Department Act, R.S.Q. 1941, c. 46, confer any such authority upon him.

I have no doubt that in taking the action which he did, the respondent was convinced that he was acting in what he conceived to be the best interests of the people of his province but this, of course, has no relevance to the issue of his responsibility in damages for any acts done in excess of his legal authority. I have no doubt also that respondent knew and was bound to know as Attorney-General that neither as Premier of the province nor as Attorney-General was he authorized in law to interfere with the administration of the Quebec Liquor Commission or to give an order or an authorization to any officer of that body to exercise a discretionary authority entrusted to such officer by the statute.

It follows, therefore, that in purporting to authorize and instruct the manager of the Quebec Liquor Commission to cancel appellant's licence, the respondent was acting without any legal authority whatsoever. Moreover, as I have said, I think respondent was bound to know that he was acting without such authority.

The respondent is therefore liable under art. 1053 of the Civil Code for the damages sustained by the appellant, by reason of the acts done by respondent in excess of his legal authority.

Respondent also contended that appellant's action must fail because no notice of such action was given under art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows:

Roncarelli v. Duplessis, [1959] S.C.R. 121

88. No public officer or other person fulfilling any public function or duty can be sued for damages by reason of any act done by him in the exercise of his functions, nor can any verdict or judgment be rendered against him, unless notice of such action had been given him at least one month before the issue of the writ of summons.

Such notice must be in writing; it must state the grounds of the action, and name of the plaintiff's attorney or agent, and indicate his office; and must be served upon him personally or at his domicile.

None of the learned judges constituting the majority in the Court of Queen's Bench has given as a reason for dismissing appellant's action, the failure to give such notice. The learned trial judge and Rinfret J. held that respondent is not entitled to avail himself of this exceptional provision since the act complained of was not "done by him in the exercise of his functions" but was an act done by him when he had gone outside his functions to perform it. I am in agreement with their views and there is little I need add to what they have said on this point. In this connection, however, reference may usefully be made to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Lachance v. Casault [(1902), 12 Que. K.B. 179 at 202.]. In that case a bailiff had attempted to take possession of books and papers in the hands of a judicial guardian without preparing a procès-verbal of the articles seized, as called for by the order of the Court requiring the guardian to give up possession to the seizing creditor. When the bailiff's action was resisted by the guardian as being unauthorized, the bailiff caused the guardian to be arrested. The charge having been subsequently dismissed, the bailiff was sued in damages for false arrest and malicious prosecution. It was held that, even assuming such bailiff was a public officer within the meaning of art. 88 C.C.P., he was not entitled to notice under the said article since at the time the act complained of was committed, he was not "dans l'exercice légal de ses fonctions".

In my opinion before a public officer can be held to be acting "in the exercise of his functions", within the meaning of art. 88 C.C.P., it must be established that at the time he performed the act complained of such public officer had reasonable ground for believing that such act was within his legal authority to perform; Asselin v. Davidson [(1914), 23 Que. K.B. 274 at 280.]. In the instant case, as I have said, in my view the respondent was bound to know that the act complained of was beyond his legal authority.

I now deal with the second appeal asking that the amount awarded to appellant by the trial judge be increased by an amount of $90,000. This amount is claimed under three heads, namely:

Damages to goodwill and reputation of business	$50,000
Loss of property rights in liquor permit	$15,000
Loss of profits for a period of one year, May 1st, 1947 to May 1st, 1948	$25,000

The licence to sell alcoholic beverages was, of course, only an annual licence subject to revocation at any time and the renewal of which might have been properly refused for a variety of reasons. Nevertheless, in my view, appellant could reasonably expect that so long as he continued to observe the provisions of the Alcoholic Liquor Act his licence would be renewed from year to year, as in fact it had been for many years past.

There can be no doubt that cancellation of appellant's licence without legal justification resulted in a substantial reduction in the value of the goodwill and profit making possibilities of the restaurant business carried on by him at 1429 Crescent St., Montreal, and in a pecuniary loss to him for which in my opinion he is entitled to recover damages from respondent.

The restaurant business is probably no less hazardous than most other businesses, and damages of this sort are obviously difficult to assess, the amount being of necessity a more or less arbitrary one. The learned trial judge awarded appellant the sum of $6,000 as loss of profits for the period from December 4, 1946, to May 1, 1947, the date on which the licence would have expired, and this would appear to be supported by the evidence. I have reached the conclusion that the amount awarded to the appellant by the learned trial judge should be increased by an amount of $25,000, as damages for diminution in the value of the goodwill of the business and for loss of future profits.

In the result, therefore, I would allow both appeals with costs here and below, and modify the judgment at the trial by increasing the amount of the damages to $33,123.53 with interest from the date of the judgment in the Superior Court.

Appeals allowed with costs, Taschereau, Cartwright and Fauteux J.J. dissenting.

Application for judicial review for declaratory relief, or alternatively mandamus compelling Citizenship and Immigration Canada to confirm his status as a permanent resident. In the further alternative, the applicant sought to compel the CIC to complete the processing of his humanitarian and compassionate application for permanent residence class within a defined timeframe. The applicant was an Indian citizen who has been married to a Canadian citizen for 14 years. They had two Canadian-born children. He arrived in Canada in 1994 and claimed refugee status, but his claim was rejected. His subsequent application for permanent residence on H & C grounds was received in Dec. 1995 and approved in principle in April 2006. While this application proceeded to stage two, the applicant decided to apply for a student visa in the summer of 1997. This application never progressed, due to the applicant's passport being confiscated by border officials and subsequently lost. By the time he obtained a new passport in Jan. 2003, the second processing stage resumed in the H & C application; however, the applicant's clearances had expired. However, the applicant's new passport and his 2004 medical examination expired by the time these documents were processed. On Aug. 31, 2005, CIC sent two letters requiring a valid passport and an updated medical exam. However, before the application was finalized, CIC received information that the applicant was the subject of drug trafficking charges in the U.S. and that his extradition was sought. The applicant's H & C file has been on hold since then. In April 2007, he was ordered to surrender to American authorities. The applicant argued the CIC's refusal to land him on Dec. 23, 1998 and Feb. 3, 2003 was unlawful, as he had met all the requirements on those dates. Alternatively, he sought mandamus compelling CIC to grant his application within 30 days, or compelling CIC to complete the processing of his application within 30 days. The respondents brought a motion pursuant to s. 87 of the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act.

HELD: Application granted with $2,000 in party and party costs.

The respondents' motion pursuant to s. 87 of the IRPA was granted. The only reason the applicant's landing was taken back on Dec. 23, 1998 was his inability to present a valid and subsisting passport. However, depending on the legal context, a person may be considered in possession of something if they held a legal right to assume immediate control over an object. Interpreting s. 14(1) of the Regulations to require physical control of the passport by the applicant would make no sense. The purpose of that subsection was to verify that an immigrant wishing to come to Canada was a citizen of another country and to ascertain the identity of the immigrant before landing him. It should have been sufficient to demonstrate he was the legal bearer of a valid passport. The respondents had a copy of his passport on the file showing it was valid until 2001. The applicant should not be made to suffer for the loss of his passport by officials of the respondents. The CIC erred in law in finding the applicant did not comply with the requirement in s. 14(1) of the prior Immigration Regulations. The applicant had met all the requirements for an order of mandamus. Prior to the charges being laid, he waited almost 10 years for his application to be processed, which amounted to unreasonable delay. The decision not to land the applicant on Dec. 23, 1998 was quashed, and the applicant's file was remitted to be processed in accordance with the law as it stood on that date and on the basis of the applicant's record at the time.

REASONS FOR ORDER AND ORDER

de MONTIGNY J.

1 de This is an application for judicial review whereby the Applicant seeks declaratory relief against the unwillingness of Citizenship and Immigration Canada ("CIC") to confirm his status as a permanent resident. In the alternative, the Applicant seeks a mandamus order compelling CIC to grant him permanent residence or, in the further alternative, compelling CIC to complete the processing of his humanitarian and compassionate ("H&C") application for permanent residence class within a defined timeframe. The Applicant also seeks his costs on a solicitor-client basis.

I. Facts

2 The Applicant is an Indian citizen who has been married for over 14 years to a Canadian citizen with whom he has two Canadian-born children. He first arrived in Canada on January 21, 1994 and claimed refugee status. After the rejection of his refugee claim, he applied for permanent residence in Canada on H & C grounds. This application was received by CIC on December 28, 1995, and approved in principle on April 12, 1996. His application then proceeded to stage two in order to determine whether he met the statutory requirements for landing.

3 In the summer of 1997, the Applicant decided to apply for a student visa. Since the process was shorter if he applied from outside of Canada, and because he could not enter the United States, he gave his application and his passport to a friend who was a Canadian citizen so that he could bring it to the Canadian visa office in Buffalo, New York. The visa officer serving his friend said the Canadian visa office in Buffalo could not process the application without the Applicant being present. His friend therefore returned to Canada with the application and the Applicant's passport. Upon entry into Canada, the friend was searched by a port of entry officer, who seized the Applicant's passport, telling him that he could not carry someone else's passport. The officer gave the Applicant's friend a receipt for the passport to be picked up by the Applicant.

4 Despite the Applicant's numerous attempts to obtain his passport, he never succeeded in doing so. The evidence in the record is not clear as to what happened to the Applicant's passport. It appears to have been lost between the port of entry office in Fort Erie and the Immigration office in Niagara Falls, although there is also an indication in the record that it may have been returned to someone believed to be the Applicant.

5 The Applicant was called in to pick up his landing documents on December 23, 1998. The officer apparently handed the Applicant his Record of Landing and welcomed him as a new Canadian permanent resident, and asked to see his passport. When the Applicant showed him a copy of his passport and explained that his original passport had been lost, he was told that a copy was not sufficient; as a result, the officer asked the Applicant to give him back his Record of Landing.

6 The Applicant immediately initiated an application to obtain a new passport from the Indian consulate. The passport not having been issued after several years, the Applicant inquired about the reason for the delay at the Indian consulate. He was told that the consulate could not process his application before CIC confirmed some technical information about his status in Canada. The Applicant finally obtained a new passport in January 2003, which he submitted to CIC in February 2003.

7 By the time the second processing stage resumed, however, the Applicant's medical, criminal and security clearances had expired. The Applicant therefore submitted updated medical and criminal examinations. In a somewhat Kafkaesque turn of events, however, the Applicant's new passport and his 2004 medical examination had expired at the time these documents were processed and CIC had finalized the security checks. Thus, CIC sent the Applicant two letters on August 31, 2005, requesting a valid passport and an updated medical examination.

8 Unfortunately for the Applicant, CIC received information from the Canadian Border Services Agency ("CBSA") in September 2005, before the Applicant's permanent residence application was finalized, indicating that the Applicant was the subject of criminal charges for drug trafficking in the United States and that his extradition was sought by the American authorities. On April 24, 2007, the Applicant was ordered to surrender to the American authorities to face prosecution. Although he had initially filed an application for judicial review of that decision, he surrendered to the American authorities on August 14, 2009.

9 The Applicant's file has been on hold ever since CIC learned of the criminal charges laid against him in the United States. CIC sent him a letter on May 25, 2009, requesting new and updated medical and police certificates, passport and American police certificate in order to resume the assessment of his application for permanent residence.

10 The Applicant now seeks a declaration from this Court declaring that CIC's refusal to land him on December 23, 1998 and on February 3, 2003 was unlawful because he had allegedly met all the requirements for landing on those dates and had therefore become a permanent resident.

11 In the alternative, the Applicant seeks an order of mandamus compelling CIC to grant the Applicant's application for permanent residence within thirty days of the Court's order.

12 In the further alternative, the Applicant seeks an order of mandamus compelling the Respondents to complete the processing of the Applicant's application for permanent residence within thirty days of the Court's order.

13 The application was originally directed only against the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. But in order to have a complete record before the Court, counsel for the Applicant brought a motion for an Order directing that the CBSA be added as a respondent. This motion was granted, on consent, on March 9, 2010, and both Respondents therefore filed a Certified Tribunal Record ("CTR"). Both Respondents also filed an application for non-disclosure pursuant to section 87 of the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act (2001, c. 27) ("IRPA"), thereby requesting that some information be blacked out from the record for national security reasons.

II. Issues

14 There are only two issues to be decided by this Court in the context of this application for judicial review. First, should an order for declaratory relief be issued by this Court to the effect that the Applicant met all the legal requirements for landing on December 23, 1998 and/or on June 28, 2002, and that the CIC acted illegally in refusing to land him as a permanent resident? Second, should the Court order the Respondents either to grant the Applicant's application for permanent residence, or to complete the processing of his application, within 30 days of this Court's order? These questions raise both jurisdictional and factual issues for which there are scant precedents. Moreover, the first question must be dealt with in the context of two different legal regimes, since prior to the coming into force of the IRPA and its Regulations, (Immigration and Refugee Protection Regulations, SOR/2002-227, hereafter "IRPR") on June 28, 2002, the Immigration Act (R.S.C., 1985, c. I-2) and the Immigration Regulations (SOR/78-172) ("Regulations") governed the Applicant's application for permanent residence.

15 Before addressing these issues, however, I shall deal briefly with the Respondents' motions for non-disclosure that were made pursuant to section 87 of the IRPA. After holding an ex parte and in camera hearing of that motion, and a further teleconference hearing with counsel for both parties, I granted the Respondents' motion on May 7, 2010 subject to my direction given at the in camera hearing that paragraph 4 of p. 2 of the supplementary record be unredacted except for two words. At the time, I gave only brief oral reasons for that decision, and indicated that I would provide fuller reasons as part of my decision on the merit of the judicial review application. Accordingly, the first part of my analysis will be devoted to this issue.

III. The legislative scheme

16 Pursuant to subsection 14(2) of the Immigration Act an officer shall grant landing to an immigrant, defined in section 2 of that Immigration Act as "a person seeking landing", when the officer is satisfied, following an examination, that it would not be contrary to the Act or Regulations to grant landing:

14. (2) Where an immigration officer is satisfied that it would not be contrary to this Act or the regulations to grant landing to an immigrant whom the officer has examined, the officer shall
 - (a) grant landing to that immigrant; or

Singh v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [2010] F.C.J. No. 921

- (b) authorize that immigrant to come into Canada on condition that the immigrant be present for further examination by an immigration officer within such time and at such place as the immigration officer who examined the immigrant may direct.

14. (2) L'agent d'immigration qui convainc, après l'interrogatoire d'un immigrant, que l'octroi du droit d'établissement ne contreviendrait pas, dans son cas, à la présente loi ni à ses règlements est tenu :
- a) soit de lui accorder ce droit ;
 - b) soit de l'autoriser à entrer au Canada à condition qu'il se présente, pour interrogatoire complémentaire, devant un agent d'immigration dans le délai et au lieu fixés.

17 Pursuant to subsection 14(1) of the Regulations, an immigrant must be in possession of a valid and subsisting passport or travel document issued to him or her by their country of origin:

14. (1) Subject to subsection (2), every immigrant shall be in possession of
- (a) a valid and subsisting passport issued to that immigrant by the country of which he is a citizen or national, other than a diplomatic, official or other similar passport;

14. (1) Sous réserve du paragraphe (2), tout immigrant doit avoir
- a) un passeport en cours de validité, autre qu'un passeport diplomatique, officiel ou autre passeport semblable, qui lui a été délivré par le pays dont il est citoyen ou ressortissant;

18 Since the coming into force of the IRPA and the IRPR on June 28, 2002, the following legislative provisions apply to the Applicant's application for permanent residence. First of all, a foreign national, which is defined in section 2 as "a person who is not a Canadian citizen or a permanent resident", becomes a permanent resident pursuant to subsection 21(1) of the IRPA if an officer is satisfied that the foreign national meets the requirements of the legislation:

21. (1) A foreign national becomes a permanent resident if an officer is satisfied that the foreign national has applied for that status, has met the obligations set out in paragraph 20(1)(a) and subsection 20(2) and is not inadmissible.

21. (1) Devient résident permanent l'étranger dont l'agent constate qu'il a demandé ce statut, s'est déchargé des obligations prévues à l'alinéa 20(1)a) et au paragraphe 20(2) et n'est pas interdit de territoire.

19 Pursuant to subsection 72(1) of the IRPR, a foreign national in Canada becomes a permanent resident if it is established through an examination that he or she meets the requirements of the legislation:

Obtaining status

72. (1) A foreign national in Canada becomes a permanent resident if, following an examination, it is established that
- (a) they have applied to remain in Canada as a permanent resident as a member of a class referred to in subsection (2);
 - (b) they are in Canada to establish permanent residence;
 - (c) they are a member of that class;
 - (d) they meet the selection criteria and other requirements applicable to that class;

Singh v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [2010] F.C.J. No. 921

- (e) except in the case of a foreign national who has submitted a document accepted under subsection 178(2) or of a member of the protected temporary residents class,
 - (i) they and their family members, whether accompanying or not, are not inadmissible,
 - (ii) they hold a document described in any of paragraphs 50(1)(a) to (h), and
 - (iii) they hold a medical certificate, based on the most recent medical examination to which they were required to submit under these Regulations within the previous 12 months, that indicates that their health condition is not likely to be a danger to public health or public safety and, unless subsection 38(2) of the Act applies, is not reasonably expected to cause excessive demand; and
- (f) in the case of a member of the protected temporary residents class, they are not inadmissible.

Obtention du statut

72. (1) L'étranger au Canada devient résident permanent si, à l'issue d'un contrôle, les éléments suivants sont établis :
- a) il en a fait la demande au titre d'une des catégories prévues au paragraphe (2);
 - b) il est au Canada pour s'y établir en permanence;
 - c) il fait partie de la catégorie au titre de laquelle il a fait la demande;
 - d) il satisfait aux critères de sélection et autres exigences applicables à cette catégorie;
 - e) sauf dans le cas de l'étranger ayant fourni un document qui a été accepté aux termes du paragraphe 178(2) ou de l'étranger qui fait partie de la catégorie des résidents temporaires protégés :
 - (i) ni lui ni les membres de sa famille -- qu'ils l'accompagnent ou non -- ne sont interdits de territoire,
 - (ii) il est titulaire de l'un des documents visés aux alinéas 50(1)a) à h),
 - (iii) il est titulaire d'un certificat médical attestant, sur le fondement de la plus récente visite médicale à laquelle il a été requis de se soumettre aux termes du présent règlement dans les douze mois qui précèdent, que son état de santé ne constitue vraisemblablement pas un danger pour la santé ou la sécurité publiques et, sauf si le paragraphe 38(2) de la Loi s'applique, ne risque pas d'entraîner un fardeau excessif;
 - f) dans le cas de l'étranger qui fait partie de la catégorie des résidents temporaires protégés, il n'est pas interdit de territoire.

20 In the case of a foreign national who, like the Applicant, has obtained an exemption under section 25 of the IRPA to apply for permanent residence from within Canada, section 68 of the IRPR provides that the foreign national becomes a permanent resident if it is established through an examination that he or she is not inadmissible and holds a passport or other document listed in section 50 of the IRPR:

Applicant in Canada

68. If an exemption from paragraphs 72(1)(a), (c) and (d) is granted under subsection 25(1) of the Act with respect to a foreign national in Canada who has made the applications referred to in section 66, the foreign national becomes a permanent resident if, following an examination, it is established that the foreign national meets the requirements set out in paragraphs 72(1)(b) and (e) and
- (a) in the case of a foreign national who intends to reside in the Province of Quebec and is not a member of the family class or a person whom the Board has determined to be a Convention refugee, the competent authority of that Province is of the opinion that the foreign national meets the selection criteria of the Province;

Singh v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [2010] F.C.J. No. 921

- (b) the foreign national is not otherwise inadmissible; and
- (c) the family members of the foreign national, whether accompanying or not, are not inadmissible.

Demandeur au Canada

68. Dans le cas où l'application des alinéas 72(1)a), c) et d) est levée en vertu du paragraphe 25(1) de la Loi à l'égard de l'étranger qui se trouve au Canada et qui a fait les demandes visées à l'article 66, celui-ci devient résident permanent si, à l'issue d'un contrôle, les éléments ci-après, ainsi que ceux prévus aux alinéas 72(1)b) et e), sont établis :

- a) dans le cas où l'étranger cherche à s'établir dans la province de Québec, n'appartient pas à la catégorie du regroupement familial et ne s'est pas vu reconnaître, par la Commission, la qualité de réfugié, les autorités compétentes de la province sont d'avis qu'il répond aux critères de sélection de celle-ci;
- b) il n'est pas par ailleurs interdit de territoire;
- c) les membres de sa famille, qu'ils l'accompagnent ou non, ne sont pas interdits de territoire.

21 Section 50 of the IRPR provides a list of acceptable documents of which a foreign national must be in possession to become a permanent resident:

Documents -- permanent residents

50. (1) In addition to the permanent resident visa required of a foreign national who is a member of a class referred to in subsection 70(2), a foreign national seeking to become a permanent resident must hold
- (a) a passport, other than a diplomatic, official or similar passport, that was issued by the country of which the foreign national is a citizen or national;
 - (b) a travel document that was issued by the country of which the foreign national is a citizen or national;
 - (c) an identity or travel document that was issued by a country to non-national residents, refugees or stateless persons who are unable to obtain a passport or other travel document from their country of citizenship or nationality or who have no country of citizenship or nationality;
 - (d) a travel document that was issued by the International Committee of the Red Cross in Geneva, Switzerland, to enable and facilitate emigration;
 - (e) a passport or travel document that was issued by the Palestinian Authority;
 - (f) an exit visa that was issued by the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to its citizens who were compelled to relinquish their Soviet nationality in order to emigrate from that country;
 - (g) a British National (Overseas) passport that was issued by the Government of the United Kingdom to persons born, naturalized or registered in Hong Kong; or
 - (h) a passport that was issued by the Government of Hong Kong Special Administrative Region of the People's Republic of China.

Documents : résidents permanents

50. (1) En plus du visa de résident permanent que doit détenir l'étranger membre d'une catégorie prévue au paragraphe 70(2), l'étranger qui entend devenir résident permanent doit détenir l'un des documents suivants :

- a) un passeport -- autre qu'un passeport diplomatique, officiel ou de même nature -- qui lui a été délivré par le pays dont il est citoyen ou ressortissant;

Singh v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [2010] F.C.J. No. 921

- b) un titre de voyage délivré par le pays dont il est citoyen ou ressortissant;
- c) un titre de voyage ou une pièce d'identité délivré par un pays aux résidents non-ressortissants, aux réfugiés au sens de la Convention ou aux apatrides qui sont dans l'impossibilité d'obtenir un passeport ou autre titre de voyage auprès de leur pays de citoyenneté ou de nationalité, ou qui n'ont pas de pays de citoyenneté ou de nationalité;
- d) un titre de voyage délivré par le Comité international de la Croix-Rouge à Genève (Suisse) pour permettre et faciliter l'émigration;
- e) un passeport ou un titre de voyage délivré par l'Autorité palestinienne;
- f) un visa de sortie délivré par le gouvernement de l'Union des républiques socialistes soviétiques à ses citoyens obligés de renoncer à leur nationalité afin d'émigrer de ce pays;
- g) un passeport intitulé "British National (Overseas) Passport", délivré par le gouvernement du Royaume-Uni aux personnes nées, naturalisées ou enregistrées à Hong Kong;
- h) un passeport délivré par les autorités de la zone administrative spéciale de Hong Kong de la République populaire de Chine.

22 Finally, it appears from section 13 of the IRPR that a passport or any other document may be produced only by producing the original document:

Production of documents

13. (1) Subject to subsection (2), a requirement of the Act or these Regulations to produce a document is met
- (a) by producing the original document;
 - (b) by producing a certified copy of the original document; or
 - (c) in the case of an application, if there is an application form on the Department's website, by completing and producing the form printed from the website or by completing and submitting the form on-line, if the website indicates that the form can be submitted on-line.

Exception

- (2) Unless these Regulations provide otherwise, a passport, a permanent resident visa, a permanent resident card, a temporary resident visa, a temporary resident permit, a work permit or a study permit may be produced only by producing the original document.

Production de documents

13. (1) Sous réserve du paragraphe (2), la production de tout document requis par la Loi ou le présent règlement s'effectue selon l'une des méthodes suivantes :
- a) la production de l'original;
 - b) la production d'un double certifié conforme;
 - c) dans le cas d'une demande qui peut être produite sur un formulaire reproduit à partir du site Web du ministère, la production du formulaire rempli, ou l'envoi de celui-ci directement sur le site Web du ministère s'il y est indiqué que le formulaire peut être rempli en ligne.

Exception

- (2) Sauf disposition contraire du présent règlement, les passeports, visas de résident permanent, cartes de résident permanent, visas de résident temporaire, permis de séjour temporaire, permis de travail et permis d'études ne peuvent être produits autrement que par présentation de l'original.

23 When determining whether the declaratory relief sought by the Applicant should be granted, the applicable legal regime will vary depending on the date upon which CIC's refusal to land the Applicant is being considered. To the extent that the date upon which the Applicant argues he should have been landed is that of December 23, 1998, the requirements to be applied are those found in the Immigration Act and the Regulations. If, on the other hand, the Court examines whether the Applicant should have been landed on February 3, 2003, it is the IRPA and the IRPR that must be applied.

24 No such issue as to the relevant legislation arises when considering the application for an order of mandamus. Section 190 of the IRPA indicates clearly that Parliament intended the new Act to apply retrospectively, as it specifically provides that the IRPA shall apply to all pending applications:

Application of this Act

190. Every application, proceeding or matter under the former Act that is pending or in progress immediately before the coming into force of this section shall be governed by this Act on that coming into force.

Application de la nouvelle loi

190. La présente loi s'applique, dès l'entrée en vigueur du présent article, aux demandes et procédures présentées ou instruites, ainsi qu'aux autres questions soulevées, dans le cadre de l'ancienne loi avant son entrée en vigueur et pour lesquelles aucune décision n'a été prise.

25 Consequently, if a mandamus order requiring the Respondents to complete the processing of the Applicant's application were to be granted, the application would have to be made in accordance with the new legislative scheme: Dragan v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2003 FCT 211, [2003] F.C.J. No. 260.

IV. Analysis

A. The Respondents' Motion for Non-Disclosure

26 Rule 17 of the Federal Courts Immigration and Refugee Protection Rules (SOR/93-22) ("Rules") requires the tribunal to include in the CTR "all papers relevant to the matter that are in the possession or control of the tribunal". Section 87 of IRPA allows for the non-disclosure of information if its disclosure would be injurious to national security or to the safety of any person.

27 In Mohammed v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2006 FC 1310, [2006] F.C.J. No. 1630, this Court held that "the decision as to whether something can be withheld or not should be made by the Court and not by the Respondent alone" (at para. 19). Similarly, in Mekonen v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2007 FC 1133, [2007] F.C.J. No. 1469, the Court held that "it is for the Court and not the tribunal to decide what information can be withheld from an applicant..." (at para. 10).

28 The combined effect of Rule 17 of the Rules and this Court's decisions in Mohammed, above, and Mekomen, above, is that a section 87 motion is required to be filed in all cases where information is redacted from the CTR for reasons of national security.

29 As provided for in paragraph 83(1)(c) of the IRPA, upon the request of the Minister, a judge shall hear information or other evidence, in the absence of the public, and the Applicant and his counsel if, in the judge's opinion, its disclosure could be injurious to national security or endanger the safety of any person. The evidence that is adduced in support of this application through the secret affidavit and the attachments thereto must be heard in the absence of the public, the Applicant and his counsel because disclosure of the evidence would be injurious to the national security or endanger the safety of any person.

30 Pursuant to sections 87 and 87.1, and paragraph 83(1)(b), the Court may appoint a special advocate to represent the interests of the permanent resident or foreign national if the Court is of the opinion that considerations of fairness and natural justice so require. In the case at bar, counsel for the Applicant made no such request.

31 After having held an in camera and ex parte hearing with counsel for the Respondents, during which the witness who filed the secret affidavit in support of the motion was questioned, counsel for the Applicant and for the Respondents were invited to make submissions by way of teleconference. As previously mentioned, it is at the end of this process that I granted the motion brought by the Respondents, with the caveat that one paragraph of the supplementary record be disclosed save for two words.

32 The state has a considerable interest in protecting national security and the security of its intelligence services. The disclosure of confidential information could have a detrimental effect on the ability of investigative agencies to fulfil their mandates in relation to Canada's national security. Although overturned by the Supreme Court on other grounds, the Federal Court found in Almrei v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2004 FC 420, [2004] F.C.J. No. 509, that the Court has a duty to ensure the confidentiality of information if, in the opinion of the judge, its disclosure would be injurious to national security or endanger the safety of any person. Quoting from paragraph 25 of the United Kingdom House of Lords decision in Regina v. Shayler, [2002] H.L.J. No. 11, Justice Edmond Blanchard stated (at para. 58):

There is much domestic authority pointing to the need for a security or intelligence service to be secure. The commodity in which such a service deals is secret and confidential information. If the service is not secure those working against the interests of the state, whether terrorists, other criminals or foreign agents, will be alerted, and able to take evasive action; its own agents may be unmasked; members of the service will feel unable to rely on each other; those upon whom the service relies as sources of information will feel unable to rely on their identity remaining secret; and foreign countries will decline to entrust their own secrets to an insecure recipient...

In Henrie v. Canada (Security Intelligence Review Committee), [1989] 2 F.C. 229 (T.D.); aff'd in (1992) 5 Admin. L.R. (2d) 269 (C.A.), this Court recognized the rule that information related to national security ought not to be disclosed as an important exception to the principle that the court process should be open and public:

There are, however, very limited and well defined occasions where the principle of complete openness must play a secondary role and where, with regard to the admission of evidence, the public interest in not disclosing the evidence may outweigh the public interest in disclosure. This frequently occurs where national security is involved for the simple reason that the very existence of our free and democratic society as well as the continued protection of the rights of litigants ultimately depend on the security and continued existence of our nation and of its institutions and laws.

33 The notion of the sometimes competing interests of the public's right to an open system and the state's need to protect information and its sources was discussed by the Supreme Court of Canada in Ruby v. Canada (Solicitor General), 2002 SCC 75, [2002] S.C.J. No. 73. In that case, the Supreme Court acknowledged that the state has a legitimate interest in preserving Canada's supply of intelligence information received from foreign sources and noted that the inadvertent release of such information would significantly injure national security.

34 Disclosure of confidential information related to national security or which would endanger the safety of any person could cause damage to the operations of investigative agencies. In the hands of an informed reader, seemingly unrelated pieces of information, which may not in themselves be particularly sensitive, can be used to develop a more comprehensive picture when compared with information already known by the recipient or available from another source. In Henrie, above, Justice David Addy also stated (at paras. 29-30):

By contrast, in security matters, there is a requirement to not only protect the identity of human sources of information but to recognize that the following types of information might require to be protected with due regard of course to the administration of justice and more particularly to the openness of its proceedings: information pertaining to the identity of targets of the surveillance whether they be individuals or groups, the technical means and sources of surveillance, the methods of operation of the Service, the identity of certain members of the Service itself, the telecommunications and cipher systems and, at times, the very fact that a surveillance is being or is not being carried out. This means for instance that evidence, which of itself might not be of any particular use in actually identifying the threat, might nevertheless require to be protected if the mere divulging of the fact that C.S.I.S. is in possession of it would alert the targeted organization to the fact that it is in fact subject to electronic surveillance or to a wiretap or to a leak from some human source within the organization.

It is of some importance to realize that an "informed reader", that is, a person who is both knowledgeable regarding security matters and is a member of or associated with a group which constitutes a threat or a potential threat to the security of Canada, will be quite familiar with the minute details of its organization and of the ramifications of its operations regarding which our security service might well be relatively uninformed. As a result, such an informed reader may at times, by fitting a piece of apparently innocuous information into the general picture which he has before him, be in a position to arrive at some damaging deductions regarding the investigation of a particular threat or of many other threats to national security.

35 Having reviewed the redacted information, and having duly considered the secret affidavit as well the explanations given by the deponent at the in camera and ex parte hearing, I have come to the conclusion that the redactions sought were necessary in order to protect national security as well as the security of persons mentioned in the secret material. Moreover, the redacted portions of the Certified Tribunal Record are minimal in content and do not seriously prejudice the Applicant's ability to know and comprehend the case he has to meet. In any event, the resolution of this application does not turn on the security clearances of the Applicant. It is for all of these reasons that the motion of the Respondents pursuant to s. 87 of the IRPA was granted.

B. The Application for Declaratory Relief

36 Counsel for the Applicant seeks a declaration from this Court that he was landed on December 23, 1998 (the date on which the Applicant attended CIC Etobicoke office for his landing examination), on June 28, 2002 (the date on which the IRPR came into force) or in February 2003 (the date on which he submitted a passport obtained from the Indian consulate in replacement of the lost one). On each of these dates, the Applicant submitted that he met all the legal requirements for landing and therefore became a permanent resident.

37 Counsel for the Respondents, for his part, argued that the Applicant could not be granted permanent residence on either of these dates because he could not satisfy an officer that he met all the requirements of the legislation. On December 23, 1998, he was not in possession of a valid and subsisting passport as required by subsection 14(1) of the former Regulations, while in February 2003, his medical, criminal and security clearances had expired.

38 There is no doubt that this Court has jurisdiction to grant declaratory relief. Section 18.1(3) of the Federal Courts Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. F-7, permits the Court to make whatever declaration is appropriate including both positive and negative declarations. The preconditions to be met before declaratory relief can be granted have been spelled out by the Supreme Court of Canada in the following terms:

Declaratory relief is a remedy neither constrained by form nor bounded by substantive content, which avails persons sharing a legal relationship, in respect of which a "real issue" concerning the relative interests of each has been raised and falls to be determined.

Canada v. Solosky, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 821, at p. 830.

39 In the present case, these preconditions are clearly met. First of all, the parties obviously share a legal relationship ever since the Applicant made his application for permanent residence in 1995. When a person applies for permanent residence, a legal relationship is created as between that person and CIC. For instance, an applicant has a duty to truthfully answer all questions asked by the visa officer (IRPA, s. 16(1); Immigration Act, s. 12(4)), and to undergo a medical examination (IRPA, s. 16(2); Immigration Act, s. 11) and an examination by the visa officer (IRPA, s. 18; Immigration Act, s. 12(1)). CIC, on the other hand, as a duty to grant landing to immigrants who meet all legal requirements (IRPA, s. 21; Immigration Act, s. 5(2) and 14(2)).

40 Furthermore, the issue at stake is clearly a real one in that it affects the parties' interests and has not been resolved yet. Indeed, the issue is not academic or hypothetical; what is at stake is the Applicant's status in Canada and the possibility to re-enter Canada if he is ever found guilty of the charges that have been laid against him in the United States. This is not to say that the declaration sought by the Applicant would automatically provide any relief to the Applicant. Disregard of a declaratory judgment does not amount to contempt, as such a declaratory judgment merely states an existing legal situation: L.C.U.C. v. Canada (Canada Post Corp.) (1986), 8 F.T.R. 93 (T.D.). For a declaratory order to have any practical and immediate effect, it would have to be accompanied by an order in the nature of a mandamus. I shall return to that question shortly. Suffice it to say that even if the Court were not prepared to compel the Respondents to perform any specific duty, there would still be merit in declaring the law. As the Supreme Court stated in another context, government officials and administrative boards are not above the law, and if an official acts contrary to statute, the courts are entitled to so declare: see Canada v. Kelso, [1981] 1 S.C.R. 199, at p. 210.

41 I have to agree with counsel for the Respondents that the Applicant could not be landed on February 23, 2003, or indeed at any point in time after the coming into force of IRPA, as an officer could not be satisfied that he was not inadmissible. Through no fault of his own, Mr. Singh's medical, criminal and security clearances had expired and needed to be reinitiated when he submitted a valid passport. That being said, this was a most unfortunate state of affairs. For all those years, the Applicant was on a kind of merry-go-round, as one clearance after another had to be redone since their validity periods never all coincided. This is clearly an example of the bureaucracy at its worst, and one can only sympathize with the Applicant's Kafkaesque experience. But from a strictly legal point of view, it is impossible to conclude that the various officials who dealt with Mr. Singh's application after he obtained a new passport erred in applying the requirements of the law.

42 The same cannot be said with respect to the refusal to land him on December 23, 1998. It is not in dispute that the only reason his Record of Landing was taken back from him on that date was his inability to present a valid and subsisting passport. At that point, Mr. Singh had met all the other requirements of the Immigration Act and its attendant Regulations.

43 The requirement to be in possession of a valid and subsisting passport is found in subsection 14(1) of the Regulations, reproduced above at paragraph 17 of these reasons. Being in possession of something generally refers to the control over an object. However, depending of the legal context, a person may be considered in possession of something if that person holds a legal right to assume immediate control over an object: see Ready John Inc. v. Canada (Department of Public Works and Government Services), 2004 FCA 222, [2004] F.C.J. No. 1002 at paras. 42-45. In the specific context of the Immigration Act, interpreting the regulatory requirement found in subsection 14(1) as the physical control of the passport by the Applicant would make no sense. The purpose of that subsection is clearly to verify that an immigrant wishing to come to Canada is a citizen of another country and to ascertain the identity of the immigrant before landing him. This is confirmed by an amendment made to the legal regime governing refugees in 1992 (S.C. 1992, ch. 49). Pursuant to s. 38 of that statute, section 46.04 of the Immigration Act was modified. The modified paragraph 46.04(8) states:

- (8) An immigration officer shall not grant landing either to an applicant under subsection (1) or to any dependant of the applicant until the applicant is in possession of a valid and subsisting passport or travel document or a satisfactory identity document.

44 Moreover, the French version of subsection 14(1) of the former Immigration Regulations stipulates that an immigrant "doit avoir" a valid passport. This expression is clearly much broader than "being in possession of" in the English version. To have a valid passport doesn't necessarily mean to physically hold on the passport, but rather to be the bearer of that document or to have the legal use of it. It should have been sufficient for the Applicant to demonstrate that he was the legal bearer of a valid passport; this is obviously done in general by showing the passport itself, but there may be circumstances where the showing of the physical passport may not be necessary in order to meet this requirement.

45 In the specific context of this case, the interpretation of subsection 14(1) proposed by the Respondents would not only make no sense but would also bring about a terrible injustice on the Applicant. Mr. Singh would be made to suffer for the loss of his passport by officials of the Respondents. Besides, the Respondents had a copy of his passport in the file, which showed that it was valid until 2001. In those very exceptional circumstances, it would be absurd and not in keeping with the wording and the spirit of subsection 14(1) to find that the Applicant could only satisfy the requirement set out in that provision by having with him the passport itself that was issued to him by the Indian authorities.

46 Counsel for the Respondents cited section 13 of the IRPR to bolster his argument. Section 13 of the IRPR prescribes an evidentiary rule to the effect that, if the "production" of a document is required by the legislation, it is the original document that must be "produced". Quite apart from the fact that section 13 of the IRPR finds no equivalent in the Immigration Act or in the former Regulations, it must be borne in mind that section 14(1) of the former Regulations did not speak of a requirement to produce but to hold a valid passport. These are two different requirements. The requirement to hold (in French "être titulaire de") a document is more than an evidentiary rule; it goes to the substance of being entitled to a valid passport issued by one's country of citizenship.

47 For all of those reasons, I am therefore of the view that CIC erred in law in finding that the Applicant did not comply with the requirement enunciated in s. 14(1) of the former Immigration Regulations, and in refusing to land the Applicant on December 23, 1998.

C. The Application for Mandamus

48 The necessary conditions to be met for the issuance of a writ of mandamus have been set out by the Federal Court of Appeal in Apotex Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1994] 1 F.C. 742, at para. 45; aff'd [1994] 3 S.C.R. 1100) and aptly summarized by my colleague Justice Danièle Tremblay-Lamer in the following terms:

- (1) there is a public legal duty to the applicant to act;
- (2) the duty must be owed to the applicant;
- (3) there is a clear right to the performance of that duty, in particular:
 - (a) the applicant has satisfied all conditions precedent giving rise to the duty;
 - (b) there was a prior demand for performance of the duty, a reasonable time to comply with the demand, and a subsequent refusal which can be either expressed or implied, e.g. unreasonable delay; and
- (4) there is no other adequate remedy.

Conille v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [1999] 2 F.C. 33, (T.D.) at para. 8

49 In the case at bar, the Applicant seeks two alternative mandamus orders. The first order sought is to direct CIC to grant the Applicant his permanent residence within 30 days of the Court's order. Alternatively, the Applicant seeks an order compelling CIC to complete the processing of the Applicant's application within 30 days of the Court's order.

50 There is no doubt in my mind that the Applicant has met all the requirements for the issuance of a mandamus order. It is clear that CIC has a public legal duty to process the Applicant's permanent residence application. Section 5(2) of the former Immigration Act imposed on CIC a clear obligation to grant landing to an applicant for permanent residence who meets the relevant statutory requirements, and the same is true by virtue of section 11(1) of IRPA: see, for example, Dragan, above, at para. 40; Vaziri v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2006 FC 1159, [2006] F.C.J. No. 1458 at para. 41.

51 I also find that the Applicant had a right to the performance of that duty. He submitted a completed application accompanied by all required supporting documents and paid the required processing fees. The record also shows that the Applicant and his counsel repeatedly contacted the Respondents to request updates or a final decision to be made. Yet, more than 14 years after he filed his application, a decision has yet to be made. The Respondents are correct in pointing out that the Applicant, due to the outstanding criminal charges that have been laid against him in the fall of 2005, cannot now satisfy an officer that he is not inadmissible under section 36 of IRPA. The fact remains that, prior to those charges having been laid, he had waited almost ten years for his application to be processed. If such a long period of time does not amount to an unreasonable delay, I truly wonder what does.

52 In light of the foregoing, I am of the view that the Applicant is entitled to an order in the nature of a mandamus. There is, however, authority for the proposition that while mandamus will be issued to compel the performance of a duty, it cannot dictate the result to be reached: see, for example, Schwartz Hospitality Group Ltd. v. Canada (Minister of Canadian Heritage), 2001 FCT 112, at para. 34. Indeed, the jurisprudence is to the effect that issuing specific directions may sometimes be warranted, but only in very limited and exceptional circumstances. As stated by the Federal Court of Appeal in Rafuse v. Canada (Pension Appeals Board), 2002 FCA 31, [2002] F.C.J. No. 91 at par. 14:

While the directions that the Court may issue when setting aside a tribunal's decision include directions in the nature of a directed verdict, this is an exceptional power that should be exercised only in the clearest of circumstances: Xie, supra, at paragraph 18. Such will rarely be the case when the issue in dispute is essentially factual in nature (Ali v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), [1994] 3 F.C. 73 (T.D.)), particularly when, as here, the tribunal has not made the relevant finding.

See also: Johnson v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2005 FC 1262, [2005] F.C.J. No. 1523, at paras. 20-22; Xie v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration) (1994), 75 F.T.R. 125 (F.C.T.D.) at para. 18.

53 In the case at bar, the issue of the Applicant's inadmissibility was apparently resolved in his favour at the time of his interview on December 23, 1998. Had it not been for the error of the officer in determining that the Applicant did not hold a valid passport because it had been seized at the visa office in Buffalo and never returned to him, the Applicant would most probably have been landed on that date. The evidence in that respect, however, is not devoid of all ambiguity, and does not allow the Court to bypass the assessment of an immigration officer and to substitute its decision to that of the Minister and those who are entrusted with his delegated authority.

54 Accordingly, the decision not to land the Applicant on December 23, 1998 is quashed, and the Applicant's file is remitted back to the Respondents to be processed in accordance with the law as it stood on that date and on the basis of the Applicant's record at the time. The processing of the Applicant's file shall also be made in light of these reasons, and in particular in light of the declaratory order with respect to s. 14(1) of the Immigration Act. Because of the long delays through which the Applicant already had to go through, the redetermination shall be made within 90 days of the release of this Court's order.

55 Counsel proposed no question for certification, and none will be certified.

56 Counsel for the Applicant seeks his costs on a solicitor-client basis. I agree with the Respondents that there is no justification for such an award. That being said, I am prepared to grant costs on a party to party basis to the Applicant. I am of the view that the long delay in processing the Applicant's file amounts to "special circumstances" for the purpose of Rule 22 of the Federal Courts Immigrations and Refugee Protection Rules, SOR/93-22. Accordingly, the Respondents are jointly ordered to pay $2,000 to the Applicant.

ORDER

THIS COURT ORDERS that this application for judicial review be granted. More specifically, the Court makes the following two orders:

- * The Court declares that the requirement to hold a valid passport found in s. 14(1) of the Regulations adopted under the former Immigration Act did not require an Applicant to actually have in his or her possession a hard copy of his or her passport, when it can be established by other means that the Applicant holds a valid passport;
- * The Court further orders CIC to process the application for landing of the Applicant within 90 days of the release of this Order, in accordance with the law as it stood on December 23, 1998 and as interpreted in the reasons for this Order, and on the basis of the Applicant's record on that date.
- * The Respondents are ordered to pay the Applicant a lump sum of $2,000.00.

5 O.R. (3d) 417 | [1991] O.J. No. 1618

Case Summary

Torts — Negligent misstatement — Liability of auditor to third parties — Pure economic loss — Bank suing auditor of debtor for negligent preparation of financial statements — Bank pleading that auditor knew that financial statements would be provided to bank by debtor in connection with loan agreement and that bank relied on information to its detriment — Auditor's motion to strike out statement of claim as disclosing no reasonable cause of action dismissed.

The plaintiff loaned money to L Ltd., a company of which the defendant was auditor. The defendant prepared audited financial statements for the year ended March 31, 1989 and issued an unqualified auditor's report in connection therewith. In April 1990, L Ltd. made an assignment in bankruptcy; the plaintiff was an unsecured creditor in the bankruptcy for the full amount of the loan. The plaintiff sued the defendant on the basis of the auditor's alleged negligence in the preparation of the audited financial statements. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant knew or ought to have known that the audited financial statements would be provided to the plaintiff after they were received by L Ltd.; that the plaintiff would rely on the audited financial statements in continuing to extend credit to L Ltd. and might rely on them to extend further credit; and that the audited financial statements would be delivered to the plaintiff to assess the financial condition of L Ltd. and as a basis to continue to extend or to increase the credit. The defendant moved under rule 21.01(1) of the Rules of Civil Procedure for the determination of the question whether, in the absence of a special relationship with the claimant, an auditor is liable for pure economic loss, and for an order striking out the statement of claim on the ground that it disclosed no reasonable cause of action.

Held, the motion should be dismissed.

The question to be determined on this motion was whether or not, on the facts as assumed from the pleadings, it could be said to be plain, obvious and beyond doubt that the plaintiff would not be successful in establishing the existence of a special relationship at trial.

The liability of an auditor to third parties for negligent misstatement in cases of pure economic loss must be grounded on something narrower than the broad question of foreseeability. Whether this narrowing concept is characterized as the requirement for a "special relationship" or a knowledge of the "nature and purpose of the transaction", or more generally as "knowledge" amounted to the same thing, i.e. to "knowledge". Knowledge of the requisite sort was pleaded.

MOTION for a determination before trial of a question of law and for an order striking out a statement of claim.

Nature of the proceeding

In this action there arises a broad and very important question of law. That question concerns the development and scope in Canada of an auditor's liability in tort for negligent misstatement.

The motion before me is under rule 21.01(1) of the Rules of Civil Procedure, O. Reg. 560/84, for:

- (a) the determination before trial of a question of law raised by a pleading where the determination of the question may dispose of the claim, and
- (b) an order striking out the statement of claim on the ground that it discloses no reasonable cause of action.

On such a motion the principles or tests to be applied are the following:

- (i) the allegations of fact in the statement of claim, unless patently ridiculous or incapable of proof, must be accepted as proven;
- (ii) the moving party, in order to succeed, must show that it is plain, obvious and beyond doubt the plaintiff could not succeed;
- (iii) the novelty of the cause of action will not militate against the plaintiff; and,

Toronto-Dominion Bank v. Deloitte Haskins & Sells and Deloitte & Touche Indexed as: Toronto-Dominion Bank v. Deloitte Haskins & Sells (Gen. Div.), 5 O.R. (3d) 417

- (iv) the statement of claim must be read generously with allowance for inadequacies due to drafting deficiencies.

I am of the view that these same principles or tests apply whether the motion is brought under rule 21.01(1)(a) or (b). Both involve a consideration of legal principles applied to facts as set out in the pleadings. Although he did not say so specifically, Mr. Justice White suggested as much in Moriarity v. Slater (1989), 67 O.R. (2d) 758, 42 B.L.R. 52 (H.C.J.). There, in reference to the procedure under both subrules, he commented that the proposition in question must be "crystal clear" to the motions judge and that caution and prudence should govern the exercise of the court's discretion.

Facts

The plaintiff, Toronto-Dominion Bank (the Bank), was banker to a company called Leigh Instruments Limited (Leigh) from 1982 until April 1990. By that time Leigh was indebted to the Bank in the amount of $40.5 million. The indebtedness was secured by a "letter of comfort" from Leigh's parent, the Plessy Company plc (Plessy).

The defendant, which I will refer to as "Deloitte", was Leigh's auditor. In the course of its general mandate from the company, it prepared audited financial statements for the year ended March 31, 1989 and issued an unqualified auditor's report in connection therewith. The bank loan appeared on Leigh's balance sheet, and the fact that it was secured by a comfort letter was described in a note to the financial statements.

On April 12, 1990, Leigh made an assignment in bankruptcy. I am told that there is other litigation between the Bank and Plessy regarding the Plessy security, which has apparently turned out to be somewhat less than a comfort to the Bank. In any event, the Bank is left as an unsecured creditor in the Leigh bankruptcy for the full amount of the loan advanced at the time.

In this action the Bank sues Deloitte on the basis of the auditor's alleged negligence in the preparation of the audited financial statements. The Bank asserts that the statements were provided to it as a term of the loan agreement, that it relied upon them in continuing and making further advances under the loan agreement, and that the auditors knew this would be the case. More specifically, the allegations which are of central importance for the disposition of this proceeding are the allegations that Deloitte knew (or ought to have known):

- (a) that the audited financial statements would be provided to the Bank after they were received by Leigh;
- (b) that the Bank would rely on the audited financial statements in continuing to extend credit to Leigh and might rely on them to extend further credit;
- (c) that the audited financial statements would be delivered to the Bank to assess the financial condition of Leigh and as a basis to continue to extend or to increase the credit.

These facts, of course, have not been proved, but as outlined above, I am required to assume their truth for the purposes of this motion.

Issue

In his factum, Mr. Mik, on behalf of Deloitte, articulates the issue and the question of law for determination as one of "the liability of an auditor, in the absence of a special relationship with the claimant, for pure economic loss".

By "a special relationship" he means something more than mere knowledge or foreseeability, which he concedes is established on the pleadings. That "something more" (my term) he characterizes as the requirements of "proximity" and "fairness", relying strongly on the decision of the House of Lords in Caparo Industries plc v. Dickman, [1990] 1 All E.R. 568, [1990] 2 W.L.R. 358, and a companion decision of Millett J. in the Court of Queen's Bench in England, called Al Saudi Banque v. Clark Pixley (a firm), [1990] Ch. 313, [1989] 3 All E.R. 361 (Ch. D.).

Toronto-Dominion Bank v. Deloitte Haskins & Sells and Deloitte & Touche Indexed as: Toronto-Dominion Bank v. Deloitte Haskins & Sells (Gen. Div.), 5 O.R. (3d) 417

In my view, the issue before me is more accurately articulated in another way. The question is whether or not, on the facts as assumed from the pleading, it can be said to be "plain, obvious and beyond doubt" that the plaintiff will not be successful in establishing the existence of such a special relationship (however that relationship is characterized), at a trial.

Law

Since the House of Lords broke through the barrier to liability in tort for negligent misstatement in Hedley Byrne & Co. Ltd. v. Heller & Partners Ltd., [1964] A.C. 465, [1963] 2 All E.R. 575, there has been no dearth of authorities fastening auditors with such a responsibility.

In Canada, Mr. Justice R.E. Holland found against a firm of auditors in Toromont Industrial Holdings Ltd. v. Thorne, Gunn, Helliwell & Christenson (1975), 10 O.R. (2d) 65, 62 D.L.R. (3d) 225 (H.C.J.), although he was reversed in part on appeal ((1976), 14 O.R. (2d) 87, 73 D.L.R. (3d) 122 (C.A.)). There are other examples -- here and in England -- and the Supreme Court of Canada, itself, considered the question in Haig v. Bamford, [1977] 1 S.C.R. 466, 72 D.L.R. (3d) 68.

The law is clear, therefore, that auditors may be liable to third parties in tort for negligent misstatement. Mr. Mik submits, however, that Caparo and Al Saudi Banque, and several decisions in British Columbia that appear to have accepted those cases, have narrowed the ambit of that liability in cases of pure economic loss. Haig v. Bamford (when considered in light of its facts and the root decision on which it is based -- Lord Justice Denning's dissent in Candler v. Crane, Christmas & Co., [1951] 2 K.B. 164, [1951] 1 All E.R. 426 (C.A.)) is not inconsistent with the principles enunciated in those cases, he argues, and the law is now refined and settled in this respect in a way that precludes this action against the defendant.

Caparo and its progeny of cases stand for the proposition that the following ingredients are necessary to establish a duty of care for negligent misstatement on the part of advisers such as accountants: (1) foreseeability of damage; (2) proximity or neighbourhood; (3) a sense that it is fair, just and reasonable to impose a duty in the circumstances.

Throughout the very thorough arguments of counsel for both parties, I was referred to a number of authorities on this subject, in addition to those mentioned above. These included: Federal Business Development Bank v. Morris, Burk, Luborsky, David & Kale (1988), 38 B.L.R. 1 (Ont. H.C.J.); Hong Kong Bank of Canada v. Touche Ross & Co. (1989), 36 B.C.L.R. (2d) 381, 74 C.B.R. (N.S.) 164 (C.A.); MacPherson v. Schachter (1989), 1 C.C.L.T. (2d) 65 (B.C. S.C.); Dixon v. Deacon Morgan McEwan Easson (1989), 64 D.L.R. (4th) 441, [1990] 2 W.W.R. 500 (B.C. S.C.); Surrey Credit Union v. Willson (1990), 49 B.C.L.R. (2d) 102, 73 D.L.R. (4th) 207 (S.C.); Kripps v. Touche Ross & Co. (1990), 52 B.C.L.R. (2d) 291 (S.C.); McGauley v. British Columbia (1990), 44 B.C.L.R. (2d) 217 (S.C.), appeal allowed to the extent of granting the plaintiff one last chance to amend statement of claim (1991), 56 B.C.L.R. (2d) 1 (C.A.); Al-Nakib Investments (Jersey) Ltd. v. Longcroft, [1990] 3 All E.R. 321, [1990] 1 W.L.R. 1390 (Ch. D.); Canada Deposit Insurance Corp. v. Prisco, Alta. Q.B., Wachowich J., November 30, 1990 [now reported 2 C.B.R. (3d) 96]; Morgan Crucible Co. plc v. Hill Samuel & Co. Ltd., [1991] Ch. 295, [1991] 1 All E.R. 148 (C.A.); James McNaughton Paper Group Ltd. v. Hicks Anderson & Co., [1991] 2 Q.B. 113, [1991] 2 W.L.R. 641 (C.A.).

Mr. Campion, on behalf of the Bank, does not concede that the law in this area has been redefined in any definitive way in Canada. He does accept that liability must be grounded on something narrower than the broad question of foreseeability in order to balance the policy considerations between a right to recovery for economic loss and the exposure of liability "in an indeterminate amount for an indeterminate time to an indeterminate class" (the oft-cited remark of Chief Justice Cardozo in Ultra Mares Corp. v. Touche, 255 N.Y. 170 (1931), at p. 179). He submits, however, that whether this narrowing concept is characterized as the requirement for a "special relationship" or as knowledge of the "nature or purpose of the transaction", or more generally as "knowledge", it amounts to the same thing: it amounts to "knowledge". And "knowledge" of the requisite sort, he argues, is pleaded.

He also submits that even if the test for liability is that set out in the Caparo line of authorities, the Bank has met those tests on the facts as pleaded, at least for the purposes of a motion such as this.

I agree.

Toronto-Dominion Bank v. Deloitte Haskins & Sells and Deloitte & Touche Indexed as: Toronto-Dominion Bank v. Deloitte Haskins & Sells (Gen. Div.), 5 O.R. (3d) 417

In Haig v. Bamford, supra, the Supreme Court of Canada deliberately left open the question of whether foreseeability was a proper test to apply in determining the full extent of the duty owed by accountants to third parties. It held that "actual knowledge of the limited class that will use and rely on the statement" was sufficient to found liability on the facts of that case (supra, p. 476 S.C.R., p. 75 D.L.R.). Mr. Justice Dickson (as he then was) adopted [p. 477 S.C.R., p. 75 D.L.R.] as his starting point Lord Justice Denning's question in Candler v. Crane, Christmas & Co., supra, "To whom do these professional people owe this duty?", and his following answer:

They owe the duty, of course, to their employer or client, and also, I think, to any third person to whom they themselves show the accounts, or to whom they know their employer is going to show the accounts so as to induce him to invest money or take some other action on them.

Later, in summarizing his decision, Mr. Justice Dickson also stated [pp. 483-84 S.C.R., p. 80 D.L.R.]:

I can see no good reason for distinguishing between the case in which a defendant accountant delivers information directly to the plaintiff at the request of his employer ... and the case in which the information is handed to the employer who, to the knowledge of the accountant, passes it to members of a limited class (whose identity is unknown to the accountant) in furtherance of a transaction the nature of which is known to the accountant.

(Emphasis added)

It is pleaded in this action that Deloitte knew that the financial statements would be provided to the Bank by Leigh in connection with the loan agreement and for the purpose of assessing the credit facility, and that the Bank relied on the information to its detriment. Having regard to this and to the passages from Haig v. Bamford cited above and having regard, I must say, even to the requirements of the Caparo line of cases -- if, indeed, they do establish the criteria -- I am not able to conclude that it is "plain, obvious and beyond doubt" that the plaintiff cannot succeed at trial.

I am mindful also of the following cautionary guideline noted by Madam Justice Wilson in Hunt v. Carey Canada Inc., supra, at pp. 990-91 S.C.R., p. 344 D.L.R.:

... I would go so far as to suggest that where a statement of claim reveals a difficult and important point of law, it may well be critical that the action be allowed to proceed. Only in this way can we be sure that the common law in general, and the law of torts in particular, will continue to evolve to meet the legal challenges that arise in our modern industrial society.

This is just such a case, it seems to me. Tempting though it may be as a judge in matters such as this, to whet one's interest and appetite in a delicious legal issue, the whetting, in my view, is best left to a time when the whole meal can be digested.

Conclusion

Accordingly, an order will go dismissing the defendant's motion, with costs to the plaintiff in the cause.

I am grateful to counsel for their skilful arguments and for the helpful materials which were provided to me.

Motion dismissed.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO

Case Summary

Actions — Status — Standing of taxpayer in class action — Interest no greater than that of any other taxpayer — Challenge of federal legislation — Official Languages Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. 0-2.

The appellant, suing as a taxpayer in a class action, claimed that the Official Languages Act, 1968-69 (Can.), c. 54 and Appropriation Acts providing money to implement it were unconstitutional. The question of standing was raised as a preliminary question of law and was decided against the appellant, both at first instance and on appeal.

Held (Fauteux C.J. and Abbott and Judson JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be allowed.

Per Martland, Ritchie, Spence, Pigeon, Laskin and Dickson JJ.: A question of alleged excess of legislative power is a justiciable one, and it is open to the Court, in the exercise of a discretionary power, to allow a taxpayer to have such a question adjudicated in a class action, being in effect a class action by a member of the public, when otherwise it could be immune from judicial review because there is no person or class of persons particularly aggrieved and because of the unwillingness of the Attorney-General to institute proceedings or of the Government to direct a reference. Any attempt to place standing in a federal taxpayer suit on the likely tax burden is as unreal as it is in the case of municipal taxpayer suits. It is not the alleged waste of public funds alone but the right of citizenry to constitutional behaviour that will support standing. As a matter of discretion the appellant should be allowed to proceed to have the suit determined on the merits.

Per Fauteux C.J., Abbott and Judson JJ. dissenting: The ratio of the judgments in the Ontario courts is that an individual has no status to challenge the constitutional validity of an Act of Parliament unless he is specially affected or exceptionally prejudiced by it. Municipal taxpayer class actions are in a class of their own since municipal corporations and municipal councils are creatures of a statute and can only do those things which they are authorized to do.

The judgment of Fauteux C.J. and Abbott and Judson JJ. was delivered by JUDSON J.

JUDSON J.— The appellant, Joseph Thorarinn Thorson, sued in the Supreme Court of Ontario for a declaration that the Official Languages Act is ultra vires of the Parliament of Canada, and for a similar declaration in respect of appropriation Acts of the Parliament of Canada insofar as they grant money out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund for the purposes of this Act. The appellant also asked for an order compelling repayment into the Consolidated Revenue Fund of moneys already expended.

One of the defences raised by the defendants in the action was that the appellant had no status to maintain the action. Following the close of pleadings, the defendants applied for an order under Rule 124 of the Rules of Practice of the Supreme Court of Ontario for leave to set down for hearing two questions of law before the trial of the action. These are:

1. That the plaintiff (appellant) has no status or standing to maintain this action;
2. That since the plaintiff (appellant) has not alleged that he as a taxpayer of Canada has suffered any special damage or damage that would set him apart from other taxpayers of Canada as a result of the enactment of the Official Languages Act, the plaintiff (appellant) has no status or standing to obtain the relief claimed in the amended statement of claim.

Leave was granted and these two questions came on for hearing before Mr. Justice Houlden. He found that the appellant had no status to maintain the action and accordingly dismissed it. His judgment [[1972] 1 O.R. 86] was affirmed by a unanimous Court of Appeal [[1972] 2 O.R. 340].

The ratio of the judgments in the Ontario courts is that an individual has no status to challenge the constitutional validity of an Act of Parliament unless he is specially affected or exceptionally prejudiced by it. The plaintiff in this action had only the same interest as any other taxpayer in Canada, and any increased taxes resulting from the implementation of the Act would be borne by all the taxpayers of Canada.

In my opinion, this decision is sound and the case is governed directly by the judgment of this Court in Smith v. Attorney General of Ontario [[1924] S.C.R. 331]. In this action, Smith was asking for a declaratory judgment that Part IV of the Canada Temperance Act was not validly in force in the Province of Ontario. The ratio of the judgment of the Court is contained in the reasons of Duff J., at pp. 337 and 338, in the following terms:

Much may be said, no doubt, for the view that an individual in the position of the appellant ought, without subjecting himself to a prosecution for a criminal offence, to have some means of raising the question of the legality of official acts imposing constraint upon him in his daily conduct which, on grounds not unreasonable, he thinks are unauthorized and illegal. We think, however, that to accede to appellant's contention upon this point would involve the consequence that virtually every resident of Ontario could maintain a similar action; and we can discover no firm ground on which the appellant's claim can be supported which would not be equally available to sustain the right of any citizen of a province to initiate proceedings impeaching the constitutional validity of any legislation directly affecting him, along with other citizens, in a similar way in his business or in his personal life.

We think the recognition of such a principle would lead to grave inconvenience and analogy is against it. An individual, for example, has no status to maintain an action restraining a wrongful violation of a public right unless he is exceptionally prejudiced by the wrongful act. It is true that in this court this rule has been relaxed in order to admit actions by ratepayers for restraining ultra vires expenditures by the governing bodies of municipalities; Maclreith v. Hart (1907), 39 S.C.R. 657. We are not sure that the reasons capable of being advanced in support of this exception would not be just as pertinent as arguments in favour of the appellant's contention, but this exception does not rest upon any clearly defined principle, and we think it ought not to be extended.

These reasons were accepted by Mignault J. and Maclean J. Idington J. thought that the action was an attempt to get an opinion which, on the facts presented, the Court had no right to give. He declined to express any opinion on the questions submitted and concurred in the dismissal of the action for the reasons given by him. The Chief Justice, who presided at the hearing, died before judgment was pronounced.

In the Smith case, as in the present appeal, much emphasis was laid on the decision in Dyson v. Attorney-General [[1911] 1 K.B. 410, and [1912] 1 Ch. 158]. In my opinion Dyson's case has no bearing upon the problem before us. The appellant in this case is seeking a declaration that Parliament had no power to enact a certain piece of legislation. Dyson's case was concerned with no such issue. The attack in Dyson's case was upon the action of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. They had devised a form which required all land owners to state the annual value of their land on a certain basis. Dyson's objection was that this demand was not authorized by the Act, and the Court of Appeal agreed with him [[1911] 1 K.B. 410]. The decision was, therefore, a declaratory judgment against a certain form of administrative action. It was sought in the Smith case to extend this principle to legislation and this request was rejected, and rightly so in my opinion. It is being repeated in this appeal and should be rejected again.

It is also my opinion that Duff J. was right in refusing to extend the ratepayer's action in municipal cases to the kind of action before him in the Smith case and before us in the present case. These actions to restrain illegal or ultra vires expenditures, to recover funds illegally paid out or retained by a member of council (Maclreith v. Hart [1908], 39 S.C.R. 657]; Paterson v. Bowes [(1853), 4 Gr. 170]) bear no analogy to the present case. I do not regard them as a relaxation of the rule enunciated in the Smith case. They are in a class of their own. Municipal corporations and municipal councils are creatures of a statute and can only do those things which they are authorized, expressly or implicitly, to do. The ratepayer's action is one means of keeping municipal action within municipal powers.

I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

The judgment of Martland, Ritchie, Spence, Pigeon, Laskin and Dickson JJ. was delivered by LASKIN J.

LASKIN J.:-- An important question of standing is raised by this appeal, brought here by leave of this Court. The appellant, suing as a taxpayer in a class action, claims a declaration against the Attorney General of Canada that the Official Languages Act, 1968-69 (Can.), c. 54, now R.S.C. 1970, c. 0-2, and Appropriation Acts providing money to implement it, are unconstitutional. There are other defendants in the action as framed, against whom specific relief is claimed, but it seems to have been assumed that their liability depends initially on whether the appellant can succeed in his claim against the Attorney General of Canada; and that unless the appellant has standing to seek a declaration of unconstitutionality, the various claims of relief must fail in limine.

The question of standing was, on the motion of the defendants under R.124 (Ont.), set down for hearing as a preliminary question of law, and was decided by Houlden J. in their favour. An appeal by the plaintiff to the Ontario Court of Appeal was dismissed without calling on counsel for the defendants. The Court of Appeal, in short reasons, approved the interpretation placed by Houlden J. on the two judgments of this Court upon which, in his view, the issue turned, namely Maclreith v. Hart [(1907), 39 S.C.R. 657] and Smith v. Attorney General of Ontario [[1924]

S.C.R. 331]. Houlden J. regarded the Smith case as laying down the applicable principle as expounded in the reasons of Duff J., speaking in this respect for the majority of the Court. Houlden J. said this in the course of his reasons:

In my judgment, the principle stated in the Smith case is one of general application. This principle is that an individual has no status or standing to challenge the constitutional validity of an Act of Parliament in an action of this type unless he is specially affected or exceptionally prejudiced by it ... The fact that the taxes of the plaintiff and the taxes of every taxpayer in Canada will be raised as a result of the implementation of the Official Languages Act is not, in my opinion, sufficient to constitute special damage or prejudice to the plaintiff so as to enable the plaintiff to bring this action.

I think there is sound reason for this result. If every taxpayer could bring an action to test the validity of a statute that involved the expenditure of public money it would in my view lead to grave inconvenience and public disorder. It is for this reason, I believe, that the plaintiff has been unable to find any Canadian or English decision as authority for the position he is asserting.

I do not think that anything is added to the reasons for denying standing, if otherwise cogent, by reference to grave inconvenience and public disorder. An effective answer to similar arguments advanced in Dyson v. The Attorney General [[1911] 1 K.B. 410], was given by Farwell L.J. in his reasons at p. 423, reasons endorsed by Fletcher Moulton L.J. in the second Dyson case [[1912] 1 Ch. 158], at p. 168. The Courts are quite able to control declaratory actions, both through discretion, by directing a stay, and by imposing costs; and as a matter of experience, MacIlreith v. Hart, to which I will return, does not seem to have spawned any inordinate number of ratepayers' actions to challenge the legality of municipal expenditures. A more telling consideration for me, but on the other side of the issue, is whether a question of constitutionality should be immunized from judicial review by denying standing to anyone to challenge the impugned statute. That, in my view, is the consequence of the judgments below in the present case. The substantive issue raised by the plaintiff's action is a justiciable one; and, prima facie, it would be strange and, indeed, alarming, if there was no way in which a question of alleged excess of legislative power, a matter traditionally within the scope of the judicial process, could be made the subject of adjudication.

Because of the way in which the matter now before this Court arose, the facts alleged in the amended statement of claim are taken as admitted for present purposes. They do not, of course, answer the legal question which has been posited on those facts. There is one admission of fact to which I wish to refer, however, which was not considered in the reasons of the Courts below. Before bringing his action, the plaintiff wrote to the Attorney General of Canada inviting him, in his capacity as representative of the Crown in right of Canada in matters legal, to take appropriate proceedings to test the validity of the Official Languages Act. The letter noted that prior to the enactment of this statute the plaintiff had asked for a reference to this Court to have its validity considered but his request was refused. Although the record contains no reply to the plaintiff's letter there is an admission by the defendants in their amended statement of defence that the Attorney General declined to act in his public capacity to challenge the constitutionality of the statute.

If a previous request to the Attorney General to institute proceedings or to agree to a relator action is a condition of a private person's right to initiate proceedings such as this on his own (see Attorney General v. Independent Broadcasting Authority, ex parte McWhirter [[1973] 1 All E.R. 689], at p. 698) that condition has been met in this case. I doubt, however, whether such a condition can have any application in a federal system where the Attorney General is the legal officer of a Government obliged to enforce legislation enacted by Parliament and a challenge is made to the validity of the legislation. The situation is markedly different from that of unitary Great Britain where there is no unconstitutional legislation and the Attorney General, where he proceeds as guardian of the public interest, does so against subordinate delegated authorities. Indeed, in such situations the decision of the Attorney General to proceed on his own or to permit a relator action is within his discretion and not subject to judicial control: see London County Council v. Attorney General [[1902] A.C. 165]. Nevertheless, what was said by Lord Denning in the McWhirter case, supra, on the position of a member of the public where the Attorney General refuses without good reason to take proceedings ex officio or to give leave for relator proceedings, is relevant to a distinction that I take and on which, in my opinion, the result in this case turns. I shall come to this later in these reasons.

I agree with the submission of counsel for the respondents that the appellant's taxpayer class action here is realistically a class action by a member of the public. He is bringing what has been called a "public action" (see Jaffe, Judicial Control of Administrative Action (1965), p. 483), and the question that arises is whether the principle of Maclreith v. Hart should be extended to cover such federal taxpayer actions (and, if so, it would extend as well to provincial taxpayer actions), as contended for by the appellant, or whether this kind of action should never be permitted for the reasons given in the Smith case, as contended for by the respondents. It is my view that this statement of the issue is both too broad and too narrow. It is too broad because it does not take account of the nature of the legislation whose validity is challenged; it is too narrow because it suggests an "either or" approach by the Courts. I am of the opinion that the Court is entitled in taxpayer actions to control standing no less than it is entitled to control the granting of declaratory orders sought in such actions. In short, the matter to me is one for the discretion of the Court, and relevant to this discretion is the nature of the legislation under attack.

Where regulatory legislation is the object of a claim of invalidity, being legislation which puts certain persons, or certain activities theretofore free of restraint, under a compulsory scheme to which such persons must adhere on pain of a penalty or a prohibitory order or nullification of a transaction in breach of the scheme, they may properly claim to be aggrieved or to have a tenable ground upon which to challenge the validity of the legislation. In such a situation, a mere taxpayer or other member of the public not directly affected by the legislation would have no standing to impugn it. Smith v. Attorney General of Ontario is this class of case. Disregarding for this purpose the significant point that the wrong Attorney General was sued, the correctness of the decision might be put in doubt if it be taken to hold that the amended Canada Temperance Act was immune from challenge by a declaratory action at the suit of either Smith or the Montreal firm which refused, because of the amended legislation, to fill Smith's liquor order and hence brought to a halt a proposed business relationship.

Why, in such a case, should Smith be disqualified as a plaintiff in a declaratory action and be compelled to violate the statute and risk prosecution in order to raise the question of its invalidity? The reasons of Duff J. mention this point but then dispose of it in the following passage, at p. 337 of [1924] S.C.R., quoted and relied upon by Houlden J.:

Much may be said, no doubt, for the view that an individual in the position of the appellant ought, without subjecting himself to a prosecution for a criminal offence, to have some means of raising the question of the legality of official acts imposing constraint upon him in his daily conduct which, on grounds not unreasonable, he thinks are unauthorized and illegal. We think, however, that to accede to appellant's contention upon this point would involve the consequence that virtually every resident of Ontario could maintain a similar action; and we can discover no firm ground on which the appellant's claim can be supported which would not be equally available to sustain the right of any citizen of a province to initiate proceedings impeaching the constitutional validity of any legislation directly affecting him, along with other citizens, in a similar way in his business or in his personal life.

We think the recognition of such a principle would lead to grave inconvenience and analogy is against it. An individual, for example, has no status to maintain an action restraining a wrongful violation of a public right unless he is exceptionally prejudiced by the wrongful act. It is true that in this court this rule has been relaxed in order to admit actions by ratepayers for restraining ultra vires expenditures by the governing bodies of municipalities; Maclreith v. Hart. We are not sure that the reasons capable of being advanced in support of this exception would not be just as pertinent as arguments in favour of the appellant's contention, but this exception does not rest upon any clearly defined principle, and we think it ought not to be extended.

On the whole we think the principle contended for, since it receives no sanction from legal analogy, and since it is open to serious objection as calculated to be attended by general inconvenience in practice, ought not to be adopted. But the question is an arguable one; and, as the merits of the appeal have been fully discussed, we are loath to give a judgment against the appellant solely based upon a fairly disputable point of procedure; and accordingly we think it right to say that in our opinion the appellant's action also fails in substance.

Much of the argument in the present appeal, especially in the submissions of the appellant, related to the significance of the assertion of Duff J., upon which Houlden J. grounded his decision and which I have already quoted, that "an individual, for example, has no right to maintain an action restraining a wrongful violation of a public right unless he is exceptionally prejudiced by the wrongful act." The plaintiff's contention was that, on the pleadings, taking the facts alleged as established for the purposes of a motion under R.124 (Ont.), he was within this proposition, and that he was not called upon to show that he was more exceptionally prejudiced than others who, like him, were also exceptionally prejudiced. Put another way, the submission is that the issue is not magnitude of the exceptional prejudice but merely whether it exists in the case of the plaintiff, albeit many others are under the same exceptional prejudice.

I am of the opinion that the foregoing statement of Duff J. cannot be torn from the context of case law and principle out of which it obviously arises, and that the submissions of the plaintiff become somewhat tortuous in seeking to parse the words "exceptional prejudice" as if they were disembodied terms of a statute. Although Duff J. cited no authority for his assertion, it is a derivation from English cases, relating to private attempts to enjoin a public nuisance. In this class of case, which involves no question of the constitutionality of legislation, there is a clear way in which the public interest can be guarded through the intervention of the Attorney General who would be sensitive to public complaint about an interference with public rights: see Wallasey Local Board v. Gracey [(1887), 36 Ch. 593]; Tottenham Urban District Council v. Williamson & Sons Ltd. [[1896] 2 Q.B. 353], Boyce v. Paddington Borough Council [[1903] 1 Ch. 109]. It is on this basis that the Courts have said that a private person who seeks relief from what is a nuisance to the public must show that he has a particular interest or will suffer an injury peculiar to himself if he would sue to enjoin it.

This is not a principle which is capable of wholesale transfer to a field of federal public law concerned with the distribution of legislative power between central and unit legislatures, and with the validity of the legislation of one or other of those two levels. There is no question in such a case of respecting legislative sovereignty, as in unitary Great Britain, but rather a question of whether Parliament or a Legislature has itself respected the limits of its authority under the Constitution.

The Official Languages Act is not a regulatory type of statute akin to the Canada Temperance Act which was involved in the Smith case. It is both declaratory and directory in respect of the use of English and French by and in federal authorities and agencies, including Courts, and in the provision of services to the public through communication in both languages by those authorities and agencies, whether in the national capital region, or at their head or central office elsewhere in Canada, or at each principal office in a federal bilingual district established under the Act. Administration of the Act is confided to a Commissioner of Official Languages who is charged to ensure recognition of the status of both official languages and compliance with the spirit and intent of the Act. He is authorized to inquire into complaints, to recommend remedial action after investigation of any complaint and to report to Parliament if appropriate remedial action is not taken. The Act creates no offences and imposes no penalties; there are no duties laid upon members of the public, although the public service may be said, broadly speaking, to be affected by the promotion of bilingualism in order that members of the public may be served and may communicate in both official languages. Public officials only might be exposed to prosecution under s. 115 of the Criminal Code.

The question of the constitutionality of legislation has in this country always been a justiciable question. Any attempt by Parliament or a Legislature to fix conditions precedent, as by way of requiring consent of some public officer or authority, to the determination of an issue of constitutionality of legislation cannot foreclose the Courts merely because the conditions remain unsatisfied: Electrical Development Co. of Ontario v. Attorney General of Ontario [[1919] A.C. 687], B.C. Power Corp. Ltd. v. B.C. Electric Co. Ltd. [[1962] S.C.R. 642]. Should they then foreclose themselves by drawing strict lines on standing, regardless of the nature of the legislation whose validity is questioned?

Short of a reference either to a provincial appellate Court by the Lieutenant Governor in Council or to this Court by the Governor General in Council, is there any other way in which the validity of a statute like the Official Languages Act can be determined in a judicial proceeding when the federal Attorney General has declined to act? Counsel for the respondents contended that a provincial Attorney General could take declaratory proceedings, but he could cite no authority for this proposition nor could I find any. However, want of authority is not an answer if principle supports the submission. I am unable to appreciate upon what principle this submission stands. Can it be said that one Attorney General of one Province is in any different position than any others of other Provinces, or is it suggested that an Attorney General class action be taken? Even if a provincial Attorney General might validly be authorized by provincial legislation to take such declaratory proceedings, I am unaware of any such legislation. As an ordinary common law matter, I do not think a provincial Attorney General is in as strong a position in a case such as the present one as is a federal taxpayer bringing a class action. The provincial Attorney General would be representing the public interest of his Province only, and, moreover, the invalidation of the Official Languages Act would not result in any accretion to, or vindicate any legislative power of the Province.

There is Australian authority to support a declaratory action by a State Attorney General to challenge the validity of Commonwealth legislation where that legislation amounts to an invasion of State legislative power: see Attorney General for Victoria v. The Commonwealth [(1946), 71 C.L.R. 237]. This, and other like cases cited therein, represent an adaptation to Australian federalism of the English position of the Attorney General as the guardian of public rights, those rights being the rights of the citizens of the State whom the State Attorney General represents. On the other hand, authority in the United States is to the contrary. In Massachusetts v. Mellon [(1923), 262 U.S. 447], a companion case to Frothingham v. Mellon considered below, the Supreme Court of the United States said this on the point (at p. 485):

It cannot be conceded that a State, as parens patriae, may institute judicial proceedings to protect citizens of the United States from the operation of the statutes thereof ... While the State, under some circumstances, may sue in that capacity for the protection of its citizens ... it is no part of its duty or power to enforce their rights in respect of their relations with the Federal Government.

The merit of the Australian position does not reach the present case because, as I have already noted, there is no invasion of provincial legislative power in the enactment of the Official Languages Act even assuming it to be unconstitutional; and the cited Australian case does not go so far as to support the right of a State Attorney General to challenge a mere Appropriation Act of the Commonwealth.

Counsel for the respondents also relied in this connection upon Reference re Subsections (1) (3) and (4) of S. 11 of the Official Languages Act, S. 23C of the New Brunswick Evidence Act and S. 14 of the New Brunswick Official Languages Act [(1972), 5 N.B.R. (2d) 653], which was a judgment of the New Brunswick Court of Appeal on a reference. There, one Leonard C. Jones applied successfully to the Court for leave to be joined as an interested party and to have all rights as a party including a right of appeal. This does not assist in the present case because a reference was refused by the federal authorities, and I do not think that a plaintiff is compelled to shop around for a reference by one of the ten provincial governments.

I come finally to the judgment of this Court in MacIlreith v. Hart [(1907), 39 S.C.R. 657]. In that case a municipal council had paid $231 to the mayor to reimburse him for his expenses in attending a municipal convention. A ratepayer of the municipality brought a class action against the mayor (the municipal council having refused to do so) for a declaration that the payment was illegal and that the sum in question should be returned by the mayor. There was at the time no authority for the municipal council to pay convention expenses. On the question whether a ratepayer's action lay, the trial judge dismissed the suit on the ground that the Attorney General was a necessary party. The Supreme Court of Nova Scotia en banc reversed, holding the action to be maintainable as brought, and this decision was affirmed by this Court.

Case law in Ontario has sanctioned such actions for a long time. The leading case is Paterson v. Bowes [(1853), 4 Gr. 170], and on the merits, sub nom Toronto v. Bowes [(1853), 4 Gr. 489 aff'd. (1856), 6 Gr. 1 aff'd. (1858), 11 Moo. P.C. 463; 14 E.R. 770]. The law in the United States is the same: see Crampton v. Zabriskie [(1879), 101 U.S. 601]. Paterson v. Bowes founded itself on Bromley v. Smith [(1826), 1 Sim. 8, 57 E.R. 482] which, on its facts, falls short of being in a strict sense a ratepayers' action to challenge an illegal municipal expenditure. It does not seem to have enjoyed any prominence in England, but there is more recent case law there which provides some support for the doctrine stated in Paterson v. Bowes: see Prescott v. Birmingham [[1955] Ch. 210]; and cf. Bradbury v. Enfield [[1967] 1 W.L.R. 1311]. There is also contrary authority in England: see Holden v. Bolton [(1887), 3 T.L.R. 676]; and in New Zealand: see Collins v. Lower Hutt City Corporation [[1961] N.Z.L.R. 25]. Professor de Smith rightly refers to the Prescott case as a weak authority because standing is approved there sub silentio and he says this on the subject (Judicial Review of Administrative Action (1968 2d ed.), at p. 479):

The state of the law is now thoroughly confused, and it is to be hoped that the House of Lords will soon have an opportunity to pronounce upon these matters. The assumption that to proclaim the ratepayer's locus standi in positive terms would let loose a torrent of ratepayers' actions is in fact mere conjecture. But if restrictive principles are to be cast aside, they should be cast aside unequivocally.

In those cases where the restrictive principle of requiring carriage of the suit by the Attorney General and denying any suit if the Attorney General refuses to act, has been cast aside, the rationale of the ratepayer's action has been explained in various ways, dependent, it seems to me, on the factual situation in the particular case. In Smith v. Bromley, where a limited number of householders of a parish were subject to rates imposed for the management and cultivation of certain allotments of enclosed waste lands over which rights of common existed, it was held that it was open to a dissident group to seek to reclaim a sum illegally paid out of the collected rates by the treasurer, albeit so paid with the approval of the majority. Sir John Leach V.C. said, briefly,

Where a matter is necessarily injurious to the common right the majority of the persons interested can neither excuse the wrong nor deprive all other parties of their remedy by suit.

The Attorney General may file an information in a case like this in respect of the public nature of the right; and the proceedings must be by the Attorney General when all persons interested are parties to the abuse; but where that is not the case, I am not aware of any principle or authority which makes it necessary that he should be before the Court.

Paterson v. Bowes spoke in terms of the interest of inhabitants (it was an inhabitants' class action rather than a ratepayers') to prevent a misapplication of funds which came from municipal rates, and it distinguished the case of the public nuisance. Analogy there to equity jurisdiction to hold a faithless agent to be trustee for his principal was based on the fact that the defendant mayor had obtained 10,000 pounds [Sterling] as a discount on the purchase for the city of debentures in the sum of 50,000 pounds [Sterling], and had retained the sum for his own use. The municipal council refused at first to act and it was only after the question of standing had been resolved in favour of the inhabitants who brought the action that the council agreed to be substituted as plaintiff. In Crampton v. Zabriskie, the Supreme Court of the United States said this of a taxpayer's suit against an illegal expenditure of money by a county:

Of the right of resident tax-payers to invoke the interposition of a court of equity to prevent an illegal disposition of the moneys of the county or the illegal creation of a debt which they in common with other property-holders of the county may otherwise be compelled to pay, there is at this day no serious question. The right has been recognized by the State courts in numerous cases; and from the nature of the powers exercised by municipal corporations, the great danger of their abuse and the necessity of prompt action to prevent irremediable injuries, it would seem eminently proper for courts of equity to interfere upon the application of the taxpayers of a county to prevent the consummation of a wrong, when the officers of those corporations assume, in excess of their powers, to create burdens upon property-holders. Certainly, in the absence of legislation restricting the right to interfere in such cases to public officers of the State or county, there would seem to be no substantial reason why a bill by or on behalf of individual taxpayers should not be entertained to prevent the misuse of corporate powers. The courts may be safely trusted to prevent the abuse of their process in such cases.

In the Smith case, as already noted, Duff J. regarded MacIlreith v. Hart as an exception from a general rule which did not rest upon any clearly defined principle. That was not the view of the Court, of which he was a member, which decided the case. He concurred in the reasons of Davies J. who founded himself on the principle of Paterson v. Bowes and who found reconciliation with English authority by concluding that ratepayers, who sue to vindicate a public right to have municipal money lawfully appropriated, suffer damage peculiar to themselves qua ratepayers in the increased rates they would have to pay by reason of illegal expenditures, even though the damage be small. Idington J. proceeded squarely on Paterson v. Bowes. So did MacLennan J. (with whom Fitzpatrick C.J. concurred) although he viewed that case as reflecting a trustee-beneficiary relationship between the municipality and its ratepayers. It is quite clear that obeisance to the special damage requirement was purely formal, and that at least equally important was the fact that ultra vires expenditures were involved which the municipal council was unwilling to reclaim.

If the Attorney General should also be unwilling to involve himself in a local municipal matter, that would end the affair unless standing was given to a ratepayer willing to bear the costs of an action to correct a wrong in municipal administration. This was the case in Bradford v. Municipality of Brisbane [[1901] Queensland L.J. 44], a judgment of Griffith C.J., where the Attorney General refused to interfere and a ratepayer was denied standing to enjoin an allegedly illegal municipal expenditure. I am unable to appreciate how an argument of principle can be made that such a wrong, an illegality which is certainly justiciable, should go uncorrected at law, whatever may eventuate as political redress.

For myself, I do not think that it was necessary to restrict the doctrine of MacIreith v. Hart in order to decide the Smith case as it was decided. Two entirely different situations were presented in those two cases. In the Smith case, a regulatory, even prohibitory, statute was in issue under which offences and penalties were prescribed; in MacIreith v. Hart, there was a public right involved which had no punitive aspects for any particular ratepayer or class of ratepayers, and it would beget wonder that, in such a case, there should be no judicial means of recovering or controlling an illegal expenditure of public money.

Assuming for the moment that MacIreith v. Hart approved a ratepayers' suit because of the communality of the relationship of persons in the city of Halifax (which had at the time a population of about 47,000) even though only $231 was involved, I do not see that the principle is any less valid in respect of a taxpayers' suit concerning Halifax in its present-day population of about 125,000, nor in respect of Metropolitan Toronto or Montreal, each of which has a population in excess of two million. The population of Metropolitan Toronto and of Montreal is greater than that of each of seven of the Provinces of Canada. If the principle of MacIreith v. Hart is applicable to municipal ratepayers' actions, why not to a provincial taxpayers' action to challenge the constitutionality of legislation involving expenditure of public money where no other means of challenge is open?

There is, of course, this difference between an illegal expenditure by a municipality or a public corporation and an allegedly illegal expenditure by a Province or by the Dominion. Neither the Province nor the Dominion is limited in expenditure by the considerations that apply to a municipality or to a corporation. The issue here is not simply one (as it seemed to be in Frothingham v. Mellon [(1923), 262 U.S. 447], discussed below) where the challenge is merely to an Appropriation Act. The main challenge is to the Official Languages Act, but, because it has been implemented by the appointment of a Commissioner of Official Languages and other staff, there is the ancillary reference to allegedly illegal expenditures made in respect of an unconstitutional object.

In the United States, a taxpayer class action in respect of an allegedly unconstitutional State expenditure is now generally maintainable: see Douglas J., concurring in Flast v. Cohen [(1968), 392 U.S. 83], at p. 108; Everson v. Board of Education [(1947), 330 U.S. 1]; and Doremus v. Board of Education [(1952), 342 U.S. 429]. However, until recently federal taxpayer suits to challenge unconstitutional federal expenditures had been denied. Frothingham v. Mellon, already cited, decided less than a year before the Smith case, had laid down the governing rule. The reasons invoke the same concern as did the Smith case about multiplicity of actions, inconvenience, and the fact that public and not special individual interest is involved and, in addition, rely on the separation of powers doctrine which is a more explicit matter in the United States than it is here. In the course of his reasons for the Court, Sutherland J. said this:

The right of a taxpayer to enjoin the execution of a federal appropriation act, on the ground that it is invalid and will result in taxation for illegal purposes, has never been passed upon by this Court. In cases where it was presented, the question has either been allowed to pass sub silentio or the determination of it expressly withheld....The interest of a taxpayer of a municipality in the application of its moneys is direct and immediate and the remedy by injunction to prevent their misuse is not inappropriate. It is upheld by a large number of state cases and is the rule of this Court. Crampton v. Zabriskie, 101 U.S. 601, 609. Nevertheless, there are decisions to the contrary. See, for example, Miller v. Grandy, 13 Mich. 540, 550. The reasons which support the extension of the equitable remedy to a single taxpayer in such cases are based upon the peculiar relation of the corporate taxpayer to the corporation, which is not without some resemblance to that subsisting between stockholder and private corporation. IV Dillon Municipal Corporations, 5th ed., s. 1580, et seq. But the relation of a taxpayer of the United States to the Federal Government is very different. His interest in the moneys of the Treasury--partly realized from taxation and partly from other sources--is shared with millions of others; is comparatively minute and indeterminable; and the effect upon future taxation, of any payment out of the funds, so remote, fluctuating and uncertain, that no basis is afforded for an appeal to the preventive powers of a court of equity.

There has been a considerable modification of Frothingham v. Mellon in the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Flast v. Cohen. There that Court held that a federal taxpayer suit may be pursued to challenge the constitutionality of a federal expenditure pursuant to the federal taxing and spending power where the challenge is also based on a specific constitutional limitation on the exercise of that power. In so far as United States decisions turn on the need for showing a justiciable "case or controversy", within Article III, section 2 of the American Constitution, or otherwise require a constitutional base to support standing by a federal taxpayer, they have no application to Canada. I note, in any event, a recent recession there from the "case of controversy" requirement: see Sierra Club v. Morton [(1972), 405 U.S. 727].

In my opinion, standing of a federal taxpayer seeking to challenge the constitutionality of federal legislation is a matter particularly appropriate for the exercise of judicial discretion, relating as it does to the effectiveness of process. Central to that discretion is the justiciability of the issue sought to be raised, a point that could be said to be involved (although the case was not decided on that basis) in Anderson v. Commonwealth [(1932), 47 C.L.R. 50], where the High Court of Australia denied standing to a member of the public to challenge the validity of an agreement between the Commonwealth and one of the States. Relevant as well is the nature of the legislation whose validity is challenged, according to whether it involves prohibitions or restrictions on any class or classes of persons who would thus be particularly affected by its terms beyond any effect upon the public at large. If it is legislation of that kind, the Court may decide, as it did in the Smith case, that a member of the public, and perhaps even one like Smith, is too remotely effected to be accorded standing. On the other hand, where all members of the public are affected alike, as in the present case, and there is a justiciable issue respecting the validity of legislation, the Court must be able to say that as between allowing a taxpayers' action and denying any standing at all when the Attorney General refuses to act, it may choose to hear the case on the merits.

In his reasons in the Smith case, Duff J. concluded his exposition on standing by the statement that "the question is an arguable one". I think that the argument for standing in the present case is fortified by analogy (which Duff J. thought was absent) to the cases on certiorari and prohibition which, even in a non-constitutional context, have admitted standing in a mere stranger to challenge jurisdictional excesses, although the granting of relief remains purely discretionary: see Wade, Administrative Law (3rd ed. 1971), at p. 138, pointing to the special public aspect of these remedies. Other analogies from English legal history depend on how far back in such history one is prepared to go. Lord Mansfield, for example, looked upon the writ of mandamus as a public remedy which "was introduced to prevent disorder from a failure of justice, and defect of police. Therefore it ought to be used upon all occasions where the law has established no specific remedy and where in justice and good government there ought to be one": Rex v. Barker [(1762), 3 Burr. 1265, at p. 1267, 97 E.R. 823, at pp. 824-825]. The expansion of the declaratory action, now well-established, would to me be at odds with a consequent denial of its effectiveness if the law will recognize no one with standing to sue in relation to an issue which is justiciable and which strikes directly at constitutional authority.

I recognize that any attempt to place standing in a federal taxpayer suit on the likely tax burden or debt resulting from an illegal expenditure, by analogy to one of the reasons given for allowing municipal taxpayers' suits, is as unreal as it is in the municipal taxpayer cases. Certainly, a federal taxpayer's interest may be no less than that of a municipal taxpayer in that respect. It is not the alleged waste of public funds alone that will support standing but rather the right of the citizenry to constitutional behaviour by Parliament where the issue in such behaviour is justiciable as a legal question.

In the present case, I would, as a matter of discretion, hold that the appellant should be allowed to proceed to have his suit determined on the merits. Accordingly, I would allow the appeal, set aside the judgments below and dismiss the motion of the respondents under R.124. The appellant should have his costs throughout.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Between Trendsetter Developments Limited, Assaly Capital Corporation, Plaintiffs (Appellants), and Ottawa Financial Corporation, In Trust, Defendant (Respondent)

Case Summary

Practice — Pleadings — Striking out — No reasonable cause of action — Appeals — No evidence to be considered — Facts pleaded deemed to be true — Ontario Rules of Civil Procedure, R. 21.01(1)(b).

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs against an order allowing the defendant's motion to strike out the statement of claim as disclosing no reasonable cause of action. The plaintiff mortgagor brought an action and a preliminary motion thereto seeking an interlocutory injunction to restrain the defendant mortgagee from selling the subject property. The defendant's motion to strike and the plaintiff's motion for the injunction were heard at the same time. The judge allowed the defendant's motion.

HELD: The appeal was allowed.

The motions judge erred in striking out the plaintiff's statement of claim based on the evidence lead in the interlocutory injunction motion. Rule 21.01(1)(b) of the Ontario Rules of Civil Procedure provided that no evidence was admissible in a motion to strike pleadings under that rule. Under that rule only the sufficiency in law of the pleading could be attacked. The plaintiff's pleadings did disclose a reasonable cause of action if the facts, as pleaded, were accepted as true.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

CATZMAN J.A. (orally)

CATZMAN J.A. (orally):— This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from an order made by a weekly court judge in Ottawa granting a motion by the defendant pursuant to rule 21.01(1)(b) of the Rules of Civil Procedure to strike out the statement of claim in this action on the ground that it discloses no reasonable cause of action.

The motion was heard, and disposed of, contemporaneously with a motion by the plaintiffs for an interlocutory injunction restraining the sale of the property of which the plaintiffs were the owners and the defendant was the mortgagee.

From the recitals in the order under appeal and the reasons given in the endorsement of the weekly court judge, it appears that he struck out the statement of claim and dismissed the action by reference to his determination of issues which were raised before him on the interlocutory injunction motion and to the evidence which was before him in connection with that motion.

In our respectful view, he erred in so doing. Rule 21.01(2) (b) provides that no evidence is admissible on a motion to strike out a pleading under rule 21.01(1)(b). The reason why no evidence is admissible is that the only issue on such a motion is the sufficiency in law of the pleading attacked: Holmested and Watson, Ontario Civil Procedure, vol.1, para. 21, s. 3. Accordingly, it was not open to the weekly court judge to take into account, in disposing of the motion to strike out the statement of claim, his determination of issues on the interlocutory injunction motion and the evidence before him in connection with that motion.

The law is well established that, on a motion to strike out a statement of claim as disclosing no reasonable cause of action, all the facts pleaded in the statement of claim must be deemed to have been proven, and the court should make the order only in plain and obvious cases which it is satisfied to be beyond doubt. This is not such a case. In our view, it cannot be said on a reading of the statement of claim in this action that the facts alleged with respect to interest and the alleged contravention of statutory provisions regarding the stipulation of interest disclose no reasonable cause of action.

Accordingly, we would allow the appeal, set aside the order under appeal, and dismiss the defendant's motion to strike out the statement of claim. The costs of the appeal, of the defendant's unsuccessful motion to quash the appeal, and of the motion before the weekly court judge shall be costs in the cause.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA

Case Summary

Catchwords:

Constitutional law — Charter of Rights — Enforcement — Damage award as remedy for breach of rights — Quantum — Claimant strip searched and his car seized in violation of his constitutional rights — Whether claimant entitled to damages as remedy under s. 24(1) of [page29] Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms — If so, how should quantum of damages be assessed.

Summary:

During a ceremony in Vancouver, the city police department received information that an unknown individual intended to throw a pie at the Prime Minister who was in attendance. Based on his appearance, police officers mistakenly identified W as the would-be pie-thrower, chased him down and handcuffed him. W, who loudly protested his detention and created a disturbance, was arrested for breach of the peace and taken to the police lockup. Upon his arrival, the corrections officers conducted a strip search. While W was at the lockup, police officers impounded his car for the purpose of searching it once a search warrant had been obtained. The detectives subsequently determined that they did not have grounds to obtain the required search warrant or evidence to charge W for attempted assault. W was released approximately 4.5 hours after his arrest. He brought an action in tort and for breach of his rights guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms against several parties, including the Province and the City. With respect to the strip search and the car seizure, the trial judge held that, although the Province and the City did not act in bad faith and were not liable in tort for either incident, the Province's strip search and the City's vehicle seizure violated W's right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure under s. 8 of the Charter. The trial judge assessed damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter at $100 for the seizure of the car and $5,000 for the strip search. The Court of Appeal, in a majority decision, upheld the trial judge's ruling.

Held: The appeal should be allowed in part.

The language of s. 24(1) is broad enough to include the remedy of constitutional damages for breach of a claimant's Charter rights if such remedy is found to be appropriate and just in the circumstances of a particular case. The first step in the inquiry is to establish that a Charter right has been breached; the second step is to show why damages are a just and appropriate remedy, having regard to whether they would fulfill one or more of the related functions of compensation, vindication of the right, and/or deterrence of future breaches.

Once the claimant has established that damages are functionally justified, the state has the opportunity to demonstrate, at the third step, that countervailing factors defeat the functional considerations that support a damage award and render damages inappropriate or unjust. Countervailing considerations include the existence of alternative remedies. Claimants need not show that they have exhausted all other recourses. Rather, it is for the state to show that other remedies including private law remedies or another Charter remedy are available in the particular case that will sufficiently address the Charter breach. Concern for effective governance may also negate the appropriateness of s. 24(1) damages. In some situations, the state may establish that an award of Charter damages would interfere with good governance such that damages should not be awarded unless the state conduct meets a minimum threshold of gravity.

If the state fails to negate that the award is "appropriate and just", the final step is to assess the quantum of the damages. To be "appropriate and just", an award of damages must represent a meaningful response to the seriousness of the breach and the objectives of s. 24(1) damages. Where the objective of compensation is engaged, the concern is to restore the claimant to the position he or she would have been in had the breach not been committed. With the objectives of vindication and deterrence, the appropriate determination is an exercise in rationality and proportionality. Generally, the more egregious the breach and the more serious the repercussions on the claimant, the higher the award for vindication or deterrence will be. In the end, s. 24(1) damages must be fair to both the claimant and the state. In considering what is fair to both, a court may take into account the public interest in good governance, the danger of deterring governments from undertaking beneficial new policies and programs, and the need to avoid diverting large sums of funds from public programs to private interests. Damages under s. 24(1) should also not duplicate damages awarded under private law causes of action, such as tort, where compensation of personal loss is at issue.

Here, damages were properly awarded for the strip search of W. This search violated his s. 8 Charter rights and compensation is required, in this case, to functionally fulfill the objects of constitutional damages. Strip searches are inherently humiliating and degrading and the Charter breach significantly impacted on W's person and rights. The correction officers' conduct which caused the breach was also serious. Minimum sensitivity to Charter concerns within the context of the particular situation would have shown the search to be unnecessary and violative. Combined with the police conduct, the impingement on W also engages the objects of vindication of the right and deterrence of future breaches. The state did not establish countervailing factors and damages should be awarded for the breach. Considering the seriousness of the injury and the finding that the corrections officers' actions were not intentional, malicious, high-handed or oppressive, the trial judge's $5,000 damage award was appropriate.

With respect to the seizure of the car, W has not established that damages under s. 24(1) are appropriate and just from a functional perspective. The object of compensation is not engaged as W did not suffer any injury as a result of the seizure. Nor are the objects of vindication of the right and deterrence of future breaches compelling. While the seizure was wrong, it was not of a serious nature. A declaration under s. 24(1) that the vehicle seizure violated W's right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure under s. 8 of the Charter adequately serves the need for vindication of the right and deterrence of future improper car seizures.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

McLACHLIN C.J.

I. Introduction

1 The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the fundamental rights and freedoms of all Canadians and provides remedies for their breach. The first and most important remedy is the nullification of laws that violate the Charter under s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. This is supplemented by s. 24(2), under which evidence obtained in breach of the Charter may be excluded if its admission would bring the administration of justice into disrepute, and s. 24(1) - the provision at issue in this case - under which the court is authorized to grant such remedies to individuals [page34] for infringement of Charter rights as it "considers appropriate and just in the circumstances".

2 The respondent Ward's Charter rights were violated by Vancouver and British Columbia officials who detained him, strip searched his person and seized his car without cause. The trial judge awarded Mr. Ward damages for the Charter breaches, and the majority of the Court of Appeal of British Columbia upheld that award.

3 This appeal raises the question of when damages may be awarded under s. 24(1) of the Charter, and what the amount of such damages should be. Although the Charter is 28 years old, authority on this question is sparse, inviting a comprehensive analysis of the object of damages for Charter breaches and the considerations that guide their award.

4 I conclude that damages may be awarded for Charter breach under s. 24(1) where appropriate and just. The first step in the inquiry is to establish that a Charter right has been breached. The second step is to show why damages are a just and appropriate remedy, having regard to whether they would fulfill one or more of the related functions of compensation, vindication of the right, and/or deterrence of future breaches. At the third step, the state has the opportunity to demonstrate, if it can, that countervailing factors defeat the functional considerations that support a damage award and render damages inappropriate or unjust. The final step is to assess the quantum of the damages.

5 I conclude that damages were properly awarded for the strip search of Mr. Ward, but not justified for the seizure of his car. I would therefore allow the appeal in part.

II. Facts

6 On August 1, 2002, Prime Minister Chrétien participated in a ceremony to mark the opening of a gate at the entrance to Vancouver's Chinatown. During the ceremony, the Vancouver Police Department ("VPD") received information that an unknown individual intended to throw a pie at the Prime Minister, an event that had occurred elsewhere two years earlier. The suspected individual was described as a white male, 30 to 35 years, 5' 9", with dark short hair, wearing a white golf shirt or T-shirt with some red on it.

7 Mr. Ward is a Vancouver lawyer who attended the August 1 ceremony. On the day, Mr. Ward, a white male, had grey, collar-length hair, was in his mid-40s and was wearing a grey T-shirt with some red on it. Based on his appearance, Mr. Ward was identified - mistakenly - as the would-be pie-thrower. When the VPD officers noticed him, Mr. Ward was running and appeared to be avoiding interception. The officers chased Mr. Ward down and handcuffed him. Mr. Ward loudly protested his detention and created a disturbance, drawing the attention of a local television camera crew. The television broadcast showed that Mr. Ward had a "very agitated look on his face", "appeared to be yelling for the benefit of the onlookers" and was "holding back" as he was being escorted down the street.

8 Mr. Ward was arrested for breach of the peace and taken to the police lockup in Vancouver, which was under the partial management of provincial corrections officers. Upon his arrival, the corrections officers instructed Mr. Ward to remove all his clothes in preparation for a strip search. Mr. Ward complied in part but refused to take off his underwear. The officers did not insist on complete removal and Mr. Ward was never touched during the search. After the search was completed, Mr. Ward was placed in a small cell where he spent several hours before being released.

9 While Mr. Ward was at the lockup, VPD officers impounded his car for the purpose of searching it once a search warrant had been obtained. VPD detectives subsequently determined that they did not have grounds to obtain the required search warrant or evidence to charge Mr. Ward for attempted assault. Mr. Ward was released from the lockup approximately 4.5 hours after he was arrested and several hours after the Prime Minister had left Chinatown following the ceremony.

III. Judicial History

A. Supreme Court of British Columbia, 2007 BCSC 3, 63 B.C.L.R. (4th) 361

10 Mr. Ward brought an action in tort and for breach of his Charter rights against the City, the Province, and individual police and corrections officers for his arrest, detention, strip search, and car seizure. Justice Tysoe found Mr. Ward's arrest for breach of the peace to be lawful and dismissed the action against the individual police and corrections officers. However, Tysoe J. held that - although they did not act in bad faith and were not liable in tort for either incident - the Province's strip search and the City's vehicle seizure violated Mr. Ward's right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure under s. 8 of the Charter. In addition, Tysoe J. found that the City breached Mr. Ward's rights under s. 9 of the Charter and committed the tort of wrongful imprisonment by keeping Mr. Ward in the police lockup longer than necessary.

11 Tysoe J. assessed damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter at $100 for the seizure of the car and $5,000 for the strip search. He rejected the governments' argument that damages were an inappropriate remedy for Charter breaches absent bad faith, abuse of power, or tortious conduct. In addition, [page37] Tysoe J. awarded $5,000 in damages for the wrongful imprisonment. This award is not at issue on this appeal.

B. British Columbia Court of Appeal, 2009 BCCA 23, 89 B.C.L.R. (4th) 217

12 Justice Low, Finch C.J.B.C. concurring, upheld Tysoe J.'s ruling, agreeing with Mr. Ward that bad faith, abuse of power, or tortious conduct are not necessary requirements for the awarding of Charter damages.

13 Justice Saunders, dissenting, would have allowed the Province and City appeals, holding that damages cannot be awarded where the police did not act in bad faith and simply made a mistake as to the proper course of action.

IV. Constitutional Provisions

14 Section 24(1) of the Charter provides as follows:

Anyone whose rights or freedoms, as guaranteed by this Charter, have been infringed or denied may apply to a court of competent jurisdiction to obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances.

V. Issues15 The issues are the following:

A. When are damages under s. 24(1) available?

1. The language of s. 24(1) and the nature of Charter damages;
2. Step one: Proof of a Charter breach;
3. Step two: Functional justification of damages;

[page38]

4. Step three: Countervailing factors;
5. Step four: Quantum of s. 24(1) damages;
6. Forum and procedure.

B. Application to the Facts

1. Damages for the strip search;
2. Damages for the car seizure.

VI. AnalysisA. When Are Damages Under Section 24(1) Available?(1) The Language of Section 24(1) and the Nature of Charter Damages

16 Section 24(1) empowers courts of competent jurisdiction to grant "appropriate and just" remedies for Charter breaches. This language invites a number of observations.

17 First, the language of the grant is broad. As McIntyre J. observed, "[i]t is difficult to imagine language which could give the court a wider and less fettered discretion": Mills v. The Queen, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 863, at p. 965. The judge of "competent jurisdiction" has broad discretion to determine what remedy is appropriate and just in the circumstances of a particular case.

18 Second, it is improper for courts to reduce this discretion by casting it in a strait-jacket of judicially prescribed conditions. To quote McIntyre J. in Mills once more, "[i]t is impossible to reduce this wide discretion to some sort of binding formula for general application in all cases, and it is not for appellate courts to pre-empt or cut down this wide discretion": Mills, at p. 965.

19 Third, the prohibition on cutting down the ambit of s. 24(1) does not preclude judicial clarification of when it may be "appropriate and just" to award damages. The phrase "appropriate and just" limits what remedies are available. The court's discretion, while broad, is not unfettered. What is appropriate and just will depend on the facts and circumstances of the particular case. Prior cases may offer guidance on what is appropriate and just in a particular situation.

20 The general considerations governing what constitutes an appropriate and just remedy under s. 24(1) were set out by Iacobucci and Arbour JJ. in Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), 2003 SCC 62, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 3. Briefly, an appropriate and just remedy will: (1) meaningfully vindicate the rights and freedoms of the claimants; (2) employ means that are legitimate within the framework of our constitutional democracy; (3) be a judicial remedy which vindicates the right while invoking the function and powers of a court; and (4) be fair to the party against whom the order is made: Doucet-Boudreau, at paras. 55-58.

21 Damages for breach of a claimant's Charter rights may meet these conditions. They may meaningfully vindicate the claimant's rights and freedoms. They employ a means well-recognized within our legal framework. They are appropriate to the function and powers of a court. And, depending on the circumstances and the amount awarded, they can be fair not only to the claimant whose rights were breached, but to the state which is required to pay them. I therefore conclude that s. 24(1) is broad enough to include the remedy of damages for Charter breach. That said, granting damages under the Charter is a new endeavour, and an approach to when damages are appropriate and just should develop incrementally. Charter damages are only one remedy amongst others available under s. 24(1), and often other [page40] s. 24(1) remedies will be more responsive to the breach.

22 The term "damages" conveniently describes the remedy sought in this case. However, it should always be borne in mind that these are not private law damages, but the distinct remedy of constitutional damages. As Thomas J. notes in Dunlea v. Attorney-General, [2000] NZCA 84, [2000] 3 N.Z.L.R. 136, at para. 81, a case dealing with New Zealand's Bill of Rights Act 1990, an action for public law damages "is not a private law action in the nature of a tort claim for which the state is vicariously liable but [a distinct] public law action directly against the state for which the state is primarily liable". In accordance with s. 32 of the Charter, this is equally so in the Canadian constitutional context. The nature of the remedy is to require the state (or society writ large) to compensate an individual for breaches of the individual's constitutional rights. An action for public law damages - including constitutional damages - lies against the state and not against individual actors. Actions against individual actors should be pursued in accordance with existing causes of action. However, the underlying policy considerations that are engaged when awarding private law damages against state actors may be relevant when awarding public law damages directly against the state. Such considerations may be appropriately kept in mind.

(2) Step One: Proof of a Charter Breach

23 Section 24(1) is remedial. The first step, therefore, is to establish a Charter breach. This is the wrong on which the claim for damages is based.

(3) Step Two: Functional Justification of Damages

24 A functional approach to damages finds damages to be appropriate and just to the extent that they serve a useful function or purpose. This approach has been adopted in awarding non-pecuniary damages in personal injury cases (Andrews v. Grand & Toy Alberta Ltd., [1978] 2 S.C.R. 229), and, in my view, a similar approach is appropriate in determining when damages are "appropriate and just" under s. 24(1) of the Charter.

25 I therefore turn to the purposes that an order for damages under s. 24(1) may serve. For damages to be awarded, they must further the general objects of the Charter. This reflects itself in three interrelated functions that damages may serve. The function of compensation, usually the most prominent function, recognizes that breach of an individual's Charter rights may cause personal loss which should be remedied. The function of vindication recognizes that Charter rights must be maintained, and cannot be allowed to be whittled away by attrition. Finally, the function of deterrence recognizes that damages may serve to deter future breaches by state actors.

26 These functions of s. 24(1) damages are supported by foreign constitutional jurisprudence and, by analogy, foreign jurisprudence arising in the statutory human rights context.

27 Compensation has been cited by Lord Woolf C.J. (speaking of the European Convention of Human Rights) as "fundamental". In most cases, it is the most prominent of the three functions that Charter damages may serve. The goal is to compensate the claimant for the loss caused by the Charter breach; "[t]he applicant should, in so far as this is possible, be placed in the same position as if his Convention rights had not been infringed": [page42] Anufrijeva v. Southwark London Borough Council, [2003] EWCA Civ 1406, [2004] Q.B. 1124, at para. 59, per Lord Woolf C.J. Compensation focuses on the claimant's personal loss: physical, psychological and pecuniary. To these types of loss must be added harm to the claimant's intangible interests. In the public law damages context, courts have variously recognized this harm as distress, humiliation, embarrassment, and anxiety: Dunlea; Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971); Taunoa v. Attorney-General, [2007] NZSC 70, [2008] 1 N.Z.L.R. 429. Often the harm to intangible interests effected by a breach of rights will merge with psychological harm. But a resilient claimant whose intangible interests are harmed should not be precluded from recovering damages simply because she cannot prove a substantial psychological injury.

28 Vindication, in the sense of affirming constitutional values, has also been recognized as a valid object of damages in many jurisdictions: see Fose v. Minister of Safety and Security, 1997 (3) SA 786 (C.C.), at para. 55, for a summary of the international jurisprudence. Vindication focuses on the harm the infringement causes society. As Didcott J. observed in Fose, violations of constitutionally protected rights harm not only their particular victims, but society as a whole. This is because they "impair public confidence and diminish public faith in the efficacy of the [constitutional] protection": Fose, at para. 82. While one may speak of vindication as underlining the seriousness of the harm done to the claimant, vindication as an object of constitutional damages focuses on the harm the Charter breach causes to the state and to society.

29 Finally, deterrence of future breaches of the right has also been widely recognized as a valid object of public law damages: e.g., Attorney General of Trinidad and Tobago v. Ramanoop, [2005] UKPC 15, [2006] 1 A.C. 328, at para. 19; Taunoa, at para. 259; Fose, at para. 96; Smith v. Wade, 461 U.S. 30 (1983), at p. 49. Deterrence, like vindication, has a societal purpose. Deterrence seeks to regulate government behaviour, generally, in order to achieve compliance with the Constitution. This purpose is similar to the criminal sentencing object of "general deterrence", which holds that the example provided by the punishment imposed on a particular offender will dissuade potential criminals from engaging in criminal activity. When general deterrence is factored in the determination of the sentence, the offender is punished more severely, not because he or she deserves it, but because the court decides to send a message to others who may be inclined to engage in similar criminal activity: R. v. B.W.P., 2006 SCC 27, [2006] 1 S.C.R. 941. Similarly, deterrence as an object of Charter damages is not aimed at deterring the specific wrongdoer, but rather at influencing government behaviour in order to secure state compliance with the Charter in the future.

30 In most cases, all three objects will be present. Harm to the claimant will evoke the need for compensation. Vindication and deterrence will support the compensatory function and bolster the appropriateness of an award of damages. However, the fact that the claimant has not suffered personal loss does not preclude damages where the objectives of vindication or deterrence clearly call for an award. Indeed, the view that constitutional damages are available only for pecuniary or physical loss has been widely rejected in other constitutional democracies: see, e.g., Anufrijeva; Fose; Taunoa; Smith; and Ramanoop.

31 In summary, damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter are a unique public law remedy, which [page44] may serve the objectives of: (1) compensating the claimant for loss and suffering caused by the breach; (2) vindicating the right by emphasizing its importance and the gravity of the breach; and (3) deterring state agents from committing future breaches. Achieving one or more of these objects is the first requirement for "appropriate and just" damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter.

(4) Step Three: Countervailing Factors

32 As discussed, the basic requirement for the award of damages to be "appropriate and just" is that the award must be functionally required to fulfill one or more of the objects of compensation, vindication of the right, or deterrence of future Charter breaches.

33 However, even if the claimant establishes that damages are functionally justified, the state may establish that other considerations render s. 24(1) damages inappropriate or unjust. A complete catalogue of countervailing considerations remains to be developed as the law in this area matures. At this point, however, two considerations are apparent: the existence of alternative remedies and concerns for good governance.

34 A functional approach to damages under s. 24(1) means that if other remedies adequately meet the need for compensation, vindication and/or deterrence, a further award of damages under s. 24(1) would serve no function and would not be "appropriate and just". The Charter entered an existent remedial arena which already housed tools to correct violative state conduct. Section 24(1) operates concurrently with, and does not replace, these areas of law. Alternative remedies include private law remedies for actions for personal injury, other Charter remedies like declarations [page45] under s. 24(1), and remedies for actions covered by legislation permitting proceedings against the Crown.

35 The claimant must establish basic functionality having regard to the objects of constitutional damages. The evidentiary burden then shifts to the state to show that the engaged functions can be fulfilled through other remedies. The claimant need not show that she has exhausted all other recourses. Rather, it is for the state to show that other remedies are available in the particular case that will sufficiently address the breach. For example, if the claimant has brought a concurrent action in tort, it is open to the state to argue that, should the tort claim be successful, the resulting award of damages would adequately address the Charter breach. If that were the case, an award of Charter damages would be duplicative. In addition, it is conceivable that another Charter remedy may, in a particular case, fulfill the function of Charter damages.

36 The existence of a potential claim in tort does not therefore bar a claimant from obtaining damages under the Charter. Tort law and the Charter are distinct legal avenues. However, a concurrent action in tort, or other private law claim, bars s. 24(1) damages if the result would be double compensation: Simpson v. Attorney-General, [1994] 3 N.Z.L.R. 667 (C.A.), at p. 678.

37 Declarations of Charter breach may provide an adequate remedy for the Charter breach, particularly where the claimant has suffered no personal damage. Considering declarations in Taunoa, at para. 368, McGrath J. writes:

The court's finding of a breach of rights and a declaration to that effect will often not only be appropriate relief but may also in itself be a sufficient remedy in the circumstances to vindicate a plaintiff's right. That will often be the case where no damage has been suffered that would give rise to a claim under private causes of action and, in the circumstances, if there is no need to deter persons in the position of the public officials from behaving in a similar way in the future. If in all the circumstances the court's pronouncement that there has been a breach of rights is a sufficiently appropriate remedy to vindicate the right and afford redress then, subject to any questions of costs, that will be sufficient to meet the primary remedial objective.

38 Another consideration that may negate the appropriateness of s. 24(1) damages is concern for effective governance. Good governance concerns may take different forms. At one extreme, it may be argued that any award of s. 24(1) damages will always have a chilling effect on government conduct, and hence will impact negatively on good governance. The logical conclusion of this argument is that s. 24(1) damages would never be appropriate. Clearly, this is not what the Constitution intends. Moreover, insofar as s. 24(1) damages deter Charter breaches, they promote good governance. Compliance with Charter standards is a foundational principle of good governance.

39 In some situations, however, the state may establish that an award of Charter damages would interfere with good governance such that damages should not be awarded unless the state conduct meets a minimum threshold of gravity. This was the situation in Mackin v. New Brunswick (Minister of Finance), 2002 SCC 13, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 405, where the claimant sought damages for state conduct pursuant to a valid statute. The Court held that the action must be struck on the ground that duly enacted laws should be enforced until declared invalid, unless the state conduct under the law was "clearly wrong, in bad faith or an abuse of power": [page47] para. 78. The rule of law would be undermined if governments were deterred from enforcing the law by the possibility of future damage awards in the event the law was, at some future date, to be declared invalid. Thus, absent threshold misconduct, an action for damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter cannot be combined with an action for invalidity based on s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982: Mackin, at para. 81.

40 The Mackin principle recognizes that the state must be afforded some immunity from liability in damages resulting from the conduct of certain functions that only the state can perform. Legislative and policy-making functions are one such area of state activity. The immunity is justified because the law does not wish to chill the exercise of policy-making discretion. As Gonthier J. explained:

The limited immunity given to government is specifically a means of creating a balance between the protection of constitutional rights and the need for effective government. In other words, this doctrine makes it possible to determine whether a remedy is appropriate and just in the circumstances. Consequently, the reasons that inform the general principle of public law are also relevant in a Charter context. [para. 79]

41 The government argues that the Mackin principle applies in this case, and, in the absence of state conduct that is at least "clearly wrong", bars Mr. Ward's claim. I cannot accept this submission. Mackin stands for the principle that state action taken under a statute which is subsequently declared invalid will not give rise to public law damages because good governance requires that public officials carry out their duties under valid statutes without fear of liability in the event that the statute is later struck down. The present is not a situation of state action pursuant to a valid statute that was subsequently declared invalid. Nor is the rationale animating the Mackin principle - that duly enacted laws should be enforced until [page48] declared invalid - applicable in the present situation. Thus, the Mackin immunity does not apply to this case.

42 State conduct pursuant to a valid statute may not be the only situation in which the state might seek to show that s. 24(1) damages would deter state agents from doing what is required for effective governance, although no others have been established in this case. It may be that in the future other situations may be recognized where the appropriateness of s. 24(1) damages could be negated on grounds of effective governance.

43 Such concerns may find expression, as the law in this area matures, in various defences to s. 24(1) claims. Mackin established a defence of immunity for state action under valid statutes subsequently declared invalid, unless the state conduct is "clearly wrong, in bad faith or an abuse of power" (para. 78). If and when other concerns under the rubric of effective governance emerge, these may be expected to give rise to analogous public law defences. By analogy to Mackin and the private law, where the state establishes that s. 24(1) damages raise governance concerns, it would seem a minimum threshold, such as clear disregard for the claimant's Charter rights, may be appropriate. Different situations may call for different thresholds, as is the case at private law. Malicious prosecution, for example, requires that "malice" be proven because of the highly discretionary and quasi-judicial role of prosecutors (Miazga v. Kvello Estate, 2009 SCC 51, [2009] 3 S.C.R. 339), while negligent police investigation, which does not involve the same quasi-judicial decisions as to guilt or innocence or the evaluation of evidence according to legal standards, contemplates the lower "negligence" standard (Hill v. Hamilton-Wentworth Regional Police Services Board, 2007 SCC 41, [2007] 3 S.C.R. 129). When appropriate, private law thresholds and defences may offer guidance in determining whether s. 24(1) damages would be "appropriate and just". While [page49] the threshold for liability under the Charter must be distinct and autonomous from that developed under private law, the existing causes of action against state actors embody a certain amount of "practical wisdom" concerning the type of situation in which it is or is not appropriate to make an award of damages against the state. Similarly, it may be necessary for the court to consider the procedural requirements of alternative remedies. Procedural requirements associated with existing remedies are crafted to achieve a proper balance between public and private interests, and the underlying policy considerations of these requirements should not be negated by recourse to s. 24(1) of the Charter. As stated earlier, s. 24(1) operates concurrently with, and does not replace, the general law. These are complex matters which have not been explored on this appeal. I therefore leave the exact parameters of future defences to future cases.

44 I find it useful to add a comment on the judgment of our Court in Béliveau St-Jacques v. Fédération des employées et employés de services publics inc., [1996] 2 S.C.R. 345. Béliveau St-Jacques is not determinative of the availability of the public law remedy of damages under s. 24(1). The judgment raised specific issues concerning the interpretation of ss. 49 and 51 of the Quebec Charter of human rights and freedoms, R.S.Q., c. C-12, and its interaction with the statutory regime set up under the Act respecting industrial accidents and occupational diseases, R.S.Q., c. A-3.001.

45 If the claimant establishes breach of his Charter rights and shows that an award of damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter would serve a functional purpose, having regard to the objects of s. 24(1) damages, and the state fails to negate that [page50] the award is "appropriate and just", the final step is to determine the appropriate amount of the damages.

(5) Step Four: Quantum of Section 24(1) Damages

46 The watchword of s. 24(1) is that the remedy must be "appropriate and just". This applies to the amount, or quantum, of damages awarded as much as to the initial question of whether damages are a proper remedy.

47 As discussed earlier, damages may be awarded to compensate the claimant for his loss, to vindicate the right or to deter future violations of the right. These objects, the presence and force of which vary from case to case, determine not only whether damages are appropriate, but also the amount of damages awarded. Generally, compensation will be the most important object, and vindication and deterrence will play supporting roles. This is all the more so because other Charter remedies may not provide compensation for the claimant's personal injury resulting from the violation of his Charter rights. However, as discussed earlier, cases may arise where vindication or deterrence play a major and even exclusive role.

48 Where the objective of compensation is engaged, the concern is to restore the claimant to the position she would have been in had the breach not been committed, as discussed above. As in a tort action, any claim for compensatory damages must be supported by evidence of the loss suffered.

49 In some cases, the Charter breach may cause the claimant pecuniary loss. Injuries, physical and psychological, may require medical treatment, with attendant costs. Prolonged detention may result in [page51] loss of earnings. Restitutio in integrum requires compensation for such financial losses.

50 In other cases, like this one, the claimant's losses will be non-pecuniary. Non-pecuniary damages are harder to measure. Yet they are not by that reason to be rejected. Again, tort law provides assistance. Pain and suffering are compensable. Absent exceptional circumstances, compensation is fixed at a fairly modest conventional rate, subject to variation for the degree of suffering in the particular case. In extreme cases of catastrophic injury, a higher but still conventionally determined award is given on the basis that it serves the function purpose of providing substitute comforts and pleasures: Andrews v. Grand & Toy.

51 When we move from compensation to the objectives of vindication and deterrence, tort law is less useful. Making the appropriate determinations is an exercise in rationality and proportionality and will ultimately be guided by precedent as this important chapter of Charter jurisprudence is written by Canada's courts. That said, some initial observations may be made.

52 A principal guide to the determination of quantum is the seriousness of the breach, having regard to the objects of s. 24(1) damages. The seriousness of the breach must be evaluated with regard to the impact of the breach on the claimant and the seriousness of the state misconduct: see, in the context of s. 24(2), R. v. Grant, 2009 SCC 32, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 353. Generally speaking, the more egregious the conduct and the more serious the repercussions on the claimant, the higher the award for vindication or deterrence will be.

53 Just as private law damages must be fair to both the plaintiff and the defendant, so s. 24(1) damages must be fair - or "appropriate and [page52] just" - to both the claimant and the state. The court must arrive at a quantum that respects this. Large awards and the consequent diversion of public funds may serve little functional purpose in terms of the claimant's needs and may be inappropriate or unjust from the public perspective. In considering what is fair to the claimant and the state, the court may take into account the public interest in good governance, the danger of deterring governments from undertaking beneficial new policies and programs, and the need to avoid diverting large sums of funds from public programs to private interests.

54 Courts in other jurisdictions where an award of damages for breach of rights is available have generally been careful to avoid unduly high damage awards. This may reflect the difficulty of assessing what is required to vindicate the right and deter future breaches, as well as the fact that it is society as a whole that is asked to compensate the claimant. Nevertheless, to be "appropriate and just", an award of damages must represent a meaningful response to the seriousness of the breach and the objectives of compensation, upholding Charter values, and deterring future breaches. The private law measure of damages for similar wrongs will often be a useful guide. However, as Lord Nicholls warns in Ramanoop, at para. 18, "this measure is no more than a guide because ... the violation of the constitutional right will not always be coterminous with the cause of action at law".

55 In assessing s. 24(1) damages, the court must focus on the breach of Charter rights as an independent wrong, worthy of compensation in its own right. At the same time, damages under s. 24(1) should not duplicate damages awarded under [page53] private law causes of action, such as tort, where compensation of personal loss is at issue.

56 A final word on exemplary or punitive damages. In Mackin, Justice Gonthier speculated that "[i]n theory, a plaintiff could seek compensatory and punitive damages by way of 'appropriate and just' remedy under s. 24(1) of the Charter": para. 79. The reality is that public law damages, in serving the objects of vindication and deterrence, may assume a punitive aspect. Nevertheless, it is worth noting a general reluctance in the international community to award purely punitive damages: see Taunoa, at paras. 319-21.

57 To sum up, the amount of damages must reflect what is required to functionally serve the objects of compensation, vindication of the right and deterrence of future breaches, insofar as they are engaged in a particular case, having regard to the impact of the breach on the claimant and the seriousness of the state conduct. The award must be appropriate and just from the perspective of the claimant and the state.

(6) Forum and Procedure

58 For a tribunal to grant a Charter remedy under s. 24(1), it must have the power to decide questions of law and the remedy must be one that the tribunal is authorized to grant: R. v. Conway, 2010 SCC 22, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 765. Generally, the appropriate forum for an award of damages under s. 24(1) is a court which has the power to consider Charter questions and which by statute or inherent jurisdiction has the power to award damages. Provincial criminal courts are not so empowered and thus do not have the power to award damages under s. 24(1).

[page54]

59 As was done here, the claimant may join a s. 24(1) claim with a tort claim. It may be useful to consider the tort claim first, since if it meets the objects of Charter damages, recourse to s. 24(1) will be unnecessary. This may add useful context and facilitate the s. 24(1) analysis. This said, it is not essential that the claimant exhaust her remedies in private law before bringing a s. 24(1) claim.

B. Application to the Facts

60 At trial, Justice Tysoe held that the provincial correction officers' strip search and the Vancouver Police Department's vehicle seizure violated Mr. Ward's right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure under s. 8 of the Charter. There are thus two distinct claims to consider.

(1) Damages for the Strip Search

61 The first question is whether Mr. Ward has established entitlement to the s. 24(1) remedy of damages. This requires him to show: (1) a breach of his Charter rights; and (2) that an award of damages would serve a functional purpose in the circumstances, having regard to the objects of s. 24(1) damages. If these are established, the burden shifts to the state (step 3) to show why, having regard to countervailing factors, an award of damages under

s. 24(1) of the Charter would be inappropriate. If the state fails to negate s. 24(1) damages, the inquiry moves to the final step, assessment of the appropriate amount of the damages.

62 Here the first step is met. Justice Tysoe found that the strip search violated Mr. Ward's personal rights under s. 8 of the Charter. This finding is [page55] not challenged on this appeal. Nor is it suggested that the British Columbia Supreme Court is not an appropriate forum for the action.

63 The second question is whether damages would serve a functional purpose by serving one or more of the objects of s. 24(1) damages - compensation, vindication and deterrence.

64 In this case, the need for compensation bulks large. Mr. Ward's injury was serious. He had a constitutional right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure, which was violated in an egregious fashion. Strip searches are inherently humiliating and degrading regardless of the manner in which they are carried out and thus constitute significant injury to an individual's intangible interests: R. v. Golden, 2001 SCC 83, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 679, at para. 90.

65 The corrections officers' conduct which caused the breach of Mr. Ward's Charter rights was also serious. Minimum sensitivity to Charter concerns within the context of the particular situation would have shown the search to be unnecessary and violative. Mr. Ward did not commit a serious offence, he was not charged with an offence associated with evidence being hidden on the body, no weapons were involved and he was not known to be violent or to carry weapons. Mr. Ward did not pose a risk of harm to himself or others, nor was there any suggestion that any of the officers believed that he did. In these circumstances, a reasonable person would understand that the indignity resulting from the search was disproportionate to any benefit which the search could have provided. In addition, without asking officers to be conversant with the details of court rulings, it is not too much to expect that police would be familiar with the settled law that routine strip searches are inappropriate where the individual is being held for a short time in police cells, is not mingling with the general prison population, and where the police have no legitimate concerns that the individual is [page56] concealing weapons that could be used to harm themselves or others: Golden, at para. 97.

66 In sum, the Charter breach significantly impacted on Mr. Ward's person and rights and the police conduct was serious. The impingement on Mr. Ward calls for compensation. Combined with the police conduct, it also engages the objects of vindication of the right and deterrence of future breaches. It follows that compensation is required in this case to functionally fulfill the objects of public law damages.

67 The next question is whether the state has established countervailing factors that would render s. 24(1) damages inappropriate or unjust.

68 The state has not established that alternative remedies are available to achieve the objects of compensation, vindication or deterrence with respect to the strip search. Mr. Ward sued the officers for assault, as well as the City and the Province for negligence. These claims were dismissed and their dismissal was not appealed to this Court. While this defeated Mr. Ward's claim in tort, it did not change the fact that his right under s. 8 of the Charter to be secure against unreasonable search and seizure was violated. No tort action was available for that violation and a declaration will not satisfy the need for compensation. Mr. Ward's only recourse is a claim for damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter. Nor has the state established that an award of s. 24(1) damages is negated by good governance considerations, such as those raised in Mackin.

69 I conclude that damages for the strip search of Mr. Ward are required in this case to functionally fulfill the objects of public law damages, and therefore are prima facie "appropriate and just". The state has not negated this. It follows that damages should be awarded for this breach of Mr. Ward's Charter rights.

70 This brings us to the issue of quantum. As discussed earlier, the amount of damages must reflect what is required to functionally fulfill the relevant objects of s. 24(1) compensation, while remaining fair to both the claimant and the state.

71 The object of compensation focuses primarily on the claimant's personal loss: physical, psychological, pecuniary, and harm to intangible interests. The claimant should, in so far as possible, be placed in the same position as if his Charter rights had not been infringed. Strip searches are inherently humiliating and thus constitute a significant injury to an individual's intangible interests regardless of the manner in which they are carried out. That said, the present search was relatively brief and not extremely disrespectful, as strip searches go. It did not involve the removal of Mr. Ward's underwear or the exposure of his genitals. Mr. Ward was never touched during the search and there is no indication that he suffered any resulting physical or psychological injury. While Mr. Ward's injury was serious, it cannot be said to be at the high end of the spectrum. This suggests a moderate damages award.

72 The objects of vindication and deterrence engage the seriousness of the state conduct. The corrections officers' conduct was serious and reflected a lack of sensitivity to Charter concerns. That said, the officers' action was not intentional, [page58] in that it was not malicious, high-handed or oppressive. In these circumstances, the objects of vindication and deterrence do not require an award of substantial damages against the state.

73 Considering all the factors, including the appropriate degree of deference to be paid to the trial judge's exercise of remedial discretion, I conclude that the trial judge's $5,000 damage award was appropriate.

(2) Damages for the Car Seizure

74 As with the strip search, we must determine whether Mr. Ward has established entitlement to the s. 24(1) remedy of damages to compensate for the constitutional wrong he suffered due to the City's seizure of his vehicle. Again, this requires determining: (1) breach of Charter right; (2) whether an award of damages would serve a functional purpose, having regard to the objects of s. 24(1) damages; (3) whether the state has established countervailing factors negating an award of s. 24(1) damages; and (4) quantum, if the right to damages is established.

75 The trial judge found that the seizure of the car violated Mr. Ward's rights under s. 8 of the Charter. This finding is not contested and thus satisfies the first requirement.

76 The next question is whether Mr. Ward has established that damages under s. 24(1) for the car seizure are appropriate and just from a functional perspective.

77 The object of compensation is not engaged by the seizure of the car. The trial judge found that Mr. Ward did not suffer any injury as a result of the seizure. His car was never searched and, upon his [page59] release from lockup, Mr. Ward was driven to the police compound to pick up the vehicle. Nor are the objects of vindication of the right and deterrence of future breaches compelling. While the seizure was wrong, it was not of a serious nature. The police officers did not illegally search the car, but rather arranged for its towing under the impression that it would be searched once a warrant had been obtained. When the officers determined that they did not have grounds to obtain the required warrant, the vehicle was made available for pickup.

78 I conclude that a declaration under s. 24(1) that the vehicle seizure violated Mr. Ward's right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure under s. 8 of the Charter adequately serves the need for vindication of the right and deterrence of future improper car seizures.

VII. Disposition

79 The appeal is allowed in part. The award against the City in the amount of $100 is set aside, substituted by a declaration under s. 24(1) that the vehicle seizure violated Mr. Ward's right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure under s. 8 of the Charter. The award of damages against the Province in the sum of $5,000 for breach of Mr. Ward's s. 8 Charter rights is confirmed.

80 We have been informed of a pre-existing agreement between Mr. Ward and the Province regarding costs and, as such, no cost order is made between Mr. Ward and the Province. No costs are awarded to or against the City.
Appeal allowed in part.

ORDER AND REASONS

Y. ROY J.

1 The Plaintiffs form a family from Saudi Arabia who applied for permanent residence in Canada under the Federal Skilled Worker Class. They submitted a statement of claim alleging a number of causes of action resulting in various heads of damages against the Defendant due to their treatment in the immigration system. They also seek, or give notice of intent to seek, declarations that certain provisions in the Federal Courts Act, RSC, 1985, c F-7 [Federal Courts Act] and the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act, SC 2001, c 27 [IRPA] are unconstitutional. The Defendant moved to strike the statement of claim in its entirety. The Court must determine whether the Defendant has established that the statement of claim fails to meet the pleadings requirements set out in the Federal Courts Rules, SOR 98-106 [the Rules]. At the Plaintiffs' request, the Court must also determine whether to grant leave to amend any claims that are struck.

I. Facts as set out in the statement of claim

2 The principal Plaintiff, Emad Al Omani, first submitted an application for permanent residence in Canada under the Federal Skilled Worker Class pursuant to subsection 12(2) of the IRPA in September 2006. That application included his wife, Lina Housne Hamza Nahas, and their two children, Lulwa Ehmada Alomani and Sultan Emad Alomani, as accompanying dependents. Their third child, Haya Emad Ibrahim Al Omani, was later added to the application.

3 The Canadian High Commission in London dealt with the application and refused it in December 2009 because it fell two points short of the score of 67 needed for a positive decision. The Plaintiffs mainly contest the visa officer's award of 4/10 points for "adaptability" and 10/16 points for English proficiency, both of which are made by applying subsection 76(1) and related provisions of the Immigration and Refugee Protection Regulations, SOR/2002-227 [IRPR]. The principal Plaintiff maintains he should have received 5 adaptability points for his Canadian brother plus at least 3 adaptability points for his wife's university degree. On language proficiency, he argues the visa officer should have considered other evidence of his English language abilities:

A/ with respect to adaptability, the Regulations and CIC's own website, sets out that the Plaintiff, Emad Al Omani, should have obtained, under "adaptability", 5 points, because he has a "sibling" (brother) who is a Canadian citizen and another 3 points because his spouse has a University degree, for a minimum of 8 out of 10 points for "adaptability", and these 8 out of 10 points, which are statutorily predetermined, are before even considering the other factors of adaptability, such as the fact that both the Plaintiff and his wife have university degrees from English instruction universities, have a net worth of $2.3 million (CDN), of which half is in liquid assets, have family in Canada, have a job offer in Canada, from the company run and owned by the Plaintiff's brother;

B/ with respect to language (English) proficiency, the Plaintiff, Emad Al Omani, only received 10 out of 16 points, notwithstanding that the Regulations, and CIC's representations, indicate that the prescribed English exam is not the only means by which to access English proficiency, and notwithstanding that the Applicant raised the issue of the need to write the exam, when he in fact graduated from an English-speaking University, has worked for English-speaking companies, in the English language, and was in the third year of a four year MBA programme, in English, which he had not yet completed due to work demands, and that the officer was in possession of confirmation of all of the above, and refused to exercise jurisdiction to assess his English proficiency, in the circumstances, within the context of his "ability to become economically established in Canada"

(at para 20(b)(ii) of the statement of claim).

4 The decision was challenged in the Federal Court. In August 2010, the decision was set aside by the Federal Court and the matter was sent back for redetermination by a different visa officer.

5 As part of the process of redetermination, the principal Plaintiff submitted further documentation requested by the Defendant and was called for an interview in January 2014. It is asserted that the interview lasted some 15 minutes. The officer asked the principal Plaintiff to explain a change in his job description. Towards the end of the interview, the officer would have asked the principal Plaintiff suddenly whether he "belonged to, or was in any way associated with "any group or organization like Al Qaeda in Iraq"". The principal Plaintiff categorically replied, according to the statement of claim, that he did not belong to, nor associated with, such groups as Al Qaeda, nor Al Qaeda itself (statement of claim, para 26(b)). When the principal Plaintiff asked for more detail on the question, the officer refused due to "secrecy" concerns.

6 In March 2014, the redetermination of the Plaintiffs' permanent residence application resulted in a second negative decision. The refusal explained that "there are reasonable grounds to believe [the principal Plaintiff is] a member of the inadmissible class of persons described in 34(1)(f)" of the IRPA.

7 In September 2014, once again the Federal Court ordered that the second negative decision be set aside and the matter was sent back for redetermination. On the record as it stands, the Plaintiffs had not heard from the Crown with respect to this second redetermination. The Plaintiffs sued.

II. Arguments

8 Fundamentally, the Plaintiffs argue that they have been mistreated in Canada's immigration system to a degree that warrants compensation. They allege the Defendant is liable in tort for misfeasance in public office, abuse and excess of jurisdiction and authority, abuse of process, negligence and negligent investigation, conspiracy, and for breaches of the plaintiffs' section 7 and section 15 Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Part I of the Constitution Act, 1982, being Schedule B to the Canada Act 1982 (UK), 1982, c 11 [Charter] rights.

9 The Plaintiffs are seeking:

- i. general damages in the amount of $200,000 per Plaintiff;
- ii. aggravated damages in the amount of $50,000 per Plaintiff;
- iii. punitive damages in the amount of $50,000 per Plaintiff;
- iv. any and all economic loss damages pleaded, to be calculated at trial;
- v. a declaration and/or finding that section 49 of the Federal Courts Act, barring jury trials in the Federal Court, is unconstitutional, and of no force and effect;
- vi. a declaration and/or finding that the requirement to seek leave from an administrative decision, under the IRPA, to commence judicial review under section 18 of the Federal Courts Act, pursuant to section 72(1) of the IRPA, violates the constitutional right to judicial review and a fair and independent judiciary and is of no force and effect; and
- vii. solicitor-client costs of this action and any other relief the Court deems just.

10 The Defendant contends in her motion to strike that the statement of claim fails to establish any of the alleged causes of action and does not properly plead damages. They further seek to strike the two named Ministers (Foreign Affairs and Citizenship and Immigration) from the action in favour of Her Majesty the Queen, as well as the Plaintiffs' constitutional arguments respecting the Federal Courts Act and the IRPA.

III. Law on a motion to strike

11 Is before the Court the motion to strike brought on behalf of the Defendant. Rule 221(1) permits the Court to strike a claim on certain grounds:

221(1) On motion, the Court may, at any time, order that a pleading, or anything contained therein, be struck out, with or without leave to amend, on the ground that it

- (a) discloses no reasonable cause of action or defence, as the case may be,
- (b) is immaterial or redundant,
- (c) is scandalous, frivolous or vexatious,
- (d) may prejudice or delay the fair trial of the action,
- (e) constitutes a departure from a previous pleading, or
- (f) is otherwise an abuse of the process of the Court, and may order the action be dismissed or judgment entered accordingly.

221(1) À tout moment, la Cour peut, sur requête, ordonner la radiation de tout ou partie d'un acte de procédure, avec ou sans autorisation de le modifier, au motif, selon le cas :

- a) qu'il ne révèle aucune cause d'action ou de défense valable;
- b) qu'il n'est pas pertinent ou qu'il est redondant;
- c) qu'il est scandaleux, frivole ou vexatoire;
- d) qu'il risque de nuire à l'instruction équitable de l'action ou de la retarder;
- e) qu'il diverge d'un acte de procédure antérieur;
- f) qu'il constitue autrement un abus de procédure.

Elle peut aussi ordonner que l'action soit rejetée ou qu'un jugement soit enregistré en conséquence.

The Defendant primarily relies on Rule 221(1)(a), which allows a claim to be struck if it "discloses no reasonable cause of action.". Rule 221(1)(c) is also in play.

12 The test to strike a claim under Rule 221 sets a high bar. First, it is assumed that the facts stated in the statement of claim can be proven. The Court must be satisfied that it is plain and obvious that the pleading discloses no reasonable cause of action assuming the facts pleaded are true: R v Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2011 SCC 42, [2011] 3 SCR 45 at para 17; Hunt v Carey Canada Inc., [1990] 2 SCR 959 [Hunt] at p 980. The Defendant bears the onus of meeting this test: Sivak v Canada, 2012 FC 272, 406 FTR 115 [Sivak] at para 25.

13 In Hunt, the Supreme Court sided with the articulation of the rule in England to the effect that "if there is a chance that the plaintiff may succeed, then the plaintiff should not be "driven from the judgment seat"" (p. 980). A high bar indeed to succeed on a motion to strike. Some chance of success will suffice or, as Justice Estey said in Att. Gen. of Can. v Inuit Tapirisat et al., [1980] 2 SCR 735, "(o)n a motion such as this a court should, of course, dismiss the action or strike out any claim made by the plaintiff only in plain and obvious cases and where the court is satisfied that "the case is beyond doubt"" (p.740).

14 To show a plaintiff has a reasonable cause of action, the statement of claim must plead material facts satisfying every element of the alleged causes of action: Mancuso v Canada (National Health and Welfare), 2015 FCA 227, 476 NR 219 [Mancuso] at para 19; Benaissa v Canada (Attorney General), 2005 FC 1220 [Benaissa] at para 15. The plaintiff needs to explain the "who, when, where, how and what" giving rise to the Defendant's liability (Mancuso, para 19, Baird v Canada, 2006 FC 205 at paras 9-11, affirmed in 2007 FCA 48).

15 Thus, there appears to be a balance. On one hand, a chance of success is enough for the matter to proceed. On the other, the material facts must be pleaded in sufficient detail such that the cause of action may exist. The purpose of pleadings is to give notice to the opposing party and define the issues in such a way that it can understand how the facts support the various causes of action. As the Court of Appeal put it in Mancuso, "(i)t is fundamental to the trial process that a plaintiff plead material facts in sufficient detail to support the claim and relief sought" (para 16). The Plaintiffs note that pleadings can still proceed despite being "far from models of legal clarity" (Manuge v Canada, 2010 SCC 67, [2010] 3 SCR 672 at para 23). But it remains that adequate material facts must be pleaded. Parties cannot make broad allegations in their statement of claim in the hope of later going on a "fishing expedition" to discover the facts: Kastner v Painblanc (1994), 176 NR 68, 51 ACWS (3d) 428 (FCA) at p.2.

16 Rules 174 and 181 further define the minimum requirements for a statement of claim. Pursuant to Rule 174, every pleading must contain the material facts on which the party relies.

174 Every pleading shall contain a concise statement of the material facts on which the party relies, but shall not include evidence by which those facts are to be proved.

174 Tout acte de procédure contient un exposé concis des faits substantiels sur lesquels la partie se fonde; il ne comprend pas les moyens de preuve à l'appui de ces faits.

Rule 181 requires that a pleading contain particulars of any alleged state of mind of a person, malice, or fraudulent intention.

181(1) A pleading shall contain particulars of every allegation contained therein, including

- (a) particulars of any alleged misrepresentation, fraud, breach of trust, wilful default or undue influence; and
- (b) particulars of any alleged state of mind of a person, including any alleged mental disorder or disability, malice or fraudulent intention.

181(1) L'acte de procédure contient des précisions sur chaque allégation, notamment :

- a) des précisions sur les fausses déclarations, fraudes, abus de confiance, manquements délibérés ou influences indues reprochés;

b) des précisions sur toute allégation portant sur l'état mental d'une personne, tel un déséquilibre mental, une incapacité mentale ou une intention malicieuse ou frauduleuse.

17 But what are "material facts"? They cannot be conclusions or bald allegations: Merchant Law Group v Canada Revenue Agency, 2010 FCA 184 at para 34; 321 DLR (4th) 301 [Merchant]; Mancuso at paras 17-18. You cannot plead bad faith as a material fact by merely stating phrases such as "deliberately or negligently" or "callous disregard." Zündel v Canada, 2005 FC 1612 at para 16, affirmed in 2006 FCA 356. A modicum of story-telling is required. The statement of claim must contain enough facts for the Defendant to understand, for instance, what the bad faith allegation is based on.

18 The jurisprudence suggests that a pleading can fall into one of three categories along a spectrum. The pleading either shows no scintilla of a cause of action, in which case the motion to strike would succeed, shows a scintilla of a cause of action, in which case there may be leave to amend, or it shows a reasonable cause of action. The Federal Court of Appeal similarly described in Mancuso material facts and bald allegations as lying on a continuum: [18] There is no bright line between material facts and bald allegations, nor between pleadings of material facts and the prohibition on pleading of evidence. They are points on a continuum, and it is the responsibility of a motions judge, looking at the pleadings as a whole, to ensure that the pleadings define the issues with sufficient precision to make the pre-trial and trial proceedings both manageable and fair.

IV. Issue

19 Motions to strike can present short questions with lengthy answers. Based on the aforementioned law, we are concerned with two overarching issues in this case:

1. Is it plain and obvious that the statement of claim discloses no reasonable cause of action with respect to some or all of the claims?
2. Do some claims that could be struck nevertheless show a scintilla of a cause of action such that the Plaintiffs should be granted leave to amend those claims?

V. Analysis of each alleged cause of action

20 The Court must take the statement of claim as it is. It must be read as generously as possible, thereby avoiding to put weight on what may be drafting deficiencies. However, would not be drafting deficiencies what would amount to speculations, hoping to find facts on discovery to support the allegations made. In effect, the motions judge is looking for the facts, taken as proven at this stage that will satisfy all of the necessary elements of the cause of action.

A. Material facts

21 We find guidance in the binding decision of the Federal Court of Appeal in Mancuso on the requirements for a statement of claim to resist a motion to strike under rule 221.

22 The main theme in Mancuso is the requirement that there be sufficient material facts pleaded. The material facts that are pleaded must be sufficient to support the claim and the relief sought. That means therefore that the facts must be advanced so that the cause of action may be established, leading to an appropriate remedy. The Court of Appeal agreed with the judge in Mancuso that "pleadings play an important role in providing notice and defining the issues to be tried and that the Court and opposing parties cannot be left to speculate as to how the facts might be variously arranged to support various causes of action" (para 16). The plaintiff must commit to more than merely stating some facts, a sort of narrative taken as proven, and then posit a series of alleged causes of action in order to prevail on a motion to strike.

23 A plaintiff will want to maximize her flexibility in a statement of claim. But she "must plead, in summary form but with sufficient detail, the constituent elements of each cause of action or legal ground raised. The pleading must tell the defendant who, when, where, how and what gave rise to its liability" (Mancuso, para 19). As is often the case, the principle behind the rule helps understand the scope of the requirement. Hence, we read at paragraph 17 of Mancuso:

[17] The latter part of this requirement -- sufficient material facts -- is the foundation of a proper pleading. If a court allowed parties to plead bald allegations of fact, or mere conclusory statements of law, the pleadings would fail to perform their role in identifying the issues. The proper pleading of a statement of claim is necessary for a defendant to prepare a statement of defence. Material facts frame the discovery process and allow counsel to advise their clients, to prepare their case and to map a trial strategy. Importantly, the pleadings establish the parameters of relevancy of evidence at discovery and trial.

24 Thus, adequate pleadings are required up front; adequate material facts are mandatorily required. As put by the Mancuso Court at para 20, "(p)laintiffs cannot file inadequate pleadings and rely on a defendant to request particulars, nor can they supplement insufficient pleadings to make them sufficient through particulars: AstraZeneca Canada Inc. v. Novopharm Limited, 2010 FCA 112."

25 That translates into the requirement that tort claims be identified and then the material facts are set out such that the elements of the tort claim are satisfied. In my view, that is largely missing in this statement of claim, which has made the examination of the motion to strike quite cumbersome.

B. How the statement of claim is organized

26 The statement of claim is difficult to apprehend and somewhat unwieldy. It starts off with bald allegations of various infringements, be they abuse of process, excess of authority, public misfeasance, negligence, negligent investigation, contempt of two Federal Court Judgments, as well as violation of section 15 and 7 of the Charter. For good measure, there is also an allegation that section 49 of the Federal Courts Act (prohibition of jury trials) and 72 of the IRPA (requirement that leave be granted for judicial review) are unconstitutional and of no force and effect.

27 It then continues with a series of paragraphs that allege facts, what constitutes in fact a narrative. Follow a number of paragraphs which provide a series of heads of damages that allegedly would result from the facts as presented. The chapeau of para 30 simply states that damages were suffered as a result of "officials' inexcusable delay, false and unfounded allegations, and breach of duty to process the main Plaintiffs' application."

28 Paragraphs 32 to 35 of the statement of claim that the Plaintiffs list causes of action. Thus, para 32 declares that there was:

- * abuse and excess of jurisdiction and authority;
- * abuse of process at common law and section 7 of the Charter;
- * public misfeasance.

The paragraph ends with a mere declaration, without any connection with the facts, that "tortious conduct has caused the damages". What particular facts constitute the alleged tortious conduct is nowhere to be found in the pleading.

29 Para 34 of the statement of claim seeks to be somewhat more precise in suggesting that the delay between various proceedings constitutes in itself abuse and excess of authority as well as public misfeasance, alleging bad faith at para 35.

30 The Plaintiffs chose to plead in the alternative that officials have been negligent and engaged in negligent investigation. As for these causes of action, the statement of claim does not state what facts are pled in support of its essential elements. Rather, it is simply stated that they are owed a duty of care "to competently and with due dispatch properly process an application ...as well as competently and diligently investigate any allegations of inadmissibility" (para 36).

31 In the further alternative, the Plaintiffs allege a conspiracy to deny their permanent residence. This time, the allegations are barely more precise in that the Plaintiffs allege "a contrived denial made in bad faith", delay and baseless association with Al Qaeda (para 37). I note that, again, the material facts that would give precision to the alleged conspiracy are not stated. In fact, there is a general allegation of conspiracy, but bad faith, delay and baseless association do not make a conspiracy, i.e. where there is proof of agreement and execution. The Defendant does not know who, when, where, how and what which would give rise to its liability.

C. Amending pleadings

32 It does not suffice for the Court to rule that a pleading is deficient. Rule 221 requires consideration of whether a pleading should be struck with or without leave to amend. The jurisprudence points to various considerations which come into play in making such determination.

33 The Plaintiffs have raised the possibility that if the statement of claim is struck in part or in whole, leave to amend the pleadings should be granted. As long as a pleading shows a scintilla of a cause of action, it will not be struck out if it can be cured by amendment: Hunt at pp 976-978; Simon v Canada, 2011 FCA 6 [Simon] at para 8; Collins v Canada, 2011 FCA 140 at para 30 [Collins]; Sivak at para 94; Sweet v Canada (1999), 249 NR 17 at para 21 (FCA) [Sweet]; Larden v Canada, (1998) 145 FTR 140 at para 26; Kiely v Her Majesty the Queen, (1987) 10 FTR 10 (FCTD) at p 2; Waterside Ocean Navigation Co Inc v International Navigation Ltd, [1977] 2 FC 257 at para 4.

34 The case law teaches that a pleading will not be struck out without leave to amend unless there is no scintilla of a cause of action (McMillan v Canada, (1996) 108 FTR 32 [McMillan] and Sivak). But there must be that scintilla. As Associate Chief Justice Jerome put it in McMillan, "(t)he burden on the applicant under R. 419 (1)(a) is heavy since portions of the pleadings will only be struck out if it is clear that the claim cannot be amended to show a proper cause of action" (para 39).

35 However, it is not for the Court to redraft the pleadings. In Sweet, the Court of Appeal commented that "(e)ach proceeding is to be assessed on its own merits, with consideration being given to, inter alia, the personal situation of the party, the issues and arguments raised, the manner and tone in which they are raised, the number and proportion of allegations that are defective and the readiness of the amendments needed" (my emphasis, para 21).

36 In fact, if a scintilla of a cause of action has been pleaded, this Court may be more reticent to strike claims without leave to amend in case it is the first version of the pleading, as in this case. In Simon and Collins, the Court of Appeal warned that failure to comply with the rules once the pleadings have been allowed to be amended would expose the pleadings to the risk of being struck out (Simon at para 17 and Collins at para 31).

D. Alleged causes of action

37 At the outset of the hearing, the parties agreed that the Defendant's list of claims was a satisfactory way to organize the discussion. I will proceed through each claim in this order and address the two issues identified above.

Claim 1: Misfeasance in public office

38 The statement of claim alleges the tort of misfeasance in public office. Because it constitutes the cause of action on which the Plaintiffs have chosen to rely the most heavily, I have attempted to gather the various paragraphs of the statement of claim which refer to misfeasance:

1. The Plaintiffs claim [...] all of which damages arise from: [...]
 - (ii) the Defendants' servants and officers' actions, and lack of action and omissions, in not issuing the permanent resident visas, and not complying with the Federal Court orders, constitutes an abuse of process, abuse and excess of authority and jurisdiction, public misfeasance, as well as negligence, and negligent investigation, all compensable at common-law, under the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act ("IRPA"), as well as s. 24(1) of the Charter.

32. The Plaintiffs state, and the fact is that:

(a) the Defendants' officials have, with knowledge and intent, abused process, abused and exceeded authority and jurisdiction, and engaged in public misfeasance of their office, in their refusal to lawfully abide by the Federal Court order and terms of the IRPA and Regulations, and issue permanent residence visas, and in the refusal(s) to give any cogent and/or sober answers to the plaintiffs and their counsel, except stone silence and stone-walling and that the Defendants' servants and officials have:

(iii) engaged in public misfeasance as set out by the Supreme Court of Canada in Odhavji Estate v. Woodhouse [2003] 3 S.C.R. 263, in that:

A/ the officials engaged in deliberate, unlawful conduct in the exercise of their public functions;

B/ the officials are aware that the conduct is unlawful and likely to injure the plaintiffs; and

C/ the officials' tortious conduct is the legal cause of the plaintiffs' injuries pleaded herein;

33. The Plaintiffs state that the Defendants' officials have a common-law duty, as well as a statutory duty under s. 3(1)(f) of the IRPA, as interpreted and confirmed by this Court, in Dragan v Canada QL [2003] F.C.J. No. 260 and Liang v Canada (M.C.I.) 2012 FC 758 decisions to process applications consistently and promptly, which sub-section reads:

3. (1) The objectives of this Act with respect to immigration are

(f) to support, by means of consistent standards and prompt processing, the attainment of immigration goals established by the Government of Canada in consultation with the provinces [...]

34. The Plaintiffs state that the Defendants' inexcusable, inordinate, and castigating delay, both between the time of the 1st judicial review and the 2nd negative decision, as well as the 2nd judicial review to the present, constitutes abuse and excess of authority, as well as public misfeasance, of public office, in that inexcusable delay has been determined to constitute public misfeasance in inter alia, McMaster v. Canada, [2009] F.C.J. No. 1071, by this Court.

35. The Plaintiffs further state that the conduct of the officers, and nature and substance of both decisions to deny the Plaintiffs permanent residence, has been made in bad faith, and absence of good faith, and further constitutes public misfeasance as set out above in the within statement of claim.

39 As indicated earlier, the Plaintiffs must plead with sufficient detail the constituent elements of each cause of action. But that is not enough. The Plaintiffs must also plead material facts in sufficient detail. As already indicated earlier, the trial judge in Mancuso commented, and it was specifically approved by the Court of Appeal, that "opposing parties cannot be left to speculate as to how the facts might be variously arranged to support various causes of action" (para 16). I am afraid this statement of fact suffers from that very deficiency. The elements of the tort of misfeasance are set out in Odhavji Estate v Woodhouse, 2003 SCC 69, [2003] 3 SCR 263 at paras 22-23 [Woodhouse]. The tort may take two different forms, but each requires the elements which are common to both. These elements are "(f)irst, the public officer must have engaged in deliberate and unlawful conduct in her or her capacity as a public officer. Second, the public officer must have been aware both that his or her conduct was unlawful and that it was likely to harm the plaintiff" (para 23). The tort may be approached in two ways. The two elements can be independently established, requiring unlawful conduct and knowledge that conduct was likely to cause harm. Or, both elements can be satisfied by proving the public officer specifically intends to injure a person because such officers do not have the authority to exercise their powers for an improper purpose (Woodhouse at para 23).

40 The first element is focused on whether the alleged misconduct is deliberate and unlawful. This can arise from an act or omission that "arises[s] from a straightforward breach of the relevant statutory provisions or from acting in excess of the powers granted for an improper purpose": Three Rivers District Council v Bank of England (No. 3), [2000] 2 WLR 1220 at p 1269, cited in Woodhouse at para 24.

41 The second element establishes the nexus between the impugned public official and the plaintiff by requiring that defendants know that their conduct was unlawful and likely to harm. One can read at paragraph 29 of Woodhouse:

The requirement that the defendant must have been aware that his or her unlawful conduct would harm the plaintiff further restricts the ambit of the tort. Liability does not attach to each officer who blatantly disregards his or her official duty, but only to a public officer who, in addition, demonstrates a conscious disregard for the interests of those who will be affected by the misconduct in question. This requirement establishes the required nexus between the parties. Unlawful conduct in the exercise of public functions is a public wrong, but absent some awareness of harm there is no basis on which to conclude that the defendant has breached an obligation that she or he owes to the plaintiff, as an individual. And absent the breach of an obligation that the defendant owes to the plaintiff, there can be no liability in tort.

The Court has further commented that this element requires the Defendant, at the very least, to have been "subjectively reckless or wilfully blind as to the possibility that harm was a likely consequence of the alleged misconduct" (Woodhouse at para 38).

42 The requirement that the Defendant must have known that the conduct was unlawful is essential to the tort of misfeasance in public office. A public official's decision may well be adverse to certain people's interests, and yet still be lawful:

The requirement that the defendant must have been aware that his or her conduct was unlawful reflects the well-established principle that misfeasance in public office requires an element of "bad faith" or "dishonesty". In a democracy, public officers must retain the authority to make decisions that, where appropriate, are adverse to the interests of certain citizens. Knowledge of harm is thus an insufficient basis on which to conclude that the defendant has acted in bad faith or dishonestly. A public officer may in good faith make a decision that she or he knows to be adverse to the interest of certain members of the public. In order for the conduct to fall within the scope of the tort, the officer must deliberately engage in conduct that he or she knows to be inconsistent with the obligations of the office.

(Woodhouse, para 28)

43 With that understanding of the tort, I will assess whether the statement of claim sufficiently pleads both tort elements for each of the Plaintiffs' misfeasance pleadings. The statement of claim seems to allege misfeasance on four grounds: (i) refusal to abide by Federal Court orders; (ii) refusal to issue permanent resident visas; (iii) refusal to provide "cogent and/or sober" answers to questions posed by the Plaintiffs; and (iv) delay in processing the Plaintiffs' permanent residence applications. For the first three grounds, the Plaintiffs allege that the actions were done "with knowledge and intent", but no similar claim is made with respect to the alleged processing delay.

(1) Misfeasance claim 1: Contempt

44 I see no potential for deliberate, unlawful conduct in the first allegation of contempt. The statement of claim says both Court orders sent the visa decision back for redetermination. There is no indication as to how the redetermination should proceed. No direction was given by the Court. The first redetermination resulted in a second negative decision, and the second redetermination is outstanding. The pleadings contain no facts, let alone material facts, showing that the orders were not followed. In fact, the exact opposite occurred. There was no refusal to abide by the court orders.

45 As a result, I cannot see a scintilla of a cause of action in the Plaintiffs' claim that the Defendant failed to abide by the orders in bad faith. I am striking the misfeasance claim respecting the "refusal to abide by Federal Court orders" without leave to amend.

(2) Misfeasance claim 2: Refusal to issue permanent visas

46 The second allegation is not, prima facie, unlawful. The act of refusing to issue permanent residence visas regularly occurs as a result of implementing IRPA. In this case, it is not completely clear on the record how the refusal to issue visas constitutes misfeasance.

47 The statement of claim offers that the first visa officer awarded the principal Plaintiff the wrong number of points under the IRPR in the face of evidence to the contrary and that the visas were denied "with knowledge and intent". The relevant provisions set precise point allocations for the adaptability criterion, leaving the visa officer little discretion in how to award points for a Canadian relative or a spouse's education.

48 It also states that the second visa officer deemed the principal Plaintiff inadmissible on the basis of wrong information. The relevant inadmissibility provisions of IRPA state that a foreign national is inadmissible for "being a member of an organization that there are reasonable grounds to believe engages, has engaged or will engage in acts referred to [in above subsections]" (para 34(1)(f) of IRPA). The determination of whether that organization engages in the enumerated acts requires that the officer must have "reasonable grounds" to believe in order to make that decision. That leaves a measure of appreciation to the officer. Certainty beyond a reasonable ground is not required. The test does not contemplate either that the officer be satisfied on a balance of probabilities, the legal standard in civil matters (Canada (Attorney General) v Fairmont Hotels Inc., 2016 SCC 56, [2016] 2 SCR 720). Reasonable grounds to believe will suffice. The Plaintiffs, on the other hand, state that there is no basis for the inadmissibility finding.

49 The phrase "with knowledge and intent" is a bald conclusion; however, there are sufficient material facts alleged early in the statement of claim to appreciate that there is a basis for the claim that both actions were deliberate conduct. It appears to me that there is a scintilla of a cause of action pleaded however imperfectly. But more precision is needed. The material facts must be plainly identified and they must be connected to the elements of the tort asserted, including of course the required state of mind (Mancuso, para 26).

50 The second tort element is knowledge that the visa denials were unlawful and likely to harm the Plaintiffs. The statement of claim says that the visa officers denied the lawful visa issuance "with knowledge and intent" and "in bad faith". If the officers did award the wrong number of points and deem the principal Plaintiff inadmissible in the face of clearly contradictory evidence, this is sufficient to plead that the officers knew their conduct was unlawful. Woodhouse found that a similarly-worded pleading was sufficient to establish a reasonable cause of action in misfeasance:

Insofar as the second requirement is concerned, the statement of claim alleges that the acts and omissions of the defendant officers "represented intentional breaches of their legal duties as police officers". This plainly satisfies the requirement that the officers were aware that the alleged failure to cooperate with the investigation was unlawful. The allegation is not simply that the officers failed to comply with s. 113(9) of the Police Services Act, but that the failure to comply was intentional and deliberate.

51 The only reference to knowledge that the unlawful conduct would likely harm the Plaintiffs is at paragraph 35, which states "that the conduct of the officers, and nature and substance of both decisions to deny the Plaintiffs permanent residence, has been made in bad faith" and the general assertion that the alleged misfeasance was done "with knowledge". Bald conclusions such as "in bad faith" do not qualify as material facts (Merchant at para 34). Moreover, Rule 181 requires that Plaintiffs provide particulars on the material facts they are pleading to support a tort's mental element. Here, the Plaintiffs seem to be pointing to several circumstantial facts to argue that the Defendant intentionally misprocessed their permanent residence applications over a ten-year period to keep them out of Canada.

52 If someone applies for a permanent residence visa, they expect to have it properly processed because they want to live in Canada. It is not a stretch to infer that improper denial of such a visa would likely harm applicants wanting to come to Canada. Of course, the statement of claim should actually plead specifically the material facts necessary to make out this second tort element. That was not done. Mancuso requires the who, when, where, how and what. The issue must be defined with more precision in order to make the proceedings manageable and fair. The amended pleadings will have to provide the material facts such that the Defendant will know what it is defending against. At this stage, one has to speculate somewhat as to what facts constitute the cause of action. More and better precision is called for.

53 My role on a motion to strike is not to decide the Plaintiffs' chance of succeeding with this argument (Minnes v Minnes (1962), 39 WWR 112). Because I see a scintilla of a cause of action, barely, I am also granting leave to amend this particular misfeasance claim with respect to the second tort element (i.e. material facts underpinning the allegation that the public official "knew" that their act or omission would likely harm the Plaintiff).

(3) Misfeasance claim 3: Refusal to provide answers

54 The fact that the Defendant refused to answer the Plaintiffs' questions does not show unlawful conduct. This does not show a cause of action, let alone a reasonable one. Unlike the points calculation and the inadmissibility decision, the Plaintiffs failed to point to a statutory obligation that the visa officer(s) breached or show that the officer(s) acted unlawfully in the exercise of their public functions generally. As a result, I am striking the misfeasance allegation concerning the "refusal to provide "cogent and/or sober" answers to questions posed by the Plaintiffs" without leave to amend.

(4) Misfeasance claim 4: Delay in processing visa applications

55 For the fourth misfeasance allegation regarding processing delays, the Plaintiffs relied on McMaster v Canada, 2009 FC 937, 352 FTR 255 [McMaster] for the authority that delay can constitute unlawful conduct in a misfeasance action. McMaster concerned an inmate who was repeatedly denied properly-sized running shoes in the face of a statutory obligation to provide adequate footwear. The statutory obligation that the Plaintiffs rely on for delay in the immigration context is subsection 3(1)(f) of IRPA, as interpreted in Liang v Canada (Citizenship and Immigration), 2012 FC 758 at paragraph 25; 413 FTR 145 [Liang] and Dragan v Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2003 FCT 211 at paragraph 45, 227 FTR 272 [Dragan]. This subsection states:

3 (1) The objectives of this Act with respect to immigration are [...]

- (f) to support, by means of consistent standards and prompt processing, the attainment of immigration goals established by the Government of Canada in consultation with the provinces;

Liang and Dragan found, on applications for mandamus, that unreasonable delay can amount to an implied refusal to perform the statutory duty to process visa applications under the IRPA. Justice Rennie, then of this Court, found in Liang that a prima facie case for delay was made out where applications requiring processing had been outstanding for 4.5 to 10 years.

56 The Defendant seeks to distinguish Liang and Dragan on the basis that they dealt with applications for mandamus, not private law actions. They argue that "even where delays are found to be unreasonable or inordinate, this does not give rise to a free-standing cause of action", citing Farzam v Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2005 FC 1659, 284 FTR 158 [Farzam] at para 105; and Haj Khalil v Canada, 2007 FC 923, 317 FTR 32 [Khalil] at para 8 (affirmed in Haj Khalil v Canada, 2009 FCA 66) (at para 28 of their written representations). Both Farzam and Khalil dealt with actions in negligence, not misfeasance in public office.

57 The Plaintiffs' visa applications have been effectively outstanding for 10 years given they are still waiting for the outcome of their second redetermination. This falls at the outer end of Justice Rennie's suggested timelines for establishing prima facie unreasonable delay in the mandamus context. The Defendant has not presented an authority stating that unreasonable delay in processing visa applications cannot amount to unlawful conduct for the purposes of a misfeasance action. As a result, this appears to be an issue requiring discussion at trial and not on a motion to strike. The Supreme Court in Hunt commented that "(p)rovided that the plaintiff can present a "substantive" case, that case should be heard" (p 975). It is premature on a motion to strike to rule on the matter.

58 As noted above, unlike the first three misfeasance allegations, the Plaintiffs failed to specifically plead that the delay was "deliberate", but did plead that it was done "in bad faith", which implies a measure of deliberation. There are circumstantial facts that could support this tort element, namely the use of different grounds to refuse the visas in the first and second denial, but the statement of claim fails to plead clearly that the delays were deliberate. In Woodhouse, the Supreme Court struck allegations that lacked the words "deliberate" and "intentional", because inadvertence or negligence is insufficient to make out the intentional tort of misfeasance:

37 Although the allegation that the Chief deliberately failed to segregate the officers satisfies the requirement that the Chief intentionally breached his legal obligation to ensure compliance with the Police Services Act, the same cannot be said of his alleged failure to ensure that the defendant officers produced timely and complete notes, attended for interviews in a timely manner, and provided accurate and complete accounts of the incident. As above, inadvertence or negligence will not suffice; a mere failure to discharge the obligations of the office cannot constitute misfeasance in a public office. In light of the allegation that the Chief's failure to segregate the officers was deliberate, this is not a sufficient basis on which to strike the pleading. Suffice it to say, the failure to issue orders for the purpose of ensuring that the defendant officers cooperated with the investigation will only constitute misfeasance in a public office if the plaintiffs prove that the Chief deliberately failed to comply with the standard established by s. 41(1)(b) of the Police Services Act.

Through the narrative offered as facts, I see however a scintilla of a cause of action on this first tort element, but the pleadings must properly set out the full cause of action. They will have to be significantly amended.

59 As with the second misfeasance claim, the pleadings on the second tort element--knowledge of unlawful conduct and likelihood of harming the Plaintiffs--are not explicit and are close to being bald, which fails to meet the requirements of Rules 174 and 181. With respect to the Defendant's knowledge that their delays were unlawful, the statement of claim fails to plead the material facts showing which public officials had this knowledge. Was the first officer aware of an unlawful delay that would likely cause harm in 2009, or only the second officer in 2014? Or was it other individuals that knew the delay was unlawful?

60 With respect to the Defendant's alleged knowledge that the delays were unlawful and likely to harm the Plaintiffs, I see a scintilla of a cause of action. It is reasonable to infer that an alleged 10-year delay in processing does not fulfill the IRPA objective of "prompt processing" and would likely cause harm to the waiting family. However, again, the statement of claim must plead sufficient material facts to qualify as a reasonable cause of action. I would not strike the pleadings without allowing an opportunity to amend in order to satisfy the requirements.

61 Accordingly, I am granting leave to amend this particular misfeasance claim with respect to the first tort element prerequisite that the unlawful conduct was deliberate, and with respect to the second tort element requirement that the public official "knew" that their act or omission was unlawful and likely to harm the Plaintiffs.

Claim 2: Abuse and excess of jurisdiction and authority

62 The Plaintiffs refer to "abuse and excess of jurisdiction and authority" at multiple points in their pleadings, often in concert with their claims respecting misfeasance in public office:

1. The Plaintiffs claim [...] all of which damages arise from: [...]
 - (ii) the Defendants' servants and officers' actions, and lack of action and omissions, in not issuing the permanent resident visas, and not complying with the Federal Court orders, constitutes an abuse of process, abuse and excess of authority and jurisdiction, public misfeasance, as well as negligence, and negligent investigation, all compensable at common-law, under the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act ("IRPA"), as well as s. 24(1) of the Charter.

32. The Plaintiffs state, and the fact is that:

- (a) the Defendants' officials have, with knowledge and intent, abused process, abused and exceeded authority and jurisdiction, and engaged in public misfeasance of their office, in their refusal to lawfully abide by the Federal Court order and terms of the IRPA and Regulations, and issue permanent residence visas, and in the refusal(s) to give any cogent and/or sober answers to the plaintiffs and their counsel, except stone silence and stone-walling and that the Defendants' servants and officials have:

- (i) engaged in abuse and excess of jurisdiction and authority as historically contemplated by the Supreme Court of Canada in Roncarelli v. Duplessis, [1959] S.C.R. 121, et seq [Roncarelli];

34. The Plaintiffs state that the Defendants' inexcusable, inordinate, and castigating delay, both between the time of the 1st judicial review and the 2nd negative decision, as well as the 2nd judicial review to the present, constitutes abuse and excess of authority, as well as public misfeasance, of public office, in that inexcusable delay has been determined to constitute public misfeasance in inter alia, McMaster v. Canada, [2009] F.C.J. No. 1071, by this Court.

63 The Defendant argues that abuse and excess of authority and jurisdiction alleged by the Plaintiffs is encapsulated in the tort of misfeasance. I agree. The following discussion of the tort of misfeasance in public office in Woodhouse confirms that it covers the claim of abuse and excess of authority and jurisdiction as contemplated in Roncarelli v Duplessis, [1959] SCR 121:

18 The origins of the tort of misfeasance in a public office can be traced to Ashby v. White (1703), 2 Ld. Raym. 938, 92 E.R. 126, in which Holt C.J. found that a cause of action lay against an elections officer who maliciously and fraudulently deprived Mr. White of the right to vote. Although the defendant possessed the power to deprive certain persons from participating in the election, he did not have the power to do so for an improper purpose. Although the original judgment suggests that he was simply applying the principle ubi jus ibi remedium, Holt C.J. produced a revised form of the judgment in which he stated that it was because fraud and malice were proven that the action lay: J. W. Smith, A Selection of Leading Cases on Various Branches of the Law (13th ed. 1929), at p. 282. Thus, in its earliest form it is arguable that misfeasance in a public office was limited to circumstances in which a public officer abused a power actually possessed.

19 Subsequent cases, however, have made clear that the ambit of the tort is not restricted in this manner. In Roncarelli v. Duplessis, [1959] S.C.R. 121, this Court found the defendant Premier of Quebec liable for directing the manager of the Quebec Liquor Commission to revoke the plaintiff's liquor licence. Although Roncarelli was decided at least in part on the basis of the Quebec civil law of delictual responsibility, it is widely regarded as having established that misfeasance in a public office is a recognized tort in Canada. See for example Powder Mountain Resorts Ltd. v. British Columbia (2001), 94 B.C.L.R. (3d) 14, 2001 BCCA 619; and Alberta (Minister of Public Works, Supply and Services) v. Nilsson (2002), 220 D.L.R. (4th) 474, 2002 ABCA 283. In Roncarelli, the Premier was authorized to give advice to the Commission in respect of any legal questions that might arise, but had no authority to involve himself in a decision to revoke a particular licence. As Abbott J. observed, at p. 184, Mr. Duplessis "was given no statutory power to interfere in the administration or direction of the Quebec Liquor Commission". Martland J. made a similar observation, at p. 158, stating that Mr. Duplessis' conduct involved "the exercise of powers which, in law, he did not possess at all". From this, it is clear that the tort is not restricted to the abuse of a statutory or prerogative power actually held. If that were the case, there would have been no grounds on which to find Mr. Duplessis liable.

64 As a result, I am striking the reference to abuse and excess of jurisdiction and authority as a stand-alone cause of action. The matter ought to be dealt with under the misfeasance claims once properly amended.

Claim 3: Abuse of process

65 The statement of claim pleads the tort of abuse of process in the same paragraphs already referred to above for misfeasance in public office and quoted at length at paragraph 38 of these reasons.

66 The Defendant contends that abuse of process "involves the misuse of the process of the courts to coerce someone in a way that is outside the ambit of the legal claim upon which the court is asked adjudicate": para 33 of the Defendant's written representations citing Levi Strauss & Co v Roadrunner Apparel Inc, (1997), 76 CPR (3d) 129 (FCA) at p 3.

67 The Supreme Court of Canada authority provided by the Plaintiffs, United States of America v Cobb, 2001 SCC 19, [2001] 1 SCR 587 [Cobb], also defines abuse of process in terms of abusing the court process:

37 Canadian courts have an inherent and residual discretion at common law to control their own process and prevent its abuse. The remedy fashioned by the courts in the case of an abuse of process, and the circumstances when recourse to it is appropriate were described by this Court in R. v. Keyowski, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 657, at pp. 658-59:

The availability of a stay of proceedings to remedy an abuse of process was confirmed by this Court in R. v. Jewitt, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 128. On that occasion the Court stated that the test for abuse of process was that initially formulated by the Ontario Court of Appeal in R. v. Young (1984), 40 C.R. (3d) 289. A stay should be granted where "compelling an accused to stand trial would violate those fundamental principles of justice which underlie the community's sense of fair play and decency", or where the proceedings are "oppressive or vexatious" ([1985] 2 S.C.R. 128, at pp. 136-37). The Court in Jewitt also adopted "the caveat added by the Court in Young that this is a power which can be exercised only in the 'clearest of cases'" (p. 137).

68 In a similar decision on a motion to strike, Prothonotary Aalto also concluded that Cobb relates to abuse of the court process and that the plaintiff failed to plead facts making out this tort:

[64] On the tort of abuse of process, I agree with the Crown's submissions that Cobb does not support the Plaintiff's submission that this tort exists on these facts. In Cobb, the Supreme Court explicitly defined abuse of process as abuse of the Court's own process and that definition did not include a public official's abuse of any process in a vacuum. The Plaintiff neither pleads facts relating to an abuse of a Court process nor did he provide any case-law that expands the tort of abuse of process beyond the abuse of the Court's process as conceptualized in Cobb.

(Almacén v Her Majesty the Queen, 2015 FC 957, upheld at 2016 FC 300 and subsequently upheld at 2016 FCA 296)

69 Moreover, the Plaintiffs pleaded no material facts going to the elements of this tort in their statement of claim (i.e. how or when a court process was abused). Actually, when discussions of immigration officials came before this Court, twice they were returned for a new determination. It is difficult to see how seizing the Court on judicial review by the Plaintiffs can be an abuse of process of the Court by the Defendant. Therefore, I am striking this claim without leave to amend.

Claim 4: Negligence and negligent investigation

70 The statement of claim pleaded negligence and negligent investigation as follows:

36. In the alternative the Plaintiffs state that, the Defendants' officials have been negligent, and engaged in negligent investigation, in the exercise of their common-law, statutory, and constitutional duties owed to the Plaintiffs in that:

- (i) the Defendants' officials owe a common-law, statutory, and constitutional, duty of care to competently and with due dispatch properly process an application sent back by judicial order pursuant to an application for judicial review under the statutory scheme pursuant to the IRPA as well as competently and diligently investigate any allegations of inadmissibility;
- (ii) the Defendants' officials breached this duty of care; and
- (iii) as a result of this breach the Plaintiffs have suffered loss and damages which includes, inter alia;

A/ the mental suffering and distress of separation between the plaintiffs and their family in Canada, also protected by s.7 of the Charter;

B/ irreparable loss of companionship, of the Plaintiffs, particularly that involving the children;

C/ economic loss, to be quantified at trial, in being deprived of, inter alia;

- (i) the benefit of the Plaintiff, Emad Al Omani, to exercise his proper place and activity in the joint business interests of his brother in Canada;
- (ii) the incursion of legal costs incurred to date, to be determined at trial;

D/ the mental stress and anguish of falsely being branded as associated with Al Qaeda, or such groups, which further endangers their very lives;

E/ their right to equal treatment and protection under the law, as required by s. 3(3)(d) of the IRPA, the structural imperatives of the Constitution, as well as s. 15 of the Charter, and loss of their dignity to the extent of unequal treatment under the law.

71 The Defendant argues that the Plaintiffs have failed to plead material facts pertaining to each element of a negligence action, particularly duty of care and breach of the standard of care. I agree. The pleadings are declaratory, without any connection of material facts with the elements of the tort.

72 When a duty of care is not clearly established in the case law, the Anns test is used to determine if a duty exists, as per Cooper v Hobart, 2001 SCC 79, [2001] 3 SCR 537 at paragraph 30. The Defendant summarized the test at paragraph 36 of her written representations:

- (a) Does the relationship between the parties in the circumstances disclose the reasonably foreseeable harm and proximity sufficient to establish a prima facie duty of care; and
- (b) Notwithstanding the existence of a prima facie duty of care, are there residual policy considerations that should negative the imposition of a duty of care?

73 The only allegations that the Plaintiffs pleaded with respect to duty of care is to allege that the Defendant owes a duty of care to (i) "competently and with due dispatch properly process an application sent back by judicial order pursuant to an application for judicial review under the statutory scheme pursuant to the IRPA" and to (ii) "competently and diligently investigate any allegations of inadmissibility" (at para 36 of the statement of claim). They pleaded no facts whatsoever going to either element of the Anns test (Anns v Merton London Borough Council, [1978] AC 728 (HL)).

74 The Plaintiffs also pleaded scarce facts as to the breach of this alleged duty of care. Repeating the points above, they allege the Defendant did not properly process an application sent back by judicial review and did not properly investigate allegations of inadmissibility. In my view, this is less than thin.

75 The Plaintiffs stated that there exists a duty of care without even alleging how that can be. What is the duty of care that was owed by immigration officers? The English Court of Appeal in W. v Home Office, [1997] E.W.J. No. 3289 (QL) [W. v Home Office] found twenty years ago that there is no proximity such that a duty of care exists between a plaintiff and immigration officers. One can read at para 28:

The process whereby the decision making body gathers information and comes to its decision cannot be the subject of an action in negligence. It suffices to rely on the absence of the required proximity. In gathering information, and taking it into account, the Defendants are acting pursuant to their statutory powers and within that area of their discretion where only deliberate abuse would provide a private remedy. For them to owe a duty of care to immigrants would be inconsistent with the proper performance of their responsibilities as immigration officers. In conducting their inquiries, and making decisions in relation to immigrants, including whether they should be detained pending those inquiries, and making decisions in relation to immigrants, including whether they should be detained pending those inquiries, they are acting in that capacity of public servant to which the considerations outlined above apply.

That is the view taken by this Court in Premakumaran v Canada, [2005] F.C.J. No. 1388 [Premakumaran].

76 In that case, finding support in A. O. Farms Inc v Canada, [2000] F.C.J. no 1771, 28 Admin LR (3d) 315 (FCA), the Court found that the immigration officers as agents of the government owe "a duty of care to the public as a whole and not to the individual Plaintiffs. The Plaintiffs cannot be considered a "neighbour" for these purposes and no such relationship should be created between the Defendant and individual members of the public" (Premakumaran, at para 25). The Federal Court of Appeal agreed. It found that "(i)n this case, however, no duty of care arises. As the Motions Judge correctly found, no special relationship of proximity and reliance is present on the facts of this case" (Premakumaran v Canada, 2006 FCA 213, [2007] 2 FCR 191, at para 24). It is one thing to allege that the performance in office constitutes a misfeasance. It is quite another to base one's claim on a duty of care leading to a claim in negligence. Misfeasance and negligence are completely different and target different states of mind.

77 The W. v Home Office case found an echo in this Court in Benaissa. There, the Court found that the process of the gathering of information by the decision-making body leading to a decision cannot be the subject of an action in negligence. There may be, in my view, circumstances in which a degree of proximity will be sufficient. However, the bare assertion that unidentified immigration officers deliberately failed to process the application for permanent residence in a timely fashion does not plead the duty of care that would distinguish this case and the facts that could disclose the factual basis for the allegation of negligence. This does not disclose a reasonable cause of action. I cannot see a scintilla of a cause of action. There is not even the beginning of something that could be amended.

78 Justice Russell faced a similar statement of claim in Sivak. He struck the negligence claim for failing to plead material facts going to the essential elements of the tort of negligence:

[45] I also agree with the Defendants that the Plaintiffs have not pled, or factually substantiated, the essential elements of the tort of negligence.

[46] As the Defendants point out, to support a cause of action in negligence, a statement of claim must include sufficient facts to support the essential elements of the tort. These include establishing a duty of care, providing details of the breach of that duty, explaining the causal connection between the breach of duty and the injury, and setting out the actual loss. Such a claim requires a factual basis that identifies each wrongful act as well as negligence, such as the "when, what, by whom and to whom of the relevant circumstances." See Benaissa v Canada (Attorney General), 2005 FC 1220, at paragraph 24.

[47] The Plaintiffs make a bald allegation at paragraph 28(b) of the Claim that the "Defendants' officials have been negligent in the exercise of their common-law, statutory, and constitutional duties owed to the Plaintiffs" and that these duties arose in the context of the processing of their refugee claims pursuant to the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act. This is followed by unsubstantiated statements that the "Defendants' officials breached this duty of care" and that this caused the Plaintiffs' losses.

[48] I agree with the Defendants that such allegations are nothing more than conclusions and are not sufficient to support a cause of action in negligence. No details have been provided to identify the "Defendants' officials," to explain their roles and responsibilities in relation to the Plaintiffs, or to establish their connection to any of the parties. Similarly, the Claim is silent as to the "Defendants' officials" particular acts or omissions that the Plaintiffs' claim were negligent and no facts are included to support the specific "common-law, statutory and constitutional duties" that were allegedly breached. It seems to me that the general requirements for establishing liability in tort have not been met and it would be impossible to conduct the necessary analysis to determine whether liability could be established. As the Defendants point out, this is particularly difficult where the defendant is a government actor. Issues arise as to whether public law discretionary powers establish private law duties owed to particular individuals or whether the decisions in question were policy decisions or operational decisions. These questions are very complex and detailed factual pleadings are required in order to properly determine whether a cause of action exists.

79 In my view, the claim as pled does not disclose a reasonable cause of action; indeed, there is not even a scintilla of a cause of action. The pleadings are nothing other than general allegations and conclusions without providing the material facts required or even what the duty of care may be. Bare assertions of conclusions are not allegations of material facts. The Plaintiffs only declare that there exists some duty of care. The Court in Sivak, relying on Kisikawpimootewin v Canada, 2004 FC 1426 [Kisikawpimootewin] and Murray v Canada (1978), 21 NR 230 (FCA) found that "a claim that does not sufficiently reveal the facts upon which a cause of action is based, such that it is not possible for the defendant to answer or the Court to regulate the action, is a vexatious action" (para 30). The Plaintiffs have asserted the claim as an alternative. In so doing, they have failed to provide any material fact relevant to a negligence claim that could support what is at any rate a vague claim based on bald assertions and conclusions.

80 The tort of negligent investigation requires the Plaintiffs to plead facts pertaining to the conduct of the investigation into the inadmissibility finding to make out a reasonable cause of action (Hill v Hamilton-Wentworth Regional Police Services Board, 2007 SCC 41 at para 68). The Defendant argues that "[i]n the few cases where the standard of care has been held to have been breached, the conduct of investigators has involved egregious and overzealous behaviour" (at para 45 of the Defendant's written representations). Examples of such conduct include "ignoring exculpatory or other material evidence" and "making decisions based primarily on assumptions or stereotypes" (Safa Al Malki v Canada, 2012 ONSC 3023 at para 17). There is nothing of the sort that is even alleged by the Plaintiffs in this lawsuit.

81 The Supreme Court also noted in Woodhouse that citizens are not entitled to a certain level of thoroughness in an investigation, nor are they entitled to a certain outcome:

40 ... Individual citizens might desire a thorough investigation, or even that the investigation result in a certain outcome, but they are not entitled to compensation in the absence of a thorough investigation or if the desired outcome fails to materialize...

82 The statement of claim recounts only the principal Plaintiff's 15-minute interview where he was asked about Al Qaeda and states that the officer refused to explain the reason for the question; it pleads that these allegations have no basis:

24. On January 13th, 2014 the Plaintiff, Emad Al Omani was called in for a very brief interview with respect to his application re-determination.

25. On March 17th, 2014 the Plaintiff was, Emad Al Omani was sent a second negative decision, which stated and concluded, without any reasons whatsoever, that;

"In particular, there are reasonable grounds to believe that you are a member of the inadmissible class of persons described in 34(1)(f) of the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act." [...]

26. The Plaintiff, Emad Al Omani, advises that at no time was he either:

- (a) given notice of these outrageous and untrue conclusions and allegations; nor
- (b) shown any evidence nor any information, to address these false allegations and conclusions.

During the interview, the Plaintiff was asked an unfocused, nebulous, and non-contextual question about Al Qaeda. In fact, during the fifteen (15) minute interview, the Plaintiff, Emad Al Omani, was only asked two questions, namely:

- (a) to explain the change in his job description [...]
- (b) the officer asked the Plaintiff if the Plaintiff belonged to, or was in any way associated with "any group or organization like Al Qaeda in Iraq", to which the Plaintiff categorically replied that he did not belong to, nor associated with such groups as Al Qaeda, nor Al Qaeda itself.

The Plaintiff then asked the officer to be more specific with respect to why he would even ask such a question, but the immigration officer refused, citing "secrecy" barring him from divulging any Canadian government information.

27. The earlier application, which had been denied, had no such allegations nor conclusions for denial. It was denied based on the fact that some documents relating to Emad Al Omani, were missing, and a miscalculation and blatant error(s) in applying the selection criteria, for which it was sent back for reconsideration by Federal Court order.

83 Apart from these statements, no material facts are given. There is nothing on the conduct of the investigation that led to the inadmissibility finding. I agree with the Defendant that the statement of claim fails to plead facts, let alone sufficient material facts to establish the tort of negligent investigation other than suggesting that the Plaintiffs are unhappy with the conclusion reached that they are inadmissible. The pleadings do not even begin to give any indication to support a general allegation that the investigation may have been negligent. I see no scintilla of an argument and am striking this claim without leave to amend. There is not even the faintest allegation of the who, when, where, how and what giving rise to liability. It is plain and obvious that the claim cannot succeed. The Plaintiffs throw up in the air an accusation with nothing to support it. There is nothing to amend. Actually, the Plaintiffs did not even attempt to specify how the claim could be amended (Ward v Canada (Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness), 2014 FC 568, para 30). The fact of the matter is that there is no cause of action given the material facts pleaded. It is not so much that there are deficiencies which may be cured by amendment. There is no cause of action pleaded.

Claim 5: Conspiracy

84 In what appears to be the further alternative, the Plaintiffs allege that the Defendant is engaged in a conspiracy at paragraph 37 of their statement of claim:

37. The Plaintiffs further state that the Defendant's officials have:

- (a) (i) engaged, and are engaging in a conspiracy, through their conduct and communications, to deny the Plaintiff's statutory, constitutional, as well as international treaty rights, to deny their permanent residence under Canadian law, as well as a fair and impartial assessment of their application, a conspiracy as outlined, inter alia, by the Supreme Court of Canada in the test set out in Hunt v. Carey and jurisprudence cited therein, namely to;

A/ engage in an agreement for the use of lawful and unlawful means, and conduct, the predominant purpose of which is to cause injury to the Plaintiff; and/or

B/ to engage, in an agreement, to use unlawful means and conduct, whose predominant purpose and conduct directed at the Plaintiff, is to cause injury to the Plaintiff, or the Defendants' officials should know, in the circumstances, that injury to the Plaintiff, is likely to, and does result;

The details and particulars of which conspiracy(ies) are as follows:

- (b) that the first denial was a contrived denial made in bad faith, and absence of good faith, entirely designed and engineered to deny, contrary to law, the Plaintiffs' application;
- (c) that the inordinate, inexcusable, and castigating delay between the 1st judicial review determination, and second denial, as well as the inordinate, inexcusable and castigating delay since the 2nd judicial review, to the present, are all designed to stone-wall and deny the Plaintiffs' procedural and substantive rights to have their applications processed [sic];
- (d) that the baseless, false, and wholly contrived allegations of inadmissibility for association with Al Qaeda, or such groups, have been designed and engineered to simply deny the Plaintiffs their procedural and substantive right to have their application(s) processed under the IRPA.

The Plaintiffs state that all known (and unknown) officers to the Plaintiffs involved in the investigation, processing, and denial of the Plaintiffs' application have conspired with the goal of denying the Plaintiffs, by any and all means necessary, and therefore liable in conspiracy as set out by the Supreme Court of Canada, in Hunt v. Carey as follows [repeats test as set out above].

- 38. The Plaintiff states, and the fact is, that as a direct result of the Defendant's officials illegal actions, and tortious conduct, the Plaintiffs have, and will, suffer damages which he claims as set out the within statement of claim.

85 As the Plaintiffs outlined, Hunt explains that the tort of conspiracy can be established on two grounds: (i) the plaintiff can claim a conspiracy to injure in that two or more people work together in agreement using lawful or unlawful means for the predominant purpose of injuring the plaintiff, who is in fact injured; or (ii) the plaintiff can claim a conspiracy of unlawful acts where two or more people work together in agreement to engage in unlawful conduct directed toward the plaintiff that they ought to know is likely to cause injury to said plaintiff, who is in fact injured.

86 The Defendant referred to Normart Management Ltd v West Hill Redevelopment Co Ltd, (1998), 37 OR (3d) 97 (ONCA), for a list of the elements that need to be pleaded to establish a cause of action in conspiracy. The Ontario Court of Appeal writes at paragraph 21:

[21] In H.A. Imports of Canada Ltd. v. General Mills Inc. (1983), 42 O.R. (2d) 645, 150 D.L.R. (3d) 574 (H.C.J.), O'Brien J., dealing with the civil action of conspiracy as pleaded, quoted from Bullen, Leake and Jacob's Precedents of Pleadings, 12th ed. (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 1975), as follows at pp. 646-47:

The statement of claim should describe who the several parties are and their relationship with each other. It should allege the agreement between the defendants to conspire, and state precisely what the purpose or what were the objects of the alleged conspiracy, and it must then proceed to set forth, with clarity and precision, the overt acts which are alleged to have been done by each of the alleged conspirators in pursuance and in furtherance of the conspiracy; and lastly, it must allege the injury and damage occasioned to the plaintiff thereby.

87 The statement of claim under review speaks of denials to grant permanent residence based on flimsy reasons followed by long periods without any action on the part of the government; however it identifies those involved in the alleged grand conspiracy as "all known (and unknown) officers to the Plaintiffs involved in the investigation, processing, and denial of the Plaintiffs' application" (at para 37). This obviously does not constitute an identification by name. It is not either by group or job positions. The Plaintiffs identify officers based on their allegation that those who dealt with the matter, given that permanent residence was denied, have conspired together. The statement of claim does not describe the alleged conspirators' relationship with each other apart from implying that they are those who worked on the Plaintiffs' application at some point. It is as if the Plaintiffs seek to derive some conspiracy against them based on two denials and the periods of time between events.

88 The statement of claim fails to describe the agreement(s) between the alleged conspirators. It pleads their alleged overall approach--denying the processing of the Plaintiffs' permanent residence application "by any and all means necessary"--but does not plead material facts precisely describing the purpose of the agreement between the known and unknown officers. It is fine to have a conspiracy theory, but it must be spelled out. Crying "conspiracy" is not enough to disclose a reasonable cause of action.

89 Reading the pleadings as generously as can be, there is no way to decipher what the agreement may be, who the conspirators are, whether the alleged conspiracy has the predominant purpose to injure the Plaintiffs, as opposed to pursuing some other purpose, whether the alleged conspiracy is to use lawful or unlawful means. In other words, we are left with a bald and bold allegation without even attempting to define the essential elements of the tort alleged, and obviously, offering any fact, material or not, to substantiate an allegation.

90 Instead of identifying the branch of the tort of conspiracy the Plaintiffs wish to rely on in order to state material facts on which they actually rely, they make a completely generic assertion, without more. There is not even anything about how there can be a conspiracy, as opposed to, for instance mere knowledge or approval of a cause of conduct. Proof of agreement and execution is required. Nothing of the sort is alleged with material facts in support.

91 All that is known is that the Plaintiffs were denied permanent residence twice. The pleadings, in my view, amount to a complete absence of definition of the tort and its elements. It is plain and obvious that there is no reasonable cause of action. It is as if the Plaintiffs were suggesting that, given they were denied twice and there were delays, there must be somehow a conspiracy. It is not pleading conspiracy to merely allege these facts and, without more, suggest an agreement the purpose of which is unknown. Put a different way, the Plaintiffs seem to allege their experience with immigration authorities is such that there must be some conspiracy hatched somewhere.

92 The pleadings are also so deficient in factual material that the Defendant would be incapable to know how to answer. They are bare assertions that are unfounded; not only they do not disclose a reasonable cause of action they could be struck as frivolous or vexatious (Senechal v Muskoka (District Municipality), [2003] OJ No 885; Kisikawpimootewin supra).

93 In terms of overt acts, which would tend to show that some agreement to work together exists and could be opposed to the co-conspirators, the statement of claim simply references the first visa denial, the delay between the first judicial review and the second visa denial, the delay since the second judicial review, and the inadmissibility allegations. There is no trace of any agreement, just some discrete events. The Plaintiffs pleaded a series of independent events, and did not present anything tending to show that the conspirators agreed to undertake these acts to further the conspiracy; rather, they rely on their overarching statement that the Defendant aimed to deny the Plaintiffs' application processing, without more.

94 The nature of a conspiracy requires that there be participants, some known and others unknown, who agree to do something that will cause injury (Cement LaFarge v B.C. Lightweight Aggregate, [1983] 1 SCR 452). Here, the material facts allowing to conclude to some agreement are absent. The date, the object and the purpose of an agreement between unknown participants is not even pled. No overt act by the participants in furtherance of the conspiracy is offered in the pleadings. These are bald allegations involving undefined persons without even a hint of the agreement which is central to a claim of conspiracy. As found in Sivak at para 55, this constitutes a pleading that is vexatious (see also Kisikawpimootewin). It is not possible, on the basis of these pleadings, for the Defendant to know how to answer. The pleading is "so defective that it cannot be cured by simple amendment" (Krause v Canada, [1999] 2 FCR 476 (FCA)). The Plaintiffs never indicated how they could amend their pleadings on this front such that there could be some assessment of "the readiness of the amendments needed", in the words of the Federal Court of Appeal in Sweet.

95 I agree with the Defendant that the Plaintiffs have failed to plead all the elements of the tort of conspiracy. It may be argued that none were pleaded. It is entirely deficient with respect to pleading the essential elements of the tort. Given the complete lack of detail on the alleged agreement, I see no scintilla of an argument. As a result, I am striking this claim without leave to amend.

Claim 6: Breach of Plaintiffs' section 7 and 15 Charter rights

96 The Plaintiffs allege both section 7 and section 15 Charter breaches at various points in their statement of claim. They note that decisions under the IRPA must be applied in a manner that is consistent with the Charter:

33. The Plaintiffs state that the Defendants' officials have a common-law duty, as well as a statutory duty under s. 3(1)(f) of the IRPA, as interpreted and confirmed by this Court, in Dragan v Canada QL [2003] F.C.J. No. 260 and Liang v Canada (M.C.I.) 2012 FC 758 decisions to process applications consistently and promptly [...] and that such decisions must be Charter-compliant, as dictated by s. 3(3)(d) of the IRPA which states:
- (3) This Act is to be construed and applied in a manner that...
- (d) ensures that decisions taken under this Act are consistent with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, including its principles of equality and freedom from discrimination and of the equality of English and French as the official languages of Canada

97 The section 7 allegations appear at paragraphs 30, 32, and 36:

30. As a result of the Defendants' officials' inexcusable delay, false and unfounded allegations, and breach of duty to process the main Plaintiffs' application, the Plaintiffs have suffered the following damages:
- (a) with respect to Emad Al-Omani his wife and children, the dire danger, indelible stigma, and mental distress and suffering knowing that the High Commission is making false and unfounded allegations that he is associated with Al Qaeda, or such groups, as well as the mental suffering of not being able to join his brothers and families in Canada and the financial damages in not being able to engage with his brothers in their business in Canada, of which he has a financial interest;
- (b) the mental stress and anxiety, and endangerment of their lives, knowing that false allegations of association with Al Qaeda, or such groups, have been made which places their lives at risk in Saudi Arabia
- [...]
32. The Plaintiffs state, and the fact is that:
- (a) the Defendants' officials have [...]
- (iv) breached the plaintiffs constitutional right(s) to the Rule of Law and Constitutionalism, as well as their s. 7 and 15 Charter Rights; which tortious conduct has caused the damages set out in paragraph 30 in the statement of claim herein.

36. In the alternative the Plaintiffs state that, the Defendants' officials have been negligent, and engaged in negligent investigation, in the exercise of their common-law, statutory, and constitutional duties owed to the Plaintiffs in that [...]
- (iii) as a result of this breach the Plaintiffs have suffered loss and damages which includes, inter alia;
A/ the mental suffering and distress of separation between the Plaintiffs and their family in Canada, also protected by s.7 [...]

D/ the mental stress and anguish of falsely being branded as associated with Al Qaeda, or such groups, which further endangers their very lives;

98 The section 15 allegations at paragraphs 1, 30, 32, 36 centre on the allegation that the Plaintiffs were treated unequally on the grounds of race and national origin because they are Saudi Arabs:

1. The Plaintiffs claim: [...]
- iii) the actions and omissions of the visa office at the Canadian High Commission in London, England, constitutes a [...] breach of the Plaintiffs' right to the Rule of Law, Constitutionalism, as well as equal treatment, both under the underlying imperatives to the constitution as well as s. 15 of the Charter,
30. As a result of the Defendants' officials' inexcusable delay, false and unfounded allegations, and breach of duty to process the main Plaintiffs' application, the Plaintiffs have suffered the following damages: [...]
- (c) loss of dignity in being treated unequally contrary to s. 3(3)(d) of the IRPA, the unwritten principles of the constitution, and s. 15 of the Charter, based on race and national origin, to wit: as Saudi Arabs.
32. The Plaintiffs state, and the fact is that:
 - (a) the Defendants' officials have [...]
 - (iv) breached the plaintiffs constitutional right(s) to the Rule of Law and Constitutionalism, as well as their s. 7 and 15 Charter Rights;

which tortious conduct has caused the damages set out in paragraph 30 in the statement of claim herein. [...]

36. In the alternative the Plaintiffs state that, the Defendants' officials have been negligent, and engaged in negligent investigation, in the exercise of their common-law, statutory, and constitutional duties owed to the Plaintiffs in that [...]
- (iii) as a result of this breach the Plaintiffs have suffered loss and damages which includes, inter alia; [...]
 - E/ their right to equal treatment and protection under the law, as required by s. 3(3)(d) of the IRPA, the structural imperatives of the Constitution, as well as s. 15 of the Charter, and loss of their dignity to the extent of unequal treatment under the law.

99 A preliminary issue with the Plaintiffs' claim is whether the Plaintiffs hold sections 7 and 15 Charter rights that can be breached. The Plaintiffs are referred to as "Saudi nationals" in the statement of claim and it appears that the principal Plaintiff only interacted with immigration officers at the Canadian High Commission in London, United Kingdom. The Plaintiffs pleaded damages on the basis that they have not been able to join their family in Canada. They are not Canadian, nor is it clear they were in Canada when the alleged Charter violations occurred.

100 The Defendant did not raise this as a ground to strike the statement of claim, so I will not consider it in my decision on this motion. However, given the fundamental nature of this threshold issue I think it is worth summarizing recent law on the topic.

101 In Tabingo v Canada (Citizenship and Immigration), 2013 FC 377; [2014] 4 FCR 150, Justice Rennie questioned whether foreign nationals hold Charter rights and summarized the jurisprudence applicable to this issue at paragraphs 61-79. He found that the case law generally does not extend Charter rights to non-Canadians or those outside of Canada, but since the parties did not contest the issue, he did not draw his own conclusion:

[75] Other recent decisions of this Court have found that non-citizens outside of Canada generally do not hold Charter rights: Zeng v Canada (Attorney General), 2013 FC 104, paras 70-72; Kinsel v Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2012 FC 1515, paras 45-47; Toronto Coalition to Stop the War v Canada (Minister of Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness), 2010 FC 957, paras 81-82. These three decisions followed Justice Blanchard's determination that a Charter claim may only be advanced by an individual who is present in Canada, subject to criminal proceedings in Canada, or possessing Canadian citizenship.

[76] This limitation on the application of the Charter is not a recent development. Even prior to Slahi, [2009] F.C.J. No. 141, the Federal Court and the Federal Court of Appeal had interpreted Singh as barring Charter claims from non-citizens outside Canada: Canadian Council of Churches v Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), [1990] 2 FC 534 (CA) (aff'd on other grounds [1992] 1 SCR 236); Ruparel v Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), [1990] 3 FC 615; Lee v Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [1997] F.C.J. No 242; Deol v Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [2001] F.C.J. No 1034 (aff'd on other grounds 2002 FCA 271).

[77] The only exception counsel identified involved an applicant claiming the right to citizenship, rather than the privilege of immigration: Crease v Canada, [1994] 3 FC 480. In that case the applicant had applied for citizenship from within Canada and had a Canadian mother.

[78] The respondent does not dispute either the applicants' standing or the application of the Charter. The parties appear to coalesce around the proposition that the FSW applications establish a sufficient nexus with Canada to extend the reach of sections 7 and 15. The jurisprudence does not support this concession. What is in issue involves the repercussions abroad of domestic legislation. In this case, there is no question of the extra-territorial application of the Charter as an adjunct of the actions of Canadian officials abroad, nor is there, as I conclude on the evidence, non-compliant administration of the legislation. The issue framed by this case is whether the protections provided by sections 7 and 15 reach foreign nationals, when residing outside of or beyond Canadian territory.

[79] Despite my reservations as to the correctness of the concession, given that there is no lis between the parties on the issue, I will not determine the point. Charter jurisprudence should develop incrementally through the interface of opposing positions and interests. In any event, it is unnecessary to determine the point, as I find that the claims of infringement fail on their merits.

102 On appeal to the Federal Court of Appeal (Tabingo v Canada, 2014 FCA 191; [2015] 3 FCR 346 [Tabingo]), Justice Sharlow acknowledged Justice Rennie's remarks in Tabingo, but also found that she did not need to draw a conclusion on the issue:

[53] In this Court, the Minister argues that the applicants do not have rights under section 7 or subsection 15(1) of the Charter. However, for reasons that will become apparent from the discussion below, I do not consider it necessary to express an opinion on that point.

103 Putting aside this preliminary issue and turning to the causes of action as pleaded, statements of claim must plead material facts pertaining to each element of an alleged Charter violation. Once again, Mancuso provides useful guidance, at paragraph 21:

[21] There are no separate rules of pleadings for Charter cases. The requirement of material facts applies to pleadings of Charter infringement as it does to causes of action rooted in the common law. The Supreme Court of Canada has defined in the case law the substantive content of each Charter right, and a plaintiff must plead sufficient material facts to satisfy the criteria applicable to the provision in question. This is no mere technicality, "rather, it is essential to the proper presentation of Charter issues": Mackay v Manitoba, [1989] 2 S.C.R. 357 at p. 361.

104 The section 7 of constitutional right requires that it be established that the right to life, liberty or security has been violated. The pleadings are silent as to what right would have been violated. As it has been established, more than 30 years ago, the three interests protected by section 7 are distinct (Singh v Minister of Employment and Immigration, [1985] 1 SCR 177; Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, [1985] 2 SCR 486). There is no indication to be found in the pleadings of what interest is involved where a permanent resident visa has been denied to a foreigner.

105 Not only the interests are not identified such that could be identified the elements that need to be proven given the ambit of each interest, but the pleadings don't give any indication as to how the interest might be engaged. To put it another way, there are no material facts pleaded. What are the facts to support an allegation of interference with the life, the liberty or the security of a person that is not allowed to immigrate to Canada, a privilege that has not been elevated to the level of a right (Medovarski v Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2005 SCC 51, [2005] 2 SCR 539). At best, the pleadings speak in terms of mental stress and anxiety generated by governor action. It may be worth noting that the Supreme Court discussed that matter in Blencoe v British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), 2000 SCC 44, [2000] 2 SCR 307 [Blencoe] and found that stress, stigma and anxiety did not deprive of the right to life, liberty and security of the person:

97 To summarize, the stress, stigma and anxiety suffered by the respondent did not deprive him of his right to liberty or security of the person. The framers of the Charter chose to employ the words, "life, liberty and security of the person", thus limiting s. 7 rights to these three interests. While notions of dignity and reputation underlie many Charter rights, they are not stand-alone rights that trigger s. 7 in and of themselves. Freedom from the type of anxiety, stress and stigma suffered by the respondent in this case should not be elevated to the stature of a constitutionally protected s. 7 right.

If the Plaintiffs wish to make the case, especially in spite of Blencoe, they have to plead the material facts, which they have not done. They are essential (Mackay v Manitoba, [1989] 2 SCR. 357 [Mackay]) even more so perhaps where the Supreme Court has already found that stress, stigma and anxiety for someone living in this country did not rise to a constitutionally protected right. I do not wish to suggest that it cannot be done in an appropriate case; it is just that it is especially important that facts be pled such that there can be a reasonable cause of action. Otherwise, "the defendant would be left guessing as to the scope of the case it has to meet to respond to the section 7 infringement" (Mancuso, para 23).

106 I am comforted in my conclusion by the similar finding made in Sivak where the Court stated that the Plaintiffs "have failed to indicate how one or more of their protected interests have been infringed, and they have also failed to identify the circumstances or context in which the breaches allegedly occurred. I have to agree with the Defendants that the allegations in this regard are stated in the form of conclusions without factual basis." (para 73). To quote from Mackay at p 362, "Charter decisions cannot be based upon unsupported hypothesis of enthusiastic counsel."

107 The statement of claim also references mental suffering and financial damages resulting from the visa denials, neither of which are sufficient to ground a Charter claim in the absence of additional material facts as set out by the Federal Court of Appeal in Tabingo:

[97] The appellants are foreign nationals who reside outside Canada. Their only connection to Canada is that they have applied under a Canadian statute for the right to become permanent residents. They have no legal right to that status, and no right to enter or remain in Canada unless they attain that status. They had the right to seek permanent resident status under the IRPA, and when they did so they had the right to have their applications considered under the IRPA. However, neither of those rights is a right to life, liberty or security of the person. When their applications were terminated by subsection 87.4(1), they were not deprived of any right that is protected by section 7 of the Charter.

[98] The appellants argue that if their applications had been accepted they would have acquired the right to enter and remain in Canada, which means necessarily that they would also have acquired all Charter rights except those given only to citizens of Canada. They argue that, because of the importance of their objective of becoming permanent residents of Canada, the loss of their right to have their permanent resident visa applications considered is such a blow to their psychological and physical integrity that it should be construed as the loss of a right that is within the scope of section 7 of the Charter.

[99] I do not accept this argument. I have no doubt that the termination of the appellants' permanent resident visa applications caused them financial loss, but financial loss alone does not implicate the rights to life, liberty and security of the person. The termination of their applications could have been profoundly disappointing to the appellants and perhaps for some psychologically damaging, but the evidence does not establish the high threshold of psychological harm necessary to establish a deprivation of the right to security of the person: Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), [2000] 2 S.C.R. 307.

108 The Plaintiffs also failed to plead facts pertaining to the section 7 internal analysis regarding the principles of fundamental justice. Being deprived of the right to life, liberty or security of the person in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice is not violation of section 7. It simply does not suffice to make a general allegation that section 7 Charter rights have been violated

109 With respect to the section 15 claims, they suffer from the same deficiencies. The Defendant argues that the Plaintiffs must show that there has been a distinction on an enumerated or analogous ground and that this distinction creates a disadvantage by perpetuating prejudice or stereotyping to properly plead a section 15 claim: R v Kapp, 2008 SCC 41, [2008] 2 SCR 483 [Kapp] at para 17; Withler v Canada (Attorney General), 2011 SCC 12, [2011] 1 SCR 396 at paras 30-31. They argue that even if there are enough facts to show adverse impact on an enumerated ground, the statement of claim does not plead facts showing how the treatment amounts to discrimination. Such analysis includes various factors such as:

[...] (1) pre-existing disadvantage, if any, of the claimant group; (2) degree of correspondence between the differential treatment and the claimant group's reality; (3) whether the law or program has an ameliorative purpose or effect; and (4) the nature of the interest affected.

Kapp at para 19

110 I agree with the Defendant that the Plaintiffs have not provided any material facts establishing how they were discriminated against.

111 The statement of claim fails to plead the basic elements of either Charter claim. These pleadings are once again so defective that they cannot be cured by simple amendment. There is not a reasonable cause of action disclosed. Since I see no scintilla of a cause of action to be cured, I have to strike both, without leave to amend.

Claim 7: Damages

112 The Defendant argues that the Plaintiffs' damages should be struck for lacking particularity. Damages are primarily pleaded at paragraphs 1, 30 and 36 of the statement of claim:

1. The Plaintiffs claim:

- (a) general damages in the amount of $200,000 per Plaintiff;
- (b) aggravated damages in the amount of $50,000 per Plaintiff;
- (c) punitive damages in the amount of $50,000 per Plaintiff;
- (d) any and all economic loss damages pleaded, to be calculated at trial;

30. As a result of the Defendants' officials' inexcusable delay, false and unfounded allegations, and breach of duty to process the main Plaintiffs' application, the Plaintiffs have suffered the following damages:

- (a) with respect to Emad Al-Omani his wife and children, the dire danger, indelible stigma, and mental distress and suffering knowing that the High Commission is making false and unfounded allegations that he is associated with Al Qaeda, or such groups, as well as the mental suffering of not being able to join his brothers and families in Canada and the financial damages in not being able to engage with his brothers in their business in Canada, of which he has a financial interest;
- (b) the mental stress and anxiety, and endangerment of their lives, knowing that false allegations of association with Al Qaeda, or such groups, have been made which places their lives at risk in Saudi Arabia [...]

- (c) loss of dignity in being treated unequally contrary to s. 3(3)(d) of the IRPA, the unwritten principles of the constitution, and s. 15 of the Charter, based on race and national origin, to wit: as Saudi Arabs.

36. In the alternative the Plaintiffs state that, the Defendants' officials have been negligent [...]

(iii) as a result of this breach the Plaintiffs have suffered loss and damages which includes, inter alia;

A/ the mental suffering and distress of separation between the plaintiffs and their family in Canada, also protected by s.7 of the Charter;

B/ irreparable loss of companionship, of the Plaintiffs, particularly that involving the children;

C/ economic loss, to be quantified at trial, in being deprived of, inter alia;

(i) the benefit of the Plaintiff, Emad Al Omani, to exercise his proper place and activity in the joint business interests of his brother in Canada;

(ii) the incursion of legal costs incurred to date, to be determined at trial;

D/ the mental stress and anguish of falsely being branded as associated with Al Qaeda, or such groups, which further endangers their very lives;

E/ their right to equal treatment and protection under the law, as required by s. 3(3)(d) of the IRPA, the structural imperatives of the Constitution, as well as s. 15 of the Charter, and loss of their dignity to the extent of unequal treatment under the law.

113 The Plaintiffs argue that damages do not need to be precisely calculated at this stage. There is some support for this position in Woodhouse:

41 Although courts have been cautious in protecting an individual's right to psychiatric well-being, compensation for damages of this kind is not foreign to tort law. As the law currently stands, that the appellant has suffered grief or emotional distress is insufficient. Nevertheless, it is well established that compensation for psychiatric damages is available in instances in which the plaintiff suffers from a "visible and provable illness" or "recognizable physical or psychopathological harm": see for example Guay v. Sun Publishing Co., [1953] 2 S.C.R. 216, and Frame v. Smith, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 99. Consequently, even if the plaintiffs could prove that they had suffered psychiatric damage, in the form of anxiety or depression, they still would have to prove both that it was caused by the alleged misconduct and that it was of sufficient magnitude to warrant compensation. But the causation and magnitude of psychiatric damage are matters to be determined at trial. At the pleadings stage, it is sufficient that the statement of claim alleges that the plaintiffs have suffered mental distress, anger, depression and anxiety as a consequence of the alleged misconduct.

74 As discussed in the context of the actions for misfeasance in a public office, courts have been cautious in protecting an individual's right to psychiatric well-being, but it is well established that compensation for psychiatric damages is available in instances in which the plaintiff suffers a "visible and provable illness" or "recognizable physical or psychopathological harm". At the pleadings stage, it is sufficient that the statement of claim alleges mental distress, anger, depression and anxiety as a consequence of the defendant's negligence. Causation and the magnitude of psychiatric damage are matters to be determined at trial.

[my emphasis]

114 The same rule applies to other categories of damages. Other than damages alleged to result from the Charter violations that have been struck out, I agree with the Plaintiffs that the Defendant has not discharged her burden to show why the alleged damages should be struck. Whether they will be able to show that they have suffered damages, including that their psychiatric well-being has been affected beyond grief or emotional disturbance or distress, remains to be shown. However the test is not likelihood of success, but rather reasonable cause of action. I am allowing the damages to proceed as pleaded.

Claim 8: Whether Ministers should be named in the statement of claim

115 The statement of claim provides the following description of the named Defendants:

3. (a) the Defendant, Her Majesty the Queen is statutorily and vicariously liable for the acts and omissions of her servants pursuant to s. 17(1)(5) of the Federal Courts Act as well as ss. 24(1) and 52 of the Constitution Act, 1867, and in particular, any purported Crown prerogative, if any exists post the Patriation of the Constitution Act, 1982, and Canada Act, 1982, by the Defendants', the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and/or Citizenship and Immigration, employees of the Canadian High Commission in London, England;
- (b) The Defendant, the Minister of Foreign Affairs is statutorily and constitutionally responsible for maintaining and staffing Canada's visa posts abroad; and
- (c) The Defendant, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is statutorily and constitutionally responsible for administering the IRPA and its Regulations.

116 The defendants seek to strike the two named Ministers (Foreign Affairs and Citizenship and Immigration) in favour of a single defendant, Her Majesty the Queen who then becomes the Defendant. The defendants note that the named Ministers are not themselves liable for the damages claimed in this case (Federation of Newfoundland Indians v Canada, 2003 FCT 383 at para 30). In Cairns v Farm Credit Corp., [1992] 2 FC 115; 49 FTR 308, Justice Denault wrote:

[6] The plaintiffs have named the Honourable William McKnight as a defendant in this action. A Minister of the Crown cannot be sued in his representative capacity, nor can he be sued in his personal capacity unless the allegations against him relate to acts done in his personal capacity (Re Air India (1987), 62 O.R. (2d) 130, (sub nom. Air India Flight 182 Disaster Claimants v. Air India) 44 D.L.R. (4th) 317 (H.C.)). As the plaintiffs have made no claims against the Minister relating to actions done in his personal capacity, the Honourable William McKnight must be struck as a party to the action.

Similar comments are found in Mancuso v Canada (National Health and Welfare), at para 180. At the hearing of the case, counsel for the Plaintiffs all but conceded the point. At any rate, that appears to be the state of the law (Sibomana v Canada, 2016 FC 943 at paras 32-33).

117 I see no reason to name these two Ministers in the present case; therefore I am striking them from the statement of claim in favour of Her Majesty the Queen as the sole Defendant.

Claim 9: Constitutionality arguments regarding jury trials under the Federal Courts Act and leave for judicial review under the IRPA

118 The Plaintiffs indicated that they plan to constitutionally challenge section 49 of the Federal Courts Act, which bars jury trials, on the basis that it violates "the constitutional imperatives of Rule and Law and Constitutionalism, as well as the right to a jury trial, grounded in the Magna Carta, and continued in s. 11(f) of the Charter in the criminal context, as well as the residual clause of s. 7 of the Charter in the civil context [...]" (statement of claim, para 39).

119 The Plaintiffs also seek a declaration that subsection 72(1) of the IRPA is unconstitutional on the basis that the Defendant's officials "can perpetually deny a meritorious application whereby, sooner or later, a leave application will be denied" and a leave application is not, in itself, judicial review (at paras 40(a) and (c) of the statement of claim).

120 The Defendant argues that both arguments should be struck because they are wholly immaterial to the present action.

121 In Mancuso, the Federal Court of Appeal encountered a similar issue on a motion to strike seeking declarations on the constitutionality of other legislation. It concluded that while free-standing declarations of constitutionality are available, they require a factual grounding:

[32] [...] Free-standing declarations of constitutionality can be granted: Canadian Transit Company v. Windsor (Corporation of the City), 2015 FCA 88. But the right to the remedy does not translate into licence to circumvent the rules of pleading. Even pure declarations of constitutional validity require sufficient material facts to be pleaded in support of the claim. Charter questions cannot be decided in a factual vacuum: Mackay v. Manitoba, above, nor can questions as to legislative competence under the Constitution Act, 1867 be decided without an adequate factual grounding, which must be set out in the statement of claim. This is particularly so when the effects of the impugned legislation are the subject of the attack: Danson v. Ontario (Attorney General), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1086, at p. 1099.

[33] The Supreme Court of Canada in Canada (Prime Minister) v. Khadr, 2010 SCC 3, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 44, para. 46 articulated the pre-conditions to the grant of a declaratory remedy: jurisdiction over the claim and a real as opposed to a theoretical question in respect of which the person raising it has an interest.

[34] Following Khadr, this Court in Canada (Indian Affairs) v. Daniels, 2014 FCA 101, 2014 FCA 101 (leave to appeal granted) at paras. 77-79 highlighted the danger posed by a generic, fact-free challenge to legislation -- in other words, a failure to meet the second Khadr requirement. Dawson JA noted that legislation may be valid in some instances, and unconstitutional when applied to other situations. A court must have a sense of a law's reach in order to assess whether and by how much that reach exceeds the legislature's vires. It cannot evaluate whether Parliament has exceeded the ambit of its legislative competence and had more than an incidental effect on matters reserved to the provinces without examining what its legislation actually does. Facts are necessary to define the contours of legislative and constitutional competence. In the present case, this danger is particularly acute; as the judge noted, the legislation at issue pertains to literally thousands of natural health supplements.

[35] This is not new law. While the plaintiffs point to Solosky v. The Queen, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 821 for the proposition that there is a broad right to seek declaratory relief, Solosky also notes that there must be "a 'real issue' concerning the relative interests of each [party]." The Court cannot be satisfied that this requirement is met absent facts being pleaded which indicate what that real issue is and its nexus to the plaintiffs and their claim for relief.

122 With respect to the section 49 claim, I note that the Plaintiffs, in their memorandum of fact and law at paragraph 18, explain that this is not an argument, but rather a notice of relief to be sought. There is nothing else. Justice Zinn struck the same section 49 argument in Cabral v Canada (Citizenship and Immigration), 2016 FC 1040 as immaterial to the present action. I agree. If it is no more than a notice that something will follow, it is useless; furthermore, the said notice does not even contemplate section 26 of the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act, RSC, 1985, c C-50. It is a different matter of a procedural nature which does not accord with a statement of claim. It shall be struck from the statement of claim. In so doing I do not wish to suggest that the constitutionality of section 49 cannot be attacked in these proceedings.

123 With respect to the Plaintiffs' claim respecting subsection 72(1) of the IRPA, I agree with the Defendant that this pleading is immaterial at this point. The Plaintiffs have had two visa decisions quashed and sent back for judicial review. Each time leave was evidently granted. The statement of claim references a hypothetical future refusal to grant leave. That cannot be the basis of a challenge to the legislation in this case. This is no more than a theoretical question, certainly not a real question on the facts of this case. As a result, the Plaintiffs' complete lack of factual basis on which to bring this claim, I am striking this claim without leave to amend.

VI. Conclusion

124 If there is compensation to be awarded, it is not through the law of conspiracy or negligence, but rather through the law of misfeasance in public office, once properly pleaded. There is simply nothing to suggest in the statement of claim that the essential elements of the tort have even been considered. It is simply not enough to say "negligence" or "conspiracy". More is needed to have a scintilla of a cause of action. The essential elements of one cause of action are not the same as another cause of action. Misfeasance is not negligence, and negligence is not conspiracy. The material facts for each will vary. The approach taken was in effect to tell the story generally without connecting the facts to the causes of action alleged later in the document. At the end of the day, we are left with a narrative that supports a cause of action in misfeasance, which requires to be pled with more precision, but is dearly missing with respect to the alternative causes of action in negligence and conspiracy. In my view, there is a scintilla of cause of action in misfeasance pleaded such that with appropriate amendments in order to allege the material facts required, the matter could proceed further.

125 Some of the claims are therefore struck out, without leave to amend:

1. misfeasance in public office -- refusal to abide by court order
2. misfeasance in public office -- refusal to answer questions
3. abuse and excess of jurisdiction and authority
4. abuse of process
5. negligence and negligent investigation
6. conspiracy
7. sections 7 and 15 of the Charter violations
8. constitutional arguments concerning section 49 of the Federal Courts Act and section 72 of the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act.

126 Some claims are struck with leave to amend:

1. misfeasance in public office -- refusal to issue visas and delay in issuing visas
2. misfeasance in public office -- delay in issuing visas
3. damages -- Charter violations.

127 Finally, the named ministers are struck in favour of Her Majesty the Queen.

128 Given the split success on the motion, there will not be an award of costs.

ORDER in T-1774-15

THIS COURT ORDERS that for the reasons given, the following causes of action are struck out from the statement of claim, without leave to amend, pursuant to Rule 221(1) of the Federal Courts Rules:

1. misfeasance in public office -- refusal to abide by court order
2. misfeasance in public office -- refusal to answer questions
3. abuse and excess of jurisdiction and authority
4. abuse of process
5. negligence and negligent investigation
6. conspiracy
7. sections 7 and 15 of the Charter violations

8. constitutional arguments concerning section 49 of the Federal Courts Act and section 72 of the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act.

For the reasons given, the following sections are struck from the statement of claim, with leave to amend, pursuant to Rule 221(1) of the Federal Courts Rules:

1. misfeasance in public office -- refusal to issue visas and delay in issuing visas
2. misfeasance in public office -- delay in issuing visas
3. damages -- Charter violations.

In view of the fact that the success is split on this motion to strike, no costs will be awarded.

On the consent of both parties, the Plaintiffs will have 60 days from the date of this Order to file an amended statement of claim and the Defendant will have 30 days to file a Statement of Defence from the date of service of the amended statement of claim.

Civil litigation — Civil procedure — Pleadings — Striking out pleadings or allegations — Grounds — Failure to disclose a cause of action or defence — Motion by plaintiff for order setting aside order striking amended statement of claim dismissed — Appellant, who was married, commenced same sex relationship with Canadian male overseas — Appellant later moved to Canada and lived with male partner, who supported him — After appellant's claim for permanent residence on H&C considerations was denied, he commenced tort claim — Claim was attempt to re-litigate reasonableness of H&C decision and, as such, was an abuse of process — Claim did not disclose reasonable cause of action as no material facts to support causes of action claimed were pleaded.

Tort law — Practice and procedure — Pleadings — Amendment — Adding or striking out claim — Motion by plaintiff for order setting aside order striking amended statement of claim dismissed — Appellant, who was married, commenced same sex relationship with Canadian male overseas — Appellant later moved to Canada and lived with male partner, who supported him — After appellant's claim for permanent residence on H&C considerations was denied, he commenced tort claim — Claim was attempt to re-litigate reasonableness of H&C decision and, as such, was an abuse of process — Claim did not disclose reasonable cause of action as no material facts to support causes of action claimed were pleaded.

Motion by the plaintiff for an order setting aside an order striking his amended statement of claim. The appellant was a male Filipino national who was married to a woman in the Philippines. In 2005, while residing in Qatar, the appellant met and entered into a romantic relationship with a Canadian male. He returned to the Philippines to run and internet cafe. At some point, he moved to Canada to work as an assistant manager in a Chinese restaurant as arranged by his male partner. In 2013, the appellant moved in with his male partner, who had supported him since that time. The appellant applied to remain in Canada on humanitarian and compassionate grounds based on his homosexual relationship and his ineligibility to be sponsored as a common law spouse. The appellant's H&C application was denied, as was his application for leave and judicial review. The appellant commenced a tort action against the Crown asserting several causes of action against the officer who decided the negative H&C decision alleging, among other things, that he knowingly misapplied the law with respect to s. 25 of the IRPA, deliberately made misstatements of fact, chose not to give articulated reasons, discriminated against him and his partner and ignored s. 3(1)(d) of the IRPA. The claim also alleged that the officer exceeded her authority, engaged in an abuse of process, breached the appellant's constitutional rights. He claimed damages for lost wages, mental suffering and distress for Charter breaches, the tort of abuse of process and excess of authority, misfeasance of public office and negligence. The respondent brought a motion to strike the claim as disclosing no reasonable cause of action and for being an abuse of the Court process. The prothonotary allowed the motion and struck the claim in its entirety with no leave to amend. The prothonotary found that the torts of abuse of process, abuse and excess of authority and the Charter arguments were unsupported and unsubstantiated and were bald conclusions with no material facts. As such, they were struck. With respect to the tort of misfeasance in public office, the prothonotary held that, even if all allegations made were true, there were no material facts pleaded that suggested that the officer acted outside the scope of her authority and that could give rise to a cause of action. With respect to the allegations of negligence, the prothonotary found that there were no material facts to support a private law duty of care. He further found that even if a duty of care existed between the appellant and the Crown, the cause of action for negligence would fail for policy considerations. Finally, the prothonotary concluded that the claim would also fail on the basis of being a collateral attack. On appeal, the appellant argued that the prothonotary misapplied the test on a motion to strike and usurped the function of the trial judge by rendering judgment on the merits without trial and that he erred in striking the claim.

HELD: Motion dismissed.

The claim was simply an attempt to re-litigate the reasonableness of the H&C decision, and the Court had already dealt with the reasonableness of that decision. As such, it was an abuse of process. Furthermore, the claim did not disclose a reasonable cause of action. There were no facts pleaded in the claim to support the causes of action alleged.

ORDER AND REASONS

RUSSELL J.

I. INTRODUCTION

1 This is a motion brought by the Appellant (Plaintiff), pursuant to Rule 51 of the Federal Court Rules, SOR/98-106 [Rules], for an order setting aside the Order and Reasons of Prothonotary Aalto, dated August 10, 2015 [Decision], which struck the Appellant's Amended Statement of Claim of September 23, 2014 [Claim].

II. BACKGROUND

2 The Appellant is a male Filipino national who is married to a woman in the Philippines. In 2005, the Appellant resided in Doha, Qatar where he worked at a clothing store. That same year, he met and entered into a romantic relationship with Mr. Tim Leahy.

3 In August 2009, the Appellant returned from Qatar to the Philippines to run an internet café that he had opened in January 2009 alongside his business partner, who he subsequently bought out in April 2010. At some point after this, Mr. Leahy arranged for the Appellant to move to Edmonton to work as an assistant manager in a Chinese Restaurant. The Appellant sold his business in the Philippines and moved to Canada.

4 Following the closure of the Chinese restaurant in Edmonton, the Appellant moved to Toronto in January 2013 to live with Mr. Leahy who has supported him since that time.

5 In October 2013, the Appellant applied on humanitarian and compassionate [H&C] grounds, based on his homosexual relationship, to remain in Canada, pursuant to s 25 of the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act, SC 2011, c 27 [IRPA]. The Appellant alleges that an H&C application was the only option available to him as he was not eligible, given his marriage in the Philippines and the duration of his relationship with Mr. Leahy, to be sponsored as a common-law spouse.

6 On February 10, 2014, the Appellant's H&C application was denied. On October 28, 2014, Justice Shore denied leave and judicial review of the H&C decision (IMM-883-13). A subsequent motion for reconsideration of this dismissal was dismissed on January 27, 2015.

A. The Claim

7 The Appellant commenced a contemporaneous tort action against the Crown asserting several causes of action against the officer who decided the negative H&C decision [Officer], including claims that the Officer committed the following acts in order to generate a negative decision:

- (1) Knowingly misapplied the law with respect to s 25 of IRPA;
- (2) Deliberately made the following misstatements of fact:
 - (a) The [Appellant] was in Canada without lawful status;
 - (b) The [Appellant] had not resided in the Philippines for the last 3 1/2 years; and
 - (c) Mr. Leahy could sponsor the [Appellant] to immigrate to Canada (which is untrue as the Plaintiff is married to a woman in the Philippines and divorce is not legal in the Philippines).
- (3) Knowingly chose not to give articulated reasons addressing the [Appellant's] factors and application;
- (4) Knowingly chose not to make the only reasonable decision in the circumstances, a positive decision, in order to generate a negative decision;
- (5) Discriminated against the [Appellant] and his partner based on sexual orientation in order to generate a negative decision;
- (6) Knowingly ignored section 3(1)(d) of the IRPA in order to generate a negative decision.

8 The Claim also pleads that the Officer further abused and exceeded her authority by notifying Canadian Border Services Agency [CBSA] of her negative decision for the purposes of preparing the Appellant for removal from Canada, which is beyond her scope and authority and which breaches the Privacy Act, RSC 1985, c P-21.

9 Additional allegations in the Claim include that the Officer:

- Engaged in abuse and excess of jurisdiction and authority as historically contemplated and set out by the Supreme Court of Canada in Roncarelli v Duplessis, [1959] SCR 121;

- Engaged in abuse of process at common law and s 7 of the Charter as enunciated inter alia, by the Supreme Court in USA v Cobb, [2001] 1 SCR 587;
- Breached the [Appellant's] constitutional right to the Rule of Law and Constitutionalism as well as his s 7 and s 15 Charter rights by placing his very life, liberty and security of person under threat of deportation, based on sexual orientation; which tortious conduct has caused the damages set out in the Claim.

10 The Appellant claimed damages for lost wages, mental suffering, and distress arising from the following causes of action:

- (1) The Crown's breach of sections 7 and 15 of the Charter;
- (2) The tort of abuse and excess of authority;
- (3) The tort of abuse of process;
- (4) Mifeasance in public office; and
- (5) Negligence.

11 The Claim concludes by stating that the Appellant will bring a constitutional challenge by way of application to strike s 49 of the Federal Courts Act, RSC, 1985, c F-7, which bars jury trials and thus violates the constitutional imperatives of the rule of law, constitutionalism and the right of the jury trial grounded in the Magna Carta, and continued in ss 11(f) and 7 of the Charter, as well as the residual clause of s 7 of the Charter in the civil context.

12 In response, the Respondent brought a motion to strike the Claim as disclosing no reasonable cause of action and for being an abuse of the Court process.

III. DECISION UNDER REVIEW

13 On August 10, 2015, Prothonotary Aalto granted the Respondent's motion and struck the Claim in its entirety, with no leave to amend.

14 The Decision applied the following legal tests, respectively, when considering the issues of striking a pleading under Rule 221 of the Rules, mifeasance in public office, and whether there is a duty of care owed by the Crown to a Plaintiff under the tort of negligence: (1) whether it is plain and obvious on the material facts pleaded that the action cannot succeed: Sivak v Canada, 2012 FC 272 [Sivak]; R v Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd, 2011 SCC 42 [Imperial Tobacco]; (2) whether the cause of action requires deliberate and unlawful conduct which would likely harm the Plaintiff: Odhavji v Woodhouse, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 263 [Odhavji]; and (3) whether the facts as pleaded disclose a proximate relationship between the Plaintiff and Defendant wherein failure to take reasonable care might foreseeably cause loss or harm to the Plaintiff; and if yes, whether there are policy considerations which exist that outweigh recognizing a duty of care: Cooper v Hobart, 2001 SCC 79.

15 The Decision engaged in a thorough overview of both the Appellant and Respondent's submissions on the motion before proceeding to analyze the mifeasance, negligence and other miscellaneous torts alleged by the Appellant to have been committed by the Officer.

16 The miscellaneous torts alleged by the Appellant included the torts of abuse of process, abuse and excess of authority, and arguments related to the Charter. Prothonotary Aalto noted that the Appellant spent little time substantiating these arguments and agreed with the Respondent that the Claim disclosed no reasonable cause of action related to them. Specifically, as regards the tort of abuse of process, the Prothonotary found that USA v Cobb, [2001] 1 SCR 587 [Cobb] did not support the Appellant's submission that the tort exists. Looking next to the tort of abuse and excess of authority, the Prothonotary took guidance from Odhavji, above, and Roncarelli v Duplessis, [1959] SCR 121 [Roncarelli]. Finally, in terms of the Appellant's Charter arguments, the Prothonotary noted that such claims should not be made in a "factual vacuum": MacKay v Manitoba, [1989] 2 SCR 357 (SCC).

The Prothonotary found each of these three tortious allegations to be unsupported and unsubstantiated; they were bald conclusions with no material facts. As such, they were struck.

17 The Prothonotary next considered the law relating to misfeasance in public office, noting that as per Odjavji, above, there were two fundamental elements to make out the tort: (1) did an officer of the Crown engage in deliberate and unlawful conduct as a public officer; and (2) was the public officer aware that the conduct was unlawful and likely to cause harm to the plaintiff? The Prothonotary held that, even if all allegations made were true, there were no material facts pleaded that suggest that the Officer acted outside the scope of her authority and that could give rise to a cause of action. The Prothonotary pointed out that there is no entitlement to a positive H&C determination. It remains inherently discretionary. Therefore, the Claim's submissions respecting this tort were also struck.

18 Finally, as regards the allegations of negligence, the Prothonotary found that there were no material facts to support a private law duty of care. The Anns test, as articulated by the Supreme Court of Canada, requires a relationship of sufficient proximity between the Crown and the Plaintiff that discloses reasonably foreseeable harm to establish a prima facie duty of care: Imperial Tobacco, above, at para 49; Anns v Merton London Borough Council, [1978] AC 728 [Anns]. The Prothonotary concluded that even if such a duty existed, the cause of action for negligence would fail for residual policy considerations. Prothonotary Aalto indicated that imposing a duty of care for the failure to make a positive H&C decision has the potential to create an indeterminate liability for all H&C applications which are denied. The Claim's submissions pertaining to negligence were also struck.

19 The Prothonotary then went on to find that if his analysis pertaining to misfeasance and negligence are incorrect, the Claim still fails on the basis of being a collateral attack on the decision of Justice Shore in IMM-883-14, and an abuse of process of the Court. The Claim is a disguised attempt to re-litigate the reasonableness of the H&C decision for the fourth time when the matter has already been decided at the immigration stage in the denial of the application for leave and judicial review, as well as in the denial of further reconsideration.

IV. STATUTORY PROVISIONS

20 The following provisions of Immigration and Refugee Protection Act, SC 2001, c 27 [IRPA] are applicable in this proceeding:

Objectives -- immigration

3 (1) The objectives of this Act with respect to immigration are

...

(d) to see that families are reunited in Canada;

Humanitarian and compassionate considerations

25 (1) Subject to subsection (1.2), the Minister must, on request of a foreign national in Canada who applies for permanent resident status and who is inadmissible -- other than under section 34, 35 or 37 -- or who does not meet the requirements of this Act, and may, on request of a foreign national outside Canada - - other than a foreign national who is inadmissible under section 34, 35 or 37 -- who applies for a permanent resident visa, examine the circumstances concerning the foreign national and may grant the foreign national permanent resident status or an exemption from any applicable criteria or obligations of this Act if the Minister is of the opinion that it is justified by humanitarian and compassionate considerations relating to the foreign national, taking into account the best interests of a child directly affected.

Objet en matière d'immigration

3 (1) En matière d'immigration, la présente loi a pour objet :

...

(d) de veiller à la réunification des familles au Canada;

Séjour pour motif d'ordre humanitaire à la demande de l'étranger

25 (1) Sous réserve du paragraphe (1.2), le ministre doit, sur demande d'un étranger se trouvant au Canada qui demande le statut de résident permanent et qui soit est interdit de territoire -- sauf si c'est en raison d'un cas visé aux articles 34, 35 ou 37 --, soit ne se conforme pas à la présente loi, et peut, sur demande d'un étranger se trouvant hors du Canada -- sauf s'il est interdit de territoire au titre des articles 34, 35 ou 37 -- qui demande un visa de résident permanent, étudier le cas de cet étranger; il peut lui octroyer le statut de résident permanent ou lever tout ou partie des critères et obligations applicables, s'il estime que des considérations d'ordre humanitaire relatives à l'étranger le justifient, compte tenu de l'intérêt supérieur de l'enfant directement touché.

21 The following provisions of the Rules are applicable in this proceeding:

Appeal

51 (1) An order of a prothonotary may be appealed by a motion to a judge of the Federal Court.

Motion to strike

221 (1) On motion, the Court may, at any time, order that a pleading, or anything contained therein, be struck out, with or without leave to amend, on the ground that it

- (a) discloses no reasonable cause of action or defence, as the case may be,
- (b) is immaterial or redundant,
- (c) is scandalous, frivolous or vexatious,
- (d) may prejudice or delay the fair trial of the action,
- (e) constitutes a departure from a previous pleading, or
- (f) is otherwise an abuse of the process of the Court, and may order the action be dismissed or judgment entered accordingly.

Appel

51 (1) L'ordonnance du protonotaire peut être portée en appel par voie de requête présentée à un juge de la Cour fédérale.

Requête en radiation

221 (1) À tout moment, la Cour peut, sur requête, ordonner la radiation de tout ou partie d'un acte de procédure, avec ou sans autorisation de le modifier, au motif, selon le cas :

- (a) qu'il ne révèle aucune cause d'action ou de défense valable;
- (b) qu'il n'est pas pertinent ou qu'il est redondant;
- (c) qu'il est scandaleux, frivole ou vexatoire;
- (d) qu'il risque de nuire à l'instruction équitable de l'action ou de la retarder;
- (e) qu'il diverge d'un acte de procédure antérieur;
- (f) qu'il constitue autrement un abus de procédure.

Elle peut aussi ordonner que l'action soit rejetée ou qu'un jugement soit enregistré en conséquence.

V. ISSUES

22 The Appellant submits that the following are at issue in this proceeding:

1. Whether the Prothonotary misapplied the test on a motion to strike and usurped the function of the trial judge by rendering judgment on the merits without a trial; and
2. Whether the Prothonotary erred in law in striking his Claim.

VI. ARGUMENT

A. Appellant

(1) Motion to Strike

23 The test on a motion to strike is high in that such an occurrence should only take place where the pleading is "bad beyond argument." The Appellant submits that the Prothonotary misapplied the test on a motion to strike: Nelles v Ontario (1989), 60 DLR (4th) 609 (SCC); Dumont v Canada (Attorney General) [1990], 1 SCR 279; Hunt v Carey Canada Inc., [1990] 2 SCR 959. The Appellant points to the jurisprudence for further guiding principles, emphasizing that a statement of claim should not be struck simply because it is novel (Nash v Ontario (1995), 27 OR (3d) 1 (CA)), and that the Respondent must produce a case directly on point from the same jurisdiction (Dalex Co v Schawartz Levitsky Feldman (1994), 19 OR (3d) 463 (Gen Div)), and that the Court should be generous and allow an amendment before striking (Grant v Cormier (2001), 56 OR (3d) 215 (Ont CA)).

24 The Appellant submits that the Decision failed to apply the test or jurisprudence applicable on a motion to strike. Instead, it decided the case on the pleadings, without a trial, usurping the function of the trial judge. The Prothonotary ignored the facts pleaded and/or reconfigured other facts pleaded as bald statements in order to dismiss the facts, on their substance, rather than take them as proven, as is required by the jurisprudence: Canada (Attorney General) v Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, [1980] 2 SCR 735.

(2) Errors of Law

25 The Appellant further argues that the Prothonotary blatantly erred when ruling that the Claim failed as a collateral attack. "Collateral attack" can only be used as a defence at trial and is not a basis to call into question jurisdiction or to strike a claim. The Appellant says that the Supreme Court has, on numerous occasions, made it clear that, whether or not judicial review has been brought, a plaintiff maintains a right to commence an action without bringing into question the jurisdictional issue of collateral attack: Canada (Attorney General) v TeleZone Inc., 2010 SCC 62 [TeleZone]; Canada (Attorney General) v McArthur, 2010 SCC 63; Parrish & Heimbecker Ltd v Canada (Agriculture and Agri-Food), 2010 SCC 64 [Parrish].

26 As regards the torts of excess of authority and public misfeasance, the Appellant points to paragraphs 12, 13 and 15 of the Decision, and says that the Prothonotary erred in finding that the relevant material facts were not pleaded. Further, the Appellant alleges that jurisdiction was exceeded when the Prothonotary made factual findings in a vacuum, and by holding that the determination of an H&C application is inherently discretionary: Rudder v Canada, 2009 FC 689 at para 37 [Rudder]; Lemus v Canada (Citizenship and Immigration), 2014 FCA 114 at para 38 [Lemus].

27 As regards negligence, the Appellant argues that, contrary to the findings of the Prothonotary, there is a duty owed by the Crown to an applicant to process applications: Liang v Canada (Citizenship and Immigration), 2012 FC 758 at para 25; Dragan v Canada, [2003] F.C.J. No 260 at para 45.

28 The Appellant also argues that the Prothonotary erred further by ruling that "imposing a duty of care for the failure to obtain a positive H&C decision has the potential to create an indeterminate liability for all H&C applications which are denied. H&C applications are discretionary and fact based."

29 The Appellant submits that jurisdiction was further exceeded by the Prothonotary's over-generalizing his Claim by stating that he was pleading that all H&C applications had a right to a positive decision. The Appellant says that this is not the case, and that on the facts pleaded: he has a right to a positive decision; that jurisprudence exists that such a conclusion can be drawn with respect to temporary visas (Rudder, above); and that mandamus lies to compel a positive decision under s 25 of IRPA: Lemus, above.

30 The Appellant says that the Prothonotary also overstepped his jurisdiction by acting as a "hybrid applications/trial judge" rather than deciding a motion to strike. He seeks an order setting aside the Decision, an order granting the relief that he alleges should have been granted by Prothonotary Aalto, costs of both the motion before Prothonotary Aalto and the within appeal, as well as any such further order or direction the Court deems just.

B. Respondent

31 The Claim was struck by Prothonotary Aalto for two reasons: it was an attempt to re-litigate an issue already decided by the Court and it did not plead material facts to support the causes of action claimed. The Respondent submits that the Appellant has not shown that either of these reasons warrant an appeal.

32 The Respondent says that the Appellant has failed to demonstrate that the decision-maker gave insufficient weight to relevant factors or proceeded on a wrong principle of law.

33 The Appellant claims that the Respondent is liable for abuse of process, excess of jurisdiction and damages for breaches of the Charter. However, the Respondent submits that the Appellant has failed to raise any factual or legal argument to challenge Prothonotary Aalto's findings in regards to these claims. Therefore in this regard, the Decision should not be disturbed.

34 The Respondent further argues that the Appellant has confused the Court's reasonable finding that the Claim was an attempt to re-litigate an issue already decided (the reasonableness of the H&C decision), and therefore an abuse of process, with the concept of a "collateral attack" as explained by the Supreme Court in TeleZone, above. However, this was not the basis for striking the Claim. Prothonotary Aalto found that the Claim was an impermissible attack on the Court's upholding of the reasonableness of the decision on judicial review. The Respondent says that while both the decision that was under appeal and TeleZone use the language of "collateral attack," the term has a different meaning in the two contexts, as an attack on the decision of the Court is distinct from an attack on an administrative decision by way of action. While the latter is permissible, the former may be an abuse of process.

35 The Respondent also says that the Appellant has not shown that the Court's alternative finding, that the Claim disclosed no reasonable cause of action, was in error.

36 As regards the claim of misfeasance, the Respondent says no material facts were pleaded to establish that the Officer acted outside the scope of her authority, and even if she did, nothing was submitted to establish a causal connection to damages by way of entitlement to a positive H&C decision. The Appellant's reliance on the decisions in Rudder and Lemus, both above, do not help him. In Rudder, the Court exercised its discretion to grant mandamus on the judicial review of a temporary resident visa. This does not establish that the Appellant is somehow entitled to a positive H&C decision or that a negative decision somehow gives rise to a cause of action. Similarly, the decision in Lemus does not change the fact that a discretionary decision is not stripped of its discretionary nature by judicial review.

37 In terms of the claim of negligence, the Respondent submits that Prothonotary Aalto reasonably found that there was no duty of care between the Respondent and the Appellant based on the facts pleaded and a correct application of the law. The jurisprudence has established that the relationship between the government and the governed is not one of individual proximity and nothing claimed by the Appellant supports a departure from this principle: Premakumaran v Canada, 2006 FCA 213 at para 22 [Premakumaran]; Benaissa v Canada (Attorney General), 2005 FC 1220 at para 35 [Benaissa]. The Respondent says that unlike the circumstances in the jurisprudence upon which the Appellant relies, here there has been no refusal to process his application nor any undue delay in processing his application.

38 The Appellant has misunderstood the second branch of the Anns test. The question is not whether the decision to reject the H&C application was a policy decision, but whether there are policy reasons that weigh against the finding of a duty of care. Prothonotary Aalto cited such policy reasons as weighing against the finding of a duty of care, including a concern over indeterminate liability for all H&C applications that are denied. The Respondent argues that the finding of no duty of care was correct in law and the striking of the claim in negligence ought not to be disturbed as a result.

VII. ANALYSIS

39 In accordance with Merck & Co v Apotex Inc, [2004] 2 FCR 459, a discretionary order of a prothonotary should only be reviewed de novo if the questions raised in the motion are vital to the final issue in the case, or the order is clearly wrong in the sense that the exercise of discretion by the prothonotary was based upon a wrong principle or upon a misrepresentation of the facts.

40 In the present motion, the questions raised are vital to the final issue in this case. Hence, I will review the Decision of Prothonotary Aalto on a de novo basis.

41 As Prothonotary Aalto pointed out in his reasons, I summarized the jurisprudence for striking a pleading for disclosing no reasonable cause of action and for being scandalous and vexatious in Sivak, above:

[15] The test in Canada to strike out a pleading under Rule 221 of the Rules is whether it is plain and obvious on the facts pleaded that the action cannot succeed. In this regard, the Supreme Court of Canada has noted that the power to strike out a statement of claim is a "valuable housekeeping measure essential to effective and a fair litigation." See Hunt v Carey Canada Inc., [1990] 2 SCR 959 and R v Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd. 2011 SCC 42, at paragraphs 17 and 19.

[16] In determining whether a cause of action exists, the following principles are to be considered:

- a. The material facts pled are to be taken as proven, unless the alleged facts are based on assumptive or speculative conclusions which are incapable of proof;
- b. If the facts, taken as proven, disclose a reasonable cause of action, that is, one with some chance of success, then the action may proceed; and
- c. The statement of claim must be read as generously as possible, with a view to accommodating any inadequacies in the form of the allegations due to drafting deficiencies.

See Operation Dismantle Inc. v Canada, [1985] 1 SCR 441.

[25] Edell v Canada (Revenue Agency), [2010] GSTC 9, 2010 FCA 26, reaffirms the fundamental rule that in a motion to strike the Court is narrowly limited to assessing the threshold issue of whether a genuine issue exists as to material facts requiring a trial. All allegations of fact, unless patently ridiculous or incapable of proof, must be accepted as proved. The defendant who seeks summary dismissal bears the evidentiary burden of showing the lack of a genuine issue.

[26] The fundamental rule, however, must take into account that no cause of action can exist where no material facts are alleged against the defendant. See Chavali v Canada 2002 FCA 209.

[31] There are many cases that hold that an action cannot be brought on speculation in the hope that sufficient facts may be gleaned on discovery to support the allegations made in the pleadings. See, for example, AstraZeneca Canada Inc. v Novopharm Ltd. 2009 FC 1209; appeal dismissed 2010 FCA 112.

[32] In fact, it is an abuse of process for a plaintiff to start proceedings in the hope that something will turn up. A plaintiff should not be permitted to discover the defendant to pursue such an action. See Kastner, [1994] F.C.J. No. 1671, above.

[33] I think it is also well-established that the rule that material facts in a statement of claim must be taken as true in determining whether a reasonable cause of action is disclosed does not require that allegations based upon assumptions and speculation be taken as true. See Operation Dismantle, above.

[89] In George v Harris, [2000] OJ No 1762, at paragraph 20, Justice Epstein, then of the Ontario Superior Court of Justice, provided examples of what constitutes a "scandalous," "frivolous" or "vexatious" document:

- i. A document that demonstrates a complete absence of material facts;
- ii. Portions of a pleading that are irrelevant, argumentative or inserted for colour, or that constitute bare allegations;
- iii. A document that contains only argument and includes unfounded and inflammatory attacks on the integrity of a party, and speculative, unsupported allegations of defamation;
- iv. Documents that are replete with conclusions, expressions of opinion, provide no indication whether information is based on personal knowledge or information and belief, and contain many irrelevant matters.

[90] A statement of claim containing bare assertions but no facts on which to base those assertions discloses no reasonable cause of action and may also be struck as an abuse of process. Furthermore, as indicated above, a claimant is not entitled to rely on the possibility that new facts may arise as the case progresses. On the contrary, the facts must be pled in the initial claim. The question of whether those facts can be proven is a separate issue, but they must be pled nonetheless.

[91] The authorities cited above also show that when a particular cause of action is pled, the claim must contain pleadings of fact that satisfy all of the necessary elements of that cause of action. Otherwise, it will be plain and obvious that the claim discloses no reasonable cause of action.

[92] A statement of claim will also be struck on the grounds that it is so unruly that the scope of the proceedings is unclear. As stated by this Court in Ceminchuk v Canada, [1995] F.C.J. No 914, at paragraph 10

A scandalous, vexatious or frivolous action may not only be one in which the claimant can present no rational argument, based upon the evidence or law, in support of the claim, but also may be an action in which the pleadings are so deficient in factual material that the defendant cannot know how to answer, and a court will be unable to regulate the proceedings. It is an action without reasonable cause, which will not lead to a practical result.

A. Abuse of Process

42 Prothonotary Aalto struck the Claim as being an abuse of process because it was simply a disguised attempt to re-litigate the issues that had already been litigated and decided in the immigrations context:

[74] Even if I am wrong on both misfeasance in public office and negligence, in my view the Claim fails on the basis of being a collateral attack on the decisions of Justice Shore in IMM-883-14. No serious or arguable issue was raised on the application for leave and judicial review. Justice Shore's discretion was exercised in accordance with the jurisprudence [see, for example, Krishnapillai, supra at para. 10]. The Claim, on a plain reading, is simply a disguised attempt to re-litigate the reasonableness of the H&C decision, an already decided issue both at the immigration stage and the application for leave and judicial review to this Court and the further re-consideration. The Plaintiff has had three chances, each of which were denied. This [is] a fourth attempt to re-litigate the same issue. This action constitutes a collateral attack on those decisions and amounts to an abuse of process. To again litigate his matter is a waste of judicial resources on a claim that is bound to fail or is bereft of any chance of success [see, for example, Hunt v Carey, [1990] 2 SCR 959].

43 Before me, the Appellant argues, based upon the TeleZone, above, line of cases that whether or not judicial review has been brought, or whether or not judicial review has been successful or unsuccessful, the Appellant still has a right to bring an action "without bringing into question the jurisdictional issue of collateral attack, albeit the Crown is free to raise collateral attack, as a defence, at trial" [emphasis in original].

44 The Appellant also says the Prothonotary erred because "we are not dealing with judicial review proper, on its merits, but a leave application, without reasons." The Appellant cites no authority to support this assertion.

45 Justice Shore's decisions refusing leave are final decisions of the Court based upon a review of the merits put forward by the Appellant in his application for leave and judicial review. Those decisions indicate, in accordance with established jurisprudence, that the application for leave evinced no arguable case. See Bains v Canada (Employment and Immigration), [1990] F.C.J. No 457; Sivagurunathan v Canada (Citizenship and Immigration), 2013 FC 233 at para 9. In order to reach that conclusion, Justice Shore, like any leave judge, was obliged to review the merits on both sides of the application and decide whether the Appellant had raised any issues that could reasonably be argued. Justice Shore decided that the Appellant had raised no such issue so that there was no case to go to a judicial review hearing. Hence, the Court has already decided that no argument can be made that the H&C decision contains a reviewable error, and the Federal Court of Appeal in Krishnapillai v R, 2001 FCA 378 [Krishnapillai], has ruled that commencing an action where leave is denied can be an abuse of the process of the Court:

[18] The constitutional issue was raised, as is mandated by section 82.1 of the Act, through the only process contemplated by Parliament to challenge the Minister's decision: an application for leave to seek judicial review. The issue was raised, one must assume, with the other issues that could be raised in order to challenge the decision of the Minister. Section 82.1 of the Act provides that there is no appeal from a judgment denying leave. The intent of Parliament was clearly to put an end to the challenge of a decision made under the Immigration Act at an early stage, i.e. as soon as leave was denied. Where leave is denied, the commencement of an action raising an issue that was or could have been raised in the leave application is an indirect attempt to circumvent the intent of Parliament and a collateral attack on the judgment denying leave. This is an abuse of the process of the Court.

[19] This conclusion disposes of the issue raised with respect to the constitutional validity of subsection 53(1). It could dispose, also, of the better part of the issues raised with respect to the constitutional validity of the leave requirement because, apart from the issue relating to the absence of reasons in denying leave which obviously could not have been raised prior to the decision denying leave, these issues could and should have been raised at the first opportunity, i.e. in the leave application. However, the argument was not made on that basis, and I shall treat the whole issue of the validity of the leave requirement under the following heading, as was done by the parties.

[36] The attack on the constitutionality of the leave requirement prescribed by section 82.1 of the Immigration Act has no chance of success.

[37] The statement of claim was properly struck out in its entirety as it was on the one hand an abuse of the process of the Court and as it did not, on the other hand, raise any reasonable cause of action.

46 As Prothonotary Aalto found, the Claim in the present case is simply an attempt to re-litigate the reasonableness of the H&C decision, and the Court has already dealt with the reasonableness of that decision. TeleZone, above, and other cases cited by the Appellant do not assist him. In Parrish, above, for example, the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that there is nothing in ss 17 and 18 of the Federal Courts Act, RSC, 1985, c F-7 that requires a plaintiff to be successful on judicial review before bringing a claim for damages against the Crown. That is not the issue here. In the present case, the Appellant's judicial review application had been dealt with by Justice Shore who, in order to refuse leave, had to conclude that there was nothing unreasonable or otherwise legally objectionable about the H&C decision that could be fairly argued on judicial review. The test for leave is fairly low; in order to dismiss leave Justice Shore had to decide that there was just no reasonable argument that could be made. The allegations in the claims -- knowingly misapplying the law; knowingly mistaking facts; knowingly failing to articulate reasons; discrimination; ignoring s 3(1)(a) of the IRPA -- were either raised or could have been raised in the leave application. The Federal Court of Appeal has said that this can be an abuse of the process of the Court, and it seems to me on the facts of this case that it is. Asking for damages as opposed to asking for the H&C decision to be quashed does not mean that the merits have not already been dealt with by the Court. This is not a collateral attack strictly speaking, or res judicata; it is an abuse of process.

47 The Court has a discretionary right to strike where it determines that its own processes are being abused. The Appellant invites the Court to read the jurisprudence as saying that he has a right to commence an action irrespective of whether the result on judicial review is positive or negative. Even if I accept this interpretation, I do not read the cases as saying that following a negative decision on judicial review the Court cannot decide whether any action commenced is an abuse of process. This is an entirely different issue and is governed by its own jurisprudence. The Appellant has pursued judicial review and has obtained a final decision of the Court that there is no fairly arguable case for reviewable error. He is now attempting to litigate the H&C decision by way of action. I see no way around the conclusion that this is an indirect attempt to circumvent the intent of Parliament and a collateral attack on Justice Shore's judgment denying leave and therefore is an abuse of the process of the Court. On these grounds alone, the Claim has to be struck, and the Appellant has made no suggestion as to how it could be amended to make it otherwise.

48 The Appellant has also drawn the Court's attention to the Supreme Court of Canada jurisprudence to the effect that a failure to grant leave does not necessarily mean that a judgment is confirmed. In Des Champs v Conseil des écoles, [1999] 3 SCR 281 at para 31, the Supreme Court said that "refusal of leave is not to be taken to indicate any view by members of this Court of the merits of the decision." The jurisprudence cited by the Appellant deals with leave to appeal to the Supreme Court which is not the issue here. "Leave" does not mean the same thing in every context. In the context of immigration review, a denial of leave means that there is no fairly arguable case on the merits.

B. No Reasonable Cause of Action

49 In the alternative, Prothonotary Aalto struck the Claim for disclosing no reasonable cause of action. Following my own de novo review, I see no way to avoid the same conclusion.

50 The mandamus cases cited by the Appellant to support his misfeasance claims do not assist. In the present case, there are no facts pleaded in the Claim that would establish any kind of right to a positive H&C decision. Even if reviewable errors occurred in reaching a negative decision, this does not mean that the Appellant would be entitled to a positive H&C, and Justice Shore has already decided that there is no arguable case for reviewable error. No facts are pleaded to establish that the Officer acted outside her authority or that the Appellant is entitled to H&C relief. The Appellant's claim to misfeasance in public office is not supported by any material facts and he simply asks the Court to assume that he is entitled to a positive H&C decision. In addition, there are no facts pleaded to support that any damages suffered were caused by the Officer's alleged wrongdoing.

51 The Appellant refers the Court to Justice Zinn's decision in Cabral et al v MCI et al (Docket no. T-2425-14) at para 17. In that case, Justice Zinn decided, on the pleadings before him, that there were sufficient facts to support allegations that the Minister had acted dishonestly. In the present case, paragraph 12 of the Claim remains a series of assertions without facts to support them.

52 For much the same reason as given by Prothonotary Aalto, my own review of the pleadings leads me to conclude that the negligence claims must be struck as revealing no possible cause of action. The Appellant has not satisfied either branch of the Anns test. He has not pleaded facts to support a duty of care. He seeks to rely upon judicial review cases that say there is a statutory duty to process an application. In this case, the Appellant's H&C application has been processed but, in any event, the statutory duty to process a claim does not establish a duty of care under Anns.

53 The Appellant does not fully address the second Anns issue. He appears to think that the question is whether the decision to reject the H&C application was a policy decision. The issue is whether there are policy reasons in this case that weigh against finding that there is a duty of care. Prothonotary Aalto identified and addressed those policy considerations in his own reasons:

[72] Even if such a prima facie duty existed, the cause of action fails on the second part of the Anns test in any event: the existence of residual policy considerations that justify denying liability. The jurisprudence teaches that policy considerations "are not concerned with the relationships between the parties, but with the effect of recognizing a duty of care on other legal obligations, the legal system and society more generally" (Benaissa v Canada (Attorney General), 2005 FC 1220 at para. 33). In my view, imposing a duty of care for the failure to obtain a positive H&C decision has the potential to create an indeterminate liability for all H&C applications which are denied. H&C applications are discretionary and fact based. This H&C was also subjected to an application for leave and judicial review and re-consideration both of which were denied.

54 The Appellant argues that the Court should not be making a decision at this stage and that whether a duty of care exists is a matter for the trial judge. But the Appellant pleads no material facts that could support a duty of care. The Courts have found that no duty of care arises in some immigration contexts. See Premakumaran, above, at para 22; Szebenyi v Canada, 2006 FC 602 at para 91; Khalil v Canada, [2007] FC 923 at para 155. I also note that in Benaissa, above, Prothonotary Lafrenière struck a claim for the very reasons that arise in this case:

[35] Even if foreseeability has been adequately pleaded by the Plaintiff, some further ingredient would be needed to establish the requisite proximity of relationship between the Plaintiff and the Crown: Hill v. Chief Constable of West Yorkshire, [1989] A.C. 53 (H.L.). In Cooper, the Supreme Court of Canada directed that an examination of the policy of the statute under which the officers of the Crown are appointed must be conducted to decide whether there exists the required proximity of relationship to create a statutory duty of care. If such a duty of care to the Plaintiff exists, it must be found in the statute, namely the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act.

[38] Even if the Plaintiff could establish a prima facie duty of care, it is plain and obvious that he cannot succeed at the second stage of the analysis set out in Cooper based on the facts pleaded. The question at the second stage is whether there exist residual policy considerations which justify denying liability. These policy considerations are not concerned with the relationship between the parties, but with the effect of recognizing a duty of care on other legal obligations, the legal system and society more generally.

[39] In my view, it would not be just, fair and reasonable for the law to impose a duty of care on those responsible for the administrative implementation of immigration decisions of the kind which have been made in the case of the Plaintiff, absent evidence of bad faith, gross negligence, or undue delay.

55 These considerations against finding a duty of care seem entirely appropriate to me. I would only add that finding a duty of care in this case would, to quote the Federal Court of Appeal in Krishnapillai, above, at para 18, allow "an indirect attempt to circumvent the intent of Parliament" to clearly "put an end to the challenge of a decision made under the Immigration Act at an early stage, i.e. as soon as leave was denied."

56 These seem to me to be the only issues of substance that the Appellant has raised in this appeal.

57 As the Prothonotary points out, the Claim is the Appellant's second attempt to define meritorious causes of action. In addition, there is no way to cure what is simply a collateral attack and an abuse of process on the decision of Justice Shore denying leave. It would, therefore, be inappropriate to grant leave to amend in a situation where the claim cannot possibly succeed and there is no scintilla of a cause of action. See Spatling v Canada (Solicitor General), 2003 CarswellNat 1013. The problems with this Claim are not curable by amendment.

ORDER

THIS COURT ORDERS that

1. The Plaintiff's (Appellant's) motion is dismissed and the decision of Prothonotary Aalto is upheld;

2. The Defendant (Respondent) is awarded costs of this motion to appeal and costs of the motion heard by Prothonotary Aalto.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT OF THE COURT

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

W.W. WEBB J.A. (orally)

1 The Appellant's Amended Statement of Claim dated September 23, 2014 was struck by an Order of the Prothonotary dated August 10, 2015 (2015 FC 957) without leave to amend. The Appellant then brought a motion before the Federal Court to set aside this Order. This motion was dismissed by Order and reasons of Russell J. dated March 9, 2016 (2016 FC 300). This appeal is from this Order of Russell J.

2 The Appellant commenced the action in the Federal Court following the denial of the Appellant's application to remain in Canada on Humanitarian and Compassionate grounds pursuant to section 25 of the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act, S.C. 2001, c. 27 (the H&C Decision). The claim alleged various causes of action including misfeasance in public office, negligence, and breaches of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The Appellant also filed an application for leave and judicial review of the H&C Decision. This application for leave was denied by Shore J. and a subsequent motion for reconsideration of this decision was dismissed. The test before Shore J. was whether there were fairly arguable issues in relation to the H&C Decision. Since leave was denied and the motion for reconsideration dismissed, the conclusion is that there were no fairly arguable issues.

3 The Prothonotary struck the Appellant's Amended Statement of Claim on the basis that, based on the facts as pled, this Statement of Claim did not disclose a reasonable cause of action. The Prothonotary also stated that, in the alternative, he would have struck this Statement of Claim as an abuse of process since, in his view, this was an attempt to re-litigate the decision of Shore J. to dismiss the application for leave in relation to the H&C Decision.

4 Russell J. reviewed the decision of the Prothonotary on a de novo basis and dismissed the Appellant's motion to set aside the Order of the Prothonotary on the basis that it was an abuse of process as it "is simply an attempt to re-litigate the reasonableness of the H&C decision, and the Court has already dealt with the reasonableness of that decision" (paragraph 46 of his reasons). Russell J. also found that he would dismiss the motion on the basis that, based on the facts as alleged in this Statement of Claim, no reasonable cause of action was disclosed.

5 In this Court, the Appellant submitted that, at the time of the issuance of the Statement of Claim, the application for leave had not been decided. This changes nothing: once the leave application was decided, none of the issues against the validity of the decision were fairly arguable. In these circumstances an action based on the validity of the decision cannot succeed and, in our view, the foundation of his claim is the unreasonableness of the H&C Decision.

6 The Appellant submits that the Supreme Court holdings in Attorney General of Canada v. TeleZone Inc., 2010 SCC 62, [2010] 3 S.C.R. 585 (TeleZone) and five related cases support his position in this appeal. We disagree. None of the six cases involved a prior related proceeding that was determined by a court to be not fairly arguable. In the TeleZone cases the Supreme Court did not repeal the doctrine against re-litigation -- that doctrine applies here.

7 In this appeal, we have not been persuaded that Russell J. committed any reviewable error in dismissing the Appellant's motion and therefore, the appeal will be dismissed, with costs.

Case Summary

Immigration law — Immigrants — Application for immigrant visa — Units of assessment/Point system — Language — Motion by defendants for summary judgment dismissing plaintiffs' claims allowed — Plaintiffs' applications for permanent residence under Federal Skilled Trade Class were refused because they failed to meet language requirement — Claims advanced by nine plaintiffs were dismissed on basis that applications were filed without one of NOC identified or were incomplete or provided stale-dated information — No evidence language test required high proficiency in English or was culturally biased — Even if remaining plaintiffs had established test was biased, they failed to mitigate by taking alternative test — Immigration and Refugee Protection Regulations, ss. 87.2(3), 87.2(4).

Motion by the defendants for summary judgment dismissing the plaintiffs' claims. The plaintiffs' applications for permanent residence under the Federal Skilled Trade Class were refused because they failed to meet the language requirement by failing the International English Language Testing System (IELTS). The plaintiffs alleged the IELTS was culturally biased towards British English and unfairly required a high proficiency in English. Immigration officers refused to consider the plaintiffs' requests for substituted evaluations because the language requirement was not met. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration had issued an instruction not to process applications that failed to meet the language threshold.

HELD: Motion allowed.

The claims advanced by nine plaintiffs were dismissed on the basis that their applications were filed without one of the NOC identified or were incomplete or provided stale-dated information. There was an absence of evidence demonstrating the IELTS required a high proficiency in English or was culturally biased. There was no genuine issue for trial regarding the Minister's instruction. Even if the remaining plaintiffs had established the IELTS was biased, they failed to mitigate their damages by taking the alternative test.

ORDER AND REASONS

Introduction

- 1 The Defendants move for summary judgment. They ask the Court to dismiss the action, with costs.
- 2 The essentials of the Plaintiffs' claim, as reflected in the Amended Statement of Claim is as follows:
 - (a) Each of the Plaintiffs applied for permanent resident status pursuant to subsection 12(2) of the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act, SC 2001, c 27 and section 87.2 of the Immigration and Refugee Protection Regulations, SOR/2002-227, as part of the Federal Skilled Trade Class [FSTC];
 - (b) Despite meeting all of the other requirements for permanent residence required by the FSTC, each was refused because he failed to meet the language requirement by failing the International English Language Testing System [IELTS], adopted by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration;
 - (c) The Plaintiffs allege that the IELTS is culturally biased towards "British English" rather than "Canadian English" and unfairly requires a high proficiency in English;
 - (d) The Plaintiffs further allege that the Minister administers the FSTC in a manner that favours persons from English-speaking countries and discriminates against those, like the Plaintiffs, who are from non-English speaking countries;
 - (e) Each Plaintiff, having failed to meet the threshold requirements under the IELTS, requested that the officer perform a substitute evaluation of his ability to become economically established in Canada, as provided by subsection 87.2(4) of the Regulations;
 - (f) The Plaintiffs allege that the officer refused to consider their applications on the merits because of a Ministerial Instruction stipulating that no FTSC application was to be examined by an officer unless the language requirement was met;
 - (g) The Plaintiffs allege that the Ministerial Instruction is contrary to the Regulations and is ultra vires;
 - (h) The Plaintiffs allege that the conduct of the Defendants amounts to breach of statute, public misfeasance and abuse, excess of jurisdiction and authority, abuse of process, bad faith, and breach of section 7 and 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Part I of the Constitution Act, 1982, being Schedule B to the Canada Act 1982 (UK), 1982, c 11; and
 - (i) The Plaintiffs suffered damages as a result of the Defendants' wrongful conduct.

3 The Defence filed by the Defendants may be summarized as the following:

- (a) Only three Plaintiffs, Mr. Henriques, Mr. Cabral and Mr. Casanova, have standing to bring the action as framed as they applied for permanent residence under the FSTP program and were denied for failing the language test;
- (b) The other Plaintiffs either applied under a different program, did not submit an eligible occupation, did not submit other requirements documents, did not have a valid work permit, or submitted expired language test results;
- (c) None of the applications were eligible for substituted evaluation because substituted evaluation only comes into play when an application has been reviewed for completeness and eligible for processing, and none of the applications were complete;
- (d) The IELTS is not biased and does not require a high proficiency in English;
- (e) The Plaintiffs have the choice between two different language tests and if they fail their chosen test, they may retake it as many times as they wish, or take the other approved test; and
- (f) The Ministerial Instruction is delegated legislation, enacted pursuant to subsection 87.3(3) of the Act which gives the Minister the ability to issue instructions with respect to the processing of applications such as FSTC applications.

Evidence Filed

4 The Defendants filed three affidavits and their attached exhibits in support of the motion. As a preliminary matter, the Plaintiffs submit that none of these affidavits are admissible. Each affiant was cross-examined by counsel for the Plaintiffs and the transcripts put before the Court.

5 The Plaintiffs object to these affidavits because they "are sworn without any personal knowledge of the applications of the Plaintiffs or other facts in issue in the within action," they "were not the decision-makers who decided not to process the Plaintiffs' applications," and they "did not issue the reasons or letters for the decision(s) in respect of the Plaintiffs' applications, if reasons exist." The Plaintiffs complain that by putting evidence forward through these witnesses, they have been denied the right to cross-examine the relevant individual decision-makers, that there is no evidence put before the Court by the Minister, and lastly they submit that the affidavits at issue "largely consist of opinions on the law, which is the purview of the Court."

6 The starting point is Rule 81(1) of the Federal Courts Rules, SOR/98-106: "Affidavits shall be confined to facts within the deponent's personal knowledge except on motions, other than motions for summary judgment or summary trial, in which statements as to the deponent's belief, with the grounds for it, may be included."

7 The Defendants' first affiant, Ms. Williams, is a Program Support Officer at the Department of Immigration, Refugee and Citizenship Canada, (formerly Citizenship and Immigration Canada) where her main duties include reviewing and assessing applications for permanent residence under the economic class under the provincial nominee program. She previously reviewed and assessed a number of different types of applications for eligibility under the economic class under the federal skilled worker program, Canadian experience class, and FSTC.

8 At paragraph 5 of her affidavit she attests that her affidavit is "directed towards setting out the operation of the FSTP [Federal Skilled Trades Program], the processing of applications submitted as part of the FSTP, and information regarding the Plaintiffs' applications." I find that to be an accurate summary of her evidence.

9 I accept, given her position and background, that she has personal knowledge of the FSTP and the processing of applications under it. Her knowledge of the Plaintiffs' applications (paragraphs 36-78 of her affidavit) is based on her review of the Global Case Management System [GCMS] notes. She attests that GCMS is an electronic file system used by Immigration, Refugees and Citizenship Canada for the processing of applications for admission to Canada.

10 I find that, given her position, she can speak to the creation of the GCMS notes and the fact that they reflect various officers' assessments and decisions involving the applications at issue. The GCMS notes are business records of the Minister and his officials and an exception to the hearsay rule. It was not necessary, as the Plaintiffs submit, that each of the officers making the various decisions tender an affidavit. On the other hand, Ms. Williams has no direct knowledge of the applications or the officers' decisions, other than as is reflected in the GCMS notes. Accordingly, her evidence, and the evidence from the GCMS notes may be contradicted by direct evidence tendered by the Plaintiffs. I note that the cover letters returning the FSTC applications, without exception, reflect the description for rejection in the GCMS notes.

11 Ms. Williams attests in many instances that there were reasons for rejecting a Plaintiff's application other than those outlined in the GCMS notes and cover letter, such as failure to have a work permit. On cross-examination, she admitted that she could not challenge any statement made by Richard Boraks, the Plaintiffs' affiant, when he contradicts her, because she had no personal knowledge of the applications. Mr. Boraks is the lawyer who prepared 26 of the 27 applications under the FSTP for the 13 Plaintiffs. I accept that he has personal knowledge of the applications and the determinations made by the Minister's officials as were reported to him. Given this admission, and the fact that Mr. Boraks does have personal knowledge of the applications because he prepared them, his evidence is preferred. In the summary of the applications set out below, I have excluded from consideration any statement made by Ms. Williams that is contradicted by Mr. Boraks.

12 I do not find that Ms. Williams' affidavit speaks to the law, as alleged by the Plaintiffs. Her references to subsection 87.2(3) of the Regulations are incidental, and do not seek to interpret the meaning of the provision. I therefore conclude that her affidavit is admissible.

13 I apply the same reasoning to Ms. Tyler's affidavit. Ms. Tyler is the Assistant Director of the Economic Policy and Programs Division at the Department of Immigration, Refugee and Citizenship Canada. She supervises a team of analysts responsible for developing the FSTC and the language testing policies for economic immigration. In her affidavit, she attests to the creation of the FSTC, the legislative requirements of the FSTC, the language requirements of the FSTC and the content of the Ministerial instructions on the FSTC. She did not engage in the interpretation of the law, but simply listed the legislative requirements as they appear in the legislation. I therefore conclude that her affidavit is also admissible.

14 Alana Homeward is a paralegal in the Ontario Office of the Department of Justice assisting counsel for the Defendants in this matter. The majority of her affidavit speaks to Minister Kenney's trips to England and Ireland between 2012 and 2014 to announce and promote the FSTP and to invite workers to come to Canada. She attaches a number of exhibits consisting of news releases, the Minister's speaking notes and talking points, news articles, and the like. She admitted on cross-examination that she could not speak to the truth of the contents of any of these exhibits. I accept that she can attest that these documents were generated as they purport to have been; however, the probative value of the documents she attaches to her affidavit is slight, given her admission.

15 The Plaintiffs' affiant, Mr. Boraks, attaches the first page of each application but not the full contents "given their inordinate volume." Given the nature of the motion and the obligation that each party puts its best case forward, he ought to have included the entire application, regardless of volume. He also attaches as exhibits the acknowledgement of receipt and in some instances, the details for the rejection of the application.

16 His affidavit speaks to a number of matters and allegations that go well outside the pleading in this action. These include issues such as the funding of the FSTP by the government, the refusal to process applications that were incomplete in only minor respects, refusing applicants to correct minor incompleteness concerns, and the language abilities of the Plaintiffs as evidenced by the fact that they had worked in Canada for many years and had satisfied union and provincial requirements in this regard.

Federal Skilled Trades Class Application Requirements

17 There are a number of programs in Canada under which persons may immigrate to and seek permanent residence in Canada. This action deals only with the FSTC program.

18 The FSTC application is restricted to those who work in and make an application with respect to one of the skilled trade occupations listed in the National Occupational Classification [NOC] identified in subsection 87.2(1) of the Regulations.

19 Subsection 87.2(3) of the Regulations, attached as Appendix A, sets out the other requirements that must be met for an applicant to be a member of the FSTC. They may be briefly summarized, as follows. An applicant must:

- (a) Meet the minimum language proficiency set by the Minister under subsection 74(3) of the Regulations in reading, writing, listening, and speaking;
- (b) Have acquired at least two years of full-time experience (or the part-time equivalent) in the skilled trade during the five years preceding the application, after becoming qualified to independently practice in the occupation;
- (c) Have met the relevant employment requirements of their skilled trade as specified in the NOC, except for the requirement to obtain a provincial certificate of qualification; and
- (d) Have a certificate of qualification issued by a competent provincial authority in the applicant's skilled trade, or a work permit or offer of employment as described in paragraphs 87.2(3)(d)(ii) - (v) of the Regulations.

20 As noted, each Plaintiff alleges that his FSTC application was denied only because of failing to meet the language requirement set out in (a) above. Subsection 87.2(4) of the Regulations provides for the possibility of a substituted evaluation where the requirements detailed in subsection 87.2(3) of the Regulations are not sufficient indicators of whether an applicant will be able to become economically established in Canada. It provides:

If the requirements referred to in subsection (3), whether or not they are met, are not sufficient indicators of whether the foreign national will become economically established in Canada, an officer may substitute their evaluation for the requirements. This decision requires the concurrence of another officer.

21 Each of the Plaintiffs in his application asked the officer to conduct a substitute evaluation regarding the language requirement. No substitute evaluation was conducted for any of the Plaintiffs where their application failed to meet the language requirements.

22 There are three other matters related to the language requirement relevant to this action.

23 First, the Defendants have designated two agencies, which administer two different tests, for English-language testing under paragraph 87.2(3)(a) of the Regulations: (1) Paragon Testing Enterprises Inc. which administers the Canadian English Proficiency Index Program-General test [CELPPI], and (2) Cambridge ESOL, IDP Australia, and the British Council, which administer the International English Language Testing System [IELTS]. Each of the Plaintiffs who submitted test results were tested using the IELTS test.

24 Second, Ministerial Instruction 6 [MI6] dated December 29, 2012, and Ministerial Instruction 12 [MI12] dated April 26, 2014, both provide that "test results must be less than two years old on the date on which the application is received."

25 Third, the two Ministerial Instructions directed that only those FSTC applicants who had met the language requirements would be processed. By virtue of this direction, an applicant who met all of the other requirements under the FSTC would not have his application processed, or a substituted evaluation considered, if he did not meet the minimum language thresholds that had been established.

26 This requirement was outlined in two Ministerial Instructions. MI6, which came into force coincident with the creation of the FSTC on January 2, 2013, set a cap of FSTC applications to be processed yearly and within that set a cap for certain identified occupations. MI6 provided that applicants, who met the language threshold and did not exceed the identified cap, would be placed into processing if they met certain specified requirements. It stated that those applications that did not meet these criteria were to be returned as they did not qualify for processing:

Complete applications from skilled tradespersons received by the Centralized Intake Office in Sydney, Nova Scotia, on or after January 2, 2013, whose applicants meet the language threshold for the Federal Skilled Trades Class as set by the Minister pursuant to subsection 74(1) of the Immigration and Refugee Protection Regulations, in each of the four language abilities (speaking, reading, writing and oral comprehension), and that do not exceed the identified caps, shall be placed into processing if they,

- (1) as per the 2011 version of the National Occupational Classification (NOC), show evidence of at least two years (24 months) of full-time or equivalent part-time paid work experience, acquired in the last five years, in one of the eligible skilled trade occupations (see footnote 2) in either Group A or B, set out below:

... [emphasis added and footnotes omitted]

27 MI12, which came into force on May 1, 2014, contained similar language to MI6 in that it too provided that applications, whose applicants met the language threshold for the FSTC and did not exceed the cap, would be placed into processing. Those that did not would be returned to the applicant with the advice that their application did not qualify for processing.

Evidence Regarding Each Plaintiff's FSTC Application(s)

28 The record before the Court on this motion shows the following with respect to each Plaintiff. Some made more than one FSTC application.

Juvenal Da Silva Cabral

29 Mr. Da Silva Cabral submitted three FSTC applications.

30 Mr. Da Silva Cabral's first application was submitted on March 15, 2013 [FSTC Application 01]. The GCMS notes indicate that it was returned because Mr. Da Silva Cabral's English language test was older than two years, and he did not meet the language requirements for writing, speaking and listening.

31 Mr. Da Silva Cabral's second application was submitted November 29, 2013 [FSTC Application 02]. The GCMS notes indicate that it was returned because Mr. Da Silva Cabral did not meet the language test results for listening and writing.

32 Mr. Da Silva Cabral's third application was submitted December 29, 2014 [FSTC Application 03]. The GCMS notes and cover letter indicate that it was returned because Mr. Da Silva Cabral did not meet the language test results for listening and writing, the incorrect fee was received as a previously dependent child was no longer a dependent, and the additional family forms he submitted were outdated as they were signed and dated in 2013.

Pedro Manuel Gomes Silva

33 Mr. Gomes Silva submitted two FSTC applications.

34 Mr. Gomes Silva's first application was submitted on August 12, 2013 [FSTC Application 04]. The GCMS notes and the cover letter indicate that it was returned because Mr. Gomes Silva's English language test was older than two years, and he did not meet the language requirements for speaking and listening.

35 Mr. Gomes Silva's second application was submitted December 25, 2015 [FSTC Application 05]. The GCMS notes and cover letter indicate that it was returned because Mr. Gomes Silva's language test was older than two years. The GCMS notes also indicate that he did not meet the language requirements for speaking and listening.

Robert Zlostz

36 Mr. Zlostz submitted two FSTC applications.

37 Mr. Zlostz's first application was submitted on September 17, 2013 [FSTC Application 06]. The GCMS notes and the cover letter indicate that it was returned because Mr. Zlostz applied under an ineligible NOC.

38 Mr. Zlostz's second application was submitted December 29, 2014 [FSTC Application 07]. The GCMS notes and cover letter indicate that it was returned because Mr. Zlostz's language test was older than two years.

Roberto Carlos Oliveira Silva

39 Mr. Oliveira Silva submitted two FSTC applications.

40 Mr. Oliveira Silva's first application was submitted on September 3, 2013 [FSTC Application 08]. The GCMS notes and the cover letter indicate that it was returned because Mr. Oliveira Silva did not meet the language requirements for writing and speaking. The cover letter also indicates that he failed to include the appropriate NOC code for his specified work experience.

41 Mr. Oliveira Silva's second application was submitted on July 25, 2014 [FSTC Application 09]. The GSMS notes indicate that it was approved and Mr. Oliveira Silva was granted permanent residence status on April 12, 2015. Mr. Boraks attests that this application was not made under the FSTC program but under the Canadian Experience Class program. Either way, this application is irrelevant. Either it was approved under the FSTC or it was not under the FSTC. Under either scenario, it is not relevant to this action as framed.

Rogério De Jesus Marques Figo

42 Mr. Marques Figo submitted two FSTC applications.

43 Mr. Marques Figo's first application was submitted on December 29, 2014 [FSTC Application 10]. The GCMS notes and the cover letter indicate that it was returned because Mr. Marques Figo did not meet the language requirements for reading, writing, speaking, and listening and because the attached Schedule 11 and family information forms were signed over one year prior to the application.

44 Mr. Marques Figo's second application was submitted on March 7, 2016 [FSTC Application 11]. The GCMS notes and cover letter indicate that it was returned because of a moratorium on the twelfth set of Ministerial Instructions as of January 1, 2015. As a result applications under FSTC were to be sent through Express Entry. The GCMS notes do not indicate that he ever made an application under the Express Entry.

Joao Gomes Carvalho

45 Mr. Gomes Carvalho submitted two FTSC applications.

46 Mr. Gomes Carvalho's first application was submitted on October 14, 2014 [FSTC Application 12]. The GCMS notes and the cover letter indicate that it was returned because Mr. Gomes Carvalho did not meet the language requirements for reading, writing, speaking, and listening.

47 Mr. Gomes Carvalho's second application was submitted on December 29, 2014 [FSTC Application 13]. The GCMS notes and cover letter indicate that it was returned because Mr. Gomes Carvalho did not meet the language requirements for reading, writing, speaking, and listening.

Andresz Tomasz Myrda

48 Mr. Mydra submitted three FSTC applications.

49 Mr. Mydra's first application was submitted on August 29, 2013[FSTC Application 14]. The GCMS notes and the cover letter indicate that it was returned because Mr. Mydra submitted it under an inapplicable NOC code. Mr. Boraks disputes this.

50 Mr. Mydra's second application was submitted on January 3, 2014 [FSTC Application 15]. The GCMS notes indicate that it was returned because Mr. Mydra's language test was older than two years.

51 Mr. Mydra's third application was submitted on December 29, 2014 [FSTC Application 16]. The GCMS notes and cover letter indicate that it was returned because Mr. Mydra's language test was older than two years and he did not submit a supplementary travel form for himself and his wife. Mr. Boraks attests that the travel forms were submitted.

Antonio Joaquim Oliveira Martins

52 Mr. Oliveira Martins submitted two FSTC applications.

53 Mr. Oliveira Martins' first application was submitted on January 14, 2014 [FSTC Application 17]. The GCMS notes and the cover letter indicate that it was returned because Mr. Oliveira Martins did not submit language test results, proof of studies or fees for one of his children, a Schedule A for another child, and did not include the NOC code. Mr. Boraks attests that he did submit "the child dependant information referred to in Ms. Williams' affidavit."

54 Mr. Oliveira Martins' second application was submitted on December 29, 2014 [FSTC Application 18]. The GCMS notes indicate that it was returned because Mr. Oliveira Martin did not submit language test results and he was listed as a dependant person older than 19.

Carlos Alberto Lima Araujo

55 Mr. Lima Araujo submitted one FSTC application.

56 Mr. Lima Araujo's application was submitted on December 29, 2014 [FSTC Application 19]. The GCMS notes and the cover letter indicate that it was returned because Mr. Lima Araujo submitted language test results that were older than two years, and did not submit birth certificates for himself, his spouse and his two dependents. Mr. Boraks attests that the birth certificates were included with the application.

Fernando Medeiros Cordeiro

57 Mr. Medeiros Cordeiro submitted two FSTC applications.

58 Mr. Medeiros Cordeiro's first application was submitted on May 21, 2013 [FSTC Application 20]. The GCMS notes indicate that it was returned because it was significantly incomplete.

59 Mr. Medeiros Cordeiro's second application was submitted on December 29, 2014 [FSTC Application 21]. The GCMS notes and cover letter indicate that it was returned because Mr. Medeiros Cordeiro did not submit language test results, an offer of employment or if employed a labour market opinion, a work permit, or a certificate of qualification.

Filipe Jose Laranjeiro Henriques

60 Mr. Laranjeiro Henriques submitted two FSTC applications.

61 Mr. Laranjeiro Henriques' first application was submitted on November 25, 2013 [FSTC Application 22]. The GCMS notes and the cover letter indicate that it was returned because Mr. Laranjeiro Henriques did not meet the language test results for listening.

62 Mr. Laranjeiro Henriques' second application was submitted on December 24, 2014 [FSTC Application 23]. The GCMS notes and cover letter indicate that it was returned because Mr. Laranjeiro Henriques did not meet the language test result for reading and listening. He was also asked to update Schedules A and 11 as they were stale-dated.

Isaac Manuel Leituga Pereira

63 Mr. Leituga Pereira submitted one FSTC application.

64 Mr. Leituga Pereira's application was submitted on December 29, 2014 [FSTC Application 24]. The GCMS notes and the cover letter indicate that it was returned because Mr. Leituga Pereira did not meet the language requirements in reading, writing, speaking, and listening and he was required to submit additional family information on his spouse.

Jose Filipe Cunha Casanova

65 Mr. Cunha Casanova submitted three FSTC applications.

66 Mr. Cunha Casanova's first application was submitted on November 29, 2013 [FSTC Application 25]. The GCMS notes and the cover letter indicate that it was returned because Mr. Cunha Casanova did not meet the language requirements in reading, writing, speaking, and listening.

67 Mr. Cunha Casanova's second application was submitted on May 15, 2014 [FSTC Application 26]. The GCMS notes and the cover letter indicate that it was returned because Mr. Cunha Casanova did not meet the language requirements in reading, writing, speaking, and listening.

68 Mr. Cunha Casanova's third application was submitted on December 29, 2014 [FSTC Application 27]. The GCMS notes and the cover letter indicate that it was returned because Mr. Cunha Casanova did not meet the language requirements in reading, writing, speaking, and listening, and his language test results were older than two years.

Summary Judgment

69 Rules 213-219 of the Federal Courts Rules govern summary judgment. Rule 215(1) provides that if on motion "the Court is satisfied that there is no genuine issue for trial with respect to a claim or defence, the Court shall grant summary judgment accordingly." This Court has held that in determining whether there is a genuine issue for trial the judge is entitled to assume that that parties have put their best foot forward, and that if the action were to go to trial, no additional evidence would be presented: The Rude Native Inc v Tyrone T Resto Lounge, 2010 FC 1278 at para 16, 195 ACWS (3d) 1128. The Rules impose a burden on the moving party to establish on the balance of probabilities that there is no genuine issue for trial, but they also impose a burden on the responding party to set out specific facts and adduce evidence showing that there is a genuine issue for trial.

Analysis of Issues for Trial

70 At the commencement of the oral hearing, counsel for the Plaintiffs objected to tying his clients' case to the pleadings, rather than the evidence. If by this he meant that it was open to this Court when determining this motion to assess whether there was evidence of a triable dispute beyond the pleading, I disagree. The test on a summary judgment motion is whether there is a genuine issue for trial, and the issues to be examined are those framed by the pleadings. It is not for the Court to make a party's case nor to seek triable issues outside the four corners of the pleadings the parties have filed.

Refused Only Because of the Language Test Result

71 It is fundamental to the Plaintiffs' claim that each had his application refused only because he failed to meet the minimum language test requirements, but had met all other requirements under the FSTC program. Accordingly, as the Defendants submit, if an application did not meet all of the other requirements, it cannot found a basis for the claim.

72 There can be no genuine issue for trial with respect to any FSTC application that was not filed with respect to one of the NOC identified in subsection 87.2 of the Regulations. Failure to meet this fundamental requirement would mean that the application could not succeed, even if all of the other requirements were met. FSTC Applications 06, 08, and 17 were returned and failed to identify any NOC code or identified one that was not part of the FSTC program. Accordingly, no genuine issue for trial can be shown with respect to any of these applications.

73 There can be no genuine issue for trial with respect to any FSTC application that was incomplete or provided stale-dated information, except for language test requirements, because any such application would necessarily have to be rejected. FSTC Applications 03, 10, 18, 20, 21, 23, and 24 were either incomplete or contained stale-dated information and would have been rejected even if the language test results were acceptable. Accordingly, no genuine issue for trial can be shown with respect to any of these applications.

74 There can be no genuine issue for trial with respect to any FSTC application that was submitted after January 1, 2015, when a moratorium was put in place and applications had to be sent through Express Entry. FSTC Application 11 fell into this category. Accordingly, no genuine issue for trial can be shown with respect to that application.

75 The Plaintiffs challenge the validity of the Ministerial Instruction that requires that an applicant must meet the language thresholds thus making no substituted evaluation possible with respect to this criterion. They have not challenged the aspect of the instruction that requires that the test results be current within the previous two years. FSTC Applications 01, 04, 05, 07, 15, 16, 19, and 27 each included stale test results and accordingly would have been returned in any event. Accordingly, no genuine issue for trial can be shown with respect to these applications.

76 The remaining applications, FSTC Applications 02, 12, 13, 14, 22, 25, and 26 were rejected because each applicant failed to meet the threshold language requirements. Prima facie, a genuine issue for trial can be shown for these applications because they were rejected only on the basis of the language requirement.

77 These remaining applications, exclude the following Plaintiffs: Mr. Pedro Gomes Silva, Mr. Robert Zlostz, Mr. Roberto Oliveira Silva, Mr. Rogerio Marques Figo, Mr. Andresz Mydra, Mr. Antonio Oliveira Martins, Mr. Carlos Lima Araujo, Mr. Fernando Medeiros Cordeiro, and Mr. Isaac Leituga Pereira. There is no genuine issue for trial with respect to the claims advanced by these nine Plaintiffs and judgment must issue dismissing their claims.

78 In considering whether there is a genuine issue for trial with respect to the FSTC applications of the remaining Plaintiffs, I now turn to the allegations regarding the use of the IELTS test, the Ministerial Instruction, and the failure to conduct a substitute evaluation.

Minimum Language Proficiency

79 Subsection 74(2) of the Regulations provides that the "minimum language proficiency thresholds fixed by the Minister shall be established with reference to the benchmarks described in the Canadian Language Benchmarks and the Niveaux de compétence linguistique canadiens."

80 The Plaintiffs admit at paragraph 12 of their Amended Statement of Claim that "the Minister is entitled to delegate the administering of the [language] test to an outside body." As noted earlier, the Minister has delegated this vis-à-vis the English test to two outside bodies, which each administers its own test. The Plaintiffs complain only of the inappropriateness of the IELTS test but make no similar claim regarding the CELPIP test used by the other body delegated by the Minister.

81 I accept the submission of the Defendants that there is no prohibition on the number of times an applicant may take a language test, that each applicant may choose which of the two English-language tests he wishes to take, and that an applicant may take both tests.

The IELTS Test

82 The Plaintiffs allege that the IELTS is culturally biased towards "British English" and unfairly requires a high proficiency in English.

83 The Language Benchmarks established for the FSTC are as follows: Reading 4.0, Listening 5.0, Writing 4.0, and Speaking 5.0. Ms. Tyler in her affidavit provides the only evidence on this motion as to the meaning of these benchmarks. She attests that a score of 4 amounts to "fluent basic ability" and a score of 5 amounts to "initial intermediate ability."

84 In the context of the FSTC application these benchmarks require the following:

- * Reading: "the ability to understand simple social messages; short simple instructions; and the purpose, main idea and key information in simple, short texts."
- * Writing: "the ability to 'write short, simple texts about personal experience and familiar topics or situations related to daily life and experience'."
- * Speaking: "the ability to 'communicate with some effort in short, routine social situations, and present concrete information about needs and familiar topics of personal relevance'."
- * Listening: "the ability to 'understand, with some effort, the gist of moderately complex, concrete formal and informal communication'."

85 Given this description of the minimum language requirements and the fact that a benchmark of only 4 or 5 is required on a 12 point scale, and absent any evidence from the Plaintiffs to the contrary, the Court cannot conclude that the IELTS requires a "high proficiency" in English, as is alleged in the Amended Statement of Claim.

86 If the IELTS is culturally biased, as alleged in the Amended Statement of Claim, one would expect to see that English-speaking persons would do significantly better on the tests than persons, like the Plaintiffs, from Italy, Poland, and Portugal. However, the evidence presented by Ms. Tyler does not show that. A chart she attaches as an exhibit showing the 2013 IELTS scoring shows the mean scores by first language:

	Listening	Reading	Writing	Speaking	Overall
English	7.2	6.8	6.9	7.6	7.2
Italian	6.1	6.1	5.8	6.3	6.2
Polish	6.4	6.2	5.9	6.5	6.3
Portuguese	6.4	6.3	6.1	6.7	6.4

87 Perhaps more telling is the band score by percentage:

	<4	4	4.5	5	5.5	6	6.5	7	7.5	8	8.5	9
English	0	1	1	3	6	10	13	15	16	16	15	5
Italian	1	3	4	11	17	18	15	12	10	6	2	0
Polish	3	3	5	8	12	14	16	15	13	9	3	0
Portuguese	1	2	4	7	12	16	17	15	13	9	3	0

88 This last chart shows that very few persons tested whose mother tongue was not English failed to meet the minimum score of 4 or 5. Only 1% of Italian speakers scored less than 4 and only 8% scored less than 5; only 3% of Polish speakers scored less than 4 and only 11% scored less than 5; and only 1% of Portuguese speakers scored less than 4 and only 7% scored less than 5. This shows that the vast majority of test-takers of Italian, Polish, and Portuguese background passed the benchmark required by the Defendants.

89 In my view, the Plaintiffs have not shown that the IETLS is in any manner "unfair" to them based on their background. In particular, given the high test results of persons from Italy, Poland, and Portugal, it cannot be said that the test discriminates against persons from non-English speaking countries. While it is true that a greater percentage of English-speaking candidates pass the benchmarks than non-English-speaking applicants, this can hardly be surprising and more importantly does not in itself establish that there is a bias against non-English speaking applicants.

Ministerial Instructions

90 The Plaintiffs argue that the Ministerial Instructions requiring officers to consider only applications where the language benchmark had been met, were contrary to the Regulations. That allegation cannot succeed. As noted above, subsection 87.3(3) of the Act specifically empowers the Minister to issue instructions.

91 It is also pled that the instructions are ultra vires on the basis that they are counter to the express power granted to an officer to make a substituted evaluation pursuant to subsection 87.2(4) of the Regulations.

92 I agree with the Defendants' submission that "delegated or subordinate legislation is presumed to work together" and that the "interpretation that favours coherence will be adopted over an interpretation that generates conflict."

93 The Plaintiffs allege that the Minister in instructing officials not to process an application that fails to meet the language thresholds is acting contrary to subsection 87.2(4) of the Regulations which provides for the possibility of a substituted evaluation. They allege at paragraph 16 of their Amended Statement of Claim:

The Plaintiffs state that, the Defendant Minister of Immigration, in directing his officers not to open or look at a file under the Federal Skilled Trade Class application under s.87.2(4) of the Regulations, notwithstanding that all the Plaintiffs, through their counsel, had requested substituted evaluation, is knowingly acting contrary to s. 87.2(4) of the Regulations and s.12(2) of the IRPA itself, and is blatantly contravening his clear statutory duty to process, under s 3(1)(f), of the IRPA, with respect these applications with the result that the Plaintiffs have suffered damages, and continue to suffer damages. [emphasis in original deleted]

94 The Plaintiffs have failed to convince me that there is a genuine issue for trial with respect to this allegation.

95 First, subsection 12(2) of the Act provides only that a "foreign national may be selected as a member of the economic class on the basis of their ability to become economically established in Canada" [emphasis added]. Accordingly, even if the Plaintiffs can establish their ability to become economically established in Canada that does not give them a right to be selected. That remains discretionary: there is no obligation or requirement on the Minister to select them.

96 Second, paragraph 3(1)(f) of the Act which sets out its objectives provides that one such objective is "to work in cooperation with the provinces to secure better recognition of the foreign credentials of permanent residents and their more rapid integration into society." The Plaintiffs have failed to plead any material fact that would support their claim that in issuing his instructions to process only those applications that meet the minimum language thresholds the Minister has breached this objective of the Act. Indeed it is arguable that the instruction that an applicant must meet the language requirement ensures that an applicant will be integrated more rapidly into Canadian society and thus is fully consistent with this purpose.

97 The Plaintiffs further allege that the Ministerial Instructions are in conflict with the Regulation that provides for substitute evaluation of applications.

98 In my view, there is no obvious conflict between these two provisions. Ministerial instructions are issued by the Minister under subsection 87.3(3) of the Act relating to the processing of FSTC applications to "best support the attainment of the immigration goals established by the Government of Canada" [emphasis added]. This is a far different and much broader goal than that which permits substituted evaluation. Subsection 87.2(4) of the Regulations makes it clear that substitute evaluation is directed to whether the applicant "will become economically established in Canada" [emphasis added].

99 Aside from different goals or purposes, the Ministerial Instruction does not nullify the possibility of possible substitute evaluation, because that option remains available if an application fails to meet any of the other requirements.

Loss or Damage Suffered

100 The Plaintiffs plead that they have suffered damages or loss as a result of the Defendants' actions. They must show that any loss is a direct result of the actions of the Defendants and that they could not avoid or mitigate that loss.

101 In my opinion, even if the Plaintiffs can establish that the IELTS is a higher standard than the Canadian Language Benchmark, as is alleged in paragraph 13 of their pleading, and even if they can establish that their IELTS results caused them damage or loss, they failed to mitigate their damage or loss because they failed to take the CELPIP test.

102 There is no allegation that the CELPIP test was inappropriate, or too high a standard, or focused on "British English" rather than "Canadian English" as is alleged regarding the IELTS. Even if the IELTS results could be said to have caused them loss or damage, they failed to mitigate that loss or damage by taking the CELPIP test. They have not shown that their language abilities would not have met the threshold under that test.

Costs

103 This claim is a proposed class proceeding. Rule 334.39(1) of the Federal Courts Rules provides that no costs are to be awarded in a class proceeding, except in the circumstances set out in paragraphs 334.39(1)(a)--(c). In Paradis Honey Ltd v Canada, 2014 FC 215 at para 122, the Court held that a motion to strike a statement of claim brought before the action has been certified, does not engage the class action rules and, in particular, the provision of Rule 334.39. The Defendants being successful are entitled to their costs.

ORDER

THIS COURT ORDERS that the Defendants' motion for summary judgment is granted, and this action is dismissed with costs to the Defendants.

Appendix "A"

Federal Skilled Trades Class

Member of class

87.2(3) A foreign national is a member of the federal skilled trades class if

- (a) following an evaluation by an organization or institution designated under subsection 74(3), they meet the threshold fixed by the Minister under subsection 74(1) for proficiency in either English or French for each of the four language skill areas;
- (b) they have, during the five years before the date on which their permanent resident visa application is made, acquired at least two years of full-time work experience, or the equivalent in part-time work, in the skilled trade occupation specified in the application after becoming qualified to independently practice the occupation, and during that period of employment has performed
 - (i) the actions described in the lead statement for the occupation as set out in the occupational descriptions of the National Occupational Classification, and
 - (ii) a substantial number of the main duties listed in the description of the occupation set out in the National Occupational Classification, including all of the essential duties;
- (c) they have met the relevant employment requirements of the skilled trade occupation specified in the application as set out in the National Occupational Classification, except for the requirement to obtain a certificate of qualification issued by a competent provincial authority; and
- (d) they meet at least one of the following requirements:
 - (i) they hold a certificate of qualification issued by a competent provincial authority in the skilled trade occupation specified in the application,
 - (ii) they are in Canada and hold a work permit that is valid on the date on which their application is made and, on the date on which the visa is issued, hold a valid work permit or are authorized to work in Canada under section 186, and
 - (A) the work permit was issued based on a positive determination by an officer under subsection 203(1) with respect to their employment in a skilled trade occupation,
 - (B) they are working for any employer specified on the work permit, and
 - (C) they have an offer of employment -- for continuous full-time work for a total of at least one year in the skilled trade occupation that is specified in the application and is in the same minor group set out in the National Occupational Classification as the occupation specified on their work permit -- that is made by up to two employers who are specified on the work permit, none of whom is an embassy, high commission or consulate in Canada or an employer who is referred to in any of subparagraphs 200(3)(h)(i) to (iii), subject to the visa being issued to the foreign national,
 - (iii) they are in Canada and hold a work permit referred to in paragraph 204(a) or (c) -- that is valid on the date on which their application is received -- and, on the date on which the visa is issued, hold a valid work permit or are authorized to work in Canada under section 186, and the circumstances referred to in clauses (ii)(B) and (C) apply,

Cabral v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [2016] F.C.J. No. 1250

- (iv) they do not hold a valid work permit or are not authorized to work in Canada under section 186 on the date on which their application is made and
 - (A) up to two employers, none of whom is an embassy, high commission or consulate in Canada or an employer who is referred to in any of subparagraphs 200(3)(h) (i) to (iii), have made an offer of employment to the foreign national in the skilled trade occupation specified in the application for continuous full-time work for a total of at least one year, subject to the visa being issued to them, and
 - (B) an officer has approved the offer for full-time work -- based on an assessment provided to the officer by the Department of Employment and Social Development, on the same basis as an assessment provided for the issuance of a work permit, at the request of up to two employers or an officer -- that the requirements set out in subsection 203(1) with respect to the offer have been met, and
- (v) they either hold a valid work permit or are authorized to work in Canada under section 186 on the date on which their application for a permanent resident visa is made and on the date on which it is issued, and
 - (A) the circumstances referred to in clauses (ii)(B) and (C) and subparagraph (iii) do not apply, and
 - (B) the circumstances referred to in clauses (iv)(A) and (B) apply.

Travailleurs de métiers spécialisés (fédéral)

Qualité

87.2(3) Fait partie de la catégorie des travailleurs de métiers spécialisés (fédéral) l'étranger qui :

- a) a fait évaluer sa compétence en français ou en anglais par une institution ou organisation désignée en vertu du paragraphe 74(3) et qui a obtenu, pour chacune des quatre habiletés langagières, le niveau de compétence établi par le ministre en vertu du paragraphe 74(1);
- b) a accumulé, au cours des cinq années qui ont précédé la date de présentation de sa demande de visa de résident permanent, au moins deux années d'expérience de travail à temps plein ou l'équivalent temps plein pour un travail à temps partiel dans le métier spécialisé visé par sa demande après qu'il se soit qualifié pour pratiquer son métier spécialisé de façon autonome, et a accompli pendant cette période d'emploi, à la fois :
 - (i) l'ensemble des tâches figurant dans l'énoncé principal établi pour le métier spécialisé dans les descriptions des métiers spécialisés de la Classification nationale des professions,

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT OF THE COURT

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

RYER J.A.

1 The appeal and the cross-appeal relate to a decision of Russell, J. of the Federal Court (2014 FC 380) on a Motion made under Rule 51 of the Federal Courts Rules R. 51(1), SOR/98-106, appealing an Order of Prothonotary Aalto (2013 FC 855) which struck out the Amended Statement of Claim of Committee for Monetary and Economic Reform ("COMER"), William Krehm and Ann Emmett, the Appellants in the appeal, without leave to amend.

2 The Judge determined that he was required to consider the issues de novo, affording no deference to the Prothonotary's findings. He then found, in paragraph 64 of his reasons that:

The role of the Court is to decide whether the Plaintiff's allegations have any factual and legal base to them, or more precisely in a motion to strike under Rule 221, whether the claims made in the Plaintiffs' claim have any reasonable prospect of success, or whether it is plain and obvious on the facts pleaded, that the claim cannot succeed.

3 After conducting his de novo reconsideration of the issues on the basis of this understanding of the test in Rule 221, the Judge concluded that the Amended Statement of Claim should be struck in its entirety. However, he granted leave to amend.

4 This Court may only interfere with the decision of the Judge if it was arrived at on a wrong basis or was plainly wrong: see Z.I. Pompey Industrie v. ECU-Line N.V., at para 18 [2003] 1 S.C.R. 450, 2003 SCC 27. This standard of review requires us to afford deference to the Judge's decision.

5 Notwithstanding the able arguments of counsel, we have not been persuaded that the Judge made any error that would warrant our intervention in either the appeal or the cross-appeal. Accordingly, the appeal and the cross-appeal will be dismissed without costs. The Appellants are granted 60 days from the date hereafter to make amendments to the Amended Statement of Claim.

Case Summary

Civil litigation — Civil procedure — Pleadings — Striking out pleadings or allegations — Grounds — Failure to disclose a cause of action or defence — Motion by defendants to strike amended statement of claim allowed — Plaintiff, an economic think tank and its members, took issue with way in which budget was presented sought various declarations concerning defendants failure to provide interest-free loans to all levels of government for human capital expenditures — Claims regarding taxation without representation issue disclosed no reasonable cause of action and had no chance of success — Court did not have jurisdiction to grant free-standing requests for jurisdiction.

Motion by the defendants to strike the plaintiffs' amended statement of claim. The plaintiff, Committee for Monetary and Economic Reform ("COMER") was an economic think-tank dedicated to research and publication on issues of monetary and economic reform in Canada. The individual plaintiffs were members of COMER who had an interest in economic policy. The plaintiffs took issue with the way in which the Minister of Finance presented the budget. They sought a series of declarations that the defendants had failed to fulfill their legal duties to provide interest free loans to federal, provincial and municipal governments for the purpose of human capital expenditures resulting in lower human capital expenditures, that the Government of Canada used flawed accounting methods in relation to public finances thereby understating the benefit of human capital expenditures and undermining Parliament's role as guardian of the public purse and that those and other harms were the result of Canadian fiscal and monetary policy being controlled, in part, by private foreign interests through Canada's involvement in international monetary and financial institutions. They also sought damages of $10,000 for each of the individual plaintiffs for breach of their constitutional right of no taxation without representation and the infringement of the right to vote due to alleged constitutional breaches by the Minister, and the return of the portion of illegal and unconstitutional tax paid by each individual plaintiff. The defendants sought to strike the amended statement of claim on the grounds that it failed to comply with the leave to amend granted and failed to remedy the problems identified, it sought to add parties, it failed to disclose a reasonable cause of action, it was scandalous, frivolous or vexatious, it was an abuse of process, it failed to disclose facts which would show a breach of the plaintiffs' rights, the causal link between any action or inaction of the defendants and the alleged infringement was too speculative, it sought declaratory relief that was not available, the plaintiffs were not entitled to seek an advisory opinion from the court, it sought to adjudicate matters that were not justiciable, it sought to fetter the sovereignty of Parliament, the plaintiffs did not have a s. 3 Charter right to any particular form of taxation, it concerned matters outside the jurisdiction of the court and the plaintiffs did not have standing to bring the claim as of right and did not meet the requirements of public interest standing.

HELD: Application allowed.

The amended statement of claim disclosed no reasonable cause of action and had no prospect of success at trial. The central allegation, that MPs were voting blind and had been hoodwinked by the Minister, was a bald assertion unsupported by facts. Furthermore, the plaintiffs had no right to insist that Parliament debate and pass budgets only in accordance with practices and procedures they approved of or advocated. There was no breach of s. 3 of the Charter as if they individual plaintiffs had a right to vote, they were fully represented in Parliament and it was Parliament that decided whether or not to pass the budget. The Court could not interfere with the way in which Parliament went about its business. With respect to the Bank Act issues, the plaintiffs had not resolved the problems of justiciability and jurisdiction that arose in the original statement of claim. The court did not have the jurisdiction to provide the plaintiffs with the declarations they sought. The plaintiffs had not led facts to demonstrate a real issue concerning the relative interests of each party and the nexus of that issue to the plaintiffs and their claim for relief. The legal issues were theoretical with no nexus to some interest of the plaintiffs other than an interest in having the court endorse their opinion on the Bank Act issues raised.

ORDER AND REASONS

RUSSELL J.

I. INTRODUCTION

1 This is a motion by the Defendants under Rule 221 of the Federal Court Rules, SOR/98-106 [Rules] to strike the Plaintiffs' Amended Statement of Claim of March 26, 2015 [Amended Claim].

II. BACKGROUND

2 The Plaintiff, Committee for Monetary and Economic Reform [COMER], is an economic "think-tank" based in Toronto. COMER was established in 1970 and is dedicated to research and publications on issues of monetary and economic reform in Canada. The individual Plaintiffs are members of COMER who have an interest in economic policy.

A. History of the Litigation

3 This litigation was commenced on December 12, 2011, with the filing of the original Statement of Claim, which was amended in minor ways on January 19, 2012 [Original Claim].

4 On August 9, 2013, the Original Claim was struck out in its entirety by Prothonotary Aalto, without leave to amend. Upon appeal from the decision of the Prothonotary, I struck the Original Claim in its entirety, but with leave to amend, by way of order on April 24, 2014 [Order of April 24, 2014].

5 Appeal and cross-appeals of my Order of April 24, 2014 were dismissed by the Federal Court of Appeal on January 26, 2015. The Plaintiffs filed the Amended Claim on March 26, 2015. The Defendants now move to strike out this Amended Claim.

B. The Amended Claim

6 The Plaintiffs' Amended Claim, while an amended version of the Original Claim, continues to seek a series of declarations relating to three basic assertions, as noted in my previous Order of April 24, 2014: first, that the Bank of Canada Act, RSC, 1985, c B-2 [Bank Act] provides for interest-free loans to the federal, provincial and municipal governments for the purposes of "human capital expenditures," and the Defendants have failed to fulfill their legal duties to ensure such loans are made, resulting in lower human capital expenditures by governments to the detriment of all Canadians; second, that the Government of Canada uses flawed accounting methods in relation to public finances, thereby understating the benefit of "human capital expenditures" and undermining Parliament's constitutional role as the guardian of the public purse; and third, that these and other harms are the result of Canadian fiscal and monetary policy being, in part, controlled by private foreign interests through Canada's involvement in international monetary and financial institutions.

7 The pleadings of fact which accompany the Amended Claim define "human capital expenditures" as those that encourage the qualitative and quantitative progress of a nation by way of the promotion of the health, education and quality of life of individuals, in order to make them more productive economic actors, through institutions such as schools, universities, hospitals and other public infrastructures. The Plaintiffs state that investment in human capital is the most productive investment and expenditure a government can make.

8 The Amended Claim seeks nine declarations. The first is that ss 18(i) and (j) of the Bank Act require the Minister of Finance [Minister] and the Government of Canada to request, and the Bank of Canada to provide, interest-free loans for the purpose of human capital expenditures to all levels of government (federal, provincial and municipal).

9 Second, the Plaintiffs ask the Court to declare that the Defendants have not only abdicated their statutory and constitutional duties with respect to ss 18(i) and (j) of the Bank Act, but that they have also, by way of a refusal to request and make interest-free loans under ss 18(i) and (j), caused a negative and destructive impact on Canadians through the disintegration of Canada's economy, its financial institutions, increases in public debt, a decrease in social services, as well as a widening gap between rich and poor, with the continuing disappearance of the middle class. In the accompanying facts to their Amended Claim, the Plaintiffs use a June 11, 2014 request of the Town of Lakeshore, Ontario as an example of an occasion when the Minister refused a request for an interest-free loan without regard to either the nature of the request or pertinent provisions of the Bank Act. The Plaintiffs say that the Minister's reasons for refusing the Town of Lakeshore's request are both financially and economically fallacious and not in accordance with statutory duties.

10 Third, the Plaintiffs seek a declaration that s 18(m) of the Bank Act, and its administration and operation, is unconstitutional and of no force and effect. They say the Defendants have abdicated their constitutional duties and handed them over to international, private entities whose interests have, in effect, been placed above those of Canadians and the primacy of the Canadian Constitution. The Plaintiffs state that no sovereign government such as Canada should ever borrow money from commercial banks at interest, when it can borrow from its own central bank interest-free, particularly when that central bank, unlike the banks of any other G-8 nation, is publically established, mandated, owned and accountable to Parliament and the Minister, and was created with that purpose as one of its main functions.

11 Fourth, the Plaintiffs ask the Court to declare that the fact that the minutes of meetings involving the Governor of the Bank of Canada [Governor] and other G-8 central bank governors have been kept secret is ultra vires the Governor, as being contrary to the Bank Act -- particularly s 24 -- and ought to be considered unconstitutional conduct.

12 The fifth declaration sought is that, by allowing the Governor to keep the nature and content of international bank meetings secret, by not exercising the authority and duty contained in ss 18(i) and (j) of the Bank Act, and in enacting s 18(m) of the Bank Act, Parliament has abdicated its duties and functions as mandated by ss 91(1)(a), (3), (14), (15), (16), (18), (19), (20) of the Constitution Act, 1867, as well as s 36 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

13 The Plaintiffs' sixth and seventh declarations involve the manner in which the Minister accounts for public finances, which the Plaintiffs say is conceptually and logically wrong. The Plaintiffs seek a declaration that the Minister is required to list human capital expenditures -- including those related to infrastructure as "assets" rather than "liabilities" in budgetary accounting -- as well as all revenues prior to the return of tax credits to individual and corporate tax payers, then subtract tax credits, then subtract total expenditures in order to arrive at an annual "surplus" or "deficit," as required by s 91(6) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

14 The eighth declaration sought is that taxes imposed to pay for the interest on the deficit and the debt to private bankers, both domestic and foreign, are illegal and unconstitutional. The Plaintiffs claim that this is the result of a breach of the constitutional right(s) to "no taxation without representation" which occurs when the Minister fails to disclose anticipated revenues to Parliament before the return of anticipated tax credits, prior to determining whether an anticipated surplus or deficit will be incurred, in the tabling of the budget. This means that a full and proper Parliamentary debate cannot properly take place, thus breaching the right to no taxation without representation under both ss 53 and 90 of the Constitution Act, 1867, as well as the unwritten constitutional imperatives to the same effect. Also, it results in an infringement of the Plaintiffs' right to vote under s 3 of the Charter, which is tied to the right to no taxation without representation with respect to the Minister's constitutional violations. The result is a breach of the terms of the Bank Act relating to interest-free loans and the consequent constitutional violations by the Executive of its duty to govern, and its relinquishing of sovereignty and statutory decision-making to private foreign bankers.

15 The ninth and final declaration sought is that the "privative clause" in s 30.1 of the Bank Act either (a) does not apply to prevent judicial review, by way of action or otherwise, with respect to statutorily or constitutionally ultra vires actions, or to prevent the recovery or damages based on such actions; or (b) if it does prevent judicial review and recovery, is unconstitutional and of no force and effect, as breaching the Plaintiffs' constitutional right to judicial review and the underlying constitutional imperatives of the rule of law, Constitutionalism and Federalism.

16 Besides the declaratory relief sought, the Plaintiffs also in the Amended Claim request damages in the amount of $10,000.00 each for individual Plaintiff: William Krehm, Anne Emmett, and for ten COMER Steering Committee [Steering Committee] members named in the Amended Claim, for the breach of their constitutional right of "no taxation without representation" and the inseparable infringement of the right to vote due to alleged constitutional breaches by the Minister. Further, the Plaintiffs request the return of the portion of illegal and unconstitutional tax, to be calculated and calibrated at trial, for each of the Plaintiffs and the members of the Steering Committee, consisting of the proportion of taxes to pay interest charges on the deficit, and debt between 2011 and the time of trial, paid by the Plaintiffs and Steering Committee members, due to the statutory and constitutional breaches of the Defendants' rights in refusing and/or failing to cover deficits in the budget by way of interest-free loans, as well as the breach of their right to no taxation without representation, to be calculated by the compounded interest changes set out in the budget, as a percentage of the budget, calculated as the same percentage paid by the Plaintiffs and Steering Committee members, to be calculated at trial.

III. ISSUES

17 The Defendants have brought a motion to strike the Amended Claim on the grounds that, inter alia:

1. it fails to comply with the leave to amend granted and fails to remedy the problems identified in the Order of April 24, 2014;
2. it seeks to add parties and new claims that are not permissible by virtue of the leave to amend and the Rules;
3. it fails to disclose a reasonable cause of action against the Defendants, or any one of them;
4. it is scandalous, frivolous or vexatious;
5. it is an abuse of process of the Court;
6. it fails to disclose facts which would show that the action or inaction of the Defendants, or any one of them, could cause an infringement of the Plaintiffs' rights under the Charter or the Constitution;
7. the causal link between the alleged action or inaction of the Defendants or any one of them, and the alleged infringement of the Plaintiffs' rights is too uncertain, speculative and hypothetical to sustain a cause of action;
8. it seeks declaratory relief only available under s 18.1 of the Federal Courts Act, RSC, 1985, c F-7 [Federal Courts Act] and in any event such relief is not available to the Plaintiffs;
9. the Plaintiffs are not entitled to seek an advisory opinion from the Court;
10. it seeks to adjudicate matters that are not justiciable;
11. it seeks to impose a fetter on the sovereignty of Parliament and seeks to overrule or disregard the privilege of the House of Commons over its own debates and internal procedures;
12. the Plaintiffs do not have a s 3 Charter right to any particular form of taxation and there is no causal connection, or legitimate expectation between their vote and the presentation of a budget before the House of Commons and resulting legislation;
13. it concerns matters outside the jurisdiction of the Court; and
14. the Plaintiffs do not have standing to bring the Amended Claim as of right, nor can they meet the necessary requirements for the grant of public interest standing.

IV. STATUTORY PROVISIONS

18 The following provisions of the Bank Act are applicable in these proceedings:

Powers and business

18. The Bank may

- (i) make loans or advances for periods not exceeding six months to the Government of Canada or the government of a province on taking security in readily marketable securities issued or guaranteed by Canada or any province;

- (j) make loans to the Government of Canada or the government of any province, but such loans outstanding at any one time shall not, in the case of the Government of Canada, exceed one-third of the estimated revenue of the Government of Canada for its fiscal year, and shall not, in the case of a provincial government, exceed one-fourth of that government's estimated revenue for its fiscal year, and such loans shall be repaid before the end of the first quarter after the end of the fiscal year of the government that has contracted the loan;

- (m) open accounts in a central bank in any other country or in the Bank for International Settlements, accept deposits from central banks in other countries, the Bank for International Settlements, the International Monetary Fund, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and any other official international financial organization, act as agent or mandatary, or depository or correspondent for any of those banks or organizations, and pay interest on any of those deposits;

[...]

Fiscal agent of Canadian Government

24. (1) The Bank shall act as fiscal agent of the Government of Canada.

Charge for acting

- (1.1) With the consent of the Minister, the Bank may charge for acting as fiscal agent of the Government of Canada.

To manage public debt

- (2) The Bank, if and when required by the Minister to do so, shall act as agent for the Government of Canada in the payment of interest and principal and generally in respect of the management of the public debt of Canada.

Canadian Government cheques to be paid or negotiated at par

- (3) The Bank shall not make any charge for cashing or negotiating a cheque drawn on the Receiver General or on the account of the Receiver General, or for cashing or negotiating any other instrument issued as authority for the payment of money out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, or on a cheque drawn in favour of the Government of Canada or any of its departments and tendered for deposit in the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

No liability if in good faith

30.1 No action lies against Her Majesty, the Minister, any officer, employee or director of the Bank or any person acting under the direction of the Governor for anything done or omitted to be done in good faith in the administration or discharge of any powers or duties that under this Act are intended or authorized to be executed or performed.

18. La Banque peut :

- i) consentir des prêts ou avances, pour des périodes d'au plus six mois, au gouvernement du Canada ou d'une province en grevant d'une sûreté des valeurs mobilières facilement négociables, émises ou garanties par le Canada ou cette province;

- j) consentir des prêts au gouvernement du Canada ou d'une province, à condition que, d'une part, le montant non remboursé des prêts ne dépasse, à aucun moment, une certaine fraction des recettes estimatives du gouvernement en cause pour l'exercice en cours -- un tiers dans le cas du Canada, un quart dans celui d'une province -- et que, d'autre part, les prêts soient remboursés avant la fin du premier trimestre de l'exercice suivant;

- m) ouvrir des comptes dans une banque centrale étrangère ou dans la Banque des règlements internationaux, accepter des dépôts -- pouvant porter intérêt -- de banques centrales étrangères, de la Banque des règlements internationaux, du Fonds monétaire international, de la Banque internationale pour la reconstruction et le développement et de tout autre organisme financier international officiel, et leur servir de mandataire, dépositaire ou correspondant;

[...]

Agent financier du gouvernement canadien

24. (1) La Banque remplit les fonctions d'agent financier du gouvernement du Canada.

Honoraires

- (1.1) La Banque peut, avec le consentement du ministre, exiger des honoraires pour remplir de telles fonctions.

Gestion de la dette publique

- (2) Sur demande du ministre, la Banque fait office de mandataire du gouvernement du Canada pour la gestion de la dette publique, notamment pour le paiement des intérêts et du principal de celle-ci.

Encaissement des chèques du gouvernement canadien

- (3) La Banque ne peut exiger de frais pour l'encaissement ou la négociation de chèques tirés sur le receveur général ou pour son compte et d'autres effets autorisant des paiements sur le Trésor, ni pour le dépôt au Trésor de chèques faits à l'ordre du gouvernement du Canada ou d'un ministère fédéral.

Immunité judiciaire

30.1 Sa Majesté, le ministre, les administrateurs, les cadres ou les employés de la Banque ou toute autre personne agissant sous les ordres du gouverneur bénéficient de l'immunité judiciaire pour les actes ou omissions commis de bonne foi dans l'exercice -- autorisé ou requis -- des pouvoirs et fonctions conférés par la présente loi.

19 The following provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867, are applicable in these proceedings:

Appropriation and Tax Bills

53. Bills for appropriating any Part of the Public Revenue, or for imposing any Tax or Impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

Recommendation of Money Votes

54. It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill for the Appropriation of any Part of the Public Revenue, or of any Tax or Impost, to any Purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by Message of the Governor General in the Session in which such Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill is proposed.

Application to Legislatures of Provisions respecting Money Votes, etc.

90. The following Provisions of this Act respecting the Parliament of Canada, namely, -- the Provisions relating to Appropriation and Tax Bills, the Recommendation of Money Votes, the Assent to Bills, the Disallowance of Acts, and the Signification of Pleasure on Bills reserved, -- shall extend and apply to the Legislatures of the several Provinces as if those Provisions were here re-enacted and made applicable in Terms to the respective Provinces and the Legislatures thereof, with the Substitution of the Lieutenant Governor of the Province for the Governor General, of the Governor General for the Queen and for a Secretary of State, of One Year for Two Years, and of the Province for Canada.

Legislative Authority of Parliament of Canada

91. It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make Laws for the Peace, Order, and good Government of Canada, in relation to all Matters not coming within the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces; and for greater Certainty, but not so as to restrict the Generality of the foregoing Terms of this Section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive Legislative Authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,

- 1A. The Public Debt and Property. (45)

[...]

3. The raising of Money by any Mode or System of Taxation.
4. The borrowing of Money on the Public Credit.

6. The Census and Statistics.

[...]

14. Currency and Coinage.

[...]

16. Savings Banks.

Application aux législatures des dispositions relatives aux crédits, etc.

90. Les dispositions suivantes de la présente loi, concernant le parlement du Canada, savoir: -- les dispositions relatives aux bills d'appropriation et d'impôts, à la recommandation de votes de deniers, à la sanction des bills, au désaveu des lois, et à la signification du bon plaisir quant aux bills réservés, -- s'étendront et s'appliqueront aux législatures des différentes provinces, tout comme si elles étaient ici décrétées et rendues expressément applicables aux provinces respectives et à leurs législatures, en substituant toutefois le lieutenant-gouverneur de la province au gouverneur-général, le gouverneur-général à la Reine et au secrétaire d'État, un an à deux ans, et la province au Canada.

Autorité législative du parlement du Canada

91. Il sera loisible à la Reine, de l'avis et du consentement du Sénat et de la Chambre des Communes, de faire des lois pour la paix, l'ordre et le bon gouvernement du Canada, relativement à toutes les matières ne tombant pas dans les catégories de sujets par la présente loi exclusivement assignés aux législatures des provinces; mais, pour plus de garantie, sans toutefois restreindre la généralité des termes ci-haut employés dans le présent article, il est par la présente déclaré que (nonobstant toute disposition contraire énoncée dans la présente loi) l'autorité législative exclusive du parlement du Canada s'étend à toutes les matières tombant dans les catégories de sujets ci-dessous énumérés, savoir :

- [...]
- 1A. La dette et la propriété publiques. (45)

20 The following provisions of the Constitution Act, 1982, are applicable in these proceedings:
Democratic rights of citizens

3. Every citizen of Canada has the right to vote in an election of members of the House of Commons or of a legislative assembly and to be qualified for membership therein.

Life, liberty and security of person

7. Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

Equality before and under law and equal protection and benefit of law

15. (1) Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

Commitment to promote equal opportunities

36. (1) Without altering the legislative authority of Parliament or of the provincial legislatures, or the rights of any of them with respect to the exercise of their legislative authority, Parliament and the legislatures, together with the government of Canada and the provincial governments, are committed to
 - (a) promoting equal opportunities for the well-being of Canadians;
 - (b) furthering economic development to reduce disparity in opportunities; and
 - (c) providing essential public services of reasonable quality to all Canadians.

Commitment respecting public services

- (2) Parliament and the government of Canada are committed to the principle of making equalization payments to ensure that provincial governments have sufficient revenues to provide reasonably comparable levels of public services at reasonably comparable levels of taxation.

Droits démocratiques des citoyens

3. Tout citoyen canadien a le droit de vote et est éligible aux élections législatives fédérales ou provinciales.

Vie, liberté et sécurité

7. Chacun a droit à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de sa personne; il ne peut être porté atteinte à ce droit qu'en conformité avec les principes de justice fondamentale.

Égalité devant la loi, égalité de bénéfice et protection égale de la loi

15. (1) La loi ne fait acception de personne et s'applique également à tous, et tous ont droit à la même protection et au même bénéfice de la loi, indépendamment de toute discrimination, notamment des discriminations fondées sur la race, l'origine nationale ou ethnique, la couleur, la religion, le sexe, l'âge ou les déficiences mentales ou physiques.

Engagements relatifs à l'égalité des chances

36. (1) Sous réserve des compétences législatives du Parlement et des législatures et de leur droit de les exercer, le Parlement et les législatures, ainsi que les gouvernements fédéral et provinciaux, s'engagent à :
 - a) promouvoir l'égalité des chances de tous les Canadiens dans la recherche de leur bien-être;

- b) favoriser le développement économique pour réduire l'inégalité des chances;
- c) fournir à tous les Canadiens, à un niveau de qualité acceptable, les services publics essentiels.

Engagement relatif aux services publics

- (2) Le Parlement et le gouvernement du Canada prennent l'engagement de principe de faire des paiements de péréquation propres à donner aux gouvernements provinciaux des revenus suffisants pour les mettre en mesure d'assurer les services publics à un niveau de qualité et de fiscalité sensiblement comparables.

21 The following provision of the Rules is applicable in these proceedings:

Motion to Strike

221.(1) On motion, the Court may, at any time, order that a pleading, or anything contained therein, be struck out, with or without leave to amend, on the ground that it

- (a) discloses no reasonable cause of action or defence, as the case may be,
- (b) is immaterial or redundant
- (c) is scandalous, frivolous or vexatious,
- (d) may prejudice or delay the fair trial of the action,
- (e) constitutes a departure from a previous pleading, or
- (f) is otherwise an abuse of the process of the Court, and may order the action be dismissed or judgement entered accordingly.

Requête en radiation

221.(1) À tout moment, la Cour peut, sur requête, ordonner la radiation de tout ou partie d'un acte de procédure, avec ou sans autorisation de le modifier, au motif, selon le cas :

- (a) qu'il ne révèle aucune cause d'action ou de défense valable.
- (b) qu'il n'est pas pertinent ou qu'il est redondant ;
- (c) qu'il est scandaleux, frivole ou vexatoire ;
- (d) qu'il risque de nuire à l'instruction équitable de l'action ou de la retarder;
- (e) qu'il diverge d'un acte de procédure antérieur ;
- (f) qu'il constitue autrement un abus de procédure.

Elle peut aussi ordonner que l'action soit rejetée ou qu'un jugement soit enregistré en conséquence.

V. ARGUMENT

A. Defendants' Submissions on the Motion

- (1) The Test on a Motion to Strike

22 The Defendants say that the test to strike out a pleading under Rule 221 is whether it is plain and obvious on the facts pleaded that the action cannot succeed: Sivak et al v The Queen et al, 2012 FC 272 at para 15 [Sivak]; R v Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd, 2011 SCC 42 at para 17 [Imperial Tobacco]. While there is a rule that material facts in a statement of claim should be taken as true when determining whether the claim discloses a reasonable cause of action, this does not require the court to accept at face value bare assumptions or allegations which may be regarded as scandalous, frivolous or vexatious, or legal submissions dressed up as facts: Operation Dismantle v

The Queen, [1985] 1 SCR 441 at para 27 [Operation Dismantle]; Carten v Canada, 2009 FC 1233 at para 31 [Carten].

(2) Reasonable Cause of Action

23 The Rules require that the pleading of material facts disclose a reasonable cause of action. A pleading must: (i) state facts and not merely conclusions of law; (ii) include material facts; (iii) state facts and not the evidence by which they are to be proved; and (iv) state facts concisely in a summary form: Carten, above; Sivak, above; Rules 174 and 181 of the Rules. The Plaintiffs' Amended Claim fails to do this. Its allegations do not provide the necessary elements of each cause of action together with the material facts. Furthermore, it is not clear if the Plaintiffs continue to rely on the allegations of conspiracy and misfeasance as facts to support these allegations are not included in the pleadings. As a result, it cannot be said that the Amended Claim's assertions result in the liability of the Defendants, or any one of them.

24 The Amended Claim includes amendments that are not permissible under the Rules: new parties (the Steering Committee members) and a cause of action not grounded in the facts already pleaded (the allegation of a breach of s 3 Charter rights) have been added. The Defendants further argue that the Amended Claim breaches the terms of the permission to amend by failing to cure the problems identified in the Order of April 24, 2014.

25 The Defendants say that there is no constitutional duty to present the federal budget in the manner sought by the Plaintiffs. As a result, no breach of the principle of no taxation without representation has occurred. The Supreme Court of Canada has held that no taxation without representation means that the Crown may not levy a tax without the authority of Parliament: Kingstreet Investments v New Brunswick, [2007] 1 SCR 3 at para 14; Constitution Act, 1867, ss 53 and 90. The present circumstances suggest that this constitutional requirement has been satisfied.

26 As the master of its own procedure, Parliament cannot be said to have a duty to legislate. No cause of action can result from failing to enact a law: New Brunswick Broadcasting Co v Nova Scotia (Speaker of the House of Assembly), [1993] 1 SCR 319 at 354-355 [NB Broadcasting]; Telezone Inc v Canada (Attorney General), [2004] OJ No 5, 69 OR (3d) 161 (CA) [Telezone]; Lucas v Toronto Services Board, 51 OR (3d) 783 at para 10; Moriss v Attorney General, [1995] EWJ No 297 (England and Wales Court of Appeal) at para 38.

27 Citing s 91(6) of the Constitution Act, 1867, the Plaintiffs allege that the accounting method employed in the budgetary process is unconstitutional. However, this subsection, "the Census and Statistics," is simply one of the classes of subjects enumerated in s 91 over which Parliament has exclusive legislative authority; it does not impose a duty to legislate and, as such, is of little help to the Plaintiffs. The Defendants point out that, in any event, much of what is being sought by the Plaintiffs is publically available from the Department of Finance. For example, Tax Expenditures and Evaluations 2012 can be found online at <http://www.fin.gc.ca/taxexp-depfisc/2012/taxexp12-eng.asp>.

28 With respect to the Plaintiffs' legitimate expectations argument, the Defendants state that it falls under the doctrine of fairness or natural justice, and does not create substantive rights: Baker v Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [1999] 2 SCR 817 at para 26. The only procedure due to a Canadian citizen is that proposed legislation receive three readings in the House of Commons and the Senate and that it receive Royal Assent: Authorson v Canada (Attorney General), 2003 SCC 39 [Authorson]. The procedural rights described by the Plaintiffs have never existed: Penikett v The Queen, 1987 CanLII 145 (YK CA) at 17-18.

29 The Defendants say that the Plaintiffs' reliance on the Magna Carta does not assist them. While the document holds a seminal place in the development of Canadian constitutional principles, it has been displaced by legislation in both the United Kingdom and Canada. It has no contemporary independent legal significance or weight and is therefore "amenable to ordinary legislative change": Rocco Galati et al v Canada, 2015 FC 91 at para 74 [Galati].

30 Parliamentary privilege, including its corresponding powers and immunities, ensures the proper functioning of Parliament and is one of the ways in which the constitutional separation of powers is respected: Telezone, above, at para 13; Canada (House of Commons) v Vaid, 2005 SCC 30 at para 21 [Vaid]. In Authorson, above, the Supreme Court affirmed its decision in Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution, [1981] 1 SCR 753, indicating that the way in which a legislative body proceeds is a matter immune from judicial review and is one of self-definition and inherent authority. The United Kingdom Bill of Rights of 1689, 1 Will & Mar sess 2, c 2, partially codifies parliamentary privilege at article 9, precluding any court from impeaching or questioning the freedom of speech and debates or proceedings in Parliament: Prebble v Television New Zealand, [1994] UKPC 3, [1995] 1 AC 321 (JCPC); Hamilton v al Fayed, [2000] 2 All ER 224 (HL) [Hamilton v al Fayed].

31 Once a category of privilege is established, it is not the courts but Parliament that may determine whether a particular exercise of privilege is necessary or appropriate: Parliament of Canada Act, RSC 1985, c P-1, ss 4-5 [Parliament of Canada Act]; Pickin v British Railways Board, [1974] AC 765 (HL) at 790; Vaid, above, at para 29. Recognized categories of privilege include freedom of speech and control over debates and proceedings in Parliament: Vaid, above. The Defendants assert that the budget debate, its presentation, supporting papers and associated legislation fall under this category of privilege: Roman Corp v Hudon's Bay Oil & Gas Co, [1973] SCR 820 at 827-828; NB Broadcasting, above.

32 By virtue of ss 53 and 54 of the Constitution Act, 1867, "Money Bills" must originate in the House of Commons, and the Governor General must grant a recommendation for the expenditure of public funds. There is no suggestion in the Amended Claim that these requirements have not been satisfied.

33 COMER, as an unincorporated association, cannot benefit from the protection provided for the electoral rights of citizens provided by s 3 of the Charter. While this protection could apply to the two individual Plaintiffs, provided they are Canadian citizens, neither has plead such a cause of action. The Amended Claim makes no suggestion that the Plaintiffs' access to "meaningful participation" in the electoral process -- what the Supreme Court has determined is protected by s 3 -- has been in any way affected: Figuroa v Canada (Attorney General), [2003] 1 SCR 912 at para 27.

34 In order for a cause of action to be brought under the Charter, at least a threat of violation of a Charter right must be established: Operation Dismantle, above, at para 7. The Amended Claim does not demonstrate a link between the actions of any of the Defendants and the alleged s 3 harms. The Defendants further submit that s 3 has never been interpreted to encompass any rights or legitimate expectations that a claimant's elected representatives will enact any particular measures or refrain from doing so.

35 With respect to the Plaintiffs' damages claim for the return of allegedly unconstitutional taxes, the Defendants assert that no factual support has been brought forward to support such a claim.

36 The Defendants also address several other allegations in the Amended Claim. As regards the alleged misfeasance by public officers in the withholding of anticipated total revenue, the Defendants say that the necessary elements of the tort -- including any alleged state of mind of a person involved, wilful default, malice or fraudulent intention -- are not made out: St John's Port Authority v Adventure Tours Inc, 2011 FCA 198 at para 25. Of note is the absence of facts that would support a finding of deliberate and unlawful misconduct of a public officer, or that a public officer was aware that his or her conduct was unlawful and likely to harm the Plaintiffs: Odhavji v Woodhouse, 2003 SCC 69 at paras 23, 28-29. In terms of the nominate tort of statutory breach, the Supreme Court of Canada has established that it does not exist: The Queen v Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, [1983] 1 SCR 205 at 225. Even so, the remedy for a breach of statutory duty by a public authority is judicial review for invalidity: Holland v Saskatchewan, 2008 SCC 42 at para 9.

37 The Plaintiffs also make a claim of conspiracy, but again fail to plead the material facts necessary to support such an allegation, such as the identity of the officials engaged in the conduct, the type of agreement entered into, the time the agreement was reached, the lawful or unlawful means that were to be used, and the nature of the intended injury to the Plaintiffs. Other requirements that are missing include an agreement between two or more persons and intent to injure: G.H.L. Fridman, Introduction to the Canadian Law of Torts, 2nd ed (Markham: Butterworths, 2003) at 185.

38 The Plaintiffs plead that, through s 24 of the Bank Act, Parliament has allowed the impugned actions by the Government of Canada. However, the Defendants point out that this provision has nothing to do with the keeping of minutes by the Bank. In addition, the Plaintiffs have not provided the grounds necessary to demonstrate how s 30.1, which provides that no action lies against the Crown, the Minister of Finance and officials of the Bank of Canada for anything done or omitted to be done in good faith in the administration or discharge of any powers or duties under the Bank Act, would affect their rights.

(3) Declaratory Relief

39 The Defendants make a series of submissions in relation to the Plaintiffs' claim for declaratory relief. First, they say the Federal Court has jurisdiction to issue declaratory and coercive remedies only as prescribed in the Federal Courts Act. Section 18 indicates that extraordinary remedies can only be obtained on an application for judicial review under s 18.1. Subsection 18.4(2) allows the Court to direct that an application for judicial review be treated and proceeded with as an action, but does not authorize the Plaintiffs to initiate a request for declaratory or coercive relief in an action.

40 The requirements for proper judicial review, as set out by s 18.1, include that only someone who is "directly affected by the matter in respect of which relief is sought" may bring an application. The Plaintiffs are not directly affected.

41 The Plaintiffs' claim damages for a "return of the portion of illegal and unconstitutional tax." The Defendants say that it is hard to see how these taxes can be claimed without impugning the legality of the instruments that gave rise to their increase. Additionally, the law is clear that the Plaintiffs may only seek to attack administrative action by state actors by way of judicial review: Telezone, above, at para 52.

42 Second, in order to claim declaratory relief, entitlement must be established. The Supreme Court of Canada has held that a declaration of unconstitutionality is a declaratory remedy for the settlement of a real dispute: Khadr v Canada (Prime Minister), 2010 SCC 3 [Khadr]. Before the court can issue a declaratory remedy, it must have jurisdiction over the issue at bar, the question before the court must be real and not theoretical, and the person raising it must have a real interest in raising it. The Defendants say that the Plaintiffs have not met any of these requirements.

43 Third, the Plaintiffs are not entitled to refer matters for an advisory opinion. As determined in the Order of April 24, 2014, the Plaintiffs are asking that the Court declare that their reading of the Bank Act and the Constitution is correct. This is akin to asking the Court for an advisory opinion. Without an adequate description of how a private right or interest has been affected, the Plaintiffs have not demonstrated a statutory grant of jurisdiction by Parliament that the Court can rule on and find that statutory and constitutional breaches have occurred.

44 Fourth, declaratory relief necessitates a real dispute between the parties and cannot be issued in response to one that is merely hypothetical: Operation Dismantle, above, at para 33; Diabo v Whitesand First Nation, 2011 FCA 96; Re Danson and the Attorney-General of Ontario, (1987) 60 OR (2d) 676 at 685 (CA). A real dispute is not present here.

45 Fifth, the Plaintiffs have no real interest or right that has been affected by the interpretation or operation of s 18 of the Bank Act. As noted in the Order of April 24, 2014, despite claiming to be acting for "all other Canadians," the Plaintiffs have failed to produce a pleading demonstrating how "all other Canadians" have been impacted in a way that constitutes an infringement of an individual or collective right. The Court is confined to declaring contested legal rights, and cannot give advisory opinions on the law generally: Gouriet v Union of Post Office Workers, [1978] AC 435 at 501-502 [Gouriet].

(4) Justiciability

46 Justiciability is a normative inquiry that involves looking to the subject matter of the question, the manner of its presentation and the appropriateness of judicial adjudication: Friends of the Earth - Les Ami(e)s de la Terre v Canada (Governor in Council), 2009 FCA 297 [Friends of the Earth].

47 The Defendants argue that the Court can, and in this case should, deal with statutory interpretation on a motion to strike: Les Laboratoires Servier v Apotex Inc, 2007 FC 837 at para 38. The Defendants state that it is critical to note that s 18 of the Bank Act, which enumerates the business and powers of the Bank of Canada, states that the Bank "may" do what is listed at paragraphs (a) through (p). The Plaintiffs want paragraphs (i) and (j) to be read as imperative: that the Bank of Canada is statutorily required, when necessary, to make interest-free loans for the purposes they define. Such mandatory language is not present and to invoke it borders on absurdity as it would suggest that Parliament did not follow through on its very purpose for creating a Bank of Canada, as set out in the Bank Act's preamble: to regulate credit and currency in the best interest of the economic life of the Canadian nation.

48 If the Bank Act is to be read as imperative, the Defendants say that it will become necessary for the Court to detail the occasions when the Government of Canada "must" request loans and the Bank "must" provide them. Without these specifications, any declaration made by the Court will be meaningless, and the courts will not make a declaration where "it will serve little or no purposes": Terrasses Zarolega Inc v RIO, [1981] 1 S.C.R. 94 at 106-107.

49 The Defendants point out that absent "objective legal criteria," the Court should decline to hear a matter since such a proceeding would entail significant consideration of policy matters, which are beyond the proper subject matter for judicial review: Friends of the Earth, above. at para 33.

50 In asking for a declaration that the Minister and the Government of Canada be required to request interest-free loans for "human capital" and or "infrastructure" expenditures, the Plaintiffs are not merely seeking an interpretation of the Bank Act; they are seeking a coercive order. Section 18 does not support such a request. The Defendants argue that whether a particular loan should be sought by the Government of Canada and made by the Bank is an inappropriate matter for judicial involvement, both institutionally and constitutionally.

51 Furthermore, the Bank Act does not set out any requirements in regards to how the Bank ought to exercise its lending powers. Loan-making is clearly subject to the Bank's discretion and contemplation of a wide range of circumstances that the Bank is best-positioned to weigh and consider.

52 The Defendants say that under the Plaintiffs' plan, the task of regulating credit and currency in the best interest of the economic life of Canada would become the responsibility of the Court, which would have to pronounce the requirements for loans on an ad hoc basis, with coercive orders.

53 Furthermore, the Plaintiffs' amendments have not addressed the deficiency related to the so-called improper "handing-off" to international institutions. The Defendants suggest that the Plaintiffs want the Court to instigate a grand inquisition in regard to monetary and fiscal matters. This is not the proper role of the Court and there is no such duty on the Defendants.

54 The allegation of "handing-off" to international institutions is not a legal cause of action and is not justiciable. It is not concerned with the objective legality of an action or inaction, but instead with the abstract concept of "private interests" being placed above the "interests of Canadians." Only the people of Canada can, through the election of their representatives, determine the interests of Canadians.

55 Government policy decisions and issues that are better decided by a branch of government are non-justiciable: Imperial Tobacco, above, at para 72; Lorne M Sossin: Boundaries of Judicial Review: The Law of Justiciability in Canada (Carswell: Toronto, 1999) at 4-5.

56 The Defendants say that the Amended Claim attacks the way in which Canada develops and implements fiscal and monetary policy, as well as its participation in international economic organizations. It attempts to address abstruse issues relating to the governance of the Bank of Canada and fiscal policy-making -- things that are properly the concern of governments, not the judiciary: Ontario (Attorney General) v Fraser, 2011 SCC 20 at para 302; Public Service Alliance of Canada v Canada, [1987] 1 SCR 424 at para 36; RJR-MacDonald Inc v Canada (Attorney General), [1995] 3 SCR 199 at paras 21, 68; Archibald v Canada, [1997] 3 FC 335 at paras 54, 83.

57 The Amended Claim is so broad and general in its parameters that it defies judicial manageability.

(5) Court's Jurisdiction

58 The Defendants say that the test for determining if a matter is within the Federal Court's jurisdiction is stipulated in ITO-International Terminal Operators LTD v Miida Electronics, [1986] 1 SCR 752 at 766 [ITO-International]:

1. There must be a statutory grant of jurisdiction by Parliament.
2. There must be an existing body of federal law which is essential to the disposition of the case and which nourishes the statutory grant of jurisdiction.
3. The law on which the case is based must be "a law of Canada" as the phrase is used in s. 101 of the Constitution Act.

59 As regards the first component of the test, there is no statutory grant for a suit to be brought against the Bank of Canada. It has been determined that s 17 of the Federal Courts Act, which provides that the Court has concurrent original jurisdiction in all cases in which relief is claimed against the Crown, does not apply to a statutory corporation acting as an agent of the Crown. Therefore, the Bank of Canada, a statutory corporation created by the Bank Act, cannot be said to be the Crown or a Crown Agent. The powers in s 18 are not fiscal agent powers, but rather powers that the Bank of Canada is entitled to exercise in its own right.

60 Also, the Court has no jurisdiction over a Minister of the Crown. He or she may not be sued in his or her representative capacity; the Queen is the only proper defendant in an action against the Crown: Peter G White Management v Canada, 2006 FCA 190.

61 The Defendants also say that the second part of the ITO-International jurisdictional test has not been met. It is not fulfilled simply by the fact that an allegedly misused power emanates from a federal statute. The Plaintiffs do not have specific rights, nor is there a detailed, corresponding statutory framework. The allegations against the Defendants relating to the abdication of statutory and constitutional duties can only be grounded in negligence, civil conspiracy or misfeasance. These matters are based on tort law and would properly be applied by the provincial courts.

62 As regards the third portion of the test, s 3 of the Charter is not properly characterized as a "law of Canada" in the s 101 sense. To support this statement, the Defendants apply the reasoning in Kigowa v Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), [1990] 1 FC 804 at para 8, which examined ss 7 and 9 of the Charter.

(6) Standing

63 As a final issue, the Defendants assert that the Plaintiffs do not have standing to bring this claim. Their private rights have not been interfered with, nor have they suffered special damages specific to them from an interference with a public right: Finlay v Canada (Minister of Finance), [1986] 2 SCR 607 at paras 18-22 [Finlay].

64 A general disdain for a particular law or governmental action is not enough to meet the standard of "genuine interest" for public interest standing. A stronger nexus than what is presented in the Amended Claim is required between the party making the claim and the impugned legislation: Canadian Council of Churches v Canada, [1992] 1 SCR 236; Marchand v Ontario (2006), 81 OR (3d) 172 (SCJ).

B. Plaintiffs' Response to Defendants' Motion

65 The Plaintiffs assert, to the extent that the Order of April 24, 2014 refused to strike the declaratory relief (the bulk of the Amended Claim), and ruled that it is justiciable, that this motion to strike is an abuse of process because res judicata and issue estoppel apply.

(1) The Test on a Motion to Strike

66 In terms of the general principles that ought to be applied on a motion to strike, the Plaintiffs assert that the facts pleaded by the Plaintiffs must be taken as proven: Canada (Attorney General) v Inuit Tapirsat of Canada, [1980] 2 SCR 735; Nelles v Ontario (1989), 60 DLR (4th) 609 (SCC) [Nelles]; Operation Dismantle, above; Hunt v Carey Canada Inc [1990] 2 SCR 959 [Hunt]; Dumont v Canada (Attorney General), [1990] 1 SCR 279 [Dumont]; Nash v Ontario (1995), 27 OR (3d) 1 (Ont CA) [Nash]; Canada v Arsenault, 2009 FCA 242 [Arsenault].

67 The Plaintiffs echo the test referenced by the Defendants, asserting that a claim can be struck only in plain and obvious cases where the pleading is bad beyond argument: Nelles, above, at para 3. The Court has provided further guidance in Dumont, above, that an outcome should be "plain and obvious" or "beyond doubt" before striking can be invoked (at para 2). Striking cannot be justified by a claim that raises an "arguable, difficult or important point of law": Hunt, above, at para 55.

68 The novelty of the Amended Claim is not reason in and of itself to strike it: Nash, above, at para 11; Hanson v Bank of Nova Scotia (1994), 19 OR (3d) 142 (CA); Adams-Smith v Christian Horizons [1997] O.J. No. 2887, (1997), 3 OR (3d) 640 (Ont Gen Div). Additionally, matters that are not fully settled by the jurisprudence should not be disposed of on a motion to strike: RD Belanger & Associates Ltd v Stadium Corp of Ontario Ltd (1991), 5 OR (3d) 778 (CA). In order for the Defendants to succeed, the Plaintiffs state that a case from the same jurisdiction that squarely deals with, and rejects, the very same issue must be presented: Dalex Co v Schwartz Levitsky Feldman (1994), 19 OR (3d) 463 (CA). The Court should be generous when interpreting the drafting of the pleadings, and allow for amendments prior to striking: Grant v Cormier -- Grant et al (2001), 56 OR (3d) 215 (CA).

69 The Plaintiffs also remind the Court that the line between fact and evidence is not always clear (Liebmann v Canada, [1994] 2 FC 3 at para 20) and that the Amended Claim must be taken as pleaded by the Plaintiffs, not as reconfigured by the Defendants: Arsenault, above, at para 10.

(2) Constitutional Claims

70 As regards the general principles to be applied to their constitutional claims, the Plaintiffs state that, as previously plead to the Prothonotary and to me, the Constitution does not belong to either the federal or provincial legislatures, but rather to Canadians: Nova Scotia (Attorney General) v Canada (Attorney General), [1951] SCR 31 [Nova Scotia (AG)]. Parliament and the Executive are bound by constitutional norms, and neither can abdicate its duty to govern: Canada (Wheat Board) v Hallet and Carey Ltd, [1951] SCR 81 [Wheat Board]; Re George Edwin Gray, (1918) 57 SCR 150 [Re Gray] at 157; Reference re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 SCR 217 [Reference re Secession of Quebec].

71 Furthermore, the Supreme Court of Canada has held that legislative omissions can lead to constitutional breaches (Vriend v Alberta, [1998] 1 SCR 493) and that all executive action and inaction must conform to constitutional norms: Air Canada v British Columbia (Attorney General), [1986] 2 SCR 539; Khadr, above.

72 With respect to the budgetary issue, the Plaintiffs submit that: (a) contrary to Arsenault, the Defendants misstate the Plaintiffs' Amended Claim; and (b) that s 3 of the Charter is intrinsically tied to the right of no taxation without representation and/or any other underlying right directly connected to the right to vote.

73 The Plaintiffs say the Defendants misstate and fail to properly respond to the constitutional question. Two erroneous submissions and assumptions have been made. First, it is not plain and obvious that s 91(6) does not impose a duty, or that it is not arguable: Wheat Board, above; Re Gray, above, at 157; Reference re Secession of Quebec, above. Second, the Defendants have overlooked that the constitutional, primary duty in the budgetary process, is to outline all revenues and expenditures. This duty has evolved from the Magna Carta and is tied to the constitutional right to no taxation without representation. The Defendants have removed and failed to reveal the true revenue(s) to Parliament, which is the only body that can constitutionally impose tax and therefore approve the proposed spending. The Minister of Finance has essentially removed the ability of Parliament to properly review, debate and pass the budget's expenditures and corresponding tax provisions.

74 The Plaintiffs' position is misconstrued by the Defendants as an attempt to argue a right in the Magna Carta. All that is stated, the Plaintiffs argue, is that the right can be traced back to the Magna Carta and is codified by ss 53, 54 and 90 of the Constitution Act, 1867. It is submitted that the tort actions, which are founded in this right and the inseparable right to vote under s 3 of the Charter, may be "novel," but comply with the rules of pleading and the Order of April 24, 2014, while meeting the test for a reasonable cause of action.

75 Furthermore, the tort action was not, and should not be, framed in public misfeasance or conspiracy. Rather, the actions of the Minister of Finance, with respect to the budgeting process, and those of the Bank of Canada officials who relegated or abdicated their duty, relate to the constitutional breaches and torts pleaded.

(3) Declaratory Relief

76 On the issue of declaratory relief, the Plaintiffs say that the Defendants' submissions on the topic are, in any event, misguided and contrary to the jurisprudence. The Plaintiffs argue that the issue has already been decided by my Order of April 24, 2014 and was upheld by the Court of Appeal when it dismissed the Defendants' cross-appeal. Therefore, the matter constitutes res judicata, issue estoppel and abuse of process: City of Toronto v CUPE, Local 79, [2003] 3 SCR 77.

77 Declaratory relief goes to the crux of the constitutional right to judicial review: Dunsmuir v New Brunswick, 2008 SCC 9 at paras 27-31; Singh v Canada (Citizenship and Immigration), 2010 FC 757 at para 38; Canada v Solosky, [1980] 1 SCR 821 at 830. The Supreme Court of Canada has recently reaffirmed the scope of the right to declaratory relief, indicating that it cannot be statute-barred: Manitoba Metis Federation Inc v Canada (Attorney General), 2013 SCC 14 at paras 134, 140 and 143.

78 The Defendants ignore ss 2 and 17 of the Federal Courts Act as well as Rule 64 of the Rules. The Court has held that declaratory relief is available, and may be sought, under s 17 of the Federal Courts Act: Edwards v Canada (2000) 181 FTR 219 [Edwards]; Khadr, above.

(4) Justiciability

79 As regards the issue of justiciability, noting that the Supreme Court of Canada has stated that the constitutionality of legislation has always been a justiciable issue, the Plaintiffs argue that just because the subject-matter at hand deals with socio-economic matters does not make it non-justiciable.

80 The Plaintiffs argue that the Defendants have "figure-skated" from the notion of justiciability to that of a "political question." The Plaintiffs state:

The "Political question" doctrine is an old doctrine adopted early in the jurisprudence over "pure questions of policy" or "choice" over "policies" over which no statutory nor constitutional dimensions exists over which the Court can adjudicate. In a word the subject-matter did not involve asserted statutory or constitutional rights. This is not the situation in the within case.

81 In terms of issues dealing with socio-economic policies that the Supreme Court of Canada has found to be justiciable, the Plaintiffs point to the following:

- * Whether "wage and price" controls were within the competence of the federal Parliament: Reference re Anti-Inflation Act, 1975, [1976] 2 SCR 373;
- * Whether the limits on transfer payments between the federal government and provincial governments could unilaterally be altered: Reference re Canada Assistance Plan (Canada), [1991] 2 SCR 525 [CAP Reference];

- * A challenge by an individual regarding whether transfer payments by the federal government to the provincial governments with respect to welfare payments were illegal because the province was breaching certain provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan: Finlay, above.

82 The Plaintiffs assert that the clear test for justiciability is whether there is a "sufficient legal component to warrant the intervention of the judicial branch": CAP Reference, above, at para 33. The Amended Claim meets this test. When social policies are alleged to infringe or violate Charter-protected rights, they must be scrutinized; this does not exclude "political questions": Chaoulli v Quebec (Procureur general), 2005 SCC 35 at paras 89, 183, 185. In such cases the question before the court is not whether the policy is sound, but rather whether it violates constitutional rights, which is a totally different question: Operation Dismantle, above, at 472.

83 The declaratory relief and damages sought in the Amended Claim are, according to the Plaintiffs, grounded in the interpretation of the Bank Act, and the constitutional duties and requirements of the budgetary process. These have not been respected. The Constitution, as a result, is being structurally violated and the Plaintiffs' rights are being infringed.

84 The Defendants have confused the notion of justiciability with that of enforceability by not properly distinguishing between the declaratory relief and tort relief sought, and in viewing some of the declaratory relief as non-enforceable. The statutory right to seek declaratory relief is provided for by Rule 64 of the Rules, whether or not any consequential relief is or can be claimed. In addition, the Supreme Court of Canada has recognized that instances may exist where it is appropriate to declare but not enforce a right: Khadr, above.

(5) Standing

85 Finally, the Plaintiffs submit that they clearly have standing to bring forward these justiciable issues on the facts pleaded. This standing is personal, but it is also public interest-based and is in line with recent jurisprudence: Canada (Attorney General) v Downtown Eastside Sex Workers United Against Violence Society, 2012 SCC 45; Galati, above.

86 The Supreme Court of Canada has ruled that the Constitution does not belong to the federal or provincial governments, but to Canadian citizens (Nova Scotia (AG), above), and that it is a tool for dispute resolution, of which one of the most important goals is to serve well those who make use of it: Reference Re Residential Tenancies Act, [1996] 1 SCR 186 at 210.

87 The Plaintiffs submit that it is time to revisit the issue of standing with respect to the constitutional validity of statutes and executive actions. In cases like the present one, concerned with the constitutional validity of statutes and/or executive actions by way of declaratory relief, public interest standing is a constitutional right.

VI. ANALYSIS

88 Pursuant to my Order of April 24, 2014 (as endorsed by the Federal Court of Appeal on January 6, 2015), the Plaintiffs have now served and filed the Amended Claim and the Defendants have brought a second motion to strike.

89 The background to this dispute is set out in my Order of April 24, 2014.

A. The Amendments

90 While the Amended Claim maintains the declaratory relief described in paragraphs 1 to 10 substantially intact from their previous pleading, the Plaintiffs have dropped the allegations that the unlawful actions of the Defendants violate ss 7 and 15 of the Charter. Instead, the Plaintiffs now seek, as part of their declaratory relief, a declaration:

- viii) that taxes imposed to pay for the interest on the deficit and debt to private bankers, both domestic and particularly foreign, are illegal and unconstitutional owing to,

- A/ the breach of the constitutional right(s) to no taxation without representation resulting from the Finance Minister's failure to disclose full anticipated revenues to MPs in Parliament, before the return of anticipated tax credits, prior to determining whether an anticipated surplus or deficit will be incurred, in the tabling of the budget, in that a full and proper debate cannot properly ensue as a result, thus breaching the right to no taxation without representation under both ss.53 and 90 of the Constitution Act, 1867, as well as the unwritten constitutional imperatives to the same effect;
- B/ the infringement of the Plaintiffs' right to vote, under s. 3 of the Charter, tied to the right to no taxation without representation with respect to the Minister of Finance's constitutional violations;
- C/ breach of the terms of the Bank of Canada Act, with respect to interest-free loans, and the consequent constitutional violations, by the Executive, of its duty to govern, and relinquishing sovereignty and statutory decision-making to private foreign bankers;

91 The Plaintiffs have also made it clear that their tort claims are not based upon public misfeasance and/or conspiracy. The new damages claim reads as follows:

(b) damages in the amount of:

- i) $10,000.00 each for the Plaintiffs William Krehm and Ann Emmett, as well as the ten (10) named COMER Steering Committee members, named in paragraph 2(a) of the within statement of claim, for the breach of their constitutional right of "no taxation without representation" and the inseparable infringement of the right to vote under s. 3 of the Charter, as tied to the right and imperative against no taxation without representation, due to the constitutional breaches by the Minister of Finance with respect to the budgetary process; and
- ii) return of the portion of illegal and unconstitutional tax, to be calculated and calibrated at trial, for each of the Plaintiffs and members of COMER's Steering Committee, consisting of the proportion of taxes, to pay interest charges on the deficit, and debt, between 2011 and the time of trial, paid by the Plaintiffs and Steering Committee members of COMER, due to the statutory and constitutional breaches of the Defendants in refusing and/or failing to cover deficits in the budget by way of interest-free loans, as well as the breach of their right to no taxation without representation, to be calculated by the compounded interest charges set out in the budget, as a percentage of the budget, calculated as the same percentage paid by the Plaintiffs and Steering Committee members, to be calculated and calibrated at trial;

92 Other amendments throughout the Amended Claim either bolster the claims with more facts (e.g. paras 15(h) and 22) or reflect the basic shifts referred to above (see paras 39, 41, 43 and 47).

B. Rule 221 -- Motion to Strike

93 As with the previous strike motion, there is no disagreement between the parties as to the basic jurisprudence that governs a motion to strike under Rule 221. For purposes of this motion, I adopt the principles set out in paras 66 and 68 of my Order of April 24, 2014. Essentially, the test for striking an action is a high one and the Defendants must show that it is plain and obvious, assuming the facts pleaded to be true, that the pleadings disclose no reasonable cause of action or that there is no reasonable prospect that the claim will succeed. See Imperial Tobacco, above, at paras 17, 21 and 25.

94 As I found in my Order of April 24, 2014, this claim remains both novel and ambitious, but this does not mean that it is plain and obvious, assuming the facts pleaded to be true, that it does not give rise to a reasonable cause of action or that there is no reasonable prospect that it will not succeed at trial.

C. Grounds for the Motion

95 The Defendants have raised a significant number of grounds for striking the Amended Claim. I will deal in turn with those grounds that I feel have substance and relevance.

(1) Budget Presentation and Taxation

96 As regards the declaratory relief sought in paras 1(a)(vi) to (viii) of the Amended Claim dealing with the presentation of the Federal Budget by the Minister of Finance, that Defendants argue as follows:

12. There is no constitutional duty of presenting the federal budget in the manner sought by the plaintiffs. There is no breach of the principle of "no taxation without representation". This principle, as defined by the Supreme Court, means that the Crown may not levy a tax except with the authority of Parliament. This constitutional requirement was satisfied here.
13. Parliament is master of its procedure. It is well recognized that there is no duty on Parliament to legislate. There is no cause of action for the omission of Parliament to enact any law.
14. The plaintiffs allege that the accounting method used in the budgetary process is a breach of ss. 91(6) Constitution Act, 1867, which grants legislative power over "[t]he census and statistics" to Parliament. This provision will not aid them. Section 91 enumerates the classes of subjects and all matters coming within them to which the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada is granted -- it does not impose duties on Parliament or the Government. A reference to a class of federal power in the Constitution Act, 1867 is not the imposition of a duty upon Parliament to legislate in respect of that subject matter. S. 91(6) -- "the Census and Statistics" -- is one of the classes of subjects enumerated in s. 91 for which it is declared in the Constitution Act, 1867 that "the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within" this class of subjects.
15. In any event, much of the information sought by the plaintiffs to be included in the budget documents presented before Parliament is publicly available from the Department of Finance, for example: Tax Expenditures and Evaluations 2012 at: <http://.fin.gc.ca/taxexp-depfisc/2012/taxexp12-eng.as p>.

97 The facts supporting the Plaintiffs' request for declaratory relief on this issue are set out in paras 25-43 of the Amended Claim. The main judicial point is stated as follows:

[39] The Plaintiffs state, and the fact is, that the above "accounting method" used in the budgetary process are [sic] not in accordance with accepted accounting practices, are conceptually and logically wrong, and have the effect of perpetually making the real and actual picture of what total "revenues", "total expenditures", and what the annual deficit/surplus" [sic] actually is, what the annual "deficit/surplus" actually is, in any given year, and what, as a result the standing national "debt" is. Moreover, and more importantly, the Plaintiffs state, and fact is [sic], that such "accounting" methods foreclose any actual or real debate, or consideration, by elected MPs, in Parliament, as the actual financial picture is not available nor disclosed to either Parliamentarians nor the Canadian public. The Plaintiffs state, and the fact is, that such accounting method breaches s. 91(6) of the Constitution Act, 1867 and the duty of the Defendant(s) to maintain accurate "statistics", and the ability of MPs in Parliament to fully and openly debate the budget, which breaches the Plaintiffs' right(s) to "no taxation without representation" and also infringes their right to vote under s. 3 of the Charter, as tied to the no right to taxation without representation.

[41] The Plaintiffs state, and the fact is, that this failure and/or calculated choice by the Defendant Minister of Finance to withhold anticipated total revenue, before the subtraction of anticipated tax credits, along with anticipated expenditures, in the budget bill(s), violates the Plaintiffs' constitutional right to no taxation without representation as guaranteed by ss. 53 and 90 of the Constitution Act, 1867, and unwritten constitutional imperative underlying it, dating back to the Magna Carta, as well as diminishes, devalues and infringes on their right to vote under s. 3 of the Charter with respect to taxation as tied to deficit, debt, and the availability to debate the alternative of avoiding both by, inter alia, exercising the interest-free Bank of Canada loans under s. 18 of the Bank of Canada Act.

98 It is true, as the Defendants say, that the Plaintiffs take issue with the way the Minister presents the federal budget to Parliament. However, the allegations set out above are not just that the Minister's accounting methods are fallacious because they fail to take account of human capital and do not appropriately take tax credits into account. If this was the point of the claims, then clearly it would be nothing more than a debate about proper accounting procedures in the context of the federal budget. However, the Plaintiffs provide the facts about how the federal budget is presented to Parliament and say why they think it is inappropriate before they go on to state the legal basis of their claim. And the legal basis of the claim is that the Minister's accounting methods and practices breach s 91(6) of the Constitution Act, 1867 because they mean the Defendants are not maintaining and presenting accurate statistics, which in turn breaches s 3 of the Charter because, in the end, inaccurate and misleading statistics prevent any meaningful debate on the budget in Parliament. This means in turn that MPs cannot fulfil their representative function and the Plaintiffs (at least the individual Plaintiffs) are therefore being taxed without any real representative input on the budget. This undermines s 3 of the Charter and the guarantees under ss 53 and 90 of the Constitution Act, 1867. This is my understanding of the Amended Claim on this issue.

99 Clearly, the Plaintiffs disagree with the way the Minister compiles and presents the budget to Parliament. They know that this, in itself, is not a legal issue they can bring to the Court. So they have hitched their complaints to s 91(6) of the Constitution Act, 1867, s 3 of the Charter and the no taxation without representation principle. Can this hitching be equated with any previous application of the constitutional principles and provisions cited and relied upon? Not to my knowledge. But that is not the issue before me. Charter litigation generally suggests that the Supreme Court of Canada may find a Charter or constitutional breach that has not been previously identified.

100 The Plaintiffs' target is the executive branch of government as embodied in the Minister of Finance. It is the Minister's actions that are alleged to thwart the Parliamentary process and to breach the Constitution Act, 1867 and s 3 of the Charter. It has to be admitted that the arguments underlying the Plaintiffs' assertion of a Constitution and a Charter breach appear at this stage to be somewhat novel and esoteric but, as I have already said, this is not a sufficient ground for saying that they disclose no reasonable cause of action or that there is no reasonable prospect of success at trial.

101 The Plaintiffs reiterated the same points clearly in their oral arguments:

The case before you is there is an executive breach of a constitutional requirement by the Minister of Finance with respect to the budget process, and that as a result the legislation that comes out of Parliament breaches the constitutional right to no taxation without representation. Why? The MPs are blindfolded.

[Transcript of Proceedings p 38, lines 17-23]

The right to vote includes the right to effective representation. If the MPs are blinded by executive constitutional breaches by the Minister of Finance, how does that ensure effective representation?

[Transcript of Proceedings p 39, lines 1-5]

[N]owhere in the pleadings are we asking Parliament to legislate. We are simply saying that there's an abdication of executive and parliamentary duty with respect to the budget as pleaded. That is a different matter.

And the failure to act applies equally to the executive as it does to the legislative with respect to constitutional breaches...

[Transcript of Proceedings p 39, lines 15-21]

And the actual revenues are not presented to Parliament. That is what we have pleaded. That is the fact.

[Transcript of Proceedings p 46, lines 20-22]

At paragraph 22, I set out the codification of these principles in sections 53, 54, and 90, and then state that by removing and not revealing the true revenues of Parliament, which is the only body which can constitutionally impose tax and thus approve the proposed spending from the speech from the throne, the Minister of Finance is removing the elected MPs' ability to properly review and debate the budget and pass its expenditure and corresponding taxing provisions through elected representatives of the House of Commons. The ancient constitutional maxim of no taxation without representation was reaffirmed post-Charter by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Education Reference.

102 It seems to me that these arguments and assertions cannot apply to COMER itself, which has no right to vote. As regards the individual Plaintiffs, even assuming they pay tax, the allegations remain abstract and theoretical. A central allegation -- unsupported by facts -- is that MPs are voting blind and have been hoodwinked by the Minister of Finance. There are no facts pleaded to support this bald allegation. MPs may well understand the issues raised by the Plaintiffs concerning budgetary accounting practices, but may have decided to accept them. The Plaintiffs are alleging that Parliament is being misled by the Minister, but that the Plaintiffs are not.

103 There are no facts to say which MPs represent the individual Plaintiffs and whether those MPs have been approached and asked to deal with the issues raised in this claim or whether, having been made aware of the Plaintiffs' concerns, those MPs have voted for or against the budget. If MPs for the individual Plaintiffs have been apprised of the problem then, no matter how they vote, it is difficult to see how the Plaintiffs are not represented in Parliament on this issue. Representation does not mean that MPs must vote in accordance with the wishes of individual constituents. If representative MPs have not been contacted, then it is difficult to understand why the individual Plaintiffs have come to Court to ask that it make findings about their rights of representation in Parliament.

104 On the other hand, if MPs, or at least those which represent the individual Plaintiffs are aware of the accounting concerns that the Plaintiffs raise, then it seems to me there can be no undermining of the voting and representation rights of the individual Plaintiffs.

105 There are no facts in the pleadings to suggest that any MPs are "voting blind" or are being misled by the Minister of Finance. Similarly, there are none to establish that Parliament does not monitor and assess the budgetary process, including the way the budget is compiled and presented by the Minister of Finance. The logic of the Amended Claim is that if Parliament is not adopting and acting upon the Plaintiffs' concerns about the budgetary process then Parliamentarians are blind. This is an unsupported assertion. It is not a fact.

106 There is nothing more than a bald assertion that the Minister of Finance is "blindfolding" his Parliamentary colleagues and leading them astray to the detriment of the individual Plaintiffs, and, presumably, all Canadians with a right to vote.

107 Even at an abstract level, this seems far-fetched, to say the least. The Plaintiffs are asking the Court to simply assume that Parliament does not have the wherewithal to understand the way the budget is compiled and presented. The logic here is that, because the budget is not being presented as the Plaintiffs think it ought to be presented, their Parliamentary representatives are being hoodwinked by the Minister of Finance and obviously do not know what they are doing when they pass a budget. This position is presumptive and unsupported by any facts. It remains an abstract debate about how the budget should be presented.

108 Bald assertions, without supporting facts, are not sufficient to satisfy the rules of pleading. See Rule 174 and accompanying jurisprudence.

109 There is nothing in the facts as pleaded in the Amended Claim to suggest that Parliament is not fully aware of the criticisms levelled by the Plaintiffs against the Minister of Finance and that parliamentarians are not free to question and debate any budget presented from the perspective of those criticisms. Hence, there is nothing to support the allegation that the ability of MPs in Parliament to fully and openly debate the budget is impeded in any way. Further, if the Minister of Finance, in compiling the budget, chooses not to take "human capital" into account and/or chooses to withhold anticipated total revenue, before the subtraction of anticipated tax credits, along with anticipated expenditures, in budget bills, these choices also become the will of Parliament following the established procedures for debating and passing budgets. The Plaintiffs can have no right to insist that Parliament should only debate and pass budgets in accordance with the principles and procedures which they approve of and advocate. If the Plaintiffs disagree with the process then, like everyone else, they have access to their own Parliamentary representatives. Hence, in my view, there is no factual basis in the Amended Claim to support an allegation that the Constitution Act, 1867, s 3 of the Charter or any constitutional principle is breached on the principle of no taxation without representation. If the individual Plaintiffs have a vote, then they are fully represented in Parliament, and it is Parliament that decides whether or not to pass the budget presented by the Minister of Finance in accordance with its own procedures. No facts are pleaded to suggest that Parliament is not fully aware of the kinds of criticisms that the Plaintiffs have raised in this action against the Minister and the budgetary process, or that Parliament is not aware that the budgetary process is not open to the kinds of criticisms that the Plaintiffs allege in their Amended Claim.

110 The Supreme Court of Canada made the following general point in Authorson, above, at para 38, quoting Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution, above:

How Houses of Parliament proceed, how a provincial legislative assembly proceeds is in either case a matter of self-definition, subject to any overriding constitutional or self-imposed statutory or indoor prescription. It is unnecessary here to embark on any historical review of the "court" aspect of Parliament and the immunity of its procedures from judicial review. Courts come into the picture when legislation is enacted and not before (unless references are made to them for their opinion on a bill or a proposed enactment). It would be incompatible with the self-regulating -- "inherent" is as apt a word -- authority of Houses of Parliament to deny their capacity to pass any kind of resolution. Reference may appropriately be made to art. 9 of the Bill of Rights of 1689, undoubtedly in force as part of the law of Canada, which provides that "Proceedings in Parliament ought not to be impeached or questioned in any Court or Place out of Parliament".

111 The Plaintiffs are not attacking any particular budget legislation that may have had an impact upon them that gives rise to a cause of action in any court of law. They are attacking the Parliamentary process that they say is used to present, debate and pass budget bills into law. They want the Court to interfere, albeit on Constitutional and Charter grounds, with the way Parliament goes about its business. In my view, the jurisprudence is clear that the Court cannot do this. The same conclusions must be reached even if the Court looks at the matter from the perspective of "when legislation is enacted and not before." Budget bills are passed in accordance with a self-regulating process in Parliament during which MPs can raise the issues of concerns to the Plaintiffs. There are no facts pleaded to suggest that the Plaintiffs are not as fully represented in Parliament on budget bills as they are on any other bill.

112 As the House of Lords made clear in Hamilton v al Fayed, above:
Article 9 of Bill of Rights 1689 provides:

"That the freedom of speech and debates or proceedings in Parliament ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of Parliament."

It is well established that article 9 does not of itself provide a comprehensive definition of parliamentary privilege. In Prebble v. Television New Zealand Ltd. [1995] 1 AC 321 at p. 332, I said:

"In addition to article 9 itself, there is a long line of authority which supports a wider principle, of which article 9 is merely one manifestation, viz. that the courts and Parliament are both astute to recognise their respective constitutional roles. So far as the courts are concerned they will not allow any challenge to be made to what is said or done within the walls of Parliament in performances of its legislative functions and protection of its established privileges: Burdett v. Abbott (1811) 14 East 1; Stockdale v. Hansard (1839) 9 Ad. & E.C. 1; Bradlaugh v. Gossett (1884) 12 Q.B.D. 271; Pickin v. British Railways Board [1974] AC 765; Pepper v. Hart [1993] AC 593. As Blackstone said in his Commentaries on the Laws of England, 17th ed. (1830), vol. 1, p. 163: 'the whole of the law and custom of Parliament has its origin from this one maxim, "that whatever matter arises concerning either House of Parliament, ought to be examined, discussed and adjudged in that House to which it relates, and not elsewhere."

113 This is confirmed by s 18 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and s 4 of the Parliament of Canada Act. The privileges, immunities and powers of the Senate and House of Commons and their members are matters of self-definition and regulation by Parliament. In my view, the presentation, debate and passing of the federal budget allows for no role by the Courts. In the present case, no facts are pleaded to support a case that Parliament is not cognizant of the Minister's methodology or the perspectives of the Plaintiffs, or is being blinded.

114 As far as the Constitution Act, 1867 and s 3 of the Charter are concerned, COMER, as an unincorporated association, has no electoral rights. As regards the individual Plaintiffs, there are no facts pleaded to suggest that they do not have effective representation in Parliament when it comes to budget bills. In Reference Re Provincial Electoral Boundaries (Saskatchewan), [1991] 2 SCR 158 at 1836, the Supreme Court of Canada explained what representation means:

Ours is a representative democracy. Each citizen is entitled to be represented in government. Representation comprehends the idea of having a voice in the deliberations of government as well as the idea of the right to bring one's grievances and concerns to the attention of one's government representative...

115 Representation does not mean that the Plaintiffs have a right to force Parliament to proceed in a way that better suits their view of the appropriate way to present and pass a budget, and they have not pleaded facts to show that any particular budget legislation has negatively impacted a legal right that they enjoy.

116 There is nothing in the Amended Claim to suggest that the individual Plaintiffs do not enjoy the same meaningful participation in the electoral process as any other Canadian voter. See Figuroa, above, at para 27. The Plaintiffs do not lack effective representation simply because budget bills are not presented and dealt with in accordance with their views of what they should or should not contain, and there is no suggestion that they lack a voice in the deliberations of government because they are unable to bring their grievances and concerns to the attention of the MPs who represent them. In my view, Constitutional and Charter protection cannot mean that individual voters have the right or the expectation that their views on the appropriate presentation and enactment of any particular piece of legislation will be followed by Parliament. This is not to say that voter concerns about the way that Parliament enacts legislation are not legitimate concerns. However, how Parliament proceeds is a matter of self-definition (see Authorson, above) unless, of course, there is some "overriding constitutional or self-imposed statutory or indoor prescription." In my view, notwithstanding the able arguments of Plaintiffs' counsel, the Plaintiffs do not plead anything in the Amended Claim to establish an overriding Constitutional prescription or a breach of s 3 of the Charter that could ground their claim for declaratory relief or damages for this aspect of their claim. The Plaintiffs don't even attempt to litigate any particular budget legislation. They focus their claim instead upon the budget compilation and Parliamentary process itself, and I think the jurisprudence is clear that the Court simply cannot go there. Article 9 of the Bill of Rights of 1688/89 also prevents the Court from entertaining any action against any member of Parliament which seeks to make them personally liable for acts done or things said in Parliament. See Hamilton v al Fayed, above.

117 In my view, then, those allegations of the Amended Claim that raise the taxation issue and seek relief based upon the Constitution Act, 1867 and s 3 of the Charter, and the principle of no taxation without representation have to be struck because it is plain and obvious that they disclose no reasonable cause of action and have no reasonable prospect of success.

(2) Bank Act Issues

118 The balance of the Amended Claim deals with alleged breaches of the Bank Act by the Minister of Finance and the Government of Canada. In its essentials, this aspect of the claim has not changed since I reviewed the Plaintiffs' previous Amended Statement of Claim in April, 2014.

119 I think it is useful to bear in mind the grounds of the Defendants' cross-appeal that the Federal Court of Appeal was asked to consider in January, 2015 and which it dismissed:

1. The Judge erred in fact and law in finding that there are alleged breaches or issues in the Plaintiffs' Amended Statement of Claim ("Claim") that are justiciable;
2. The judge erred in law by finding that s. 18 of the Bank of Canada Act could not be interpreted in a motion to strike, but would require full legal argument on a full evidentiary record;
3. The judge erred in law by finding that had the learned Prothonotary determined s. 18 of the Bank of Canada Act to be a "legislative imperative" that the Claim would then become justiciable;
4. The judge erred in law by finding that even if s. 18 of the Bank of Canada Act is permissive, that this does not dispose of the matter of justiciability;
5. The judge erred in fact and in law by finding that the Claim does not require the Court to adjudicate and dictate competing policy choices and that objective legal criteria exist to measure the Plaintiffs' allegations;
6. The judge erred in law and in fact by characterizing the Claim as one which requires the Court to assess whether the Defendants have acted, and continue to act, in accordance with the Bank of Canada Act and the Constitution;
7. The judge erred in fact and in law by finding that relevant and material facts have actually been pleaded in the Claim in support of the declarations sought that the policies and actions allegedly pursued by the Defendants have not complied with the Bank of Canada Act and the Constitution;
8. The judge erred in law in finding on a motion to strike that any allegations in the Claim of breach of statute and/or of constitutional obligations may be justiciable depending on whether the Plaintiffs can establish a reasonable cause of action though appropriate and future amendments;

120 It also has to be borne in mind that in my Order of April 24, 2014, I did not say that the Plaintiffs were likely to succeed with their Bank Act claims. All I said was that the claims had to be struck in their entirety because, as they stood, they did not disclose a reasonable cause of action and had no prospect of success. The Federal Court of Appeal endorsed this position.

121 I concluded that the "full import of the Bank Act and what is required of Canada and those Minister and officials who act, or don't act, in accordance with the Bank Act is at the heart of this dispute" (para 72) and that:

[76] So, as regards the declaratory relief sought in this Claim, it is my view that the matters raised could be justiciable and appropriate for consideration by the Court. Should the Plaintiffs stray across the line into policy, they will be controlled by the Court. There is a difference between the Court declaring that the Government or the Governor, or the Minister, should pursue a particular policy and a declaration as to whether the policy or policies they have pursued are compliant with the Bank Act and the Constitution. The facts are pleaded on these issues. Subject to what I have to say about other aspects of the Claim, the Plaintiffs should be allowed to go forward, call their evidence, and attempt to make their case. It cannot be said, in my view, that it is plain and obvious on the facts pleaded that the action cannot succeed as regards this aspect of the Claim. And even if s.18 of the Bank Act is interpreted as purely permissive, that does not decide the issue raised in the Claim that Canada has obviated crucial aspects of the Bank Act and has subverted or abdicated constitutional obligations by making itself subservient to private international institutions.

122 I said the Bank Act claims "could be justiciable and appropriate for consideration by the Court"(emphasis added) because the Plaintiffs do give their account of the socio-economic problems that arise from alleged breaches of the Bank Act and related constitutional principles. I concluded that this provided context for the alleged breaches in the claims because the Court needs to understand the Plaintiffs' version of what is at stake and what flows from the alleged breaches:

[75] The difficult boundary between what a court should and should not decide will arise time and again in a case like the present. However, the issue is not whether the Court should mandate the Government and the Bank to adopt the economic positions espoused and advocated by the Plaintiffs. Nor will the Court be deciding whether a particular policy is "financially or economically fallacious," although this kind of accusation does appear in the Claim. In my view, the Court is being asked to decide whether particular policies and acts are in accordance with the Bank Act and the Constitution. If justiciability is a matter of "appropriateness," then the Court is the appropriate forum to decide this kind of issue. In fact, the Court does this all the time. The Supreme Court of Canada has made it clear that the Parliament of Canada and the executive cannot abdicate their functions (see Wheat Board, above) and that the executive and other government actors and institutions are bound by constitutional norms. See Reference re Secession of Quebec, above, and Khadr, above.

123 From a res judicata perspective, it has to be borne in mind that the portions of the claim related to the Bank Act were struck under Rule 221. My comments about justiciability -- "could be justiciable and appropriate for consideration by the Court," -not "are justiciable" simply went to Prothonotary Aalto's findings that they were not justiciable because they involved matters of policy rather than law. I was simply pointing out that legal issues could be distinguished from policy issues, so that the Bank Act claims could become justiciable "subject to what I have to say about other aspects of the Claim..." And when I say the "facts are pleaded on these issues," (para 76) the "issues" I am referring to are the facts that distinguish the law from policy. The Plaintiffs are right to point out that I thought the Bank Act claims could go forward, but this was subject to issues of jurisdiction and what I had to say about the other aspects of the claim, and the Federal Court of Appeal endorsed this reasoning and this approach to the claims.

124 The reason I said the Bank Act claims "could be justiciable and appropriate for consideration by the Court" is because, as drafted, these claims give rise to problems of jurisdiction and justiciability that the Plaintiffs should have the opportunity to resolve by way of amendments. Now that amendments have been made the Court has to decide whether the Plaintiffs have resolved these problems.

125 The grounds brought forward by the Defendants in the present Rule 221 motion, as well as the arguments of the Plaintiffs, have to be considered in light of what the Court has already ruled about the Bank Act claims and what the Federal Court of Appeal has endorsed.

126 The Plaintiffs fault the Defendants for again raising arguments on justiciability that the Court has already decided and the Federal Court of Appeal has endorsed. As a reading of my Order of April 24, 2014 shows, my conclusions on justiciability at that time were subject to serious reservations. I concluded that there were legal issues in the claims (breaches of the Bank Act and the Constitution) that the Court could deal with and that could be distinguished from the socio-economic policy assertions in the claims: "In my view, the Court is being asked to decide whether particular policies and acts are in accordance with the Bank Act and the Constitution. If justiciability is a matter of 'appropriateness,' then the Court is the appropriate forum to decide this kind of issue."

127 I did not conclude, however, that the claims as drafted were sufficient to allow the Court to carry out this function (otherwise I would not have struck them under Rule 221), and I went on to point out that the Bank Act and related Constitutional claims had to be struck, and indicated what the Plaintiffs needed to do by way of amendment to allow the Court to consider the legal (as opposed to the socio-economic policy aspects) of the claims. It has to be borne in mind that I struck all of the claims and that the Federal Court of Appeal did not just endorse what I said about justiciability; it also endorsed my decision to strike all of the claims and my reasons for doing so. So the important issue before me at this juncture is not whether the Court could examine and rule on the legal aspects of the claims; the issue is whether the amendments are sufficient to allow the Court to do this, and whether they overcome the problems I identified that compelled me to strike all of the claims in 2014.

128 To be fair to both sides of this dispute, my Order of April 24, 2014 may sometimes confuse issues of jurisdiction and justiciability. The Federal Court of Appeal seemed to have no problem with this and, however these concerns should be characterized, I did set them out in some detail and I will discuss them here as I described them in my Order of April 24, 2014. The Defendants may not be entirely wrong when they characterize those problems as being about justiciability rather than jurisdiction.

129 In my Order of April 24, 2014, I went on to examine the jurisdictional problems that arose in the Amended Statement of Claim that was then before me:

[86] As I have concluded that it is not plain and obvious that the breach of statutory and constitutional obligations and the declaratory relief sought is not justiciable, all I can do at this juncture is decide whether the Court has the jurisdiction to deal with this aspect of the Claim. If amendments are made to portions of the Claim that are struck, this issue may have to be re-visited.

[87] At this stage in the proceedings, s. 17 of the Federal Courts Act appears sufficiently wide enough to give the Federal Court concurrent jurisdiction where relief is sought against the Crown. This doesn't end the matter, of course, and the Defendants have asked the Court to examine and apply the ITO v Miida Electronics Inc, [1986] 1 SCR 752 at p. 766 [ITO], jurisdictional test.

[88] Given the Federal Court of Appeal decision in Rasmussen v Breau, [1986] 2 FC 500 at para 12, to the effect that the Federal Courts Act only applies to the Crown eo nomine, and not to a statutory corporation acting as an agent for the Crown, it is difficult to see why the Bank should be named as a Defendant. However, the main problem in the way of determining jurisdiction at this stage is that the Plaintiffs have yet to produce pleadings that adequately set out how any private or other interest has been affected by the alleged statutory and constitutional breaches. The Plaintiffs are asking the Court to declare that their view of the way the Bank Act and the Constitution should be read is correct, and that breaches have occurred. This is akin to asking the Court for an advisory opinion, and I see nothing in the jurisprudence to suggest that the Court has the jurisdiction to provide this kind of ruling in the form of a declaration.

[89] The Plaintiffs are extremely vague on this issue. They simply assert that the Federal Court has jurisdiction to issue declarations concerning statutes such as the Bank Act, and jurisdiction over federal public actors, tribunals and Ministers of the Crown. They say they have private rights to assert but, as yet, and given that the tort and Charter claims must be struck, I see no private rights at issue. In addition, they claim to be acting for "all other Canadians," but, once again, they have yet to produce pleadings that adequately plead how the rights of "all other Canadians" have been impacted in a way that translates into the infringement of an individual or a collective right. If the rights of all Canadians are impacted, then the individual Plaintiffs would be able to describe, in accordance with the rules that govern pleadings, how their individual rights have been breached, but they have, as yet, not been able to do this.

[90] It seems to me that the fundamental problem of how the Plaintiffs can simply come to the Court and request declarations that their interpretations of the Bank Act and the Constitution are correct is the reason why they have attached tortious and Charter breaches to their Claim. They know that they need to show how individual rights have been infringed but, as of yet, they have not even set out in their pleadings how their own rights have been infringed, let alone the rights of "all other Canadians."

[91] This means that, in terms of the ITO principles, the Plaintiffs have yet to show a statutory grant of jurisdiction by the federal Parliament that the Court can entertain and rule on the Claim as presently constituted (i.e. simply declare that statutory and constitutional breaches have occurred without an adequate description in the pleadings of how a private right or interest has been affected and the grounds for a valid cause of action), and they have yet to cite an existing body of federal law which is essential to the disposition of the case and which nourishes such a statutory grant of jurisdiction. The Plaintiffs do not have any specific rights under the legislation which they cite and they have provided no statutory or other framework for the exercise of any rights. They may be able to do these things with appropriate amendments to the pleadings. As yet, however, I cannot see how the Court acquires the jurisdiction to provide the declaratory relief that is sought.

130 It seems to me that the Plaintiffs have not resolved these problems in the Amended Claim.

131 The Plaintiffs take a very forceful and wide view on the availability of declaratory relief and the Court's jurisdiction to grant such relief. The Plaintiffs take the position that any citizen has a constitutional right, subject to frivolous and vexatious or no jurisdiction of the Court, to bring a public interest issue to the Court.

[Transcript of Proceedings p 62, lines 25-27]

132 Even if I were to accept this broad approach to standing, I still have to decide the jurisdictional issue which I could not decide in April, 2014 for the reasons quoted above that were endorsed by the Federal Court of Appeal, and which, to use the Plaintiffs' own logic, I must accept as res judicata. I said that the Plaintiffs could not just ask the Court for an advisory opinion on these Bank Act issues because "I see nothing in the jurisprudence to suggest that the Court has the jurisdiction to provide this kind of ruling in the form of a declaration." In retrospect, I might have characterized this as a justiciability issue but, in my view, the terminology doesn't matter because I decided that the problem was that the Plaintiffs were asking for a free-standing declaration that amounted to an advisory opinion and the Court is not in the business of granting free-standing opinions.

133 The Plaintiffs' position on this issue is as follows:

You have at paragraph 29 the ruling in Dunsmuir with respect to judicial review as a constitutional right. And Dunsmuir and other cases see judicial review writ large. It's not the procedural avenue of judicial review by way of application as opposed to by way of action. Under section 17 this Court has ruled one can seek declaratory relief by way of action, and that is in my factum.

But if I can refer Your Lordship to paragraph 31, where I actually extract the portions from the Manitoba Métis case, and they are italicized and bolded at pages 242 and 243.

"Citing Thorsen, [1975] 1 S.C.R. 138, the Supreme Court of Canada in this case", which is 2013 case," states: 'The constitutionality of legislation has always been a justiciable issue. The right of the citizenry to constitutional behaviour by Parliament can be vindicated by declaration that legislation is invalid or that a public act is ultra vires.'"

That is paragraph 134 that is extracted. That is exactly what my clients seek with respect to the actions of the Minister of Finance and the resulting constitutional breach of their right to vote -- of their right not to be taxed without effective representation by their MPs, because they're blindfolded by the Minister of Finance and what he does not deliver, which is a constitutional requirement, we say.

And then over the page from paragraph 140, the Supreme Court states:

"The Courts are the guardians of the Constitution and cannot be barred by mere statutes from issuing a declaration on a fundamental constitutional matter. The principles of legality, constitutionally and the rule of law demand no less."

And then the passage that really answers my friend at paragraph 143 of Manitoba Métis Federation -- an Inc., by the way, a corporation brought the challenge.

"Furthermore, the remedy available under this analysis is of a limited nature. A declaration is a narrow remedy. It is available without a cause of action, and courts make declarations whether or not any consequential relief is available."

That statutorily reproduced under rule 64 of the Federal Courts Act, My Lord, which is reproduced at paragraph 32 of my factum, and this court in Edwards, which is right below that, has ruled that the declaratory relief may be sought in an action under section 17, which was done. And then which is consistent with the Supreme Court of Canada jurisprudence in Khadr and Thorsen.

134 The Plaintiffs appear to be of the view that, as a think-tank, they can simply come to Court and ask the Court to declare that the Minister of Finance and the Government of Canada are required to do certain things under the Bank Act, and that they have abdicated their constitutional duties, and allowed international private entities to trump the interests of Canadians. COMER has no Constitutional or Charter rights to assert and the individual Plaintiffs are no differently situated from any other Canadian and have no demonstrable individual Constitutional and Charter rights to assert. In the Amended Claim, the Plaintiffs collectively remain a think-tank, seeking the Court's endorsement of alleged Bank Act and Constitutional breaches related to the Bank Act and international institutions.

135 Having been given the opportunity to amend, there are still no material facts in the Amended Claim that link the impugned legislative scheme embodied in the Bank Act to an effect on themselves as Plaintiffs. Their argument is that freestanding declarations on the constitutionality of laws and legal authority are always available to any Canadian citizen.

136 Since my Order of April 24, 2014 was considered by the Federal Court of Appeal, the Federal Court of Appeal has had occasion to consider and pronounce in some detail on what the Court can do with pleadings that contain freestanding requests for declaratory relief. In Mancuso v Canada (National Health and Welfare), 2015 FCA 227 [Mancuso], the Federal Court of Appeal provided the following guidance:

[31] The appellants allege that their action can nonetheless proceed to trial on the basis of the surviving paragraphs. It is not problematic, in their view, that there are no material facts in the statement of claim, including none that link the impugned scheme to an effect on themselves as plaintiffs. They base this argument on the proposition that freestanding declarations on the constitutionality of laws and legal authority are always available.

[32] On this latter point, there is no doubt. Free-standing declarations of constitutionality can be granted: Canadian Transit Company v. Windsor (Corporation of the City), 2015 FCA 88. But the right to the remedy does not translate into licence to circumvent the rules of pleading. Even pure declarations of constitutional validity require sufficient material facts to be pleaded in support of the claim. Charter questions cannot be decided in a factual vacuum: Mackay v. Manitoba, above, nor can questions as to legislative competence under the Constitution Act, 1867 be decided without an adequate factual grounding, which must be set out in the statement of claim. This is particularly so when the effects of the impugned legislation are the subject of the attack: Danson v. Ontario (Attorney General), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1086, at p. 1099.

[33] The Supreme Court of Canada in Canada (Prime Minister) v. Khadr, 2010 SCC 3, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 44, para. 46 articulated the pre-conditions to the grant of a declaratory remedy: jurisdiction over the claim and a real as opposed to a theoretical question in respect of which the person raising it has an interest.

[34] Following Khadr, this Court in Canada (Indian Affairs) v. Daniels, 2014 FCA 101 (leave to appeal granted) at paras. 77-79 highlighted the danger posed by a generic, fact-free challenge to legislation -- in other words, a failure to meet the second Khadr requirement. Dawson JA noted that legislation may be valid in some instances, and unconstitutional when applied to other situations. A court must have a sense of a law's reach in order to assess whether and by how much that reach exceeds the legislature's vires. It cannot evaluate whether Parliament has exceeded the ambit of its legislative competence and had more than an incidental effect on matters reserved to the provinces without examining what its legislation actually does. Facts are necessary to define the contours of legislative and constitutional competence. In the present case, this danger is particularly acute; as the judge noted, the legislation at issue pertains to literally thousands of natural health supplements.

[35] This is not new law. While the plaintiffs point to Solosky v. The Queen, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 821 for the proposition that there is a broad right to seek declaratory relief, Solosky also notes that there must be "a 'real issue' concerning the relative interests of each [party]." The Court cannot be satisfied that this requirement is met absent facts being pleaded which indicate what that real issue is and its nexus to the plaintiffs and their claim for relief.

137 In the present case, the Plaintiffs have not, in their Amended Claim, pleaded facts to demonstrate a "real" issue concerning the relative interests of each party, and the nexus of that real issue to the Plaintiffs and their claim for relief. Although as I pointed out in my Order of April 24, 2014, the Plaintiffs do distinguish between legal issues and policy issues, the legal issues remain theoretical with no real nexus to some interest of the Plaintiffs, other than an interest in having the Court endorse their opinion on the Bank Act issues raised.

138 The Plaintiffs have not addressed the jurisdictional problems I referred to in paras 85 to 91 of my Order of April 24, 2014 and/or what might generally be referred to as the jurisdiction of the Court to entertain, or its willingness to grant, free-standing requests for declaration.

139 Apart from the taxation issues which I have concluded are not justiciable for reasons set out above, the Plaintiffs have made little attempt in their amendments to rectify the problems I raised in my Order of April 24, 2014. The declaratory relief related to the Bank Act remains the same. The damages claimed in 1(b)(ii) appear to be based upon s 3 of the Charter and the no taxation without representation principle, which I have found to be non-justiciable.

140 The Plaintiffs have urged me to treat my Order of April 24, 2014 and the Federal Court of Appeal decision on that judgement as res judicata. If I do this then I have to say that in their Amended Claim the Plaintiffs have still provided no legal or factual basis for the infringement of their private rights, and the declarations remain nothing more than a request that the Court provide an advisory opinion that supports their view of the way the Bank Act and the Constitution should be read.

141 In order to overcome this problem in their first Amended Statement of Claim, the Plaintiffs hitched their declaratory relief to ss 7 and 15 of the Charter and various tort claims, all of which they have now abandoned. In their stead, they have now hitched the declaratory relief to claims based on s 3 of the Charter and Constitutional guarantees of no taxation without representation, which I have found to be non-justiciable. This leaves the Court in the same situation as it found itself in April, 2014:

[91] This means that, in terms of the ITO principles, the Plaintiffs have yet to show a statutory grant of jurisdiction by the federal Parliament that the Court can entertain and rule on the Claim as presently constituted (i.e. simply declare that statutory and constitutional breaches have occurred without an adequate description in the pleadings of how a private right or interest has been affected and the grounds for a valid cause of action), and they have yet to cite an existing body of federal law which is essential to the disposition of the case and which nourishes such a statutory grant of jurisdiction. The Plaintiffs do not have any specific rights under the legislation which they cite and they have provided no statutory or other framework for the exercise of any rights. They may be able to do these things with appropriate amendments to the pleadings. As yet, however, I cannot see how the Court acquires the jurisdiction to provide the declaratory relief that is sought.

142 It seems to me that the Federal Court of Appeal in Mancuso, above, has now made it clear that a claim for a pure declaration must establish through pleading sufficient material facts that the Court has jurisdiction over the claims "and a real as opposed to a theoretical question in respect of which the person raising has an interest."

143 I do not wish to denigrate, or even downplay, the Plaintiffs' concerns about the way that Parliament has dealt with economic and monetary issues. But not all concerns can be translated into legal action that can, or should, be dealt with by a court of law. Rather than supplement their previous ss 7 and 15 Charter claims, and their previous tort claims, the Plaintiffs have abandoned those claims altogether and have now come up with claims based upon s 3 of the Charter and Constitutional guarantees of no taxation without representation. As able as their arguments are, the sudden switch to a new game plan suggests that the Plaintiffs are not able to remove their concerns from the political realm and to characterize them in such a way that they can be dealt with by this Court.

144 It seems to me, then, that the latest Amended Claim discloses no reasonable cause of action and has no prospect of success at trial. It also seems to me that the Plaintiffs are still asking the Court for an advisory opinion in the form of declarations that their view of the way the Bank Act and the Constitution should be read is correct. It also seems to me that they have failed to show a statutory grant of jurisdiction by Parliament that this Court can entertain and rule on their claim as presently constituted, or that they have any specific rights under the legislation which they invoke, or a legal framework for any such rights. As the Supreme Court of Canada pointed out in Operation Dismantle, above, the preventive function of a declaratory judgment must be more than hypothetical and requires "a cognizable threat to a legal interest before the Court will entertain the use of its process as a preventative measure" (para 33). The Court is not here to declare the law generally or to give an advisory opinion. The Court is here to decide and declare contested legal rights. See Gouriet, above, at 501-502.

D. Other issues

145 The Defendants have raised a number of other issues going to the adequacy and appropriateness of the Amended Claim but, in light of the fundamental problems I have dealt with above, I see no point in going any further with my analysis.

E. Leave to Amend

146 The Plaintiffs have asked the Court to consider, as an alternative form of relief, that they be allowed to proceed on the declaratory relief in their Amended Claim, with leave to amend any struck portions with respect to the damages portion of the claim.

147 As set out above, I do not think that, even for the declaratory relief sought, that the Plaintiffs have been able to raise their claim above a mere request for an advisory opinion. In addition, as further explained above, given that the Plaintiffs have not been able to rectify the fundamental issues I pointed out in my Order of April 24, 2014, and have not suggested any way in which they could be rectified, I see no point in allowing an amendment. Having previously permitted the Plaintiffs such an opportunity, their response convinces me that, for reasons given, they have no scintilla of a cause of action that this Court can or should hear. Without having any real legal interest at stake, the Plaintiffs remain a think tank seeking to have the Court endorse their political and academic viewpoint. Amendments are not going to change this.

ORDER

THIS COURT ORDERS that

1. The Plaintiffs' latest Amended Claim is struck in its entirety;
2. Leave to amend is refused;
3. Costs are awarded to the Defendants.

Committee for Monetary and Economic Reform v. Canada

Federal Court Judgments

Federal Court of Appeal

Toronto, Ontario

M. Noël C.J., D.G. Near and D.J. Rennie JJ.A.

Heard: December 7, 2016.

Oral judgment: December 7, 2016.

Docket: A-76-16

[2016] F.C.J. No. 1391 | [2016] A.C.F. no 1391 | 2016 FCA 312

Between Committee for Monetary and Economic Reform ("Comer"), William Krehm, and Ann Emmett, Appellants, and Her Majesty the Queen, The Minister of Finance, The Minister of National Revenue, The Bank of Canada, The Attorney General of Canada, Respondents

Case Summary

Civil litigation — Civil procedure — Pleadings — Striking out pleadings or allegations — Grounds — Failure to disclose a cause of action or defence — Appeal by Committee, Krehm and Emmet from order striking amended statement of claim dismissed — Action challenged the manner in which the Parliament handled monetary and economic issues — Court lacked jurisdiction to provide advisory opinion on state of law in general, challenged by appellants as contrary to their rights to no taxation without representation — Federal Courts Rules, Rule 221.

Appeal by the Committee for Monetary and Economic Reform, Krehm and Emmet from an order striking their amended statement of claim without leave to amend. Their action challenged the way Parliament handled economic and monetary issues in Canada, and sought declarations of various statutory violations and tortious conduct of conspiracy and misfeasance of public office. The respondents, the Crown, the Ministers of Finance and of National Revenue, the Bank of Canada and the Attorney General of Canada successfully moved to strike the original claim as disclosing no reasonable cause of action, but on appeal, the appellants were granted leave to amend their claim. In their amended pleadings, the appellants abandoned claims under sections 3 and 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, 1982, substituting claims pursuant to section 3, asserting a right to no taxation without representation. This claim was also struck in the order under appeal.

HELD: Appeal dismissed.

There was no error in the order, characterizing the claim as one for an advisory opinion on the law in general, something beyond the jurisdiction of the court. The amended claim disclosed no reasonable cause of action and had no chance of success at trial.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT OF THE COURT

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

D.J. RENNIE J.A.

1 This is an appeal brought by the Committee for Monetary and Economic Reform, William Krehm, and Ann Emmet (the appellants) from an order issued pursuant to Rule 221 of the Federal Court Rules (SOR/98-106) by Russell J. (the Federal Court judge) striking out the appellants' amended statement of claim without leave to amend (2016 FC 147).

2 The appellants commenced an action challenging the way Parliament handles economic and monetary issues in Canada and initially sought declarations of violations of the Bank of Canada Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-2 [Bank of Canada Act]; the Constitution Act, 1867, (U.K.), 30 & 31 Vict., c. 3, reprinted in R.S.C. 1985, App. II, No. 5; sections 7 and 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Part I of the Constitution Act, 1982, being Schedule B of the Canada Act 1982 (U.K.), 1982, c. 11 [Charter]; and of tortious conduct of conspiracy and misfeasance in public office.

3 The respondents brought a motion to strike, and on August 9, 2013, Prothonotary Aalto struck out the appellants' original statement of claim in its entirety without leave to amend on the basis that it did not disclose a reasonable cause of action (2013 FC 855).

4 By decision rendered on April 24, 2014, the Federal Court judge sitting in appeal from the Prothonotary's decision, reconsidered the matter de novo. Applying the test for striking out set out by the Supreme Court in R v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2011 SCC 42, he too held that the statement of claim did not reveal a cause of action, but was of the view that the possibility that the appellants could come up with a proper pleading with respect to specified issues could not be excluded. He therefore granted the appellants leave to amend (2014 FC 380). On the appeal and cross-appeal which followed, this Court disposed of the matter from the bench, dismissing both (2015 FCA 20).

5 On March 26, 2015, the appellants filed an amended statement of claim wherein they abandoned prior claims made pursuant to sections 7 and 15 of the Charter and substituted therefor claims pursuant to section 3 of the Charter, asserting a right to "no taxation without representation".

6 The respondents again moved to have the statement of claim struck on the basis that the appellants' amended statement of claim failed to rectify any of the previous deficiencies and therefore disclosed no reasonable cause of action.

7 By decision rendered on February 8, 2016, the Federal Court judge again struck the amended statement of claim in its entirety, this time however without leave to further amend.

8 This is the decision now under appeal.

9 The essence of the Federal Court judge's reasoning for striking the amended statement of claim is summed up at paragraph 144 of his reasons:

It seems to me, then, that the latest Amended Claim discloses no reasonable cause of action and has no prospect of success at trial. It also seems to me that the Plaintiffs are still asking the Court for an advisory opinion in the form of declarations that their view of the way the Bank Act and the Constitution should be read is correct. It also seems to me that they have failed to show a statutory grant of jurisdiction by Parliament that this Court can entertain and rule on their claim as presently constituted, or that they have any specific rights under the legislation which they invoke, or a legal framework for any such rights. As the Supreme Court of Canada pointed out in Operation Dismantle, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 441 above, the preventive function of a declaratory judgment must be more than hypothetical and requires "a cognizable threat to a legal interest before the Court will entertain the use of its process as a preventative measure" (para 33). The Court is not here to declare the law generally or to give an advisory opinion. The Court is here to decide and declare contested legal rights.

10 The appellants assert that the opinion so expressed is wrong in law. In support of this proposition, they essentially reiterate the arguments which they urged upon the Federal Court judge and ask that we come to a different conclusion. Counsel for the appellants focused his argument during the hearing on the issue of standing and the right to seek declarations of constitutionality. It remains however that, as the Federal Court judge found, the right to a remedy is conditional on the existence of a justiciable issue.

11 Reviewing the matter on the least deferential and most favourable standard from the appellant's perspective (i.e.: correctness), we are unable to detect any error which would warrant our intervention.

12 The arguments raised by the appellants have been given full consideration and there is nothing that we could usefully add to the judgment below to explain why the Federal Court judge correctly held that the appellants' claims, as set out in their amended statement of claim, are bound to fail.

13 As to the denial of leave to amend, after having granted leave once, the Federal Court judge held that leave ought not to be granted a second time. Keeping in mind that this aspect of the decision embodies a discretionary element, we can detect no error in the conclusion reached by the Federal Court judge as expressed at paragraph 147 of his reasons.

14 The appeal will be dismissed with costs.

Appeal From:

ON APPEAL FROM THE FEDERAL COURT OF APPEAL

Case Summary

Status:

Application for leave to appeal dismissed with costs (without reasons) May 4, 2017.

Catchwords:

Civil procedure — Pleadings — Standing — Declaratory judgments — Jurisdiction — Applicants' statement of claim struck out without leave to amend pursuant to s. 221 of the Federal Courts Rules, SOR/98-106 — Is the right to seek justiciable declaratory constitutional relief, particularly in public interest litigation, irreconcilable with the pre-Patriation notion of "private reference" (or "free-standing" or "advisory" opinion)? - - Is the right to seek declaratory constitutional relief, in respect of the budgetary process and the legislative provisions of the Bank of Canada Act, R.C.S. 1985, c. B-2, foreclosed by a successful underlying cause of action for damages tied to the declaratory relief?

Case Summary:

The applicants commenced an action against the respondents. They sought declarations of violations of the Bank of Canada Act, R.C.S. 1985, c. B-2; the Constitution Act, 1867, (U.K.), 30 & 31 Vict., c. 3, reprinted in R.S.C. 1985, App. II, No. 5; ss. 7 and 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Part I of the Constitution Act, 1982, being Schedule B of the Canada Act 1982 (U.K.), 1982, c. 11; and of tortious conduct of conspiracy and misfeasance in public office. The applicants sought damages for the violations alleged.

The respondents brought a motion to strike. The Federal Court Prothonotary struck out the original statement of claim in its entirety without leave to amend on the basis that the claim did not disclose a reasonable cause of action. On appeal from the Prothonotary's decision, the Federal Court judge agreed that the claim should be struck but granted leave to amend the pleadings. The Federal Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal and cross-appeal from that decision.

The applicants filed an amended statement of claim where they abandoned prior Charter claims and added a claim pursuant to s. 3 of the Charter, asserting a right to "no taxation without representation". The respondents again moved to have the statement of claim struck on the basis that the applicants failed to rectify any of the previous deficiencies in the pleadings, and that the claim therefore disclosed no reasonable cause of action.

ORDER AND REASONS

ZINN J.

1 The defendants move to strike the Statement of Claim, without leave to amend. They submit that it discloses no reasonable cause of action, and is riddled with deficiencies such that the "claim is beyond particularizing or amending [and] should be struck in its entirety." I agree; however, the plaintiffs ought to be granted an opportunity to file an amended claim that properly and specifically sets out their claim(s).

2 The present Statement of Claim comes close to being incomprehensible. The claim appears to assert that the plaintiffs have suffered damages and loss as a result of the delay, misfeasance, discrimination, negligence, and illegality in the processing of Labour Market opinions [LMOs], Labour Market Impact Assessments [LMIA], work permits and permanent residence applications.

3 This is a proposed class action proceeding against two Ministers for certain alleged acts and omissions, and against Her Majesty the Queen for the tortious acts and omissions of her officials and servants, including the two Ministers.

4 It is alleged that all of the plaintiffs applied for, and were denied, LMO or LMIA assessments, on Temporary Work Permits [TWP], Work Permits [WP], or Provincial Nominee Program [PNP] permanent resident consideration. The plaintiffs are sorted into eight groups (it is unclear to the court whether some plaintiffs appear in more than one group), as described in paragraph 2 of the Statement of Claim, as follows:

[Group 1] "are all Foreign Temporary Workers, [TFW] pursuant to the IRPA Regulations, under the authority of s. 12(2) of the IRPA, who applied for Foreign Temporary Worker permits and were denied because no Labour Market Opinion ("LMO") or Labour Market Impact Assessment ("LMIA") had been processed by the Defendant Minister of Employment and Social Development (formerly Minister for Human Resources and Social Development), following which the Minister of Immigration and his officials denied them work permits due to the inordinate, inexplicable, and actionable delay by the Minister of Human Resources and Social Development, contrary to his statutory duty to process, pursuant to s. 3(1)(f) of the IRPA, which applications were filed and denied to the Plaintiffs set out in, and in accordance with, " Schedule A" of the within Statement of Claim;"

[Group #2] "are all Foreign Temporary Workers, pursuant to the IRPA Regulations, who were denied permits based on the erroneous, arbitrary, and ultra vires assessment that the Plaintiffs' trade or work category lack a labour market "shortage", which refusals were made based on conceded facts by the Defendants that:

- (i) that no statistics existed with respect to "shortages";
- (ii) that the Defendant Ministers expressed, publicly, that they hoped to have such statistics as to shortages, by 2015; and
- (iii) that the best-placed authority as to shortages are the Provincial, local Labour authorities, industries, and trade unions; which applications were filed and denied to the Plaintiffs set out in, and in accordance with, " Schedule B" to the within statement of claim;"

[Group #3] "were denied LMO/LMIA consideration due to illegal and ultra vires Ministerial directions and instructions by the Minister of Employment and Social Development, of a moratorium up to June 2014, 2014, which moratorium was applied nationally even though it arose from a local problem in Western Canada with no such problem existing in Ontario, particularly with the "ethnic food sector", and further which instructions were due to the incompetence and ultra vires LMO/LMIA assessments, as well as the impossible and onerous policies and requirements then imposed on June 20th, 2014, looking forward beyond June 20th, 2014, which included some of the following:

- (i) commit to hiring and training Canadians at high wage rates even though the employers cannot find Canadians willing and able to be trained and, further, if a company failed to find and train a Canadian worker over a 3-5 year period, then the company could face 1 year in jail and a $100,000 fine;
- (ii) agree to let in Ministry of Employment and Development (Human Resources and Social Development) investigators into their office, unannounced and without warrant, to review and take all company records; Ministry of Employment and Development (Human Resources and Social Development) investigators also were given ability to enter residential premises; which LMO/LMIA applications, were filed and denied to the Plaintiffs set out in, and in accordance with "Schedule C" of the within Statement of Claim;"

Da Silva Campos v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [2015] F.C.J. No. 908

[Group #4] were denied, contrary to law, and by way of illegal and ultra vires policy change and Minister's instructions, which policies and changes changed after the Plaintiffs' application was submitted, but before a decision on the assessment was made, whereby the new policies and instructions were applied to the LMO/ LMIA, resulting in a refusal of the application, and actionable damages caused to the Plaintiffs set out in, and in accordance with "Schedule D" of the within Statement of Claim;

[Group #5] were denied an LMO/LMIA assessment and decision in order to .renew their work permits, due to arbitrary, and ultra vires, compliance order(s) against their employers and Plaintiffs which made it impossible to obtain a decision, such as:

- (i) the inexcusable, inordinate delay in processing and verifying which could take 5-6 months;
- (ii) making assessments, and assumptions regarding commercial, market and labour standard conditions which did not accord with reality and were based on mere assumptions without evidence, when the expertise, evidence, and information lay with local Provincial authorities, industries, and unions which were not accessed by the Defendants' officials;
- (iii) while they called them "investigations" with respect to the compliance orders, the Defendants' officials in fact never showed up at work-sites, or offices, to speak to employers or employees; and
- (iv) while an employer was under "compliance review", all applications for that employer were not processed;

which resulted in the denial of an LMO/LMIA assessment for the Plaintiffs who applied for one, prior to the arbitrary compliance orders were put in place, but before an assessment/decision could be made, which caused actionable damages for the Plaintiffs as set out in, and in accordance with "Schedule E" of the within Statement of Claim;"

[Group #6] "were not able to apply for required LMO/LMIA, to renew their work permits, due to arbitrary, and ultra vires, arbitrary changes to LMO/LMIA Rules for which these Plaintiffs made it impossible to obtain a decision, which rules include such orders as:

- (i) the Defendants' officials would change the wage rates without notice;
- (ii) the Defendants' officials would change the advertising requirements without notice;
- (iii) the Defendants' officials would charge their analysis of their "labour market" statistics without notice; and
- (iv) the Defendants' officials would change language requirements without notice;

which resulted in the denial of an LMO/LMIA assessment for the Plaintiffs who applied for one, prior to the arbitrary rules were put in place, but before an assessment/decision could be made, which caused actionable damages for the Plaintiffs as set out in, and in accordance with "Schedule F" of the within Statement of Claim;"

[Group #7] "were eligible Provincial Nominee Program ("PNP") Applicants in Ontario who applied but, because of either illegal and ultra vires "quota" and inexplicable, illegal, and actionable delay by the Defendant Minister of Immigration, as well as superimposing and overriding provincial criteria and selection with irrelevant and ultra vires federal criteria, will not receive an answer to their application for their permanent residence, and will see removal proceedings against them before a decision can be made, thus causing actionable damages to these Plaintiffs as set out, and in accordance with "Schedule G" of the within Statement of Claim;"

[Group #8] "who qualify for the "PNP" Programme in Ontario but who, because of the illegal, arbitrary, and ultra vires Federal "quota" by the Defendant Minister of Immigration, as well as super imposing and overriding provincial criteria and selection with irrelevant and ultra vires federal criteria, will not be processed, and subject to removal proceedings prior to a decision and thus caused actionable damages to the Plaintiffs as set in, and in accordance with "Schedule H" of the within Statement of Claim;"

5 The plaintiffs submit that "the substantive issues" in this motion have been dealt with by the court in Cabral et al v Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) et al, T-2425-14, which is referred to as "the companion case" and they argue that the basis of the within motion is "virtually indistinguishable, in law, and that the within motion to strike ought to be dismissed, as was largely the case in T-2425-14."

6 I agree with the defendants that the ruling on the motion to strike in T-2425-14 is of limited assistance in deciding the within motion because the subject matter of the actions are significantly different. I also agree with the defendants that the ruling in T-2425-14 is relevant in two respects: (i) whether the motion should be heard orally rather than in writing, and (ii) with respect to the plaintiffs' challenge to section 49 of the Federal Courts Act which bars jury trials should be struck. For the reasons given in T-2425-14, I find that this motion may be properly disposed of in writing pursuant to Rule 369 of the Federal Courts Rules, and that the allegation challenging section 49 of the Federal Courts Act, must be struck from the Statement of Claim.

7 The defendants submit that the plaintiffs, as TFWs, are "without standing with respect to claims concerning the processing of applications for [LMO/LMIAs and thus paragraphs 2(a)-(f) and 6(a)-(f) do not disclose a reasonable case of action." It is accurate, as the defendants plead that LMOs and LMIAAs are applied for and issued to employers, not the workers hired under them. However, it is not plain and obvious that a worker cannot be adversely affected by the failure or delay of Canada to issue a LMO or LMIA to a prospective employer which would have permitted the worker to be hired. On the other hand, it is unclear to the court that the claim, as currently drafted, pleads that all or any of the plaintiffs would have been hired as temporary workers had these documents been issued.

8 I am far from convinced that it is plain and obvious that none of these plaintiffs have a possible claim against the defendants; however, as presently drafted, the Statement of Claim cannot stand. The Statement of Claim suffers from a number of deficiencies that cannot be cured simply by striking its offensive parts for what would remain would not make sense. These deficiencies include the following:

1. The plaintiffs have not responded to what appears to be an accurate submission by the defendants that "the title of the proceeding lists 236 plaintiffs but upwards of 90 are listed twice [and] seven plaintiffs appear multiple times with names spelled in different ways making it unclear whether they are duplicate or different plaintiffs." This must be corrected in order that the defendants know who is bringing the action and without that information they are unable to mount much if any specific defence.
2. The Schedule "B" plaintiffs are described in paragraph 2(b) as having been denied permits but in Schedule "B" the plaintiffs are described as having been denied "LMIAAs". This inconsistency must be resolved.
3. The Schedule "A" plaintiffs are described as having been denied LMIAAs, but in Schedule "A" the plaintiffs list the dates they applied for work permits, which is not relevant to the claim these plaintiffs are advancing. Again, this must be resolved.
4. "In paragraph 12(a), the plaintiffs make passing reference to a 'criminal law duty of care, under s. 126 of the Criminal Code" [but] no facts are pleaded in respect of this claim, nor is this alleged duty of care otherwise referenced in the pleading." Absent such particulars, this pleading should be struck.

9 The defendants submit that "the plaintiffs plead no material facts supporting a claim that delays in the processing of applications for LMIAAs are actionable." The plaintiffs plead that there were delays in processing the LMOs and LMIAAs and that those delays were "inordinate, inexplicable and actionable." I do not accept, as the defendants suggest, that the claim must set out the dates of application, the date of denial, and the processing time that passed. Those facts can be discovered through a demand for particulars if the information is not otherwise available to the defendants. It is not necessary for the purposes of pleading. On the other hand, the plaintiffs must plead more than mere delay. Without pleading the basis for its assertion that there was a delay (such as comparing the processing time to an average, or basing the processing on some specific direction or policy), the defendants cannot respond.

10 I agree with the defendants that the plaintiff s' pleading that they have been or will be denied permanent resident visas owing to 'quotas', 'delays', and 'ultra-vires federal criteria' is far too general. The plaintiffs must plead material facts to establish the alleged quota, delay and ultra-vires claims, and plead facts the support the allegation that they have been or will be denied permanent resident visas to which they would otherwise be entitled.

11 I agree with the defendants that the "plaintiffs allege certain Ministerial instructions, policies, compliance orders, rules, quotas, and 'federal criteria' are 'illegal and ultra-vires'" without specifically identifying them or stating how they are illegal or ultra-vires. Absent this information, the pleading is deficient as it lacks material facts necessary for the defendants to respond to the allegation.

12 The Statement of Claim, insofar as it makes allegations relating to TFWP, LMIAs, the PNP, the Federal Skilled Workers Program, the Federal Trades Program, work permits, permanent residence visas, compliance orders, assessments of labour shortages, and the food-services moratorium of 2014, is deficient because there are no facts or insufficient facts pled to permit the defendants and the court to understand the bases of these claims. I agree with the defendants that these pleadings are "neither complete nor intelligible."

13 I further agree with the defendants that it appears that part of this claim, as it relates to the plaintiffs in T-2425-14, is duplicative. If so, and to that extent, it is improper.

14 These irregularities and material deficiencies are sufficient, in the court's view, to strike the Statement of Claim in its entirety; however, because there may be an actionable claim by some of these plaintiffs, they will be granted leave to file a Fresh Statement of Claim within sixty (60) days that conforms to these reasons, failing which the claim will be dismissed.

ORDER

THIS COURT ORDERS that:

1. The Statement of Claim is struck in its entirety;
2. The plaintiffs are granted leave to file a Fresh Statement of Claim within sixty (60) days of this Order that complies with the Reasons provided, failing which the action will be dismissed; and
3. Costs are in the cause.

REASONS FOR DECISION

E.M. STEWART J.

Nature of the Motions

1 The Plaintiffs have initiated proceedings as against these more than 20 Defendants and claim damages in the aggregate of approximately $12,000,000.00 for defamation and other purported causes of action.

2 The Defendants have brought these several motions pursuant to s. 137.1 of the Courts of Justice Act ("CJA"), R.S.O 1990, c C.43. Section 137.1 allows for the dismissal by judicial order of a proceeding that limits debate on matters of public interest. These motions are more commonly referred to as "anti-SLAPP" motions. A SLAAP refers to a strategic lawsuit against public participation, a characterization which the Defendants argue aptly attaches to the proceedings brought against them.

3 The Plaintiffs argue that the motions do not satisfy the test for dismissal at this early stage and therefore submit that the relief requested by the Defendants should not be granted.

4 The most relevant portions of Section 137.1 of the CJA provide as follows:

Dismissal of proceeding that limits debate

Purposes

137.1 (1) The purposes of this section and sections 137.2 to 137.5 are,

- (a) to encourage individuals to express themselves on matters of public interest;
- (b) to promote broad participation in debates on matters of public interest;
- (c) to discourage the use of litigation as a means of unduly limiting expression on matters of public interest; and
- (d) to reduce the risk that participation by the public in debates on matters of public interest will be hampered by fear of legal action. 2015, c. 23, s.3.

Definition, "expression"

(2) In this section,

"expression" means any communication, regardless of whether it is made verbally or non-verbally, whether it is made publicly or privately, and whether or not it is directed at a person or entity. 2015, c. 23, s. 3.

Order to dismiss

- (3) On motion by a person against whom a proceeding is brought, a judge shall, subject to subsection (4), dismiss the proceeding against the person if the person satisfies the judge that the proceeding arises from an expression made by the person that relates to a matter of public interest. 2015, c. 23, s. 3.

No dismissal

- (4) A judge shall not dismiss a proceeding under subsection (3) if the responding party satisfies the judge that,
 - (a) there are grounds to believe that,
 - (i) the proceeding has substantial merit, and

- (ii) the moving party has no valid defence in the proceeding; and
- (b) the harm likely to be or have been suffered by the responding party as a result of the moving party's expression is sufficiently serious that the public interest in permitting the proceeding to continue outweighs the public interest in protecting that expression. 2015, c. 23, s. 3.

5 It is not disputed that the tort of defamation is governed by a well-established test requiring that three criteria be met:

- (a) that the words complained of were published, meaning that they were communicated to at least one person other than the plaintiff;
- (b) the words complained of referred to the plaintiff; and
- (c) the impugned words were defamatory, in the sense that they would tend to lower the plaintiff's reputation in the eyes of a reasonable person.

6 Even if the definition of defamation is met, a defendant may have several defences to rely on to escape liability. These include justification, fair comment, qualified privilege and responsible journalism (see: Grant v. Torstar Corp., 2009 SCC 61).

7 In order to properly consider the issues raised by a motion brought pursuant to s. 137.1 evidence may be filed by the parties to provide background and context to an impugned statement as well as to establish the chances of success of the claims and any available defences.

8 Subsections 137.1(3) and (4) of the CJA set out a two-part test for a motion to dismiss an action on this basis. First, the defendant has the onus of showing that the plaintiff's proceeding arises from an expression that "relates to a matter of public interest". If the defendant meets that threshold, the court must dismiss the action unless the plaintiff satisfies the court that there are grounds to believe the proceeding has substantial merit, that there are grounds to believe that the defendant has no valid defence, and that the harm suffered by the plaintiff is sufficiently serious such that the public interest in allowing the proceeding to continue outweighs the public interest in protecting that expression.

9 It is instructive to repeat that, once it has been established by the Defendants that the impugned communication relates to a matter of public interest, the burden on these motions rests on the Plaintiffs to establish that there is substantial merit to each of their claims.

10 The three factors that comprise the plaintiff's onus to meet the second branch of the test are conjunctive. If the plaintiff fails to meet the onus on any one of those three requirements, the action must be dismissed.

11 The Supreme Court of Canada has considered the test for dismissal under s. 137.1 and has expressed views on issues related to the approach to be applied thereunder in two recent decisions: 1704604 Ontario Ltd. V. Pointes Protection Association, 2020 SCC 22 and Bent v. Platnick, 2020 SCC 23.

12 In Pointes Protection, "substantial merit" was defined as a real prospect of success. The requirement was further refined in Bent v. Platnick as demonstrating a prospect of success that need not be demonstrably likely, but one that weighs more in favour of the plaintiff.

13 Substantial merit has been described as a more demanding standard than that applicable on a motion to strike a claim pursuant to Rule 21 of the Rules of Civil Procedure for failure to disclose a cause of action. Accordingly, more than merely some chance of success is required. In Bent v. Platnick, was stated (at para. 49):

...for an underlying proceeding to have "substantial merit", it must have a real prospect of success -- in other words, a prospect of success that, while not amounting to a demonstrated likelihood of success, tends to weigh more in favour of the plaintiff. In context with "grounds to believe", this means that the motion judge needs to be satisfied that there is a basis in the record and the law -- taking into account the stage of the proceeding -- for drawing such a conclusion. This requires that the claim be legally tenable and supported by evidence that is reasonably capable of belief.

14 In Bent v. Platnick, the Court went on to state (at paras 87 and 88):

In Pointes Protection, this Court clarifies the fact that unlike s. 137.1(3), which requires a showing on a balance of probabilities, s. 137.1(4)(a) expressly contemplates a "grounds to believe" standard instead: para.35. This requires a basis in the record and the law - taking into account the stage of the litigation - for finding that the underlying proceeding has substantial merit and that there is no valid defence.

I elaborate here that, in effect, this means that any basis in the record and the law will be sufficient. By definition, "a basis" will exist if there is a single basis in the record and the law to support a finding of substantial merit and the absence of a valid defence. That basis must of course be legally tenable and reasonably capable of belief. But the "crux of the inquiry" is found, after all, in s. 137.1(4)(b), which also serves as a "robust backstop" for protecting freedom of expression.

15 The "crux of the inquiry" therefore is the balancing exercise required by s. 137.1(4)(b) which involves a weighing of the seriousness of the harm to the Plaintiffs as a result of the expressions of the Defendants and the public interest in permitting the proceeding to continue, versus the public interest in protecting the expression.

16 Having considered the submissions made on behalf of the parties, having applied the provisions of the legislation referred to above which govern the determination of the issues in light of the principles and considerations articulated by the Supreme Court of Canada in the authorities noted above, for the reasons that follow I find that an application of the test under s. 137.1 to each claim, including the allegations of "negligence" and "conspiracy" (which are nothing but dressed-up and unsubstantiated variations of the central claims of alleged defamation), must result in a dismissal of all claims.

17 I also conclude that these claims are precisely ones that are of the kind that s. 137.1 is designed to discourage and screen out.

The Plaintiffs

18 The Plaintiff Dr. Kulvinder Kaur Gill ("Dr. Gill") is a medical doctor practising at an allergy, asthma and clinical immunology clinic with locations in Brampton and Milton, Ontario. Dr. Gill has been a member of the Ontario Medical Association ("OMA") Governing Council and transparency of the OMA and the harm of escalating cuts to frontline health care. She is a founding member and leader of Concerned Ontario Doctors ("COD") which operates in part as a platform for the expression of her views.

19 The undisputed evidence on the motion plainly shows that Dr. Gill is not afraid to voice unpopular views or to court controversy.

20 Dr. Gill also is a frequent commentator on issues related to the Covid-19 pandemic and does so frequently on her Twitter account which has attracted more than 63,000 "followers".

21 Accordingly, in addition to her campaign of attack on the OMA and its leadership, Dr. Gill has been an outspoken critic of prevailing public health advice on how to prevent or slow Covid-19 infection from spreading throughout the community, using social media platforms including Twitter to disseminate her controversial views. In doing so, Dr Gill has suggested that the risks posed by the Covid-19 virus are exaggerated, vaccines are unnecessary, lockdowns are illogical, and hydroxychloroquine is an effective treatment for infection caused by the virus.

22 Dr. Gill has been formally and publicly cautioned by the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario against using her position as a physician to bolster her dissemination of such misleading information which contradicts the positions advocated by public health authorities in Ontario and Canada. The prohibition contained in the Regulated

Health Professions Act against use in a civil proceeding of documents or details of the College's investigation requires that no further mention or consideration of same enter into the deliberations required by these motions.

23 The Plaintiff Dr. Ashvinder Kaur Lamba ("Dr. Lamba") is a medical doctor practising as a physician at a long-term care home and a retirement home in Etobicoke, Ontario and is an addiction physician in Thornhill, Ontario. She also has a family practice in Brampton. Dr. Lamba is a former OMA delegate and member of the OMA Governing Council and is now Secretary of the Board of COD.

24 Dr. Lamba is to some extent a secondary protagonist with respect to the advancement of these claims which, in large part, arise out of matters in which Dr. Gill is the central figure. Dr. Lamba did not swear or file an affidavit in response to these motions. She asserts her claims only as against two of the Defendants and only with respect to allegations relating to statements said to have been made concerning her OMA activities and positions.

25 The multi-million dollar claims for damages made by both Plaintiffs are for reputational damage only, although each Plaintiff continues to be active in their professional organization and affairs and to practise medicine unimpeded in Ontario. As will be referred to below, the Plaintiffs have advanced very little basis for demonstrating that they or their reputations have been damaged as a result of the statements or conduct of any of the Defendants.

The Defendants

26 The Defendant Dr. Angus McIver ("Dr. McIver") is an elderly physician who holds no leadership position in the OMA. He has a primary Twitter account ("@smoothholdfart") with 1206 followers, and a now-deleted secondary Twitter account ("@vitomaciver") which had been used mainly for posting photos of his dog.

27 The Defendant Dr. Nadia Alam ("Dr. Alam") is a medical doctor practising as a family physician and anaesthetist in Ontario and is a Board Director of the Halton Hills Family Health Team. Dr. Alam has been and remains active in the OMA. From 2017-2020 she was a member of the Board of Directors of the OMA and was OMA President during 2018-2019. Dr. Alam is represented by two separate counsel in connection who separately address the two categories of allegations the Plaintiffs have made against her.

28 The Defendant Dr. David Jacobs ("Dr. Jacobs") is a physician specializing in diagnostic radiology in Toronto. Dr. Jacobs is a leader in his specialty associations and professional governing bodies.

29 The Defendant Dr. Alex Nataros ("Dr. Nataros") is a family physician practising medicine in British Columbia. Dr. Nataros is a recipient of the Leadership and Advocacy Award of the College of Family Physicians of Canada.

30 The Defendant Dr. Michelle Cohen ("Dr. Cohen") is a family physician in Brighton, Ontario who is a public advocate on health policy issues, having published articles in various newspapers and periodicals on health policy topics.

31 The Defendant Dr. John Van Aerde ("Dr. Van Aerde") is a specialist in paediatric medicine. Although now retired from clinical practice, Dr. Van Aerde remains active in various medical associations, medical education institutions as well as the Canadian Medical Association.

32 The Defendant Dr Andrew Fraser ("Dr. Fraser") is a tenured professor at the University of Toronto Donnelly Centre for Cellular and Biomedical Research. He conducts research on genetic models of development and disease, and has significant training and experience in pathology and statistical analysis.

33 The Defendant Dr. Ilan Schwartz ("Dr. Schwartz") is a physician with a subspecialty in infectious diseases, employed by the University of Alberta and the Alberta Health Services. Dr. Schwartz was involved in clinical trials of the use of hydroxychloroquine that were among the many such research investigations that showed it to be an ineffective treatment for Covid-19 infection.

34 The Defendant Dr. Marco Prado ("Dr. Prado") is a professor at Western University with an established expertise in biochemistry and immunology.

35 The Defendant Timothy Caulfield ("Caulfield") is a health policy and health sciences professor at the University of Alberta's Faculty of Law and School of Public Health whose research has dealt with misinformation in the context of health care and Covid-19.

36 The Defendant Dr. Sajjad Fazel ("Dr. Fazel") is a post-doctoral associate at the University of Calgary and also holds a Masters Degree in Public Health.

37 The Defendant Dr. Terry Polevoy ("Dr. Polevoy") is a retired family physician who is an active leader within various medical associations, including associations of physicians in his area of practice and provincial associations. Dr. Polevoy is active on social media, primarily through his Twitter account where he frequently shares information, opinions and news stories on a variety of subjects including politics and health care.

38 The Defendant Dr. Andrew Boozary ("Dr. Boozary") is a physician in Toronto and the Executive Director of Population Health and Social Medicine at the University Health Network.

39 The Defendant Dr. Abdu Sharkawy ("Dr. Sharkawy") is a physician with a specialization in infectious diseases and internal medicine. He routinely speaks in public and using his Twitter account to educate members of the public on health and medicine matters.

40 The Defendant The Medical Post publishes both a print magazine and an online newspaper for Canadian physicians. The online newspaper is published daily and is only available to registered users or subscribers.

41 The Defendant Tristan Bronca has worked with the Medical Post and has become familiar with the scientific literature on hydroxychloroquine showing it is not an effective treatment for covid-19.

42 The Defendant The Pointer Group Incorporated ("The Pointer") is a paid subscription-bases digital-only media platform that provides locally-focused news in the Peel and Greater Toronto Regions.

43 The Defendant André Picard ("Picard") is the Staff Senior Health Columnist for The Globe and Mail where he has worked since 1987. Picard reports and writes on health and health care issues. He is the author of six books on health-related subjects and speaks publicly on frequent occasions on such matters, also using a Twitter account for that purpose.

44 The Defendant Carly Weeks is a Health Reporter for The Globe and Mail where she has been a staff writer since 2007. She writes and often speaks publicly on health-related topics and additionally uses a Twitter account for that purpose.

45 The Defendant Alheli Picazo ("Picazo") is a freelance writer who primarily covers the topics of politics and health. She uses Twitter for this purpose and often tweets about the Covid-19 pandemic and related issues.

46 The Defendant Bruce Arthur ("Arthur") is a columnist at the Toronto Star. He uses his Twitter account to express personal views and concerns on a variety of topics, including the Covid-19 pandemic.

47 The Plaintiffs have discontinued their action as against the Defendants The Hamilton Spectator and Societe-Radio Canada.

Preliminary Observations

48 As can be seen from the above descriptions of the Defendants, the Plaintiffs have brought these proceedings against more than 20 individual physicians, academics, medical and scientific experts, and journalists as well as against publications that have and continue to provide valuable information to the public about Covid-19.

49 In the motions before the Court, the Defendants seek to avail themselves of a provision enacted by the legislature that is intended to operate as a shield against anyone seeking to stifle debate on issues that are of interest to the public. The ultimate issue before me is whether these claims are such that they should be dismissed on that basis at this early stage.

50 The provision under which the Defendants move for orders dismissing the claims against them is not the first or the only available recourse by which a proceeding may be terminated or curtailed by the courts when appropriate. For instance, Rules 2.1.01, 20 and 21 establish bases upon which proceedings may be dismissed or adjudicated upon short of any full trial. No one has an absolute and unfettered right to pursue any civil claims through to full trial and judgment without confronting a possible roadblock that may bring the proceedings to a halt.

51 One may well wonder about the motives of these full-time physicians who remain active in what might fairly be described as the politics of their professional associations in bringing proceedings seeking staggering money judgments against such a broad array of persons whom they claim to perceive as having injured their reputations. The sheer variety of their targets and the magnitude of their claims set them up to be examined pursuant to s. 137.1.

52 Because there are so many claims made in these proceedings against so many Defendants, and so many arguments and defences advanced by them, applying the test on each of the motions brought on their behalf is a daunting task. However, it does appear that the claims can be grouped generally into 2 categories: those that arise out of statements made by some Defendants in the context of an OMA dispute, and those that arise out of or were provoked by the controversial views expressed by Dr. Gill about pandemic-related matters.

53 In dealing with the substance of these various motions, I may repeat the same positions taken by various parties, or make liberal reference to those parts of the written submissions that have been filed on behalf of some parties as well as the rationales for those arguments as advanced.

54 In several instances, some Defendants have sought to avail themselves of more than one available defence. As will be seen below, I consider it unnecessary to determine to any full extent or comment upon the defences of justification that have been asserted because I consider that the additional defences of fair comment, responsible journalism and/or qualified privilege offer full defences to the claims and therefore no entry into what may be (at its highest) an arbitration of matters of scientific debate is necessary. By declining to do so, I do not purport to suggest that the opinions of the Plaintiffs are of equal persuasive merit to those views expressed by the Defendants, but only that a thorough evaluation of them for the purposes of these motions is not strictly required.

55 As a general observation, counsel for the Plaintiffs has urged the Court to agree that it must adopt a fairly narrow approach to the s. 137.1 analysis referred to herein, must avoid drawing any inferences, and must not arrive at any conclusions based on a qualitative assessment of the evidence tendered by the parties.

56 In my opinion, to adopt an overly-rigid and narrow approach to the analysis of the material filed in this case would be to ignore the stated purpose of the legislation as well as the "crux of the inquiry" and "robust backstop" descriptions employed by the Supreme Court of Canada to describe the balancing process that is designed to protect, in appropriate cases, freedom of expression on matters of public interest from the chilling prospect of litigation.

57 Having said that, the material filed by the parties is such that it requires very little or nothing by the way of credibility assessments to dispose of the motions. Rather, the expressions or conduct of the Defendants that are the subject of the action are basically not in dispute. The critical task is to determine if they are protected when the analysis established by s. 137.1 is applied. Having carefully considered the evidence and arguments put forward by the Plaintiffs, I nevertheless am of the opinion that the expressions complained of attract the protection that a s. 137.1 analysis permits.

58 For greater clarity, I view all of the expressions or statements complained of by the Plaintiffs to have been made on matters of public interest. The test required by s. 137.1 has been applied to each in order to determine the appropriate result. In each case, I should be taken to have accepted and adopted fully the submissions advanced on behalf of each of the Defendants.

The OMA Dispute Claims

A. Dr. Maciver

59 Section 137.1 places an initial burden, which is purposefully not an onerous one, on a defendant to satisfy the motion judge that the proceeding arises from an expression that relates to a matter of public interest. At this first stage of the s. 137.1 analysis, it is not legally relevant whether the expression is desirable or deleterious, valuable or vexatious, or whether it helps or hampers the public interest. The only question is whether the expression pertains to any matter of public interest, defined broadly.

60 The expression in the action brought against Dr. Maciver concerns tweets published by him on his Twitter feed in September 2018. In its entire context, Dr. Maciver's expression pertains to the public debate about the OMA sparked by the Plaintiffs and their physician advocacy organization COD on Twitter and their blocking of physicians who do not agree with their views.

61 When Dr. Maciver published his tweets, the Plaintiffs through COD had been engaged in ongoing, serious and inflammatory attacks on the OMA and its leadership on Twitter and on other platforms. These attacks included allegations of fraud and corruption. Dr. Maciver wanted to respond to the Plaintiffs' Twitter attacks directly on their Twitter feeds that was the site of the public conversation but could not do so because the Plaintiffs had blocked him and others from engaging with them on Twitter.

62 Frustrated by the Plaintiffs' blocking of him, Dr. Maciver tweeted the words complained of on his own Twitter feed. In his initial tweet, which is the primary subject of this litigation as against him, Dr. Maciver used some rather offensive name-calling towards the Plaintiffs. He deleted this tweet within days after posting it.

63 The following facts provide context to Dr. Maciver's expression:

- (a) Prior to and at the time of the publication of the words complained of, there was significant interest in Ontario and, in particular, within the Ontario medical community concerning the contract negotiations between the Government of Ontario and the OMA, on behalf of Ontario physicians.
- (b) Since its formation, COD has taken positions critical of and has attacked the OMA and its leadership. The Plaintiffs, as leaders of COD, have a "lack of confidence in the integrity, fairness, accountability and transparency of the OMA." Dr. Maciver is one of the many OMA physicians who strongly oppose COD's and the Plaintiffs' ongoing attacks on the OMA.
- (c) In October 2017, Dr. Maciver replied to a COD tweet, expressing his ongoing disappointment in COD "continuing to fragment the profession in Ontario." Soon after his fairly benign expression of disappointment, the Plaintiffs blocked him from posting on their Twitter account.
- (d) The Plaintiffs also have blocked the Twitter accounts of other physicians who appeared to dissent from their political views concerning the OMA.
- (e) Prior to the publication of the words complained of, the Plaintiffs used Twitter to criticize the OMA and its leadership. These criticisms included allegations of fraud and corruption. Some examples of this are as follows:

* OMA=toxic culture of misogyny, bullying & intimidation

- * None of them are held to account for their lies, unethical conduct, and bullying & intimidation of frontline MDs
- * Corrupt OMA's hypocrisy on Full Display
- * We will be fully united once we truly revamp the OMA. But that can only happen once it's dismantled, the vermin scurries out...
- * The following is the epitome (so far) of the egregiousness of this organization and its so called "leaders" - how disgusting can they get?
- * Instead, corrupt OMA's implementing draconian Code of Conduct to silence MDs
- * ...undemocratic OMA passed Part 1 of 2 Part Code of Conduct to silence MDs from exposing unethical conduct
- * LAME DUCK OMA...Incoming OMA Pres Nadia Alam was NEVER elected by membership
- * Of course, the corrupt OMA rewards its unethical "leaders" with accolades and rewards. One word: karma.
- * Unbelievable hypocrisy on display
- * The corrupt OMA is taking extreme measures to muzzle your doctors...

64 Leading up to the publication of his impugned tweets in September 2018, Dr. Maciver became increasingly frustrated by the Plaintiffs' attacks on the OMA and, in particular, their attacks on the honesty and integrity of its leadership. Dr. Maciver believed the Plaintiffs' attacks were very serious charges which called for debate and response on the main forum in which they were being made, i.e. the Plaintiffs' Twitter feeds. Because the Plaintiffs had blocked Dr. Maciver, he could not respond directly to them.

65 On September 4, 2018, Dr. Maciver lost his temper over the Plaintiffs' ongoing conduct and what he viewed as the inflammatory positions they were taking on behalf of COD. Dr. Maciver reacted on his @smoothholdfart account about being blocked by the Plaintiffs on Twitter. He made further tweets from his @vitomaciver account the same day and on September 8, 2018. From the outset, the primary focus of the Plaintiffs' complaint and this action against Dr. Maciver concerns the words "corksoakers" and "twats" published in the initial smoothholdfart tweet.

66 In its entire context, Dr. Maciver's expression pertains to the public debate about the OMA sparked by the Plaintiffs and COD on Twitter and their blocking on Twitter of physicians who dissent from their inflammatory views.

67 I am of the opinion that the impugned communications authored by Dr. Maciver were on a matter of public interest.

68 In terms of referencing the Plaintiffs in the initial @smoothholdfart Tweet, Dr. Maciver understood Dr. Gill and Dr. Lamba to be the public faces of COD on Twitter. This is the only reason he referenced them.

69 The law is clear that people have no legal duty to "always be calm, cool, kind, gentle and polite." It has long been recognized by courts that "there is a distinction between actionable defamation and mere obscenities, insults and other verbal abuse" and "[t]he courts cannot award damages in favour of the victims of empty threats, insulting words or rudeness" (see: Langille et al v. McGrath, 2000 CanLII 46809).

70 The law tolerates such speech not only as an expression of free speech in a free society but also as a safeguard against our court system being flooded with litigation.

71 It is clear from the words complained of and the overall context in which they were published on Twitter that Dr. Maciver was communicating his disapproval of the conduct of the Plaintiffs. The offensive language used by him is pure name-calling, and not defamation.

72 Although some of the language used by Dr. Maciver on Twitter may have been unprofessional and ill-advised, the words complained of are not defamatory and therefore not actionable. There is an important distinction in the law of defamation between words that are actionable for being defamatory and words that merely contain insults and are not actionable. Freedom of speech would be seriously curtailed if insulting comments, which have caused no harm to reputation, were actionable for being defamatory (see: Diop v. Transdev Dublin Light Rail, 2019 IEHA 849).

73 On multiple occasions, Dr. Maciver has apologized to the Plaintiffs both publicly and privately and shown contrition for the heated language he used on Twitter. The fact of Dr. Maciver's apologies was also made known within the physician community on Twitter.

74 On September 7, 2018, the Plaintiffs published a Facebook post to COD's many followers which referred to Dr. Maciver's "vulgarity" and repeated the allegedly offending language. In the post, the Plaintiffs wrongfully claimed that Dr. Maciver called them "cock sucking cunts" and further incorrectly told their readers that Dr. Maciver made his tweets as a leader of the OMA.

75 Any reputational harm to the Plaintiffs purportedly caused by Dr. Maciver's expression is evidently of very low magnitude, if any has actually occurred.

76 Dr. Gill offered no evidence of any harm arising from Dr. Maciver's briefly published expression, other than vague, unparticularized statements. In fact, it is her own evidence that she remains "a highly regarded member of [her] profession." Dr. Lamba has not seen fit to tender evidence on this motion to describe the alleged harm that she claims to have suffered.

77 Even if for the purposes of this motion the words complained of are found to be defamatory of the Plaintiffs and that some general damages to their reputation are therefore to be presumed, then the record before me supports a conclusion that any damages suffered are likely to be assessed as merely nominal and insufficient to warrant continuation of this proceeding.

78 An application of the s. 137(4)(b) "crux of the matter" analysis therefore requires a dismissal of the Plaintiffs' claims against Dr. Maciver. For the reasons he asserts, the public interest in protecting Dr. Maciver's right to speak out on a matter of public interest outweighs any considerations that might otherwise favour allowing the action against him to continue.

79 Accordingly, the relief requested by Dr. Maciver is hereby allowed and the action against him is dismissed.

B. Dr. Alam and the Medical Post

80 In 2018 Dr. Alam was President of the OMA. The Plaintiffs objected to what they described as Dr. Macivor's vulgarity and demanded via Facebook that the OMA and Dr. Alam censure him.

81 Dr. Alam was then called upon to comment on this situation by members of the OMA as well. As such, Dr. Alam has raised a very strong defence that her response was written on an occasion of qualified privilege in furtherance of her duties to communicate to OMA membership and to respond to what may fairly be described as an attack upon her and the OMA by the Plaintiffs.

82 The basic elements of the attack by the Plaintiffs may be seen in a statement published by the Plaintiffs on their Facebook page which states, in part:

We are your Ontario Doctors

September 7, 2018

#METOOMICINE & THE TOXIC ONTARIO MEDICAL ASSOCIATION-PART 1

A glimpse of OMA's toxicity. This is what we and frontline MDs are subjected to in private by the Ontario Medical Association (OMA) "leaders" and staff. Now one of the OMA's "leaders" feels so empowered that he now publicly makes his racist, sexist and misogynistic comments on Twitter. Slang for "cock sucking cunts".

This vulgarity is from Dr. Angus Maciver: The OMA's "distinguished leader" who was awarded "OMA Life Member Award" for his ongoing 20 years on the corrupt OMA Council, currently as President of the Perth County Medical Society and previously as the Chair of the OMA Section of General Surgery. He is also a "leader" of the Ontario Association of General Surgeons, a former Royal College of Canada examiner and former University of Western Ontario Schulich School of Medicine faculty.

This is the "new", "reformed" and "progressive" OMA. OMA; its leaders never practice what they preach and either repeatedly engage in, encourage or turn a blind eye to such disgusting behaviours. This is the toxic and pervasive culture at OMA's corrupt core.

... This is the toxic and pervasive culture at the OMA's corrupt core. In the past 72 hrs, not a single OMA "leader", medical "leadership" organization or

"feminist" advocacy "leader" has condemned this OMA "leader". Silence of acceptance has followed Maciver's vulgarity. It is unacceptable that still in 2018, it is not the vulgarity of comments or actions that evoke condemnation, but rather the privileged status of the harasser that evoke silence, and even worse, further empowerment of the harasser by those who witnessed it.

The OMA is a toxic and self-serving organization that is corrupt to its core...

As a young, visible minority, female Canadian frontline MDs, fighting the corrupt establishment that is the OMA has felt akin to battling Goliath. But we are empowered by the truth and driven by knowing we are fighting for the future of Ontario's healthcare and for you: our patients and our colleagues.

... We demand action from the Ontario Government NOW: a prompt, full independent forensic review of the corrupt OMA.

83 On September 8, 2018, after the Plaintiffs posted their statement on Facebook, some OMA members formed the mistaken belief that Dr. Maciver had been speaking on behalf of the OMA or that he was an OMA staff member when he posted the tweet referred to.

84 Dr. Alam consulted with senior management and staff of the OMA and it was agreed that she should contact Dr. Maciver in order to encourage him to apologize for what he had reportedly said, and Dr. Alam did so. Dr. Maciver advised that he had tried and would continue trying to resolve the dispute.

85 On September 9, 2018, Drs. Gill and Lamba posted a further statement on Facebook, a partial transcript of which is as follows:

We are Your Ontario Doctors

September 9, 2018

#Metoomedicine & the toxic Ontario medical association-part 2

... We have never spoken to or interacted with OMA's decorated leader, Dr. Angus Maciver, in our personal or professional lives. We have never interacted with him ever on any social media platform. But he has now forced himself into our lives. Six days ago, this OMA leader felt so empowered that he directly attacked the only two young, female, visible minority MDs on the entire Board of Concerned Ontario Doctors, using slang to call us "cock sucking cunts" on Twitter as other OMA leaders enabled and encouraged him. There was no apology. There were no condemnations from any of the OMA leaders or any of the many medical leadership organizations he is affiliated with. All these medical "leaders" condoned his toxic behavior and vulgarity with their silence. The OMA normalized it.

... What is most disturbing is that all of the OMA "leaders" remained silent publicly. Not a single OMA leader condemned their decorated leader for his overtly vulgar misogyny. Not one.

... The most disturbing was that after 6 days of silence, the OMA President Nadia Alam's response is to defend and empower him, validate his lies and attack us (see Picture 3 in comments below). The corrupt OMA, that MDs are forced to be members of and pay millions to for it to protect our "best" interests, defends the harasser and his professional misconduct. The OMA President Nadia Alam's first statement on Twitter came this morning (see Picture 4 in comments below), 6 days after the OMA leader's misogyny and only following mounting public pressure. Again Alam does not condemn him. she defends and empowers him, validates his lies and attacks us. This is failed leadership.

This is the same OMA President who just months ago, on International Women's Day, said she was "grateful that brave women speak up to change culture from the ground up like #metoo" (see Picture 5 in comments below). Now Alam is attacking those "brave women" because it is the toxic and corrupt OMA that she is defending.

The OMA President Alam's empowerment of the harasser comes as a selfproclaimed "feminist" & #metoo "advocate". Her response is deemed by the corrupt OMA to be the only word and is supposed to close the chapter. But it won't. Because #TimesUP. MDs have had enough of OMA's toxicity.

... As we have said before (Part 1: goo.gl/GFJ485), the OMA is a deeply corrupt, authoritarian, abusive and toxic organization. It is the biggest threat to the future of healthcare in ON and Canada. Ford's government must immediately undertake a fully independent forensic review of the OMA.

86 On Sunday September 23, 2018, Dr. Alam received an e-mail from Drs. Lamba and Gill sent to her official OMA e-mail address and to her personal e-mail account. The text of that e-mail reads as follows:

Drs. Kulvinder Gill and Ashvinder Lamba are giving the Ontario Medical Association (OMA) and its President Dr. Nadia Alam one last opportunity to tell the truth and condemn Dr. Angus Maciver for his vulgar misogyny and harassment against them. Do the right thing. Otherwise, your lies will be exposed.

87 Section 25 of the Libel and Slander Act allows qualified privilege to apply on a matter of public interest between two or more people who have a direct interest in the matter, even if the communication is witnessed or reported on by media or other people.

88 Parenthetically, on November 7, 2018 the Plaintiffs filed complaints against Dr. Alam with the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario and in 2019 with the Human Rights Tribunal of Ontario concerning these same grievances.

89 Once the Plaintiffs demanded that Dr. Alam respond publicly and accused her and the OMA of being corrupt the words of Dr. Alam complained of became a matter of public interest such as to satisfy s. 137.1(3) of the CJA and additionally were ones of special importance.

90 I agree that a defence of qualified privilege is therefore available to Dr. Alam and applies here.

91 Qualified privilege exists where a person making a communication has "an interest or duty (legal, social, moral, or personal) to publish the information in issue to the person to whom it is published" and the recipient has a "corresponding interest or duty to receive it". This privilege attaches to the circumstance, and not the communication. Where the occasion itself is found to be covered by qualified privilege, then a defendant may publish remarks that are perhaps untrue and defamatory (unless the dominant motive was malice) without liability therefor.

92 There has not been any evidence of malice led by the Plaintiffs to defeat the qualified privilege defence asserted by Dr. Alam.

93 Dr. Alam therefore has satisfied the test of having a valid defence. In their Statement of Claim, the Plaintiffs also allege that Dr. Alam was in breach of her "duty of care" to them and was negligent in her conduct. There can be no recognized duty of care in these circumstances of such strong criticism of Dr. Alam that would limit her ability to respond proportionately as was done here. These additional claims that have been alleged are, in reality, mere restatements of the claims for defamation and are likewise dismissed.

94 The Plaintiffs also allege that a quotation attributed to Dr. Alam that was published in the Medical Post was defamatory. Specifically, Dr. Alam's quote in the article was as follows:

"I spoke to Dr. McIver [sic]. By then he had already apologized to the physicians on Twitter and over email. He is blocked by them so unclear if it got through. He agreed, there is no place for this type of language between colleagues. Ever."

95 On its face, I find that there is nothing defamatory about the impugned statement, a strong defence. The full article in which this statement appears is contained at paragraphs 10 and 11 of the Factum filed on behalf of the Medical Post. Seeing Dr. Alam's statement in context will simply undermine any possible assertion that it is defamatory.

96 The Plaintiffs failed to serve a libel notice or commence an action within the requirements of s. 5 of the Libel and Slander Act which constitutes an absolute bar to this action against the Medical Post, a similarly strong defence.

97 As noted above, the third and final step of the section 137.1 analysis is the heart of the test. This section requires a balancing of the public interest in allowing a harmed plaintiff to pursue litigation against the public interest in protecting expressions. This step has been described as a "robust backstop" that allows judges to dismiss claims even if they are technically meritorious. Even where a plaintiff can show their proceeding has substantial merit and the defendant has no valid defence, it may still be in the public interest to prioritize protecting the expression over allowing a plaintiff to pursue a cause of action despite the harm it caused. To make this determination, the harm to the plaintiff as a result of the expression is weighed against the public interest in protecting that expression.

98 To overcome this hurdle, the Plaintiffs must show 1) the existence of harm, 2) that the harm is linked to the expression, and 3) if harm is established and linked, that this linked harm is sufficiently serious to make it preferable to allow the proceeding to continue, rather than protecting the expression.

99 Harm includes both monetary and non-monetary damages. While the Plaintiffs do not need to establish the full details of the harm, nor to have it be monetized, they do have to provide evidence of the existence of the harm, or evidence from which a judge can draw an inference of likelihood in respect of the existence of the harm, as well as the relevant causal link. Bald assertions will not be sufficient.

100 As already noted, the Plaintiffs have not produced any evidence of harm suffered or to be suffered by them as a result of the words of which they complain.

101 Dr. Alam's statements in issue and the Medical Post article are of sufficient importance to satisfy the balancing test as set out in s. 137.1(4)(b). Dr. Alam's speech and the information in the article were necessary and valuable. An application of the balancing test results in a determination strongly in favour of these Defendants. As a result, the claims against Dr. Alam and, to the extent it is also a target of these claims, against the Medical Post must be dismissed.

The Covid-19 Claims

102 The Covid-19 claims arising out of statements made by the Defendants other than Dr. Maciver appear to be advanced only by Dr. Gill. She has been very vocal in her criticism of how government officials and agencies and organizations like the World Health Organization ("WHO") have responded to the ongoing worldwide pandemic.

103 The bulk of the communications in this category occurred on the lively and rather unbridled platform of Twitter, and comprise what may be accurately described as a Twitter Storm.

A. André Picard and Carly Weeks

104 In early August 2020 Dr. Gill posted tweets in which she expressed her views on how society should respond to the pandemic. In the first, Dr. Gill said "we don't need a vaccine" for Covid-19, stating that those who had not figured this out were "not paying attention". In the second, she stated that society could "safely return to normal life now" with what she referred to as "#Humanity's existing effective defences against #COVID19", identified by her as "The Truth", "T-cell Immunity" and hydroxychloroquine ("HCQ").

105 Andre Picard, the Staff Senior Health Columnist for The Globe and Mail, tweeted on his Twitter account that he found it "quite shocking" that Dr. Gill would publicly state such opinions that were so contrary to the prevailing consensus among medical professionals, scientists, and public health officials.

106 Dr. Gill then attacked Picard by posting a tweet implying that he had no right to comment because of his lack of medical training and insinuating that he was advancing the so-called "political WHO narrative", apparently improperly influenced by his association with a charity established in memory of the late former Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau.

107 The other three tweets by Picard and the single tweet by Weeks complained of were posted in the flurry of Twitter activity that followed Dr. Gill's attack on Picard. These included tweets about the controversial use of HCQ to treat Covid-19, and others attacking Picard or expressing support for him.

108 Dr. Gill alleges that the tweets are defamatory of her. In addition, she appears to allege that Picard and Weeks engaged in some form of conspiracy to injure her.

109 When Picard became aware of Dr. Gill's tweets, he was concerned that any prominent Ontario physician would publicly state views that were so contrary to the consensus among physicians, scientists and public officials on subjects on which he had reported extensively. He was concerned that Dr. Gill's statements had the potential to misinform or mislead people.

110 In addition to the numerous tweets attacking Picard for his statement, several tweets were posted supporting him. Among the tweets posted on August 6, 2020 was one by the Defendant Tristan Bronca:

"The country's top health journalist (accurately) points out that this doctor maybe shouldn't be pushing a drug that is now primarily pushed by conspiracy theorists. She responds with a conspiracy-minded smear about how he's in bed with the WHO. Remarkable work."

111 At 5:55pm on August 6, 2020, Picard responded to Bronca's tweet by posting the second of his tweets that Dr. Gill complains of:

"Add the subsequent avalanche of tweets from an army of hydroxychloroquine bots and unhinged conspiracy theorists and you have a concise summary of my day."

112 As the discussion continued, at some point a "hashtag" was created that read "#IStandWithPicard". Twitter users include a hashtag symbol (#) before a relevant keyword or phrase to categorize or aggregate tweets and allow others to find them more easily.

113 Users who posted tweets that included #IStandWithPicard did so to voice their support for Picard in response to the many tweets attacking him. Among them was a tweet from Picard's colleague at The Globe and Mail, Weeks.

114 On the evening of August 6, 2020, Weeks saw that the #IStandWithPicard hashtag was trending on Twitter because Picard was being attacked by many users.

115 After reading Picard's comments, Weeks agreed with Picard's reaction of "shock." Based on her research, reading and reporting about COVID-19, Weeks knew that there was a wealth of scientific literature and research regarding the lack of efficacy of HCQ against Covid-19, the difficulty of achieving herd immunity and the necessity of a safe and effective vaccine that contradicted Dr. Gill's opinions.

116 Weeks sought to express her agreement with Picard's opinion about Dr. Gill's tweets and to show support for him in light of the negative comments that had been directed at him. She also sought to promote the dissemination of accurate information concerning COVID-19. Weeks was concerned that Dr. Gill's statements had the potential to misinform or mislead people.

117 On the evening of August 6, 2020 Weeks responded to one of Picard's tweets by posting what is essentially the only expression by her, one for which she is being sued by the Plaintiffs for millions of dollars in damages:

"André is one of the finest health communicators - anywhere - and has done more to help the public understand #COVID19 than anyone in the country. Grateful, as usual, for his no-nonsense takes and the fact he doesn't hesitate to call out BS when he sees it. #IStandWithPicard"

118 At 8:37 a.m. on August 7, 2020, Picard posted the third of his tweets about which Dr. Gill complains, in which he reiterated his concern that a Canadian pediatrician had publicly stated that a coronavirus vaccine was not necessary:

"While I appreciate all the kindness, and am flattered to have my own hash tag #IStandWithPicard, I would prefer that people focus not on trolls but on my initial concern, that a Canadian pediatrician is saying we don't need a #coronavirus vaccine. #Covid19 #antivax @cpso_ca"

119 Picard tagged the Twitter account of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario because there was an ongoing public discussion about whether and how social media use by physicians during the pandemic should be regulated, a topic of evidently great public interest.

120 Later on the morning of August 7, 2020, Dr. Jim Woodgett, a research scientist, posted a thread on Twitter in which he advocated for the dissemination and open-minded exchange of quality information and warned against drawing attention to misinformation. Dr. Woodgett suggested that Twitter users replace #IStandWithPicard with #IStandWithScience in their tweets. Among the tweets in Dr. Woodgett's thread was one that stated:

"I'm sure André appreciates the support, but (apologies to him) he doesn't need it and the hashtag serves to direct people to the source of the issue. On the contrary, antivaccine and pro-HCQ advocates have everything to gain by attracting attention. This fuels their cause."

121 In reply to this tweet on August 7, 2020, Picard posted the fourth and final of his tweets about which Dr. Gill complains, advocating for the dissemination of good science instead of engaging in pointless Twitter exchanges:

"Thank you for this thoughtful thread. I wholeheartedly agree with this point in particular. We should use our energy to promote good science, not interacting with bots, trolls and politically-driven anti-science, #antivax (what's the polite word?) dogmatists. #Covid19 #scicomm."

122 In my opinion, all of the expressions complained of made by Picard and Weeks are on matters of intense public interest.

123 Those same expressions are in the nature of fair comment on statements made by Dr. Gill on a similar platform and therefore attract that defence. The Plaintiffs have not discharged their burden of showing that his defence to all their claims has no chance of success.

124 Applying the public interest balancing test, I conclude that the need to protect the freedom of these Defendants to express such views far outweighs the considerations that might apply to any factors in favour of allowing the claims of Dr. Gill against Picard and Weeks, including the unsubstantiated claims of conspiracy, to continue. Accordingly, all claims against Picard and Weeks are dismissed.

B. Tristan Bronca

125 On August 6, 2020, Bronca read the tweet by Picard mentioned above on Twitter:

It's quite shocking to see a Canadian physician leader @dockaurG saying we don't need a #coronavirus vaccine, we just need t-cell immunity, hydroxychloroquine and "the Truth". #Covid19.

126 There were two tweets by Dr. Gill visible in Picard's tweet. Her August 4, 2020 tweet stated:

"If you have not figured out that we don't need a vaccine, you are not paying attention. #Factsnotfear".

127 The second tweet of Dr. Gill stated:

#Humanity's existing effective defences against #COVID19 to safely return to normal life now:

-The Truth

-T-cell Immunity

-Hydroxychloroquine

128 Bronca believed that Dr. Gill's statements ran counter to all the public health advice and scientific opinion Bronca was aware of at the time. Dr. Gill's tweet concerned him, especially given her job as a physician. Bronca was aware of other social media communications and tweets by Dr. Gill that were of the same vein.

129 Bronca also saw Dr. Gill's response attacking Picard on August 6, 2020:

It is quite shocking that a journalist with absolutely no medical training is attacking a MD for stating scientific facts. Not surprising given picardonhealth is a Pierre Trudeau Foundation Mentor & on its Trudeau "#COVID19 Impact Committee" to drive the political WHO narrative.

130 Bronca believed that Dr. Gill's attack on Picard had made him the target of many negative comments and criticism on Twitter. Bronca took a screenshot of the tweets of Picard and Dr. Gill and added his own opinion in his tweet, which stated:

"The country's top health journalist (accurately) points out that this doctor maybe shouldn't be pushing a drug that is now primarily pushed by conspiracy theorists. She responds with a conspiracyminded smear about how he's in bed with the WHO. Remarkable work.

131 The "country's top health journalist" refers to Picard. "This doctor" refers to Dr. Gill. The drug referred to in the Bronca Tweet is hydroxychloroquine.

132 Through his work with Medical Post, Bronca had been immersed in reports of the studies and analysis being done relating to the efficacy of hydroxychloroquine as a treatment for Covid-19. Bronca had also spoken with medical experts who were well versed on the scientific literature on the topic of hydroxychloroquine who did not believe it was an effective treatment for Covid-19. By August 6, 2020, Bronca understood that the majority of the scientific evidence showed that hydroxychloroquine was not an effective treatment for Covid-19.

133 Bronca's tweet addresses Dr. Gill's attack on Picard and her accusation that he is driving "the political WHO narrative". Bronca understood that "WHO" refers to the World Health Organization. He understood the word "narrative", as used by Dr. Gill, is a common buzzword used by some to characterize the allegedly nefarious activities of global or high-powered organizations and the alleged lies they tell to cover up or disguise these activities.

134 Bronca thought that Dr. Gill's attack on Picard suggested that he was an active part of those allegedly nefarious activities and lies. Bronca had seen no evidence that Picard was so involved. It appeared to him that by using the language she did, Dr. Gill was attempting to smear Picard and subject him to negative comments and online hate.

135 Bronca's tweet on August 6, 2020, questions surrounding the development of effective treatments for Covid-19, and the development of vaccines for the prevention of Covid-19 were matters of great public interest to both the medical profession and the public at large. Bronca believes he should be able to publicly express his concerns about statements that run counter to public health advice and scientific opinion without the risk of lengthy and costly litigation for doing so.

136 The Bronca tweet falls within the statutory definition of expression, which is expansive. Dr. Gill's claim against Bronca clearly "arises from" the Bronca tweet. In August 2020, and for many months prior to and after, the issue of treatments for and vaccinations for Covid-19 were matters of great public interest due to the global Covid-19 pandemic. The Bronca tweet, which responded to what he fairly considered to be misleading information regarding hydroxychloroquine as treatment for Covid-19, related to a matter of public interest.

137 In my view, the Bronca tweet constitutes fair comment on a matter of public interest. This defence has been described as one that:

"Protects obstinate, or foolish, or offensive statements of opinion, or inference, or judgment, provided certain conditions are satisfied. The word "fair" refers to limits to what any honest person, however opinionated or prejudiced, would express upon the basis of the relevant facts."

138 The Bronca tweet was based on facts. As of August 6, 2020 the majority of the scientific evidence showed that hydroxychloroquine was not an effective treatment for Covid-19. In addition, the use of hydroxychloroquine in the treatment of Covid-19 had been promoted by Alex Jones and on websites like the Gateway Pundit, both of which had a history of promoting conspiracy theories. With respect to the second sentence of the Bronca tweet, it is a fact that Dr. Gill accused Picard of "driv[ing] the political WHO narrative" in her August 6, 2020 response to Picard.

139 The Bronca tweet was also recognizable as comment by any reasonable reader of the tweet.

140 Accordingly, there are grounds to believe that Bronca's defence of fair comment has a real prospect of success. The Plaintiffs have not discharged their onus to show otherwise.

141 In the weighing of the interests pursuant to s. 137(4)(b), the Plaintiffs cannot satisfy the requirement that the harm suffered by them as a result of Bronca's expression is sufficiently serious such that the public interest in permitting the action to continue outweighs the public interest in protecting that expression. Indeed, the public interest in the protection of the right of Bronca to speak about such matters of intense public interest strongly favours dismissal of these claims.

142 Accordingly, all claims against Bronca are dismissed.

C. Dr. Jacobs, Dr. Cohen, Dr. Nataros, Dr. Alam and Dr. Sharkawy

143 The Plaintiffs have claimed against these five Defendants in defamation on the basis of their various Twitter posts, and provision by them of commentary in articles published by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, as follows:

- (a) That a single tweet by Dr. Sharkawy, posted August 6, 2020 in response to the Picard tweet is defamatory of Dr. Gill;
- (b) That three tweets by Dr. Jacobs dated August 7, 10 and 12, 2020 are defamatory of Dr. Gill;
- (c) Against Dr. Cohen on the basis of a series of tweets posted between August 6, 2020 and August 11, 2020, and comments made by Dr. Cohen in CBC's August 10, 2020 article "Ontario doctor subject of complaints after COVID-19 tweets", and in CBC's video news story "Complaints Filed against Ontario doctor after COVID-19 tweets" dated August 10, 2020;
- (d) Against Dr. Nataros on the basis of a series of tweets posted between August 6, 2020 to October 21, 2020, and comments made by Dr. Nataros in CBC's August 10, 2020 article "Ontario doctor subject of complaints after COVID-19 tweets", and in CBC's video news story "Complaints Filed against Ontario doctor after COVID-19 tweets" dated August 10, 2020;
- (e) That a tweet posted by Dr. Alam on August 6, 2020 in response to the Picard tweet is defamatory of Dr. Gill.

144 The Plaintiffs have asserted several causes of action as against these Defendants broadly as a whole, with little to no particularization of alleged individual involvement. The Plaintiffs plead these Defendants are liable in negligence, conspiracy, and "breach of the doctor Defendants' professional obligations".

145 The Plaintiffs' claims of conspiracy are deficiently pleaded bare assertions. The pleadings are bald, overly speculative, or simply restated legal principles rather than pleaded material facts. The Plaintiffs' pleading fails to set out any alleged "agreement" with particularity, lumps these Defendants all together, and gives no particulars of damages. In my view, it is clear from the pleadings the conspiracy claim will fail.

146 Further, the Plaintiffs have failed to meet their burden to adduce any evidence reasonably capable of belief to establish grounds to believe a conspiracy of this nature could have substantial merit or, for that matter, any merit at all.

147 The Plaintiffs also broadly assert a negligence claim as against these Defendants. The general law of negligence requires that a claim in negligence be based on a duty of care owed to them by these Defendants. The Plaintiffs assert that a special duty of care exists "as set out in protocol" when a physician makes representations or remarks about a fellow doctor to the public. No such duty of care between or among physicians exists such that a cause of action may arise.

148 The Plaintiffs also assert that these Defendants are liable to the Plaintiffs in "breach of the doctor Defendants' professional obligations". The Plaintiffs have provided no basis in the record or law to support a breach of professional obligation gives rise to an independent cause of action. The Plaintiffs thereby fail in their burden to establish that there are grounds to believe the proceeding has substantial merit.

149 The Plaintiffs' claim against Dr. Sharkawy pertains to a single tweet made on August 6, 2020, which is alleged to be defamatory to Dr. Gill.

150 In response to the Picard tweet, on August 6, 2020 Dr. Sharkawy tweeted the following:
 dockaurG Curious.,who exactly are the "Concerned Doctors of Ontario" and do they espouse your views?
 The rest of us Ontario MDs are quite "concerned" that you are spreading very dangerous misinformation that will cost lives #Accountability.

151 Dr. Sharkawy embedded the Picard tweet, and by extension, the two embedded tweets of Dr. Gill embedded in the Picard tweet.

152 The Plaintiffs have the onus of showing that that none of the defences raised by Dr. Sharkawy are legally tenable or supported by evidence that is reasonably capable of belief such that they can be said to have no real prospect of success. Dr. Sharkawy relies on the defences of fair comment and justification. In my view the Sharkawy tweet meets all the requirements of the defence of fair comment. Dr. Sharkawy was responding to the fact Dr. Gill had publicly posted certain tweets regarding COVID-19 public health measures in the midst of the global COVID-19 pandemic, to the effect that COVID-19 vaccines were not necessary, and HCQ was an appropriate treatment for COVID-19. Dr. Sharkawy's statement that "[t]he rest of us Ontario MDs are quite concerned" was fair comment or at least presents a strong defence of fair comment.

153 The Sharkawy tweet further satisfies the requirement that any person could honestly express that opinion on the proved facts. The public health guidance at the time, and to this day, is contrary to the views expressed by Dr. Gill in her August 4 tweet (about vaccines) and August 6 tweet (about HCQ) that Dr. Sharkawy commented his concerns about. Any reasonable person could form the same concerns and opinion on the proved facts in light of the conflict with generally accepted public health guidance.

154 The Plaintiffs allege Dr. Jacobs' August 7, 2020 tweet is defamatory. Dr. Jacobs's August 7, 2020 tweet responds to two prior tweets of Dr. Gill, which are attached to Dr. Jacobs tweet as a screenshot. Dr. Jacobs August 7, 2020 tweet reads as follows:

No, we're not living through a scandal. We're living through one of the deadliest pandemics in the last century. What is most shocking is a medical doctor pushing conspiracy theories.

This needs to stop. #Cdnpoli #COVID19 #IStandWithPicard
#vaccine #coronavirus

[Attached screenshot of Dr. Gill's July 3 tweet]

We're living thru one of deadliest #BigPharma scandals in history. Most shocking/frightening--majority oblivious. #HCQWorks as prophylaxis & early treatment in #COVID19. HCQ doesn't work for greedy BigPharma, politicians abusing power, corrupted WHO/CCP, bought out media/academics

[The July 3 tweet attached a June 30, 2020 tweet by Dr. Gill, which was also attached to Dr. Jacobs August 7, 2020 tweet]

Irrational fear is driven by politicians abusing power, media misinformation, unethical academics, BigPharma COIs & corrupted WHO co-opted by CCP. Science & medicine have been hijacked & are being exploited for power & greed...

155 There are no grounds to believe the Jacobs tweet is capable of bearing the defamatory meaning alleged in paragraph 151, including such imputations as to "call into question Dr. Gill's mental stability" or "suggest that she was/is endangering the lives of her patients".

156 Further, the Plaintiffs cannot meet their burden under s. 137.1(4)(a)(ii) to show that there are grounds to believe Dr. Jacobs has no valid defence of fair comment. Dr. Jacobs further relies on the defence of fair comment. The Jacobs August 7 tweet satisfies the test for the defence of fair comment in that it is based on fact (Dr. Gill's tweets, the facts on which his comment was based, were included in the Jacobs August 7 Tweet), recognizable as comment (Dr. Jacobs' statement would be properly construed by the reasonable reader as reflecting his conclusion or inference arising from Dr. Gill's embedded tweets), could honestly be made by any person (Dr. Jacobs inference that Dr. Gill was pushing conspiracy theories has a clear linkage to the facts of Dr. Gill's statements that "HCQ doesn't work for greedy BigPharma, politicians abusing power, corrupted WHO/CCP, bought out media/academics" which by definition is a conspiracy theory).

157 The Plaintiffs further allege Dr. Jacobs' August 10, 2020 tweet, which attached and quoted from the August 10, 2020 Canadian Broadcasting Corporation article about Dr. Gill entitled "Ontario doctor subject of complaints after COVID-19 tweets" is defamatory. The body of Dr. Jacobs' August 10, 2020 tweet contains only the title of the article, and a direct quote from the article "It's important that physicians recognize the influence they may have on social media, particularly when it comes to public health", included in the article from a spokesperson of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario. Dr. Jacobs replied to the tweet "The fact that so many people on this thread still believe that the current research supports the use of hydroxychloroquine, when the opposite is true, is exactly why it is so important for physicians to be responsible in what they say on social media".

158 Further, there are no grounds to believe that Dr. Jacobs' August 10, 2020 tweet is defamatory in that it would lower Dr. Gill's reputation in the eyes of a reasonable person. An excerpt of a quote from the CPSO, coupled with a statement that it is important for physicians to be responsible on social media is incapable of bearing the defamatory meaning alleged. The Plaintiffs cannot establish that there are grounds to believe that the defence of fair comment will not succeed.

159 Dr. Jacobs' August 10, 2020 tweet satisfies all elements of the defence of fair comment: (i) Public Interest: it was made on a matter of public interest, addressing physician influence on social media with respect to public health; (ii) Based on Facts: The August 10, 2020 tweet attached the CBC article, providing the full requisite factual backdrop; (iii) Recognisable as Comment: Dr. Jacobs' statement that the fact that many believed HCQ was an effective treatment for COVID-19 reflected why it was so important for physicians to be responsible on social media is clearly recognizable to the "reasonable reader" as comment. Any reasonable reader would understand that Dr. Jacobs shared the CBC article, then provided his opinion and conclusion regarding the article as comment below; (iv) Could honestly be made by any person: Dr. Jacobs' comment in the August 10, 2020 tweet is in agreement with the statement of the CPSO spokesperson mentioned in the article, demonstrating two commentators could honestly come to the same conclusion on the same known facts. (v) Absence of Malice: Dr. Jacobs posted his comment in good-faith, without malice. There are no grounds to believe the fair comment defence has no real prospect of success.

160 The Plaintiffs further claim that a tweet made by Dr. Jacobs on August 12, 2020 is defamatory of Dr. Gill. The Plaintiffs cannot establish there are grounds to believe this claim has substantial merit. For a statement to be defamatory it must refer to the Plaintiff. Dr. Jacobs' August 12, 2020 Tweet does not refer to the Plaintiff, nor did the attached article. No connection was drawn to Dr. Gill in the tweet thread.

161 Dr. Jacobs further asserts a defence of qualified privilege with respect to all three tweets that the Plaintiffs allege to be defamatory. As a physician, Dr. Jacobs has a moral and professional duty to: educate the public to ensure that medical knowledge is appropriately conveyed to facilitate health promotion and disease prevention; interpret information given out by health authorities during emergencies; and to participate in setting the standards of his profession. The public has an interest in receiving that information. There are no grounds to believe that this defence of qualified privilege has no real prospect of success in these circumstances. Indeed, it is a strong defence.

162 Some of the impugned expressions of Dr. Nataros are alleged to be defamatory on the basis that they accuse Dr. Gill of spreading "misinformation", including his contribution to the August 10, 2020 CBC News Video, in which he states.

This is a threat to me and my practice and my professional integrity here in British Columbia. It is a threat to my 15,000 patients to have a Canadian licensed physician promoting misinformation that is harmful.

163 Further impugned expressions of Dr. Nataros appear to relate to allegations that his statements either encourage the public to lodge a complaint against Dr. Gill, or relate to statements Dr. Nataros made referencing the fact he had felt an obligation to report Dr. Gill to the CPSO. A further Impugned Expression relates to a statement that the "unanimous consensus of #MedTwitter is clear this @doekaurGMD ain't a leader among peers."

164 There are no grounds to believe that the defence of fair comment relied upon by Dr. Nataros has no real prospect of success. Dr. Nataros made these comments: (i) On a matter of public interest: his expressions are addressing the physician regulation and the public health response to the COVID-19 pandemic; (ii) Based on Fact: The existence of the COVID-19 pandemic was broadly known and Dr. Nataros either responds to a Twitter thread, attaches his letter of complaint to the CPSO or the August 10, 2020 CBC Article to the expressions, providing the requisite factual backdrop; (iii) Recognizable as Comment: Dr. Nataros' statements are all recognizable as his opinion. The statement that he "took responsibility for a Colleague's misconduct", expresses his opinion of Dr. Gill's conduct, not a factual statement that there had been a finding of misconduct, (iv) could honestly be made by any person: Given the publicly available health information available at the time, any person could reasonably express the same opinion; (v) Absence of Malice: Dr. Nataros' only motivation in posting the impugned expressions was his concern for patients and the impact of misinformation on the public health response to the COVID-19 pandemic.

165 Several of Dr. Cohen's tweets and expressions between August 6, 2020 and August 10, 2020 are alleged to be defamatory of Dr. Gill. The Plaintiffs cannot meet their burden to show that there are grounds to believe these expressions are defamatory and thus that the claim has any real chance of success, or there are grounds to believe Dr. Cohen has no valid defences.

166 Certain of the impugned expressions of Dr. Cohen's which are alleged to be defamatory of Dr. Gill pertain to statements around Dr. Gill "blocking" people on Twitter. The Plaintiffs cannot meet their burden to show these statements are defamatory. There is no basis to discern that "blocking" someone on Twitter would tend to lower Dr. Gill's reputation in the eyes of a reasonable person. Dr. Cohen's statements use wording such as "blocked nearly every other Ontario Doctor on Twitter" which the reasonable reader would understand to not be a literal statement that nearly every doctor was blocked, but a hyperbolic statement, the sting of which is that Dr. Gill has blocked many Ontario physicians. As such, there are no grounds to believe that Dr. Cohen's defence of fair comment has no real prospect of success with respect to these expressions.

167 Dr. Cohen also further relies on the defence of qualified privilege with respect to all impugned expressions. As a physician, Dr. Cohen believed she has a moral and professional duty to educate the public to ensure that medical knowledge is appropriately conveyed to facilitate health promotion and disease preventions, interpret information given out by health authorities during emergencies, and to participate in setting the standards of her profession. The public has an interest in receiving that information. There are no grounds to believe that this defence has no real prospect of success.

168 The words of Dr. Alam's August 6, 2020 tweet on their face are not defamatory. Dr. Alam expresses her view that the medical evidence on the use of HCQ is "shaky", and that a COVID-19 vaccine is needed. While Dr. Alam's view may differ from that of Dr. Gill, a difference of professional opinion does not constitute defamation. There is nothing in Dr. Alam's tweet that would tend to lower either Plaintiff's reputation in the eyes of a reasonable person. The Plaintiffs cannot establish there are grounds to believe the defamation action as against Dr. Alam for the August 6, 2020 tweet has substantial merit, as the words are simply not capable of bearing a defamatory meaning.

169 The Plaintiffs also cannot establish there are grounds to believe that Dr. Alam has no valid defence. There are no grounds to believe that her defence of fair comment has little prospect of success. Dr. Alam's August 6, 2020 tweet satisfies the test for fair comment: (i) Is made on a matter of public interest: the tweet is addressing the public health response and treatment options with respect to the COVID-19 pandemic; (ii) Based on Fact: The factual underpinning of the Picard Tweet is attached to Dr. Alam's tweet, and the existence of the COVID-19 pandemic was broadly known; (iii) Recognizable as Comment: Dr. Alam's statement that evidence of HCQ is "shaky" and that the need for a COVID-19 vaccine is real reflect Dr. Alam's opinion; (iv) Could honestly be made by any person: Given the publicly available health information available at the time, any person could reasonable person could express the same opinion; and (v) Absence of Malice: The evidence supports that Dr. Alam was not motivated by malice, but by her good-faith belief that an appropriate vaccine is vital to combat the COVID-19 virus.

170 The burden of proof is on the Plaintiffs to show on a balance of probabilities that that (a) they likely have suffered or will suffer harm; (b) that such harm is as a result of the expression established under s. 137.1(3); and, (c) that the corresponding public interest in allowing the underlying proceeding to continue outweighs the deleterious effects on expression and public participation.

171 Although a fully developed damages brief may not be necessary on a s. 137.1 motion, in this case there is simply a complete dearth of any evidence on the motion to show harm, or linking these Defendants' expressions to any of the undefined damages that are claimed by the Plaintiffs.

172 The Plaintiffs' claims of harm are completely undifferentiated. The Plaintiffs fail to even allege specific claims of damage with respect to each individual Defendant or expression, let alone provide any evidence of a causal link of harm or damage arising from each expression.

173 This is particularly problematic in the context of this case, as even if the Plaintiffs were able to establish harm, there are many potential causes of the harm that the Plaintiffs claim to have suffered. Evidence of a causal link of harm arising from the impugned expression is required.

174 Evidence of a causal link between the expression and the harm is especially important, in the circumstances of the present motion, where there may be sources other than these Defendants' expressions that may have caused the Plaintiffs harm, including self-inflicted harm by the Plaintiffs themselves as a result of the professional and public criticism received for controversial statements and media appearances.

175 These allegations appear to be part of a larger tactical campaign in opposition to COVID-19 public health measures, designed to benefit from the publicity of the claim to promote public health and policy views and to silence those who express views contrary to those of the Plaintiffs.

176 The public interest of protecting the expression of these Defendants significantly outweighs any public interest in permitting the proceeding to continue. There are numerous relevant factors at the weighing stage which weigh heavily in favour of protecting their expressions.

177 These Defendants were not motivated by any malice or ill-will towards the Plaintiffs. Rather, the defendant Physicians' expressions were motivated by good-faith efforts to protect the public from misinformation, and provide the public with health information in the context of an unprecedented global pandemic:

- (a) Dr. Sharkawy expressed concern that misinformation espoused to the public could result in Canadians choosing not to get vaccinated for COVID-19 or using unapproved treatments for COVID-19 that were not medically accepted. His expression was motivated by a moral duty as a physician to express his views to the public out of concern for public safety;
- (b) Dr. Jacobs's expressions were motivated by an intention to inform his followers of appropriate approved treatments for COVID-19, and a belief that properly informing the public could save lives. Dr. Jacobs emphasized the importance that the public receive a clear and consistent message when it comes to public health messaging, as harm to patients can arise when a physician provides an opinion that does not align with information from public health or government;
- (c) Dr. Cohen's expressions were motivated by concern about the public health impacts of Dr. Gill's tweets with respect to the need for COVID-19 vaccinations and the use of hydroxychloroquine. Dr. Cohen felt a duty as a physician to offer her views in the public interest.
- (d) Dr. Nataros felt a duty as a physician to offer his views to the public and address misinformation about COVID-19. Dr. Nataros' expressions were motivated by concern for public safety arising from the spread of misinformation on COVID-19 treatments and the efficacy of vaccines.

178 The expressions of these Defendants in seeking to address misinformation are intimately tied to the search for truth, a core value underlying freedom of expression. The expression of these Defendants is therefore to be afforded a high weight in the s. 137.1(4)(b) weighing exercise.

179 If this proceeding were allowed to continue, its chilling effects would have an impact well beyond the parties to this case. There is a real risk that the effects of this proceeding will stifle the speech of the Defendants, and deter other physicians, journalist, scientists, and other members of the public from engaging in public discussion and discourse about potential misinformation on matters of public health in the future. The public has a clear interest in discussion and discourse about matters of public health.

180 Even on a generous interpretation of the limited evidence adduced by the Plaintiffs, the harm likely to be or already suffered by the Plaintiffs lies at the very low end of the spectrum as does the public interest in allowing the proceeding to continue. The balancing test produces a result that favours that urged by these Defendants.

181 Accordingly, all claims as against these Defendants should be dismissed.

D. Dr. Van Aerde

182 On August 4, 2020, Dr. Gill tweeted:

"If you have not yet figured out that we don't need a vaccine, you are not paying attention. #FactsNotFear".

183 Dr. Gill suggests in her Affidavit that this tweet was taken "out of context and distorted", and it was made in response to an announcement made "moments prior" by Dr. Theresa Tam at a press conference. She states this was a "singular 'vaccine Tweet'". And yet, she also posted "[w]e don't need a #SARSCoV2 vaccine" on July 8, 2020, a full month before Dr. Tam's press conference. Her clearly stated public position against COVID-19 vaccines is not affected by context.

184 In another tweet, dated August 6, 2020, which was removed from Twitter for violating its rules, Dr. Gill stated:

"#Humanity's existing effective defences against #COVID19 to safely return to normal life now includes: - Truth, -T-cell Immunity, Hydroxychloroquine."

185 On August 6, 2020, Dr. Van Aerde, shocked by the anti-vaccine rhetoric of a fellow pediatrician, made the following expressions on Twitter and Facebook (collectively, the "Expressions"):

"Requesting @Twitter and @TwitterSupport remove account @dockaurg for misinformation against vaccination and in favour of hydroxychloroquine and misrepresenting Canadian physicians."

"Another Twitter account hacked? I am sorry if that is the case, But here is another of your tweets attached with unprofessional lies. As a colleague Pediatrician I have to admit that you are dangerous to children. How do you come up with this? Why Don't you quote evidence?"

"I was blocked too... after I called out the untruths and supported Andre Picard. Some of us have requested Twitter to remove her account. She was trained in Western as Pediatrician. She has tweeted before on bogus treatments, lots of trolls followers. There is a call for her unprofessionalism to be looked at by cspo. Somebody mentioned she is part of our FB community, and I suggest for her to be removed for lack of professionalism and scholarship as per CANMEDS2105."

186 Dr. Gill "blocked" Dr. Van Aerde shortly after these tweets were posted. Blocking on Twitter prevented Dr. Van Aerde from viewing and responding to Dr. Gill's tweets from his own Twitter account.

187 There is no dispute that Dr. Van Aerde is the author of the expressions and that those expressions are captured by the statutory definition of expression under s. 137.1(2).

188 Dr. Van Aerde's expressions relate directly to the COVID-19 global pandemic and information and disinformation about COVID-19. The expressions respond to Dr. Gill's propositions that "we don't need a vaccine", and all we need is "...-Truth, -T-cell Immunity, Hydroxychloroquine".

189 No issue falls more squarely into the definition of a matter of public interest than a global pandemic. The public has a genuine stake in the matter of debates about pandemics and COVID-19 health treatments.

190 To the extent that the content of the expressions made by Dr. Van Aerde are comments, rather than statements of fact, then there are reasonable grounds to believe that fair comment is a valid defence for him.

191 The expressions are based on factual evidence that vaccines are a critical tool to end the pandemic and supported by multiple health agencies and organizations. Any person could honestly express that opinion on those facts. At least 22 other people did, nine of whom are Canadian physicians, as evidenced by this litigation.

192 Dr. Van Aerde's expressions are very likely also protected by a defence of qualified privilege. The occasion here that triggers qualified privilege is the need to respond to an influential physician using her Twitter platform to spread misinformation in the middle of a pandemic. Misinformation about treatments and vaccines could have serious and widespread health consequences. Dr. Van Aerde had a professional, social, and moral duty to respond to Dr. Gill's statements and challenge her views.

193 The Plaintiff has failed to adduce any evidence of a conspiracy. She provides no evidence in her affidavit of a conspiracy. The Statement of Claim makes bald allegations that, because Dr. Van Aerde was on the same Facebook group as other defendants, there is necessarily some conspiracy between them to harm Dr. Gill. She argues that the Defendants, "like a pack of hyenas" coordinated an attack on her without any evidence to support her claim.

194 Dr. Gill also includes negligence as a cause of action in her claim but Dr. Gill's only evidence of negligence is adopting of allegations in her Statement of Claim as sworn facts. A cause of action in negligence is not properly set out in her pleadings. Dr. Gill is really claiming negligence because she was defamed. If she was defamed, the proper cause of action is defamation, which is her only plausible cause of action.

195 The final step involves weighing the harm suffered against the interest in protecting the expression made. Dr. Van Aerde was somewhat harsh in his comments but not gratuitously so and the focus is not on whether the expression should have been more polite. Dr. Gill has suffered no harm as a result of the expressions of Dr. Van Aerde. The imposition of subjective and moralistic limits on debates, and in particular on those of scientists amidst a pandemic, is not in the public interest. When the final comparative weighing step of the test is applied, I consider that the correct result is that all claims against Dr. Van Aerde be dismissed.

E. Dr. Fraser

196 On October 1, 2020, Dr Gill "quote-tweeted" (re-posted, with commentary), her own earlier tweet from September 17, 2020, which read:

Why is there fear re meaningless "cases"? Up to 90% false+ d/t high PCR cycle thresholds on ppl who are not infectious. Even among the small % of actual true positives: it is good news b/c ICU adms & deaths are at all-time lows. These healthy ppl are contributing to herd immunity

197 Dr Gill's October 1 tweet added the following additional commentary:

This cannot be stressed enough. Rising "cases" amongst young & healthy ppl, without equal rise in ICU adms or deaths directly as a result of the virus, is very encouraging news: it means we are building natural community/herd immunity which will protect elderly & high-risk groups

198 Dr. Fraser saw Dr. Gill's October 1 tweet and understood it to suggest that Ontario was developing natural herd immunity to COVID-19--a proposition that he considered to be dangerous misinformation about the risk of COVID-19 transmission that could lull Ontarians into abandoning public health measures at a time when infections were on the rise. Dr. Fraser was concerned that Dr. Gill's tweet would undermine public health efforts that aimed to reduce the spread of COVID-19 by encouraging the use of masks and social distancing, and reducing contacts.

199 Dr. Fraser's understanding at the time, based on his review of infection rates in Ontario, was that nowhere near the percentage of the population required to achieve herd immunity had been infected and recovered from COVID-19 as of October 1, 2020. He was concerned that members of the public would read Dr. Gill's tweet and understand that precautions were no longer necessary because the population had achieved, or had nearly achieved, herd immunity. He feared this could cause people to disregard public health guidelines and expose themselves to a higher risk of infection. He was particularly concerned that individuals who read the tweet would be more likely to accept her statement as truthful and authoritative because Dr. Gill's Twitter profile highlights her physician credentials.

200 Dr. Fraser had been closely following reporting of the nascent "second wave" of COVID-19 infections developing in Europe and had observed that Ontario appeared to be lagging a couple of weeks behind but following a similar trend. Of course, a "second wave" of infections in Ontario did ultimately occur, reaching its peak later that fall.

201 Based on these concerns, Dr. Fraser posted a small number of tweets in response to Dr. Gill's October 1 tweet, and in response to her followers who engaged with him subsequently, in an effort to push back against what he considered to be misinformation that could have dangerous repercussions if left unchallenged. As a publicly funded scientist, Dr. Fraser felt that he had a responsibility to voice his concerns so that Dr. Gill's followers and others who saw her tweet would be aware that her views did not represent the consensus in the scientific community.

202 Almost immediately after Dr. Fraser published his first tweet, Dr. Gill blocked him from her Twitter page, making it impossible for him to engage with her. She also "quotetweeted" Dr. Fraser's tweet and referred to Dr. Fraser using the same language about which she complains in this action.

203 The impugned tweets relate to the COVID-19 pandemic, and the dangers of misinformation regarding the risk of transmission and the need for public health measures in response to the pandemic. That is a matter of significant public interest. One can scarcely imagine a topic of greater public interest.

204 The first impugned tweet, which Dr. Fraser posted on October 1, 2020 in response to Dr. Gill's tweet, reads:
Can you please stop with this herd immunity garbage? What proportion of the population is seropositive at this stage in your opinion? 80%? Or below 5%? This is simply lunatic stuff. I can't believe you are qualified as an MD.

205 Applying the proper approach to determining meanings, the tweet means that the Ontario population had not reached herd immunity to COVID-19 as of October 1, 2020 and there was no reasonable basis to suggest that Ontario had reached or was close to reaching herd immunity. It was therefore irresponsible for Dr. Gill to tell the public that Ontario had reached or was close to reaching herd immunity.

206 The reference to "lunatic stuff" is understood reasonably as a reference to the suggestion that Ontario had reached herd immunity--it does not convey the meaning that Dr. Gill is a lunatic. If it were to be understood as referring to Dr. Gill, it is mere vulgar abuse, an insult that might hurt Dr. Gill's feelings but that is not actionable and would not harm her reputation in the eyes of a right-thinking person.

207 The second impugned tweet was a response Dr. Fraser posted to a tweet from Martin Kulldorff, which defended Dr. Gill after Dr. Fraser's first tweet. Dr. Fraser wrote:

Let's at least agree that there is a substantial history here of Kulvinder pushing fact-free COVID myths.

I also had anonymous threats to my personal email account for pointing out her skews and misrepresentations. Not the behaviour of a reasonable person I would say.

208 The tweet meant and was understood to mean that prior to her October 1 tweet, Dr. Gill had made claims about COVID-19 that were not grounded in fact. The mention of "anonymous threats to my personal email account" and "Not the behaviour of a reasonable person" meant and were understood to mean that an anonymous supporter of Dr. Gill had made threats to Dr. Fraser's personal email account because Dr. Fraser had pointed out Dr. Gill's misrepresentations of fact. That supporter's conduct was not the behaviour of a reasonable person. That comment was not objectively understood to refer to Dr. Gill herself.

209 Dr. Fraser posted the third and fourth impugned tweets in response to one of Dr. Gill's supporters, who had criticised one of his tweets. The tweets read:

Dr. Gill was previously reprimanded for spreading untruths about COVID. She was pushing HCQ and suggested vaccine was unnecessary. She suggests that the low deaths SO FAR in Ontario's 2ND wave is due to herd immunity...nonsensical as I said. I stand by my condemnation of her views the reason I pushed back hard against her fact-free tweets is that this is the second time she is spreading harmful and dangerous views. Last time she was forced to retract her tweets. It is disgraceful that an MD continues to push illogical and wrong views during a pandemic.

210 These tweets mean and were understood to mean that Dr. Fraser understood Dr. Gill had been admonished previously for making inaccurate statements about hydroxychloroquine as a COVID treatment and that vaccines are not needed and that she was forced to retract those tweets and Dr. Gill is again giving the public inaccurate and potentially harmful information about COVID, this time relating to herd immunity. Further, it is unreasonable to suggest that the low deaths in Ontario's second wave as of October 4 are due to herd immunity.

211 Finally, the fifth impugned tweet was a comment Dr. Fraser made in response to a tweet by the Defendant, Marco Prado. It reads:

Thank you Marco! I feel it is our responsibility as academics to try to push back against dangerous and wrong views that encourage complacency and a false sense of security during this pandemic. If this was the first time Dr. Gill had done this, it could be a mistake. It wasn't.

212 This tweet meant and was understood to mean that academics have a responsibility during the pandemic to speak out when others express views that may lead members of the public to stop taking appropriate precautions and increasing their risk of contracting COVID-19. Further, Dr. Gill's comments cannot be overlooked as a mistake because on Dr. Fraser's understanding it is not the first time she has published comments during the pandemic that are not based on fact and may have dangerous implications.

213 Even if Dr. Gill were to satisfy the substantial merit requirement, she cannot meet her burden of demonstrating that Dr. Fraser has no valid defence to the claim. Dr. Gill must show there are grounds to believe that Dr. Fraser's defences have no real prospect of success. She must show that none of the defences are legally tenable or supported by evidence that is reasonably capable of belief. There must be a basis in the record and the law, taking into account the stage of the proceeding, to support a finding that the defences do not tend to weigh more favour of Dr. Fraser. Dr. Gill has not met that burden.

214 The comments expressed in the impugned tweets have a nexus to the underlying facts. A person could honestly have made the same comments Dr. Fraser did based on the facts Dr. Fraser knew and as summarised above. Moreover, Dr. Fraser honestly believed in the comments he expressed. He believed that Dr. Gill's tweet suggested Ontario had reached, or was close to reaching herd immunity; that Ontario was in fact not close to COVID-19 herd immunity; and that it was unreasonable and dangerous for a physician to suggest otherwise to the public because it could result in individuals refusing to follow public health measures to reduce the transmission of the virus. Dr. Fraser honestly believed, based on the CBC article, that Dr. Gill had previously posted a tweet containing inaccurate information about COVID-19 and that the tweet had been taken down from Twitter for violating its rules--a public rebuke or reprimand.

215 Dr. Fraser's unchallenged evidence is that he did not act out of any malice or ill-will toward Dr. Gill. Dr. Fraser did not and does not know Dr. Gill and had never interacted with her before his initial tweet in response to her October 1, 2020 tweet. He did not intend to cause any harm to Dr. Gill but his predominant motive was to ensure the public was not swayed by inaccurate, misinformation during a significant public health crisis. His only intention was to provide an opposing informed perspective regarding the appropriate interpretation of public health information relating to COVID-19 for the benefit of Dr. Gill's Twitter followers and for anyone else who became aware of Dr. Gill's October 1, 2020 tweet.

216 Dr. Gill's and Dr. Fraser's tweets were public communications related to the appropriate public health response to a pandemic. At the time, Dr. Fraser perceived that members of the Canadian public were genuinely confused about the risk of transmission of COVID-19 and what precautions were necessary to reduce the risk of transmission of this potentially deadly disease. There is a compelling social interest in attaching privilege to communications such as Dr. Fraser's impugned tweets, which respond to and debate statements made on a public forum relating to pressing matters of public health.

217 To the extent Dr. Gill has suffered any harm, she has not shown any causal link to Dr. Fraser's impugned tweets. There are many potential causes of the harm Dr. Gill claims to have suffered. Dr. Gill herself is the most obvious cause of damage to her reputation. Other potential causes include the comments and criticisms of others. When Dr. Fraser published the impugned tweets, Dr. Gill was already the subject of criticism on social media for spreading misinformation about COVID-19.

218 There is great public interest in protecting Dr. Fraser's expressions which are of substantial importance. He spoke up against what he considered to be misinformation that could lead individuals to ignore public health recommendations and measures designed to mitigate the risk of COVID-19 pandemic. A public health emergency in which informed, knowledgeable experts are stifled from commenting publicly to combat misinformation is a significant threat to the general public interest.

219 When the ultimate balancing test is applied, the interests and factors that might favour allowing this action against Dr. Fraser to continue are easily and far outweighed by the public interest in protecting speech of this nature. Accordingly, all claims against Dr. Fraser are dismissed.

E. Dr. Schwartz, Timothy Caulfield, Dr. Prato and Dr. Fazel

220 On August 6, 2020, Professor Caulfield responded to a tweet posted by André Picard on the same date in which Picard indicated he was shocked to see Dr. Gill tweeting that we do not need a coronavirus vaccine, but rather that we just need T-cell immunity, HCQ, and the truth:

Incredible. A leading MD spreading #misinformation about vaccines & value of lockdown? Pushing disproven #Hydroxychloroquine?

She has already blocked me (preemptive?), so can't see all. Will @cpsoc_ca explore? She's involved (leads?) "Concerned Ontario Doctors".

221 Following his above tweet, Professor Caulfield then copied and pasted the following two tweets from Dr. Gill (the "#FactsNotFear tweets"), over which he included the letters "WTF":

There is absolutely no medical or scientific reason for this prolonged, harmful, and illogical lockdown.
#FactsNotFear

222 On August 6, 2020, Professor Caulfield responded to a tweet by Dr. Michelle Cohen regarding the spread of misinformation on social media by tweeting "Go Team".

223 On August 6, 2020, Dr. Fazel responded to the #FactsNotFear tweets as follows:

I'll just put this here. #VaccinesWork #vaccination #VaccinesforALL [infographic from the Public Health Agency of Canada titled: "Vaccines Work", outlining the efficacy of vaccines for whopping cough, measles, chickenpox, mumps, diphtheria, and polio]

224 On August 6, 2020, Dr. Fazel responded to a tweet by Professor Caulfield of the same date regarding a leading physician spreading misinformation:

Just like any other profession, unfortunately, even in medicine you have a few rotten apples. This is why it's crucial to improve evidence-based literacy in the community.

225 On August 6, 2020, Dr. Fazel responded to a post by Dr. Gill by tweeting:

There is a difference between having opposing views that are backed by evidence and spreading misinformation.

226 On July 22, 2020, Dr. Schwartz quoted a tweet regarding a comment by Dr. Anthony Fauci on vaccine antibodies and T-cells, and he added the following:

Apparently "T-Cell Immunity" is the new rallying cry for anti-science plague enthusiasts who argue that many more people are immune than measured in serosurveys (which measure antibodies).

[thinking emoji] I'd listen to Dr. Fauci [world emoji]'s pre-eminent immunologist on this one 227 Dr. Schwartz subsequently added to that tweet:

Case in point:

[re-tweet of Dr. Gill's tweet: T-cell immunity, T-cell immunity, T-cell immunity...]

228 On August 6, 2020, Dr. Schwartz responded to a tweet by Mr. Picard which re-posted a tweet that expressed disdain for Picard and support for Dr. Gill, and added a comment that "the trolls [were] out in full force":

Yes, her army of despicables also attacked me last week when I called her out for her anti-science stance.

229 On August 6, 2020, Dr. Schwartz responded to a tweet from Dr. Jo Kennelly, the late wife of Dr. Frank Plummer, in which Dr. Kennelly indicated that vaccine cell creation and T-cell natural immunity were not mutually exclusive in Dr. Plummer's eyes:

Except it pains me that she uses his good name in vain to support her anti-science opinions.

230 On August 10, 2020, Dr. Schwartz re-tweeted an article from CBC of the same date, titled "Ontario doctor subject of complaints after COVID-19 tweet".

231 On August 10, 2020, Dr. Schwartz tweeted:

This pediatrician has consistently espoused misinformation & conspiracy theories at a time when trust in our profession is critically important. She accuses all who call her out of bigotry & corruption & hides behind summer student experience in a respected lab.

232 On October 4, 2020 Dr. Prado responded to a tweet posted by Dr. Andrew Fraser in which Dr. Fraser reported that he received threats from supporters of Dr. Gill to his personal email after challenging Dr. Gill's tweets. Regarding the supporters that threatened Dr. Fraser, Dr. Prado wrote:

I have no patience with conspiracy theory defenders. My family lives in Brazil. Many people they know had major issues because of COVID and were in the hospital. Some died. You are right, stay strong and keep pushing for scientific facts Andy!

233 Dr. Gill claims against these four Defendants in defamation and conspiracy. She also claims against Dr. Schwartz, Dr. Fazel, and Dr. Prado in negligence.

234 Dr. Gill cannot prove the substantial merit element as she does not have viable causes of action in defamation, negligence, or conspiracy. Dr. Gill cannot prove the "no valid defence" element as the defences of fair comment and qualified privilege advanced by these Defendants have sufficient validity. Dr. Gill cannot prove that any damages she may have suffered are sufficiently serious for the interest in permitting the proceeding to continue to outweigh the public interest in protecting the impugned expressions, and therefore she cannot overcome the public interest hurdle.

235 Given that the proceeding arises from expressions made by these Defendants that relate to matters of public interest, the onus shifts to the Plaintiffs to show that there are grounds to believe that the proceeding has substantial merit and that these Defendants have no valid defence.

236 None of the impugned statements of these Defendants are capable of giving rise to the defamatory meanings alleged. Further, those meanings would not have arisen in the minds of reasonable readers. In the "Twitter-sphere" the exchanges would simply be seen as a disagreement between medical professionals in terms that would not be interpreted as defamatory.

237 In the circumstances, Dr. Gill cannot show that there are reasonable grounds to support a finding that these Defendants owed her a duty of care in these circumstances.

238 There are no grounds to believe the conspiracy claim has substantial merit. The statement of claim is deficient and does not disclose a reasonable cause of action as it relates to the claim of conspiracy against the moving parties. Moreover, Dr. Gill has put forward insufficient evidence to support such a claim.

239 Dr. Gill cannot satisfy the court that there are grounds to believe that her claims of defamation, negligence, or conspiracy are legally tenable and supported by evidence reasonably capable of belief such that they have a real prospect of success.

240 For the reasons set out in their detailed Factum at paragraphs 66 through 91, I agree with these Defendants that the Plaintiffs have not shown that their defences of fair comment and qualified privilege lack the necessary prospects of success to permit the action to proceed.

241 When the balancing test is applied to the claims against these Defendants I consider that the comparative interests and considerations are very heavily in favour of the position advanced of these Defendants. Accordingly, all claims made against them are dismissed.

G. Dr. Polevoy

242 Dr. Polevoy is a retired physician now living in the Region of Waterloo, Ontario. He has been an advocate for good patient care and public health for many years. Dr. Polevoy is also an active physician leader with a long history of leadership in specialty associations, and provincial associations.

243 Dr. Polevoy uses his Twitter account as a platform to express his view on a number of topics, including to communicate with the public on health and medicine.

244 The Plaintiffs have claimed damages for alleged defamation on the basis of series of tweets posted between August 6, 2020 and October 21, 2020 similar in nature to those of the other physician Defendants.

245 Dr. Polevoy has adopted the arguments and submissions advanced on behalf of the other Defendant physicians with respect to the nature of his tweets and the available defences to him of fair comment and qualified privilege. In my opinion they apply equally to his tweeted expressions. Further, any communication expressing any complaint or concern about the Plaintiffs that he made to the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario which is the governing body for physicians in the province must be considered to have occurred on an occasion of qualified privilege. Qualified privilege is a strong defence to any claims made by the Plaintiffs of defamation.

246 A consideration of the factors that must be weighed when applying the ultimate balancing test on this motion likewise favours the interest in protecting his right to express himself on matters of public interest. As a result, all claims against Dr. Polevoy in this action are dismissed.

H. Dr. Boozary

247 The only allegations in the Statement of Claim regarding Dr. Boozary are that he published three statements on his public Twitter profile in August 2020 which contain allegedly defamatory remarks concerning Dr. Gill.

248 The following tweets are the allegedly defamatory tweets posted by Dr. Boozary:

(a) On August 6, 2020:

The war on science is real in Canada- maybe ugliest when it comes from our own MD's. All indebted for the strength/ integrity of science/health journalism as counter force up north.

[attaches Dr. Kulvinder Kaur MDs tweet: if you have not yet figured out that we don't need a vaccine, you are not paying attention #FactsNotFear].

(b) On August 7, 2020:

#IStandWithPicard - we all do. Hate only seems to fuel the bots will just continue to send love/strength to Andre/ seven nation army of science at the front line. Trust in science and each other going to get us thru

(c) On August 9, 2020:

Being blocked by @dockaurG a badge of honour sure but unsettling/win for misinformation that there's still an MD platform of >20k followers amplifying anti-science/anti-vax harm.

249 Dr. Boozary has an interest and is actively involved in the public health response to COVID-19 as a primary care doctor, as an assistant professor at the Dalla Lana School of Public Health, and as a co-lead for the Toronto Region's COVID-19 Homelessness and Shelter Response. Through these roles and in the media, Dr. Boozary has been actively involved in public education. Dr. Boozary has also tweeted throughout the pandemic about emerging scientific research, his view on health policy responses, and how he believes we should be coming together to protect those who are most vulnerable.

250 The proceeding against Dr. Boozary arises from an expression made by Dr. Boozary that relates to a matter of public interest. Dr. Boozary's tweets are expressions. All of Dr. Boozary's tweets relate to the COVID-19 pandemic - particularly about the importance of sharing health science information during the crisis - which is a topic of obvious public interest. At this stage, the court is not assessing the quality of the expression, and so it is not legally relevant whether the expression is desirable or deleterious, valuable or vexatious, or whether it helps or hampers the public interest ... The question is only whether the expression pertains to any matter of public interest, defined broadly. This is not an onerous burden, and is clearly met in this case.

251 Dr. Boozary's August 6 tweet does not make any defamatory statement about Dr. Gill. Dr. Gill tweeted "we don't need a vaccine", which was counter to prevailing scientific opinion that a vaccine is necessary to reduce mortality and prevent the ongoing spread of COVID-19. Dr. Boozary stated in the August 6 tweet in response, copying Dr. Gill's tweet, "The war on science is real in Canada- maybe ugliest when it comes from our own MD's."

252 Dr. Boozary's tweet does not injure Dr. Gill's reputation. Dr. Gill's own expression has an impact on her reputation in that people reading it may either agree or disagree and people may feel strongly either way. Dr. Gill has also continued to openly broadcast her opinions on the public health response to COVID-19, even where those opinions are contrary to prevailing scientific opinion, and is thus maintaining the reputation that she has created. Dr. Boozary's election to share his own view on the matter, to his much smaller audience, would not affect Dr. Gill's reputation. Those who agree with Dr. Gill might actually support the idea that she is involved in a "war on science" in that they disagree with the prevailing scientific opinion of the importance of vaccines in fighting COVID-19. In short, Dr. Boozary's comments in the August 6 tweet did nothing to lower the reputation of Dr. Gill and are not defamatory.

253 Dr. Boozary's August 7 tweet is also not defamatory. The words of the Tweet do not refer to Dr. Gill. The Tweet is about hateful "bots", which by definition are unidentified Twitter users, and attempts to offer support to André Picard and scientists at the front line in the pandemic. A reasonable person could not interpret the August 7 tweet to have lowered Dr. Gill's reputation in any way.

254 Finally, the August 9 tweet also is not defamatory. In the tweet, Dr. Boozary did not claim that Dr. Gill is anti-science or anti-vaccine, but rather that she used her large platform to amplify messages that are anti-science and anti-vaccine. He stated his opinion that it was concerning for a medical doctor with so many followers to be amplifying medical information which he considered to be contrary to scientific evidence. The August 9 tweet does not lower Dr. Gill's reputation as anyone familiar with Dr. Gill's Twitter account would be aware of the content she shares and could recognize that Dr. Boozary was stating his own views about that content, not falsely alleging anything against Dr. Gill.

255 Even if Dr. Boozary's tweets were somehow defamatory, then the defence of fair comment applies to them. Thus, the Plaintiffs are unable to meet their burden of showing there are grounds to believe that Dr. Boozary's defence has no real prospect of success.

256 All three of Dr. Boozary's tweets clearly meet the first criteria as they relate to the dissemination of scientific information regarding the COVID-19 pandemic, which is a matter of obvious public interest. The specific issues that Dr. Boozary was tweeting about within the broader rubric of the pandemic - namely, concerns about a medical doctor denying the need for a vaccine and support for health science reporting - are of particular concern during this global crisis.

257 Turning to the other criteria for establishing fair comment for the August 6 tweet, these criteria are met. Dr. Boozary's comment relates to the fact that Dr. Gill tweeted that "we don't need a vaccine"; he embedded Dr. Gill's full tweet as evidence of this fact. The August 6 tweet is recognizable as a comment because "the war on science is real" is a conclusion or observation which is generally incapable of proof. Further, it is a matter of Dr. Boozary's opinion to say it is "ugliest" when this comes from a medical doctor. Any person could honestly hold these views, given the prevailing scientific position that we do need a vaccine to combat COVID-19 and the important role of doctors in assuaging vaccine hesitancy.

258 The other criteria are also met for the August 7 tweet. This tweet does not make any comment about Dr. Gill. Dr. Boozary makes three comments in this tweet: (1) he supports Picard and others on the "front line" in science; (2) we need to trust in science and each other; and (3) hate fuels the "bots". The first two comments are statements of support that require no factual basis.

259 With respect to the third comment, Dr. Boozary's evidence in cross-examination was that he understood the term "bots" to refer to accounts that have no obvious human identity or accountability and are spreading vitriol against individuals not in relation to the subject matter of their tweets but against them personally, such as death threats.

260 The August 7 tweet is a matter of comment and opinion, and a person could honestly express the same opinions on the facts.

261 Finally, the August 9 tweet also meets the other criteria. The facts grounding Dr. Boozary's comments in this tweet are: Dr. Gill blocked Dr. Boozary on Twitter, Dr. Gill is a medical doctor, Dr. Gill had more than 20,000 twitter followers and Dr. Gill tweeted (which is quoted in Dr. Boozary's August 6 tweet) that "we don't need a vaccine". Calling Dr. Gill blocking him a "badge of honour" is a comment, as this is a subjective personal perspective on the known fact. Dr. Boozary also comments subjectively that he considers the existence of her account "unsettling" and a "win for misinformation", which are also clearly opinions.

262 While Dr. Boozary has met the criteria for the defence of fair comment for all three expressions at issue, Dr. Gill has failed to establish that Dr. Boozary was actuated by express malice, an onus which she bears in order to defeat the privilege. Malice relates to the state of mind of the defendant and is ordinarily established through proof that the defendant knew the statement was untrue, was reckless with respect to its truth, did not believe the statements were true, or had some improper motive or purpose. Although Dr. Gill did not plead malice with any specificity, her claim that Dr. Boozary acted maliciously cannot succeed on any of these bases. Dr. Boozary affirmed his belief in the statements and that he made those statements for the purpose of expressing his opinion on the dissemination of public health information, without malicious intent. Dr. Boozary also denied Dr. Gill's unsupported allegation that his tweets were sexist, racist, or misogynistic.

263 In applying the balancing test, Dr. Boozary rightly submits that Dr. Gill has failed to establish both the existence of harm as well as causation - both of which are required under the test.

264 Dr. Boozary's expression has high importance. His tweets related to the spread of scientific information regarding the deadly global pandemic, in the midst of the crisis. Scientific and public health information about COVID-19 is a matter of obvious public interest, because everyone in the public has a substantial concern about this topic in that it affects the welfare of citizens, and in particular there has been considerable public controversy about vaccinations. This interest far outweighs any interest that could support allowing the action against him to proceed.

265 An application of the final balancing test results in a determination in Dr. Boozary's favour. All claims against him in this action are dismissed.

I. The Pointer Group Incorporated

266 On October 19, 2020 Dr. Gill delivered a notice of libel pursuant to section 5 of the Libel and Slander Act to The Pointer concerning an article published by The Pointer on August 13, 2020 (the "Article"). The libel notice alleged that the Article contained defamatory statements about Dr. Gill.

267 On October 22, 2020, The Pointer responded to the libel notice and denied that the Article was defamatory.

268 The Article, published on August 13, 2020, reports on:

- (a) Tweets published by Dr. Gill on August 4, 5, 6 and 12, 2020, which appear in the Article in their entirety and which express her views that lockdowns are unwarranted and promotes the use of hydroxychloroquine as a treatment for the virus;
- (b) Twitter's removal of Dr. Gill's tweet on August 6, 2020, because it violated Twitter's policies. The August 6, 2020 tweet is set out in the Article even though it was removed on Twitter. That tweet promoted T-cell immunity (herd immunity) and hydroxychloroquine as humanity's effective defences against COVID-19;
- (c) Dr. Gill defending the use of a hydroxychloroquine and promoting it as "effective in the fight against COVID-19";
- (d) A complaint made to the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario ("CPSO") about Dr. Gill's tweets;
- (e) The fact there are medical studies that have questioned the use of hydroxychloroquine as a treatment for COVID-19;
- (f) Health Canada's position that it does not support the use of hydroxychloroquine to prevent or treat COVID-19 without a prescription and warning Canadians about false and misleading claims; and
- (g) Concerns expressed by Dr. David Juurlink, head of clinical pharmacology and toxicology at the University of Toronto, regarding Dr. Gill's tweets including that her advice in her tweets is dangerous.

269 Dr. Juurlink's comments in the Article are not the subject of Dr. Gill's claim and Dr. Juurlink is not a defendant in this action.

270 The Article reports on Dr. Gill's own tweets, which are publicly available and are repeated verbatim in the Article. The Article also accurately reports that there are research and statements from public authorities that have contradicted Dr. Gill's views and that other members of the medical community do not support her views, have made complaints about her public statements and are concerned about the impact those statements will have on members of the public. There is nothing in the Article that is not true.

271 Dr. Gill appears to have asserted that she did not make the statements attributed to her, and that the statements as reported were distorted and taken out of context. The Article simply reports on her tweets and does not take them out of context.

272 Dr. Gill knowingly tweeted about the pandemic, despite the controversial nature of her views, and knowing that they would be subject to public criticism and media reports. The Article is a fair and accurate report about Dr. Gill's tweets and the controversy created by them, and is based on true underlying fact.

273 The public has an interest in receiving competing viewpoints to those expressed publicly by Dr. Gill. Information on whether Dr. Gill's opinions expressed in her tweets are disputed is important to public debate and information about COVID-19 and potential treatments.

274 The Pointer states that attempts to contact Dr. Gill for comment were made before publishing the Article, but she did not respond, nor did she follow up after publication of the Article. Before the Article was published, among other things, The Pointer sent an email to Dr. Gill at the email address: concernedontariodoctors@gmail.com, the email address for Concerned Ontario Doctors, but received no reply.

275 In her affidavit sworn June 14, 2021 Dr. Gill asserted for the first time that The Pointer did not attempt to contact her before publishing the Article. She did not complain about this in her libel notice or in her Statement of Claim. In response to the libel notice, The Pointer wrote, among other things, that it had attempted to contact Dr. Gill for comment before publishing the Article. Dr. Gill did not dispute this.

276 The Article contains references to four reliable sources: Dr. Juurlink, Health Canada, Health Link BC, and an extensive study by the New England Journal of Medicine on the efficacy of hydroxychloroquine for treatment of COVID-19.

277 Dr. Gill claims that The Pointer did not engage in responsible journalism because it simply repeated the defamation of others without verification or competent investigation and echoed the defamation of the other Defendants. However, I agree with the arguments advanced by the Pointer that:

- (a) There was no repetition of defamation of others. The Article contained quotations from an interview The Pointer conducted with Dr. Juurlink. Dr. Juurlink is not a named defendant. The quotation in the Article from Dr. Juurlink is a statement of his opinion and it is a reasonable comment of his concerns about Dr. Gill's tweets. The Article is reporting his concerns, which are shared by other members of the medical community; and
- (b) There was no echoing of the defamation of the other defendants. The sole reference to another defendant in the Article was an indirect reference to the fact "the CBC [i.e. Radio Canada] reported Dr. Alex Nataros... filed a complaint with the [CPSO] for an "egregious spread of misinformation."" The article quotes from a tweet made by Dr. Nataros in response to Dr. Gill's tweets, which is part of Dr. Gill's claim. However, one quote of one tweet by one other defendant does not constitute a general repeating or echoing of the defamation of others. As noted, the action was discontinued against Radio Canada.

278 The Article therefore bears all of the features of a strong responsible journalism defence.

279 Journalists at large must have the freedom to responsibly report on the COVID-19 pandemic, including Dr. Gill's comments and the criticism of them, irrespective of whether Dr. Gill has a valid basis to assert that lockdowns are ineffective or that hydroxychloroquine is effective against COVID-19. The media must be permitted to report responsibly on comments that affect the public and which are a matter of public interest.

280 The Plaintiffs should not be permitted to stifle public discourse and participation in public health debates caused by their own public comments.

281 In my view, the Plaintiffs have failed to discharge their onus of showing that The Pointer's defence of responsible journalism has very little chance of succeeding. In fact, I consider that the evidence entirely contradicts such a conclusion and that The Pointer has a very strong defence available to it.

282 Further and finally, when the balancing test is ultimately applied, it results in an assessment very much in favour of The Pointer and the public interest concerns it has advanced. As a result, the claims against it in this action must be dismissed.

J. Alheli Picazo

283 The action against Picazo is based on four tweets she posted to her Twitter account. The first three comprised a "thread" or series of tweets posted on August 6, 2020, prompted by a tweet from the Defendant, André Picard earlier that day. Picard's tweet embedded two tweets dated August 4 and 6, 2020 from Dr. Gill that read as follows:

"If you have not yet figured out that we don't need a vaccine, you are not paying attention. #FactsNotFear"

and

"#Humanity's existing effective defences against #COVID19 to safely return to normal life now:

-The Truth

-T-cell immunity

-Hydroxychloroquine"

284 In the first tweet in Picazo's impugned August 6, 2020 thread, Picazo wrote, "Her behaviour and tweets throughout the pandemic have been grossly irresponsible, to say the least. I would have no faith in her as a doctor for anything." Embedded in this tweet was an image of another tweet Dr. Gill sent on August 4, 2020, stating, "There is absolutely no medical or scientific reason for this prolonged, harmful and illogical lockdown. #FactsNotFear". Picazo's tweet also embedded a tweet by Bronca, which itself contained an image of the two tweets published by Dr. Gill set out at the previous paragraph.

285 Picazo's second tweet stated, "This is unprofessional, imo." "Imo" is a well-known acronym for "in my opinion". That tweet embedded images of, and was a comment on, two additional tweets of Dr. Gill, which read:

"#COVID19 Defined By

"Absolute power corrupts absolutely"

"A lie told often enough becomes truth"

"Cancer of bureaucracy is destroying medicine"

"Media's most powerful entity on earth: power to make the innocent guilty & to make the guilty innocent - control minds of masses"

and

"If you're not careful, newspapers will have you hating the ppl who are oppressed & loving the ppl who are doing the oppressing" 2020: frontline MDs silenced/censored for speaking the truth & upholding HippocraticOath [sic] while media invokes fear & "journalists" propagate lies"

286 The third tweet in Picazo's thread stated, "There is an abandonment of science happening here, she just doesn't seem to be able to recognize the culprit", which was a comment on a tweet by Dr. Gill that stated:

"My heart is broken watching #COVID19Canada unfold. Absolutely broken watching our govts embrace quackery & abandon science. Broken hearing endless political/media lies. Broken watching govts violate our freedom/rights. Broken from govts allowing Cdns to die when we can save them."

287 The final tweet by Picazo that Dr. Gill alleges was defamatory was posted on October 20, 2020. That tweet was part of a series of tweets Picazo wrote regarding the renaming of Sir John A. MacDonald Hall at the Queen's University Faculty of Law, which was a news story at that time. Picazo was responding to comments made by Queen's Law professor Bruce Pardy that were critical of the proposal to remove the name. Picazo wrote, "What's more threatening to Canadians than the re-naming of a building? Covid denialism and promoting bad science and fringe theories/figures. #cdnpoli". That tweet contained embedded images of four other tweets from various accounts, including one from Dr. Gill that promoted the use of HCQ.

288 Numerous articles and scholarly resources have been tendered by the various Defendants that make clear that Dr. Gill's views on the use of lockdowns as a public health measure, the proximity of reaching her immunity, the efficacy and safety of HCQ as a treatment for COVID-19, and the necessity of a COVID-19 vaccine run contrary to the generally accepted views of the scientific and medical community.

289 To satisfy the requirements of s. 137.1(3), the moving party must demonstrate on a balance of probabilities that (i) the proceeding arises from an expression made by the moving party and that (ii) the expression relates to a matter of public interest. These requirements are easily satisfied in the case as against Picazo which arises from the four tweets referred to.

290 Dr. Gill has claimed in defamation and also alleged conspiracy. There are no grounds to believe that either of these claims has a real prospect of success. Further, there are no grounds to believe that Picazo's defences of justification and fair comment have no real prospect of success.

291 Picazo's impugned comments were that Dr. Gill's tweets: (a) were grossly irresponsible; (b) were unprofessional; (c) constituted an abandonment of science; (d) contained bad science; and (e) contained fringe theories.

292 Although Dr. Gill further claims that Picazo said she engaged in "COVIDdenial". Picazo's October 20, 2020 tweet, which referred to "Covid denialism and promoting bad science and fringe theories/figures", was directed at Bruce Pardy, not at Dr. Gill. Picazo's tweet embedded four tweets (only one of which was a tweet of the Plaintiffs) that had been previously retweeted by Bruce Pardy. Reading this tweet in context, the meaning, as far as it relates to Dr. Gill's tweet, is that it was Bruce Pardy who was promoting bad science and fringe theories. Dr. Gill's tweet that was embedded in Picazo's October 20, 2020 tweet simply attached an article promoting the use of HCQ to treat COVID-19, and so the meaning (as it relates to Dr. Gill) is that the use of HCQ to treat COVID is "bad science" and a "fringe theory".

293 In my view, these comments were not defamatory. The thrust of Picazo's comments is that Dr Gill's tweets promoted ideas and theories related to lockdowns, HCQ, and vaccines that contradicted the generally accepted medical and scientific consensus and that the tweets were, for that reason, irresponsible and unprofessional. Prior to August 6, 2020, Dr. Gill already had a reputation as an advocate of controversial opinions regarding the COVID-19 pandemic. Picazo's comments regarding Dr. Gill's tweets contain the same conclusions that a reasonable person would have reached. Picazo's tweets simply affirmed Dr. Gill's self-positioning as a bold, advocate willing to "tell it like it is" in the face of (in Dr. Gill's view) misinformation being spread by the government, public health authorities, and the mainstream media.

294 The content and tone of Picazo's tweets were mild and measured relative to the highly charged online discourse surrounding the COVID-19 pandemic and, in particular, to the way in which Dr. Gill expresses herself on Twitter.

295 Picazo's impugned comments also attract a strong fair comment defence. They relate to a matter of public interest. They are based on fact, i.e., the underlying tweets from Dr. Gill that Picazo was referring to and are embedded in Picazo's tweets. These tweets, and the other tweets of Dr. Gill are publicly available on her Twitter page for the world to see.

296 Picazo's comments are recognizable as comment and are expressly framed as such, and constitute an opinion that a person could honestly express on the proved facts. It is Picazo's unchallenged evidence that she was expressing her honestly held opinion that Dr. Gill's statements about COVID-19, vaccines and public health measures were inaccurate, irresponsible, and unprofessional for a medical doctor to be making, that they created a potential risk to public health, and that they ran counter to the prevailing views on these issues as expressed by public health authorities.

297 The Plaintiffs have failed in their onus of demonstrating that the defence of fair comment has little or no application to Picazo's expressions. In my view, the record shows that a very strong defence in that regard is available to her.

298 Further, Dr. Gill has failed to demonstrate or particularize any overt acts by Picazo in furtherance of the alleged conspiracy, to explain how Picazo acted in concert with other Defendants, or to set out particularized allegations of damages suffered as a result of the conspiracy. The conspiracy claim fails to meet the "substantial merit" test and should be dismissed on this basis alone.

299 Finally, an application of the ultimate balancing test very much favours Picazo and the interests and values that she has argued must be protected. Accordingly, I conclude that all claims in this action against her ought to be dismissed.

K. Bruce Arthur

300 On August 6, 2020, Arthur saw a tweet by André Picard, whom he follows on Twitter, which embedded the following August 4, 2020 tweet by Dr. Gill:

"If you have not figured out that we don't need a vaccine, you are not paying attention. #FactsNotFear"

301 Arthur was concerned by this tweet because it contradicted the public health advice he had become aware of over the previous months. He was particularly concerned that the tweet had been made by a physician.

302 Arthur then reviewed Dr. Gill's Twitter account, and saw the following tweets:

- a) "There is absolutely no medical or scientific reason for this prolonged, harmful and illogical lockdown."
- b) "Current status of #COVID19 99.9% Politics, Power, Greed & Fear. 0.1% Science & Medicine."
- c) "#Humanity's existing effective defences against #COVID19 to safely return to normal life now: -The Truth - T-cell Immunity - Hydroxychloroquine."

303 Arthur observed that Dr. Gill's tweets had been retweeted many, many times.

304 Arthur also observed that Dr. Gill had tweeted about André Picard, accusing him of having been appointed by Trudeau to the COVID-19 Impact Committee "to drive the political WHO narrative." This tweet had resulted in a barrage of negative online vitriol directed at Picard.

305 After learning that Dr. Gill had blocked him from being able to view her Twitter page, Arthur tweeted the following:

I don't boast about being blocked, but this one is a badge of honour, from a Canadian doctor who is spreading dangerous misinformation, and who unleashed a troll farm at @picardonhealth, one of the finest public service journalists in Canada. What a disgrace.

[Screenshot of Twitter message showing he had been blocked]

Now, let's wait and see which media outlet her a platform. It'll be telling.

306 This single tweet is the sole subject of the defamation claim against Arthur.

307 The expression at issue relates to a matter of public interest - namely, the COVID-19 pandemic and ensuing public health response. The public interest nature of the expression should not be in dispute on this motion, particularly since Dr. Gill herself has extensively tweeted about this topic.

308 When determining whether a statement has a defamatory meaning, attention must be given to the mode of communication, context, and all surrounding circumstances. As a platform, Twitter allows for an open exchange of ideas and invites users to engage with the views of others. By making controversial statements on this very public platform, Dr. Gill implicitly invited members of the public to respond to her views.

309 Arthur's tweet cannot bear the defamatory meanings ascribed to it by Dr. Gill. It does not call her a conspiracy theorist, it does not call into question her mental stability, and it says nothing about her ability to care for her patients. It merely states Arthur's own view that her publicly-available tweets include dangerous misinformation about COVID-19, and that the spreading of this misinformation and her related accusations hurled at Picard were a "disgrace".

310 There is no evidence that the Arthur tweet lowered Dr. Gill's reputation. Her tweets were available for the public to see. Any reasonable member of the community could immediately look at her Twitter page and discern for themselves whether they agreed with Arthur's assessment of her tweets.

311 Dr. Gill has fostered a reputation for herself as an outspoken and controversial advocate against public health advice on COVID-19 measures, and the mainstream media's coverage of COVID-19. Public health authorities have deemed anti-vaccine and anti-lockdown rhetoric to be "misinformation". Therefore, Arthur's characterization of Dr. Gill's tweets as "misinformation" likely served only to solidify her stance as a crusader against public health advice and the mainstream media, a reputation she herself created.

312 Arthur's tweet also attracts a strong defence of fair comment on a matter of public interest. It was on a matter of obvious public interest. It was based in fact, as it directly responded to Dr. Gill's Twitter posts about vaccines, lockdowns, hydroxychloroquine and the overall COVID-19 public health response, which she does not dispute making. The tweet expressed an honestly held opinion that many other Defendants in this litigation shared. There is no credible suggestion or evidence that it was motivated by malice.

313 Arthur's tweet is also recognizable as comment. Arthur was reacting to the fact that Dr. Gill had blocked him on Twitter, and tweeted that it being blocked was a "badge of honour" due to his opinion that she was "spreading dangerous misinformation" and had unfairly criticized Picard. The final words, "What a disgrace", shows that Arthur was only expressing his opinion and personal observation of Dr. Gill's actions on Twitter.

314 Dr. Gill has not put forward any real evidence of any harm caused to her by Arthur's single tweet, or of any reputational or other harm at all.

315 In any event, any potential harm arising from the impugned expressions is outweighed by the importance of allowing citizens to freely express themselves via social media platforms on what will be the defining public health issue of our time. An application of the ultimate balancing test to these facts requires that all claims against Arthur be dismissed.

Conclusion

316 For these reasons, the motions brought by the Defendants are granted, and all claims against them in these proceedings are hereby dismissed.

Costs

317 Given the position taken on behalf of the Plaintiffs by their counsel in response to the suggestion made by some of the Defendants that the Plaintiffs' claims were being maintained with the possible benefit of third party funding, I did not consider it necessary or appropriate to refer to it in the above reasons as it did not form any part of the applicable analysis. However, I should indicate to the parties that approach taken in that regard is without prejudice to the entitlement of any party to refer to such issue if there is a proper basis for doing so when making submissions on costs.

318 If the parties cannot agree on the subject of costs, written submissions may be delivered by the Defendants for my consideration within 30 days of the date of this decision. Written submissions may be delivered by the Plaintiffs within 30 days thereafter.

Constitutional law — Constitutional proceedings — Practice and procedure — Pleadings — Motion by defendants to strike plaintiffs' action challenging constitutionality of Food and Drugs Act and Natural Health Products Regulations or to proceed only against Federal Crown allowed in part — Cross-motion by plaintiffs to stay enforcement of certain provisions of Act and Regulations dismissed — Damages claim, allegations of malicious intent and improper purpose, and Charter infringement claims struck for failing to plead material facts, failing to disclose reasonable cause of action or abuse of process — Corporate plaintiffs could not maintain s. 7 Charter claim — Federal Crown only proper defendant.

Motion by the defendants to strike the plaintiffs' action challenging the constitutionality of the Food and Drugs Act and Natural Health Products Regulations or to allow the action to proceed only against the Federal Crown. Cross-motion by the plaintiffs to stay the enforcement of certain provisions of the Act and Regulations pending the outcome of the action. The plaintiffs were users, manufacturers or distributors of products that fell within the definition of natural health product, including dietary food supplements, nutritional food supplements and vitamins. They alleged the federal government did not have constitutional authority to regulate natural health substances, the Act and Regulations infringed their rights under the Charter, and they had suffered damages as a result of Charter breaches and tortious conduct by government officials in enforcing the Act and Regulations. The plaintiff Dahl challenged enforcement actions under the Act that led to criminal convictions against him.

HELD: Motion allowed in part; cross-motion dismissed.

Certain claims for relief were struck as overly broad. The plaintiffs' damages claim and allegations of malicious intent and improper purpose or bad faith in relation to enforcement actions against them were also struck with leave to amend to state conduct under the provisions of the Act and Regulations that was clearly wrong, in bad faith or an abuse of power. Several paragraphs were struck for failing to plead sufficient material facts to support the assertions made. Other paragraphs were struck as vexatious or because they disclosed no reasonable cause of action. The Charter claim was struck as it did not outline how any asserted rights were infringed and thus disclosed no reasonable cause of action. The bulk of the pleadings respecting Dahl were struck as an abuse of process as they were an attempt to re-litigate the validity of actions related to the previous criminal proceedings. Dahl could not use his unchallenged convictions to demonstrate unconstitutionality. There was no reasonable chance of success that his malicious prosecution claim would succeed. The corporate plaintiffs could not bring a proactive challenge to the Act and Regulations on s. 7 Charter grounds as they had no procedural protections under s. 7. Their claim of s. 2(b) Charter breaches had not been pleaded with sufficient detail to allow adjudication. The defendant Ministers and RCMP were not proper defendants. The federal Crown was the only proper defendant in the action.

JUDGMENT AND REASONS

RUSSELL J.

INTRODUCTION

1 The Plaintiffs have brought an action challenging certain provisions of the Food and Drugs Act, RSC, 1985, c F-27 [Act] on constitutional grounds, challenging the Natural Health Products Regulations, SOR/2003-196 [Regulations] on constitutional grounds and as exceeding the authority delegated by the Act, and claiming damages based on alleged Charter breaches and tortious conduct in the implementation and enforcement of the Act and the Regulations. This judgment relates to two motions brought in the context of that action. The Defendants have brought a motion to strike the Statement of Claim [Claim] in its entirety, or in the alternative to strike certain paragraphs that amount to the bulk of the Claim (paragraphs 1(a), 1(b), 1(c), 1(e), 2 - 29, 34, 36 and 37-100). They also seek to amend the Claim to remove all of the Defendants except Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Canada. The Plaintiffs have brought a cross-motion seeking to stay the enforcement of s. 3(1) and (2) of the Act and large portions of the Regulations pending the outcome of the action.

BACKGROUND

2 The Plaintiffs are present or past users, manufacturers or distributors of products that fall within the definition of "natural health product" as set out in the Regulations [natural health products], which they describe as naturally occurring dietary food supplements, nutritional food supplements and vitamins. They challenge the validity and the enforcement of the Regulations and certain sections of the Act on a number of grounds, including that:

the federal government does not have the constitutional authority to regulate natural health substances under the division of powers set out in the Constitution Act, 1867 (UK), 30 & 31 Victoria, c 3, reprinted in RSC 1985, App II, No 5 [Constitution Act 1867];

Parliament never intended the definition of "drug" in the Act to apply to natural health products and therefore the Regulations exceed the authority delegated by the Act; and the enactment and enforcement of the Regulations and the application of certain sections of the Act to natural health products have infringed their rights under ss. 2(a), 2(b), 7, 8, 9 and 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Part I of the Constitution Act, 1982, being Schedule B to the Canada Act, 1982 (UK), 1982, c 11 [Charter].

3 The Plaintiffs also allege that they have suffered damages as a result of these alleged Charter breaches as well as heavy-handed and tortious conduct by government officials and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police [RCMP] in enforcing the Act and the Regulations.

4 With respect to the constitutional division of powers, the Claim states that Parliament has the jurisdiction to regulate any product that has a potential health risk, but Parliament cannot extend this jurisdiction to products which pose no or a de minimis health risk, so that the Regulations are therefore ultra vires the jurisdiction of Parliament (Claim, at para 16(h)).

5 The Plaintiff Nick Mancuso [Mancuso] is a Canadian actor who says that he has, throughout his life, relied heavily on dietary food supplements and vitamins as a conscious, informed choice regarding his health. He views the free choice to use these products as part of his belief system in terms of how to maintain good health and "in general, with respect to his bodily and psychological integrity." He resists the notion that the state can "arbitrarily and selectively dictate" what dietary supplements or vitamins can be sold to him, and alleges that restrictions on the sale of natural food products and the communication of health claims about them violate his rights under ss. 2(a), 2(b), 7 and 15 of the Charter and have caused him mental distress.

6 The Plaintiff David Rowland [Rowland] is an advocate of "alternative" medicine who says that he has been involved for many years with the development of natural health products. A line of dietary supplements developed by Rowland -- the Vitamost(R) line -- are or were distributed by The Results Company Inc [the Results Company], another Plaintiff described as "a small family owned business." Rowland and the Results Company allege that the product and site licensing regime imposed by the Regulations -- the National Products Number [NPN] licensing scheme -- has severely restricted the sale of these supplements. They say the NPN regime is "oppressive and totally unnecessary" because the products are safe, and that the Regulations are "unconstitutional and ultra vires the Act."

7 Rowland and the Results Company allege that Health Canada has refused licences for some of their products and has withheld approval for others, causing a steep decline in their business. They allege that the NPN regime is a form of censorship that prohibits the sale of natural health products and decides which health claims can be made about them, prohibiting "all other true claims." They say that "[i]n no other industry are suppliers prevented from telling their customers the truth about what their products do." They also allege that the enforcement of the Regulations has been "excessive and abusive," employing "para-military methods of enforcement." They allege that they have suffered damage to reputation and economic losses, and Rowland alleges breaches of his rights under ss. 2, 7 and 15 of the Charter "as claimed and articulated with respect to Nick Mancuso."

8 The Plaintiff Eldon Dahl [Dr. Dahl] has been involved in importing, exporting, preparing and distributing natural health products since purchasing an existing health food store in West Vancouver in 1984. He says he is qualified as a Naturopathic Physician. The Plaintiff Agnesa Dahl [Mrs. Dahl] is his wife, and the Plaintiff Life Choice Ltd [Life Choice] is their company, which was formed from the amalgamation of companies they previously owned or controlled (E.D. Modern Design Ltd and E.G.D. Modern Design Ltd). The Dahls and the predecessor companies of Life Choice have been subject to enforcement action under the Act and the Regulations on a number of occasions, including searches and seizures dating back to 2001. In 2004, Dr. Dahl and his then company (E.D. Internal Health) were charged with 42 counts of violating the Customs Act, RSC, 1985, c 1 (2nd Supp.) [Customs Act] and the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, SC 1996, c 19 [CDSA]. Dr. Dahl and E.D. Internal Health were found guilty on 33 counts and received a conditional sentence and fines: R v Dahl, 120998, March 26th 2004 (BC Prov Ct) [R v Dahl #1]; R v Dahl, [2004] B.C.J. No. 3072, 120998-C3, May 26, 2004 (BC Prov Ct) [R v Dahl #2]. In early 2010, the Dahls and their company, E.G.D. Modern Design Ltd, were charged with 33 counts of violating the Act and the CDSA. The charges against the Dahls were stayed due to delay in January 2013, while E.G.D. Modern Design pleaded guilty on 11 counts (including 8 under the Act) and was sentenced to pay fines totalling $125,250: R v Dahl, 2013 ABQB 54 [R v Dahl #6]; trial excerpt from R v Eldon Garth Dahl, Agnesa Dahl and EDG Modern Design Ltd, [2013] A.J. No. 89, 100237221Q3 (Alta QB) [R v Dahl #7] at pp. 52-104 (Defendant's Motion Record, at 559-611).

9 The Dahls allege violations of their rights under ss. 7, 8 and 9 of the Charter in connection with the searches and seizures preceding the charges outlined above, which they characterize as excessive and abusive, including a "heavily armed raid" resulting in the seizure of products and a search of their home in which they allege they were unlawfully detained and a gun was pointed at Mrs. Dahl's chest. They allege that Dr. Dahl was "falsely convicted" in 2004, and that they were "falsely and maliciously charged [...] and prosecuted" beginning in 2010 "for the possession and sale of perfectly safe, natural products... [which] are arbitrarily, vaguely, and overly-broadly treated as 'drugs' and falsely and maliciously enforced as such." They say that Dr. Dahl has an unwarranted criminal record "for not only something he was not responsible for, but also due to the ultra vires, unconstitutional Regulations and their excessive and abusive enforcement by the Defendants' officials" (emphasis in original). The Dahls and Life Choice also allege that Health Canada issued unfounded Health Warning Bulletins on its website regarding safety concerns with Dr. Dahl's and E.G.D. Modern Design's products, without notifying them, and has refused to remove these warnings even after the products were proven to be safe.

10 The Dahls state that they have suffered loss of reputation, mental distress, and financial losses as a result of these events. In addition to the alleged breaches of ss. 7, 8 and 9 of the Charter, the Dahls claim that they "have also had their Charter rights, as consumers, manufacturers, and distributors, personally breached under ss. 2, 7 and 15 of the Charter for the same reasons and rationale as set out with respect to Nick Mancuso and David Rowland."

11 Finally, the Claim states that in addition to the various constitutional breaches alleged by the "biological" Plaintiffs, the corporate Plaintiffs claim breaches of the following Charter and constitutional rights:

- a) the right to freedom of expression and communication as guaranteed under s. 2 of the Charter;
- b) the procedural safeguards of s. 7 of the Charter in the context of (quasi) criminal prosecution and regulatory scheme;
- c) the right to equality, as a structural imperative of the underlying principle of the Constitution Act, 1867 as enunciated by the Supreme Court of Canada in Winner v SMT (Eastern) Ltd, [1951] SCR 887 [Winner], which right, above and beyond s. 15 of the Charter, is also involved by the biological Plaintiffs.

12 The Defendants argue that the Claim should be struck in its entirety without leave to amend. Should any portion of it proceed, they say that the only proper Defendant is Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Canada. The Plaintiffs argue that not only should the Claim proceed but, in addition, the Court should stay the enforcement of s. 3(1) and (2) of the Act and ss. 44, 63-83, 87, 91, 93, 94, 98 and 108-115 of the Regulations pending the outcome of the action.

ISSUES

13 The issues that arise in this proceeding are:

1. Should the Claim, or any portion of it, be struck?
2. If the Claim is struck, should the Court grant leave to amend it?
3. If any portion of the Claim is permitted to proceed, who are the proper defendants?
4. Should the Court stay the enforcement of s. 3(1) and (2) of the Act and ss. 44, 63-83, 87, 91, 93, 94, 98 and 108-115 of the Regulations pending the outcome of the action?

ARGUMENTS

Defendants' Motion to Strike the Claim

Arguments of the Defendants

14 The Defendants argue that the Claim should be struck in its entirety without leave to amend. They say it is in fact three separate claims combined together into one unduly complex, prolix and convoluted pleading that is so undefined and broad in scope as to be judicially unmanageable. They also argue that it does not meet the basic rules of pleading in that it fails to set out a concise statement of the material facts relied upon, is replete with bald allegations and colourful rhetoric, and pleads evidence instead of material facts in many instances. The Defendants say it is not possible for them to answer the allegations contained in the pleading by preparing a statement of defence.

15 The Defendants also argue that the Plaintiffs are asking the Court to make findings inconsistent with previous findings made by other courts in different proceedings, and are attempting to re-litigate matters that were, or ought to have been, raised in earlier proceedings. As such, they say the Claim is an abuse of process. In addition, the Defendants argue that the corporate Plaintiffs are asserting violations of Charter provisions they are not entitled to invoke, all of the Plaintiffs are seeking prerogative relief (specifically orders in the nature of prohibition) that cannot be obtained in an action, and the Claim names improper and unnecessary parties.

16 The Defendants acknowledge that, for the purposes of this motion, the allegations set out in the Claim are deemed to be proven unless they are incapable of proof. They state that the test for striking out pleadings under Rule 221(1)(a) of the Federal Court Rules, SOR/98-106 [Rules] is whether it is plain and obvious, assuming the facts pleaded to be true, that the claim discloses no reasonable cause of action - that is, it has no reasonable prospect for success: Hunt v Carey Canada Inc, [1990] 2 SCR 959 at para 18 [Hunt]; R v Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd, 2011 SCC 42 at para 17 [Imperial Tobacco]. They also point out that Rule 221 states a number of other grounds upon which a pleading in an action may be struck:

221.(1) On motion, the Court may, at any time, order that a pleading, or anything contained therein, be struck out, with or without leave to amend, on the ground that it

- (a) discloses no reasonable cause of action or defence, as the case may be,
- (b) is immaterial or redundant,
- (c) is scandalous, frivolous or vexatious,
- (d) may prejudice or delay the fair trial of the action,
- (e) constitutes a departure from a previous pleading, or
- (f) is otherwise an abuse of the process of the Court, and may order the action be dismissed or judgment entered accordingly.

17 The Defendants state that the present motion relies upon subrules 221(a), (c), (d), and (f).

18 With respect to the argument that the Claim is scandalous, frivolous and vexatious (Rule 221(c)) and will delay the fair trial of the action (Rule 221(d)), the Defendants say that the Claim fails to meet the basic rules of pleading, is based upon bald assertions that are unsupported by any material facts and, taken as a whole, is a lengthy and disorganized diatribe in favour of de-regulation of the production, distribution, sale and consumption of natural health products.

19 The purpose of pleadings, the Defendants argue, is to clearly define the issues in dispute and give fair notice of the case to be met by the other side. Pleadings establish a landmark by which the parties and the court can determine the relevancy of evidence, both on discovery and at trial: Sivak v Canada, 2012 FC 272 at para 11 [Sivak #2]. Pleadings that are irrelevant, immaterial, redundant, argumentative and/or inserted for colour should be struck pursuant to Rule 221(c), and a pleading should also be struck as scandalous where it contains unfounded and inflammatory attacks on the integrity of a party: Sivak #2, above, at para 89; George v Harris, [2000] OJ No 1762 at para 18, 97 ACWS (3d) 225 [George].

20 The Defendants note that there are four basic requirements of pleading. Every pleading must: (a) state facts and not merely conclusions of law; (b) include material facts; (c) state facts and not the evidence by which they are to be proven; and (d) state facts concisely in a summary form: Carten v Canada, 2009 FC 1233 at para 36, aff'd by 2010 FC 857. A plaintiff is required to plead with sufficient particularity the constituent elements of every cause of action raised, and cannot plead bare assertions without supporting facts, as this may prejudice the trial of the action: Simon v Canada, 2011 FCA 6 at para 18 [Simon]; Merchant Law Group v Canada (Revenue Agency), 2010

21 The Defendants point to examples of what they characterize as bald assertions unsupported by any material facts in paragraphs 6, 7, 16(t), 16(y), 35 and 36 of the Claim. They state that these are "merely examples" and that it is impossible for them to respond to "bald, vague, over-generalized, bombastic assertions." They argue that the Claim does not set out concise statements of material facts in support of recognizable causes of action in law, and is therefore not a proper pleading.

22 With respect to the allegations of Mancuso (paragraphs 24-30 of the Claim), the Defendants say that while he claims that the regulatory schemes enforced by Health Canada officials have curtailed and eliminated the availability of "many" of the "safe products" that he seeks to consume, he has not identified any specific dietary food supplements and vitamins to which he has been denied access. In addition, while he alleges that the current regulatory scheme violates his rights under ss. 2(a), 2(b), 7 and 15 of the Charter, he has failed to plead the constituent elements of the Charter violations he asserts.

23 With respect to the claim of a s. 2(a) violation, the Defendants say that Mancuso has failed to plead the prohibition of any practice or line of conduct with a nexus to a religious belief or morality to which he subscribes, which is required to establish a breach of s. 2(a) of the Charter: Syndicat Northcrest v Amselem, 2004 SCC 47 at para 56. Rather, he simply asserts a preference for certain dietary food supplements and vitamins. Without more, the Defendants argue, Mancuso's s. 2(a) claim presents no reasonable prospect of success.

24 The Defendants say Mancuso's allegations regarding freedom of expression under s. 2(b) of the Charter are similarly deficient. Although the Supreme Court of Canada has adopted a wide definition of "expression," Mancuso has not pleaded any personal attempts to make or receive prohibited expressive activity.

25 The Defendants say that Mancuso has also failed to properly plead a violation of s. 7 of the Charter. He must show that there is a deprivation of life, liberty or security of the person that is inconsistent with a principle of fundamental justice. He has failed to indicate any health product necessary to his bodily and/or psychological integrity that is made unavailable to him by effect of the legislation he seeks to invalidate. As such, there is no basis upon which to find a deprivation of life, liberty or personal security. Furthermore, Mancuso does not assert any discordance with a principle of fundamental justice.

26 Finally, the Defendants say that Mancuso's allegation of a breach of s. 15 of the Charter presents no reasonable prospect of success as he has not pleaded disadvantage based on a prohibited or analogous ground. Mancuso alleges discrimination based on choice of food, dietary supplements and vitamins. This is not a prohibited ground under s. 15 and has not been recognized or pleaded as an analogous ground of discrimination.

27 With respect to the breaches of ss. 2, 7 and 15 alleged by Rowland and Dr. and Mrs. Dahl, the Defendants argue that since these Plaintiffs rely entirely upon Mancuso's facts in support of these allegations, they have pleaded no material facts upon which it might be found that their rights have been violated. In addition, their claims suffer from the same deficiencies present in Mancuso's.

28 The Defendants also argue that the declarations sought by the Plaintiffs are so broad and undefined in scope as to be judicially unmanageable, which is reason alone to conclude that these portions of the Claim have no chance of success: Chaudhary v Canada (Attorney General), 2010 ONSC 6092 at para 17. The Plaintiffs seek sweeping declarations invalidating "the entire scheme and enforcement" of the Regulations. This request is so sweeping and imprecise as to be entirely unworkable. The Plaintiffs also ask that the Court read down the definition of "drug" in s. 2 of the Act to exclude natural health products, but the requested declaration is so vague and imprecise that the Court would be unable to define with precision the scope of any constitutional invalidity or to provide meaningful guidance to the parties. The Defendants say that the Court should not issue sweeping declarations within a factual vacuum.

29 The Defendants also argue that the Plaintiffs' action for damages has no reasonable prospect of success. An action for damages brought under s. 24(1) of the Charter cannot be combined with an action for a declaration of invalidity based on s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982: Mackin v New Brunswick (Minister of Finance), 2002 SCC 13 at para 81 [Mackin]; see also Vancouver (City) v Ward, 2010 SCC 27 at para 39 [Ward]; Schachter v Canada, [1992] 2 SCR 679 at para 89 [Schachter]. Canadian courts, including the Federal Court, have relied upon Mackin to strike statements of claim where s. 24(1) damages are sought for the enforcement of legislation that was constitutionally valid at the time of enforcement: Zündel v Canada, 2005 FC 1612, aff'd 2006 FCA 356 [Zündel]; see also Perron v Canada (Attorney General), [2003] 3 CNLR 198, [2003] OJ No 1348 at paras 55-56.

30 Furthermore, the Defendants say that damages are not available for the application of a law that was constitutionally valid at the time of enforcement. Absent conduct that is in bad faith or an abuse of power, public officials are entitled to a sphere of civil immunity in respect of the acts that give effect to valid grants of statutory authority, and this immunity applies even where that grant of authority is subsequently declared unconstitutional. There are no retroactive remedies under s. 24(1) of the Charter: Mackin, above, at para 78; Schachter, above, at para 89. Since the Plaintiffs have not pleaded with any particularity any allegations of bad faith or abuse of power, even assuming the extensive constitutional invalidities they allege, the Plaintiffs would not be entitled to any damages. The Crown's actions fall squarely within the immunity.

31 The Defendants argue that the claims of Dr. Dahl, Mrs. Dahl and Life Choice should be struck in their entirety because they are an abuse of process. The rule against collateral attack protects against attempts to challenge judicial decisions in previous proceedings. This is complemented by the doctrine of abuse of process in situations where a plaintiff accepts the legal force of a judicial order, but contests the correctness of that order and/or the factual findings underlying it for the purposes of a different proceeding with different legal consequences: Toronto (City) v Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE), Local 79, 2003 SCC 63 [CUPE] at paras 33-34. Canadian courts have routinely struck out civil actions where a plaintiff seeks a judicial finding different from a finding made by a trial judge in a prior criminal proceeding: Demeter v British Pacific Life Insurance Co (1985), 13 DLR (4th) 318, 7 OAC 143 at paras 6-7 (CA); Wolf v Ontario (Attorney General), 2012 ONSC 72 at paras 56-7 [Wolf]; Sauvé v Canada, 2010 FC 217 [Sauvé], aff'd in part by 2011 FCA 141.

32 The Plaintiffs are asking the Court to revisit the legality of the searches conducted by authorities on March 31, 2004 and January 15, 2009, the correctness of the 2004 and 2013 convictions, and the factual findings underlying those convictions. Dr. Dahl and E.D. Internal Health unsuccessfully challenged the validity of three search warrants under s. 8 of the Charter in the 2004 criminal proceeding (R v Dahl #1, at para 10), and the Plaintiffs also unsuccessfully challenged the legality of the January 15, 2009 searches in the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench: trial excerpt from R v Eldon Garth Dahl, Agnesa Dahl and EDG Modern Design Ltd, 100237221Q3 (Alta QB) [R v Dahl #5], March 20, 2012 cross-examination on Voir Dire at pp. 40-41 (Defendant's Motion Record, at pp. 345-346). They now seek to re-litigate the constitutional validity of these same searches. In addition, they allege that they were "falsely and maliciously charged" in the latter proceeding, despite the guilty plea of E.G.D. Modern Design Ltd, with Dr. Dahl acting as principal. The Defendants argue that the entirety of paragraphs 40-41 of the Claim is premised on the assertion that, contrary to the findings of two trial judges and a plea of guilty, these Plaintiffs were subject to unlawful searches and have been wrongfully convicted. This Court would be unable to grant the remedies sought without first making findings on criminal liability, the constitutionality of police searches and/or the admissibility of evidence in a criminal proceeding that are inconsistent with prior findings made in the Plaintiffs' criminal trials. This would undermine the principles of consistency, finality and integrity in the administration of justice, and this portion of the Claim should therefore be struck out in its entirety as a collateral attack and abuse of process.

33 The Defendants argue further that the case law clearly establishes that corporations do not possess rights under s. 7 or s. 15 of the Charter. While corporations can rely on s. 2(a) of the Charter in defence to a criminal charge, that provision cannot be used as a sword by a corporate plaintiff in civil proceedings: Edmonton Journal v Alberta (Attorney General), [1989] 2 SCR 1326 at para 101; Peter Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada, 5th ed (Toronto: Thomson Reuters Canada Ltd., 2007) at 59-12.

34 The Defendants also argue that the Plaintiffs are not entitled to seek an injunction and prohibition by way of an action, as these remedies can only be obtained on application for judicial review: Federal Courts Act, RSC 1985, c F-7, s. 18(3) and Burton v Canada, [1996] FCJ No 1059 at para 22, 65 ACWS (3d) 20 (FCTD).

35 Should any portion of the Claim proceed, the Defendants argue that it should only continue against Her Majesty the Queen. The three named Ministers and the RCMP are not proper or necessary parties. The Claim discloses no material facts alleging any wrongdoing on the part of the named Ministers, the Minister of National Health and Welfare does not exist, naming the Attorney General of Canada is redundant, and the RCMP is not a suable entity: Mandate Erectors and Welding Ltd v Canada, [1996] FCJ No 1130, 118 FTR 290 at paras 19-21 (TD) [Mandate Erectors]; Cairns v Farm Credit Corp, [1992] 2 FC 115 (TD) at para 6 [Cairns]; Sauvé, above, at para 44.

Arguments of the Plaintiffs

36 The Plaintiffs respond that the Claim should not be struck, and that the named Defendants are all proper parties to the action.

37 The Plaintiffs note that the facts pleaded in the Claim must be taken as proven for the purposes of this motion: Canada (Attorney General) v Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, [1980] 2 SCR 735; Nelles v Ontario (1989), 60 DLR (4th) 609 (SCC) [Nelles]; Operation Dismantle Inc v Canada, [1985] 1 SCR 441; Hunt, above; Dumont v Canada (Attorney General), [1990] 1 SCR 279 [Dumont]; Trendsetter Ltd v Ottawa Financial Corp (1989), 32 OAC 327 (CA) [Trendsetter]; Nash v Ontario (1995), 27 OR (3d) 1 (Ont CA) [Nash]; Arsenault v Canada, 2009 FCA 242 [Arsenault]. A claim should be struck "only in plain and obvious cases where the pleading is bad beyond argument" (Nelles, above, at 627), or where it is "plain and obvious" or "beyond doubt" that the claim will not succeed (Dumont, above, at 280; Trendsetter, above). The fact that a claim is novel or raises a difficult point of law is not a justification for striking it: Hunt, above, at 990-91; Nash, above; Hanson v Bank of Nova Scotia (1994), 19 OR (3d) 142 (CA); Adams-Smith v Christian Horizons (1997), 14 CPC (4th) 78 (Ont Gen Div); Miller (Litigation Guardian of) v Wiwchairyk (1997), 34 OR (3d) 640 (Ont Gen Div). Matters not fully settled by the jurisprudence should not be decided on a motion to strike: RD Belanger & Associates Ltd v Stadium Corp of Ontario Ltd (1991), 5 OR (3d) 778 (CA). Indeed, the Plaintiffs say that, in order to succeed in striking a claim, the Defendants must produce a "decided case directly on point from the same jurisdiction demonstrating that the very same issue has been squarely dealt with and rejected": Dalex Co v Schwartz Levitsky Feldman (1994), 19 OR (3d) 463 (Gen Div). Finally, the Court should be generous with respect to the drafting of the pleadings, permitting amendment before striking: Grant v Cormier -- Grant (2001), 56 OR (3d) 215, [2001] OJ No 3851 (CA); Toronto-Dominion Bank v Deloitte Haskins & Sells (1991), 5 OR (3d) 417, [1991] OJ No 1618 (Gen Div).

38 The Plaintiffs argue that the Defendants improperly teeter-totter between asserting that certain facts are not "facts" because they are bald conclusions without evidentiary foundation on the one hand, and on the other hand that facts pleaded are not properly "facts" because they constitute "evidence." This is an attempt to selectively excise facts from the Claim, contrary to this Court's guidance: Liebmann v Canada (Minister of National Defence), [1994] 2 FC 3 (TD) at para 20 [Liebmann].

39 The Plaintiffs also argue that the Defendants confuse the declaratory relief sought with the tort damages portion of the Claim, and ignore the fact that, in the main, the Claim seeks declaratory relief. The Plaintiffs say that they are seeking: 1) in the main, declaratory relief as to the various provisions of the Regulations (Claim, at paras 1(a)(i)-(xi), 1(b)(i)-(v), 1(c) and 1(d)); 2) injunctive relief or relief in the nature of prohibition (Claim, at paras 1(e)(i) -- (iv)); and 3) monetary compensation by way of damages (Claim, at paras 2(a) -- (d)).

40 The Plaintiffs say that declaratory relief goes to the crux of the constitutional right to judicial review: Dunsmuir v New Brunswick, 2008 SCC 9 [Dunsmuir] at paras 27-31; Singh v Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2010 FC 757; Canada v Solosky, [1980] 1 SCR 821 at 830; Manitoba Metis Federation Inc v Canada (Attorney General), 2013 SCC 14 at paras 134, 140, 143 [Manitoba Metis Federation]. Under Rule 64, declaratory relief may be sought in the Federal Court "whether or not any consequential relief is or can be claimed." It has been held that declaratory relief can be sought in an action under s. 17 of the Federal Courts Act. Edwards v Canada (2000), 181 FTR 219, 94 ACWS (3d) 922; see also Canada (Prime Minister) v Khadr, [2010] 1 SCR 44. Furthermore, "[t]he constitutionality of legislation has always been a justiciable issue": Thorson v Canada (Attorney General), [1975] 1 SCR 138 at 151; Manitoba Metis Federation, above, at para 134.

41 The Plaintiffs do not dispute the rules of pleading asserted by the Defendants, but argue that the Claim does not suffer from the deficiencies alleged. They say that the Defendants take various assertions of fact out of context as examples of improper pleading, and seek to improperly colour the factual pleadings in their entirety on that basis. In so doing, the Defendants are not taking the Claim as pleaded, but are re-configuring it to suit their own ends, contrary to the clear direction of the Federal Court of Appeal in Arsenault, above, at para 10. The facts alleged must be read in their context and taken as proven.

42 With respect to the claims of Mancuso, the Plaintiffs say that, contrary to the Defendants' assertions, the Claim sets out (at paragraphs 28, 29 and 30(a) and (b)) that Mancuso has been deprived of products and published information on those products by virtue of the Regulations and their enforcement, thereby infringing his rights under ss. 2, 7 and 15 of the Charter. The Defendants' complaints do not rise above a request for particulars, which the Plaintiffs say are provided in Mancuso's affidavit in the present motion record. The Plaintiffs argue that Mancuso's s. 7 claims are supported by the jurisprudence (Singh v Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), [1985] 1 SCR 177; R v Morgentaler, [1988] 1 SCR 30; Rodriguez v British Columbia (Attorney General), [1993] 3 SCR 519; Chaoulli v Quebec (Attorney General), [2005] 1 SCR 791, and that while his s. 15 claim is arguably novel, it cannot be said that it is "plain and obvious" that it cannot succeed: Dumont, above, at p. 280.

43 The Plaintiffs say that the same arguments apply with respect to the Charter claims of Rowland, Dr. Dahl and Mrs. Dahl, and that the Dahls have additional claims under ss. 2, 7 and 15 of the Charter arising out of the manner in which the search warrants were executed, the fact that out-dated health advisories concerning their products have not been removed, and other facts alleged in the Claim.

44 With respect to the argument that the declarations sought are "unmanageable and imprecise," the Plaintiffs argue that each declaration sought is, in and by itself, precise, clear and discreet. The only "broad-sweeping" declaration sought, they say, is that dietary food supplements and vitamins cannot to be treated as "drugs" under the Act, which relief is well-founded and backed by facts as to the essential differences between a "food" and a "drug."

45 As to the purported inability to claim damages in an action that also seeks relief under s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982, the Plaintiffs argue that Mackin, above, is not as absolute as the Defendants suggest when it comes to damages arising from unconstitutional subordinate Regulations, and the Defendants' position has been bluntly rejected by the Supreme Court in Manitoba Metis Federation, above, at para 134. Furthermore, the notion that damages under s. 24(1) are not available for the application of a law that was constitutionally valid at the time of enforcement does not cover enforcement that was in excess of, and an abuse of, authority, and bad faith and abuse of authority have been pleaded.

46 The Plaintiffs argue that the Dahls' claims are not collateral attacks, and that the doctrines of res judicata and abuse of process do not apply because the judicial forum is different and the issues are different. Specifically, the criminal proceedings did not deal with the declaratory relief sought and the claim of damages for abusive and excess enforcement methods. Dealing with the Defendants' assertions about the relief sought and evidence led at the criminal trials is the purview of the trial judge in the present action and should not be dealt with on a motion to strike. The Plaintiffs argue that the present situation involves different judicial proceedings with different jurisdictions dealing with different grounds and remedies, not a collateral attack, and that recent Supreme Court jurisprudence rejects the Defendants' position on this issue: Dunsmuir, above; Canada (Attorney General) v TeleZone Inc, 2010 SCC 62 [TeleZone]; Canada (Attorney General) v McArthur, 2010 SCC 63; Parrish & Heimbecker Ltd v Canada (Agriculture and Agri-Food), 2010 SCC 64 [Parrish & Heimbecker]; Nu-Pharm Inc v Canada (Attorney General), 2010 SCC 65 [Nu-Pharm]; Canadian Food Inspection Agency v Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada, 2010 SCC 66; Manuge v Canada, 2010 SCC 67 [Manuge]; Sivak v Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2011 FC 402 [Sivak #1].

47 With respect to the Charter claims of the corporate Plaintiffs, the Plaintiffs argue that while corporations do not have the same rights afforded to biological persons under ss. 7 and 15, they can invoke s. 2 Charter rights, s. 7 procedural rights in the context of a (quasi) criminal scheme, and s. 7 fundamental justice rights against overbroad or impermissibly vague legislation: R v Heywood, [1994] 3 SCR 761 [Heywood]; R v Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical Society, [1992] 2 SCR 606 [Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical]. They say that the only Charter relief claimed by the corporate Plaintiffs here is: 1) the void for vagueness and over-breadth doctrines under s. 7, which a corporation has the right to invoke since corporations are subject to the criminal provisions set up by the Regulations (Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical, above); and 2) the right to "commercial speech" under s. 2(a) and (b) of the Charter (RJR-MacDonald Inc v Canada (Attorney General), [1995] 3 SCR 199 [RJR-MacDonald (1995)]; Irwin Toy Ltd v Québec (Attorney General), [1989] 1 SCR 927 [Irwin Toy]; Rocket v Royal College of Dental Surgeons of Ontario, [1990] 2 SCR 232 [Rocket]). They argue that corporations have a right to seek declaratory relief and obtain constitutional remedies with respect to the application and enforcement of statutes governing them: Winner v SMT (Eastern) Ltd, [1951] S.C.R. 887 [Winner]; RJR-MacDonald (1995), above.

48 Furthermore, while the corporate Plaintiffs are not entitled to invoke the equality provisions of s. 15 of the Charter, they argue that they are entitled to invoke "the equality provisions of the underlying constitutional imperative [of] equality of treatment": Donald A MacIntosh, Fundamentals of the Criminal Justice System, (Agincourt: Carswell, 1989); Winner, above; Bolling v Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497 (1954); Canada v Schmidt, [1987] 1 SCR 500.

49 With respect to the Defendants' argument that they are not entitled to the injunctive relief claimed, the Plaintiffs argue that nothing prevents the Court from granting injunctive relief in the course of, and ancillary to, an action (Toth v Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration) (1988), 6 Imm LR (2d) 123 (FCA) [Toth]; Manitoba (Attorney General) v Metropolitan Stores (MTS) Ltd, [1987] 1 SCR 110 [Metropolitan Stores]; RJR-MacDonald v Canada (Attorney General), [1994] 1 SCR 311 [RJR-MacDonald (1994)]), and that nothing prevents the Court from granting relief "in the nature" of prohibition and/or injunction under s. 24(1) of the Charter.

50 With respect to the proper parties to the action, the Plaintiffs argue that while Her Majesty the Queen is normally the only Defendant in claims against the government, in cases dealing with constitutional issues this Court has determined that others can be personally named: Liebmann, above, at paras 51-52. Furthermore, the determination of the standing of parties is not best done at the stage of a motion to strike: Apotex Inc v Canada (Governor in Council), 2007 FCA 374 at para 13 [Apotex].

Plaintiffs' Motion for an Interim Injunction

51 As noted above, the Plaintiffs have filed a cross-motion seeking to stay the enforcement of s. 3(1) and (2) of the Act and ss. 44, 63-83, 87, 91, 93, 94, 98 and 108-115 of the Regulations pending the outcome of the action. The parties agree that the test on such a motion is that set out in Toth, above (see also RJR-MacDonald (1994), above, at pp. 333-334; Metropolitan Stores, above). That is, the Plaintiffs must establish that:

- a) They have raised a serious issue for trial;
- b) They would suffer irreparable harm if the provisions are not stayed; and
- c) The balance of convenience favours the granting of a stay.

52 The parties disagree on whether that test is met in the present circumstances.

Arguments of the Plaintiffs

53 The Plaintiffs say they have raised serious issues for trial in their claim. They argue that the threshold for this element of the test is low (RJR-MacDonald (1994), above, at para 50), and that such a stay is obtainable as against regulatory provisions as well as executive action: Toth, above; Metropolitan Stores, above; RJR-MacDonald (1994), above. They argue that the action presents the following serious issues, among others:

- (a) That the definition of "drug" in s. 2 of the Act is overly-broad and thus violates s. 7 of the Charter (citing Heywood, above, at paras 48-51);
- (b) That the doctrine of overbreadth and others apply under s. 7, as tenets of fundamental justice, to all legislative provisions whether criminal, civil, administrative or other (citing Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical, above);
- (c) That the Regulations with respect to natural health products are ultra vires the Parliament of Canada and unlawfully intrude on the exclusive jurisdiction of the Provinces over civil rights, property, food, health and matters of a merely private and local nature (citing the Constitution Act, 1867, s. 92(7), (13) and (16), Schneider v British Columbia, [1982] 2 SCR 112 at 142; RJR-MacDonald (1995), above at para 32; Eldridge v British Columbia (Attorney General), [1997] 3 SCR 624 at para 24; Reference Re Securities Act, 2011 SCC 66), and is beyond the Federal government's criminal law power;
- (d) That the Regulations are ultra vires the Act as they go beyond the intent and meaning of the enacting legislation;
- (e) That the definition of "drug" in the Act is void for vagueness in that it encompasses any and all food and dietary supplements and / or vitamins and herbs (citing Heywood, above; Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical, above); and
- (f) That s. 3(1) and (2) of the Act violate the Plaintiffs' rights under s. 2(a) and (b) of the Charter and s. 1(c) of the Canadian Bill of Rights (citing Irwin Toy, above; Rocket, above; RJR-MacDonald (1995), above).

54 The Plaintiffs also submit that they will suffer irreparable harm if the statutory provisions are not stayed. Physical and psychological integrity is protected as a s. 7 right, and "commercial free speech" is protected under s. 2(a) and (b), and the ongoing infringement of these rights is not compensable through damages. Where a serious issue has been established and there is a potential Charter breach, irreparable harm is made out as such breaches are assumed not to be compensable through damages: RJR-MacDonald (1994), above, at paras 60-61.

55 As to the balance of convenience, the Plaintiffs argue that the provisions sought to be stayed do not deal with any health and safety issues, and that in the history of the natural health products at issue, there has been no serious injury or death attributed to them. With respect to the public interest, the Plaintiffs point to the Supreme Court's analysis in RJR-MacDonald (1994), above, at paras 62-67, affirming that that the public interest is a "special factor" to be considered in constitutional cases, but noting that "the government does not have a monopoly on the public interest" and it is open to both parties in an interlocutory proceeding involving the Charter to rely upon considerations of the public interest.

Arguments of the Defendants

56 The Defendants argue that the Plaintiffs have not raised a serious issue to be tried, largely on the basis of their argument on the motion to strike that the Claim as a whole is frivolous and vexatious. Where this is the case, they argue, no serious issue is raised: RJR-MacDonald (1994), above, at p. 337.

57 With respect to irreparable harm, the Defendants say that the Federal Court of Appeal has repeatedly stated that speculative harm is not irreparable harm (Canada (Attorney General) v Canada (Information Commissioner), 2001 FCA 25 at para 12 [Information Commissioner]; International Longshore and Warehouse Union, Canada v Canada (Attorney General), 2008 FCA 3 at paras 25, 33), and argue that the harm alleged by the Plaintiffs is speculative. For example, while Mancuso identifies three products "eliminated from the market" allegedly due to the licensing scheme being challenged, he also states in his affidavit that he uses these products "regularly and commonly." He also fails to identify any medical condition from which he suffers that will deteriorate or worsen unless a stay is granted; his claims to mental and physical distress are unspecified. Thus, the Court is left to speculate as to the nature of the harm that will result. The harms alleged by Rowland are similarly speculative. Moreover, the business income losses he alleges are compensable through damages if the Plaintiffs are successful, and thus by definition they do not constitute irreparable harm: RJR-MacDonald (1994), above, at p. 341. The Defendants note that the law on damages for a Charter breach has developed substantially since RJR-MacDonald (1994), such that it should no longer be assumed that alleged Charter breaches cannot be remedied through damages: see Ward, above.

58 Finally, with respect to the balance of convenience, the Defendants note that the public interest has central importance in assessing the balance of convenience in Charter cases (RJR-MacDonald (1994), above, at p. 343), and argue that legislation is presumed to serve the public interest, even in the face of a constitutional challenge: Harper v Canada (Attorney General), 2000 SCC 57 at para 9 [Harper]. In most cases, they say, this presumption is determinative on a motion for an interlocutory injunction, which will only be granted based on alleged unconstitutionality in "clear cases": Harper, above, at para 9. It is rare for a claim alleging constitutional invalidity to meet this threshold for at least two reasons: 1) the extent and meaning of the rights guaranteed by the Charter are often ambiguous, particularly where the constitutionality of the impugned provisions has not been previously litigated; and 2) it remains open to the government to justify a breach of those rights based on s. 1 of the Charter (Metropolitan Stores, above, at paras 42, 44). At the interlocutory stage, the Defendants argue, a reviewing court is simply not in an adequate position to assess the merits of a reasonable limitation argument.

59 In this case, the Defendants argue, the impugned provisions have the purpose of protecting the health and well-being of Canadians by prohibiting the advertising and labelling of drugs for serious diseases and by regulating the manufacturing, labelling, advertising and sale of natural health products. Even the temporary staying of these provisions would deprive officials of tools that Parliament and the Governor in Council have enacted to protect the health and safety of the public. Thus, in advance of any finding of unconstitutionality, the balance of convenience must favour the maintenance of validly-enacted legislation, and the Plaintiffs' motion for an injunction must be dismissed.

60 In addition, the Defendants argue, the Plaintiffs have provided no compelling basis to rebut the presumption that the balance of convenience favours the continued operation of the challenged laws. Financial loss is not sufficient to bring a claim within the small minority of cases where the interlocutory staying of legislation can be justified: Evangelical Fellowship of Canada v Canadian Musical Reproduction Rights Agency, [1999] FCJ No 1391, [2000] 1 FC 586 (FCA) at para 32. There is no basis here to find that the public interest is served by granting a stay of the impugned legislation.

ANALYSIS

Motion to Strike

The Law

61 There is no disagreement between the parties as to the rules and principles applicable in a motion to strike. The disagreement arises over their application to the facts of this case.

62 This motion is brought under subrules 221(a), (c), (d) and (f). The Defendants say that the Claim does not satisfy the basic rules of pleading. They say it is scandalous, frivolous and vexatious, that it will prevent the fair and effective trial of the action, and that at least in part it constitutes a collateral attack on judicial decisions rendered in other proceedings. They say that the Claim is so deficient that it should be struck in its entirety.

The General Challenge

63 As the Defendants point out, the Claim constitutes a challenge to the Act and the Regulations.

64 In oral argument, the Plaintiffs have told the Court that they are only challenging the NPN and safe licensing aspects of the Act and Regulations as well as the overly broad definition of "drug" found in s. 2 of the Act that allows any food, dietary food supplement, nutritional food derivative, or vitamin to be classified as a drug for purposes of the legislation, even when such substances do not pose a health risk. The Plaintiffs say that they do not wish to challenge the health and safety aspects of the legislative scheme. The basic assertion is that food, dietary food supplements and vitamins should be classified as food, and not drugs, and that the enforcement and inspection system to which they are subject should be akin to the food inspection and enforcement system, and not the pharmaceutical and/or prohibited drug system.

65 It seems to me that these objectives are adequately and clearly embodied in the CLAIM section of the Claim along with the legal ramifications and basis for the relief being sought. The issue is whether the balance of the Claim is sufficiently compliant with the rules of pleading. In other words, does the Claim plead with sufficient particularity the constituent elements of each cause of action or legal ground raised, and does it provide a sufficient factual basis in an appropriate and summary form?

66 The Defendants, however, feel that at least portions of the CLAIM section should be struck for several reasons:

- a) The claims are too broad and abstract. The substances at issue are not specified (apparently some 55,000 substances are presently regulated);
- b) 1(a)(viii) is a repetition of 1(a)(i);
- c) 1(a)(ix) lacks the specificity required of pleadings. The Defendants need to know the names of the officials involved, and the time and places of the violations at issue;
- d) 1(a)(x) is too abstract and requires the material facts related to the Plaintiffs;
- e) 1(a)(xi) is likewise too abstract and needs materials facts related to the Plaintiffs.

67 As regards 1(a) of the CLAIM section, the Plaintiffs are merely stating in a general way the relief they are seeking and the basis for that relief. There is no need to state the specifics here if they can be found in the balance of the Claim. In my view, 1(a)(viii) is not a repetition of 1(a)(i) because it states a different legal basis for declaring the definition of "drug" to be void.

68 As regards 1(b) of the CLAIM section, the Defendants raise the following concerns:

- a) 1(b)(i) is too broad and unmanageable. It says the "entire scheme and enforcement, [...] is unconstitutional in breaching section 7 of the Charter in its reverse onus enforcement [...]";
- b) 1(b)(ii) is likewise too broad and unmanageable. Specifics are required. The usual way to attack a scheme of enforcement is by way of judicial review of a particular administrative decision under the Act, rather than by way of an action;
- c) 1(b)(iii) raises the same concerns;
- d) 1(b)(iv) is too broad because it requires the Court to declare that anyone can eat what they want without restriction by the State.

69 My reading of these paragraphs in the CLAIM section is that 1(b)(i) only deals with the "reverse onus" aspect of enforcement and that 1(b)(ii) only deals with over breadth with respect to NPN licensing and compliance costs. Hence, I see nothing inappropriate about these paragraphs.

70 As regards 1(b)(iii), it seems to me that the reference to a "large number of persons" is a problem because it is unnecessarily broad and unmanageable. However, the intent may be that the discrimination occurs "against any person, who, like the individual Plaintiffs, have a preference [...]". Hence, the final seven lines of 1(b)(iii) should be struck with leave to amend.

71 I also agree that 1(b)(iv) is much broader than what the Plaintiffs say is their purpose in bringing this claim. I don't see how the Court could possibly, on the facts pleaded, deal with a request for such a broad declaration, or how the Defendants could defend. Hence, this paragraph should also be struck with leave to amend.

72 As regards 1(c) of the CLAIM section, the Defendants complain that the Plaintiffs are asking the Court to review the whole scheme for classification, inspection and enforcement of food, dietary food supplements and vitamins and declare how it should be regulated. I agree with the Defendants that this is far beyond what is required in the present case, or indeed the power of the Court. It would involve the Defendants and the Court in a broad inquiry (there are presently 55,000 approved health products) and in a broad-ranging policy discussion as to how such products are best regulated. Even if this were an appropriate role for the Court to assume - which it is not (see Friends of the Earth v Canada (Governor in Council), [2009] 3 FCR 201 at paras 25, 33, 36, 39-40, 45 aff'd 2009 FCA 297; Canadian Union of Public Employees v Canada (Minister of Health), 2004 FC 1334 at para 40) -- the pleadings do not, when read as a whole, provide any factual basis for such a broad declaration. Paragraph 1(c) should be struck.

73 As regards 1(e) of the CLAIM section, the Defendants have the following complaints:

- a) The prerogative relief of prohibition and injunction is not available in an action;
- b) 1(e)(i) is too broad and a declaration of invalidity is sufficient;
- c) With respect to 1(e)(ii), there is nothing in the Claim that provides a factual or legal basis for an interference with NAFTA, GATT, the WTO, and related agreements, policies regulations, and rulings;
- d) 1(e)(iii) asks for a general prohibition that goes well beyond the issues and facts set out in the Claim;
- e) 1(e)(iv) is far too broad in that it refers to "any advertising" and it should be made clear that the intent is to deal with sections 3(1) and 3(2) of the Act.

74 I see no reason to rule at this stage that the prerogative remedies are not available in an action. See my decision in Sivak #1, above, at paras 36-44. In Manuge, above, one of the companion cases to Telezone, above, the plaintiff sought declarations of invalidity (on both Charter and administrative law grounds), constitutional remedies and damages or restitution in the context of an action, and the Supreme Court raised no concerns with this approach in ruling that the claim should be permitted to proceed in the Federal Court: see Manuge, above, at paras 1, 9-10 and 17-24. In the companion case of Nu-Pharm, above, the Supreme Court raised no concern that the plaintiff sought injunctive relief along with damages in the same claim before this court. In Ward v Samson Cree Nation, [1999] FCJ No 1403, 247 NR 254 (CA), the Court of Appeal found that a claim for declaratory relief could be added to a claim for damages through an amendment to the statement of claim, though the majority and minority differed on the basis for doing so. See also Hinton v Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2008 FCA 215 at paras 49-50 and 54.

75 In both Manuge and Telezone, the Supreme Court noted that there is "a residual discretion to stay an action if it is premised on public law considerations to such a degree that [...] 'in its essential character, it is a claim for judicial review with only a thin pretence of a private wrong'": Manuge, above, at para 18, quoting Telezone, above, at para 78. It is not enough, however, for a defendant to claim that some of the matters at issue would be amenable to judicial review. If there are valid causes of action pleaded -- which an amended statement of claim may yet disclose in this matter -- this suggests there is more than a thin pretence of private wrong and the plaintiff will normally be permitted to pursue the action: Manuge, at paras 19-21; Telezone, at para 76.

76 Paragraph 1(e)(i) is too broad in that it refers to paragraph 1(c) which has been struck, but I don't see that the references to paragraph 1(a) or (b) cause a problem. Consequently, the reference to paragraph 1(c) should be struck from paragraph 1(e)(i).

77 I agree with the Defendants' objections to paragraph 1(e)(ii), (iii) and (iv). The relief requested here goes well beyond what the facts and law pleaded in the rest of the Claim can support. Consequently, these paragraph should be struck.

The Damage Claims

78 The Defendants say that the damages claims have no reasonable prospect of success and that the Plaintiffs are improperly seeking relief under both s. 24(1) of the Charter and s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982.

79 Relying upon Mackin, above, and Justice Hughes' decision in Zündel, above, the Defendants say that, absent conduct that is in bad faith or an abuse of power, damages are not available where a plaintiff seeks civil remedies arising from the application of a law that was constitutionally valid at the time of enforcement.

80 The Plaintiffs say that Mackin is not absolute, and does not prevent damages for unconstitutional subordinate regulations. Further, they say that TeleZone, and Sivak #1, both above, make it clear that the Plaintiffs can seek declaratory relief and damages together. They argue that Mackin does not cover the situation where damages are not barred by the expiry of a limitation period, and does not prevent a claim for damages where enforcement has occurred in excess and abuse of authority, or in bad faith, as pleaded in the present case.

81 I agree that the rule in Mackin is not absolute. As the Supreme Court explained in Ward, above at para 39, the consequence of Mackin is that a claim for damages for state conduct pursuant to a statute that was valid at the time will be struck unless the state conduct under the law was "clearly wrong, in bad faith or an abuse of power." The rule of law demands that duly enacted laws be enforced until declared invalid, and in the absence of "threshold misconduct" as just described, no claim for damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter (or any other claim for damages) will result from that enforcement if the law is subsequently declared invalid: Ward, above, at paras 39, 41; Mackin, above, at paras 78-79. The Court in Mackin went on to say (at para 81):

[81] In short, although it cannot be asserted that damages may never be obtained following a declaration of unconstitutionality, it is true that, as a rule, an action for damages brought under s. 24(1) of the Charter cannot be combined with an action for a declaration of invalidity based on s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[Emphasis added]

82 I see nothing in Mackin that suggests the application of the above principles is in any way dependent on whether or not damages are barred by the expiry of a limitation period. That is a separate issue.

83 The Plaintiffs do plead that methods of enforcement of the Act and the Regulations are in excess and are an abuse of authority at paragraphs 19-21, and make further allegations of malicious intent and improper purpose or bad faith in relation to enforcement actions against the Dahls and their company at paragraph 92. However, each of these pleadings must be struck for reasons I will outline further below. If the Plaintiffs wish to maintain an action for damages arising from the enforcement of the portions of the Act and the Regulations which they claim are ultra vires and unconstitutional, they will need to plead, in a manner that conforms to the rules of pleading, state conduct under those provisions that was "clearly wrong, in bad faith or an abuse of power."

The Facts

84 The Defendants say that paragraph 6 of Claim offends the rules of pleading because it makes general, unsupported assertions about natural health products that "have been safely consumed for centuries, in various forms, without regulations, prohibition, nor enforcement as 'drugs', prior to 1985-2005."

85 I agree that this is little more than an unsupported assertion and, in its present form, it is not possible for the Defendants to answer. The Defendants need to know at least:

- a) What specific products are referred to;
- b) When and where they have been consumed;

- c) By whom have they been consumed;
- d) In what forms have they been consumed.

86 Paragraph 6 should be struck for failure to plead sufficient material facts to support the assertion made.

87 Paragraph 7, likewise refers in a general way to "draconian tactics usually reserved for dangerous, armed criminals and terrorists." There are insufficient facts pleaded to support this broad assertion or to save it from being scandalous and vexatious, and, in its present form, it is impossible to defend against without investigating every instance of enforcement. The Defendants are also being asked to examine, and the Court to rule on, the erroneous classification of "any and all 'foods' as 'drugs'." As there appear to be, according to Defendants' counsel, some 55,000 substances to deal with, this is simply unworkable for the Defendants and the Court. It seems to me that some specific substances and foods are required together with the facts to support the basic assertion of arbitrary selection. Paragraph 7 should be struck.

88 Paragraph 8 is similarly problematic. It is not clear whether the Plaintiffs are asserting that the Defendants have selected and prohibited the sale of prunes, or have prohibited health claims for prunes, chamomile and oregano, or whether they are saying this could happen. And there is no indication of how these examples are connected to anything that the Plaintiffs might have suffered. Paragraph 6 refers to the Plaintiffs as consumers, producers, distributors and vendors, but unless the Defendants know which dietary food supplements and vitamins they produce, distribute, sell and consume, it is impossible to know if any of what may be hypothetical examples are reasonable or have any relevance for the Plaintiffs. Paragraph 8 should be struck for these reasons.

89 Paragraph 9 may or may not be a reasonable hypothesis. Without specific instances, or the material facts as to the erroneous classification and arbitrary selection of all foods and substances presently classified, the Defendants cannot defend these assertions or answer hypothetical examples.

90 The Plaintiffs appear to be avoiding specific foods and substances because they wish to have all natural health products declared foods and freely available, with the right to claim health benefits, without restraint. But they are not providing the material facts required on all natural health products to support why this is justified and allow the Defendants to answer the case and the Court to adjudicate it. Nor are they explaining or providing the facts to connect all natural health products to them.

91 In my view, then, paragraphs 6, 7, 8, and 9 have to be struck.

92 The Defendants object to paragraph 10 of the Claim as being argument and not facts. In my view, this paragraph contains a statement of the facts upon which the Plaintiffs rely to distinguish dietary food supplements from drugs. I see nothing improper with this paragraph.

93 The Defendants also object to paragraph 11 as unsupported assertion and argument. There is no fact stated with respect to any particular health product and the Court is being asked to draw a single conclusion about all natural health products. In my view, however, this paragraph is a statement about Health Canada's approach to enforcement and the reasons why the Plaintiffs consider such an approach to enforcement to be inappropriate. I don't see why the Defendants should have any difficulty in answering this paragraph. It either describes Health Canada's approach to enforcement or it doesn't.

94 The Defendants object to paragraph 12 of the Claim as having no relevance and for not being connected to any of the Plaintiffs, and because no declaration is sought with regard to Schedule F of the Regulations. In my view, however, this paragraph does no more than provide specific facts to show that dietary food supplements are listed together with pharmaceuticals and are treated in the same way. These are facts to support the Plaintiffs' claim that natural health products are dealt with inappropriately under the Act and the Regulations. This paragraph is simple to answer. These substances either are listed, or are not listed, in Schedule F.

95 The Defendants object to paragraph 13 as being argument, bare legal conclusions and too wide-ranging in that it refers to every dietary food supplement and every drug. It seems to me that the paragraph is an attempt to explain and provide the facts to support the Plaintiffs' principle proposition that natural health products should not be listed and treated in law like drugs because drugs have different properties and propensities from natural food products. The only sentence I can see as objectionable occurs in 13(g) and reads "we have, in Canada, an alarming growth of these diseases termed 'iatrogenic' (physician caused)." This is objectionable because there are no facts pleaded to support what is a bare conclusion and a matter of opinion. It is also irrelevant to the factual comparison between drugs and natural food products. Like "Death is the most permanent side effect of all" in 13(d), it is inserted for colour and to promote natural food products at the expense of pharmaceuticals. This sentence should be struck.

96 The Defendants also object to paragraph 14 as being too broad and as involving a policy debate about what products should be regulated by Health Canada, which the Court cannot decide. They also argue that it contains bare conclusions and assertions rather than material facts. I have to disagree with the Defendants. Once again, the paragraph is a statement of the material facts upon which the Plaintiffs rely to distinguish "nutrients" from drugs, and these facts are recited to support their argument that nutrients should not be regulated like drugs, which in turn gives rise to the relief that is requested. I do not see this as requiring the Court to decide policy. The issue for the Court will be whether, as a result of natural food products being regulated in the way they are, have the Plaintiffs established a right to the relief they seek on the basis of the forms of action and breaches of rights which they allege?

97 The Defendants say that paragraph 15 is improper for a number of reasons:

- a) It deals with Dr. Dahl's past convictions under the CDSA and has nothing to do with the relief being sought in this claim in relation to the Act and the Regulations;
- b) 15(f) does not plead facts;
- c) 15(g) is colourful in its assertion that RCMP officers "have guns drawn every time when they raid vitamin suppliers." This is a fact the Plaintiffs cannot possibly know.

98 In general, I agree with the Defendants on most of these points and, as I point out later, I also agree that the bulk of the pleadings with respect to Dr. Dahl have to be struck as an abuse of process, and the remainder must be struck for other reasons. I see nothing wrong, however, with the subparagraphs (a), (b), (c) and (h) and find that they can be separated from the other subparagraphs. It is my view that only subparagraphs (e), (f), and (g) should be struck.

99 The Defendants object to paragraph 16 as containing unmanageable bald assertions, unsupported by material facts. The Plaintiffs concede that paragraph 16 probably belongs, for the most part, in the CLAIMS sections. I think the best approach, then, is to strike paragraph 16 in its entirety so that the Plaintiffs can correct the problem by way of amendment. However, I also point out the following:

- a) There is a significant amount of overlap with the CLAIMS as already set out and the Plaintiffs should ensure that repetition does not occur;
- b) Moving paragraph 16(f) to the CLAIMS section will not cure the problem because these are material facts pleaded to support the assertion;
- c) The kind of assertion that is found in paragraph 16(g) involves a general inquiry into all of the natural health products being regulated and is not connected to the individual Plaintiffs. It is more argument than pleading;
- d) The kind of bald assertion found in paragraph 16(m) about "confusion" is unacceptable without the specifics. As pleaded, it is nothing more than an opinion or argument;
- e) The same goes for paragraphs 16(s), (t), (u);

Mancuso v. Canada (Minister of National Health and Welfare), [2014] F.C.J. No. 732

- f) Paragraph 16(y) again refers to "Draconian methods of enforcement" as though they are ubiquitous and routine, but there are insufficient material facts to support such an assertion.

If the Plaintiffs intend to re-draft paragraph 16 for inclusion elsewhere in the Claim, these problems should be born in mind.

100 Paragraph 17 of the Claim alleges that the Government specifically designed the regulations to be cost prohibitive for and to eliminate small producers, distributors etc. Legislative purpose could be relevant to some of the constitutional analysis, including the division of powers issues (if found to be economic regulation of a specific industry, it would presumptively fall under the provincial power over property and civil rights). On the other hand, if this allegation is meant to establish bad faith, then it offends the rules of pleading because bad faith has to be pleaded with more particularity, per Merchant Law, above. I think the Plaintiffs must amend the pleading to clarify this point, and to plead the allegation with sufficient particularity if it is intended to establish bad faith, before they can be permitted to pursue such a claim through discovery and at trial.

101 The Defendants object to paragraph 18 of the Claim as being too broadly worded as a general attack on the regulatory scheme of the Act and the Regulations that is not connected to any material facts pleaded. It contains unsupported general conclusions -- 18(b) -- and applies to all applications - 18(c) -- under the scheme.

102 In my view, paragraph 18 is an attempt to provide material facts to support a general assertion that the regime under the Act and the Regulations is vague, overly-broad and arbitrary. This is necessary background for the Plaintiffs specific complaints:

- a) 18(a) is a clear statement of fact;
- b) 18(b) is a straight statement of fact about what qualifications are required of any decision-maker. It does not require an assessment of every decision and every official;
- c) 18(c) is a statement of fact about how any application is assessed and that science plays no part and no reasons are given;
- d) 18(d) is likewise a statement of fact;
- e) 18(e) is likewise a statement of fact;
- f) 18(f) is unacceptable as a bald, unsupported assertion and requires specific facts;
- g) 18(g) is a summary of the character and impact of the facts previously pleaded but it is laden with argument.

I agree with the Defendants that these facts about the administration of the regime may not avail the Plaintiffs in the relief they seek for reasons of relevance to the Plaintiffs' own experience with the system. But at this stage, apart from 18(f) and 18(g), I don't think they can be struck as inadequate pleading. My conclusion is that 18(f) and 18(g) must be struck but that the balance of paragraph 18 can remain.

103 This highlights a general challenge in evaluating the pleadings. In effect, we have two separate claims:

- a) Claims for relief based upon individual experience; and
- b) A general attack on the scheme of the Act and the Regulations.

In some cases, the same facts may go toward both. This is not prohibited. In general, it is sufficient for a party to plead the material facts and counsel is then at liberty to present in argument any legal consequences which the facts support: see Conohan v The Cooperators, [2002] 3 FC 421, 2002 FCA 60. I have attempted to be sensitive to this and to evaluate facts pleaded in relation to more than one type of claim or cause of action where they could reasonably be seen as relevant. Still, the Plaintiffs bear the responsibility of pleading the material facts in a manner that discloses a cause of action recognized in law, and it is inevitable that the manner of pleading will affect whether a claim is recognizable or not. The pleadings play an important role in providing notice and defining the issues to be tried, and the Court and opposing parties cannot be left to speculate as to how the facts might be variously arranged to support various causes of action: see Johnson, above, at para 25. Rather, "[e]ach constituent element of each cause of action must be pleaded with sufficient particularity": Simon, above, at para 18.

104 The Defendants object generally to paragraphs 19-21 of the Claim as being bare general assertions without supporting facts. As noted above, these paragraphs (and paragraphs 19 and 21 in particular), amount to a pleading that the Defendants' enforcement actions were an abuse of authority and/or conducted in bad faith. Thus, the Court must bear in mind the guidance of the Court of Appeal in Merchant Law, above, at para 34-35:

[34] I agree with the Federal Court's observation (at paragraph 26) that paragraph 12 of the amended statement of claim "contains a set of conclusions, but does not provide any material facts for the conclusions." When pleading bad faith or abuse of power, it is not enough to assert, baldly, conclusory phrases such as "deliberately or negligently," "callous disregard," or "by fraud and theft did steal": Zundel v. Canada, 2005 FC 1612, 144 A.C.W.S. (3d) 635; Vojic v. Canada (M.N.R.), [1987] 2 C.T.C. 203, 87 D.T.C. 5384 (F.C.A.). "The bare assertion of a conclusion upon which the court is called upon to pronounce is not an allegation of material fact": Canadian Olympic Association v. USA Hockey, Inc. (1997), 74 C.P.R. (3d) 348, 72 A.C.W.S. (3d) 346 (F.C.T.D.). Making bald, conclusory allegations without any evidentiary foundation is an abuse of process: AstraZeneca Canada Inc. v. Novopharm Limited, 2010 FCA 112 at paragraph 5. If the requirement of pleading material facts did not exist in Rule 174 or if courts did not enforce it according to its terms, parties would be able to make the broadest, most sweeping allegations without evidence and embark upon a fishing expedition. As this Court has said, "an action at law is not a fishing expedition and a plaintiff who starts proceedings simply in the hope that something will turn up abuses the court's process": Kastner v. Painblanc (1994), 58 C.P.R. (3d) 502, 176 N.R. 68 at paragraph 4 (F.C.A.).

[35] To this, I would add that the tort of misfeasance in public office requires a particular state of mind of a public officer in carrying out the impugned action, i.e., deliberate conduct which the public officer knows to be inconsistent with the obligations of his or her office: Odhavji Estate v. Woodhouse, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 263, 2003 SCC 69 at paragraph 28. For this tort, particularization of the allegations is mandatory. Rule 181 specifically requires particularization of allegations of "breach of trust," "wilful default," "state of mind of a person," "malice" or "fraudulent intention."

105 Paragraph 19 is drafted as though the enforcement methods complained of are the same in every case of enforcement and are always an excess or abuse of authority carried out for the same purpose in each case. The Plaintiffs cannot possibly know this, and it is telling that they only refer to one example in their own case (the experiences of the Dahls). A claim that does not plead sufficient material facts for the defendant to know how to answer is a vexatious pleading (Kisikawpimootewin v Canada, 2004 FC 1426; Murray v Canada (1978), 21 NR 230 (FCA)), nor can an action be brought on speculation hoping that sufficient facts will be obtained during discovery to substantiate the pleadings (AstraZeneca Canada Inc v Novopharm Ltd, 2009 FC 1209, aff'd 2010 FCA 112; Sivak #2, above, at paras 30-31). The appropriateness of enforcement procedures as well as their purpose can only be assessed and adjudicated by knowing the full facts and context of each individual case. That is an impossible action to mount and to defend when there must be thousands of instances. As drafted, this is a colourful assertion unsupported by the facts as pleaded. It has to be struck.

106 Paragraph 20 has similar problems. It asserts a general practice but cites no specific instances. Whether or not this is a general and invariable practice is a fact that can be defended, but it need not go further than that. If it is not a general and invariable practice then the Defendants need not make or address specific instances unless the Plaintiffs have pleaded specific instances correctly. Hence, I think it needs to be made clear by the Plaintiffs whether what they refer to here is something mandated by the Act or the Regulations, or conduct set out in some administrative policy of directive, or whether they are referring to what individual officials have chosen to do that is either in breach of the Act or the Regulations or not required for the purposes of the regime. If the Plaintiffs intend this as a statement of what all officials do then they need to plead the facts to show that it always occurs (which seems impossible to me) or individual instances of this having happened that the Defendants can answer and the Court can adjudicate. Paragraph 20 as presently drafted should be struck so that these matters can be clarified by amendment.

107 Paragraph 21 has the same problems as paragraph 19. It asserts conduct that occurs in all instances and which the Plaintiffs cannot know, the Defendants cannot defend, and the Court cannot manage or adjudicate without knowing the full facts and context of each instance. In addition, it alleges that Health Canada officials repeatedly engaged in a practice of misleading the RCMP, which is a serious allegation of bad faith that would need to be pleaded with much greater particularity to avoid being vexatious: see Merchant Law, above, at paras 34-35, and Rule 181. This paragraph should be struck.

108 The Defendants object to paragraphs 22 and 23 of the Claim on the grounds that Rowland is attempting to use the doctrine of reasonable expectations as a sword in a context where, even if the facts pleaded are true, all he is saying is that his personal expectations were not met. I agree that the doctrine of reasonable expectations (or legitimate expectations as it is sometimes called) cannot be used in this way and that no valid basis is pleaded and no reasonable cause of action is set out in these paragraphs. See Mackin, above, at para 83. As the Supreme Court has consistently held, "[t]he doctrine of reasonable expectations does not create substantive rights, and does not fetter the discretion of a statutory decision-maker": Moreau-Bérubé v. New Brunswick (Judicial Council), [2002] 1 SCR 249, 2002 SCC 11 at para 78; Baker v Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [1999] 2 SCR 817 at para 26; Reference Re Canada Assistance Plan (B.C.), [1991] 2 SCR 525 at paras 58-59. None of the Plaintiffs could have any legitimate expectation that the Government of Canada would change the Regulations or take any other action based on a public announcement by a Minister of the Crown that he intended to follow the recommendations of a Parliamentary Committee. Paragraphs 22 and 23 should be struck.

109 The Defendants make extensive objection to Mancuso's Charter claims as set out in paragraphs 24 to 30 of the Claim:

- (a) The claims pleaded by Mancuso are similarly composed of bald assertions of Charter infringements unsupported by material facts. Mancuso pleads that the entirety of the "current scheme" violates his rights under sections 2, 7 and 15 of the Charter. Mancuso fails to specify the health product(s) that are not made available to him as a result of the Food and Drugs Act or the Natural Health Product Regulations, or that he has unsuccessfully taken steps to obtain any such products.
- (b) Mancuso also fails to plead the constituent elements of the Charter violations he asserts. Section 2(a) of the Charter protects the single integrated concept of "freedom of conscience and religion". To successfully establish a breach of section 2(a), a claimant must demonstrate that he/she has a practice or belief, having a nexus with religion or secular morality, which calls for a particular line of conduct. Mancuso has failed to plead the prohibition of any practice or line of conduct with a nexus to religious beliefs or morality to which he ascribes. He simply asserts a preference for certain dietary food supplements and vitamins. Without more, his section 2(a) claim presents no reasonable prospect for success.
- (c) The plaintiff's allegations relating to freedom of expression under section 2(b) of the Charter are similarly deficient. Although the Supreme Court of Canada has adopted a wide definition of expression, Mancuso has not pleaded any personal attempts to make or receive prohibited expressive activity.
- (d) To establish a breach of s. 7, a claimant must demonstrate a deprivation that is inconsistent with a principle of fundamental justice. Mancuso has failed to indicate any health product necessary to his bodily and/or psychological integrity that is made unavailable to him by effect of the legislation he seeks to invalidate. As a result, there is no basis upon which to find a deprivation of life, liberty or personal security. Moreover, he does not assert any discordance with a principle of fundamental justice.
- (e) Finally, Mancuso's allegation of invalidity pursuant to s.15 of the Charter presents no reasonable prospect for success as the alleged discrimination does not fall within the purview of s.15. To succeed on a section 15 claim, a claimant must establish disadvantage on a prohibited ground or analogous characteristic. Mancuso alleges discrimination on the basis of his choice of food, dietary (food) supplements, and vitamins. This is not a prohibited ground under s.15 of the Charter, nor has it been recognized, or pleaded, as an analogous ground of discrimination.

- (f) Given the above-noted absence of material facts, the entirety of Mancuso's allegations of Charter invalidity should be struck as presenting no reasonable prospect for success.

110 All I can do is agree with the Defendants. We simply don't have any facts about what Mancuso has relied upon, or any difficulties he has experienced in accessing particular natural health products. If Mancuso has, throughout his life, heavily relied upon dietary food supplements and vitamins then, presumably he has not been prevented from accessing them. His general views about freedom of choice with respect to health don't tell the Defendants or the Court how any asserted rights have been infringed. These paragraphs present no reasonable cause of action and should be struck in their entirety.

111 Paragraphs 31 to 39 provide the basis for the claims of Rowland and the Results Company. The Results Company is claiming damages, and Rowland claims personal damages as well as a breach of his ss. 2, 7 and 15 Charter rights as claimed and articulated with respect to Mancuso, at paragraph 30 of the Claim.

112 For reasons already given, I have already held that Mancuso has not articulated or appropriately pleaded any basis for a breach of Charter rights. This means, inevitably, that neither has Rowland, so that Rowland's Charter right claims must be struck.

113 Rowland says that he, "as a consumer, producer, as well as a distributor of these products, further claims, personally, damages in loss of income and reputation, derived from the Results Company [...]." No cause of action is pleaded to ground Rowland's claim except "the Defendants officials arbitrary, excess and abuse of authority in the enforcement of the Act and Regulations." If this is intended as a tort claim, the constituent elements of the tort need to be set out and pleaded appropriately; otherwise there is no way of knowing, defending or adjudicating this aspect of the claim. Hence, Rowland's personal damages claims should be struck for revealing no reasonable cause of action.

114 The Results Company's claims do mention specific products and plead facts related to the company's dealings with Health Canada. Some of the complaints involve specific dealings between the company and Health Canada, and some of them allege some kind of conspiracy or policy by Health Canada to force small companies out of business in order to favour and support large pharmaceutical companies. Some of these assertions are very broad and are supported by very few facts, if any.

115 This portion of the Claim appears to support counsel for the Plaintiffs' oral assertion that the Plaintiffs' real concern is the NPN licensing and site licensing aspects of the regulatory scheme under the Act and the Regulations. However, the personal claims of Mancuso, Rowland and the Dahls suggest that counsel is not being entirely accurate in this regard.

116 In addressing the Results Company's claims it is often difficult to disentangle fact and substance from some of the broad, unsupported and often colourful assertions that are made.

117 I see nothing wrong with paragraphs 31 to 33. The problems begin at paragraph 34 which seems intended to provide a factual basis for the assertion regarding "the Defendants' officials' excessive and abusive enforcement of these (unconstitutional and ultra vires the Act) Regulations [...]." So the Results Company appears not to be basing its claim for damages upon the regulatory and enforcement scheme per se, but upon its "excessive and abusive enforcement." It is hard to see, then, how the Results Company's experiences can be said to support the general declaratory relief sought in paragraph 1 of the CLAIMS section. However, it is not entirely clear from paragraph 34 that "excessive and abusive enforcement" is the real issue because paragraph 34 begins with the words "As a result of Health Canada's oppressive and totally unnecessary Natural Products ("NPN") product licensing scheme, The Results Company Inc. is quickly being put out of business and may not survive past the end of 2012."

118 When I read the whole of paragraph 34, some of it appears to be about the NPN product licensing scheme per se, yet the sentence that immediately precedes the subparagraphs says that those subparagraphs are meant to ground the "effect of the Defendants' officials' excessive and abusive enforcement." This aspect of the claim can neither be defended nor adjudicated until this issue is clarified.

119 Subparagraph 34(b) attributes a drop in sales "entirely to Health Canada's discriminatory NPN licensing scheme under which Health Canada has refused licences for some Vitamost(R) products, has withheld licenses for others, and made it cost prohibitive even to apply for licenses for most products in the Vitamost(R) line."

120 If these matters were so vital to the Results Company's future, one has to wonder why the decisions in question were not subjected to judicial review, though of course this is not a pre-requisite to bringing an action for damages: see Telezona, Nu-Pharm, Parrish & Heimbecker, all above. However, without the specifics as to which licenses have been refused or withheld, and the costs associated with each application, it is not possible to defend or adjudicate this aspect of the Claim.

121 Subparagraph 34(c) alleges, in effect, that Health Canada has used the NPN licensing scheme to favour "mass merchandisers" at the expense of "small family businesses" so that there is "no more level playing field, due to Health Canada." Is this meant to suggest a deliberate policy by Health Canada, a conspiracy by Health Canada Officials, or simple ignorance as to effects of the licensing scheme? This claim goes well beyond the Results Company and whatever it may have suffered. There are no facts to support such general allegations and, as it stands, this broad claim cannot be defended or adjudicated. It reads like someone's opinion rather than a factual pleading.

122 I see nothing wrong with subparagraph 34(d) which appears to provide a specific example of excessive or abusive enforcement that can be defended and adjudicated.

123 Subparagraph 34(e) is deficient and should be struck because no facts are provided to support what is a bald assertion. In order to defend and adjudicate this allegation, it would be necessary to know, at least, the following:

- a) What are the products in the Vitamost(R) line apart from Advaya(R) which is mentioned in 34(f);
- b) Which of them are innovative and why?
- c) For which of the products has the Results Company experienced discrimination and what form did that discrimination take?
- d) Which specific ingredients or combination of ingredients have not been documented by the sources deemed acceptable to Health Canada, who are those sources, and how has this prevented the licensing of a formulation on the Vitamost(R) line?

124 Advaya(R) is the only specific example given in paragraph 34(f). The Plaintiffs say that they cannot comply with the Health Canada requirement and list "the exact quantity of each ingredient" because this would "reveal proprietary information protected by patent." Patents do not protect undisclosed proprietary information. The patent monopoly is given in return for public disclosure of the invention. So this makes no sense. However, the main complaint appears to be that:

Health Canada does not allow any of the many health claims for Advaya(R) that the Results Company has been able to verify by means clinical trials and symptom surveys, all of which claims are compliant with U.S. guidelines for dietary supplements.

It isn't clear here whether the Results Company is objecting to a particular decision or decisions of Health Canada that have prevented such health claims - in which case the facts would be needed to ground the claim that such decision is excessive or abusive -- or whether the Results Company is saying that the Act and/or the Regulations prevent such claims -- in which case the Plaintiffs need to plead how this translates into a cause of action.

125 Paragraph 34(g) does not say which Vitamost(R) formulas are at issue. More importantly, however, it alleges general discrimination through NPN licensing "against complex formulations." No facts are pleaded to say whether such "discrimination" is deliberate or is simply a function of the way the system works for all complex formulations, and there is nothing to explain how this translates into a cause of action for damages that the Defendants can defend.

126 Paragraphs 34(h) to 34(k) express little more than disagreement with the need for testing in Canada, and Health Canada's approach. The opinion is expressed that finished product testing and stability testing is unnecessary. This appears to be what the Results Company means by something that is "oppressive and totally unnecessary."

127 The difficulty is that an opinion that simply questions the need for Health Canada's approach to testing is not the basis for any form of action, and the constituents of any form of action are not pleaded. Is this conspiracy, negligence or a malicious tort? Until the facts are pleaded and joined with the constituents of same form of action that justifies a damages claim, these paragraphs remain nothing more than a difference of opinion over the need for testing.

128 Much the same can be said of paragraphs 34(c) to (t).

129 As a way of summarizing what the whole of paragraph 34 amounts to in law, the Plaintiffs say in paragraph 34(s) that:

Both NPN licensing and the DIN registration scheme that it replaces are forms of censorship which both prevents new products from coming to market and restricts the sales of those which are permitted to be sold. Health Canada decides which health claims it will allow for each product and prohibits all other true claims -- including those referenced by textbooks, clinical studies, and even testimonials sworn by affidavit. This censorship is an insidious way of limiting public access to high quality formulas by restricting both the formulators who create these products and the entrepreneurs who bring them to market. In no other industry are suppliers prevented from telling their customers the truth about what their products do. Because Vitamost(R) products are innovative, 25 years of censorship has severely limited their sales. Customers only find out about these unique supplements by word of mouth, since TRC is prevented from advertising the benefits of taking Vitamost(R) formulas;

130 If the Plaintiffs are alleging "censorship" as the legal basis of their claim and the form of action they are pursuing, then they need to show how "censorship," in law, gives rise to a cause of action. That is, they must set out the material facts they are using the label "censorship" to describe in a manner that matches the constituent elements of a cause of action that they are entitled to bring: Simon, above, at para 18.

131 If the Plaintiffs are simply seeking damages as relief under s. 24(1) of the Charter, then they need to plead the facts that will support the accusations of bad faith or abuse of power by public officials: see Ward, above, at para 39; Mackin, above, at paras 78-79. The same applies to civil causes of action: simply enforcing a statute and regulations that were valid at the time will not give rise to a cause of action (Mackin, at para 78), and there is no cause of action for legislating or failing to legislate in a manner that is adverse to a party's interests or may cause them to incur losses: see Welbridge Holdings Ltd v Greater Winnipeg, [1971] SCR 957; Mahoney v Canada, [1986] FCJ No 438, 4 FTR 259 (FCTD); Kwong Estate v Alberta, [1978] AJ No 594, 96 DLR (3d) 214 (ABCA).

132 I see nothing in paragraph 34 that pleads facts to establish "excessive and abusive enforcement" as opposed to the simple enforcement of what is, in the Plaintiffs' opinion, an "oppressive and totally unnecessary [...] licensing scheme."

133 All in all, I see nothing pleaded in paragraph 34 that sets out a concise statement of material facts that could support a recognizable cause of action in law.

134 There is nothing in paragraphs 35 and 36, which attempt to summarize the Plaintiffs position, that saves the pleadings from the problems I have identified above. As drafted, with the exception of subparagraph 34(d) (addressed above) and the background information provided in paragraphs 31-33 and 35, the whole of section C of the Claim is little more than the personal views of Rowland and his company, the Results Company, that the NPN licensing scheme is unnecessary and has not allowed him to make the profits he would like to have made, because it discriminates in favour of larger companies who are better able to meet the costs involved.

135 Consequently, it is my view that paragraphs 31 to 39 of the Claim should be struck.

136 The Defendants object to the claims of Dr. Dahl, Ms. Dahl and Life Choice as an abuse of process and as a collateral attack upon judicial decisions made in previous proceedings.

137 The Defendants allege that:

Dahl, Mrs. Dahl and Life Choice Ltd. ask this Court to revisit the legality of the searches conducted by authorities on March 31, 2004 and January 15th 2009, the correctness of their 2004 and 2013 criminal convictions, and the factual findings underlying those convictions. For example:

- (a) In their 2004 criminal proceeding, Dahl and E.D. Internal Health unsuccessfully challenged the validity of three search warrants pursuant to s.8 of the Charter. The plaintiffs now seek to re-litigate the constitutionality of these search warrants and the actions taken under their authority.
- (b) In the 2013 criminal proceedings, E.G.D. Modern Design Ltd., with Dahl acting as principal, pleaded guilty to eleven charges under the Food and Drugs Act and the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act. Despite their guilty plea, the plaintiffs allege in this action that they were falsely and maliciously charged.
- (c) The plaintiffs unsuccessfully challenged the legality of the January 15th 2009 searches in the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench. The plaintiffs plead in this proceeding that these searches were contrary to sections 7, 8 and 9 of the Charter.

On a generous and fair reading, the entirety of paragraphs 40-101 of the statement of claim is premised on the assertion that, contrary to the findings of two trial judges and their own pleas of guilt, these plaintiffs were subject to unlawful searches and have been wrongly convicted. This court would be unable to grant the remedies sought by the plaintiffs in this action without first making findings on criminal liability the constitutionality of police searches and/or the admissibility of evidence in a criminal proceeding that are inconsistent with prior findings made in the plaintiffs' criminal trials. Because such findings would necessarily undermine the principles of consistency, finality, and integrity in the administration of justice, this portion of the statement of claim should be struck in its entirety as a collateral attack and abuse of process.

138 Paragraphs 40 to 55 provide background information about the Dahls, some of their business endeavours and four encounters with Health Canada. It seems to me that the description of the first four encounters with Health Canada provides no information that is relevant to the relief sought in this action, but the Defendants have conceded that, on their own, these paragraphs are inoffensive.

139 The facts pleaded by the Dahls provide the only possible factual basis found in the Claim for excessive and abusive enforcement and, indirectly at least, highlight the poverty of the rest of the pleadings on this issue.

140 The Plaintiffs go on to describe a search that took place in March 2001 that led to criminal conviction in 2004, and a search in January 2009 that led to criminal conviction in 2013.

141 Dr. Dahl says that, as a result of the first criminal proceedings, he:

Now has a criminal record for not only something he was not responsible for, but also due to the ultra vires, unconstitutional Regulations and their excessive and abusive enforcement by the Defendants' officials.

142 The convictions stemming from the 2001 investigation were under three different statutes. Dr. Dahl's company, E.D. Internal Health Ltd, pleaded guilty to sixteen charges under the Act and the Regulations and received a fine of $5,600: see R v Dahl #2, above, at para 18. The 42 charges that went to trial were all under the Customs Act and the CDSA. These charges related to importing anabolic steroids or their derivatives and mis-describing these goods on customs forms. The Plaintiffs say some of these substances are not considered anabolic steroids and are not controlled in the United States and should not be in Canada, but as it stands they are listed in Schedule IV (s. 23) of the CDSA. Dr. Dahl and E.D. Internal Health Ltd were found guilty after trial on 33 counts under ss. 153(a) and 159 of the Customs Act and ss. 5(2) and 6(1) of the CDSA (R v Dahl #1, above). Dr. Dahl received a conditional sentence and fines totalling $116,360, and E.D. Internal Health Ltd received fines totalling $232,720.

143 There is nothing pleaded that shows why the convictions under the Customs Act and the CDSA have any relevance to the present Claim. Based on the pleadings, the validity and enforcement of those statutes is not at issue. Only the 16 convictions resulting from the guilty pleas of E.D. Internal Health under the Act and the Regulations could have any possible relevance here.

144 Dr. Dahl complained of breaches of s. 8 of the Charter at the trial before Justice Lytwyn who found no violation of s. 8: see R v Dahl #1, above, at para 10. If Dr. Dahl disagreed with this finding, he could have appealed Justice Lytwyn's decision. He cannot now come before this Court and have these searches re-examined with a view to finding a breach of s. 8 of the Charter.

145 Dr. Dahl complains that he now has a criminal record for something he was not responsible for. However, E.D. Internal Health accepted responsibility for the 16 charges under the Act and the Regulations through its guilty pleas, and a competent Court found that Dr. Dahl and E.D. Internal Health were responsible for 33 additional offences under the Customs Act and CDSA. He cannot now come before this Court and ask for the same issues to be re-determined.

146 Dr. Dahl also says that due to the 2004 trial, he now has a criminal record "due to the ultra vires unconstitutional Regulations and their excessive and abusive enforcement by the Defendants' officials." There are two components to this allegation: that the Regulations are ultra vires and unconstitutional, and that their enforcement leading up to the trial and convictions in 2004 were abusive and excessive.

147 In large measure, the claim of abusive enforcement amounts to an attempt to re-litigate the validity of the three search warrants related to the 2004 criminal proceeding. As I have already noted above, their constitutionality has already been decided by Justice Lytwyn. The attempt to re-litigate that issue here is, if not strictly speaking a collateral attack on the legal effect of the 2004 convictions, certainly an abuse of the Court's process that should not be permitted to proceed: see CUPE, above, at paras 33-55; Wolf, above, at paras 54-57.

148 While the Plaintiffs refer to TeleZone, above, and its companion cases to argue that the collateral attack and abuse of process doctrines should not apply where the forum is different and the issue to be decided is different, those cases do not avail the Plaintiffs here. They dealt with the question of whether an administrative decision must first be challenged through judicial review before an action for damages can be brought based on the consequences of those decisions. The Supreme Court found that such a detour was not necessary, nor were the actions in question collateral attacks on the administrative decisions in question. In so finding, the Court emphasized the differences between the nature and purpose of judicial review on the one hand and proceedings to determine civil liability on the other (see TeleZone, above, at paras 20-31, 60-68). Thus, the Plaintiffs are not wrong to suggest that differences in the nature of the issues at stake can affect the application of the collateral attack and abuse of process doctrines. However, none of these cases suggested that matters squarely decided in previous criminal court proceedings can be re-litigated by the party against whom those matters were decided in future civil proceedings in which they seek to obtain damages. In my view, this scenario goes to the very heart of the abuse of process doctrine, in that it would bring the administration of justice into disrepute, and cannot be permitted for the reasons stated in CUPE, above.

149 The Plaintiffs also plead at paragraph 70 under the heading "Post March 21, 2001" that:

After the investigation, all of Dr. Dahl's Canadian shipments were stopped from entering Canada. Customs sent everything for inspection or held them up. His only alternative was to close his Canadian business. He ended up selling his stock and exclusive product lines at cost and also his warehouse.

If this is intended to be an allegation of excessive enforcement so as to ground a claim for damages, it is not properly pleaded. On the most generous reading, it can be seen as an attempt to plead a claim in negligence, but the Plaintiffs have not pleaded what duty or standard of care was owed to them and how it was breached. Even if it could be established that the customs officials in question owed a private law duty of care to the Plaintiffs, which is a steep hill to climb (see Cooper v Hobart, [2001] 3 SCR 537, 2001 SCC 79; Edwards v Law Society of Upper Canada, [2001] 3 SCR 562, 2001 SCC 80), they have not pleaded any facts that could be taken as a breach of that duty. There is nothing to suggest that customs official were doing anything other than carrying out their statutory duties reasonably and in good faith. Likewise, the allegation cannot ground a claim for malicious prosecution as there is no indication that a prosecution resulted from these alleged customs enforcement activities, let alone that this was done without reasonable cause and was motivated by malice: see Nelles v Ontario, [1989] 2 SCR 170. A claim of misfeasance in public office would require a pleading that a public office holder engaged in deliberate and unlawful conduct in his or her capacity as a public officer, and was aware both that their conduct was unlawful and was likely to harm the Plaintiff: Odhaviji Estate v Woodhouse, [2003] 3 SCR 263 at paras 22-23, 28 [Odhaviji Estate]. None of this has been pleaded here with respect to the actions of customs officials. Thus, paragraph 70 should be struck.

150 As regards the alleged legal invalidity of the Regulations, both as being ultra vires the Act and unconstitutional, I do not see how the 2004 convictions have any bearing on that claim. As already noted above, the convictions under the Customs Act and CDSA are irrelevant, and any attempt to impugn the 16 convictions of E.D. Internal Health under the Act and the Regulations is an abuse of the Court's process: see CUPE, above, at paras 33-55; Wolf, above, at paras 54-57. The time to challenge those charges based on the purported legal invalidity of the Regulations was before entering guilty pleas on behalf of E.D. Internal Health.

151 Dr. Dahl says he is not questioning the fact of his convictions; he says, however, that this does not prevent him from attempting to show in these proceedings that the Regulations under which E.D. Internal Health was convicted were unconstitutional. I agree, but Dr. Dahl cannot use the fact of the unchallenged convictions to demonstrate unconstitutionality, which he is trying to do. The argument appears to be that the Regulations and the scheme of the Act are so absurd that they led to Dr. Dahl's criminal convictions in 2004. They certainly did not lead to the convictions under the Customs Act and CDSA, and the unchallenged convictions under the Act and the Regulations are not a factual basis for the unconstitutionality of the Regulations. Moreover, the notion that Dr. Dahl is not attempting to impugn the 2004 convictions through the present Claim is belied by pleadings that attack the factual underpinnings of those convictions -- including that certain evidence "went unnoticed by the Trial Judge" (para 72), and that Dr. Dahl "was charged with products that were never actually in his possession" (para 74) -- and the allegation that Dr. Dahl was "falsely convicted in 2004" (para 98).

152 Dr. Dahl appears to be arguing that the Regulations are making criminals out of innocent people, but if he has been convicted he is not an innocent person. He simply feels that the offences he was convicted of should not be offences. Without more, this is not a ground for unconstitutionality.

153 If the Court is intended to see the convictions as part of the harm flowing from the allegedly invalid Regulations, then the principles from Mackin, above, apply. Setting aside the claims about excessive searches, already dealt with above, the Plaintiffs have not pleaded the kind of threshold misconduct (i.e. conduct that is "clearly wrong, in bad faith or an abuse of power") that would be necessary to create the possibility of damages following a declaration of invalidity: see Mackin, above, at paras 79-82; Ward, above, at paras 39-40.

154 The second search and seizure took place in January 2009 and this led to charges in January 2010. Dr. Dahl, Mrs. Dahl and their company, E.G.D. Modern Design Ltd, were each charged with 33 regulatory and criminal offences under the Act, the CDSA, and their respective Regulations: R v Dahl #6, above at para 3. The trial commenced on March 19, 2012, and two defence applications were heard, including an unsuccessful challenge to four of the six searches based on s. 8 of the Charter. However, due to the late disclosure of certain documents by the Crown, the trial was adjourned and there were difficulties rescheduling it within a reasonable time. The resulting delay infringed the Dahls' rights under s. 11(b) of the Charter, and the charges against them were stayed. However, Justice Jeffrey of the Court of Queen's Bench found that the Charter considerations applied differently to a corporate defendant: unlike for individual defendants where security of the person considerations such as prolonged anxiety and stigma figured prominently, with respect to corporate defendants, s. 11(b) serves exclusively to protect the right to a fair trial. There was no evidence that E.G.D. Modern Design's ability to make full answer and defence had been impaired, and the charges against that company were permitted to proceed: see R v Dahl #6, above, at paras 9, 14-15.

155 Ultimately, E.G.D. Modern Designs Ltd, with Dr. Dahl acting as principal, pleaded guilty to 11 charges, eight under the Act and Regulations, and three under the CDSA. Regarding the eight offences under the Act and the Regulations, the company was fined $2,500 for each of five of these offences, and the maximum $5,000 each for the remaining three since they revealed "an intent to consciously organize and operate surreptitiously, wilfully circumventing the law after having experienced the effect of being caught once before": R v Dahl #7, above, at p. 94 (Defendant's Motion Record, at p. 601). The Court made an explicit finding that Dr. Dahl was the controlling mind of the corporate defendants convicted in both 2004 and 2013 (R v Dahl #7, above, at p. 93 (Defendant's Motion Record, at p. 600):

In both cases, the senior officer or representative of the corporation was the same, Mr. Eldon Dahl. In each case he was the controlling mind.

A corporation faces criminal liability for the criminal acts of its representatives. Here, each corporation, the old 2004 corporation, E.D. Internal Health, and now the entity before me, E.G.D. Modern Design Ltd., were directed and controlled by the same individual.

156 As noted above, Dr. Dahl, Mrs. Dahl and E.G.D. Modern Design Ltd unsuccessfully challenged the search warrants and their execution in the proceeding in the Court of Queen's Bench in Alberta: R v Dahl #5, above, at pp. 176-192 (Defendant's Motion Record, at pp. 481-497). Justice Jeffrey reviewed the whole process of the search of the Dahls' home and the reasons for the entry with guns drawn and found as follows:

Here, the police did not depart from the knock and announce approach. They drew their weapons rather than keeping them holstered, that is all. They did not escalate the entry into a dynamic entry. [page 188, lines 25-28]

In my view, in the heat of the moment and the uncertainty of what they might face, the apparent lack of cooperation justified the police considering whether they had misread the Dahls. Some of the alleged offences here did involve the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, not matters some might consider of lesser severity such as the other charges under the Food and Drugs Act. Investigations and searches associated with alleged offences under the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act can be met with violence. Weapons are not uncommon in these contexts. [page 188, lines 34-40]

Here, the police did not do anything else that escalated the entry other than draw their guns to help ensure their own safety. I do not find this manner of conduct of the search warrant at Number 19 unreasonable in the circumstances and dismiss the application to exclude evidence resulting from the search here. [page 189, lines 33-36]

157 In the present proceedings, the Dahls say the search of their home was unconstitutional, that they were unlawfully detained during that search, and that they were falsely and maliciously charged.

158 E.G.D. Modern Design Ltd pleaded guilty to eight charges under the Act and Regulations and another three under the CDSA. Dr. Dahl was the principal who entered these pleas and was found to have been the directing mind of the corporation with respect to the alleged illegal conduct. Under these circumstances, there is no reasonable prospect of succeeding on a claim of malicious prosecution. The Plaintiffs would not only have to establish that the proceedings concluded in their favour, but that they were instituted without reasonable cause and were motivated by malice: see Nelles, above; Lewis N Klar, Tort Law, 5th ed (Toronto: Carswell, 2012) at p. 67. Dr. and Mrs. Dahl had the charges against them stayed, which could be seen as a termination of the proceedings in their favour. The Plaintiffs have alleged that the Defendants' enforcement actions had an improper purpose of driving small entities out of the natural health products industry (see para 92(i) of the Claim). However, given that E.G.D. Modern Design pleaded guilty to 11 of the charges, with Dr. Dahl confirming to the Court on its behalf that it was admitting the essential elements of each of the offences (see R v Dahl # 7, above, at p. 90), and given the Court's finding that Dr. Dahl was the directing mind whose illegal and criminal conduct gave rise to the company's criminal liability, there is no possibility of establishing that there was a lack of reasonable and probable cause for the Defendants to pursue the prosecution. Moreover, the allegation of malice is not properly pleaded because it is a bald allegation with no supporting material facts presented: see Merchant Law, above, at paras 34-35. The allegation of malicious prosecution and all of the accompanying allegations to malicious intent and being "falsely and maliciously charged" and "falsely and maliciously prosecuted" in paragraphs 92-93 must be struck.

159 Moreover, given that the legality of the search of the Dahl's home was explicitly ruled upon by Justice Jeffrey in this proceeding, which resulted in guilty verdicts against one of the Plaintiffs based on guilty pleas entered by Dr. Dahl as the corporation's principal, the attack on the constitutionality of that search in this proceeding is an abuse of process that must be struck: CUPE, above, at paras 33-55. The court made an explicit finding that the search of the Dahl's home was lawful and carried out in a reasonable manner in the circumstances: see R v Dahl #5, above, at pp. 176-189.

160 Like the 2004 convictions, the 2009 convictions of E.G.D. Modern Design Ltd are not relevant to the alleged invalidity of the impugned Regulations. The time to challenge these charges based on the purported unconstitutionality of the Regulations was before entering guilty pleas on behalf of E.G.D. Modern Design Ltd.

161 Two further allegations by the Dahls require brief comment. Arguably, each discloses a potential cause of action, but both must nevertheless be struck from the present Claim.

162 The Dahls allege unlawful detention "contrary to ss. 7, 8 and 9 of the Charter" during the search of their home (para 92(c)). Section 9 of the Charter provides that "[e]veryone has the right not to be arbitrarily detained or imprisoned." The Plaintiffs plead at paragraph 90 of the Claim that:

[Dr. Dahl] and his wife sat in their living room for 11 hours and were prevented from moving or seeing the Health Canada agents search the entire residence. When questioned if they were under arrest, Dr. Eldon Dahl was told that they were just being "detained" and not to move...

There is jurisprudence holding that the lawful authority to detain is not necessarily implied in the lawful authority to search and seize granted by a search warrant, and a detention in these circumstances may be arbitrary, especially if it is prolonged: see for example R. v Douglas, 2012 SKQB 250. The Defendants have not pointed to any explicit ruling on this point by the Alberta courts, and accepting the facts as pleaded, I cannot say at this stage that a claim on this basis, either in tort or based on s. 9 of the Charter, has no reasonable chance of success.

163 There is also the matter of the warnings allegedly published by Health Canada about the Plaintiffs' products. They allege at paragraphs 81-84 of the Claim that Health Canada published two warnings, on August 21, 2008 and September 3, 2008 respectively, alleging that the products of Dr. Dahl and E.G.D. Modern Design were contaminated with bacteria and unsafe, and has refused to remove these warnings from its website even though the products were later licensed as "proven safe" by the Defendants' officials. The Plaintiffs have not pleaded deliberate unlawful conduct so as to ground a claim of misfeasance in public office (see Odhavji Estate, above), but read generously, these pleadings could reveal a claim for negligence. Even if this is so, however, it is not a claim that can be considered by this Court as currently pleaded.

164 The problem with both of these claims is that, at least as pleaded, they have no connection whatsoever with the content of the Act or Regulations that are challenged in this proceeding. Not only does this present practical problems for the discovery process and any eventual trial of the action, which would inevitably be disjointed, but there is a more fundamental problem relating to the jurisdiction of this Court. As Justice MacKay observed in Mandate Erectors, above, at para 15, the second part of the jurisdictional test set out in I.T.O. - International Terminal Operators Ltd. v Miida Electronics Inc. et al., [1986] 1 SCR 752, 28 DLR (4th) 641 [ITO] states that in order for the Federal Court to have jurisdiction, there must be an "existing body of federal law which is essential to the disposition of the case and which nourishes the statutory grant of jurisdiction." In removing the named ministers from the style of cause, he found that they could not be sued in their representative capacity, were not sued in their personal capacity, and if they had been, the claims would have been in tort and would have been outside the jurisdiction of this Court. Certain other named defendants were also removed as defendants, as the Court found that the federal laws implicated in the claim were not essential to the disposition of the claims made against them within the terms of the ITO test: Mandate Erectors, above, at paras 18-19.

165 I find the same is true in the present case. The Dahls have not demonstrated in their pleadings that there is anything about the challenged Act and Regulations that is essential to the disposition of their claims of unlawful detention or negligence in warning the public about their products. These are distinct tort (and perhaps Charter in the former case) claims that have nothing to do with a federally enacted law, and nothing to do with the broader challenge the Plaintiffs are trying to make to the Act and Regulations in their Claim. If the Dahls' wish to pursue those allegations, they must do so in a provincial superior court. They may encounter limitation issues, but that is of no concern here.

166 It may be that these allegations are not intended to ground independent causes of action, but are instead intended to indicate damages suffered as a result of the impugned provisions of the Act and Regulations, or state misconduct in relation to those instruments that could permit a damages claim despite the principles stated in Mackin. If so, then the Plaintiffs need to plead some connection between the impugned provisions of the Act and Regulations and the allegedly unlawful conduct.

167 For the above reasons, paragraphs 56-93 of the Claim, and any references to wrongful conviction, malicious prosecution, false advisories, or unlawful searches appearing elsewhere in the Claim in reference to the allegations in those paragraphs must be struck. Paragraphs 40-55 seem inoffensive, but they do not disclose any cause of action either on their own or in connection with any other remaining portions of the Claim, and should be struck on that basis.

168 There follows a series of paragraphs in which the Dahls describe the losses they and their companies have suffered as a result of the alleged unlawful conduct of the Defendants (see paras 95-101). However, each of the causes of action that could ground a claim to damages has been struck above. Since I have decided to grant leave to amend the Claim, I think the most prudent course is to strike these paragraphs and allow the Plaintiffs to amend them in accordance with the amended causes of action.

169 In paragraph 97(g) of the Claim, Dr. Dahl and Mrs. Dahl also assert that they have "had their Charter right [...] personally breached under ss. 2, 7, and 15 of the Charter for the same reasons and rationale as set out with respect to Nick Mancuso and David Rowland."

170 As I have already ruled that Mancuso and Rowland have not pleaded the facts required to establish such breaches, it follows that there are no material facts pleaded to establish breaches of the Dahls' ss. 2, 7, and 15 Charter rights.

The Charter Claims of the Corporate Plaintiffs

171 The final portion of the Claim relates to allegations of Charter breaches by the corporate Plaintiffs, which are The Results Company Inc and Life Choice Ltd, the latter being the successor company to E.D. Modern Design Ltd and E.G.G. Modern Design Ltd. The Plaintiffs plead the following in this regard at paragraph 102 of the Claim:

The Plaintiffs state, for the sake of clarity, that while the within Statement of Claim clearly sets out which Charter and constitutional breaches are involved, as being infringed, with respect to the biological Plaintiffs, the corporate Plaintiffs also claim the following Charter and constitutional rights have been breached:

Mancuso v. Canada (Minister of National Health and Welfare), [2014] F.C.J. No. 732

- (a) the right to freedom of expression and communication as guaranteed under s. 2 of the Charter;
- (b) the procedural safeguards of s. 7 of the Charter in the context of (quasi) criminal prosecution and regulatory scheme;
- (c) the right to equality, as a structural imperative of the underlying principle of the Constitution Act, 1867 as enunciated by the Supreme Court of Canada in Winner v. S.M.T. (Eastern) Ltd., [1951] S.C.R. 887, which right, above and beyond s. 15 of the Charter, is also involved by the biological Plaintiffs.

172 With respect to the s. 7 claim, the Supreme Court has consistently held that the word "everyone" in s. 7 of the Charter does not include a corporation. Corporations do not have s. 7 rights because the protected interests -- life, liberty and security of the person -- are attributes of natural persons and not artificial persons: see at Irwin Toy, above, at paras 94-96; Dywidag Systems International, Canada Ltd. v Zutphen Brothers, [1990] 1 SCR 705 at paras 6-7 [Dywidag Systems]; Hogg, above, at p. 47-5. Without a deprivation of one of these protected interests, the principles of fundamental justice -- or "procedural safeguards of s. 7 of the Charter" as the Plaintiffs refer to them -- do not come into play. At a minimum, corporations cannot obtain relief on s. 7 grounds under s. 24(1) of the Charter, because s. 24(1) provides remedies for those whose rights have been violated: R v Big M Drug Mart Ltd, [1985] 1 SCR 295 at para 37 [Big M]. On the other hand, a corporation can defend against a criminal or regulatory charge on the basis that the law under which it has been charged violates the Charter rights of individuals (including their s. 7 rights), and is therefore constitutionally invalid: see Big M, at paras 37-43 (regarding s. 2(a) of the Charter), and R v Wholesale Travel Group Inc., [1991] 3 SCR 154 at paras 21-26 per Lamer CJ and Sopinka J, with Gonthier, Stevenson and Iacobucci JJ expressing agreement at para 236 [Wholesale Travel]. Does this mean that corporations can also launch a proactive challenge to the constitutional validity of a law on s. 7 grounds when they are not defending against a criminal or quasi-criminal charge? The Supreme Court has said they cannot, in Dywidag Systems, above, at para 7:

[6] There can now be no doubt that a corporation cannot avail itself of the protection offered by s. 7 of the Charter. In Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 927, the majority of this Court held that a corporation cannot be deprived of life, liberty and security of the person and cannot therefore avail itself of the protection offered by s. 7 of the Charter. At page 1004 it was stated:

[...] it appears to us that [s. 7] was intended to confer protection on a singularly human level. A plain, common sense reading of the phrase "Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person" serves to underline the human element involved; only human beings can enjoy these rights. "Everyone" then, must be read in light of the rest of the section and defined to exclude corporations and other artificial entities incapable of enjoying life, liberty or security of the person, and include only human beings.

[7] It is true that there is an exception to this general principle that was established in Big M Drug Mart, supra, where it was held that "[a]ny accused, whether corporate or individual, may defend a criminal charge by arguing that the law under which the charge is brought is constitutionally invalid" (pp. 313-14). Here no penal proceedings are pending and the exception is obviously not applicable.

[Emphasis added]

The Plaintiffs point out that corporations have been permitted to seek declarations of constitutional invalidity by bringing motions before the Court, citing the example of RJR-MacDonald (1995), above. That case dealt with the constitutional division of powers and s. 2(b) of the Charter, from which corporations can benefit in a more direct fashion (see below). Having been referred to no contrary authority, I conclude that the question of whether a corporation can bring a proactive challenge to a law on s. 7 grounds has been settled by Dywidag Systems, above, and the corporate Plaintiffs cannot bring such a challenge here. I would note in passing that this conclusion does not necessarily prevent the Plaintiffs from advancing their argument that the impugned provisions are unconstitutionally vague should they choose to do so (see paragraph 16 of the Claim, struck above with leave to amend), since this argument could be relevant under s. 1 of the Charter should they establish a breach of another Charter provision: see Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical, above, at paras 39-40.

173 Moreover, even if Dywidag Systems, above, was not conclusive authority on this point, the Plaintiffs have not pleaded a challenge in the nature of Big M or Wholesale Travel, both above, arguing that the impugned provisions are invalid because they violate the rights of individuals. Rather, the corporate Plaintiffs appear to be claiming procedural protections under s. 7 in complete abstraction from the question of whether anyone's s. 7 rights are violated. It is clear that such an argument has no chance of success, as the procedural protections under s. 7 come into play only where an infringement of life, liberty or security of the person has been established: see Main Rehabilitation Co v Canada, 2004 FCA 403 at paras 4-5.

174 The situation is quite different with respect to the corporate Plaintiffs' claim that their "right to freedom of expression and communication as guaranteed under s. 2 of the Charter" has been breached. The jurisprudence establishes that commercial speech, including that of corporations, is protected under s. 2(b) of the Charter, though perhaps enjoying weaker protection than other forms of speech that are closer to the core of what the provision was intended to protect: see Ford v Quebec (Attorney General), [1988] 2 SCR 712 at paras 45-60; Irwin Toy, above; Rocket, above; RJR-MacDonald (1995), above; Canada (Attorney General) v JTI-Macdonald Corp, [2007] 2 SCR 610. Since most legislative limitations on protected expression will infringe s. 2(a), the analysis in most cases comes down to whether the limitations in question are reasonable limits that can demonstrably be justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

175 The claim that the corporate Plaintiffs enjoy a "right to equality, as a structural imperative of the underlying principle of the Constitution Act, 1867" amounts to an appeal to unwritten constitutional principles, which have been discussed by the Supreme Court in a number of cases. It is not entirely clear whether the Plaintiffs are advancing "equality" as an independent principle or as a component of the rule of law. They cite Donald MacIntosh, citing in turn A. V. Dicey, who expressed the view that "equality before the law" is a component of the rule of law: see MacIntosh, above, at p. 7. Whether and in what circumstances such unwritten principles can be used as a basis for invalidating legislation on constitutional grounds remains a debatable point: see Reference re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 SCR 217; Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution, [1981] 1 SCR 753 at 845 (Patriation Reference); Hogg, above at 15-53, discussing Mackin, above; c.f. British Columbia v Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd, [2005] 2 SCR 473 at paras 59-60. It is not a point that needs to be decided at this stage of these proceedings, in part because it is not clear whether this is the position the Plaintiffs are advancing. They say they are entitled to equality, as a structural imperative of the underlying principle of the Constitution Act, 1867, but they do not tell the Court or the Defendants how that right has been breached, or what remedies should flow. Is this part of the challenge to the impugned portions of the Act and Regulations, or specific actions of the executive branch in enforcing them, or both? How exactly have their purported rights to equality been breached? The Plaintiffs don't say.

176 The same absence of a factual foundation affects the claim under s. 2(b) of the Charter. How exactly have the rights of the corporate Plaintiffs to freedom of expression been infringed? There are glimmers of this earlier in the Claim (see paragraph 16(b), (p), (q), (r) and (w) and paragraph 34 (s)), but in my view, the alleged breaches of the corporate Plaintiffs' s. 2(b) Charter rights have not been pleaded with sufficient detail to allow the Court to adjudicate the matter. As the Supreme Court found in MacKay v Manitoba, [1989] 2 SCR 357 the presentation of a factual foundation is essential to the proper adjudication of Charter issues.

Proper Defendants

177 The Defendants say that Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Canada is the only proper defendant in this action. This is because the Claim discloses no material facts alleging any wrongdoing on the part of the named Ministers. Also, the Minister of National Health and Welfare does not exist, the naming of the Attorney General of Canada is redundant, and the RCMP is not a suable entity (see Sauvé, above, at para 44).

178 The Plaintiffs disagree and refer the Court to Liebmann, above, at paras 51-52 as well as Apotex, above, at para 13.

179 I do not see the relevance of either of these cases. Liebmann added Her Majesty the Queen as an additional defendant and decided that the debate about the appropriateness of granting injunctive relief against officers of the Crown "when that injunction operates against them in their representative capacity only as opposed to against them in their personal capacity" was irrelevant in that particular case because "the challenge is a constitutional one" in which "the Court has jurisdiction pursuant to section 24 of the Constitution Act, 1982 to grant whatever remedies are appropriate in the circumstances."

180 In the present case, there is nothing in the Claim, even before portions of it are struck, that involves the Minister of Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness, or which explains how the Minister of National Health and Welfare (who does not exist) and the RCMP (who cannot be sued) can have any relevance or standing in a constitutional challenge, or why it is necessary to name the Attorney General of Canada in addition to the Crown in order to obtain relief under s. 24 of the Constitution Act, 1982. Ministers cannot be sued in their representative capacity, and there is no indication that they are being sued in their personal capacity: Cairns, above, at para 6; Merchant Law, above, at paras 19-21.

181 Apotex, above, merely says that it "is not always appropriate for motions to strike to be the context to make a binding decision on a question of standing, [...]," rather "a judge should exercise her discretion as to whether it would be appropriate in the circumstances to render a decision on standing or whether a final disposition of the question should be heard with the merits of the case."

182 It is my view that Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Canada is the only proper defendant in this action and that the other named defendants must be struck.

The Stay Motion

183 For obvious reasons, given my decision on the Defendants' strike motion, the Court cannot grant the Plaintiffs a stay of the operation of s. 3(1) and (2) of the Act, and the stipulated sections of the Natural Health Products Regulations. The Plaintiffs have yet to disclose a serious issue to be tried and so cannot satisfy the cumulative, tripartite test established in RJR-MacDonald (1994), above.

184 However, because the issue of a stay may arise again, following amendments to the Claim, I think it might help if I also point out that, on the present record before me for a stay, I would not have been able to grant it even had the Plaintiffs established a serious issue to be tried. I say this for the following reasons:

- a) There is no convincing, non-speculative evidence of irreversible harm established on a balance of probabilities. See Information Commissioner, above, at para 62. As the Defendants point out, Mancuso identifies products eliminated from the market but he also says that he uses these products regularly and commonly. Mancuso also leaves his claims to mental and physical distress unspecified and unsubstantiated. In addition, the harm referred to by Rowland is either vague and speculative or it is quantifiable business losses.
- b) The evidence presented by the Plaintiffs (and the weakness of their case for serious issue is inevitably significant here) does not overcome the presumption that the Act and the Regulations serve the public good, so that the balance of convenience favours the Plaintiffs. See Harper, above at para 9. As the Defendants point out, even a prima facie Charter breach leaves it open to the Crown to justify that breach under s. 1 of the Charter (and it is difficult to see how the Court could assess this issue at an interlocutory stage such as the present), and even a temporary staying of the legislative and regulatory provision in question could impact the well-being of Canadians in general in serious ways and in advance of any finding of constitutionality. The evidentiary record before me provides little to support such a serious interference with the wording of the Act and the Regulations.

JUDGMENT

THIS COURT'S JUDGMENT is that:

1. The Claim is struck in accordance with my reasons pursuant to s. 221 of the Federal Court Rules.
2. The Plaintiffs are hereby granted leave to amend their Claim within 30 days of the date of this order, unless otherwise extended by the Court.
3. All Defendants are hereby struck from the style of cause except Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Canada.
4. The Defendants may move to strike any amended Claim.
5. The Plaintiffs' motion for a stay is dismissed.
6. The parties may address the Court on the issue of costs for these two motions, and should do so in writing within 30 days of the date of this order.

Appeal by the plaintiffs and cross-appeal by the defendants from a judgment striking the appellants' statement of claim. The appellants were comprised of consumers, distributors and producers of natural health products. They commenced an action challenging the constitutional authority of Parliament to enact a scheme for the regulation of the production and sale of natural health products, including vitamins, and dietary and nutritional food supplements. Alternatively, the appellants challenged the statutory authority that authorized the regulations, and pled various Charter violations and tortious conduct by government officials in the administration and enforcement of the scheme, supporting a claim for damages. They sought declarations of invalidity and a stay of the enforcement of the legislation and regulations. A Federal Court order struck the statement of claim. The plaintiffs appealed and the defendants cross-appealed to the extent that it was an error not to strike the claim in its entirety.

HELD: Appeal and cross-appeal dismissed.

The cross-appeal was unnecessary, as the ruling of the Federal Court judge clearly intended to strike the whole of the statement of claim with leave to file a fresh as amended claim eliminating the defects. The judge accepted the plaintiffs could seek declarations of invalidity on constitutional and administrative law grounds with claims for damages and restitution. The judge appropriately struck the whole of the claim for failure to meet the requirement of pleading material facts. No material facts were pled to support the claims of Charter violations by the individual appellants. The corporate plaintiffs were unable to maintain a s. 7 Charter claim under the prevailing circumstances. The tort claims were supported by bald assertions rather than material facts. The notion that the appellants could proceed to trial on the basis of the unobjectionable portions of the pleading was rejected, as the Court required a sense of the law's reach in order to define the contours of legislative and constitutional competence to assess whether the legislation was ultra vires. With respect to the claims arising from enforcement, the judge erred in characterizing the claims as a collateral attack, but correctly identified them as an abuse of process.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT

RENNIE J.A.

1 This appeal and cross-appeal arise from a judgment dated July 16, 2014 of the Federal Court striking the appellants' statement of claim: 2014 FC 708. In brief, the appellants commenced an action challenging the constitutional authority of Parliament to enact a scheme for the regulation of the production and sale of natural health products, including vitamins, and dietary and nutritional food supplements. In the alternative, if the scheme is constitutional, the appellants challenge the statutory authority that authorizes the regulations, and plead various Charter violations and tortious conduct by government officials in the administration and enforcement of the scheme. The appellants seek declarations of invalidity and a stay of the enforcement of the legislation and regulations.

2 The Federal Court, per Justice James Russell (the judge) granted the defendants' motion to strike. The appellants appeal the order striking the statement of claim. Should the Court find that the judge did not strike the claim in its entirety, the respondents have filed a cross-appeal, contending that it was an error not to do so.

3 For the reasons that follow, I would dismiss the appeal and cross-appeal.

I. The Statement of Claim

4 The plaintiffs plead in their statement of claim that they are consumers, distributors and producers of "natural health products" in Canada. They include both natural persons and corporations. "Natural health products" are regulated as "drugs" as defined by section 2 of the Food and Drugs Act (R.S.C., 1985, c. F-27) (FDA), and the Natural Health Products Regulations, SOR 2003-196 (the Regulations), non-compliance with which attracts regulatory and criminal consequences.

5 In their statement of claim, the plaintiffs plead that Parliament does not have the legislative competence, under section 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867, to regulate natural health substances. They plead that Parliament's competence is confined to the regulation of substances that pose a health risk and does not extend to the regulation of substances that pose no health risk, or little health risk, like natural health products. In the alternative, they say that the Regulations defining a "drug" are overbroad and that Parliament did not intend the definition of "drug" in section 2 of the FDA to include natural health products, and therefore the Regulations exceed the authority delegated by the FDA.

6 They also plead that the Regulations as a whole, and specific provisions such as the prohibition on the production and sale of a "natural health product" without a "Natural Product Number" or NPN, violate subsections 2(a), 2(b), and sections 7, 9 and 15 of the Charter. Section 8 violations are also said to arise from various searches and seizures to which some of the plaintiffs were subject under the FDA and the Regulations and the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act (S.C. 1996, c. 19).

7 The plaintiffs also plead that in the implementation and enforcement of this regulatory scheme, agents and officials of the defendants committed torts related to the exercise of state authority, including malicious prosecution and misfeasance in a public office. They seek damages for lost profits, loss of reputation, mental distress, punitive and exemplary damages, as well as damages under subsection 24(1) of the Charter. They seek to have the action determined by a jury trial.

II. Analysis

A. Standard of review

8 The decision of this Court in Imperial Manufacturing Group Inc. v. Decor Grates Incorporated, 2015 FCA 100 instructs that the usual appellate standard of review applies to decisions of a trial judge in matters of pleadings and therefore that conclusions on questions of fact and questions of mixed fact and law that are suffused by fact can only be interfered with if there is a palpable and overriding error. Conclusions on questions of law and questions of law that may be extracted from questions of mixed fact and law attract no deference and are reviewed on a standard of correctness.

9 I am satisfied that the judge identified and properly applied the governing principles applicable to a motion to strike and that no reviewable error arises in his conclusion that the statement of claim did not comply with the rules of pleading.

B. Preliminary issue - The scope of the decision below

10 The first paragraph in the judge's judgment provides that "The Claim is struck in accordance with my reasons pursuant to s. 221 of the Federal Court Rules." The appellants contend that this should be interpreted as meaning that the claim is struck, subject to the parts of the reasons which allowed some paragraphs to stand. I do not think there is any merit to this argument. The judge intended that the whole claim be struck and the plaintiffs be permitted to file a "fresh as amended statement of claim" that eliminated the defects existing in the pleading before him.

11 I agree that the judge found certain paragraphs of the claim unobjectionable. He accepted, for example, that the plaintiffs could, in an action in the Federal Court, obtain declarations of invalidity on both constitutional and administrative law grounds along with claims for damages and restitution. He also accepted that the facts pleaded in relation to the general attack on the vires of the scheme might also bear on the claims for individual relief. Further, he accepted that certain paragraphs and subparagraphs of the claim were also unobjectionable (see, for example, subparagraphs 1(a), 1(b), 1(d), and 1(e)(i) and paragraphs 2, 3, and 18).

12 However, the appellants' interpretation of the judgment is not supported by its plain language-- "the claim is struck." Further, the judge's reasons leave no doubt that the judge struck the claim in its entirety. He found that the claim invited a broad ranging policy discussion as to whether, and how, natural health products should be regulated. On multiple occasions he adverted to the inability of the defendants to plead in defence, given the scope or breadth of the assertions and the lack of underlying material facts or particularity, and in addressing costs, the judge characterized the pleading as "very unwieldy and non-compliant." Given the number of paragraphs and subparagraphs struck and their distribution throughout the claim, the residue would be a disjointed and difficult read and entirely lacking in any material fact.

13 Although some paragraphs seeking declaratory relief were not mentioned as explicitly being struck, these comments must be read in light of the judge's extensive consideration of the requirement of a factual matrix as prerequisite to the determination of constitutionality. The judge found that the plaintiffs were seeking to impugn the whole scheme for the classification, inspection and enforcement of food, dietary food supplements and vitamins. He noted that the pleading did not particularize which of the 55,000 natural food products were in issue and made no link between the products and the plaintiffs. He concluded that the pleadings did not provide a factual foundation for such a broad declaration.

14 The argument that the judge allowed the declaratory component of the claim to continue is also inconsistent with the appellants' own memorandum of fact and law which concedes at paragraph 21 that "the Court erred in striking the claim in its entirety."

15 In the result, the cross-appeal is unnecessary and should be dismissed.

C. The requirement of material facts

16 It is fundamental to the trial process that a plaintiff plead material facts in sufficient detail to support the claim and relief sought. As the judge noted "pleadings play an important role in providing notice and defining the issues to be tried and that the Court and opposing parties cannot be left to speculate as to how the facts might be variously arranged to support various causes of action."

17 The latter part of this requirement -- sufficient material facts -- is the foundation of a proper pleading. If a court allowed parties to plead bald allegations of fact, or mere conclusory statements of law, the pleadings would fail to perform their role in identifying the issues. The proper pleading of a statement of claim is necessary for a defendant to prepare a statement of defence. Material facts frame the discovery process and allow counsel to advise their clients, to prepare their case and to map a trial strategy. Importantly, the pleadings establish the parameters of relevancy of evidence at discovery and trial.

18 There is no bright line between material facts and bald allegations, nor between pleadings of material facts and the prohibition on pleading of evidence. They are points on a continuum, and it is the responsibility of a motions judge, looking at the pleadings as a whole, to ensure that the pleadings define the issues with sufficient precision to make the pre-trial and trial proceedings both manageable and fair.

19 What constitutes a material fact is determined in light of the cause of action and the damages sought to be recovered. The plaintiff must plead, in summary form but with sufficient detail, the constituent elements of each cause of action or legal ground raised. The pleading must tell the defendant who, when, where, how and what gave rise to its liability.

20 The requirement of material facts is embodied in the rules of practice of the Federal Courts and others: see Federal Courts Rules, Rule 174; Alta. Reg. 124/2010, s. 13.6; B.C. Reg. 168/2009, s. 3-1(2); N.S. Civ. Pro. Rules, s. 14.04; R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, s. 25.06. While the contours of what constitutes material facts are assessed by a motions judge in light of the causes of action pleaded and the damages sought, the requirement for adequate material facts to be pleaded is mandatory. Plaintiffs cannot file inadequate pleadings and rely on a defendant to request particulars, nor can they supplement insufficient pleadings to make them sufficient through particulars: AstraZeneca Canada Inc. v. Novopharm Limited, 2010 FCA 112.

D. Pleading of Charter violations

21 There are no separate rules of pleadings for Charter cases. The requirement of material facts applies to pleadings of Charter infringement as it does to causes of action rooted in the common law. The Supreme Court of Canada has defined in the case law the substantive content of each Charter right, and a plaintiff must plead sufficient material facts to satisfy the criteria applicable to the provision in question. This is no mere technicality, "rather, it is essential to the proper presentation of Charter issues": Mackay v Manitoba, [1989] 2 S.C.R. 357 at p. 361.

22 In respect of all of the Charter allegations, the judge found that the plaintiffs did not identify any specific natural health product to which they had been denied access, nor how that denial related to the rights might be protected by the Charter provisions raised. For example, a violation of subsection 2(a) requires that the claimant's practice or belief have a nexus with a religious belief or practice or secular morality: Syndicat Northcrest v. Amselem, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 551, 2004 SCC 47, at p. 56. Here, no material facts were pleaded supporting the proposition that the plaintiffs had such a practice or belief that was in any way connected with their consumption or sale of natural health products. Similarly, insofar as the plaintiffs assert infringement of their freedom of expression, no material facts were pleaded as to communications that the plaintiffs intended to send or receive that were interfered with by the regulatory scheme, a prerequisite for a violation of subsection 2(b).

23 With regard to the section 7 claims, the plaintiffs need to plead material facts to support the claim that restrictions on the availability of natural health products interfered with either their security of person or liberty. Again, as the judge noted, the plaintiffs did not identify any particular products to which they have been denied access or how any such denial might have risen to the level of a section 7 violation. A section 7 infringement typically engages a fundamental life choice or issues inherently related to personal well-being: Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486; R. v. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 30. In the absence of a pleading of a specific regulated drug to which the plaintiffs have been denied access, or a description of how the plaintiffs use of it has been constrained in a manner that engages section 7 interests, the defendant would be left guessing as to the scope of the case it has to meet to respond to the section 7 infringement.

24 Similarly, to establish a violation of section 15, a claimant must first establish that the basis on which he or she claims to have been discriminated against is either an enumerated or an analogous ground within the scope of section 15. While the appellants plead that choice in food, supplements and vitamins is an analogous ground, they did not plead any facts in support of this claim, or facts in support of the other elements of a section 15 violation, such as how the regulation of the product perpetuates disadvantage or prejudice rising to substantive discrimination: Withler v. Canada (Attorney General), [2011] 1 S.C.R. 396, 2011 SCC 12 at paras. 30-31.

E. The corporate plaintiffs

25 The judge correctly struck the claims of Charter violations advanced by the corporate plaintiffs. A corporation cannot maintain a section 7 Charter challenge for either a subsection 24(1) or a section 52 remedy unless it is the defendant in a criminal or regulatory prosecution or is subject to compulsory measures, such as injunctive relief, at the behest of the state in a regulatory proceeding: R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295; Canadian Egg Marketing Agency v. Richardson, [1998] 3 S.C.R. 157. The pleadings on behalf of the corporate defendants also suffer from the same deficiency found by the judge in respect of the individual plaintiffs. The claims by the corporate plaintiffs for breaches of the "right to equality as a structural imperative of the underlying principle of the Constitution Act 1867", and for violations of the corporations' subsection 2(b) rights, lacked a factual foundation in the pleadings. In any event, a corporation cannot assert section 15 rights.

F. The tort claims

26 A properly pleaded tort claim identifies the particular nominate tort alleged and sets out the material facts needed to satisfy the elements of that tort. As the judge pointed out, while the appellants assert various torts including misfeasance in public office, they do not link particular conduct to the elements of the tort. For example, the tort of misfeasance in public office requires a pleading of a particular state of mind by a public official -- deliberate, specific conduct which the official knows to be inconsistent with their legal obligations: Odhavji Estate v. Woodhouse, 2003 SCC 69; St. John's Port Authority v. Adventure Tours Inc., 2011 FCA 198; Merchant Law Group v. Canada Revenue Agency, 2010 FCA 184. The statement of claim in this case does not meet that standard.

27 The bald assertion of a conclusion is not a pleading of material fact. The judge properly struck many of the paragraphs underlying the tort claims on the basis that without more, these were conclusory statements. He also found that the allegations of bad faith and abuse of power comprised a set of statements or conclusions and did not meet the standard of pleading described in Merchant Law at paras. 34-35.

28 The judge assessed the allegations of tortious conduct in the implementation and enforcement of the Regulations against these principles and concluded that the appropriateness of the enforcement measures could only be assessed in the light of the facts and context of a particular action or series of actions. What was pleaded, however, was a general practice, with no specific instances, leaving it unclear as to whether the conduct was "something mandated by the Act or the Regulations, or conduct set out in some administrative policy of directive, or whether they are referring to what individual officials have chosen to do" (Reasons for Decision at para. 106).

G. Damages

29 Relying on Mackin and Ward, the judge correctly dismissed the claim for relief under sections 24(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982: Mackin v. New Brunswick (Minister of Finance); Rice v. New Brunswick, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 405, 2002 SCC 13; Vancouver (City) v. Ward, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 28, 2010 SCC 27; Henry v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 24. As a general rule, damages are not available from harm arising from the application of a law which is subsequently found to be unconstitutional, without more. The plaintiffs pleaded that the respondents' conduct was "clearly wrong, in bad faith or an abuse of power" -- one of the elements typically required in order to found a damages claim under section 24(1) of the Charter -- but failed to supply material facts on the question of how the Regulations and their enforcement constitute serious error, bad faith or abuse so as to trigger an entitlement to Charter damages. They also fail to give any particulars of any conduct that would support a damages claim.

H. Declaratory relief

30 As noted, the judge did not explicitly strike the paragraphs of the claim which sought declarations as to the constitutionality of the scheme, either under the Constitution Act, 1867 or the Charter. Nor did he explicitly strike the declaratory relief in respect of administrative law challenges to the scope of the definition of "drug" in section 2 of the FDA and the Regulations.

31 The appellants allege that their action can nonetheless proceed to trial on the basis of the surviving paragraphs. It is not problematic, in their view, that there are no material facts in the statement of claim, including none that link the impugned scheme to an effect on themselves as plaintiffs. They base this argument on the proposition that freestanding declarations on the constitutionality of laws and legal authority are always available.

32 On this latter point, there is no doubt. Free-standing declarations of constitutionality can be granted: Canadian Transit Company v. Windsor (Corporation of the City), 2015 FCA 88. But the right to the remedy does not translate into licence to circumvent the rules of pleading. Even pure declarations of constitutional validity require sufficient material facts to be pleaded in support of the claim. Charter questions cannot be decided in a factual vacuum: Mackay v. Manitoba, above, nor can questions as to legislative competence under the Constitution Act, 1867 be decided without an adequate factual grounding, which must be set out in the statement of claim. This is particularly so when the effects of the impugned legislation are the subject of the attack: Danson v. Ontario (Attorney General), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1086, at p. 1099.

33 The Supreme Court of Canada in Canada (Prime Minister) v. Khadr, 2010 SCC 3, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 44, para. 46 articulated the pre-conditions to the grant of a declaratory remedy: jurisdiction over the claim and a real as opposed to a theoretical question in respect of which the person raising it has an interest.

34 Following Khadr, this Court in Canada (Indian Affairs) v. Daniels, 2014 FCA 101 (leave to appeal granted) at paras. 77-79 highlighted the danger posed by a generic, fact-free challenge to legislation -- in other words, a failure to meet the second Khadr requirement. Dawson JA noted that legislation may be valid in some instances, and unconstitutional when applied to other situations. A court must have a sense of a law's reach in order to assess whether and by how much that reach exceeds the legislature's vires. It cannot evaluate whether Parliament has exceeded the ambit of its legislative competence and had more than an incidental effect on matters reserved to the provinces without examining what its legislation actually does. Facts are necessary to define the contours of legislative and constitutional competence. In the present case, this danger is particularly acute; as the judge noted, the legislation at issue pertains to literally thousands of natural health supplements.

35 This is not new law. While the plaintiffs point to Solosky v. The Queen, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 821 for the proposition that there is a broad right to seek declaratory relief, Solosky also notes that there must be "a 'real issue' concerning the relative interests of each [party]." The Court cannot be satisfied that this requirement is met absent facts being pleaded which indicate what that real issue is and its nexus to the plaintiffs and their claim for relief.

36 To conclude, while the Federal Court correctly found that there was nothing inherently faulty with claims in respect of declaratory relief (subparagraphs 1(a)(ix) through 1(b)(v)), the action could not move forward on the constitutional issues on the basis of the claims for relief alone. The paragraphs said to underlie the claims of constitutional breaches were struck, and with them disappeared the basis on which these claims could be adjudicated.

I. The section 8 violations

37 A final issue concerns the claim that searches conducted by officers of the defendant against some of the appellants violated section 8 of the Charter. The judge struck these allegations on the basis that they had previously been raised and disposed of in the criminal and regulatory prosecutions: R v. Dahl, 120998, March 26th 2004 (BC Prov Ct); R v. Eldon Garth Dahl, Agnesa Dahl and EDG Modern Design Ltd, 100237221Q3 (AltaB) [2013] A.J. No. 89. Given that, he found that the section 8 Charter claim constituted a collateral attack on the Provincial Court and Queen's Bench decisions and also an abuse of process.

38 The appellants raise three arguments. Their first and second arguments are that these doctrines do not apply because the judicial forum and the relief sought are different. They also contend that the judge erred in striking the claim on the basis of abuse of process and collateral attack on preliminary motion. On this last point, they say that they will adduce evidence at trial which is different from or expands on the facts which underlie the decision of the BC and Alberta courts, and explain why this claim is not impermissible relitigation. As this requires the judge to weigh evidence, the issue of collateral attack and abuse of process cannot be determined on a motion to strike and must await trial.

39 Collateral attack and abuse of process are related, but distinct, doctrines: Toronto (City) v. C.U.P.E., Local 79, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 77, 2003 SCC 63. A collateral attack is an impermissible attempt to nullify the result of another proceeding outside of the proper channels for the review of that decision. The purpose of the doctrine is to prevent attempts to overturn decisions made in other courts. Its ambit is narrow.

40 Abuse of process, in contrast, is a residual and discretionary doctrine of broad application and scope, which bars the relitigation of issues. It is directed to preventing relitigation of the same issues and the attendant mischief of inconsistent decisions by different courts which, in turn, would undermine the doctrines of finality and respect for the administration of justice. It is thus a more flexible doctrine than collateral attack. It permits a judge to bar relitigation of a criminal conviction in a different forum, as was the case in CUPE.

41 The relief sought by the appellants is different in this action from that in the BC and Alberta proceedings. Here, damages are sought for an alleged unconstitutional search and for torts claimed to have been committed in the execution of the search. In the provincial courts, what was sought was the exclusion of the evidence obtained in the search at a criminal trial. These differences preclude the application of the doctrine of collateral attack. Abuse of process, however, remains available; indeed, contrary to the appellants' first and second arguments, abuse of process explicitly contemplates a different judicial forum and relief sought.

42 The remaining question is whether it is appropriate to strike a claim on the basis that it is an abuse of process on a motion to strike. It should be noted at the outset that the rules of practice of the Federal Courts expressly contemplate this (Rule 221(f)). Further, this Court has endorsed the propriety of striking a claim as being an abuse of process at the pleadings stage where the claimant sought to relitigate a criminal conviction from another jurisdiction in a civil action before the Federal Court: Sauvé v. Canada 2011 FCA 141 (commenting favourably on the lower court's striking of paragraphs not under appeal).

43 Whether a particular issue has previously been judicially determined is a fact of which a judge is entitled to take notice at the early stage of a motion to strike. The fact of the other decision can form the foundation for the exercise of the judge's discretion. Allowing the abuse of process doctrine to be raised at the pleadings stage is consistent with the objective of maintaining respect for the administration of justice and the court's desire for comity and mutual respect between jurisdictions. More practically, a defendant has the right to have an abusive claim struck before being subjected to an intrusive and costly discovery process. While plaintiffs are not required to build into their pleadings a response to every conceivable defence, it is not unduly burdensome to expect plaintiffs who know they are relitigating a previously-determined issue to include in their pleadings the material facts they will rely upon to explain why the discretion to find the claim abusive should not be exercised.

44 Here, there are no such facts that could be pleaded because granting the Charter or tort claims related to the impugned search would necessarily require the Federal Court to make different factual findings from those reached in the final decisions of the BC Provincial Court and Alberta Court of Queen's Bench in the criminal proceedings, which found the impugned search to be lawful.

45 Accordingly, while the judge erred in characterising the claim as a collateral attack, he correctly identified it as an abuse of process. The difference of forum and relief do not preclude the claim from being abusive; it was appropriate for the judge to decide this issue on a motion to strike, and there is no reviewable error in his application of the principle of abuse of process to the claim before him.

III. Conclusion

46 I would dismiss the appeal and the cross-appeal, with costs. I would grant the appellants sixty days from the date of this Court's judgment to serve and file their fresh as amended statement of claim.

Appeal From:

ON APPEAL FROM THE FEDERAL COURT OF APPEAL

Case Summary

Status:

The motion for an extension of time to serve and file the application for leave to appeal is dismissed with costs June 23, 2016. In any event, had such motion been granted, the application for leave to appeal would have been dismissed with costs.

Catchwords:

Charter of Rights — Alleged violations of ss. 2(a), 2(b), 7, 9 and 15 of the Charter — Civil Procedure — Pleadings — Motion to strike — Constitutional law — Division of powers — Does a Judge, sitting on a motion to strike, have the jurisdiction to make findings of fact — Does a Judge sitting on a motion to strike have jurisdiction to "strike the entirety of the claim", with leave to amend, and not allow to proceed the factual assertions and legal remedy not struck — Can an action for Declaratory relief proceed without a "cause of action" for damages — Does a guilty plea in Provincial Court, under a statute where its constitutionality has not been determined, bar a subsequent Superior Court action attacking the constitutionality of the legislation, based on a "collateral attack/abuse of process" pursuant to Toronto (City) v. C.U.P.E., Local 79, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 77, 2003 SCC 63.

Case Summary:

The applicants are individual and corporate consumers, distributors and producers of certain health products (the "Products") in Canada. The Products are regulated as "drugs" as defined by s. 2 under the Food and Drugs Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. F-27 (the "Act") and the Natural Health Products Regulations, SOR 2003-196 (the "Regulations"). The applicants brought an action challenging Parliament's constitutional authority to regulate the production and sale of natural health products, including vitamins and dietary and nutritional food supplements. Alternatively, they challenged the statutory authority for the Regulations, pleading Charter breaches and tortious conduct by government officials in administering and enforcing the regulatory scheme. Their statement of claim sought, inter alia, damages, declarations of invalidity and a stay of enforcement of provisions of the Act and Regulations.

The respondents brought a motion to strike the statement of claim in its entirety or paragraphs amounting to the bulk of the claim, and brought a motion to remove all defendants but Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Canada.

The Federal Court struck the Claim "in accordance with these reasons", granted leave to amend the Claim within 30 days, and struck the other defendants. The applicants appealed the decision, arguing that the Judge had erred in striking parts of the Claim and that those parts which had not been struck should be allowed to proceed. The respondents cross-appealed on the issue of whether the whole Claim had been struck. The Federal Court of Appeal interpreted the lower court decision as striking the entire statement of claim and dismissed the appeal.

Motion by the defendants, the Crown and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, to strike portions of the statement of claim of the plaintiffs, Sivak and 16 others. The motion arose in the context of a motion by the plaintiffs seeking certification of a class action. The plaintiffs accused the Canadian government of conspiring to deprive them and other Czech Roma of rights under the Canadian immigration system. The action arose in the context of a 2009 Fact-Finding Mission Report on State Protection in the Czech Republic and the extent to which it related to the decision-making process of the Refugee Protection Division. The matter was converted to an action, as it raised important issues of institutional bias that could not be assessed on judicial review. The defendants brought a motion to strike portions of the pleadings. The defendants submitted that the Minister of Foreign Affairs was not a proper or necessary party and that the claim did not support a cause of action against him. The defendants also sought to strike the claims alleging negligence, conspiracy, misfeasance in public office, and breaches of ss. 7 and 15 of the Charter. The plaintiffs submitted that the motion to strike was premature and heavy-handed.

HELD: Motion allowed.

The impugned portions of the pleadings were little more than bald accusations bolstered with rhetoric and irrelevant asides that did not provide a basis of fact. The allegations against the Minister of Foreign Affairs were nothing more than speculative and were conclusions unsupported by material facts. The claim did not disclose any wrongdoing by the Minister, any basis for vicarious liability, or any cause of action against him. The plaintiffs did not plead or factually substantiate the essential elements of the tort of negligence, as no details were provided to support the duties allegedly breached. Similarly, the essential elements of the torts of conspiracy, abuse of process, and misfeasance in public office and supporting material facts were not sufficiently pled. The Charter claims failed to indicate how the plaintiffs' protected interests were infringed. They also failed to identify the circumstances or context in which the breaches allegedly occurred. Further portions were struck as immaterial or redundant. The impugned portions were struck without leave to amend.

REASONS FOR ORDER AND ORDER

RUSSELL J.

THE MOTION

1 I have before me a motion by the Defendants to strike portions of the Plaintiffs' Amended Statement of Claim. I heard this motion in conjunction with a motion by the Plaintiffs seeking certification as a class action and, to some extent, both motions need to be considered together.

2 By way of judgment, dated March 31, 2011, I converted the Plaintiffs' previous judicial review application into an action pursuant to subsection 18.4(2) of the Federal Courts Act, directing that henceforth the judicial review would be treated and proceeded with as an action.

3 Since actions are commenced by way of Statement of Claim, the Plaintiffs filed their most recent Amended Statement of Claim (Claim) on October 19, 2011, and it is this document against which the Defendants' strike motion is directed.

4 The Defendants do not seek to strike the Claim in its entirety. They acknowledge the importance of resolving as quickly as possible the dispute between the parties concerning procedural fairness, natural justice, and the validity of the Fact-Finding Mission Report on State Protection Czech Republic, dated June 2009 (2009 Report) in so far as the 2009 Report relates to the Refugee Protection Division's (RPD) decision-making process. What the Defendants object to are those portions of the Claim that deal with tort allegations, as well as a few more peripheral matters which they say do not comply with the rules and jurisprudence that govern pleadings in this Court.

OVERVIEW

5 After reviewing the Claim, my general conclusion is that the impugned portions are, as the Defendants allege, often little more than bald accusations which the Plaintiffs have attempted to bolster with colourful rhetoric and irrelevant asides instead of providing a real basis of fact. For example, a passage such as there is no doubt, in the minds of anyone involved with refugees, particularly the members of the immigration bar, as well as notable NGOs, that this "June, 2009 Report" was manufactured by the IRB, as a means of appeasing the Minister, in order to base negative findings and refugee determinations, which would reduce the acceptance rates of Czech Roma is a statement of what the Plaintiffs hope to prove, but it also reveals that the Plaintiffs are short of facts to support their case, and so have to fall back upon the alleged omniscience of the "immigration bar" and "anyone involved with refugees." I do not see anywhere in the rules that govern pleadings that facts can be dispensed with provided plaintiff or defendant invokes the oracular powers of their own counsel and his or her cohorts at the bar.

6 This matter was converted to an action because it raised important matters of possible institutional bias that I felt could not be assessed on judicial review given the limited record available to the Court. Since conversion, the Plaintiffs have broadened the scope of their objectives and now wish to accuse the Canadian government of conspiring to deprive them, and other Czech Roma, of their rights under our immigration system. If the Plaintiffs wish to launch such an attack they must proceed efficiently and effectively.

7 To proceed efficiently and effectively both sides must abide by and follow the Federal Courts Rules (Rules) which were promulgated precisely for this purpose. At this stage in the proceedings the Plaintiffs must comply with the rules that govern the form and content of pleadings. In my view, the Plaintiffs have not done this with their Claim, and the result is that this action has already taken much longer than it should have taken to reach this stage. The issues raised by the Plaintiffs have a significance for many other extant and future refugee claims, and the system could easily become trammelled as other claims are held in abeyance to await the outcome of this action. This situation gives rise to an even greater need for efficiency and effectiveness than might otherwise be the case. Hence, from this point on, the Court will look to counsel on both sides to do everything in their power to ensure the just, most expeditious and least expensive determination of this dispute on its merits.

8 Deficient pleadings do not promote the just, most expeditious and least expensive determination on the merits. In fact, they promote the opposite, which is why it is important that the objections to the Claim be dealt with quickly and that timelines be set to achieve the remaining steps needed to carry this dispute to a resolution.

THE MOTION TO STRIKE

9 Rather than request particulars, the Defendants have brought a motion to strike some portions of the Claim. After hearing the differences between counsel on these matters, I do not think the Defendants are being premature or heavy-handed. The wide disparity of views between the parties over what is required of pleadings means that the Court's early involvement is to be preferred.

The Applicable Rules

10 I see no dispute between the parties concerning the applicable rules and principles that govern pleadings. The Plaintiffs simply allege that they have complied with the law and that their Claim as presently drafted is sufficient.

11 The two principal functions of pleadings are to clearly define the issues between litigants and to give fair notice of the case which has to be met by the other side. See Cerqueira v Ontario, 2010 ONSC 3954.

12 Rule 174 requires that every pleading shall contain a concise statement of the material facts on which the party relies, but shall not include evidence by which those facts are to be proven.

13 Rule 181 requires that a pleading "shall contain particulars of every allegation contained therein."

14 Pursuant to subsection 221(1) of the Rules, a defendant may bring a motion to strike out all or some of a statement of claim on the following grounds:

- a. It discloses no reasonable cause of action;
- b. It is immaterial, or redundant; or
- c. It is scandalous, frivolous or vexatious.

15 The test in Canada to strike out a pleading under Rule 221 of the Rules is whether it is plain and obvious on the facts pleaded that the action cannot succeed. In this regard, the Supreme Court of Canada has noted that the power to strike out a statement of claim is a "valuable housekeeping measure essential to effective and a fair litigation." See Hunt v Carey Canada Inc., [1990] 2 SCR 959 and R v Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd. 2011 SCC 42, at paragraphs 17 and 19.

16 In determining whether a cause of action exists, the following principles are to be considered:

- a. The material facts pled are to be taken as proven, unless the alleged facts are based on assumptive or speculative conclusions which are incapable of proof;
- b. If the facts, taken as proven, disclose a reasonable cause of action, that is, one with some chance of success, then the action may proceed; and
- c. The statement of claim must be read as generously as possible, with a view to accommodating any inadequacies in the form of the allegations due to drafting deficiencies.

See Operation Dismantle Inc. v Canada, [1985] 1 SCR 441.

17 These basic principles have acquired a fairly heavy gloss of case law over the years as the Court has applied them to particular sets of pleadings. I think it might be helpful at this stage to set out some of the more basic guidelines that have emerged from the cases that I believe have relevance for this motion.

Rule 174

18 In Baird v Canada 2006 FC 205; affirmed 2007 FCA 48, a statement of claim was held to be fatally flawed where it did not specify a time when the offending activities giving rise to the causes of action took place. Nor did it specify which Crown servant did something wrong. The pleadings were allegations and conclusions, and did not provide the essential facts grounding the cause of action.

19 In Sunsolar Energy Technologies (S.E.T.) Inc. v Flexible Solutions International Inc. 2004 FC 1205, this Court concluded that in order to implead corporate officers and directors, actual actions of personal conduct must be pleaded. A bare assertion of conclusion is not an allegation of material fact, nor can it support a cause of action against an individual defendant. Nor can it be pled that it is a "reasonable conclusion" that an individual was implicated to a sufficient extent to support a finding of deliberate acts. To hold otherwise is to turn an action into a fishing expedition.

20 Conohan v The Cooperators, [2002] 3 FC 421, 2002 FCA 60 makes the often repeated point that it is sufficient for a party to plead the material facts. Counsel is then at liberty to present in argument any legal consequences which the facts support.

21 The importance of pleading facts is asserted again in Johnson v Canada (Royal Canadian Mounted Police)

2002 FCT 917, where the Court reiterated that it is not sufficient for a claim to contain assertions without facts upon which to base those assertions. In Johnson, this meant that a plea of breach of agreement must allege the relevant terms that have been breached, and a plea of breach of fiduciary duty must identify the material facts alleged to give rise to the existence of the duty and the breach.

22 Kastner v Painblanc (1994), 58 CPR (3d) 502, 176 NR 68 (Fed. CA) emphasizes the important general point that an action is not a fishing expedition and that a plaintiff who starts proceedings in the hope that something will turn up abuses the Court's process.

Rule 181

23 Chen v Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) 2006 FC 389, makes it clear that the purpose of pleadings is to define the matters at issue between the parties, but the purpose of particulars is different. Particulars are meant to provide the opposing party with sufficient information of the allegations being advanced so that it might know the case to be met at trial and to prepare a full and meaningful response. If a pleading is not good as a matter of law, particulars cannot save it. If it is not good as a matter of pleading, particulars will not improve it. These distinctions are of significance in the present case because Plaintiffs' counsel often took the position before me that this motion to strike is not appropriate because the Defendants have not asked for particulars and, if the Claim as pled is in any way defective, such defects can be remedied by the Court simply ordering particulars.

24 Paul v Kingsclear Indian Band (1997), 137 FTR 275 (TD), however, establishes clearly that there is no obligation on a defendant to demand particulars and a plaintiff cannot cure an otherwise deficient statement of claim by arguing that defendant has not sought particulars.

Rule 221

25 Edell v Canada (Revenue Agency), [2010] GSTC 9, 2010 FCA 26, reaffirms the fundamental rule that in a motion to strike the Court is narrowly limited to assessing the threshold issue of whether a genuine issue exists as to material facts requiring a trial. All allegations of fact, unless patently ridiculous or incapable of proof, must be accepted as proved. The defendant who seeks summary dismissal bears the evidentiary burden of showing the lack of a genuine issue.

26 The fundamental rule, however, must take into account that no cause of action can exist where no material facts are alleged against the defendant. See Chavali v Canada 2002 FCA 209.

27 Apotex Inc. v Glaxo Group Ltd, 2001 FCT 1351 teaches that the Court should generally refuse to strike out "surplus statements" that are not prejudicial. Doubt is to be resolved in favour of permitting the pleading so that relevant evidence in support of the pleading may be brought before the trial judge.

28 Also, while the Court is not required to re-draft pleadings, it must examine defective pleadings to determine if they could be saved through proper amendments. See Sweet v Canada (1999), 249 NR 17 (Fed. CA).

29 Even though, if there is any doubt, paragraphs in the pleadings should be left in so that evidence may be brought before the trial judge, this does not mean that redundant or immaterial paragraphs outlining the evidence should remain in the pleadings. See Mathias v The Queen, [1980] 2 FC 813 (TD).

30 Kisikawpimootewin v Canada, 2004 FC 1426 reiterates the well-recognized premise that a scandalous, vexatious or frivolous action includes an action where the pleadings are so deficient in factual material that the defendant cannot know how to answer. This is echoed again in Murray v Canada (1978), 21 NR 230 (Fed. CA). A claim that does not sufficiently reveal the facts upon which a cause of action is based, such that it is not possible for the defendant to answer or the Court to regulate the action, is a vexatious action.

31 There are many cases that hold that an action cannot be brought on speculation in the hope that sufficient facts may be gleaned on discovery to support the allegations made in the pleadings. See, for example, AstraZeneca Canada Inc. v Novopharm Ltd. 2009 FC 1209; appeal dismissed 2010 FCA 112.

32 In fact, it is an abuse of process for a plaintiff to start proceedings in the hope that something will turn up. A plaintiff should not be permitted to discover the defendant to pursue such an action. See Kastner, above.

33 I think it is also well-established that the rule that material facts in a statement of claim must be taken as true in determining whether a reasonable cause of action is disclosed does not require that allegations based upon assumptions and speculation be taken as true. See Operation Dismantle, above.

GROUND

The Minister of Foreign Affairs

34 The Defendants say that the Minister of Foreign Affairs should be struck from the Claim as he is not a proper or necessary party; nor is he vicariously liable for acts or omissions of employees at visa posts abroad.

35 Paragraph 104(1)(a) of the Rules authorizes the Court to order that a person who is not a proper or necessary party shall cease to be a party to an action. A person is only considered a necessary party where he or she would be bound by the results of the action, and where there is a question in the action "which cannot be effectually and completely settled unless he is a party." The Defendants say that the Minister of Foreign Affairs does not fall into either category. Furthermore, where the Plaintiffs' Claim does not seek relief against a defendant, and makes no allegations against him, that defendant is not a necessary party.

36 The Defendants say that, in the present case, the Claim does not disclose any material facts that establish wrongdoing on the part of the Minister of Foreign Affairs or that support a cause of action against him. The Claim contains only bald allegations respecting this defendant which are asserted in the form of conclusions. In fact, the Minister of Foreign Affairs is referred to only twice in the Claim: once in paragraph 7(b)(ii), which describes the Minister as a party while making allegations against his staff, and again in paragraph 23 in which the Plaintiffs conclude, without any supporting facts, that the Minister of Foreign Affairs "conspired with and facilitated in the manufacturing of the June 2009 Report." It is possible that the Plaintiffs are also referring to the Minister of Foreign Affairs in paragraphs 26 and 27 of the Claim, which allege a "Ministerial and IRB effort to attempt to be rid of the Roma problem" and a "Ministerial and RPD conspiracy." However, the term "Ministerial" is not defined in the Claim and no facts are pled to support the conclusions in those paragraphs. Therefore, it is entirely unclear how the Minister of Foreign Affairs is implicated in any alleged wrongdoing.

37 Furthermore, the Defendants say that the Minister of Foreign Affairs is not vicariously liable for the acts or omissions of the staff members at the embassies and visa posts abroad. While unclear from the vague language in the Claim, the Plaintiffs appear to make this allegation at paragraph 7(b)(ii). The Minister of Foreign Affairs, however, is himself a Crown servant when acting in his official capacity. An individual Crown servant is not vicariously liable for the torts of subordinate Crown servants. This also applies to the statement at paragraph 7(b)(iii) in which the Plaintiffs claim that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is liable for the actions of his employees and staff.

38 Based on the foregoing, the Defendants say that the Claim does not comply with Rules 174 and 181 respecting the allegations against the Minister of Foreign Affairs. He should be removed as a party to the within action and the Claim should be amended accordingly. In addition, the portions of paragraph 7(b) alleging vicarious liability on the part of the Minister of Foreign Affairs and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration should be struck.

39 In response, the Plaintiffs argue that, with respect to paragraphs 9 to 23 of the Defendants' submissions:

- a. The Minister of Foreign Affairs is statutorily charged with overseeing, inter alia, the operations of Canada's embassies and the foreign missions, including the issuance of visas when visa requirements are imposed;
- b. Questions with respect to the contact of the two researchers who drafted the "June, 2009 Issue Paper", and the Canadian Embassy were refused answered;

- c. The Plaintiffs plead, as a fact, that both the Minister of Citizenship and Foreign Affairs, conspired to:
 - (i) Engage in an agreement for the use of lawful and unlawful means, and conduct, the predominant purpose of which is to cause injury to the Plaintiffs, and all other Canadians (sic); and/or
 - (ii) To engage in an agreement, to use unlawful means and conduct, whose predominant purpose and conduct directed at the Plaintiffs, and all other Czech Roma, is to cause injury to the Plaintiffs and all other Czech Roma, or the Defendants' officials should know, in the circumstances, that injury to the Plaintiffs, and all other Czech Roma, is likely to, and does result;
- d. The Plaintiffs have pleaded that the actions of the Minister, and his officials, breached their Charter and constitutional rights;
- e. While Ministers are generally not named as Defendants, there are exceptions to this, particularly with respect to constitutional and Charter issues and the Plaintiffs state that this is such an exception and that, at this juncture, it is premature to strike any parties from the pleadings. See Liebmann v Canada (Minister of National Defence), [1994] 2 FC 3 and Cairns v Farm Credit Corp., [1992] 2 FC 115.

40 I do not think that the Plaintiffs adequately answer the complaints raised by the Defendants. My reading of the Claim leads me to the conclusion that the Plaintiffs' accusations against the Minister of Foreign Affairs are, as pled, nothing more than speculative allegations and conclusions unsupported by material facts.

41 I agree with the Defendants that, as presently drafted, the Claim does not disclose sufficient material facts to establish and support:

- a. Any wrongdoing on the part of the Minister of Foreign Affairs;
- b. Any cause of action against him;
- c. How the Minister of Foreign Affairs could be vicariously or otherwise liable for the acts and omissions of other people such as staff members at the embassies and visa posts abroad and/or the imposition of visa requirements.

42 As it stands, the allegations against the Minister of Foreign Affairs are bald accusations. If the Plaintiffs wish to establish that the Minister of Foreign Affairs has conspired to cause them injury, then they must set out the facts upon which they rely. As presently drafted, the Claim merely states what the Plaintiffs hope to prove at trial. At this stage, this amounts to a fishing expedition. As the Federal Court of Appeal made clear in Simon v Canada, 2011 DTC 5016; 2011 FCA 6, the requirement that a pleading contain a concise statement of the material facts relied upon is a technical requirement with a precise meaning in law. Each constituent element of a cause of action must be pleaded with sufficient particularity. Making allegations without a factual foundation is an abuse of process. In my view, there is nothing clear and/or inferable in the way the Minister of Foreign Affairs is simply accused of wrongdoing on the basis that he has some vague responsibility for overseeing embassies and foreign missions, or that embassy officials are somehow conducting a broad "Ministerial" conspiracy.

43 The Federal Court of Appeal in Baird v Canada 2007 FCA 48 affirmed that a statement of claim was fatally flawed where it did not specify a time when the offending activities giving rise to the causes of action took place, and did not specify which Crown servant did something wrong. It is not enough to plead allegations and conclusions. The essential facts grounding a cause of action must be pled.

44 The applicable rules and jurisprudence interpreting those rules, are readily available to the Plaintiffs and their counsel. The failure to plead sufficient material facts to support a claim against the Minister of Foreign Affairs, or particular Crown servants, leads me to conclude that the Plaintiffs have no such facts and are seeking to use these proceedings as a fishing expedition.

Negligence

45 I also agree with the Defendants that the Plaintiffs have not pled, or factually substantiated, the essential elements of the tort of negligence.

46 As the Defendants point out, to support a cause of action in negligence, a statement of claim must include sufficient facts to support the essential elements of the tort. These include establishing a duty of care, providing details of the breach of that duty, explaining the causal connection between the breach of duty and the injury, and setting out the actual loss. Such a claim requires a factual basis that identifies each wrongful act as well as negligence, such as the "when, what, by whom and to whom of the relevant circumstances." See Benaissa v Canada (Attorney General) 2005 FC 1220, at paragraph 24.

47 The Plaintiffs make a bald allegation at paragraph 28(b) of the Claim that the "Defendants' officials have been negligent in the exercise of their common-law, statutory, and constitutional duties owed to the Plaintiffs" and that these duties arose in the context of the processing of their refugee claims pursuant to the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act. This is followed by unsubstantiated statements that the "Defendants' officials breached this duty of care" and that this caused the Plaintiffs' losses.

48 I agree with the Defendants that such allegations are nothing more than conclusions and are not sufficient to support a cause of action in negligence. No details have been provided to identify the "Defendants' officials," to explain their roles and responsibilities in relation to the Plaintiffs, or to establish their connection to any of the parties. Similarly, the Claim is silent as to the "Defendants' officials" particular acts or omissions that the Plaintiffs' claim were negligent and no facts are included to support the specific "common-law, statutory and constitutional duties" that were allegedly breached. It seems to me that the general requirements for establishing liability in tort have not been met and it would be impossible to conduct the necessary analysis to determine whether liability could be established. As the Defendants point out, this is particularly difficult where the defendant is a government actor. Issues arise as to whether public law discretionary powers establish private law duties owed to particular individuals or whether the decisions in question were policy decisions or operational decisions. These questions are very complex and detailed factual pleadings are required in order to properly determine whether a cause of action exists.

49 As I read the Claim as presently drafted, the majority of the limited factual allegations upon which the claim in negligence is based relate mainly to members of the Board and/or of the Board's Research Directorate. The Defendants are correct to point out that these individuals are not linked to the named Defendants in the Statement of Claim and factual allegations respecting their conduct are insufficient and fail to ground liability in negligence by the named Defendants.

50 All that the Plaintiffs say in general reply is that "the proper and complete context and reading [of all their tort claims] illustrate that the various causes of action are properly pleaded."

51 Once again, if the Claim is read in the light of the relevant rules and governing jurisprudence, I think the Plaintiffs fall a long way short of providing what is required.

Conspiracy

52 The Defendants point out that the Plaintiffs have not pled the essential elements of the tort of conspiracy and that paragraphs 23, 27 and 28(a)(iv) should therefore be struck from the Claim.

53 The Defendants direct the Court to the Supreme Court of Canada decision in Canada Cement LaFarge Ltd. v British Columbia Lightweight Aggregate Ltd., [1983] 1 SCR 452 (SCC) at paragraph 33 for the constituents of the tort of conspiracy:

... whereas the law of tort does not permit an action against an individual defendant who has caused injury to the plaintiff, the law of torts does recognize a claim against them in combination as the tort of conspiracy, if:

1. whether the means used by the defendants are lawful or unlawful, the predominant purpose of the defendants' conduct is to cause injury to the plaintiff; or,
2. where the conduct of the defendants is unlawful, the conduct is directed towards the plaintiff... and the defendants should know in the circumstances that injury to the plaintiff is likely to and does result.

54 In Normart Management Ltd. v West Hill Redevelopment Co., (1998), 37 OR (3d) 97 (OCA) the Ontario Court of Appeal provided guidance with respect to pleading the tort of conspiracy at paragraphs 21 and 22. Applied to the present context, I think this means that, as the Defendants point out,

- a. All the parties to the conspiracy must be identified and their relationship to each other must be described;
- b. Agreements between the various defendants must be pled with all facts material to such agreements including the parties to each agreement, the date of the agreement, and the object and purpose of each agreement;
- c. Overt acts of each of the alleged conspirators in pursuance or furtherance of the conspiracy must be pled with clarity and precision, including the times and dates of such overt acts; and
- d. The pleadings must allege the injury and the damage occasioned to the plaintiffs and special damages in the sense of the monetary loss the plaintiffs have sustained must be pled and particularized.

55 Once again, I have to agree with the Defendants that the Claim is entirely deficient with respect to pleading the elements of the tort of conspiracy. Bald allegations of a conspiracy involving undefined Ministers, the Board, and unidentified "Defendants' officials" are made at paragraphs 23, 27 and 28(a)(iv) without any reference to the above requirements. The Plaintiffs also accuse the "Defendants' officials" of engaging in unlawful conduct at paragraph 28(b)(iii)(A), but provide no details to describe this conduct or establish its unlawfulness. This is scandalous and vexatious.

56 Once again, the Plaintiffs provide no detailed response and say little more than that, in their opinion, they have complied with the rules and the governing jurisprudence.

57 I have to conclude that, once again, when the Claim is read against the rules and governing jurisprudence, the paragraphs alleging conspiracy should be struck.

Misfeasance in Public Office/Abuse of Authority

58 The Defendants make similar complaints in relation to this aspect of the Claim. They say that the Plaintiffs have not pled the essential elements of the tort of misfeasance in public office/abuse of authority, so that, paragraphs 24 and 28(a)(i) and (iii) of the Claim should be struck.

59 In Freeman-Maloy v Marsden, (2006) 79 OR (3d) 401, the Ontario Court of Appeal provided the following guidance regarding the constituents of the tort of misfeasance in a public office:

[10] The tort of misfeasance in a public office is founded on the fundamental rule of law principle that those who hold public office and exercise public functions are subject to the law and must not abuse their powers to the detriment of the ordinary citizen. As Lord Steyn put it in Three Rivers District Council v. Bank of England (No. 3), [2000] 2 W.L.R. 1220, at p. 1230 W.L.R.: "The rationale of the tort is that in a legal system based on the rule of law executive or administrative power 'may be exercised only for the public good' and not for ulterior and improper purposes." The "underlying purpose" of the tort of misfeasance in a public office "is to protect each citizen's reasonable expectation that a public officer will not intentionally injure a member of the public through deliberate and unlawful conduct in the exercise of public functions": Odhavji, supra, at para. 30.

[11] In Three Rivers, supra, the House Lords identified the ingredients of the tort as being: (1) the defendant must be a public officer; (2) the claim must arise from the exercise of power as a public officer; and (3) the mental element, namely, the defendant must have acted with malice or bad faith. In Odhavji, at para. 23, [page407] Iacobucci J. described the elements of the tort in similar terms: "First, the public officer must have engaged in deliberate and unlawful conduct in his or her capacity as a public officer. Second, the public officer must have been aware both that his or her conduct was unlawful and that it was likely to harm the plaintiff."

60 The Supreme Court of Canada has also provided extensive guidance with regard to this tort. In Odhavji Estate v Woodhouse 2003 SCC 69 (SCC), the Supreme Court of Canada emphasized the following:

22 What then are the essential ingredients of the tort, at least insofar as it is necessary to determine the issues that arise on the pleadings in this case? In Three Rivers, the House of Lords held that the tort of misfeasance in a public office can arise in one of two ways, what I shall call Category A and Category B. Category A involves conduct that is specifically intended to injure a person or class of persons. Category B involves a public officer who acts with knowledge both that she or he has no power to do the act complained of and that the act is likely to injure the plaintiff. This understanding of the tort has been endorsed by a number of Canadian courts: see for example Powder Mountain Resorts, supra, [2001] B.C.J. No. 2172; Alberta (Minister of Public Works, Supply and Services) (C.A.), supra, [2002] A.J. No. 1474; and Granite Power Corp. v. Ontario, [2002] O.J. No. 2188 (QL) (S.C.J.). It is important, however, to recall that the two categories merely represent two different ways in which a public officer can commit the tort; in each instance, the plaintiff must prove each of the tort's constituent elements. It is thus necessary to consider the elements that are common to each form of the tort.

23 In my view, there are two such elements. First, the public officer must have engaged in deliberate and unlawful conduct in his or her capacity as a public officer. Second, the public officer must have been aware both that his or her conduct was unlawful and that it was likely to harm the plaintiff. What distinguishes one form of misfeasance in a public office from the other is the manner in which the plaintiff proves each ingredient of the tort. In Category B, the plaintiff must prove the two ingredients of the tort independently of one another. In Category A, the fact that the public officer has acted for the express purpose of harming the plaintiff is sufficient to satisfy each ingredient of the tort, owing to the fact that a public officer does not have the authority to exercise his or her powers for an improper purpose, such [page282] as deliberately harming a member of the public. In each instance, the tort involves deliberate disregard of official duty coupled with knowledge that the misconduct is likely to injure the plaintiff.

24 Insofar as the nature of the misconduct is concerned, the essential question to be determined is not whether the officer has unlawfully exercised a power actually possessed, but whether the alleged misconduct is deliberate and unlawful. As Lord Hobhouse wrote in Three Rivers, supra, at p. 1269:

The relevant act (or omission, in the sense described) must be unlawful. This may arise from a straightforward breach of the relevant statutory provisions or from acting in excess of the powers granted or for an improper purpose.

Lord Millett reached a similar conclusion, namely, that a failure to act can amount to misfeasance in a public office, but only in those circumstances in which the public officer is under a legal obligation to act. Lord Hobhouse stated the principle in the following terms, at p. 1269: "If there is a legal duty to act and the decision not to act amounts to an unlawful breach of that legal duty, the omission can amount to misfeasance [in a public office]." See also R. v. Dytham, [1979] Q.B. 722 (C.A.). So, in the United Kingdom, a failure to act can constitute misfeasance in a public office, but only if the failure to act constitutes a deliberate breach of official duty.

25 Canadian courts also have made a deliberate unlawful act a focal point of the inquiry. In Alberta (Minister of Public Works, Supply and Services) v. Nilsson (1999), 70 Alta. L.R. (3d) 267, 1999 ABQB 440, at para. 108, the Court of Queen's Bench stated that the essential question to be determined is whether there has been deliberate misconduct on the part of a public official. Deliberate misconduct, on this view, consists of: (i) an intentional illegal act; and (ii) an intent to harm an individual or class [page283] of individuals. See also Uni-Jet Industrial Pipe Ltd. v. Canada (Attorney General) (2001), 156 Man. R. (2d) 14, 2001 MBCA 40, in which Kroft J.A. adopted the same test. In Powder Mountain Resorts, supra, Newbury J.A. described the tort in similar terms, at para. 7:

... it may, I think, now be accepted that the tort of abuse of public office will be made out in Canada where a public official is shown either to have exercised power for the specific purpose of injuring the plaintiff (i.e., to have acted in "bad faith in the sense of the exercise of public power for an improper or ulterior motive") or to have acted "unlawfully with a mind of reckless indifference to the illegality of his act" and to the probability of injury to the plaintiff. (See Lord Steyn in Three Rivers, at [1231].) Thus there remains what in theory at least is a clear line between this tort on the one hand, and what on the other hand may be called negligent excess of power -- i.e., an act committed without knowledge of (or subjective recklessness as to) its unlawfulness and the probable consequences for the plaintiff. [Emphasis in original.]

Under this view, the ambit of the tort is limited not by the requirement that the defendant must have been engaged in a particular type of unlawful conduct, but by the requirement that the unlawful conduct must have been deliberate and the defendant must have been aware that the unlawful conduct was likely to harm the plaintiff.

61 It seems to me, then, that in order to establish a cause of action based on the tort of public misfeasance/abuse of authority, the Claim must meet the following requirements:

- a. It must be established that the Defendant(s) is a public officer;
- b. The Claim must arise from the exercise of power as a public officer; and
- c. The mental element, namely that the Defendant(s) must have acted in bad faith or with malice, must be present.

62 As the Defendants point out, while the Plaintiffs have listed the generic elements of the tort of misfeasance in public office/abuse of authority at paragraph 28(a)(iii) of their Claim, they have failed to provide material facts to substantiate the allegations. Again, the "Defendants' officials" are not identified, there are no particulars respecting the nature of the public offices that particular individuals are alleged to have held, the unidentified "Defendants' officials" are not connected to the named Defendants, and the bald allegation of "unlawful conduct" is not substantiated by material facts. Also, the majority of the factual allegations in the Claim refer to members of the Board and/or of the Board's Research Directorate and their relationship to the named Defendants, or to the "Defendants' officials" is not established in the Claim.

63 With respect to the allegations in this regard against the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration at paragraph 24 of the Claim I agree with the Defendants that insufficient material facts are pled and details of the public comments that were allegedly made are not provided. Paragraph 24 of the Claim is not sufficient to ground a cause of action against the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration based on public misfeasance/abuse of authority.

64 Once again, the Plaintiffs provide no substantial response to these deficiencies in their Claim. They simply say that they disagree and that their Claim complies with the relevant rules and jurisprudence. I cannot accept this position.

65 Based on the foregoing, paragraphs 24 and 28(a)(i) and (iii) of the Claim should be struck, as well as any other reference to the tort of public misfeasance/abuse of authority.

Abuse of Process

66 The Defendants have similar complaints with regard to the abuse of process claims. They say the Plaintiffs have not pled the essential elements of the tort of abuse process and it is not relevant to the within proceedings.

67 An allegation of "abuse of process" is made at paragraph 28(a)(ii) of the Claim. The Plaintiffs assert that unidentified Defendants' officials "engaged in an abuse of process at common law." This allegation is not factually substantiated.

68 The tort of abuse of process usually involves the misuse of the process of the Court to coerce someone in a way that is outside the ambit of the legal claim upon which the Court is asked to adjudicate. The Federal Court of Appeal in Levi Strauss & Co. v Roadrunner Apparel Inc. (1997), 76 CPR (3d) 129 (FCA) held that:

A review of the authorities shows that the essential element of the tort of abuse of process is that the abuser must have used the legal process for a purpose other than that which it was designed to serve, in other words for a collateral, extraneous, ulterior, improper or illicit purpose. The gist of the tort is the misuse of or perversion of the Court's process and there is no abuse when a litigant employs regular legal process to its proper conclusion, even with bad intentions.

69 The Defendants say that it is entirely unclear from the Claim how the tort of abuse of process could be applied to the actions of any of the named Defendants and that, in any case, the elements of the tort have not been pled. For these reasons they say that paragraph 28(a)(ii) should therefore be struck, as well as any other reference to the tort of abuse of process.

70 Once again, the Plaintiffs assert that they have pled this matter appropriately. However, they also say that abuse of process is not restricted to Court proceedings and that it can attach to Ministerial abuse. They say that the essential point is that the Ministers have interfered with the IRB which is supposed to be as independent as the judiciary. The Plaintiffs say that the Ministers and their staffs have interfered with the IRB both by their comments and their actions.

71 Quite apart from whether abuse of process can be applied in this context (basically a legal point that can be left for future determination) it is my view that the Plaintiffs still need to provide the factual underpinnings for the tort. Before the Defendants can properly respond, they still need to know the who, where, when, what and how of these allegations. Factual substantiation is missing from the Claim. For this reason, I think I have to strike paragraph 28(a)(ii) and other reference to the tort of abuse of process.

Conclusions on the Named Torts

72 Generally speaking, then, with regard to the named private law causes of action, I feel that the Defendants' objections to the pleadings are substantially justified, and that the Claim fails to comply with Rule 174 and the "plain and obvious" test posited in Hunt, above.

Sections 7 and 15 of the Charter

73 The Defendants allege that the Plaintiffs' allegations at paragraphs 24, 28(a)(v) and 28(b)(iii)(A), (B) and (D) of the Claim respecting alleged breaches of sections 7 and 15 of the Charter are speculative and hypothetical and are not supported by adequate facts. In both respects, the Plaintiffs assert that the actions of unidentified officials of the Defendants breached the Plaintiffs' sections 7 and 15 Charter rights, resulting in damages. They have failed to indicate how one or more of their protected interests have been infringed, and they have also failed to identify the circumstances or context in which the breaches allegedly occurred. I have to agree with the Defendants that the allegations in this regard are stated in the form of conclusions without any factual basis. This does not meet the requirements set out by the Supreme Court of Canada in MacKay v Manitoba, [1989] 2 SCR 357.

74 Charter allegations in the Claim that are made in a "factual vacuum" should be struck. In MacKay, above, the Supreme Court of Canada provided the following guidance:

9 Charter decisions should not and must not be made in a factual vacuum. To attempt to do so would trivialize the Charter and inevitably result in ill-considered opinions. The presentation of facts is not, as stated by the respondent, a mere technicality; rather, it is essential to a proper consideration of Charter issues. A respondent cannot, by simply consenting to dispense with the factual background, require or expect a court to deal with an issue such as this in a factual void. Charter [page362] decisions cannot be based upon the unsupported hypotheses of enthusiastic counsel. [emphasis added]

75 Once again, the Plaintiffs say that their Claim sufficiently pleads the facts and grounds upon which the Defendants can respond to the allegations of Charter breaches, but they have also indicated that they are not adverse to providing particulars if the Defendants require them.

76 Once again, I have to agree that, with regard to sections 7 and 15 and the Charter, the Claim is deficient in the ways alleged by the Defendants.

Redundant and Immaterial Material

77 The Defendants say that, pursuant to subsection 222(1) of the Rules, the Court can strike out a pleading on the ground that it is "immaterial or redundant." Immaterial or redundant allegations in a claim result in useless expense and prejudice the trial by involving the parties in a dispute that is wholly apart from the issues. Similarly, portions of a pleading that are irrelevant or inserted for colour should also be struck as they are scandalous.

78 On this basis, the Defendants seek to strike the following paragraphs from the Claim for the following reasons:

- a. Paragraphs 12(c) and 14 - in these paragraphs, the Plaintiffs purport to have knowledge of the opinions of "members of the refugee bar, and others" respecting the June 2009 Report and assert that this ill-defined group predicted that the situation was a repeat of the "Hungarian (Roma) Lead Case." Such opinions cannot be proven, the scope of the group is not clearly identifiable, the allegations are unsubstantiated and they are irrelevant and redundant to the Claim. Such allegations are inserted for colour only and should be struck as they are scandalous and violate the Rules;
- b. Paragraph 12(f) and 17 - these paragraphs also refer to the "Hungarian Lead Case" and are argumentative, inserted for colour only, and are irrelevant and redundant to the within Claim;
- c. Paragraph 20 - this paragraph refers to the cross-examination of Gordon Ritchie and the Defendants' alleged refusal to answer undertakings. These factual details are irrelevant to the Claim;
- d. Paragraph 25 - this paragraph should be struck because it is repetitive of paragraph 28 which is in fact pled with more specificity (although factually insufficient in any event). Paragraph 25 does not refer to a specific cause of action upon which the Plaintiffs base their entitlement to the damages claimed and is redundant;
- e. Paragraph 27 - this paragraph is immaterial to the Claim. It refers to the treatment of the Roma during the Holocaust and is inserted for colour only and is redundant.

79 In response, the Plaintiffs simply say that "these 'facts' with respect to the Hungarian Roma Lead Case, in Geza v Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [2006] FCJ No 477, (FCA) were not only pleaded, and advanced, but also further accepted by the Court of Appeal in that case."

80 It is difficult to know what the Plaintiffs mean by this allegation, and which "facts" they are referring. Geza was not an action and we are in the present case dealing with particular rules of pleadings. The Rules are clear that the pleadings are to contain facts, not evidence. I just do not see, for instance, what the unsubstantiated collective opinion of the immigration bar has to do with the factual underpinnings of this case. The same goes for most of the other points. In my view, the redundant material simply has no place in this Claim and impedes progress towards a clear statement of facts and issues to which the Defendants can respond, and the Court can adjudicate. The Plaintiffs may well feel a sense of historical grievance, and they may have good reason for it, but I think it better to wait until the facts are provided before the government of Canada and the RPD are connected with Hitler's Holocaust and a historical "continuum of persecution." I am well aware of the cases referred to earlier where the Court has refused to strike "surplus" statements that do not give rise to prejudice. However, accusations of this kind are not self-evident facts. All they do is raise the emotional and rhetorical temperature of the action and impede the just, most expeditious and least determination of the action on its merits.

81 I disagree with the Defendants regarding paragraph 12(f) which, although it refers to the "Hungarian Lead Case" and unspecified public comments by Minister Kenney, does allege facts which may be relevant and may help to ground the principal claim of institutional bias.

82 As regards paragraph 25, because paragraph 24 is not substantiated by relevant facts, there is nothing to ground the Minister's alleged public references and the balance of the paragraph is really pleading evidence.

Improperly Pleading Evidence

83 As the Defendants point out, Rule 174 of the Rules directs that a statement of claim shall not include evidence by which the facts of the case are to be proven.

84 On this basis, the Defendants say that the following paragraphs of the Claim should be struck:

- a. Paragraph 12(c) - not only should this paragraph be struck on the basis that it is irrelevant and/or immaterial, it also constitutes evidence.;
- b. Paragraph 12(g) - this paragraph lists the credentials of Paul St. Clair. This is evidence that has no place in the Claim;
- c. Paragraph 14 - as noted above, this paragraph purports to confirm the opinion in the minds of "anyone involved with refugees, particularly the members of the immigration bar" which could constitute evidence.

85 The Plaintiffs provide little by way of response on this issue other than disagreement. There is significant overlap here with other grounds of complaint and I think I have said enough already to explain why I agree with the Defendants on these points.

Miscellaneous Deficiencies

86 The Defendants also complain of the following deficiencies:

- a. The term "Minister" is used throughout the Claim without proper specificity given that two Ministers are named as Defendants. In this regard, it is unclear which Minister the Plaintiffs are referring to in certain sections of the Claim. Further, the Plaintiffs appear to use the Minister of Immigration, Minister Kenney, Minister, Immigration Minister and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration interchangeably (see, for example, paragraph 12(b), 12(c), 22 and 24.) Such terminology must be clarified so that the Defendants can properly respond to the Claim;
- b. The Plaintiffs have not defined or listed the statutory provisions or legislation upon which they rely despite making numerous, vague references to statutory breaches through the Claim;
- c. The relief outlined in paragraph 6 of the Claim is duplicative of the relief outlined in paragraph 1(a) to (d). As well, the Plaintiffs have only particularized their damages with respect to their negligence claim.

87 Given that I have already accepted the Defendants arguments as outlined above, I think that these difficulties disappear and/or do not sufficiently offend the Rules to warrant striking.

Conclusions

88 It seems to me that the Defendants have provided ample authority and justification for striking certain portions of the Claim as outlined above.

89 In George v Harris, [2000] OJ No 1762, at paragraph 20, Justice Epstein, then of the Ontario Superior Court of Justice, provided examples of what constitutes a "scandalous," "frivolous" or "vexatious" document:

- i. A document that demonstrates a complete absence of material facts;
- ii. Portions of a pleading that are irrelevant, argumentative or inserted for colour, or that constitute bare allegations;
- iii. A document that contains only argument and includes unfounded and inflammatory attacks on the integrity of a party, and speculative, unsupported allegations of defamation;

- iv. Documents that are replete with conclusions, expressions of opinion, provide no indication whether information is based on personal knowledge or information and belief, and contain many irrelevant matters.

90 A statement of claim containing bare assertions but no facts on which to base those assertions discloses no reasonable cause of action and may also be struck as an abuse of process. Furthermore, as indicated above, a claimant is not entitled to rely on the possibility that new facts may arise as the case progresses. On the contrary, the facts must be pled in the initial claim. The question of whether those facts can be proven is a separate issue, but they must be pled nonetheless.

91 The authorities cited above also show that when a particular cause of action is pled, the claim must contain pleadings of fact that satisfy all of the necessary elements of that cause of action. Otherwise, it will be plain and obvious that the claim discloses no reasonable cause of action.

92 A statement of claim will also be struck on the grounds that it is so unruly that the scope of the proceedings is unclear. As stated by this Court in Ceminchuk v Canada, [1995] FCJ No 914, at paragraph 10

A scandalous, vexatious or frivolous action may not only be one in which the claimant can present no rational argument, based upon the evidence or law, in support of the claim, but also may be an action in which the pleadings are so deficient in factual material that the defendant cannot know how to answer, and a court will be unable to regulate the proceedings. It is an action without reasonable cause, which will not lead to a practical result.

93 The Plaintiffs claim that this motion to strike is premature and the Defendants were obliged to request particulars first. However, as pointed out above, I think the jurisprudence of the Court is clear that there is no obligation on defendants to demand particulars and a plaintiff cannot cure an otherwise deficient statement of claim by arguing that the defendants have not sought particulars. See Paul v Kingsclear Indian Band, (1997), 132 FTR 145 (TD).

Amendments

94 I have no motion or request before me from the Plaintiffs that they be allowed to amend their Claim to correct the deficiencies outlined above. By and large, they have simply alleged that they have already pled in accordance with the relevant rules and governing jurisprudence. For the most part, and for reasons given, I cannot accept this position. I am well aware that an amendment should be allowed where a claim might possibly succeed if the pleading is amended and that to deny an amendment there must be no scintilla of a cause of action. See Larden v Canada (1998), 145 FTR 140. However, the Plaintiffs have not sought leave to amend and I have nothing before me to suggest that the Plaintiffs can establish the scintilla of a cause of action in relation to those portions of the Claim that have been struck.

95 It will soon be a year since I ordered this matter converted to an action, and yet we are still dealing with the fundamentals of the Claim. The time has come to adopt a more urgent approach to this action and I want counsel on both sides to acknowledge this factor and to proceed and conduct themselves accordingly. I know that Mr. Galati plans to take a break during the rest of January and February, but he has indicated he can be available to deal with this file during March 2012. In any event, the matter cannot be allowed to drag on and both counsel must expect to have to prioritize this action in future. Both sides acknowledge the importance of the issues raised for the immigration system generally and there is already a significant body of applications in this Court awaiting the outcome of these proceedings. That body will grow and will, eventually, begin to cause problems for the administration of justice in this Court, as well as for the handling of cases before the IRB. This uncertainty must be addressed quickly and the Court will be looking for counsel's enhanced assistance in ensuring the just, most expeditious and least expensive determination of the merits.

ORDER

THIS COURT ORDERS that

1. For reasons given, the following are struck from the Amended Statement of Claim pursuant to Rule 221(1) of the Federal Court Rules without leave to amend:
 - (i) Paragraph 6(b)
 - (ii) Paragraph 12(c);
 - (iii) Paragraph 14;
 - (iv) Paragraph 17;
 - (v) Paragraph 20;
 - (vi) Paragraph 24;
 - (vii) Paragraph 25;
 - (viii) Paragraph 27;
 - (ix) Paragraph 12(g);
 - (x) The Minister of Foreign Affairs as a party;
 - (xi) All references to the Minister of Foreign Affairs in the body of the Claim;
 - (xii) Paragraph 28(b) and all other references to the tort of negligence;
 - (xiii) Paragraphs 23, 27 and 28(a)(iv) and all references to the tort of conspiracy;
 - (xiv) Paragraphs 24, 28(a)(i) and (iii) and all references to the tort of public misfeasance/abuse of authority;
 - (xv) Paragraphs 28(a)(ii) and all references to the tort of abuse of process;
 - (xvi) All allegations of breach of sections 7 and 15 of the Charter contained in paragraphs 24, 28(a)(v), 28(b)(iii)(A), (B) and (D), and elsewhere in the claim.
2. The Defendants shall have the costs of this motion.
3. Counsel will confer and prepare and provide to the Court on or before March 20th, 2012, an itemized list of the further steps to be taken in this action and a preliminary timetable for accomplishing them. If necessary, the Court will then establish the time for a conference meeting to discuss and resolve points of concern.

Counsel

Mr. Rocco Galati, for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. Jonathan Dawe, Mr. Michael Dineen, for the Defendants, Oxana M. Kowalyk (Id Member), Susy Kim (Id Member), Iris Kohler (Id Member).

Mr. Jamie Todd, Ms. Ildiko Erdei, for the Defendants, Officer O'hara (CBSA Officer), Hal Sippel, Eric Blenkarn, Andrej Rustja, CBSA Officers, All John and Jane Doe CBSA/CIC Officials Unknown to the Plaintiffs, Involved in the Arrest, Detention and Continued Detention of the Plaintiffs, Linda Lizotte-Macpherson, President of the CBSA, Minister of Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness, Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Attorney General of Canada.

ORDER AND REASONS

R.L. BARNES J.

1 On these motions the Defendants seek relief under Rule 221 of the Federal Courts Rules, SOR/98-106, striking out the Statement of Claim filed by the Plaintiffs in this action on the basis that it discloses no viable cause of action, is scandalous, frivolous or vexatious, is an abuse of the process of the Court and is barred by cause of action estoppel.

2 At the outset of argument the Plaintiffs conceded that the claims asserted against the President of the Canada Border Services Agency [CBSA], the Minister of Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration [CIC] should be struck. In the result the action is dismissed as against those parties.

What remains for determination is whether the claims against the remaining Defendants should be struck and, if so, on what terms.

3 In order to apply the legal principles relied upon by the parties it is necessary to consider the specific allegations in the Plaintiffs' 65 page Statement of Claim.

4 The Plaintiffs' complaint arises out of their arrest and detention at the hands of the CBSA on March 7, 2014. Among other allegations the Plaintiffs say that they were wrongfully arrested and unlawfully detained on the strength of false information that CBSA and CIC officials either knowingly or negligently relied upon in the prosecution of the Plaintiffs' ongoing immigration detentions. Included in the claims against the named and unnamed officials are allegations that they misrepresented evidence, conspired to deprive the Plaintiffs of a fair hearing, and sought to punish the Plaintiffs for bringing refugee claims.

5 Some representative passages concerning the alleged conduct of the CBSA and CIC officers are set out below:

* The Arrest and Detention of Plaintiffs in Canada

87. Prior to, and up to being arrested by the CBSA on March 7th, 2014, the Plaintiffs were subject to the following actionable conduct by the CBSA/CIC officials:
- (a) negligent investigation in refusing to properly investigate the facts and evidence put forward by the Plaintiffs; and relying solely on the false information provided by those who defrauded the Plaintiffs, as well as officials of the People's Republic of China, and who were defendants in Ontario civil actions for that fraud and other criminal acts, for which negligent investigation the CBSA/CIC officers, and Her Majesty the Queen are liable, in that:
 - (i) the officers owed a common-law and statutory duty of care to competently investigate prior to arrest and detention;
 - (ii) the officer(s) breached that duty of care; and
 - (iii) as a result of that breach they caused the Plaintiffs compensable damages;
 - (b) that the initial duty to competently investigate is owed to the present day, which has been flagrantly breached and ignored by the named and unnamed CBSA/CIC officers, notwithstanding more comprehensive and updated information and evidence provided by Plaintiffs' counsel;
 - (c) engaged in abuse and excess of authority, and misfeasance of public office for the facts set out above, by:
 - (i) refusing disclosure undertaken and resisting disclosure due to the Plaintiffs;
 - (ii) misrepresenting the nature and quality of the evidence against the Plaintiffs;
 - (iii) acting in bad faith, and absence of good faith, continued to shift the grounds, for continued detention against the Plaintiffs;
 - (iv) sought the continued detention of the Plaintiffs, as punishment, because the Plaintiffs made refugee claims, refugee claims necessitated by the actions of the Defendant CBSA/CIC officials who have now, knowingly, exposed the Plaintiffs to torture and/or death if returned to China;
 - (v) refusing to properly investigate;
 - (d) conspired to deprive the Plaintiffs of their statutory and constitutional rights, to be free of arbitrary and unlawful arrest and detention as set out below in this statement of claim;
 - (e) breached the Plaintiffs' constitutional right(s) to counsel; and
 - (f) otherwise breached their rights under s. 7 of the Charter, to life, liberty, and security of the person, in a matter inconsistent with the tenets of fundamental justice, and contrary to s. 15 of the Charter, by discriminating against the Plaintiffs based on their status as wealthy Chinese nationals, with respect to their investigation, arrest, detention, and continued detention of the Plaintiffs.

102. Prior to, and during, the 1st detention review, the Defendant CBSA/CIC officials at the hearing, engaged in the following actionable conduct:

- (a) they continued to engage in negligent investigation as set out above;
- (b) they engaged in abuse of process, and abuse and excess of authority, and misfeasance of public office by:
 - (i) refusing disclosure undertaken and owed to the Plaintiffs;
 - (ii) misrepresenting the nature and quality of the evidence against the Plaintiffs';
 - (iii) in bad faith, and absence of good faith, shifted the grounds, for continued detention against the Plaintiffs;
 - (iv) sought the continued detention of the Plaintiffs, as punishment, because the Plaintiffs made refugee claims, refugee claims necessitated by the actions of the Defendant CBSA/CIC officials who have now, knowingly, exposed the Plaintiffs to torture and/or death if returned to China;
- (c) conspired to deprive the Plaintiffs of a fair hearing, and further conspired to continue the Plaintiffs' unlawful and arbitrary arrest and detention by:
 - (i) engaging in an agreement for the use of lawful and unlawful means, and conduct, the predominant purpose of which is to cause injury to the Plaintiffs; and/or
 - (ii) engaging, in an agreement, to use unlawful means and conduct, whose predominant purpose and conduct directed at the Plaintiffs, is to cause injury to the Plaintiffs, or the Defendants' officials should know, in the circumstances, that injury to the Plaintiffs, is likely to, and does result;
- (d) continued to breach the Plaintiffs' right to counsel and effective right to assistance of assistance of counsel;
- (e) endangered the lives of the Plaintiffs if ever returned to China; and
- (f) otherwise breached their rights under s. 7 of the Charter, to life, liberty, and security of the person, in a matter inconsistent with the tenets of fundamental justice, and contrary to s. 15 of the Charter, by discriminating against the Plaintiffs based on their status as wealthy Chinese nationals, with respect to their investigation, arrest, detention, and continued detention of the Plaintiffs.

6 In this action the Plaintiffs also seek damages from three members of the Immigration Division (collectively the ID Members) for unlawfully maintaining the Plaintiffs' detention in the context of three detention reviews. Each of the impugned decisions was overturned by this Court on judicial review. The Plaintiffs' claims are based, in part, on an assertion that ID Members Kowalyk, Kim and Kohler are liable in damages for failing to follow the Federal Court orders that quashed the earlier detention review decisions and for a variety of other adjudicative errors. Parts of the Statement of Claim assert causes of actions in negligence and others assert fraud and malice.

7 The material allegations made against the ID Members are the following:

MEMBER KOWALYK

106. In making her decision, on December 11th, 2014, ID Member O.M. Kowalyk, which decision was made in bad faith, and absence of good faith, the ID Member, with knowledge and intent and sole purpose of the continued detention of the Plaintiffs, contrary to law, engaged in the following conduct, and made the following baseless findings, with intention and knowledge, in bad faith and absence of good faith, for the sole purpose of continuing the unlawful detention of the Plaintiffs by:

- (a) making substantive determinations with respect to the strength and bona fides of the Plaintiffs' refugee claims which are outside the jurisdiction of the ID, and the exclusive jurisdiction of the RPD (Refugee Protection Division) of the IRB;
- (b) making rulings diametrically opposed to binding Federal Court orders and judgments;
- (c) knowingly misapplying the jurisprudence to the facts of the Plaintiffs' detention with the intention to continue the unlawful and arbitrary detention of the Plaintiffs;
- (d) refusing a release plan, which has been accepted as a release plan, for those accused of (association with) terrorism in Canada;
- (e) knowingly making capricious and perverse findings of fact and law, with the knowledge and intention of continuing the detention of the Plaintiffs; and
- (f) doing all of the above set out in (a)- (e), based on discrimination, contrary to s. 15 of the Charter, because the Plaintiffs are wealthy Chinese nationals; which conduct and findings were contrary to the binding jurisprudence, and the knowledge, experience, and expertise of the Member which spans just over 30 years as an Adjudicator and ID member conducting detention reviews.

109. The Plaintiffs state and the fact is that the errors cited by the Federal Court were not "errors" by Member Kowalyk, but made knowingly by her, in bad faith, and absence of good faith, intentionally designed for the purpose of continuing the Plaintiffs' unlawful and unconstitutional detention.

...

MEMBER KIM

114. In making her decision, on April 2nd, 2015, ID Member Susy Kim, which decision was made in bad faith, and absence of good faith, the ID Member, with knowledge and intent and sole purpose of the continued detention of the Plaintiffs, contrary to law, engaged in the following conduct, and made the following baseless findings, with intention and knowledge, in bad faith and absence of good faith, for the sole purpose of continuing the unlawful detention of the Plaintiffs:

- (a) making rulings diametrically opposed to binding Federal Court orders and judgment of Justice Phelan and knowingly ignored and contradicted Justice Phelan's judgment on judicial review;
- (b) making substantive determinations with respect to the Plaintiffs' refugee hearings which are outside the jurisdiction of the ID, and the exclusive jurisdiction of the RPD (Refugee Protection Division) of the IRB;
- (c) making rulings diametrically opposed to binding Federal Court orders and judgments;
- (d) knowingly misapplying the jurisprudence to facts of the Plaintiffs' detention with the intention to continue the unlawful and arbitrary detention of the Plaintiffs;
- (e) refusing a release plan, which has been accepted as a release plan, for those accused of (association with) terrorism in Canada;
- (f) knowingly making capricious and perverse findings of fact and law, with the knowledge and intention of continuing the detention of the Plaintiffs; and

- (g) doing all of the above set out in (a)- (e), based on discrimination, contrary to s. 15 of the Charter, because the Plaintiffs are wealthy Chinese nationals; which conduct and findings were contrary to the binding Federal Court jurisprudence, including that of the previous, successful judicial review, by the Federal Court, of the previous detention review of Oxana M. Kowalyk.

116. The Member's decision essentially adopted and rehashed the decision of the previous ID Member (Kowalyk). This is referenced in Justice Gagne's decision, at paragraph 48, as quoted in the previous paragraph of this Statement of Claim. The decision further ignores and flies in the face of the judicial review conducted by Justice Phelan of ID Member Kowalski's decision, whereby ID Member Kim knowingly adopts Kowalyk's errors to fly in the face of the Federal Court decision quashing Kowalyk's decision.

117. The Plaintiffs state and the fact is that the errors cited by the Federal Court were not "errors" by Member Susy Kim, but made knowingly by her, in bad faith, and absence of good faith, intentionally designed for the purpose of continuing the Plaintiffs' unlawful and unconstitutional detention.

MEMBER KOHLER

143. In making her decision, which decision was made in bad faith, and absence of good faith, the ID Member, Iris Kohler, with knowledge and intent and sole purpose of the continued detention of the Plaintiffs, contrary to law, engaged in the following conduct, and made the following baseless findings, with intention and knowledge, in bad faith and absence of good faith, for the sole purpose of continuing the unlawful detention of the Plaintiffs:

- (a) making rulings diametrically opposed to binding Federal Court orders and judgments;
- (b) making substantive determinations with respect to the Plaintiffs' refugee hearings which are outside the jurisdiction of the ID, and the exclusive jurisdiction of the RPD (Refugee Protection Division) of the IRB;
- (c) knowingly misapplying the jurisprudence to facts of the Plaintiffs' detention with the intention to continue the unlawful and arbitrary detention of the Plaintiffs;
- (d) refusing a release plan, which has been accepted as a release plan, for those accused of (association with) terrorism in Canada;
- (e) knowingly making capricious and perverse findings of fact and law, with the knowledge and intention of continuing the detention of the Plaintiffs; and
- (f) doing all of the above set out in (a)- (e), with discrimination, contrary to s. 15 of the Charter, because the Plaintiffs are wealthy Chinese nationals; which conduct and findings were contrary to the binding Federal Court jurisprudence, including that of previous, successful judicial reviews, by the Federal Court, of previous detention reviews, by Justice Phelan and Justice Gagné, as set out above.

146. Furthermore, ID Member Kohler's decision, rehashes and repeats the reasons of the previous two ID Members' decisions, with a number of paragraphs being extracted and merged from ID Member Kowalyk's, and ID Member Kim's decision, which findings and conclusions knowingly, and with the sole intent to continue the detention of the Plaintiffs, fly in the face of the previous two Federal Court decisions of Justice Phelan and Justice Gagné.

147. The Plaintiffs state and the fact is that the errors cited by the Federal Court were not "errors" by Member Iris Kohler, but made knowingly by her, in bad faith, and absence of good faith, intentionally designed for the purpose of continuing the Plaintiffs' unlawful and unconstitutional detention.

8 In addition to the above allegations, the Statement of Claim includes prolix, unfocused and generalized accusations of a conspiracy to harm the Plaintiffs carried out by the named Defendants and other unnamed government officials. It is not possible to tell whether the ID Members are included in all of the conspiracy allegations but, in a few instances, they are expressly identified. For the most part, these conspiracy allegations simply repeat the earlier pleading of individualized bad faith set out above. Below are the key conspiracy allegations specific to the ID Members:

- (d) that the ID members, Oxana Kowalyk, Susy Kim, Iris Kohler, have also done so in a separate and overlapping conspiracy, by:
 - (i) making substantive determinations with respect to the Plaintiffs' refugee hearings which are outside the jurisdiction of the ID, and the exclusive jurisdiction of the RPD (Refugee Protection Division) of the IRB;
 - (ii) making rulings diametrically opposed to binding Federal Court orders and judgments particularly the Federal Court orders and judgment made with respect to the Plaintiffs; on judicial review(s) of their detention;
 - (iii) knowingly misapplying the jurisprudence to facts of the Plaintiffs' detention with the intention to continue the unlawful and arbitrary detention of the Plaintiffs;
 - (iv) refusing a release plan, which has been accepted as a release plan, for those accused of (association with) terrorism in Canada;
 - (v) knowingly making capricious and perverse findings of fact and law, with the knowledge and intention of continuing the detention of the Plaintiffs; and
 - (vi) doing all of the above set out in (a)-(e), based on discrimination, contrary to s. 15 of the Charter, because the Plaintiffs are wealthy Chinese nationals;

155. The Plaintiffs further state that actions of the named and unnamed CBSA/CIC officers, in conjunction with the ID Members, at the behest and false information from agents of the People's Republic of China, and the fraudsters Szeto and Chen, with the resulting unlawful and unconstitutional detention, constitute torture and unusual treatment contrary to the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel or Unusual Treatment, and also constitutes a crime against humanity contrary to, inter alia, s. 6 of the Crimes Against Humanity Act, as well as an offence under the Criminal Code of Canada. The Plaintiffs state, and fact is, that the named and unnamed officials, in furtherance of attempting to remove the Plaintiffs to China, are acting as de facto agents for the People's Republic of China, and in fact are accessories, co-conspirators with the attempt to deliver the Plaintiffs to torture, and unlawful imprisonment and/ or death. This conspiracy, and over-lapping conspiracies, and unlawful and unconstitutional conduct, through the knowledge and willful conduct of the above-noted officials, in bad faith and the absence of good faith, also grounds the basis for civil and constitutional torts and liability.

158. The Plaintiffs further state that this entire process, is a statutory and constitutional abuse of process, by way of disguised extradition, on false information obtained from fraudsters and officials of a dictatorial regime, with a refusal by Canadian officials to properly and competently investigate, to remove at the request of a regime that engages in inter alia, torture, without the procedural and substantive safeguards of the Extradition Act, which the named and unnamed officials, and ID

Members, know run contrary to the Royal Commission Inquiry conducted with respect to Maher Arar, and its report and recommendations, as well as the Ontario Court of Appeal decision (leave to the SCC denied), finding it constitutionally impermissible to extradite based on information obtained by torture, as set out in USA v. Kadr, which decision is a document referred to in the pleadings herein.

9 In one concluding passage, the Statement of Claim asserts that the ID Members, among others, were acting "as de facto agents of the People's Republic of China, in what amounts to a disguised and baseless extradition" (see para 156 (vi)).

I. Analysis

10 Rule 221 of the Federal Courts Rules applies to these motions and provides for relief on the following basis:
STRIKING OUT PLEADINGS

221 (1) On motion, the Court may, at any time, order that a pleading, or anything contained therein, be struck out, with or without leave to amend, on the ground that it

- (a) discloses no reasonable cause of action or defence, as the case may be,
- (b) is immaterial or redundant,
- (c) is scandalous, frivolous or vexatious,
- (d) may prejudice or delay the fair trial of the action,
- (e) constitutes a departure from a previous pleading, or
- (f) is otherwise an abuse of the process of the Court, and may order the action be dismissed or judgment entered accordingly.

(2) No evidence shall be heard on a motion for an order under paragraph (1)(a).

RADIATION D'ACTES DE PROCÉDURE

221 (1) À tout moment, la Cour peut, sur requête, ordonner la radiation de tout ou partie d'un acte de procédure, avec ou sans autorisation de le modifier, au motif, selon le cas :

- a) qu'il ne révèle aucune cause d'action ou de défense valable;
- b) qu'il n'est pas pertinent ou qu'il est redondant;
- c) qu'il est scandaleux, frivole ou vexatoire;
- d) qu'il risque de nuire à l'instruction équitable de l'action ou de la retarder;
- e) qu'il diverge d'un acte de procédure antérieur;
- f) qu'il constitue autrement un abus de procédure.

Elle peut aussi ordonner que l'action soit rejetée ou qu'un jugement soit enregistré en conséquence.

(2) Aucune preuve n'est admissible dans le cadre d'une requête invoquant le motif visé à l'alinéa (1)a).

11 The Defendants all contend that the Statement of Claim discloses no cause of action known to law and is scandalous, frivolous and vexatious. They also argue that a markedly similar Statement of Claim was struck out by the Ontario Superior Court as disclosing no viable cause of action, thus rendering this proceeding an abuse of process by relitigation or subject to cause of action estoppel. The Immigration Division members also rely on the immunity that is afforded to them by section 156(a) of the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act, SC 2001, c 27 [IRPA].

II. The claims against the ID Members

12 There is no question that the claims advanced against the ID Members in the performance of their adjudicative duties are protected by a strongly worded immunity provision. Section 156 of IRPA states:

156. Immunity and no summons -- The following rules apply to the Chairperson and the members in respect of the exercise or purported exercise of their functions under this Act:

- (a) no criminal or civil proceedings lie against them for anything done or omitted to be done in good faith; and
- (b) they are not competent or compellable to appear as a witness in any civil proceedings.

13 Mr. Galati opposes the motion to strike the claims against the ID Members on the basis that the Court must take the pleaded facts as provable. He asserts that it is only where it is plain and obvious that a pleading is bad that it can be struck: see, for instance, Hunt v Carey Canada Inc, [1990] 2 SCR 959 at page 980, 74 DLR (4th) 321. Motions to strike under Rule 221 of the Federal Courts Rules are, of course, also subject to Rule 174 requiring that every pleading contain "a concise statement of the material facts on which the party relies".

14 While I accept that, on a motion to strike, the Court must take the pleaded facts to be provable and should only strike in the clearest of cases, at the same time not every legal theory that can be imagined by the creative legal mind must be entertained. For instance, I do not agree that this Court must accept, as potentially viable, fanciful interpretations of the scope of immunity afforded to the ID Members by section 156 of IRPA. An example of such an argument is the Plaintiffs' contention that they are entitled to pursue a cause of action for the negligent enforcement of a judicial decree (i.e., the Federal Court judgments). The Plaintiffs advance this claim on the strength of the decision in Holland v Saskatchewan, 2008 SCC 42, [2008] 2 SCR 551. That case, of course, involved an allegation of negligent implementation of a judicial decree and not negligent adjudication. In the face of the broad immunity created by section 156, it is plain and obvious that this allegation and any similar allegation could not, in the absence of pleaded material facts bearing on bad faith, possibly succeed.

15 The same can be said of the allegations concerning ostensible errors made by the ID Members. The Statement of Claim does not survive a motion to strike by the pleading of a series of supposed errors followed by a bare assertion of bad faith and conspiracy. Indeed, all of the conspiracy allegations are purely speculative and improper. To assert without any factual foundation that the ID Members were engaged in a conspiracy to harm the Plaintiffs with the CBSA and CIC officials and were acting as de facto agents of the Chinese authorities is particularly scandalous and improper. What the record actually discloses is that the ID Members produced thoughtful and thorough decisions. This Court found some discrete reviewable errors in their decisions but identified nothing blameworthy and returned the cases for redetermination. The remedy for adjudicative error lies in judicial review and not in a collateral action seeking damages.

16 What the Court must still consider is whether some remainder of the Statement of Claim would, if proven, be sufficient to escape the confines of section 156. To determine this, it is necessary to consider the basic principles with respect to pleadings. The fundamental purpose and rule of pleadings were discussed by Justice Eric Bowie in Zelinski v the Queen, [2002] 1 CTC 2422, [2002] DTC 1204 (TCC) and recently endorsed by Justice Wyman Webb in Beima v Canada, 2016 FCA 205, [2016] F.C.J. No 907 (QL):

4 The purpose of pleadings is to define the issues in dispute between the parties for the purposes of production, discovery and trial. What is required of a party pleading is to set forth a concise statement of the material facts upon which she relies. Material facts are those facts which, if established at the trial, will tend to show that the party pleading is entitled to the relief sought ...

5 The applicable principle is stated in Holmsted and Watson [Ontario Civil Procedure, Vol. 3, pages 25-20 to 25-21]:

This is the rule of pleading: all of the other pleading rules are essentially corollaries or qualifications to this basic rule that the pleader must state the material facts relied upon for his or her claim or defence. The rule involves four separate elements: (1) every pleading must state facts, not mere conclusions of law; (2) it must state material facts and not include facts which are immaterial; (3) it must state facts and not the evidence by which they are to be proved; (4) it must state facts concisely in a summary form.

17 The question is therefore whether the Statement of Claim contains any material factual allegations that could support a finding of bad faith on the part of any of the ID Members in the discharge of their adjudicative functions. In this context, bad faith requires proof of deliberate dishonest conduct by each of the ID Members in carrying out their detention review responsibilities.

18 An assessment of the Statement of Claim must begin with an appreciation of the legal principles that distinguish between speculative or conclusory allegations and those that are sufficiently particularized to be subjected to further judicial scrutiny (i.e., material facts that are capable of supporting a potentially viable cause of action). This distinction is discussed by Justice David Stratas in Merchant Law Group v Canada Revenue Agency, 2010 FCA 184, 321 DLR (4th) 301 [Merchant Law] in the following passage:

[34] I agree with the Federal Court's observation (at paragraph 26) that paragraph 12 of the amended statement of claim "contains a set of conclusions, but does not provide any material facts for the conclusions." When pleading bad faith or abuse of power, it is not enough to assert, baldly, conclusory phrases such as "deliberately or negligently," "callous disregard," or "by fraud and theft did steal": Zundel v. Canada, 2005 FC 1612, 144 A.C.W.S. (3d) 635; Vojic v. Canada (M.N.R.), [1987] 2 C.T.C. 203, 87 D.T.C. 5384 (F.C.A.). "The bare assertion of a conclusion upon which the court is called upon to pronounce is not an allegation of material fact": Canadian Olympic Association v. USA Hockey, Inc. (1997), 74 C.P.R. (3d) 348, 72 A.C.W.S. (3d) 346 (F.C.T.D.). Making bald, conclusory allegations without any evidentiary foundation is an abuse of process: AstraZeneca Canada Inc. v. Novopharm Limited, 2010 FCA 112 at paragraph 5. If the requirement of pleading material facts did not exist in Rule 174 or if courts did not enforce it according to its terms, parties would be able to make the broadest, most sweeping allegations without evidence and embark upon a fishing expedition. As this Court has said, "an action at law is not a fishing expedition and a plaintiff who starts proceedings simply in the hope that something will turn up abuses the court's process": Kastner v. Painblanc (1994), 58 C.P.R. (3d) 502, 176 N.R. 68 at paragraph 4 (F.C.A.).

[35] To this, I would add that the tort of misfeasance in public office requires a particular state of mind of a public officer in carrying out the impugned action, i.e., deliberate conduct which the public officer knows to be inconsistent with the obligations of his or her office: Odhavji Estate v. Woodhouse, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 263, 2003 SCC 69 at paragraph 28. For this tort, particularization of the allegations is mandatory. Rule 181 specifically requires particularization of allegations of "breach of trust," "wilful default," "state of mind of a person," "malice" or "fraudulent intention."

19 More recently, Justice Michael Manson discussed the need for particulars when pleadings allege fraud or malice. His comments in Tomchin v Canada, 2015 FC 402, 332 CRR (2d) 64 [Tomchin] are particularly apt on this motion:

[21] In order to strike a pleading on the ground that it does not disclose a reasonable cause of action, those allegations that are properly pleaded as concise material facts and are capable of being proved must be taken as true (Hunt v Carey Canada Inc., [1990] 2 SCR 959; Federal Court Rules, Rule 174). However, that rule does not apply to allegations based on assumptions and speculation (Operation Dismantle Inc v Canada, [1985] 1 SCR 441 at para 27).

[22] As well, any pleading of misrepresentation, fraud, malice or fraudulent intent must provide particulars of each and every allegation; bald allegations of bad faith, ulterior motives or ultra vires activities is both "scandalous, frivolous and vexatious", and an abuse of process of this Court (Federal Court Rules, Rule 191; Merchant Law Group v Canada (Revenue Agency), 2010 FCA 184 at paras 34-35).

[38] Throughout the Statement of Claim, the Plaintiff alleges bad faith and ulterior motives on the part of the Defendants. However, I agree with the Defendants that the allegations are purely speculative and none of the statements are supported by the facts as pleaded. What the facts show is nothing other than legitimate, intra vires reasons for the Plaintiff's interview, investigation and detention by CBSA.

[47] The pleading as a whole is replete with opinion and conclusory statements, devoid of the concise, material facts needed to support a viable cause of action. I agree with the Defendants that the Statement of Claim appears to have been filed for collateral purposes, in the hopes that a fishing expedition may yield some claim of substance that may somehow support the Plaintiff's desire for a remedy against the Defendants. His position is simply wrong (Kastner v Painblanc, [1994] F.C.J. No 1671 at para 4 (FCA)).

20 The allegations made by the Plaintiffs against the ID Members in this proceeding are bad for the same reasons identified in the Merchant Law and Tomchin decisions noted above. The allegations of bad faith and malice are merely conclusions unsupported by any material facts. The allegation of a conspiracy in concert with the People's Republic of China is particularly troublesome. In the absence of any supporting facts it is a scandalous allegation and, in that form, should never have been pleaded.

21 I can only conclude from the total absence of particulars that the claims made against the ID Members were solely intended to embarrass those Defendants for making detention rulings adverse to the Plaintiffs' interests. In the result, all of the claims against the ID Members are struck out without leave to amend and the action is dismissed as against each of them.

22 The ID Members are entitled to their costs in the action. Having regard to the scandalous nature of the allegations made against them, an increased award of costs is justified. These Defendants are awarded $5,500 payable within 30 days by the Plaintiffs, jointly and severally.

III. The claims against the CBSA and CIC

23 One of the principal arguments advanced on behalf of the CBSA and CIC Defendants is that this action is an abusive relitigation of a very similar cause of action dismissed by the Ontario Superior Court of Justice. To fairly address this argument it is necessary to examine the scope and disposition of that earlier action.

24 The Statement of Claim issued on behalf of the Plaintiffs in the Ontario Superior Court of Justice named, among other parties, CIC and the CBSA as Defendants. That Statement of Claim sets out, almost verbatim, much of the factual history contained in the Federal Court Statement of Claim (see for example paras 16-18 and 76-99).

25 Nevertheless, the specific allegations directed at the conduct of CIC and the CBSA in the Ontario pleading were limited to the following:

62. CIC and CBSA knew, or ought to have known, at the time that the application forms were submitted by Chen and Szeto, that Chen and Szeto were not licensed or approved immigration consultants or professionals, and that they were submitting the application documents contrary to the IRPA s. 91(1).
63. Furthermore, subsequent to Ms. Yan and Mr. Wang's discovery that Chen and Szeto were not licensed to submit immigration applications, and subsequent to their discovery of significant other misrepresentations and frauds perpetuated against them by Chen and Szeto, CIC and CBSA were notified by letters dated, respectively, January 27, 2014 and February 5, 2014 from counsel for Ms. Yan and Mr. Wang, specifically advising CIC and CBSA that:
 - (a) Ms. Yan and Mr. Wang had discovered that Chen and Szeto were not licensed or approved immigration consultants and were not licensed or qualified to complete and submit applications to Canada Immigration on their behalf;
 - (b) Ms. Yan and Mr. Wang had reason to believe that Chen and Szeto had provided incorrect information on the applications;

- (c) Chen and Szeto had threatened repeatedly to make false reports regarding Ms. Yan and Mr. Wang to CBSA and Canada Immigration in the course of continued attempts at extorting funds from Ms. Yan and Mr. Wang. Because of the legal actions and criminal complaints made by Ms. Yan and Mr. Wang against Chen and Szeto, Ms. Yan and Mr. Wang had reason to believe that Chen and Szeto had made and were continuing to make false allegations to CBSA and CIC against Ms. Yan and Mr. Wang; and
 - (d) Ms. Yan and Mr. Wang were requesting copies of all application documents submitted on their behalf by Chen and Szeto.
64. Ms. Yan and Mr. Wang have to date received no response whatsoever from CBSA or CIC to the January 27th and February 5th letters.
65. Therefore, in addition to the fact that CIC and CBSA should have known that Chen and Szeto were in breach of s. 91(1) of the IRPA at the time of submission of the purported application, CIC and CBSA should certainly have known, and commenced a specific investigation and consulted with Ms. Yan and Mr. Wang's counsel, after receipt of their counsel's February notice letter.
66. Further, having received the latest application in or about 2013, and possibly previous applications from Chen and Szeto prior to that time, and then the February notification from counsel for Yan and Mr. Wang, CBSA should then have known that they were relying upon documents, the preparation of which were a criminal offence by Chen and Szeto contrary to s. 91(1) of the IRPA.
67. Knowing that the preparation of the application documents was a criminal offence by third parties, the CBSA should not have instructed its counsel to rely upon information on those documents to continue the detention and deny the freedom of Ms. Yan and Mr. Wang.
68. Chen and Szeto were not licensed or approved immigration consultants, and they were submitting the application documents contrary to the IRPA s. 91(1).

74. The CBSA's arrest disclosure referred to "tips" that they received in respect of Ms. Yan and Mr. Wang.
75. Ms. Yan and Mr. Wang believe that their concerns, set out in their counsel's February 2014 letter to CIC and CBSA, were correct and that Chen and Szeto made false report to the Canadian immigration agencies including CIC and CBSA, as well as false reports to the embassy, national government, and provincial government of China, as well as false reports to the Dominican Republic, all falsely claiming improperly actions and activities by the Plaintiffs.

109. The plaintiffs state pleading that they have suffered damages as a result of the Citizenship and Immigration Canada and Canada Border Services Agency failure:
- (a) to identify and take preventative steps because, at the time that the application forms were submitted by Chen and Szeto, Chen and Szeto were not licensed or approved immigration consultants or professionals, and that they were submitting the application documents contrary to the IRPA s. 91(1);
 - (b) to take preventative action, including contacting counsel for the plaintiffs, upon receipt of counsel's letter in February 2014 warning that Chen and Szeto were not licensed and may have file false information regarding the plaintiffs;
 - (c) to refrain from using documents prepared by Chen and Szeto and relying upon "tips" from Chen and Szeto as a part of the basis for investigation and detention of the plaintiffs; and
 - (d) to refrain from CBSA instructing its Minister's Counsel to rely on documents prepared by Chen and Szeto in submissions at Detention Hearings to continue the detention of the plaintiffs.

26 Not surprisingly, the Attorney General of Canada moved to strike the Ontario Statement of Claim as it related to CIC and the CBSA on the basis that it disclosed no cause of action and was otherwise frivolous, vexatious and an abuse of the Court process. On the day the motion was to be heard, the Plaintiffs' then counsel (not Mr. Galati) requested and obtained an adjournment based, in part, on an argument that "new facts" had emerged "which inform the Plaintiffs' case against the moving Defendants". Plaintiffs' counsel also advised the Court that he intended to amend the Statement of Claim. Thrown-away costs were awarded to the Attorney General in the amount of $2,500.00, payable within 30 days.

27 The Attorney General brought the motion to strike back before the Court on June 17, 2015. Plaintiffs' counsel failed to file any responding material and seems not to have opposed the motion. Indeed, in an apparent effort to avoid the motion to strike, the Plaintiffs filed a Notice of Discontinuance on June 11, 2015. Justice Edward Belobaba described the filing of the Notice of Discontinuance as "improper" and of no effect. He went on to strike the claims against the Attorney General without leave to amend on the following basis:

The AG Canada's motion to strike St. of Claim as against AG Canada (CIC & CBSA) w/o leave to amend is granted. Unopposed. No reasonable cause of action is created by not investigating s 91 IRPA breaches. Ps have not alleged insufficient legal basis for detention. I agree with and adopt AG's submissions in paras. 35- 37, 38-40 and 41-43, 45 and 50 of AG's Factum.

28 By reference Justice Belobaba adopted the following points from the Attorney General's written arguments:

35. There is nothing in IRPA that imposes a duty on CIC or CBSA to investigate or take action against anyone who contravenes s. 91 by giving representation or advice in an immigration proceeding or application for consideration.
36. Similarly, s. 91(9) of IRPA, which provides that "[e]very person who contravenes subsection (1) commits an offence..." does not impose any duty on CIC or CBSA to investigate or penalize every person who breaches s. 91.
37. The Plaintiffs have cited no authority to show any duty on CIC or CBSA to investigate or penalize all persons who may have breached s. 91 of IRPA. They have also not pointed to any rationale for imposing such a duty on CIC or CBSA or indicated how it would be possible or feasible to perform such a duty.

2) No cause of action created by not investigating Ms. Chen and Mr. Sze to

38. The Plaintiffs seem to suggest that CIC or CBSA should have investigated Ms. Chen and Mr. Szeto after the Plaintiffs' counsel wrote letters of January 27, 2014, and February 5, 2014 advising that these persons breached s. 0091. This allegation fails to show any cause of action as the Plaintiffs cannot, by their counsel's letters, create a duty on CIC and CBSA to investigate persons who allegedly breach s. 91(1), where no such duty exists in law.

Claim, paras 63, 65, 68, 109(b), [Motion Record of the AG]

39. The Plaintiffs have not explained how their counsel's letters could mandate CIC or CBSA to investigate or prosecute Ms. Chen or Mr. Szeto for breaching or allegedly breaching s. 91, absent any legislative duty, court order or other legal requirement to do so.
40. Further, the Plaintiffs do not allege that their detention by CBSA is unlawful, i.e. that there are insufficient legal bases for the detention. As such, they fail to show any reasonable cause of action regarding their detention.

3) Plaintiffs have not alleged insufficient legal basis for detention

Plaintiffs' detention currently based on flight risk

41. The Plaintiffs assert a claim for "Special damages in the amount of $10,000.00 of each day of detention of the plaintiffs by the defendant Canada Border Services Agency", but nowhere in the Claim do the Plaintiffs allege that their detention is unlawful.

Claim, para 1 (o), [Motion Record of the AG]

42. It seems that the Plaintiffs are seeking damages for time spent in lawful detention. However, this does not give rise to any reasonable cause of action.
43. Further, the Plaintiffs implicitly admit that their detention is lawful, as they assert that "the essence of its [CBSA's] current claims against the Plaintiffs" include "the flight risk and misrepresentation issues". While the Plaintiffs say that these "claims" are "in any event, incorrect", they do not indicate any reason why they are not flight risks. In addition, they do not allege that the flight risk issue was caused by Ms. Chen or Mr. Szeto. In fact, their allegations indicate the contrary.

Claim, para 45, [Motion Record of the AG]

45. The Plaintiffs' allegations indicate that they are foreign nationals who are detained in Canada as flight risks, i.e., being unlikely to appear for examination, an admissibility hearing or removal from Canada. Since they state that "flight risk" is part of the essence of CBSA's claims against them, and flight risk in these circumstances is sufficient for their lawful detention by the Immigration Division, the mere fact that they are detained or that they disagree with the flight risk finding does not create a reasonable cause of action.

50. As such, the Plaintiffs fail to show any cause of action against the AG (on behalf of CIC or CBSA) regarding their detention, or regarding the use or reliance of alleged incorrect information submitted by Mr. Chen and Mr. Szeto, as the Plaintiffs' allegations indicate that CIC or CBSA relied on information other than that received from Ms. Chen and Mr. Szeto, to lawfully detain them as flight risks, pursuant to IRPA.

29 It is quite clear to me that Justice Belobaba effectively dismissed the Plaintiffs' claims against the CIC and the CBSA alleging a negligent investigation, albeit in relation to specified deficiencies pertaining to the supposed fraudsters, Szeto and Chen. To the extent that the Statement of Claim purported to assert a claim to damages from the Plaintiffs' detention, that, too, was dismissed.

30 I have some reservations about globally applying abuse of process principles to this motion to strike based on the Ontario Superior Court's dismissal endorsement. That proceeding was supported by a few vague allegations of negligent investigation by unnamed officials in the CBSA and CIC, but the Statement of Claim did not include allegations against the ID Members named in this action nor did it assert that government officials acted or conspired to present false evidence to the Immigration Division for the purpose of harming the Plaintiffs. In addition to the absence of a clear overlap of pleaded issues, it is also not entirely clear what the Ontario Superior Court decided beyond the finding that no cause of action based on an alleged negligent investigation could be made out. It is also of some significance that the Ontario action was dismissed on a motion to strike that was unopposed. Finally, some of the allegations in the Federal Court Statement of Claim post-date the dismissal of the Ontario action. Those after-the-fact allegations cannot be struck based on the argument that a party is required to put its best case forward and cannot selectively plead or split its case. Alleged events that have not yet occurred cannot be reasonably anticipated and pleaded. Given these issues I am not prepared to strike the entire Statement of Claim based on abuse of process by relitigation principles. That is not to say, however, that all of what has been pleaded in this action is permissible in the face of the dismissal of the Ontario action. In my view, the Plaintiffs are not entitled to replead their allegations concerning supposedly negligent investigations by the CBSA, CIC or any of their officials. The Ontario Superior Court found those allegations could not support a viable cause of action and the Plaintiffs are not legally entitled to relitigate that issue in this Court. To do so is an abuse of process: see Toronto (City) v CUPE, Local 79, 2003 SCC 63 at para 37, [2003] 3 SCR 77. Those allegations are accordingly struck from the Statement of Claim without leave to amend.

31 There is not much of any substance that remains in the Statement of Claim, and what does remain is devoid of material facts. Prolixity, repetition and the bare pleading of a series of events are not substitutes for the requirement that a defendant know what is being factually and legally alleged so that a proper answer and defence can be stated. What is always required is a recitation of material facts that can support an arguable cause of action. Nevertheless, there are some generalized allegations that CBSA and CIC officials knowingly fabricated a case against the Plaintiffs in order to keep them in custody. In theory, a viable cause of action for misfeasance in public office could arise, provided that there are sufficient material facts pleaded to support it. Here there are none and the remaining portions of the Statement of Claim are struck out for that reason and because what little remains is unintelligible. The Plaintiffs will, however, have leave to file a fresh Statement of Claim provided that it contains sufficient material particulars to support a cause of action for misfeasance in the prosecution of a case for the detention of the Plaintiffs.

32 These Defendants have been successful on their separate motions and are entitled to their costs which I fix at $3,500.00. These costs are similarly payable jointly and severally by the Plaintiffs within 30 days.

ORDER

THIS COURT ORDERS that these motions are allowed and the Statement of Claim is struck out in its entirety. The action against the Defendants, Oxana M. Kowalyk (ID Member), Susy Kim (ID Member), Iris Kohler (ID Member), Linda Lizotte-Macpherson, President of the CBSA, the Minister of Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is dismissed without leave to amend or refile. The Plaintiffs will have leave to refile only in respect of a cause of action framed in accordance with these reasons.

THIS COURT FURTHER ORDERS that the Defendants Oxana M. Kowalyk, Susy Kim and Iris Kohler, shall have their costs in the amount of $5,500.00 payable by the Plaintiffs jointly and severally within thirty (30) days.

THE COURT FURTHER ORDERS that the remaining Defendants shall have their costs in the amount of $3,500.00 payable by the Plaintiffs jointly and severally within thirty (30) days.

Case Summary

Civil litigation — Civil procedure — Pleadings — Striking out pleadings or allegations — Grounds — Failure to disclose a cause of action or defence — False, frivolous, vexatious or abuse of process — Appeal by plaintiffs from order striking out the statement of claim without leave to amend dismissed — Open to Federal Court to conclude that the claims against the individual members of the Refugee Board should be struck in the absence of any material facts that could conceivably ever support a claim against them — Portions of the claim that sought to re-litigate issues that had previously been finally decided were properly struck as abusive.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT OF THE COURT

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

M.J.L. GLEASON J.A. (orally)

1 The appellants appeal from the judgment of the Federal Court in Wang and Yan v. The Queen et al, 2016 FC

1052 (per Barnes, J.) in which the Federal Court struck the appellants' Statement of Claim, with leave to amend it in part. We see no basis for interfering with the Federal Court's judgment as the Federal Court correctly set out the law applicable on a motion to strike and made no palpable and overriding error in applying that law to the appellants' Statement of Claim.

2 More specifically, it was open to the Federal Court to conclude that the claims against the individual members of the Immigration Division of the Immigration and Refugee Board (the ID) should be struck in the absence of any material facts that could conceivably ever support a claim against them. Likewise, it was open to the Federal Court to dismiss as abusive those portions of the claim that sought to re-litigate issues that had previously been finally decided by the Ontario Superior Court of Justice and to conclude that what remained of the pleading was so devoid of material fact that it ought to be struck, with leave to amend. Although the Federal Court did not deal with the appellants' claim for habeas corpus, the appellants have been released from custody and the circumstances have therefore changed from those that existed at the time of the pleading. It is unnecessary for us to address in this appeal the extent, if any, of the Federal Court's jurisdiction to hear a new application for habeas corpus based on these changed facts, which application has not yet been made.

3 We would accordingly dismiss this appeal with costs, fixed in the all-inclusive amount of $2000.00, payable to the respondent members of the ID and in the all-inclusive amount of $2000.00, payable to the remaining respondents. We would grant the appellants the requested 60 days within which to amend their Statement of Claim, if they wish.

ON APPEAL FROM THE FEDERAL COURT OF APPEAL

Case Summary

Status:

Application for leave to appeal dismissed with costs (without reasons) February 21, 2019.

Civil procedure — Pleadings — Statement of claim — Motion to strike — Whether Federal Court of Appeal applied wrong test on motion to strike — Whether Federal Court of Appeal drew a non-existing distinction between negligent "implementation" and "adjudication" by an administrative tribunal pursuant to Holland v. Saskatchewan, 2008 SCC 42, [2008] 2 S.C.R. 551 — Whether "material proof" in pleadings is required to meet bad faith exception to immunity from civil action, pursuant to s. 156(a) of the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act, S.C. 2001, c. 27 — Whether Federal Court has concurrent jurisdiction, in habeas corpus, in context of a Federal scheme, in this case, immigration, in accordance with Idziak v. Canada (Minister of Justice), [1992] 3 S.C.R. 631.

Case Summary:

The applicants, Zhenhua Wang and Chunxiang Yan, alleged they were wrongfully arrested and unlawfully detained because of false information that the Canada Border Services Agency ("CBSA") and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration ("CIC") officials knowingly or negligently relied upon in the prosecution of their immigration detentions. In their statement of claim, the applicants alleged that named and unnamed officials misrepresented evidence, conspired to deprive the applicants of a fair hearing and sought to punish the applicants for bringing refugee claims. The applicants sought damages against the numerous named and unnamed respondents.

The respondents sought to strike out the statement of claim filed by the applicants pursuant to r. 221 of the Federal Courts Rules, SOR/98-106, on the basis that it disclosed no viable cause of action. At the Federal Court, the motions judge allowed the motion to strike the statement of claim. Leave to amend or re-file the action was granted in part. The Federal Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal.
