One circumstance in which abuse of process has been applied is where the litigation before the court is found to be in essence an attempt to relitigate a claim which the court has already determined.

As Goudge J.A.'s comments indicate, Canadian courts have applied the doctrine of abuse of process to preclude relitigation in circumstances where the strict requirements of issue estoppel (typically the privity/mutuality requirements) are not met, but where allowing the litigation to proceed would nonetheless violate such principles as judicial economy, consistency, finality and the integrity of the administration of justice. (See, for example, Franco v. White (2001), 53 O.R. (3d) 391 (C.A.); Bomac Construction Ltd. v. Stevenson, [1986] 5 W.W.R. 21 (Sask. C.A.); and Bjarnarson v. Government of Manitoba (1987), 38 D.L.R. (4th) 32 (Man. Q.B.), aff'd (1987), 21 C.P.C. (2d) 302 (Man. C.A.). This has resulted in some criticism, on the ground that the doctrine of abuse of process by relitigation is in effect non-mutual issue estoppel by another name without the important qualifications recognized by the American courts as part and parcel of the general doctrine of non-mutual issue estoppel (Watson, supra, at pp. 624-25).

104 The vexatious action and one that is an abuse of process are two concepts that courts have noted have strikingly similar features. Mr. Justice Macaulay noted this in Freshway Specialty Foods v. Map Produce LLC, 2005 BCSC 1485 at para. 52, where he wrote:

[52] There is no bright line dividing a vexatious proceeding from one that is an abuse of the court's process. In my view, the factors that signal a vexatious proceeding also signal an abusive process. Abuse of process is a wider concept however and may extend beyond vexatious proceedings to capture any circumstance in which the court's process is used for an improper purpose. As pointed out by Baker J., in Babovic v. Babowech, [1993] B.C.J. No. 1802 (S.C.), a decision not referred to by counsel, the categories of abuse of process remain open and include, for example, "proceedings which are without foundation or serve no useful purpose and multiple or successive proceedings which cause or are likely to cause vexation or oppression" (para. 18).

105 The Attorney General of Canada submits that it is plain and obvious that the plaintiffs' allegations against it are a collateral attack against the decisions of the IAD, the Federal Court, and the Federal Court of Appeal. As such, it asserts the litigation is an abuse of the court process. I agree.

106 Insofar as both defendants are concerned, I have already concluded that the pleadings are vexatious, with reference to the criteria in Lang Michener.

107 The pleadings make substantial and widespread criminal allegations against numerous government officials, including registry staff, government lawyers, and others, many of whom are unnamed. The pleadings also use inflammatory language to describe alleged actions of government employees and officials as crime, as "cowardly administrative tortures", and "efficient weapons". The plaintiffs have clearly rolled issues raised in previous actions forward into this action, where they have repeated them and supplemented them with allegations brought against the lawyers who have acted against them, or just Mr. Simon, in earlier proceedings, as well as court registry staff and a whole host of other government officials. It is clear that the plaintiffs are attempting to relitigate some matters already decided in respect of the Attorney General of Canada.

108 The plaintiffs' pleadings in regard to the Attorney General of Canada contain allegations against the CIC, CRA, and Service Canada. Regarding the CIC, the plaintiffs allege that its forms are invalid and that Mr. Simon's wife's application for permanent residency was wrongfully refused. Mr. Simon has previously appealed the refusal of that application to the IAD and sought leave to apply for judicial review in Federal Court. The Federal Court's order dismissing that application concluded the matter. Mr. Simon then brought a collateral attack against that order in another Federal Court action, which included appeals to the Federal Court of Appeal and an application for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. He repeats this attack in this present action. The matter is clearly res judicata.

109 Regarding the claims alleged against the CRA, Mr. Simon again claims that in 2008 and 2009 unnamed Crown servants wrongfully, knowingly, and by tortious conduct, released funds or monies from the 2007 and 2008 tax credits of Mr. Simon to Revenue Services of British Columbia. The same allegation was before the Federal Court in action T-639-10. The Federal Court of Appeal dismissed this claim. Mr. Simon sought leave to appeal the Federal Court of Appeal's decision to the Supreme Court of Canada.

110 I agree with the Attorney General of Canada that Mr. Simon has had two opportunities in that Federal Court action to bring a viable cause of action in relation to the CRA, and it would be an abuse of this court's process for him to be allowed to relitigate this matter in this forum.

111 Regarding Service Canada, Mr. Simon alleges that it "threatened" and "tried to coerce" him. He seeks a declaration that his future Canada Pension Plan and Old Age Security benefits cannot be automatically garnished by Service Canada in the context of the case at bar. These issues have been adjudicated by the Federal Court in action T-1029-12. There, the court found that no action for damages premised on a hypothetical administrative decision can succeed, because no damage has yet materialized. This decision was upheld on appeal. This too is res judicata.

112 I also note that within the British Columbia Provincial Court action, Mr. Simon alleged that Ms. Lipsack, a BC Ministry of Justice lawyer, misinterpreted statutes and denied him a reasonable payment plan for his debt. A judge of the Provincial Court dismissed this claim on May 14, 2009. The case at bar repeats the allegations against Ms. Lipsack. This issue has been previously decided and is res judicata.

113 Further, it must be recognized that it is an abuse of the court process to do any of the following:

- 1) To make serious and baseless allegations against the court, Federal Court, or Supreme Court of Canada. The plaintiffs' claim that registry staff committed fraud, contravened various pieces of legislation, "silenced" Mr. Simon, covered up errors, acted in bad faith, and acted in furtherance of a conspiracy. The plaintiffs refer to an order of the Federal Court of Appeal as unprofessional, vague, "Dodanaic", and controversial.
- 2) To make serious and baseless allegations against legal counsel and public officials involved with this case. The plaintiffs allege, without material facts pleaded as a foundation, that legal counsel for the Supreme Court of Canada "contradicted and contravened" the Supreme Court Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. S-26. They further allege that counsel for the Federal Crown gave false testimony, which amounted to perjury, all in the course of making legal argument. They further allege, without factual foundation, that certain acts or omissions of named and unnamed public servants constitute "terrorist activities" and conspiracy intended to intimidate a segment of the public and endanger a person's life.
- 3) To calculate damage awards by translating Criminal Code sentencing ranges into monetary awards.
- 4) To disclose that, as a result of mental torture, one of the plaintiffs feels murderous impulses toward government employees.

These examples are but a few of the many that, in my view, clearly demonstrate this action was brought for an improper purpose.

114 In light of the foregoing and considering the pleadings as a whole, I am satisfied that it is plain and obvious this claim is an abuse of process.

CONCLUSION

115 I conclude that both defendants have met the high onus upon them in their applications. Their applications to strike the notice of civil claim in its entirety pursuant to Rule 9-5(1) of the Civil Rules is granted, with no leave to amend. Mr. Simon, on behalf of the plaintiffs, made it clear that he does not seek leave to amend. Even so, the law requires that I give it consideration. I have. In light of Mr. Simon's numerous attempts to file proper pleadings in many other courts in relation to these matters over the last several years, it is my view that it would not be appropriate to grant leave to amend in this case. Mr. Simon has demonstrated he is incapable of composing proper pleadings.

116 The parties have already addressed the issue of costs. Both defendants seek a reduced lump sum amount of costs in the event of their success in these applications. The amounts they seek would not even compensate them for their disbursements, but in any event they do seek a reduced sum. Mr. Simon did not oppose such an application.

117 In my view, it is appropriate in the circumstances of this case to exercise my discretion to award costs in favour of the successful parties, in this case both of the defendants. I also find it appropriate to award lump sum costs, consistent with my review of the case law. Those costs will be in an amount that is greatly reduced from an amount that could have been awarded had costs been assessed on the ordinary scale. The plaintiff, Mr. Simon, will be required to pay each defendant costs in the amount of $1,000 each, payable forthwith.

118 This concludes my reasons. Anything further?

119 MR. SIMON: The question to the parties, Your Honour?

120 THE COURT: Pardon me, Mr. Simon?

121 MR. SIMON: Was your question to the parties if there is any comment?

122 THE COURT: No comments, but just any questions.

123 MR. SIMON: Well, my question is that it is no material facts have been pleaded or too many material facts have been pleaded? That's a bit unclear for me, because there were [inaudible] kind of causes of action and you admitted in your speech that several of them -- some of them have legal grounds. No, the thing is the pleading, if something is vague, like not mentioning like unnamed public officials or public servants, I would like to refer to the case of Just v. British Columbia, the falling rock, and that gentleman won the case in British Columbia. I think it was a separate court eventually. And he didn't name the official who failed to remove that rock which killed his daughter. Anyway, I found several case which the judge decides that it's not necessary to name by name the officials who failed, like acted improperly or illegally. My claim doesn't really show negligence. Only one case that say -

124 THE COURT: Mr. Simon, I am sorry to interrupt you, but I feel that I have to. By my question I meant if there were any sort of procedural type of questions. This is not an opportunity to reargue the case. I have made my decision and I have outlined my reasons just now. Unless there is any sort of procedural type questions, we will conclude proceedings now.

125 MR. SIMON: Yeah, the procedural type that if all my facts are taken as true or pled as true, that condition is satisfied, you think that not even one of the 60 allegations would be able to prove? Because the IP too and those kind of controversies between the forms, the government forms, and I can prove the conspiracy [inaudible], but I was not allowed to produce evidence, though the Crown was allowed to show evidence, because affidavit is in evidence and I didn't have that advantage. So I could prove everything if not [inaudible] misconstrued, scattered references and rambling allegations or speculation, but I am able to prove everything, all the 60, and it is very unlikely that even if one of my facts can be, you know, supported by evidence, that means that a judge won't have the right to discuss this as [inaudible]. There is a good chance that one of the 60 would succeed, because there would be another government and there would be more reasonable staff who let me review all the errors of the present government. So it's not absolutely impossible that a new government would return to obey the laws of Canada. I don't think that's impossible.

126 THE COURT: Thank you, Mr. Simon.

127 MR. SIMON: Thank you.

128 MR. WITTEN: My Lady, it's Mark Witten here in for the Province, and I understand from Ms. Brown that when the order was circulated that you previously made about adjourning the trial date -

129 THE COURT: Yes.

130 MR. WITTEN: -- that Mr. Simon was unwilling to sign that order. So I would ask that you make an order dispensing with the need for Mr. Simon or the plaintiffs' signature with respect to the judgment that you just gave today.

131 THE COURT: Mr. Simon, just so you understand, oftentimes when there are self-represented litigants, or the parties are a great distance apart, or if one party has demonstrated an inability or unwillingness to sign the form of prior orders, a judge will make an order dispensing with the signature of one of the parties on the form of the order.

132 The order that I have made today striking your claim in its entirety without leave to amend is valid as of today. What happens from here is that the successful parties or party will prepare the order, will type it up, and normally they would send it to the lawyer for the unsuccessful party to sign to indicate by their signature that the wording of the order is consistent with as I said today. It would then be sent to the court registry for them to ensure its accuracy, and then once that step is completed and the registry is assured it is accurate, it gets sent to me to sign to also ensure that it is accurate. There are a number of steps to ensure the actual order entered is accurate, and what counsel has just asked me for is an order that is typically asked for in these types of circumstances, to save time and to add convenience, that is to dispense with your signature on the form of the order. Do you have any opposition to that?

133 MR. SIMON: Well, you know, that's -- my letter, you know, that's two pages. That's irrelevant now, because of course I obey your judgment and it doesn't matter. I will appeal it as soon as possible, and I am just wondering, if I appeal it, that means that I don't need to pay the $2,000 today, or do I have to?

134 THE COURT: I am not going give you any legal advice, Mr. Simon.

135 MR. SIMON: No, but the requirement on -

136 THE COURT: I am not going to give you any legal advice at all.

137 MR. SIMON: Okay.

138 THE COURT: All right. What about this application to dispense with your signature?

139 MR. SIMON: Well, it's irrelevant, Your Honour, because if you dismiss my claim, that means that that scheduled -- hearing scheduled to the 16th of March is probably not tenable. I don't know. It's in the air. That's your decision, and I don't think it's applicable. I have to go to the British Columbia Court of Appeal I think. That would be maybe an abuse of process to hear it by another judge or whatever who is not more knowledgeable than yourself, so unless a panel of three judges would hear it at this level, at the Supreme Court of British Columbia, which I don't think that option exists. So my only choice is acceptance, obey your order, your decision, and whatever the Crown parties' counsel would trust with that order, I may make a comment that they change this word or insert that word or only that word, but otherwise I -- but even if I don't sign it, it won't make any difference, because I have to obey your order [inaudible].

140 THE COURT: The trial date scheduled sometime in March, which had been scheduled unilaterally by the plaintiffs, was cancelled last day. I am going to make it clear again today. That trial date no longer exists for this matter. I have dismissed this claim now. Mr. Simon, there is no court date in March. There is no necessity for Mr. Simon to sign the form of that order that I made last day.

141 MR. SIMON: Okay. Yes.

142 THE COURT: I will dispense with Mr. Simon's signature on the form of that order, where I adjourned that trial date. Given the history of this matter and Mr. Simon's comments just now, I will make an order today dispensing with Mr. Simon's signature on the form of the order that I have made today. Mr. Simon, you will get a copy of the entered order in due course, so if you do change your address, your mailing address, please advise the court registry so they know where to mail it to.

143 MR. SIMON: Yes, Your Honour. I know.

144 MR. WITTEN: Thank you, My Lady.

145 THE COURT: Thank you.

146 MS. FAIRGRIEVE: My Lady.

147 THE COURT: Yes.

148 MR. FAIRGRIEVE: Sorry, this is Tim Fairgrieve for the Attorney General of Canada. There is one other matter that I wanted to raise. I believe -- it's my understanding that my colleague Alison Brown had requested that if costs were to be ordered in a lump sum at the conclusion of the application against the plaintiffs, that they be ordered against Mr. Simon alone and not the wife.

149 THE COURT: That is quite right. Mr. Simon, I think you had agreed with that the other day as well.

150 MR. SIMON: Yes, yes.

151 THE COURT: Yes, I had forgotten about that. Thank you very much for reminding me. Costs will be payable by Mr. Simon only.

152 MR. SIMON: Yes.

153 MR. FAIRGRIEVE: So we'll include that in the order.

154 THE COURT: Yes. Thank you very much.

155 MR. FAIRGRIEVE: Thank you.

156 MR. SIMON: Thank you everybody.

Case Summary

Civil litigation — Civil procedure — Pleadings — Striking out pleadings or allegations — Grounds — False, frivolous, vexatious or abuse of process — Parties — Capacity to sue or be sued — Party types — Corporations, partnerships and sole proprietorships — Motion by the defendant unit owners for dismissal of two actions on the ground that the Strata Corporation had no jurisdiction to bring the actions dismissed — Motion by Strata Corporation to strike out the defences and for judgment allowed — Strata Corporation sued defendants for failing to comply with various bylaws and for payment of fines levied — Strata Corporation had standing to bring action as required resolution was passed — Defences and counterclaims were confusing and prolix — Allowing defendants to amend pleading would constitute abuse of process — Rules of Court, Rule 19(24).

Motion by the defendant unit owners for dismissal of two actions on the ground that the Strata Corporation had no jurisdiction to bring the actions. Motion by the Strata Corporation to strike out the defences and for judgment. The plaintiff Strata Corporation sued the defendants to enforce various bylaws against them. The plaintiff was the strata corporation of a commercial development. The plaintiff alleged that the defendants failed to open these units for business as required under the bylaws resulting in unpaid fines and that the defendants stored items on the common property contrary to the bylaws. In the second action, the Strata Corporation alleged the defendants failed to grant it access to the units to check the repairs on a sewer line and to investigate the cause of steam coming from an adjacent unit. The defendants argued the Strata Corporations had not passed the required resolution to bring the actions.

HELD: Motion by the defendants dismissed.

Motion by the Strata Corporation allowed. The required resolution to commence these actions was passed by a vote at the 2006 annual meeting. The statements of defence were so prolix and confusing that it was difficult to understand the case to be met. These pleadings included arguments, opinions, and allegations against non-parties. The defendants should not be granted the opportunity to redraft their pleadings as to do so would constitute an abuse of process. Some of the proposed defences and counterclaims could not be redrafted as they were without legal foundation. The defendants had been given several opportunities to draft appropriate pleadings in other actions that raised essentially the same issues. The defendants also brought counterclaims prohibited by a prior court order and endeavoured to re-litigate matters that they knew had already been considered and decided.

Reasons for Judgment

J.A. SINCLAIR PROWSE J.

(I) NATURE OF THE HEARING

1 The Plaintiff is the Strata Corporation of the strata development in which the Defendants own two units. In these two actions (which have been ordered to be heard together), the Strata Corporation is seeking to enforce various bylaws against the Defendants as owners of those units.

2 In this hearing, the Defendants seek to have these actions dismissed on the ground that the Strata Corporation is without jurisdiction to bring them. The Strata Corporation, on the other hand, seeks, pursuant to R. 19(24), to have the Defendants' pleadings struck; to have the Defendants denied permission to redraft any of their pleadings; and to have Judgment entered on its behalf.

3 Before addressing these applications, it became apparent upon reviewing the pleadings of all of the parties that a typographical error had been made in the style of cause in the second action (Vancouver Registry No. L0527856). Specifically, the Defendant Sze Hang Holding Inc. is mistakenly described as Sze Hang Holding Ltd. Because this is a typographical error, leave is granted to the Strata Corporation to amend its pleading to correct this error.

(II) BACKGROUND CIRCUMSTANCES

4 To put the issues raised in these applications in context, the Strata Corporation is the strata corporation for Pacific Plaza, a business as opposed to a residential strata development. Although there is a dispute as to whether the proper business designation of this strata development is "wholesale industrial" (the position of the Defendants) or "a combination of wholesale industrial and commercial retail" (the position of the Strata Corporation), there is no issue that it is a "business" as opposed to a "residential" strata development.

5 This strata development was built by Ernest & Twins Ventures (PP) Ltd. and completed in 1998. The Defendants were not original owners. Rather, it was about 3 years after it was built that Sze Hang Holding purchased two units (namely, the North and South Units).

6 It was not until 1 year after that (or 4 years after it was built) that Mr. Lam acquired any ownership interest in any of the strata units. This is the ownership that he continues to hold. Specifically, the South Unit is owned by him and Sze Hang Holding - Mr. Lam having acquired a 1% interest and Sze Hang Holding having a 99% interest. The North Unit is wholly owned by Sze Hang Holding.

7 Although Mr. Lam did not acquire an ownership interest in any of the strata units until the summer of 2002, he has operated a business from those units from the time that they were acquired by Sze Hang Holding. For much, if not all, of this time, Extra Gift Exchange Inc. has been the tenant of these units. (Extra Gift Exchange is a company in which Mr. Lam and Ms. Sze Hang Lee are principals. Ms. Lee is also a principal in Sze Hang Holding.)

8 In addition, to operating a business in this strata development from at least 2001, Mr. Lam has been actively involved in the affairs of the strata development and in particular of the Strata Council. (As with all strata developments, pursuant to s. 4 and s. 26 of the Strata Property Act, S.B.C. 1998, c. 43 [SPA] the strata council is the mechanism through which the powers and duties of the strata corporation are exercised. Put another way, the strata council acts as the board of directors for the strata corporation.)

9 Over the last 8 years, Mr. Lam has been involved in a number of actions pertaining to various aspects of this strata development. Although some of these matters have been completed, there are approximately 5 other outstanding actions in addition to the present actions. While some of these actions include claims of defamation and personal injury, for the most part these actions pertain to claims regarding the construction, sale, management, and governance of this development. (This was also the situation with the actions that are now completed.) I am the Case Management Judge for the present actions as well as the 5 other outstanding ones.

10 As far as the present actions are concerned, as was set out earlier, the Strata Corporation is seeking to enforce various bylaws. Specifically, in the first action (Vancouver Registry No. L050030) which will hereinafter be referred to as the Fines Action, the Strata Corporation claims that for the last few years the Defendants have failed to open either of these units for business at all, let alone for the requisite number of business hours required under the bylaws; that as of December 2007, the Defendants had incurred fines in the amount of $91,571.58 with respect to the South Unit and $38,840.15 with respect to the North Unit because of these violations; and that to date the Defendants have neither paid these fines nor complied with the bylaws by opening their units for business.

11 Moreover, the Strata Corporation claims that the Defendants have posted notices in the windows of their units, the purpose of these notices being to criticize and embarrass the members of the Strata Council.

12 Further, the Strata Corporation claims that the Defendants stored items on the common property adjoining the South Unit contrary to the bylaws and that the Strata Corporation had to incur the costs of removing and then storing these items. (It still has these items and is still paying the costs of this storage.)

13 With respect to the second action (Vancouver Registry No. L052756) which will hereinafter be referred to as the Access Action, the Strata Corporation claims that, contrary to the bylaws, the Defendants failed to grant it access to the North Unit to check that a sewer line that had backed up had been properly repaired (that is, in accordance with the building code); to the South Unit to investigate the cause of steam that was coming from it into an adjacent unit; and to the North Unit to investigate whether it was being used as a residence.

14 As far as the present hearing is concerned, as is set out in an earlier decision in these proceedings (namely, 2008 BCSC 481), it was set at my direction for the purpose of clarifying the pleadings and specifically clarifying the claims, defences, and counterclaims to be made. The basis for this direction was that it had become apparent in pre-trial applications, pertaining to such matters as the extent of document production, the extent of examinations for discovery, and the period of time needed for trial, that the pleadings would have to be clarified sooner rather than later as the issues raised in these pre-trial applications could not be decided until that was done.

15 As an example, in these pre-trial applications the Defendants took the position that their defences and claims raised issues requiring extensive document production from the Strata Corporation (approximately 600,000 documents) and a trial of at least a month in length. The Strata Corporation, on the other hand, took the position that the issues in these actions were simple matters, requiring modest document production, and a trial of two weeks at the very most. Specifically, the Strata Corporation took the position that most, if not all, of the Defendants' pleadings were without legal foundation and would have been struck when considered by the Court.

16 It was in these circumstances that I directed this hearing. The parties were invited to make whatever applications that they considered appropriate regarding the clarification of the pleadings.

(III) THE APPLICATION OF THE DEFENDANTS THAT THESE ACTIONS SHOULD BE DISMISSED BECAUSE THE STRATA CORPORATION DOES NOT HAVE THE AUTHORITY TO BRING THEM

17 In this application, the Defendants submit that the Strata Corporation was not authorized to bring these actions as it had not passed the resolution required by s. 171 of the SPA. This section of the SPA specifies that a resolution must be passed by a 3/4 vote at an annual or special general meeting before litigation may be commenced by a strata corporation.

18 Included in their arguments, the Strata Corporation submits that the Defendants do not have standing to bring this application. Rather, it is only the other owners that have standing to bring this application as they will be required to finance these purportedly unauthorized actions.

19 It was unnecessary to determine this issue as the evidence does not support this application of the Defendants. To the contrary, the evidence shows that the required resolution to commence these actions was passed by a 3/4 vote at the annual or special general meeting held on October 26, 2006.

20 Given these circumstances, this preliminary objection is dismissed.

(IV) THE APPLICATION OF THE STRATA CORPORATION TO STRIKE AND DISMISS THE PLEADINGS OF THE DEFENDANTS PURSUANT TO R. 19(24)

21 The Strata Corporation brings this application pursuant to R. 19(24). Not only do the Defendants oppose this application, but they also contend that it should be dismissed on a preliminary basis as the Court is without jurisdiction to hear it.

(A) The Preliminary Application Of The Defendants To Dismiss The R. 19(24) Application Of The Strata Corporation

22 The Defendants submit that the Court has already approved all of their pleadings as presently drawn and, therefore, it is without jurisdiction to revisit the matter. The Defendants contend that the matter is res judicata.

23 The record of these proceedings does not support this contention.

24 As is set out in my earlier decision (namely, 2008 BCSC 481), in the fall of 2007 at the request of both parties I directed that issues that had been raised regarding the Defendants' pleadings be postponed until the trial. (That is, those issues would be determined at trial by the trial judge.) However, as was touched upon earlier in these Reasons for Judgment as well as being set out in the aforementioned decision, it became apparent in the course of subsequent pre-trial applications that those issues could not be deferred until trial.

25 There was never a decision made that the Defendants' pleadings were valid pleadings. To the contrary, the earlier direction went no further than postponing that decision until trial.

26 As the issues raised in this hearing have not been addressed by the Court, these applications are not res judicata.

27 For these reasons, this application is dismissed.

(B) The R. 19(24) Application Of The Strata Corporation

28 The Defendants filed individual pleadings in each of these actions. In the Fines Action, they individually filed a Statement of Defence and Counterclaim and in the Access Action, they filed individual Statements of Defence. Mr. Lam also filed a Counterclaim in the Access Action while Sze Hang Holding did not.

29 With respect to the South Unit, because they are joint owners Mr. Lam and Sze Hang Holding do not have the standing individually to raise defences or to bring claims as owners: Extra Gift Exchange Inc., Lam and Richmond Liquidation Sales v. Ernest & Twins Ventures (PP) Ltd. et al, 2007 BCSC 426. Rather, the standing to raise defences and to bring counterclaims as owners of the South Unit rests with the Defendants jointly.

30 Although as the sole owner of the North Unit, Sze Hang Holding could file individual pleadings on behalf of that unit, it makes little sense to do so in this case, as for the most part (if not entirely) the Defendants bring the same defences and counterclaims for each of the units.

31 For example, in the Fines Actions, with the exception of paragraphs 1-3, 38-40, 46, 55, 66, 83, and 96-98 in Mr. Lam's pleadings and paragraphs 1, 2, 38, 42, 51, 79, 92, and 93 in Sze Hang Holding's pleadings, the pleadings are essentially the same. In the Access action, with the exception of paragraphs 1, 30-36, 43, 60, 63-66, 68-70, 72-74, and 80-104 in Mr. Lam's pleadings and paragraphs 1, 30, 53, 54, 56, and 57 in Sze Hang Holding's pleadings, the pleadings are the same.

32 During his submissions, Mr. Lam explained that, in addition to the defences and counterclaims that he is pursuing as an owner, he is also pursuing some individual claims as a tenant - that is, Sze Hang Holding is not pursuing these tenant claims. Because he has these individual claims, he argued that his pleadings should be individual.

33 This argument is not sound in law. Rather, as was just set out, because neither Mr. Lam nor Sze Hang Holding has standing to individually defend or pursue any claims based as owners of the South Unit, their pleadings must be joint. Any claims made solely by one of the Defendants on grounds other than as owners should be set out as an individual claim within that joint pleading.

34 However, even though these pleadings were not brought in the proper form for purposes of this hearing, I have proceeded as if they had been. Furthermore, as the parties did during the hearing, I have addressed the pleadings in both actions collectively. (Many of the defences and counterclaims are repeated in both actions.)

35 As was set out at the beginning of this section of this Judgment, the application of the Strata Corporation to strike the Defendants' pleadings is brought pursuant to R. 19(24). That rule provides that:

At any stage of a proceeding the court may order to be struck out or amended the whole or any part of an endorsement, pleading, petition or other document on the ground that

- (a) it discloses no reasonable claim or defence as the case may be,
- (b) it is unnecessary, scandalous, frivolous or vexatious,
- (c) it may prejudice, embarrass or delay the fair trial or hearing or the proceeding, or
- (d) it is otherwise an abuse of the process of the court, and the court may grant judgment or order the proceeding to be stayed or dismissed and may order the costs of the application to be paid as special costs.

36 Pursuant to this rule, pleadings that are so prolix and confusing that it is difficult, if not impossible, to understand the case to be met, should be struck: Gittings v. Caneco Audio-Publishers Inc. (1987), 17 B.C.L.R. (2d) 38 (S.C.), rev'd (1988), 26 B.C.L.R. (2d) 349 (C.A.) but not on this point. The underlying rationale of this principle is that if causes of action (or defences for that matter) are not properly pleaded, it is impossible for a defendant (or a plaintiff) to know the case to meet: Homalco Indian Band v. British Columbia (1998), 25 C.P.C. (4th) 107 (B.C.S.C.).

37 The Defendants' pleadings are lengthy. In the Fines Action, Mr. Lam's Statement of Defence and Counterclaim (including the Prayer for Relief) is 51 pages long with 120 paragraphs while Sze Hang Holding's Statement of Defence and Counterclaim (including the Prayer for Relief) is 48 pages and 115 paragraphs. In the Access Action, Mr. Lam's Statement of Defence and Counterclaim is 42 pages and 114 paragraphs long while Sze Hang Holding's Statement of Defence is 25 pages and 65 paragraphs long. (As was touched on earlier, Sze Hang Holding did not file a Counterclaim in the Access Action.)

38 These pleadings are so prolix and confusing that it is difficult, if not impossible, to understand the case to be met. In addition to the proposed defences and counterclaims being incomprehensible, these pleadings include arguments, opinions, and allegations against people and businesses which are not parties - for example, allegations against members of the Strata Council, the present property management company, and a lawyer who has provided legal services to the Strata Corporation.

39 Given these facts, the pleadings must be struck. Thus, the next issue is whether the Defendants should be permitted to redraft these pleadings.

40 Generally, if the problem with a pleading is that it is inadequately drafted, a party will be given the opportunity to redraft it. However, if it is plain and obvious that even if redrafted a pleading is bound to fail because it does not raise an arguable issue (that is, it is without legal foundation), a party will not be granted the opportunity to redraft: Braun Investment Group Inc. v. Emco Investment Corp. (1984), 58 B.C.L.R. 396, 46 C.P.C. 85 (S.C.), aff'd (1985), 67 B.C.L.R. 247 (C.A.); and McNaughton v. Baker (1988), 25 B.C.L.R. (2d) 17, [1988] 4 W.W.R. 742 (C.A.).

41 In addition to this ground for denying a party the opportunity to redraft a pleading, the Court may deny that opportunity on the ground that to grant it would constitute an abuse of process.

42 That is, as explained in John W. Horn & Hon. Susan A. Griffin, Fraser Horn & Griffin, The Conduct of Civil Litigation in British Columbia, 2d ed., looseleaf (Markham, Ont.: LexisNexis, 2007) at 25-5:

A pleading or portion of a pleading may be struck out on any of the grounds set out in Rule 19(24)(b), (c) and (d). Though such an application is not usually made with the object of securing judgment in a summary way, the Rule in terms provides that this result may follow. If the ground of the application is that the entire proceeding is ... an abuse of process ... then the entire action may be stayed or dismissed or the entire defence struck out.

43 As described in Frederick M. Irvine, McLachlin & Taylor British Columbia Practice, 3rd ed., looseleaf (Markham, Ont.: LexisNexis, 3006) at 19-63(3):

Abuse of process is not limited to cases where a claim or an issue has already been decided in other litigation, but is a flexible doctrine applied by the court to values fundamental to the court system. In Toronto (City) v. Canadian Union of Public Employees, Local 79 (C.U.P.E.), [2003] 3 S.C.R. 77, [2003] S.C.J. No. 64, the court stated at para. 37:

Canadian courts have applied the doctrine of abuse of process to preclude relitigation in circumstances where the strict requirements of issue estoppel (typically the privity/mutuality requirements) are not met, but where allowing the litigation to proceed would nonetheless violate such principles as judicial economy, consistency, finality and the integrity of the administration of justice.

44 Applying these principles to the circumstances of this case, for the reasons that follow I have concluded that the Defendants should not be granted the opportunity to redraft their pleadings. Given this decision, in turn, results in there being no Statements of Defences or Counterclaims filed in either of these actions, I have also concluded that the Strata Corporation should be granted judgment.

45 Some of the proposed defences and claims of the Defendants could not be redrafted in any event as they are without legal foundation. That is, no matter how they are redrafted, they are bound to fail because they do not raise an arguable issue.

46 For example, as they explained in their submissions (because it could not be discerned in their pleadings) the Defendants contend that the bylaws which form the basis of the Strata Corporation's claims are invalid because they are ultra vires. In other words, those bylaws are beyond the authority of the Strata Corporation to pass, let alone enforce.

47 This contention is not supported by the law. Pursuant to s. 3 of the SPA "... the strata corporation is responsible for managing and maintaining the common property and common assets of the strata corporation for the benefit of the owners." Moreover, as is set out in s. 119 of the SPA, strata corporations "must have bylaws" and the bylaws "may provide for the control, management, maintenance, use and enjoyment of the strata lots, common property and common assets of the strata corporation and for the administration of the strata corporation."

48 Under s. 129 and s. 133 of the SPA, the Strata Corporation may impose fines to enforce bylaws and may do what is reasonably necessary to remedy a contravention of its bylaws or rules, including doing work on or to a strata lot, the common property, or common assets; removing objects from the common property or common assets; and requiring that reasonable costs of remedying the contravention be paid by the person who may be fined.

49 As the bylaws in the present actions fall within the scope of the statutory responsibilities of strata corporations and as strata corporations are statutorily required to exercise these responsibilities through the passage and enforcement of bylaws, the bylaws are not ultra vires the power of the Strata Corporation.

50 Given the statutory provisions governing strata corporations, there is no legal foundation for this contention either as a defence or as a claim. It is bound to fail.

51 As another example of a pleading that cannot be redrafted in any event because it is without legal foundation, the Defendants submit that invalid proxies have been used to elect many, if not all, of the members of the Strata Council and have been used to pass resolutions, including the resolutions creating the bylaws that the Strata Corporation seeks to enforce in these actions. The Defendants argue that the proxies are invalid because the owners of the proxies sold them to other owners. As a result of this flawed process, the Defendants submit that the bylaws are invalid and unenforceable.

52 Assuming that some owners sold their proxies to other owners and that those proxies were used to elect members of the Strata Council and/or to pass resolutions creating or enforcing these bylaws, that fact alone does not invalidate the election of the members of Strata Council; the creation of the bylaws; and/or the enforcement of the bylaws.

53 The fact that an owner chooses to sell his/her proxy to another owner does not invalidate that proxy. Pursuant to s. 56 of the SPA, a person who is otherwise eligible to vote at a general meeting may do so in person or by proxy. In other words, whether it is the election of members to the strata council or the passage of a resolution, a strata unit owner may exercise his/her vote by proxy.

54 To be valid, as is set out in s. 56 of the SPA, a proxy must:

- (a) be in writing and signed by the person appointing the proxy;
- (b) be general or for a specific meeting or resolution; and
- (c) be revocable (and, by extension, a later proxy must be considered to revoke an earlier one).

In other words, as long as the proxy meets these statutory requirements, it is valid. The fact that an owner chooses to sell his/her proxy to another owner does not invalidate it.

55 Although s. 292(2)(g) of the SPA authorizes the making of regulations "respecting the person who may be proxies, the number of proxies they may hold, the circumstances in which they may be proxies and restrictions on their powers as proxies", to date no regulations have been made that hold that the selling of a proxy invalidates it.

56 Given these conclusions, any defences and/or counterclaims based on the premise that a proxy that has been sold is invalid are bound to fail because that is not a basis on which a proxy would be rendered invalid. Consequently, there is no point in redrafting these pleadings because they are without legal foundation.

57 A further example of pleadings that cannot be redrafted in any event are the counterclaims brought by Mr. Lam as a tenant. (Presumably, these claims are brought as the tenant of the North Unit as he is an owner of the South Unit.) Aside from the fact that Mr. Lam has consistently maintained in these actions, as well as in related actions, that Extra Gift Exchange is the tenant of this unit as well as the South Unit, tenants do not have standing to bring claims or to raise a defence with respect to the bylaws.

58 That is, although some powers and duties can be assigned to a tenant pursuant to s. 147(1) of the SPA, the landlord (that is, Sze Hang Holding as the owner) cannot assign to a tenant the responsibility for fines or the costs of remedying a contravention of the bylaws or rules.

59 Mr. Lam relies on the provisions of the now-repealed Condominium Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 64 to provide him with standing to bring claims as a tenant. In addition to the fact that claims based on this statute are bound to fail because this statute has been repealed, as was set out in Extra Gift Exchange Inc., Lam and Richmond Liquidation Sales v. Ernest & Twins Ventures (PP) Ltd., 2007 BCSC 426 when Mr. Lam brought claims on behalf of Extra Gift Exchange as a tenant, the provisions of the Condominium Act pertain to tenants of "residential" strata units. Given this situation, even if this statute had not been repealed, any claims or defences of the Defendants brought pursuant to its provisions would be bound to fail as it does not give them standing, the Pacific Plaza being a business rather than residential strata development.

60 Quite apart from the fact that many, if not most, of the Defendants' pleadings could not be redrafted in any event because there is no legal foundation for the defences and counterclaims made, in the circumstances of this case it would be inappropriate to grant the Defendants permission to redraft their pleadings as to do so would constitute an abuse of process.

61 To begin with, over the last 7, almost 8, year period the Defendants have been given at least 4 opportunities (including this time) to draft appropriate pleadings. These earlier opportunities were granted by Mr. Justice Thackray in Extra Gift Exchange Inc. and Lam v. The Strata Corporation LMS3259 (18 September 2001), Vancouver No. S014678; Mr. Justice Shabbits in Extra Gift Exchange Inc., Lam, and Richmond Liquidation Sales v. Ernest & Twins Ventures (PP) Ltd. (18 February 2004), Vancouver No. L031802; Extra Gift Exchange Inc., Lam, and Richmond Liquidation Sales v. Ernest & Twins Ventures (PP) Ltd. (19 February 2004), Vancouver No. L031802; Extra Gift Exchange Inc., Lam, and Richmond Liquidation Sales v. Ernest & Twins Ventures (PP) Ltd. (20 February 2004), Vancouver No. L031802; and Extra Gift Exchange Inc., Lam, and Richmond Liquidation Sales v. Ernest & Twins Ventures (PP) Ltd. (18 March 2004), Vancouver No. L031802; and by myself in Extra Gift Exchange Inc. v. Ernest & Twins Ventures (PP) Ltd., 2007 BCSC 426.

62 Although the actions were different, the claims made in them are basically the same claims as the claims and defences made by the Defendants in these actions. That is, the claims pertain to the governance, management, and construction of this strata development.

63 Furthermore, although Sze Hang Holding was not a party in any of these earlier actions, Mr. Lam brought all of the claims for its benefit as well as his own. In addition, Ms. Sze Hang Lee (who is a principal of Sze Hang Holding and who represented it throughout this proceeding) was in attendance for all of these other matters, either by assisting Mr. Lam or as the representative of Extra Gift Exchange. Moreover, as a review of the pleadings in these earlier efforts disclose, although not named as a party the claims were brought for the benefit of Sze Hang Holding as well as the named parties.

64 Given the direct involvement of a principal of Sze Hang Holding in most if not all of these actions and the fact that claims were for the benefit of Sze Hang Holding as well as the named parties, I am satisfied that, for all practical purposes, Sze Hang Holding has also been given the benefit of these earlier opportunities.

65 As occurred in the present actions, the Defendants were self-represented in these other actions. Because of that fact, in my view they have been given more opportunities than would normally have been given to redraft their pleadings properly. On a number of previous occasions, the Court has urged them to secure legal assistance in this process. They have been advised that there are various legal organizations that can provide assistance at a modest cost. Given the state of the present pleadings, I can only conclude that the Defendants have either chosen not to get that assistance or have chosen not to follow the advice given.

66 There may be defences or claims that if properly drafted, the Defendants could have pursued. However, that opportunity is now gone. Given the number of previous opportunities, it would be an abuse of process to permit the Defendants yet another opportunity to redraft their pleadings.

67 In addition to being given these previous opportunities, it would be an abuse of process to permit the Defendants to redraft because of the fact that in their pleadings in the present actions the Defendants raised (as defences and counterclaims) claims that they knew had already been addressed and dismissed. Furthermore, they contravened earlier Court orders by raising matters that they had been specifically prohibited from raising in these actions.

68 To put this conclusion in context, although the present actions were commenced before Extra Gift Exchange Inc. et al. v. Ernest & Twins Ventures (PP) Ltd., 2007 BCSC 426, was released, the pleadings of the Defendants in these actions were drafted and filed after that judgment was issued.

69 In the Ernest & Twins matter, Mr. Lam and Extra Gift Exchange (Ms. Lee, a principal in Sze Hang Holding, is also a principal in Extra Gift Exchange), made claims against a number of parties including the developer, the past and current property management companies, and the former and current members of Strata Council. The claims pursued in that action pertained to construction, sale, management, and governance of the strata development.

70 In the Ernest & Twins action, Mr. Lam and Extra Gift Exchange were the plaintiffs. Judgment was granted against the plaintiffs with respect to most of their claims. That is, most of the claims were dismissed because they were without legal foundation. There was no point to redrafting them because they did not raise an arguable issue—they were bound to fail.

71 However, with respect to a few claims pertaining to the Strata Corporation and the current members of the Strata Council (current being defined as from 2002 onward), Mr. Lam was granted permission to redraft because there was potentially an arguable issue if they were properly drafted and if they were properly brought. However, that permission to redraft was subject to terms. Included in those terms was the requirement that the orders for special costs had to be paid before those potential claims could be pursued. (There were two orders for special costs - one in one of the earlier actions and the second I made in the Ernest & Twins matter.)

72 However, there was an exception to the payment of that special costs term. In particular, Mr. Lam was granted the opportunity to redraft some of the claims against the Strata Corporation and bring them as counterclaims in the present actions, without having to pay the special costs order first.

73 The rationale behind this exception was that some of the potential claims that Mr. Lam had been given the opportunity to redraft against the Strata Corporation pertained to bylaw matters such as the oppressive and unfair levying of fines. Because these potential claims were interrelated to the claims that were being brought against him and Sze Hang Holding in the present actions, I concluded that it was inappropriate to require Mr. Lam to pay the special costs orders before they could pursue these potential claims as counterclaims in these actions.

74 However, the claims from the Ernest & Twins decision that Mr. Lam was given the opportunity to redraft and pursue in the present actions were very limited. Specifically, as far as the present actions were concerned:

With the exception of claims pertaining to the oppressive and unfair levying of fines and penalties, and the arbitrary and improper waiving of these fines and penalties (which also includes the improper acquisition and use of proxies), none of the potential claims may be brought until the outstanding orders of special costs have been paid.

In addition, "the potential counterclaims will not extend to potential claims against the Current Strata Council Members." That is, this exception did not extend to any of the potential claims against the current members of the Strata Council - the current members of the Strata council being defined as members from 2002 onwards. Put another way, before these claims could be redrafted and pursued Mr. Lam had to comply with all of the terms set out in Ernest & Twins decision which included the payment of the special costs orders.

75 Unfortunately, not only did the Defendants pursue defences and claims in the present actions that went beyond the permitted categories, they pursued defences and counterclaims that had been dismissed (that is, had been found to be without legal foundation) in the Ernest & Twins action.

76 Included in the defences and counterclaims that fall outside the permitted categories are the allegations that the Defendants have made in their pleadings against the members of the Strata Council. Although the Defendants have framed their defences and counterclaims as allegations of mismanagement by the Strata Corporation, these allegations are really against the members of Strata Council as it is their purported unauthorized acts and misconduct that the Defendants plead constitutes this mismanagement.

77 Another prohibited claim that was included in the Defendants' pleadings in the present actions is the claim that the Strata Corporation failed to pursue an action for fraudulent misrepresentation against the developers, an action that was purportedly authorized by a resolution supported by at least 3/4 of the owners.

78 To bring claims that contravene a Court order is an abuse of process.

79 As was just touched upon earlier, with respect to many of the claims in the Ernest & Twins action, judgment was granted against the plaintiffs (that is, Mr. Lam) because the claims were without legal foundation - they did not raise an arguable issue. The Defendants bought many of these dismissed claims in the present actions, claims such as the failure of the Strata Corporation to take action regarding structural deficiencies; the alleged misconduct of the Strata Corporation regarding the payment of legal expenditures incurred by the Strata Corporation to defend or pursue actions; and breaches of fiduciary duty. These claims are res judicata. The Court has already determined that they are bound to fail. To bring them again is an abuse of process.

80 Sze Hang Holding argues that as it was not a party to the Ernest & Twins action, it is not bound by any orders arising from that decision. I do not agree.

81 As was just touched upon, some of the claims in the Ernest & Twins decision were dismissed. Those claims were dismissed because they were without legal foundation and therefore were bound to fail. With respect to these dismissed claims, the fact that there are now brought by Sze Hang Holding alone or jointly with Mr. Lam does not change the fact that they are not legally recognized claims. They do not raise an arguable issue.

82 As far as the other orders in the Ernest & Twins decision are concerned, Sze Hang Holding's standing to defend the claims brought in the present actions and to bring counterclaims against the Strata Corporation is as an owner. As its ownership in the South Unit is joint with Mr. Lam, Sze Hang Holding cannot defend any claims or bring any counterclaims with respect to that unit without Mr. Lam.

83 Consequently, because Mr. Lam was a party in the Ernest & Twins decision; because some of the orders in that case limited his capacity to bring or defend claims as an owner of the South Unit; and because Sze Hang Holding cannot raise defences or bring claims as an owner of the South Unit without Mr. Lam, Sze Hang Holding is bound by the orders made in that decision.

84 Sze Hang Holding argues that with respect to the North Unit, however, because it was not a party to the Ernest & Twins decision and because it is the sole owner of that unit, it is not bound by the Ernest & Twins decision with respect to counterclaims and defences raised on behalf of that unit. In the circumstances of this case, that argument is not persuasive.

85 For the most part, if not entirely, the defences and counterclaims that it raises as owner of the North Unit are the same defences and counterclaims that it raises jointly with Mr. Lam as owners of the South Unit. In these circumstances, to permit Sze Hang Holding to pursue counterclaims or defences as the owner of the North Unit that it is prohibited from pursuing on behalf of the South Unit, as a result of the Ernest & Twins decision, would constitute an abuse of process as it would thwart that earlier decision.

86 To summarize, in my view given all of the circumstances set out above, to allow the Defendants the opportunity to redraft some or all of their pleadings would, in the circumstances of this case, constitute an abuse of process. It would violate the principles of judicial economy, consistency, finality, and the integrity of the administration of justice.

87 Having denied the Defendants the opportunity to redraft their pleadings, their Statements of Defence and Counterclaims are dismissed.

(C) Conclusion

88 The Defendants pleadings are struck because they are so prolix and confusing that it is impossible for the Strata Corporation to discern the case that it is to meet.

89 The Defendants are denied the opportunity to redraft not only because many of their defences and counterclaims are bound to fail as they do not raise an arguable issue, but primarily because it would constitute an abuse of process. Not only have the Defendants been granted previous opportunities to redraft but in these pleadings they contravened court orders and endeavoured to re-litigate matters that they knew had already been considered and decided.

90 As the Defendants pleadings have been struck and as they have been denied the opportunity to redraft them, this matter will proceed as if Statements of Defence or Counterclaims had not been filed. Given those circumstances, Judgment is granted to the Strata Corporation in both actions against both Defendants.

91 As far as the Fines Action is concerned, the question of the quantum of the fines to be awarded against the Defendants in regard to 1080 - 8888 Odlin Crescent, Richmond B.C. (the South Unit) for the breach of the business hour bylaw as of December 1, 2007; of the quantum of the fines to be awarded against the Defendant Sze Hang Holding in regard to 1380 - 8888 Odlin Crescent Richmond B.C. (the North Unit) for the breach of the business hour bylaw as of December 1, 2007; and of the amount to be awarded against the Defendants in regard to the cost of moving and storing the Defendants' property are all referred to the Registrar who will certify their findings.

92 In the Access Action, with respect to the relief granted as a result of the Judgment against the Defendants, this Court orders:

- (a) that the Defendants, on or before 5:00 p.m. on May 15, 2009, provide access on a date and time agreed upon by the parties to enable a representative of the Strata Corporation (that representative having been chosen by the Strata Corporation) to attend the premises located at 1010 - 8888 Odlin Crescent in Richmond B.C. (the South Unit), the purpose of that access being to enable the Strata Corporation to determine whether the Defendants are complying with the bylaws;
- (b) that the Defendant Sze Hang Holding, on or before 5:00 p.m. on May 15, 2009, provide access on a date and time agreed upon by it and the Strata Corporation to enable a representative of Strata

Corporation (that representative having been chosen by the Strata Corporation) to attend the premises located at 1380 - 8888 Odlin Crescent in Richmond B.C. (the North Unit), the purpose of that access being to enable the Strata Corporation to determine whether the Defendant Sze Hang Holding is complying with the bylaws;

- (c) that if the Defendants or either of them fail to comply with the aforementioned orders, the representative of the Strata Corporation is entitled to enter the premises with the assistance of a locksmith, provided that after that inspection is completed by the representative of the Strata Corporation that he or she secures the premises and provides the owners and/or owner of the premises entered with the new key to those premises or premise; and
- (d) that if the Defendants or either of them impedes or attempts to impede the representative of the Strata Corporation from entering 1380 - 8888 Odlin Crescent and/or 1010 - 8888 Odlin Crescent as permitted by this order, any peace officer and member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is authorized to arrest and remove that Defendant or Defendants.

(e) COSTS

93 As the successful party, pursuant to R. 57(9), the Strata Corporation is entitled to be awarded costs. Under R. 19(24), the Court may order costs to be paid as special costs.

94 Given that the Defendants included in their pleadings claims that they knew had been dismissed in other proceedings and that the Defendants contravened previous Court orders by including in these pleadings claims that they had been directed not to bring, I will exercise my discretion and award these costs as special costs.

Corrigendum

Released: April 16, 2009

Revised Judgment

Corrigendum to Reasons for Judgment dated April 7, 2009, issued, advising that:

[1] Paragraph 81 will now read:

As was just touched upon, some of the claims in the Ernest & Twins decision were dismissed. Those claims were dismissed because they were without legal foundation and therefore were bound to fail. With respect to these dismissed claims, the fact that there are now brought by Sze Hang Holding alone or jointly with Mr. Lam does not change the fact that they are not legally recognized claims. They do not raise an arguable issue.

(amendment underlined)

The Reasons for Judgment are amended accordingly. In all other aspects, the Reasons stand.

Case Summary

Appeal From:

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO

Catchwords:

Labour law — Arbitration — Dismissal without just cause — Evidence — Recreation instructor dismissed after being convicted of sexual assault — Conviction upheld on appeal — Arbitrator ruling that instructor had been dismissed without just cause — Whether union entitled to relitigate issue decided against employee in criminal proceedings — Evidence Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. E.23, s. 22.1 — Labour Relations Act, S.O. 1995, c. 1, Sch. A, s. 48.

Catchwords:

Judicial review — Standard of review — Labour arbitration — Recreation instructor dismissed after being convicted of sexual assault — Arbitrator ruling that instructor had been dismissed without just cause — Whether arbitrator entitled to revisit conviction — Whether correctness is appropriate standard of review — Evidence Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. E.23, s. 22.1 — Labour Relations Act, S.O. 1995, c. 1, Sch. A, s. 48.

Summary:

O worked as a recreation instructor for the respondent City. He was charged with sexually assaulting a boy under his supervision. He pleaded not guilty. At trial before a judge alone, he testified and was cross-examined. [page78] The trial judge found that the complainant was credible and that O was not. He entered a conviction, which was affirmed on appeal. The City fired O a few days after his conviction. O grieved the dismissal. At the arbitration hearing, the City submitted the complainant's testimony from the criminal trial and the notes of O's supervisor, who had spoken to the complainant at the time. The complainant was not called to testify. O testified, claiming that he had never sexually assaulted the boy. The arbitrator ruled that the criminal conviction was admissible evidence, but that it was not conclusive as to whether O had sexually assaulted the boy. No fresh evidence was introduced. The arbitrator held that the presumption raised by the criminal conviction had been rebutted, and that O had been dismissed without just cause. The Divisional Court quashed the arbitrator's ruling. The Court of Appeal upheld that decision.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

Per McLachlin C.J. and Gonthier, Iacobucci, Major, Bastarache, Binnie and Arbour JJ.: When asked to decide whether a criminal conviction, prima facie admissible in a proceeding under s. 22.1 of the Ontario Evidence Act, ought to be rebutted or taken as conclusive, courts will turn to the doctrine of abuse of process to ascertain whether relitigation would be detrimental to the adjudicative process. The doctrine engages the inherent power of the court to prevent the misuse of its procedure, in a way that would bring the administration of justice into disrepute. It has been applied to preclude relitigation in circumstances where the strict requirements of issue estoppel are not met, but where allowing litigation to proceed would nonetheless violate such principles as judicial economy, consistency, finality and the integrity of the administration of justice. The motive of the party who seeks to relitigate, and the capacity in which he or she does so, cannot be decisive factors in the application of the bar against relitigation. What is improper is to attempt to impeach a judicial finding by the impermissible route of relitigation in a different forum. A proper focus on the process, rather than on the interests of a party, will reveal why relitigation should not be permitted. From the system's point of view, relitigation carries serious detrimental effects and should be avoided unless the circumstances dictate that relitigation is necessary to enhance the credibility and the effectiveness of the adjudicative process as a whole. Casting doubt over the validity of a criminal conviction is a very serious matter. Collateral attacks and relitigation are not appropriate methods of redress since they inordinately tax the adjudicative process while doing nothing to ensure a more trustworthy [page79] result. The common law doctrines of issue estoppel, collateral attack and abuse of process adequately capture the concerns that arise when finality in litigation must be balanced against fairness to a particular litigant. There is no need to endorse a self-standing and independent "principle of finality" as either a separate doctrine or as an independent test to preclude relitigation.

The appellant union was not entitled, either at common law or under statute, to relitigate the issue decided against the grievor in the criminal proceedings. The facts in this appeal point to the blatant abuse of process that results when relitigation of this sort is permitted. O was convicted in a criminal court and he exhausted all his avenues of appeal. In law, his conviction must stand, with all its consequent legal effects. There is nothing in this case that militates against the application of the doctrine of abuse of process to bar the relitigation of O's criminal conviction. The arbitrator was required as a matter of law to give full effect to the conviction. As a result of that error of law, the arbitrator reached a patently unreasonable conclusion. Properly understood in the light of correct legal principles, the evidence before the arbitrator could only lead him to conclude that the respondent City had established just cause for O's dismissal.

Issue estoppel has no application in this case since the requirement of mutuality of parties has not been met. With respect to the collateral attack doctrine, the appellant does not seek to overturn the sexual abuse conviction itself, but rather contest, for the purposes of a different claim with different legal consequences, whether the conviction was correct.

Per LeBel and Deschamps JJ.: As found by the majority, this case is appropriately decided on the basis of the doctrine of abuse of process, rather than the narrower and more technical doctrines of either collateral attack or issue estoppel. There was also agreement that the appropriate standard of review for the question of whether a criminal conviction may be relitigated in a grievance proceeding is correctness. This is a question of law involving the interpretation of the arbitrator's constituent statute, [page80] an external statute, and a complex body of common law rules and conflicting jurisprudence dealing with relitigation, an issue at the heart of the administration of justice. The arbitrator's determination in this case that O's criminal conviction could indeed be relitigated during the grievance proceeding was incorrect. As a matter of law, the arbitrator was required to give full effect to O's conviction. His failure to do so was sufficient to render his ultimate decision that O had been dismissed without just cause -- a decision squarely within the arbitrator's area of specialized expertise and thus reviewable on a deferential standard -- patently unreasonable, according to the jurisprudence of the Court.

Because of growing concerns with the ways in which the standards of review currently available within the pragmatic and functional approach are conceived of and applied, the administrative law aspects of this case require further discussion. The patent unreasonableness standard does not currently provide sufficiently clear parameters for reviewing courts to apply in assessing the decisions of administrative adjudicators. Certain fundamental legal questions -- for instance constitutional and human rights questions and those involving civil liberties, as well as other questions that are of central importance to the legal system as a whole, such as the issue of relitigation -- typically fall to be decided on the correctness standard. Not all questions of law, however, must be reviewed under a standard of correctness. Resolving general legal questions may be an important component of the work of some administrative adjudicators. In many instances, the appropriate standard of review in respect of the application of general common or civil law rules by specialized adjudicators should not be one of correctness, but rather of reasonableness. If the general question of law is closely connected to the adjudicator's core area of expertise, the decision will typically be entitled to deference.

In reviewing a decision under the existing standard of patent unreasonableness, the court's role is not to identify the correct result. To pass a review for patent unreasonableness, a decision must be one that can be rationally supported. It would be wrong for a reviewing court to intervene in decisions that are incorrect, rather than limiting its intervention to those decisions that lack a rational foundation. If this occurs, the line between correctness on the one hand, and patent unreasonableness, on the other, becomes blurred. The boundaries between [page81] patent unreasonableness and reasonableness simpliciter are even less clear and approaches to sustain a workable distinction between them raise their own problems. In the end, the essential question remains the same under both standards: was the decision of the adjudicator taken in accordance with reason? In summary, the current framework exhibits several drawbacks. These include the conceptual and practical difficulties that flow from the overlap between patent unreasonableness and reasonableness simpliciter, and the difficulty caused at times by the interplay between patent unreasonableness and correctness.

The role of a court in determining the standard of review is to be faithful to the intent of the legislature that empowered the administrative adjudicator to make the decision, as well as to the animating principle that, in a society governed by the rule of law, power is not to be exercised arbitrarily or capriciously. Judicial review on substantive grounds ensures that the decisions of administrative adjudicators are capable of rational justification; review on procedural grounds ensures that they are fair.

Administrative law has developed considerably over the last 25 years. This evolution, which reflects a strong sense of deference to administrative decision makers and an acknowledgment of the importance of their role, has given rise to some problems or concerns. It remains to be seen, in an appropriate case, what should be the solution to these difficulties. Should courts move to a two standard system of judicial review, correctness and a revised unified standard of reasonableness? Should we attempt to more clearly define the nature and scope of each standard or rethink their relationship and application? This is perhaps some of the work which lies ahead for courts, building on the developments of recent years as well as on the legal tradition which created the framework of the present law of judicial review.

ARBOUR J.

I. Introduction

1 Can a person convicted of sexual assault, and dismissed from his employment as a result, be reinstated by a labour arbitrator who concludes, on the evidence before him, that the sexual assault did not take place? This is essentially the issue raised in this appeal.

2 Like the Court of Appeal for Ontario and the Divisional Court, I have come to the conclusion that the arbitrator may not revisit the criminal conviction. Although my reasons differ somewhat from those of the courts below, I would dismiss the appeal.

II. Facts

3 Glenn Oliver worked as a recreation instructor for the respondent City of Toronto. He was charged with sexually assaulting a boy under his supervision. He pleaded not guilty. At trial before a judge alone, he testified and was cross-examined. He called several defence witnesses, including character witnesses. The trial judge found that the complainant was credible and that Oliver was not. He entered a conviction, which was later affirmed on appeal. He sentenced Oliver to 15 months in jail, followed by one year of probation.

4 The respondent City of Toronto fired Oliver a few days after his conviction, and Oliver grieved his dismissal. At the hearing, the City of Toronto submitted the boy's testimony from the criminal trial and the notes of Oliver's supervisor, who had spoken to the boy at the time. The City did not call the boy to [page87] testify. Oliver again testified on his own behalf and claimed that he had never sexually assaulted the boy.

5 The arbitrator ruled that the criminal conviction was admissible as prima facie but not conclusive evidence that Oliver had sexually assaulted the boy. No evidence of fraud nor any fresh evidence unavailable at trial was introduced in the arbitration. The arbitrator held that the presumption raised by the criminal conviction had been rebutted, and that Oliver had been dismissed without just cause.

III. Procedural History

A. Superior Court of Justice (Divisional Court) (2000), 187 D.L.R. (4th) 323

6 At Divisional Court the application for judicial review was granted and the decision of the arbitrator was quashed. The Divisional Court heard this case and Ontario v. O.P.S.E.U. at the same time. (Ontario v. O.P.S.E.U., [2003] 3 S.C.R. 149, 2003 SCC 64, is being released concurrently by this Court.) O'Driscoll J. found that while s. 22.1 of the Evidence Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. E.23, applied to all the arbitrations, relitigation of the cases was barred by the doctrines of collateral attack, issue estoppel and abuse of process. The court noted that criminal convictions are valid judgments that cannot be collaterally attacked at a later arbitration (paras. 74-79). With respect to issue estoppel, under which an issue decided against a party is protected from collateral attack barring decisive new evidence or a showing of fraud, the court found that relitigation was also prevented, rejecting the appellant's argument that there had been no privity because the union, and not the grievor, had filed the grievance. The court also held that the doctrine of abuse of process, which denies a collateral attack upon a final decision of another court where the party had "a full opportunity of contesting the decision", applied (paras. 81 and 90). Finally, O'Driscoll J. found that whether the standard of review was correctness or patent unreasonableness in each [page88] case, the standard for judicial review had been met (para. 86).

B. Court of Appeal for Ontario (2001), 55 O.R. (3d) 541

7 Doherty J.A. for the court held that because the crux of the issue was whether the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE or the union) was permitted to relitigate the issue decided in the criminal trial, and because this analysis "turned on [the arbitrator's] understanding of the common law rules and principles governing the relitigation of issues finally decided in a previous judicial proceeding", the appropriate standard of review was correctness (paras. 22 and 38).

8 Doherty J.A. concluded that issue estoppel did not apply. Even if the union was the employee's privity, the respondent City of Toronto had played no role in the criminal proceeding and had no relationship to the Crown. He also found that describing the appellant union's attempt to relitigate the employee's culpability as a collateral attack on the order of the court did not assist in determining whether relitigation could be permitted. Commenting that the phrase "abuse of process" was perhaps best limited to describe those cases where the plaintiff has instigated litigation for some improper purpose, Doherty J.A. went on to consider what he called "the finality principle" in considerable depth.

9 Doherty J.A. dismissed the appeal on the basis of this principle. He held that the res judicata jurisprudence required a court to balance the importance of finality, which reduces uncertainty and inconsistency in results, and which serves to conserve the [page89] resources of both the parties and the judiciary, with the "search for justice in each individual case" (para. 94). Doherty J.A. held that the following approach should be taken when weighing finality claims against an individual litigant's claim to access to justice (at para. 100):

- Does the res judicata doctrine apply?
- If the doctrine applies, can the party against whom it applies demonstrate that the justice of the individual case should trump finality concerns?
- If the doctrine does not apply, can the party seeking to preclude relitigation demonstrate that finality concerns should be given paramountcy over the claim that justice requires relitigation?

10 Ultimately, Doherty J.A. dismissed the appeal, concluding that "finality concerns must be given paramountcy over CUPE's claim to an entitlement to relitigate Oliver's culpability" (para. 102). He so concluded because there was no suggestion of fraud at the criminal trial, because the underlying charges were serious enough that the employee was likely to have litigated them to the fullest, and because there was no new evidence presented at arbitration (paras. 103-108).

IV. Relevant Statutory Provisions

11 Evidence Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. E.23

22.1 (1) Proof that a person has been convicted or discharged anywhere in Canada of a crime is proof, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the crime was committed by the person, if,

- (a) no appeal of the conviction or discharge was taken and the time for an appeal has expired; or
- (b) an appeal of the conviction or discharge was taken but was dismissed or abandoned and no further appeal is available.

(2) Subsection (1) applies whether or not the convicted or discharged person is a party to the proceeding.

(3) For the purposes of subsection (1), a certificate containing the substance and effect only, omitting the formal part, of the charge and of the conviction or discharge, purporting to be signed by the officer having the custody of the records of the court at which the offender was convicted or discharged, or by the deputy of the officer, is, on proof of the identity of the person named as convicted or discharged person in the certificate, sufficient evidence of the conviction or discharge of that person, without proof of the signature or of the official character of the person appearing to have signed the certificate.

48. (1) Every collective agreement shall provide for the final and binding settlement by arbitration, without stoppage of work, of all differences between the parties arising from the interpretation, application, administration or alleged violation of the agreement, including any question as to whether a matter is arbitrable.

V. Analysis

A. Standard of Review

12 My colleague LeBel J. discusses at length our jurisprudence on standards of review. He reviews concerns and criticisms about the three standard system of judicial review. Given that these issues were not argued before us in this case, and without the benefit of a full adversarial debate, I would not wish to comment on the desirability of a departure from our recently affirmed framework for standards of review analysis. (See this Court's unanimous decisions of Dr. Q v. College of Physicians and Surgeons of British Columbia, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 226, 2003 SCC 19, and Law Society of New Brunswick v. Ryan, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 247, 2003 SCC 20.)

13 The Court of Appeal properly applied the functional and pragmatic approach as delineated in Pushpanathan v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 982 (see also [page91] Dr. Q, supra), to determine the extent to which the legislature intended that courts should review the tribunals' decisions.

14 Doherty J.A. was correct to acknowledge patent unreasonableness as the general standard of review of an arbitrator's decision as to whether just cause has been established in the discharge of an employee. However, and as he noted, the same standard of review does not necessarily apply to every ruling made by the arbitrator in the course of the arbitration. This follows the distinction drawn by Cory J. for the majority in Toronto (City) Board of Education v. O.S.S.T.F., District 15, [1997] 1 S.C.R. 487, where he said, at para. 39:

It has been held on several occasions that the expert skill and knowledge which an arbitration board exercises in interpreting a collective agreement does not usually extend to the interpretation of "outside" legislation. The findings of a board pertaining to the interpretation of a statute or the common law are generally reviewable on a correctness standard... . An exception to this rule may occur where the external statute is intimately connected with the mandate of the tribunal and is encountered frequently as a result. [Emphasis added.]

15 In this case, the reasonableness of the arbitrator's decision to reinstate the grievor is predicated on the correctness of his assumption that he was not bound by the criminal conviction. That assumption rested on his analysis of complex common law rules and of conflicting jurisprudence. The body of law dealing with the relitigation of issues finally decided in previous judicial proceedings is not only complex; it is also at the heart of the administration of justice. Properly understood and applied, the doctrines of res judicata and abuse of process govern the interplay between different judicial decision makers. These rules and principles call for a judicial balance between finality, fairness, efficiency and authority of judicial decisions. The application of these rules, doctrines and principles is clearly outside the sphere of expertise of a labour arbitrator who may be called to have recourse to them. In such a case, he or she [page92] must correctly answer the question of law raised. An incorrect approach may be sufficient to lead to a patently unreasonable outcome. This was reiterated recently by Iacobucci J. in Parry Sound (District) Social Services Administration Board v. O.P.S.E.U., Local 324, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 157, 2003 SCC 42, at para. 21.

16 Therefore I agree with the Court of Appeal that the arbitrator had to decide correctly whether CUPE was entitled, either at common law or under a statute, to relitigate the issue decided against the grievor in the criminal proceedings.

B. Section 22.1 of Ontario's Evidence Act

17 Section 22.1 of the Ontario Evidence Act is of limited assistance to the disposition of this appeal. It provides that proof that a person has been convicted of a crime is proof, "in the absence of evidence to the contrary", that the crime was committed by that person.

18 As Doherty J.A. correctly pointed out, at para. 42, s. 22.1 contemplates that the validity of a conviction may be challenged in a subsequent proceeding, but the section says nothing about the circumstances in which such challenge is or is not permissible. That issue is determined by the application of such common law doctrines as res judicata, issue estoppel, collateral attack and abuse of process. Section 22.1 speaks of the admissibility of the fact of the conviction as proof of the truth of its content, and speaks of its conclusive effect if unchallenged. As a rule of evidence, the section addresses in part the hearsay rule, by making the conviction -- the finding of another court -- admissible for the truth of its content, as an exception to the inadmissibility of hearsay (D. M. Paciocco and L. Stuesser, The Law of Evidence (3rd ed. 2002), at p. 120; Phillips on Evidence (14th ed. 1990), at paras. 33-94 and 33-95).

19 Here, however, the admissibility of the conviction is not in issue. Section 22.1 renders the proof of the conviction admissible. The question is whether it can be rebutted by "evidence to the contrary". There are circumstances in which evidence will be admissible to rebut the presumption that the person convicted committed the crime, in particular where the conviction in issue is that of a non-party. There are also circumstances in which no such evidence may be tendered. If either issue estoppel or abuse of process bars the relitigation of the facts essential to the conviction, then no "evidence to the contrary" may be tendered to displace the effect of the conviction. In such a case, the conviction is conclusive that the person convicted committed the crime.

20 This interpretation is consistent with the rule of interpretation that legislation is presumed not to depart from general principles of law without an express indication to that effect. This presumption was reviewed and applied by Iacobucci J. in Parry Sound, supra, at para 39. Section 22.1 reflected the law established in the leading Canadian case of Demeter v. British Pacific Life Insurance Co. (1983), 150 D.L.R. (3d) 249 (Ont. H.C.), at p. 264, aff'd (1984), 48 O.R. (2d) 266 (C.A.), wherein after a thorough review of Canadian and English jurisprudence, Osler J. held that a criminal conviction is admissible in subsequent civil litigation as prima facie proof that the convicted individual committed the alleged act, "subject to rebuttal by the plaintiff on the merits". However, the common law also recognized that the presumption of guilt established by a conviction is rebuttable only where the rebuttal does not constitute an abuse of the process of the court (Demeter (H.C.), supra, at p. 265; Hunter v. Chief Constable of the West Midlands Police, [1982] A.C. 529 (H.L.), at p. 541; see also Re Del Core and Ontario College of Pharmacists (1985), 51 O.R. (2d) 1 (C.A.), at p. 22, per Blair J.A.). Section 22.1 does not change this; the legislature has not explicitly displaced the common law [page94] doctrines and the rebuttal is consequently subject to them.

21 The question therefore is whether any doctrine precludes in this case the relitigation of the facts upon which the conviction rests.

C. The Common Law Doctrines

22 Much consideration was given in the decisions below to the three related common law doctrines of issue estoppel, abuse of process and collateral attack. Each of these doctrines was considered as a possible means of preventing the union from relitigating the criminal conviction of the grievor before the arbitrator. Although both the Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal concluded that the union could not relitigate the guilt of the grievor as reflected in his criminal conviction, they took different views of the applicability of the different doctrines advanced in support of that conclusion. While the Divisional Court concluded that relitigation was barred by the collateral attack rule, issue estoppel and abuse of process, the Court of Appeal was of the view that none of these doctrines as they presently stand applied to bar the rebuttal. Rather, it relied on a self-standing "finality principle". I think it is useful to disentangle these various rules and doctrines before turning to the applicable one here. I stress at the outset that these common law doctrines are interrelated and in many cases more than one doctrine may support a particular outcome. Even though both issue estoppel and collateral attacks may properly be viewed as particular applications of a broader doctrine of abuse of process, the three are not always entirely interchangeable.

(1) Issue Estoppel

23 Issue estoppel is a branch of res judicata (the other branch being cause of action estoppel), which precludes the relitigation of issues previously decided [page95] in court in another proceeding. For issue estoppel to be successfully invoked, three preconditions must be met: (1) the issue must be the same as the one decided in the prior decision; (2) the prior judicial decision must have been final; and (3) the parties to both proceedings must be the same, or their privies (Danyluk v. Ainsworth Technologies Inc., [2001] 2 S.C.R. 460, 2001 SCC 44, at para. 25, per Binnie J.). The final requirement, known as "mutuality", has been largely abandoned in the United States and has been the subject of much academic and judicial debate there as well as in the United Kingdom and, to some extent, in this country. (See G. D. Watson, "Duplicative Litigation: Issue Estoppel, Abuse of Process and the Death of Mutuality" (1990), 69 Can. Bar Rev. 623, at pp. 648-51.) In light of the different conclusions reached by the courts below on the applicability of issue estoppel, I think it is useful to examine that debate more closely.

24 The first two requirements of issue estoppel are met in this case. The final requirement of mutuality of parties has not been met. In the original criminal case, the lis was between Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada and Glenn Oliver. In the arbitration, the parties were CUPE and the City of Toronto, Oliver's employer. It is unnecessary to decide whether Oliver and CUPE should reasonably be viewed as privies for the purpose of the application of the mutuality requirement since it is clear that the Crown, acting as prosecutor in the criminal case, is not privy with the City of Toronto, nor would it be with a provincial, rather than a municipal, employer (as in the Ontario v. O.P.S.E.U. case, released concurrently).

25 There has been much academic criticism of the mutuality requirement of the doctrine of issue estoppel. In his article, Professor Watson, supra, argues that explicitly abolishing the mutuality requirement, [page96] as has been done in the United States, would both reduce confusion in the law and remove the possibility that a strict application of issue estoppel may work an injustice. The arguments made by him and others (see also D. J. Lange, The Doctrine of Res Judicata in Canada (2000)), urging Canadian courts to abandon the mutuality requirement have been helpful in articulating a principled approach to the bar against relitigation. In my view, however, appropriate guidance is available in our law without the modification to the mutuality requirement that this case would necessitate.

26 In his very useful review of the abandonment of the mutuality requirement in the United States, Professor Watson, at p. 631, points out that mutuality was first relaxed when issue estoppel was used defensively:

The defensive use of non-mutual issue estoppel is straight forward. If P, having litigated an issue with D1 and lost, subsequently sues D2 raising the same issue, D2 can rely defensively on the issue estoppel arising from the former action, unless the first action did not provide a full and fair opportunity to litigate or other factors make it unfair or unwise to permit preclusion. The rationale is that P should not be allowed to relitigate an issue already lost by simply changing defendants

27 Professor Watson then exposes the additional difficulties that arise if the mutuality requirement is removed when issue estoppel is raised offensively, as was done by the United States Supreme Court in Parklane Hosiery Co. v. Shore, 439 U.S. 322 (1979). He describes the offensive use of non mutual issue estoppel as follows (at p. 631):

The power of this offensive non-mutual issue estoppel doctrine is illustrated by single event disaster cases, such as an airline crash. Assume P1 sues Airline for negligence in the operation of the aircraft and in that action Airline is found to have been negligent. Offensive non-mutual issue estoppel permits P2 through P20, etc., now to sue Airline and successfully plead issue estoppel on the question of the airline's negligence. The rationale is that if Airline fully and fairly litigated the issue of its negligence in action #1 it has had its day in court; it has had due [page97] process and it should not be permitted to re-litigate the negligence issue. However, the court in Parklane realized that in order to ensure fairness in the operation of offensive non-mutual issue estoppel the doctrine has to be subject to qualifications.

28 Properly understood, our case could be viewed as falling under this second category -- what would be described in U.S. law as "non-mutual offensive preclusion". Although technically speaking the City of Toronto is not the "plaintiff" in the arbitration proceedings, the City wishes to take advantage of the conviction obtained by the Crown against Oliver in a different, prior proceeding to which the City was not a party. It wishes to preclude Oliver from relitigating an issue that he fought and lost in the criminal forum. U.S. law acknowledges the peculiar difficulties with offensive use of non-mutual estoppel. Professor Watson explains, at pp. 632-33:

First, the court acknowledged that the effects of non-mutuality differ depending on whether issue estoppel is used offensively or defensively. While defensive preclusion helps to reduce litigation offensive preclusion, by contrast, encourages potential plaintiffs not to join in the first action. "Since a plaintiff will be able to rely on a previous judgment against a defendant but will not be bound by that judgment if the defendant wins, the plaintiff has every incentive to adopt a 'wait and see' attitude, in the hope that the first action by another plaintiff will result in a favorable judgment". Thus, without some limit, non-mutual offensive preclusion would increase rather than decrease the total amount of litigation. To meet this problem the Parklane court held that preclusion should be denied in action #2 "where a plaintiff could easily have joined in the earlier action".

Second, the court recognized that in some circumstances to permit non-mutual preclusion "would be unfair to the defendant" and the court referred to specific situations of unfairness: (a) the defendant may have had little incentive to defend vigorously the first action, that [page98] is, if she was sued for small or nominal damages, particularly if future suits were not foreseeable; (b) offensive preclusion may be unfair if the judgment relied upon as a basis for estoppel is itself inconsistent with one or more previous judgments in favour of the defendant; or (c) the second action affords to the defendant procedural opportunities unavailable in the first action that could readily result in a different outcome, that is, where the defendant in the first action was forced to defend in an inconvenient forum and was unable to call witnesses, or where in the first action much more limited discovery was available to the defendant than in the second action.

In the final analysis the court declared that the general rule should be that in cases where a plaintiff could easily have joined in the earlier action or where, either for the reasons discussed or for other reasons, the application of offensive estoppel would be unfair to the defendant, a trial judge should not allow the use of offensive collateral estoppel.

29 It is clear from the above that American non-mutual issue estoppel is not a mechanical, self-applying rule as evidenced by the discretionary elements which may militate against granting the estoppel. What emerges from the American experience with the abandonment of mutuality is a twofold concern: (1) the application of the estoppel must be sufficiently principled and predictable to promote efficiency; and (2) it must contain sufficient flexibility to prevent unfairness. In my view, this is what the doctrine of abuse of process offers, particularly, as here, where the issue involves a conviction in a criminal court for a serious crime. In a case such as this one, the true concerns are not primarily related to mutuality. The true concerns, well reflected in the reasons of the Court of Appeal, are with the integrity and the coherence of the administration of justice. This will often be the case when the estoppel originates from a finding made in a criminal case where many of the traditional concerns related to mutuality lose their significance.

30 For example, there is little relevance to the concern about the "wait and see" plaintiff, the "free [page99] rider" who will deliberately avoid the risk of joining the original litigation, but will later come forward to reap the benefits of the victory obtained by the party who should have been his co-plaintiff. No such concern can ever arise when the original action is in a criminal prosecution. Victims cannot, even if they wanted to, "join in" the prosecution so as to have their civil claim against the accused disposed of in a single trial. Nor can employers "join in" the criminal prosecution to have their employee dismissed for cause.

31 On the other hand, even though no one can join the prosecution, the prosecutor as a party represents the public interest. He or she represents a collective interest in the just and correct outcome of the case. The prosecutor is said to be a minister of justice who has nothing to win or lose from the outcome of the case but who must ensure that a just and true verdict is rendered. (See Law Society of Upper Canada, Rules of Professional Conduct (2000), Commentary Rule 4.01(3), at p. 61; R. v. Regan, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 297, 2002 SCC 12; Lemay v. The King, [1952] 1 S.C.R. 232, at pp. 256-57, per Cartwright J.; and R. v. Banks, [1916] 2 K.B. 621 (C.C.A.), at p. 623.) The mutuality requirement of the doctrine of issue estoppel, which insists that only the Crown and its privies be precluded from relitigating the guilt of the accused, is hardly reflective of the true role of the prosecutor.

32 As the present case illustrates, the primary concerns here are about the integrity of the criminal process and the increased authority of a criminal verdict, rather than some of the more traditional issue estoppel concerns that focus on the interests of the parties, such as costs and multiple "vexation". For these reasons, I see no need to reverse or relax the long-standing application of the mutuality requirement in this case and I would conclude that issue estoppel has no application. I now turn to the question of whether the decision of the [page100] arbitrator amounted to a collateral attack on the verdict of the criminal court.

(2) Collateral Attack

33 The rule against collateral attack bars actions to overturn convictions when those actions take place in the wrong forum. As stated in Wilson v. The Queen, [1983] 2 S.C.R. 594, at p. 599, the rule against collateral attack has long been a fundamental rule that a court order, made by a court having jurisdiction to make it, stands and is binding and conclusive unless it is set aside on appeal or lawfully quashed. It is also well settled in the authorities that such an order may not be attacked collaterally -- and a collateral attack may be described as an attack made in proceedings other than those whose specific object is the reversal, variation, or nullification of the order or judgment.

Thus, in Wilson, supra, the Court held that an inferior court judge was without jurisdiction to pass on the validity of a writ of habeas corpus authorized by a superior court. Other cases that form the basis for this rule similarly involve attempts to overturn decisions in other fora, and not simply to relitigate their facts. In R. v. Sarson, [1996] 2 S.C.R. 223, at para. 35, this Court held that a prisoner's habeas corpus attack on a conviction under a law later declared unconstitutional must fail under the rule against collateral attack because the prisoner was no longer "in the system" and because he was "in custody pursuant to the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction". Similarly, in R. v. Consolidated Maybrun Mines Ltd., [1998] 1 S.C.R. 706, this Court held that a mine owner who had chosen to ignore an administrative appeals process for a pollution fine was barred from contesting the validity of that fine in court because the legislation directed appeals to an appellate administrative body, not to the courts. Binnie J. described the rule against collateral attack in Danyluk, supra, at para. 20, as follows: "that a judicial order pronounced by a court of competent jurisdiction should not be brought into question in [page101] subsequent proceedings except those provided by law for the express purpose of attacking it" (emphasis added).

34 Each of these cases concerns the appropriate forum for collateral attacks upon the judgment itself. However, in the case at bar, the union does not seek to overturn the sexual abuse conviction itself, but simply contest, for the purposes of a different claim with different legal consequences, whether the conviction was correct. It is an implicit attack on the correctness of the factual basis of the decision, not a contest about whether that decision has legal force, as clearly it does. Prohibited "collateral attacks" are abuses of the court's process. However, in light of the focus of the collateral attack rule on attacking the order itself and its legal effect, I believe that the better approach here is to go directly to the doctrine of abuse of process.

(3) Abuse of Process

35 Judges have an inherent and residual discretion to prevent an abuse of the court's process. This concept of abuse of process was described at common law as proceedings "unfair to the point that they are contrary to the interest of justice" (R. v. Power, [1994] 1 S.C.R. 601, at p. 616), and as "oppressive treatment" (R. v. Conway, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1659, at p. 1667). McLachlin J. (as she then was) expressed it this way in R. v. Scott, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 979, at p. 1007:

... abuse of process may be established where: (1) the proceedings are oppressive or vexatious; and, (2) violate the fundamental principles of justice underlying the community's sense of fair play and decency. The concepts of [page102] oppressiveness and vexatiousness underline the interest of the accused in a fair trial. But the doctrine evokes as well the public interest in a fair and just trial process and the proper administration of justice.

36 The doctrine of abuse of process is used in a variety of legal contexts. The unfair or oppressive treatment of an accused may disentitle the Crown to carry on with the prosecution of a charge: Conway, supra, at p. 1667. In Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), [2000] 2 S.C.R. 307, 2000 SCC 44, this Court held that unreasonable delay causing serious prejudice could amount to an abuse of process. When the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms applies, the common law doctrine of abuse of process is subsumed into the principles of the Charter such that there is often overlap between abuse of process and constitutional remedies (R. v. O'Connor, [1995] 4 S.C.R. 411). The doctrine nonetheless continues to have application as a non-Charter remedy: United States of America v. Shulman, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 616, 2001 SCC 21, at para. 33.

37 In the context that interests us here, the doctrine of abuse of process engages "the inherent power of the court to prevent the misuse of its procedure, in a way that would ... bring the administration of justice into disrepute" (Canam Enterprises Inc. v. Coles (2000), 51 O.R. (3d) 481 (C.A.), at para. 55, per Goudge J.A., dissenting

(approved [2002] 3 S.C.R. 307, 2002 SCC 63)). Goudge J.A. expanded on that concept in the following terms at paras. 55-56:

The doctrine of abuse of process engages the inherent power of the court to prevent the misuse of its procedure, in a way that would be manifestly unfair to a party to the litigation before it or would in some other way bring the administration of justice into disrepute. It is a flexible doctrine unencumbered by the specific requirements of concepts such as issue estoppel. See House of Spring Gardens Ltd. v. Waite, [1990] 3 W.L.R. 347 at p. 358, [1990] 2 All E.R. 990 (C.A.).

One circumstance in which abuse of process has been applied is where the litigation before the court is found to be in essence an attempt to relitigate a claim which the court has already determined. [Emphasis added.]

As Goudge J.A.'s comments indicate, Canadian courts have applied the doctrine of abuse of process to preclude relitigation in circumstances where the strict requirements of issue estoppel (typically the privity/mutuality requirements) are not met, but where allowing the litigation to proceed would nonetheless violate such principles as judicial economy, consistency, finality and the integrity of the administration of justice. (See, for example, Franco v. White (2001), 53 O.R. (3d) 391 (C.A.); Bomac Construction Ltd. v. Stevenson, [1986] 5 W.W.R. 21 (Sask. C.A.); and Bjarnarson v. Government of Manitoba (1987), 38 D.L.R. (4th) 32 (Man. Q.B.), aff'd (1987), 21 C.P.C. (2d) 302 (Man. C.A.).) This has resulted in some criticism, on the ground that the doctrine of abuse of process by relitigation is in effect non-mutual issue estoppel by another name without the important qualifications recognized by the American courts as part and parcel of the general doctrine of non-mutual issue estoppel (Watson, supra, at pp. 624-25).

38 It is true that the doctrine of abuse of process has been extended beyond the strict parameters of res judicata while borrowing much of its rationales and some of its constraints. It is said to be more of an adjunct doctrine, defined in reaction to the settled rules of issue estoppel and cause of action estoppel, than an independent one (Lange, supra, at p. 344). The policy grounds supporting abuse of process by relitigation are the same as the essential policy grounds supporting issue estoppel (Lange, supra, at pp. 347-48):

The two policy grounds, namely, that there be an end to litigation and that no one should be twice vexed by the same cause, have been cited as policies in the application [page104] of abuse of process by relitigation. Other policy grounds have also been cited, namely, to preserve the courts' and the litigants' resources, to uphold the integrity of the legal system in order to avoid inconsistent results, and to protect the principle of finality so crucial to the proper administration of justice.

39 The locus classicus for the modern doctrine of abuse of process and its relationship to res judicata is Hunter, supra, aff'g McIlkenny v. Chief Constable of the West Midlands, [1980] Q.B. 283 (C.A.). The case involved an action for damages for personal injuries brought by the six men convicted of bombing two pubs in Birmingham. They claimed that they had been beaten by the police during their interrogation. The plaintiffs had raised the same issue at their criminal trial, where it was found by both the judge and jury that the confessions were voluntary and that the police had not used violence. At the Court of Appeal, Lord Denning, M.R., endorsed non-mutual issue estoppel and held that the question of whether any beatings had taken place was estopped by the earlier determination, although it was raised here against a different opponent. He noted that in analogous cases, courts had sometimes refused to allow a party to raise an issue for a second time because it was an "abuse of the process of the court", but held that the proper characterization of the matter was through non-mutual issue estoppel.

40 On appeal to the House of Lords, Lord Denning's attempt to reform the law of issue estoppel was overruled, but the higher court reached the same result via the doctrine of abuse of process. Lord Diplock stated, at p. 541:

The abuse of process which the instant case exemplifies is the initiation of proceedings in a court of justice for the purpose of mounting a collateral attack upon a final decision against the intending plaintiff which has been made by another court of competent jurisdiction in [page105] previous proceedings in which the intending plaintiff had a full opportunity of contesting the decision in the court by which it was made.

41 It is important to note that a public inquiry after the civil action of the six accused in Hunter, supra, resulted in the finding that the confessions of the Birmingham six had been extracted through police brutality (see R. v. McIlkenny (1991), 93 Cr. App. R. 287 (C.A.), at pp. 304 et seq.). In my view, this does not support a relaxation of the existing procedural mechanisms designed to ensure finality in criminal proceedings. The danger of wrongful convictions has been acknowledged by this Court and other courts (see United States v. Burns, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 283, 2001 SCC 7, at para. 1; and R. v. Bromley (2001), 151 C.C.C. (3d) 480 (Nfld. C.A.), at pp. 517-18). Although safeguards must be put in place for the protection of the innocent, and, more generally, to ensure the trustworthiness of court findings, continuous re-litigation is not a guarantee of factual accuracy.

42 The attraction of the doctrine of abuse of process is that it is unencumbered by the specific requirements of res judicata while offering the discretion to prevent relitigation, essentially for the purpose of preserving the integrity of the court's process. (See Doherty J.A.'s reasons, at para. 65; see also Demeter (H.C.), supra, at p. 264, and Hunter, supra, at p. 536.)

43 Critics of that approach have argued that when abuse of process is used as a proxy for issue estoppel, it obscures the true question while adding nothing but a vague sense of discretion. I disagree. At least in the context before us, namely, an attempt to relitigate a criminal conviction, I believe that abuse of process is a doctrine much more responsive to the real concerns at play. In all of its applications, the primary focus of the doctrine of abuse of process is the integrity of the adjudicative functions of courts. Whether it serves to disentitle the Crown from proceeding because of undue delays (see Blencoe, supra), or whether it prevents a civil party from using the courts for an improper purpose (see Hunter, supra, and Demeter, supra), the focus is less [page106] on the interest of parties and more on the integrity of judicial decision making as a branch of the administration of justice. In a case such as the present one, it is that concern that compels a bar against relitigation, more than any sense of unfairness to a party being called twice to put its case forward, for example. When that is understood, the parameters of the doctrine become easier to define, and the exercise of discretion is better anchored in principle.

44 The adjudicative process, and the importance of preserving its integrity, were well described by Doherty J.A. He said, at para. 74:

The adjudicative process in its various manifestations strives to do justice. By the adjudicative process, I mean the various courts and tribunals to which individuals must resort to settle legal disputes. Where the same issues arise in various forums, the quality of justice delivered by the adjudicative process is measured not by reference to the isolated result in each forum, but by the end result produced by the various processes that address the issue. By justice, I refer to procedural fairness, the achieving of the correct result in individual cases and the broader perception that the process as a whole achieves results which are consistent, fair and accurate.

45 When asked to decide whether a criminal conviction, prima facie admissible in a proceeding under s. 22.1 of the Ontario Evidence Act, ought to be rebutted or taken as conclusive, courts will turn to the doctrine of abuse of process to ascertain whether relitigation would be detrimental to the adjudicative process as defined above. When the focus is thus properly on the integrity of the adjudicative process, the motive of the party who seeks to relitigate, or whether he or she wishes to do so as a defendant rather than as a plaintiff, cannot be decisive factors in the application of the bar against relitigation.

46 Thus, in the case at bar, it matters little whether Oliver's motive for relitigation was primarily to [page107] secure re-employment, rather than to challenge his criminal conviction in an attempt to undermine its validity. Reliance on Hunter, supra, and on Demeter (H.C.), supra, for the purpose of enhancing the importance of motive is misplaced. It is true that in both cases the parties wishing to relitigate had made it clear that they were seeking to impeach their earlier convictions. But this is of little significance in the application of the doctrine of abuse of process. A desire to attack a judicial finding is not in itself an improper purpose. The law permits that objective to be pursued through various reviewing mechanisms such as appeals or judicial review. Indeed reviewability is an important aspect of finality. A decision is final and binding on the parties only when all available reviews have been exhausted or abandoned. What is improper is to attempt to impeach a judicial finding by the impermissible route of relitigation in a different forum. Therefore, motive is of little or no import.

47 There is also no reason to constrain the doctrine of abuse of process only to those cases where the plaintiff has initiated the relitigation. The designation of the parties to the second litigation may mask the reality of the situation. In the present case, for instance, aside from the technical mechanism of the grievance procedures, who should be viewed as the initiator of the employment litigation between the grievor, Oliver, and his union on the one hand, and the City of Toronto on the other? Technically, the union is the "plaintiff" in the arbitration procedure. But the City of Toronto used Oliver's criminal conviction as a basis for his dismissal. I cannot see what difference it makes, again from the point of view of the integrity of the adjudicative process, whether Oliver is labelled a plaintiff or a defendant when it comes to relitigating his criminal conviction.

48 The appellant relies on Re Del Core, supra, to suggest that the abuse of process doctrine only applies to plaintiffs. Re Del Core, however, provided no majority opinion as to whether and when public policy would preclude relitigation of issues [page108] determined in a criminal proceeding. For one, Blair J.A. did not limit the circumstances in which relitigation would amount to an abuse of process to those cases in which a person convicted sought to relitigate the validity of his conviction in subsequent proceedings which he himself had instituted (at p. 22):

The right to challenge a conviction is subject to an important qualification. A convicted person cannot attempt to prove that the conviction was wrong in circumstances where it would constitute an abuse of process to do so... Courts have rejected attempts to relitigate the very issues dealt with at a criminal trial where the civil proceedings were perceived to be a collateral attack on the criminal conviction. The ambit of this qualification remains to be determined ... [Emphasis added.]

49 While the authorities most often cited in support of a court's power to prevent relitigation of decided issues in circumstances where issue estoppel does not apply are cases where a convicted person commenced a civil proceeding for the purpose of attacking a finding made in a criminal proceeding against that person (namely Demeter (H.C.), supra, and Hunter, supra; see also Q. v. Minto Management Ltd. (1984), 46 O.R. (2d) 756 (H.C.), Franco, supra, at paras. 29-31), there is no reason in principle why these rules should be limited to such specific circumstances. Several cases have applied the doctrine of abuse of process to preclude defendants from relitigating issues decided against them in a prior proceeding. See for example Nigro v. Agnew-Surpass Shoe Stores Ltd. (1977), 18 O.R. (2d) 215 (H.C.), at p. 218, aff'd without reference to this point (1978), 18 O.R. (2d) 714 (C.A.); Bomac, supra, at pp. 26-27; Bjarnarson, supra, at p. 39; Germisheid v. Valois (1989), 68 O.R. (2d) 670 (H.C.); Simpson v. Geswein (1995), 25 C.C.L.T. (2d) 49 (Man. Q.B.), at p. 61; Roenisch v. Roenisch (1991), 85 D.L.R. (4th) 540 (Alta. Q.B.), at p. 546; Saskatoon Credit Union, Ltd. v. Central Park Enterprises Ltd. (1988), 47 D.L.R. (4th) 431 (B.C.S.C.), at p. 438; Canadian Tire Corp. v. Summers (1995), 23 O.R. (3d) 106 (Gen. Div.), at p. 115; see also [page109] P. M. Perell, "Res Judicata and Abuse of Process" (2001), 24 Advocates' Q. 189, at pp. 196-97; and Watson, supra, at pp. 648-51.

50 It has been argued that it is difficult to see how mounting a defence can be an abuse of process (see M. Teplitsky, "Prior Criminal Convictions: Are They Conclusive Proof? An Arbitrator's Perspective", in K. Whitaker et al., eds., Labour Arbitration Yearbook 2001-2002 (2002), vol. I, 279). A common justification for the doctrine of res judicata is that a party should not be twice vexed in the same cause, that is, the party should not be burdened with having to relitigate the same issue (Watson, supra, at p. 633). Of course, a defendant may be quite pleased to have another opportunity to litigate an issue originally decided against him. A proper focus on the process, rather than on the interests of a party, will reveal why relitigation should not be permitted in such a case.

51 Rather than focus on the motive or status of the parties, the doctrine of abuse of process concentrates on the integrity of the adjudicative process. Three preliminary observations are useful in that respect. First, there can be no assumption that relitigation will yield a more accurate result than the original proceeding. Second, if the same result is reached in the subsequent proceeding, the relitigation will prove to have been a waste of judicial resources as well as an unnecessary expense for the parties and possibly an additional hardship for some witnesses. Finally, if the result in the subsequent proceeding is different from the conclusion reached in the first on the very same issue, the inconsistency, in and of itself, will undermine the credibility of the entire judicial process, thereby diminishing its authority, its credibility and its aim of finality.

52 In contrast, proper review by way of appeal increases confidence in the ultimate result and affirms both the authority of the process as well as the finality of the result. It is therefore apparent that [page110] from the system's point of view, relitigation carries serious detrimental effects and should be avoided unless the circumstances dictate that relitigation is in fact necessary to enhance the credibility and the effectiveness of the adjudicative process as a whole. There may be instances where relitigation will enhance, rather than impeach, the integrity of the judicial system, for example: (1) when the first proceeding is tainted by fraud or dishonesty; (2) when fresh, new evidence, previously unavailable, conclusively impeaches the original results; or (3) when fairness dictates that the original result should not be binding in the new context. This was stated unequivocally by this Court in Danyluk, supra, at para. 80.

53 The discretionary factors that apply to prevent the doctrine of issue estoppel from operating in an unjust or unfair way are equally available to prevent the doctrine of abuse of process from achieving a similar undesirable result. There are many circumstances in which the bar against relitigation, either through the doctrine of res judicata or that of abuse of process, would create unfairness. If, for instance, the stakes in the original proceeding were too minor to generate a full and robust response, while the subsequent stakes were considerable, fairness would dictate that the administration of justice would be better served by permitting the second proceeding to go forward than by insisting that finality should prevail. An inadequate incentive to defend, the discovery of new evidence in appropriate circumstances, or a tainted original process may all overcome the interest in maintaining the finality of the original decision (Danyluk, supra, at para. 51; Franco, supra, at para. 55).

54 These considerations are particularly apposite when the attempt is to relitigate a criminal conviction. Casting doubt over the validity of a criminal conviction is a very serious matter. Inevitably in a case such as this one, the conclusion of the arbitrator has precisely that effect, whether this was intended [page111] or not. The administration of justice must equip itself with all legitimate means to prevent wrongful convictions and to address any real possibility of such an occurrence after the fact. Collateral attacks and relitigation, however, are not in my view appropriate methods of redress since they inordinately tax the adjudicative process while doing nothing to ensure a more trustworthy result.

55 In light of the above, it is apparent that the common law doctrines of issue estoppel, collateral attack and abuse of process adequately capture the concerns that arise when finality in litigation must be balanced against fairness to a particular litigant. There is therefore no need to endorse, as the Court of Appeal did, a self-standing and independent "finality principle" either as a separate doctrine or as an independent test to preclude relitigation.

D. Application of Abuse of Process to Facts of the Appeal

56 I am of the view that the facts in this appeal point to the blatant abuse of process that results when relitigation of this sort is permitted. The grievor was convicted in a criminal court and he exhausted all his avenues of appeal. In law, his conviction must stand, with all its consequent legal effects. Yet as pointed out by Doherty J.A. (at para. 84):

Despite the arbitrator's insistence that he was not passing on the correctness of the decision made by Ferguson J., that is exactly what he did. One cannot read the arbitrator's reasons without coming to the conclusion that he was convinced that the criminal proceedings were badly flawed and that Oliver was wrongly convicted. This conclusion, reached in proceedings to which the prosecution was not even a party, could only undermine the integrity of the criminal justice system. The reasonable observer would wonder how Oliver could be found guilty beyond a reasonable doubt in one proceeding and after the Court of Appeal had affirmed that finding, be found in a separate proceeding not to have committed the very same assault. That reasonable observer would also not understand how Oliver could be found to be properly convicted of [page112] sexually assaulting the complainant and deserving of 15 months in jail and yet also be found in a separate proceeding not to have committed that sexual assault and to be deserving of reinstatement in a job which would place young persons like the complainant under his charge.

57 As a result of the conflicting decisions, the City of Toronto would find itself in the inevitable position of having a convicted sex offender reinstated to an employment position where he would work with the very vulnerable young people he was convicted of assaulting. An educated and reasonable public would presumably have to assess the likely correctness of one or the other of the adjudicative findings regarding the guilt of the convicted grievor. The authority and finality of judicial decisions are designed precisely to eliminate the need for such an exercise.

58 In addition, the arbitrator is considerably less well equipped than a judge presiding over a criminal court -- or the jury --, guided by rules of evidence that are sensitive to a fair search for the truth, an exacting standard of proof and expertise with the very questions in issue, to come to a correct disposition of the matter. Yet the arbitrator's conclusions, if challenged, may give rise to a less searching standard of review than that of the criminal court judge. In short, there is nothing in a case like the present one that militates against the application of the doctrine of abuse of process to bar the relitigation of the grievor's criminal conviction. The arbitrator was required as a matter of law to give full effect to the conviction. As a result of that error of law, the arbitrator reached a patently unreasonable conclusion. Properly understood in the light of correct legal principles, the evidence before the arbitrator could only lead him to conclude that the City of Toronto had established just cause for Oliver's dismissal.

VI. Disposition

59 For these reasons, I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

LeBEL J.

I. Introduction

60 I have had the benefit of reading Arbour J.'s reasons and I concur with her disposition of the case. I agree that this case is appropriately decided on the basis of the doctrine of abuse of process, rather than the narrower and more technical doctrines of either collateral attack or issue estoppel. I also agree that the appropriate standard of review for the question of whether a criminal conviction may be relitigated in a grievance proceeding is correctness. This is a question of law requiring an arbitrator to interpret not only the Labour Relations Act, 1995, S.O. 1995, c. 1, Sch. A, but also the Evidence Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. E.23, as well as to rule on the applicability of a number of common law doctrines dealing with relitigation, an issue that is, as Arbour J. notes, at the heart of the administration of justice. Finally, I agree that the arbitrator's determination in this case that Glenn Oliver's criminal conviction could indeed be relitigated during the grievance proceeding was incorrect. As a matter of law, the arbitrator was required to give full effect to Oliver's conviction. His failure to do so was sufficient to render his ultimate decision that Oliver had been dismissed without just cause -- a decision squarely within the arbitrator's area of specialized expertise and thus reviewable on a deferential standard -- patently unreasonable, according to the jurisprudence of our Court.

61 While I agree with Arbour J.'s disposition of the appeal, I am of the view that the administrative law aspects of this case require further discussion. In my concurring reasons in Chamberlain v. Surrey School District No. 36, [2002] 4 S.C.R. 710, [page114] 2002 SCC 86, I raised concerns about the appropriateness of treating the pragmatic and functional methodology as an overarching analytical framework for substantive judicial review that must be applied, without variation, in all administrative law contexts, including those involving non-adjudicative decision makers. In certain circumstances, such as those at issue in Chamberlain itself, applying this methodological approach in order to determine the appropriate standard of review may in fact obscure the real issue before the reviewing court.

62 In the instant appeal and the appeal in Ontario v. O.P.S.E.U., [2003] 3 S.C.R. 149, 2003 SCC 64, released concurrently, both of which involve judicial review of adjudicative decision makers, my concern is not with the applicability of the pragmatic and functional approach itself. Having said this, I would note that in a case such as this one, where the question at issue is so clearly a question of law that is both of central importance to the legal system as a whole and outside the adjudicator's specialized area of expertise, it is unnecessary for the reviewing court to perform a detailed pragmatic and functional analysis in order to reach a standard of review of correctness. Indeed, in such circumstances reviewing courts should avoid adopting a mechanistic approach to the determination of the appropriate standard of review, which risks reducing the pragmatic and functional analysis from a contextual, flexible framework to little more than a pro forma application of a checklist of factors (see C.U.P.E. v. Ontario (Minister of Labour), [2003] 1 S.C.R. 539, 2003 SCC 29, at para. 149; Dr. Q v. College of Physicians and Surgeons of British Columbia, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 226, 2003 SCC 19, at para. 26; Chamberlain, supra, at para. 195, per LeBel J.).

63 The more particular concern that emerges out of this case and Ontario v. O.P.S.E.U. relates to what in my view is growing criticism with the ways in which the standards of review currently available within the [page115] pragmatic and functional framework are conceived of and applied. Academic commentators and practitioners have raised some serious questions as to whether the conceptual basis for each of the existing standards has been delineated with sufficient clarity by this Court, with much of the criticism directed at what has been described as "epistemological" confusion over the relationship between patent unreasonableness and reasonableness simpliciter (see, for example, D. J. Mullan, "Recent Developments in Standard of Review", in Canadian Bar Association (Ontario), Taking the Tribunal to Court: A Practical Guide for Administrative Law Practitioners (2000), at p. 26; J. G. Cowan, "The Standard of Review: The Common Sense Evolution?", paper presented to the Administrative Law Section Meeting, Ontario Bar Association, January 21, 2003, at p. 28; F. A. V. Falzon, "Standard of Review on Judicial Review or Appeal", in Administrative Justice Review Background Papers: Background Papers prepared by Administrative Justice Project for the Attorney General of British Columbia (2002), at pp. 32-33). Reviewing courts too, have occasionally expressed frustration over a perceived lack of clarity in this area, as the comments of Barry J. in Miller v. Workers' Compensation Commission (Nfld.) (1997), 154 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 52 (Nfld. S.C.T.D.), at para. 27, illustrate:

In attempting to follow the court's distinctions between "patently unreasonable", "reasonable" and "correct", one feels at times as though one is watching a juggler juggle three transparent objects. Depending on the way the light falls, sometimes one thinks one can see the objects. Other times one cannot and, indeed, wonders whether there are really three distinct objects there at all.

64 The Court cannot remain unresponsive to sustained concerns or criticism coming from the legal community in relation to the state of Canadian jurisprudence in this important part of the law. It is true that the parties to this appeal made no submissions putting into question the standards of review jurisprudence. Nevertheless, at times, an in-depth discussion or review of the state of the law may become necessary despite the absence of particular [page116] representations in a specific case. Given its broad application, the law governing the standards of review must be predictable, workable and coherent. Parties to litigation often have no personal stake in assuring the coherence of our standards of review jurisprudence as a whole and the consistency of their application. Their purpose, understandably, is to show how the positions they advance conform with the law as it stands, rather than to suggest improvements of that law for the benefit of the common good. The task of maintaining a predictable, workable and coherent jurisprudence falls primarily on the judiciary, preferably with, but exceptionally without, the benefit of counsel. I would add that, although the parties made no submissions on the analysis that I propose to undertake in these reasons, they will not be prejudiced by it.

65 In this context, this case provides an opportunity to reevaluate the contours of the various standards of review, a process that in my view is particularly important with respect to patent unreasonableness. To this end, I review below:

- the interplay between correctness and patent unreasonableness both in the instant case and, more broadly, in the context of judicial review of adjudicative decision makers generally, with a view to elucidating the conflicted relationship between these two standards; and,
- the distinction between patent unreasonableness and reasonableness simpliciter, which, despite a number of attempts at clarification, remains a nebulous one.

66 As the analysis that follows indicates, the patent unreasonableness standard does not currently provide sufficiently clear parameters for reviewing courts to apply in assessing the decisions of administrative adjudicators. From the beginning, patent unreasonableness at times shaded uncomfortably into what should presumably be its antithesis, the correctness review. Moreover, it is increasingly difficult to distinguish from what is ostensibly its less [page117] deferential counterpart, reasonableness simpliciter. It remains to be seen how these difficulties can be addressed.

II. Analysis

A. The Two Standards of Review Applicable in This Case

67 Two standards of review are at issue in this case, and the use of correctness here requires some preliminary discussion. As I noted in brief above, certain fundamental legal questions -- for instance, constitutional and human rights questions and those involving civil liberties, as well as other questions that are of central importance to the legal system as a whole, such as the issue of relitigation -- typically fall to be decided on a correctness standard. Indeed, in my view, it will rarely be necessary for reviewing courts to embark on a comprehensive application of the pragmatic and functional approach in order to reach this conclusion. I would not, however, want either my comments in this regard or the majority reasons in this case to be taken as authority for the proposition that correctness is the appropriate standard whenever arbitrators or other specialized administrative adjudicators are required to interpret and apply general common law or civil law rules. Such an approach would constitute a broad expansion of judicial review under a standard of correctness and would significantly impede the ability of administrative adjudicators, particularly in complex and highly specialized fields such as labour law, to develop original solutions to legal problems, uniquely suited to the context in which they operate. In my opinion, in many instances the appropriate standard of review in respect of the application of general common or civil law rules by specialized adjudicators should not be one of correctness, but rather of reasonableness. I now turn to a brief discussion of the rationale behind this view.

(1) The Correctness Standard of Review

68 This Court has repeatedly stressed the importance of judicial deference in the context of labour law. Labour relations statutes typically bestow broad powers on arbitrators and labour boards to resolve the wide range of problems that may arise in this field and protect the decisions of these adjudicators by privative clauses. Such legislative choices reflect the fact that, as Cory J. noted in Toronto (City) Board of Education v. O.S.S.T.F., District 15, [1997] 1 S.C.R. 487, at para. 35, the field of labour relations is "sensitive and volatile" and "[i]t is essential that there be a means of providing speedy decisions by experts in the field who are sensitive to the situation, and which can be considered by both sides to be final and binding" (see also Canada (Attorney General) v. Public Service Alliance of Canada, [1993] 1 S.C.R. 941 ("PSAC"), at pp. 960-61; and Ivanhoe inc. v. UFCW, Local 500, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 565, 2001 SCC 47, at para. 32). The application of a standard of review of correctness in the context of judicial review of labour adjudication is thus rare.

69 While in this case and in Ontario v. O.P.S.E.U. I agree that correctness is the appropriate standard of review for the arbitrator's decision on the relitigation question, I think it necessary to sound a number of notes of caution in this regard. It is important to stress, first, that while the arbitrator was required to be correct on this question of law, this did not open his decision as a whole to review on a correctness standard (see Canadian Broadcasting Corp. v. Canada (Labour Relations Board), [1995] 1 S.C.R. 157, at para. 48). The arbitrator was entitled to deference in the determination of whether Oliver was dismissed without just cause. To say that, in the circumstances of this case, the arbitrator's incorrect decision on the question of law affected the overall reasonableness of his decision, is very different from saying that the arbitrator's finding on the ultimate [page119] question of just cause had to be correct. To fail to make this distinction would be to risk "substantially expand[ing] the scope of reviewability of administrative decisions, and unjustifiably so" (see Canadian Broadcasting Corp., supra, at para. 48).

70 Second, it bears repeating that the application of correctness here is very much a product of the nature of this particular legal question: determining whether relitigating an employee's criminal conviction is permissible in an arbitration proceeding is a question of law involving the interpretation of the arbitrator's constitutive statute, an external statute, and a complex body of common law rules and conflicting jurisprudence. More than this, it is a question of fundamental importance and broad applicability, with serious implications for the administration of justice as a whole. It is, in other words, a question that engages the expertise and essential role of the courts. It is not a question on which arbitrators may be said to enjoy any degree of relative institutional competence or expertise. As a result, it is a question on which the arbitrator must be correct.

71 This Court has been very careful to note, however, that not all questions of law must be reviewed under a standard of correctness. As a prefatory matter, as the Court has observed, in many cases it will be difficult to draw a clear line between questions of fact, mixed fact and law, and law; in reality, such questions are often inextricably intertwined (see Pushpanathan v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 982, at para. 37; Canada (Director of Investigation and Research) v. Southam Inc., [1997] 1 S.C.R. 748, at para. 37). More to the point, as Bastarache J. stated in Pushpanathan, supra, "even pure questions of law may be granted a wide degree of deference where other factors of the pragmatic and functional analysis suggest that such deference is the legislative intention" [page120] (para. 37). The critical factor in this respect is expertise.

72 As Bastarache J. noted in Pushpanathan, supra, at para. 34, once a "broad relative expertise has been established", this Court has been prepared to show "considerable deference even in cases of highly generalized statutory interpretation where the instrument being interpreted is the tribunal's constituent legislation": see, for example, Pezim v. British Columbia (Superintendent of Brokers), [1994] 2 S.C.R. 557, and National Corn Growers Assn. v. Canada (Import Tribunal), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1324. This Court has also held that, while administrative adjudicators' interpretations of external statutes "are generally reviewable on a correctness standard", an exception to this general rule may occur, and deference may be appropriate, where "the external statute is intimately connected with the mandate of the tribunal and is encountered frequently as a result": see Toronto (City) Board of Education, supra, at para. 39; Canadian Broadcasting Corp., supra, at para. 48. And, perhaps most importantly in light of the issues raised by this case, the Court has held that deference may be warranted where an administrative adjudicator has acquired expertise through its experience in the application of a general common or civil law rule in its specialized statutory context: see Ivanhoe, supra, at para. 26; L'Heureux-Dubé J. (dissenting) in Canada (Attorney General) v. Mossop, [1993] 1 S.C.R. 554, at pp. 599-600, endorsed in Pushpanathan, supra, at para. 37.

73 In the field of labour relations, general common and civil law questions are often closely intertwined with the more specific questions of labour law. Resolving general legal questions may thus be an important component of the work of some administrative adjudicators in this field. To subject all such decisions to correctness review would be to expand the scope of judicial review considerably beyond what the legislature intended, fundamentally undermining the ability of labour adjudicators to develop [page121] a body of jurisprudence that is tailored to the specialized context in which they operate.

74 Where an administrative adjudicator must decide a general question of law in the course of exercising its statutory mandate, that determination will typically be entitled to deference (particularly if the adjudicator's decisions are protected by a privative clause), inasmuch as the general question of law is closely connected to the adjudicator's core area of expertise. This was essentially the holding of this Court in Ivanhoe, supra. In Ivanhoe, after noting the presence of a privative clause, Arbour J. held that, while the question at issue involved both civil and labour law, the labour commissioners and the Labour Court were entitled to deference because "they have developed special expertise in this regard which is adapted to the specific context of labour relations and which is not shared by the courts" (para. 26; see also Pasiechnyk v. Saskatchewan (Workers' Compensation Board), [1997] 2 S.C.R. 890). This appeal does not represent a departure from this general principle.

75 The final note of caution that I think must be sounded here relates to the application of two standards of review in this case. This Court has recognized on a number of occasions that it may, in certain circumstances, be appropriate to apply different standards of deference to different decisions taken by an administrative adjudicator in a single case (see Pushpanathan, supra, at para. 49; Macdonell v. Quebec (Commission d'accès à l'information), [2002] 3 S.C.R. 661, 2002 SCC 71, at para. 58, per Bastarache and LeBel JJ., dissenting). This case provides an example of one type of situation where this may be the proper approach. It involves a fundamental legal question falling outside the arbitrator's area of expertise. This legal question, though foundational to the decision as a whole, is easily differentiated from a second question on which the arbitrator was entitled to deference: the determination of whether there was just cause for Oliver's dismissal.

76 However, as I have noted above, the fact that the question adjudicated by the arbitrator in this case can [page122] be separated into two distinct issues, one of which is reviewable on a correctness standard, should not be taken to mean that this will often be the case. Such cases are rare; the various strands that go into a decision are more likely to be inextricably intertwined, particularly in a complex field such as labour relations, such that the reviewing court should view the adjudicator's decision as an integrated whole.

(2) The Patent Unreasonableness Standard of Review

77 In these reasons, I explore the way in which patent unreasonableness is currently functioning, having regard to the relationships between this standard and both correctness and reasonableness simpliciter. My comments in this respect are intended to have application in the context of judicial review of adjudicative administrative decision making.

(a) The Definitions of Patent Unreasonableness

78 This Court has set out a number of definitions of "patent unreasonableness", each of which is intended to indicate the high degree of deference inherent in this standard of review. There is some overlap between the definitions and they are often used in combination. I would characterize the two main definitional strands as, first, those that emphasize the magnitude of the defect necessary to render a decision patently unreasonable and, second, those that focus on the "immediacy or obviousness" of the defect, and thus the relative invasiveness of the review necessary to find it.

79 In considering the leading definitions, I would place in the first category Dickson J.'s (as he then was) statement in Canadian Union of Public Employees, Local 963 v. New Brunswick Liquor Corp., [1979] 2 S.C.R. 227 ("CUPE"), that a decision will only be patently unreasonable if it "cannot be rationally supported by the relevant legislation" (p. 237). Cory J.'s characterization in PSAC, supra, of patent unreasonableness as a "very strict test", [page123] which will only be met where a decision is "clearly irrational, that is to say evidently not in accordance with reason" (pp. 963-64), would also fit into this category (though it could, depending on how it is read, be placed in the second category as well).

80 In the second category, I would place Iacobucci J.'s description in Southam, supra, of a patently unreasonable decision as one marred by a defect that is characterized by its "immediacy or obviousness": "If the defect is apparent on the face of the tribunal's reasons, then the tribunal's decision is patently unreasonable. But if it takes some significant searching or testing to find the defect, then the decision is unreasonable but not patently unreasonable" (para. 57).

81 More recently, in Law Society of New Brunswick v. Ryan, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 247, 2003 SCC 20, Iacobucci J. characterized a patently unreasonable decision as one that is "so flawed that no amount of curial deference can justify letting it stand", drawing on both of the definitional strands that I have identified in formulating this definition. He wrote, at para. 52:

In Southam, supra, at para. 57, the Court described the difference between an unreasonable decision and a patently unreasonable one as rooted "in the immediacy or obviousness of the defect". Another way to say this is that a patently unreasonable defect, once identified, can be explained simply and easily, leaving no real possibility of doubting that the decision is defective. A patently unreasonable decision has been described as "clearly irrational" or "evidently not in accordance with reason" (Canada (Attorney General) v. Public Service Alliance of Canada, [1993] 1 S.C.R. 941, at pp. 963-64, per Cory J.; Centre communautaire juridique de l'Estrie v. Sherbrooke (City), [1996] 3 S.C.R. 84, at paras. 9-12, per Gonthier J.). A decision that is patently unreasonable is so flawed that no amount of curial deference can justify letting it stand.

82 Similarly, in C.U.P.E. v. Ontario, supra, Binnie J. yoked together the two definitional strands, describing a patently unreasonable decision as "one whose defect is 'immedia[te] and obviou[s]' (Southam, supra, at para. 57), and so flawed in terms of implementing the legislative intent that no amount of curial deference can properly justify letting it stand (Ryan, supra, at para. 52)" (para. 165 (emphasis added)).

83 It has been suggested that the Court's various formulations of the test for patent unreasonableness are "not independent, alternative tests. They are simply ways of getting at the single question: What makes something patently unreasonable?" (C.U.P.E. v. Ontario, supra, at para. 20, per Bastarache J., dissenting). While this may indeed be the case, I nonetheless think it important to recognize that, because of what are in some ways subtle but nonetheless quite significant differences between the Court's various answers to this question, the parameters of "patent unreasonableness" are not as clear as they could be. This has contributed to the growing difficulties in the application of this standard that I discuss below.

(b) The Interplay Between the Patent Unreasonableness and Correctness Standards

84 As I observed in Chamberlain, supra, the difference between review on a standard of correctness and review on a standard of patent unreasonableness is "intuitive and relatively easy to observe" (Chamberlain, supra, at para. 204, per LeBel J.). These standards fall on opposite sides of the existing spectrum of curial deference, with correctness entailing an exacting review and patent unreasonableness leaving the issue in question to the near exclusive determination of the decision maker (see Dr. Q, supra, at para. 22). Despite the clear conceptual boundary between these two standards, however, the distinction between them is not always as readily discernable in practice as one would expect.

(i) Patent Unreasonableness and Correctness in Theory

85 In terms of understanding the interplay between patent unreasonableness and correctness, it is of interest that, from the beginning, there seems to have been at least some conceptual uncertainty as to the proper breadth of patent unreasonableness review. In CUPE, supra, Dickson J. offered two characterizations of patent unreasonableness that tend to pull in opposite directions (see D. J. Mullan, Administrative Law (2001), at p. 69; see also H. W. MacLauchlan, "Transforming Administrative Law: The Didactic Role of the Supreme Court of Canada" (2001), 80 Can. Bar Rev. 281, at pp. 285-86).

86 Professor Mullan explains that, on the one hand, Dickson J. rooted review for patent unreasonableness in the recognition that statutory provisions are often ambiguous and thus may allow for multiple interpretations; the question for the reviewing court is whether the adjudicator's interpretation is one that can be "rationally supported by the relevant legislation" (CUPE, supra, at p. 237). On the other hand, Dickson J. also invoked an idea of patent unreasonableness as a threshold defined by certain nullifying errors, such as those he had previously enumerated in Service Employees' International Union, Local No. 333 v. Nipawin District Staff Nurses Association, [1975] 1 S.C.R. 382 ("Nipawin"), at p. 389, and in CUPE, supra, at p. 237:

... acting in bad faith, basing the decision on extraneous matters, failing to take relevant factors into account, breaching the provisions of natural justice or misinterpreting provisions of the Act so as to embark on an inquiry or answer a question not remitted to it.

87 Curiously, as Mullan notes, this list "repeats the list of 'nullifying' errors that Lord Reid laid out in the landmark House of Lords' judgment" in Anisminic Ltd. v. Foreign Compensation Commission, [1969] 2 A.C. 147. [page126] Anisminic "is usually treated as the foundation case in establishing in English law the reviewability of all issues of law on a correctness basis" (emphasis added), and, indeed, the Court "had cited with approval this portion of Lord Reid's judgment and deployed it to justify judicial intervention in a case described as the 'high water mark of activist' review in Canada: Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. v. International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 796", [1970]

S.C.R. 425 (see Mullan, Administrative Law, supra, at pp. 69-70; see also National Corn Growers, supra, at p. 1335, per Wilson J.).

88 In characterizing patent unreasonableness in CUPE, then, Dickson J. simultaneously invoked a highly deferential standard (choice among a range of reasonable alternatives) and a historically interventionist one (based on the presence of nullifying errors). For this reason, as Mullan acknowledges, "it is easy to see why Dickson J.'s use of [the quotation from Anisminic] is problematic" (Mullan, Administrative Law, supra, at p. 70) .

89 If Dickson J.'s reference to Anisminic in CUPE, supra, suggests some ambiguity as to the intended scope of "patent unreasonableness" review, later judgments also evidence a somewhat unclear relationship between patent unreasonableness and correctness in terms of establishing and, particularly, applying the methodology for review under the patent unreasonableness standard. The tension in this respect is rooted, in part, in differing views of the premise from which patent unreasonableness review should begin. A useful example is provided by CAIMAW v. Paccar of Canada Ltd., [1989] 2 S.C.R. 983 ("Paccar").

90 In Paccar, Sopinka J. (Lamer J. (as he then was) concurring) described the proper approach under the patent unreasonableness standard as [page127] one in which the reviewing court first queries whether the administrative adjudicator's decision is correct: "curial deference does not enter the picture until the court finds itself in disagreement with the tribunal. Only then is it necessary to consider whether the error (so found) is within or outside the boundaries of reasonableness" (p. 1018). As Mullan has observed, this approach to patent unreasonableness raises concerns in that it not only conflicts "with the whole notion espoused by Dickson J. in [CUPE, supra] of there often being no single correct answer to statutory interpretation problems but it also assumes the primacy of the reviewing court over the agency or tribunal in the delineation of the meaning of the relevant statute" (Mullan, "Recent Developments in Standard of Review", supra, at p. 20).

91 In my view, this approach presents additional problems as well. Reviewing courts may have difficulty ruling that "an error has been committed but ... then do[ing] nothing to correct that error on the basis that it was not as big an error as it could or might have been" (see Mullan, "Recent Developments in Standard of Review", supra, at p. 20; see also D. J. Mullan, "Of Chaff Midst the Corn: American Farm Bureau Federation v. Canada (Canadian Import Tribunal) and Patent Unreasonableness Review" (1991), 45 Admin. L.R. 264, at pp. 269-70). Furthermore, starting from a finding that the adjudicator's decision is incorrect may colour the reviewing court's subsequent assessment of the reasonableness of competing interpretations (see M. Allars, "On Deference to Tribunals, With Deference to Dworkin" (1994), 20 Queen's L.J. 163, at p. 187). The result is that the critical distinction between that which is, in the court's eyes, "incorrect" and that which is "not rationally supportable" is undermined.

92 The alternative approach is to leave the "correctness" of the adjudicator's decision undecided (see Allars, supra, at p. 197). This is essentially the approach that La Forest J. (Dickson C.J. [page128] concurring) took to patent unreasonableness in Paccar, supra. He wrote, at pp. 1004 and 1005:

The courts must be careful to focus their inquiry on the existence of a rational basis for the decision of the tribunal, and not on their agreement with it.

I do not find it necessary to conclusively determine whether the decision of the Labour Relations Board is "correct" in the sense that it is the decision I would have reached had the proceedings been before this Court on their merits. It is sufficient to say that the result arrived at by the Board is not patently unreasonable.

93 It is this theoretical view that has, at least for the most part, prevailed. As L'Heureux-Dubé J. observed in Canadian Union of Public Employees, Local 301 v. Montreal (City), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 793 ("CUPE, Local 301"), "this Court has stated repeatedly, in assessing whether administrative action is patently unreasonable, the goal is not to review the decision or action on its merits but rather to determine whether it is patently unreasonable, given the statutory provisions governing the particular body and the evidence before it" (para. 53). Patent unreasonableness review, in other words, should not "become an avenue for the court's substitution of its own view" (CUPE, Local 301, supra, at para. 59; see also Domtar Inc. v. Quebec (Commission d'appel en matière de lésions professionnelles), [1993] 2 S.C.R. 756, at pp. 771 and 774-75).

94 This view was recently forcefully rearticulated in Ryan, supra. Iacobucci J. wrote, at paras. 50-51:

[W]hen deciding whether an administrative action was unreasonable, a court should not at any point ask itself what the correct decision would have been... . The standard of reasonableness does not imply that a decision maker is merely afforded a "margin of error" around what the court believes is the correct result.

... Unlike a review for correctness, there will often be no single right answer to the questions that are under review against the standard of reasonableness... . Even if there could be, notionally, a single best answer, it is not the court's role to seek this out when deciding if the decision was unreasonable.

Though Iacobucci J.'s comments here were made in relation to reasonableness simpliciter, they are also applicable to the more deferential standard of patent unreasonableness.

95 I think it important to emphasize that neither the case at bar, nor the companion case of Ontario v. O.P.S.E.U., should be misinterpreted as a retreat from the position that in reviewing a decision under the existing standard of patent unreasonableness, the court's role is not to identify the "correct" result. In each of these cases, there were two standards of review in play: there was a fundamental legal question on which the adjudicators were subject to a standard of correctness -- whether the employees' criminal convictions could be relitigated -- and there was a question at the core of the adjudicators' expertise on which they were subject to a standard of patent unreasonableness -- whether the employees had been dismissed for just cause. As Arbour J. has outlined, the adjudicators' failure to decide the fundamental relitigation question correctly was sufficient to lead to a patently unreasonable outcome. Indeed, in circumstances such as those at issue in the case at bar, this cannot but be the case: the adjudicators' incorrect decisions on the fundamental legal question provided the entire foundation on which their legal analyses, and their conclusions as to whether the employees were dismissed with just cause, were based. To pass a review for patent unreasonableness, a decision must be one that can be "rationally supported"; this standard cannot be met where, as here, what supports the adjudicator's decision -- indeed, what that decision is wholly premised on -- is a legal determination that the adjudicator was required, but failed, to decide correctly. To say, however, that in such circumstances a decision will be patently unreasonable -- a conclusion that flows from the applicability of two separate standards of review -- is very different from suggesting [page130] that a reviewing court, before applying the standard of patent unreasonableness, must first determine whether the adjudicator's decision is (in)correct or that in applying patent unreasonableness the court should ask itself at any point in the analysis what the correct decision would be. In other words, the application of patent unreasonableness itself is not, and should not be, understood to be predicated on a finding of incorrectness, for the reasons that I discussed above.

(ii) Patent Unreasonableness and Correctness in Practice

96 While the Court now tends toward the view that La Forest J. articulated in Paccar, at p. 1004 -- "courts must be careful [under a standard of patent unreasonableness] to focus their inquiry on the existence of a rational basis for the decision of the tribunal, and not on their agreement with it" -- the tension between patent unreasonableness and correctness has not been completely resolved. Slippage between the two standards is still evident at times in the way in which patent unreasonableness is applied.

97 In analyzing a number of recent cases, commentators have pointed to both the intensity and the underlying character of the review in questioning whether the Court is applying patent unreasonableness in a manner that is in fact deferential. In this regard, the comments of Professor Lorne Sossin on the application of patent unreasonableness in Canada Safeway Ltd. v. RWDSU, Local 454, [1998] 1 S.C.R. 1079, are illustrative:

Having established that deference was owed to the statutory interpretation of the Board, the Court proceeded to dissect its interpretation. The majority was of the view that the Board had misconstrued the term "constructive lay-off" and had failed to place sufficient emphasis on the terms of the collective agreement. The majority reasons convey clearly why the Court would adopt a different approach to the Board. They are less clear as to why the Board's approach lacked a rational foundation. Indeed, [page131] there is very little evidence of the Court according deference to the Board's interpretation of its own statute, or to its choice as to how much weight to place on the terms of the collective agreement. Canada Safeway raises the familiar question of how a court should demonstrate its deference, particularly in the labour relations context.

(L. Sossin, "Developments in Administrative Law: The 1997-98 and 1998-99 Terms" (2000), 11 S.C.L.R. (2d) 37, at p. 49)

98 Professor Ian Holloway makes a similar observation with regard to Lester (W.W.) (1978) Ltd. v. United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry, Local 740, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 644:

In her judgment, [McLachlin J. (as she then was)] quoted from the familiar passages of CUPE, yet she ... reached her decision on the basis of a review of the case law. She did not ask whether, despite the fact that it differed from holdings in other jurisdictions, the conclusion of the Newfoundland Labour Relations Board could be "rationally supported" on the basis of the wording of the successorship provisions of the Labour Relations Act. Instead, she looked at whether the Board had reached the correct legal interpretation of the Act in the same manner that a court of appeal would determine whether a trial judge had made a correct interpretation of the law. In other words, she effectively equated patent unreasonability with correctness at law.

(I. Holloway, "A Sacred Right: Judicial Review of Administrative Action as a Cultural Phenomenon" (1993), 22 Man. L.J. 28, at pp. 64-65 (emphasis in original); see also Allars, supra, at p. 178.)

99 At times the Court's application of the standard of patent unreasonableness may leave it vulnerable to criticism that it may in fact be doing implicitly what it has rejected explicitly: intervening in decisions that are, in its view, incorrect, rather than limiting any intervention to those decisions that lack a rational foundation. In the process, what should be an indelible line between correctness, on the one hand, and patent unreasonableness, on the other, becomes blurred. It may very well be that review [page132] under any standard of reasonableness, given the nature of the intellectual process it involves, entails such a risk. Nevertheless, the existence of two standards of reasonableness appears to have magnified the underlying tension between the two standards of reasonableness and correctness.

(c) The Relationship Between the Patent Unreasonableness and Reasonableness Simpliciter Standards

100 While the conceptual difference between review on a correctness standard and review on a patent unreasonableness standard may be intuitive and relatively easy to observe (though in practice elements of correctness at times encroach uncomfortably into patent unreasonableness review), the boundaries between patent unreasonableness and reasonableness simpliciter are far less clear, even at the theoretical level.

(i) The Theoretical Foundation for Patent Unreasonableness and Reasonableness Simpliciter

101 The lack of sufficiently clear boundaries between patent unreasonableness and reasonableness simpliciter has its origins in the fact that patent unreasonableness was developed prior to the birth of the pragmatic and functional approach (see C.U.P.E. v. Ontario, supra, at para. 161) and, more particularly, prior to (rather than in conjunction with) the formulation of reasonableness simpliciter in Southam, supra. Because patent unreasonableness, as a posture of curial deference, was conceived in opposition only to a correctness standard of review, it was sufficient for the Court to emphasize in defining its scope the principle that there will often be no one interpretation that can be said to be correct in interpreting a statute or otherwise resolving a legal dispute, and that specialized administrative adjudicators may, in many circumstances, be better equipped than courts to choose between the possible interpretations. Where this is the case, provided that the adjudicator's decision is one that can be "rationally supported on a construction which the relevant legislation may reasonably be considered to bear", [page133] the reviewing court should not intervene (Nipawin, supra, at p. 389).

102 Upon the advent of reasonableness simpliciter, however, the validity of multiple interpretations became the underlying premise for this new variant of reasonableness review as well. Consider, for instance, the discussion of reasonableness simpliciter in Ryan, that I cited above:

Unlike a review for correctness, there will often be no single right answer to the questions that are under review against the standard of reasonableness... . Even if there could be, notionally, a single best answer, it is not the court's role to seek this out when deciding if the decision was unreasonable.

It is difficult to distinguish this language from that used to describe patent unreasonableness not only in the foundational judgments establishing that standard, such as Nipawin, supra, and CUPE, supra, but also in this Court's more contemporary jurisprudence applying it. In Ivanhoe, supra, for instance, Arbour J. stated that "the recognition by the legislature and the courts that there are many potential solutions to a dispute is the very essence of the patent unreasonableness standard of review, which would be meaningless if it was found that there is only one acceptable solution" (para. 116).

103 Because patent unreasonableness and reasonableness simpliciter are both rooted in this guiding principle, it has been difficult to frame the standards as analytically, rather than merely semantically, distinct. The efforts to sustain a workable distinction between them have taken, in the main, two forms, which mirror the two definitional strands of patent unreasonableness that I identified above. One of these forms distinguishes between patent unreasonableness and reasonableness simpliciter on the basis of the relative magnitude of the defect. The other looks to the "immediacy or obviousness" of the defect, and thus the relative invasiveness of the review necessary to [page134] find it. Both approaches raise their own problems.

(ii) The Magnitude of the Defect

104 In PSAC, supra, at pp. 963-64, Cory J. described a patently unreasonable decision in these terms:

In the Shorter Oxford English Dictionary "patently", an adverb, is defined as "openly, evidently, clearly". "Unreasonable" is defined as "[n]ot having the faculty of reason; irrational... . Not acting in accordance with reason or good sense". Thus, based on the dictionary definition of the words "patently unreasonable", it is apparent that if the decision the Board reached, acting within its jurisdiction, is not clearly irrational, that is to say evidently not in accordance with reason, then it cannot be said that there was a loss of jurisdiction.

While this definition may not be inherently problematic, it has become so with the emergence of reasonableness simpliciter, in part because of what commentators have described as the "tautological difficulty of distinguishing standards of rationality on the basis of the term 'clearly'" (see Cowan, supra, at pp. 27-28; see also G. Perrault, Le contrôle judiciaire des décisions de l'administration: De l'erreur juridictionnelle à la norme de contrôle (2002), at p. 116; S. Comtois, Vers la primauté de l'approche pragmatique et fonctionnelle: Précis du contrôle judiciaire des décisions de fond rendues par les organismes administratifs (2003), at pp. 34-35; P. Garant, Droit administratif (4th ed. 1996), vol. 2, at p. 193).

105 Mullan alludes to both the practical and the theoretical difficulties of maintaining a distinction based on the magnitude of the defect, i.e., the degree of irrationality, that characterizes a decision:

... admittedly in his judgment in PSAC, Cory J. did attach the epithet "clearly" to the word "irrational" in delineating a particular species of patent unreasonableness. However, I would be most surprised if, in so doing, he was using the term "clearly" for other than rhetorical effect. Indeed, I want to suggest ... that to maintain a position that it is only the "clearly irrational" that will cross the threshold of patent unreasonableness while irrationality simpliciter will not is to make a nonsense [page135] of the law. Attaching the adjective "clearly" to irrational is surely a tautology. Like "uniqueness", irrationality either exists or it does not. There cannot be shades of irrationality. In other words, I defy any judge or lawyer to provide a concrete example of the difference between the merely irrational and the clearly irrational! In any event, there have to be concerns with a regime of judicial review which would allow any irrational decision to escape rebuke even under the most deferential standard of scrutiny.

Also relevant in this respect are the comments of Reed J. in Hao v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) (2000), 184 F.T.R. 246, at para. 9:

I note that I have never been convinced that "patently unreasonable" differs in a significant way from "unreasonable". The word "patently" means clearly or obviously. If the unreasonableness of a decision is not clear or obvious, I do not see how that decision can be said to be unreasonable.

106 Even a brief review of this Court's descriptions of the defining characteristics of patently unreasonable and unreasonable decisions demonstrates that it is difficult to sustain a meaningful distinction between two forms of reasonableness on the basis of the magnitude of the defect, and the extent of the decision's resulting deviation from the realm of the reasonable. Under both standards, the reviewing court's inquiry is focussed on "the existence of a rational basis for the [adjudicator's] decision" (see, for example, Paccar, supra, at p. 1004, per La Forest J.; Ryan, supra, at paras. 55-56). A patently unreasonable decision has been described as one that "cannot be sustained on any reasonable interpretation of the facts or of the law" (National Corn Growers, supra, at pp. 1369-70, per Gonthier J.), or "rationally supported on a construction which the relevant legislation may reasonably be considered to bear" (Nipawin, supra, at p. 389). An unreasonable decision has been described as one for which there are "no lines of reasoning supporting the decision which could reasonably lead [page136] that tribunal to reach the decision it did" (Ryan, supra, at para. 53).

107 Under both patent unreasonableness and reasonableness simpliciter, mere disagreement with the adjudicator's decision is insufficient to warrant intervention (see, for example, Paccar, supra, at pp. 1003-4, per La Forest J., and Chamberlain, supra, at para. 15, per McLachlin C.J.). Applying the patent unreasonableness standard, "the court will defer even if the interpretation given by the tribunal ... is not the 'right' interpretation in the court's view nor even the 'best' of two possible interpretations, so long as it is an interpretation reasonably attributable to the words of the agreement" (United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, Local 579 v. Bradco Construction Ltd., [1993] 2 S.C.R. 316, at p. 341). In the case of reasonableness simpliciter, "a decision may satisfy the ... standard if it is supported by a tenable explanation even if this explanation is not one that the reviewing court finds compelling" (Ryan, supra, at para. 55). There seems to me to be no qualitative basis on which to differentiate effectively between these various characterizations of a rationality analysis; how, for instance, would a decision that is not "tenably supported" (and is thus "merely" unreasonable) differ from a decision that is not "rationally supported" (and is thus patently unreasonable)?

108 In the end, the essential question remains the same under both standards: was the decision of the adjudicator taken in accordance with reason? Where the answer is no, for instance because the legislation in question cannot rationally support the adjudicator's interpretation, the error will invalidate the decision, regardless of whether the standard applied is reasonableness simpliciter or patent unreasonableness (see D. K. Lovett, "That Curious Curial Deference Just Gets Curiouser and Curiouser -- Canada (Director of Investigation and Research) v. Southam Inc." (1997), 55 Advocate (B.C.) 541, at p. 545). Because the two variants of reasonableness [page137] are united at their theoretical source, the imperative for the reviewing court to intervene will turn on the conclusion that the adjudicator's decision deviates from what falls within the ambit of the reasonable, not on "fine distinctions" between the test for patent unreasonableness and reasonableness simpliciter (see Falzon, supra, at p. 33).

109 The existence of these two variants of reasonableness review forces reviewing courts to continue to grapple with the significant practical problems inherent in distinguishing meaningfully between the two standards. To the extent that a distinction is advanced on the basis of the relative severity of the defect, this poses not only practical difficulties but also difficulties in principle, as this approach implies that patent unreasonableness, in requiring "clear" rather than "mere" irrationality, allows for a margin of appreciation for decisions that are not in accordance with reason. In this respect, I would echo Mullan's comments that there would "have to be concerns with a regime of judicial review which would allow any irrational decision to escape rebuke even under the most deferential standard of scrutiny" (Mullan, "Recent Developments in Standard of Review", supra, at p. 25).

(iii) The "Immediacy or Obviousness" of the Defect

110 There is a second approach to distinguishing between patent unreasonableness and reasonableness simpliciter that requires discussion. Southam, supra, at para. 57, emphasized the "immediacy or obviousness" of the defect:

The difference between "unreasonable" and "patently unreasonable" lies in the immediacy or obviousness of the defect. If the defect is apparent on the face of the tribunal's reasons, then the tribunal's decision is patently unreasonable. But if it takes some significant searching or testing to find the defect, then the decision is unreasonable but not patently unreasonable .

111 In my view, two lines of difficulty have emerged from emphasizing the "immediacy or obviousness" [page138] of the defect, and thus the relative invasiveness of the review necessary to find it, as a means of distinguishing between patent unreasonableness and reasonableness simpliciter. The first is the difficulty of determining how invasive a review is invasive enough, but not too invasive, in each case. The second is the difficulty that flows from ambiguity as to the intended meaning of "immediacy or obviousness" in this context: is it the obviousness of the defect in the sense of its transparency on the face of the decision that is the defining characteristic of patent unreasonableness review (see J. L. H. Sprague, "Another View of Baker" (1999), 7 Reid's Administrative Law 163, at pp. 163 and 165, note 5), or is it rather the obviousness of the defect in terms of the ease with which, once found, it can be identified as severe? The latter interpretation may bring with it difficulties of the sort I referred to above -- i.e., attempting to qualify degrees of irrationality. The former interpretation, it seems to me, presents problems of its own, which I discuss below.

112 Turning first to the difficulty of actually applying a distinction based on the "immediacy or obviousness" of the defect, we are confronted with the criticism that the "somewhat probing examination" criterion (see Southam, supra, at para. 56) is not clear enough (see D. W. Elliott, "Suresh and the Common Borders of Administrative Law: Time for the Tailor?" (2002), 65 Sask. L. Rev. 469, at pp. 486-87). As Elliott notes: "[t]he distinction between a 'somewhat probing examination' and those which are simply probing, or are less than probing, is a fine one. It is too fine to permit courts to differentiate clearly among the three standards."

113 This Court has itself experienced some difficulty in consistently performing patent unreasonableness review in a way that is less probing than the "somewhat probing" analysis that is the hallmark of reasonableness simpliciter. Despite the fact that a less invasive review has been described as a defining characteristic of the standard of patent unreasonableness, in a number of the Court's recent decisions, including Toronto (City) Board of Education, supra, [page139] and Ivanhoe, supra, one could fairly characterize the Court's analysis under this standard as at least "somewhat" probing in nature.

114 Even prior to Southam and the development of reasonableness simpliciter, there was some uncertainty as to how intensely patent unreasonableness review is to be performed. This is particularly evident in National Corn Growers, supra (see generally Mullan, "Of Chaff Midst the Corn", supra; Mullan, Administrative Law, supra, at pp. 72-73). In that case, while Wilson J. counselled restraint on the basis of her reading of CUPE, supra, Gonthier J., for the majority, performed quite a searching review of the decision of the Canadian Import Tribunal. He reasoned, at p. 1370, that "[i]n some cases, the unreasonableness of a decision may be apparent without detailed examination of the record. In others, it may be no less unreasonable but this can only be understood upon an in-depth analysis."

115 Southam itself did not definitively resolve the question of how invasively review for patent unreasonableness should be performed . An intense review would seem to be precluded by the statement that, "if it takes some significant searching or testing to find the defect, then the decision is unreasonable but not patently unreasonable" (para. 57). The possibility that, in certain circumstances, quite a thorough review for patent unreasonableness will be appropriate, however, is left open: "[i]f the decision under review is sufficiently difficult, then perhaps a great deal of reading and thinking will be required before the judge will be able to grasp the dimensions of the problem" (para. 57).

116 This brings me to the second problem: in what sense is the defect immediate or obvious? Southam left some ambiguity on this point. As I have outlined, on the one hand, a patently unreasonable decision is understood as one that is [page140] flawed by a defect that is evident on the face of the decision, while an unreasonable decision is one that is marred by a defect that it takes significant searching or testing to find. In other places, however, Southam suggests that the "immediacy or obviousness" of a patently unreasonable defect refers not to the ease of its detection, but rather to the ease with which, once detected, it can be identified as severe. Particularly relevant in this respect is the statement that "once the lines of the problem have come into focus, if the decision is patently unreasonable, then the unreasonableness will be evident" (para. 57). It is the (admittedly sometimes only tacit) recognition that what must in fact be evident -- i.e., clear, obvious, or immediate -- is the defect's magnitude upon detection that allows for the possibility that in certain circumstances "it will simply not be possible to understand and respond to a patent unreasonableness argument without a thorough examination and appreciation of the tribunal's record and reasoning process" (see Mullan, Administrative Law, supra, at p. 72; see also Ivanhoe, supra, at para. 34).

117 Our recent decision in Ryan has brought more clarity to Southam, but still reflects a degree of ambiguity on this issue. In Ryan, at para. 52, the Court held:

In Southam, supra, at para. 57, the Court described the difference between an unreasonable decision and a patently unreasonable one as rooted "in the immediacy or obviousness of the defect". Another way to say this is that a patently unreasonable defect, once identified, can be explained simply and easily, leaving no real possibility of doubting that the decision is defective. A patently unreasonable decision has been described as "clearly irrational" or "evidently not in accordance with reason" (Canada (Attorney General) v. Public Service Alliance of Canada, [1993] 1 S.C.R. 941, at pp. 963-64, per Cory J.; Centre communautaire juridique de l'Estrie v. Sherbrooke (City), [1996] 3 S.C.R. 84, at paras. 9-12, per Gonthier J.). A decision that is patently unreasonable is so flawed that no amount of curial deference can justify letting it stand. [Emphasis added.]

This passage moves the focus away from the obviousness of the defect in the sense of its transparency "on the face of the decision", to the obviousness of its magnitude once it has been identified. At other points, however, the relative invasiveness of the review required to identify the defect is emphasized as the means of distinguishing between patent unreasonableness and reasonableness simpliciter:

A decision may be unreasonable without being patently unreasonable when the defect in the decision is less obvious and might only be discovered after "significant searching or testing" (Southam, supra, at para. 57). Explaining the defect may require a detailed exposition to show that there are no lines of reasoning supporting the decision which could reasonably lead that tribunal to reach the decision it did.

118 Such ambiguity led commentators such as David Phillip Jones to continue to question in light of Ryan whether whatever it is that makes the decision "patently unreasonable" [must] appear on the face of the record ... Or can one go beyond the record to demonstrate -- "identify" -- why the decision is patently unreasonable? Is it the "immediacy and obviousness of the defect" which makes it patently unreasonable, or does patently unreasonable require outrageousness so that the decision is so flawed that no amount of curial deference can justify letting it stand?

(D. P. Jones, "Notes on Dr. Q and Ryan: Two More Decisions by the Supreme Court of Canada on the Standard of Review in Administrative Law", paper originally presented at the Canadian Institute for the Administration of Justice, Western Roundtable, Edmonton, April 25, 2003, at p. 10.)

119 As we have seen, the answers to such questions are far from self-evident, even at the level of theoretical abstraction. How much more difficult must they be for reviewing courts and counsel struggling to apply not only patent unreasonableness, but also reasonableness simpliciter? (See, in this regard, the comments of Mullan in "Recent Developments in Standard of Review", supra, at p. 4.)

120 Absent reform in this area or a further clarification of the standards, the "epistemological" confusion over the relationship between patent unreasonableness and reasonableness simpliciter will continue. As a result, both the types of errors that the two variants of reasonableness are likely to catch -- i.e., interpretations that fall outside the range of those that can be "reasonably", "rationally" or "tenably" supported by the statutory language -- and the way in which the two standards are applied will in practice, if not necessarily in theory, be much the same.

121 There is no easy way out of this conundrum. Whatever attempts are made to clarify the contours of, or the relationship between, the existing definitional strands of patent unreasonableness, this standard and reasonableness simpliciter will continue to be rooted in a shared rationale: statutory language is often ambiguous and "admits of more than one possible meaning"; provided that the expert administrative adjudicator's interpretation "does not move outside the bounds of reasonably permissible visions of the appropriate interpretation, there is no justification for court intervention" (Mullan, "Recent Developments in Standard of Review", supra, at p. 18). It will thus remain difficult to keep these standards conceptually distinct, and I query whether, in the end, the theoretical efforts necessary to do so are productive. Obviously any decision that fails the test of patent unreasonableness must also fall on a standard of reasonableness simpliciter, but it seems hard to imagine situations where the converse is not also true: if a decision is not supported by a tenable explanation (and is thus unreasonable) (Ryan, supra, at para. 55), how likely is it that it could be sustained on "any reasonable interpretation of the facts or of the law" (and thus not be patently unreasonable) (National Corn Growers, supra, at pp. 1369-70, per Gonthier J.)?

122 Thus, both patent unreasonableness and reasonableness simpliciter require that reviewing courts pay "respectful attention" to the reasons of adjudicators [page143] in assessing the rationality of administrative decisions (see Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [1999] 2 S.C.R. 817, at para. 65, per L'Heureux-Dubé J., citing D. Dyzenhaus, "The Politics of Deference: Judicial Review and Democracy", in M. Taggart, ed., The Province of Administrative Law (1997), 279, at p. 286, and Ryan, supra, at para. 49).

123 Attempting to differentiate between these two variants of curial deference by classifying one as "somewhat more probing" in its attentiveness than the other is unlikely to prove any more successful in practice than it has proven in the past. Basing the distinction on the relative ease with which a defect may be detected also raises a more theoretical quandary: the difficulty of articulating why a defect that is obvious on the face of a decision should present more of an imperative for court intervention than a latent defect. While a defect may be readily apparent because it is severe, a severe defect will not necessarily be readily apparent; by the same token, a flaw in a decision may be immediately evident, or obvious, but relatively inconsequential in nature.

124 On the other hand, the effect of clarifying that the language of "immediacy or obviousness" goes not to ease of detection, but rather to the ease with which, once detected (on either a superficial or a probing review), a defect may be identified as severe might well be to increase the regularity with which reviewing courts subject decisions to as intense a review on a standard of patent unreasonableness as on a standard of reasonableness simpliciter, thereby further eliding any difference between the two.

125 An additional effect of clarifying that the "immediacy or obviousness" of the defect refers not to its transparency on the face of the decision but rather to its magnitude upon detection is to suggest that it is feasible and appropriate for reviewing courts to attempt to qualify degrees of irrationality in assessing the decisions of administrative adjudicators: i.e., this decision is irrational enough to be unreasonable, but not so irrational as to be [page144] overturned on a standard of patent unreasonableness. Such an outcome raises questions as to whether the legislative intent could ever be to let irrational decisions stand. In any event, such an approach would seem difficult to reconcile with the rule of law.

126 I acknowledge that there are certain advantages to the framework to which this Court has adhered since its adoption in Southam, supra, of a third standard of review. The inclusion of an intermediate standard does appear to provide reviewing courts with an enhanced ability to tailor the degree of deference to the particular situation. In my view, however, the lesson to be drawn from our experience since then is that those advantages appear to be outweighed by the current framework's drawbacks, which include the conceptual and practical difficulties that flow from the overlap between patent unreasonableness and reasonableness simpliciter, and the difficulty caused at times by the interplay between patent unreasonableness and correctness.

127 In particular, the inability to sustain a viable analytical distinction between the two variants of reasonableness has impeded their application in practice in a way that fulfils the theoretical promise of a more precise reflection of the legislature's intent. In the end, attempting to distinguish between the unreasonable and the patently unreasonable may be as unproductive as attempting to differentiate between the "illegible" and the "patently illegible". While it may be possible to posit, in the abstract, some kind of conceptual distinction, the functional reality is that once a text is illegible -- whether its illegibility is evident on a cursory glance or only after a close examination -- the result is the same. There is little to be gained from debating as to whether the text is illegible simpliciter or patently illegible; in either case it cannot be read.

128 It is also necessary to keep in mind the theoretical foundations for judicial review and its ultimate purpose. The purpose of judicial review is to uphold the normative legal order by ensuring that the [page145] decisions of administrative decision makers are both procedurally sound and substantively defensible. As McLachlin C.J. explained in Dr. Q, supra, at para. 21, the two touchstones of judicial review are legislative intent and the rule of law:

[In Pushpanathan,] Bastarache J. affirmed that "[t]he central inquiry in determining the standard of review exercisable by a court of law is the legislative intent of the statute creating the tribunal whose decision is being reviewed" (para. 26). However, this approach also gives due regard to "the consequences that flow from a grant of powers" (Bibeault, supra, at p. 1089) and, while safeguarding "[t]he role of the superior courts in maintaining the rule of law" (p. 1090), reinforces that this reviewing power should not be employed unnecessarily. In this way, the pragmatic and functional approach inquires into legislative intent, but does so against the backdrop of the courts' constitutional duty to protect the rule of law.

In short, the role of a court in determining the standard of review is to be faithful to the intent of the legislature that empowered the administrative adjudicator to make the decision, as well as to the animating principle that, in a society governed by the rule of law, power is not to be exercised arbitrarily or capriciously.

129 As this Court has observed, the rule of law is a "highly textured expression, importing many things which are beyond the need of these reasons to explore but conveying, for example, a sense of orderliness, of subjection to known legal rules and of executive accountability to legal authority" (Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution, [1981] 1 S.C.R. 753, at pp. 805-6). As the Court elaborated in Reference re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217, at para. 71:

In the Manitoba Language Rights Reference, supra, at pp. 747-52, this Court outlined the elements of the rule of law. We emphasized, first, that the rule of law provides that the law is supreme over the acts of both government and private persons. There is, in short, one law for all. Second, we explained, at p. 749, that "the rule of law requires the creation and maintenance of an actual order of positive laws which preserves and embodies the more general principle of normative order"... . A third aspect of the rule of law is ... that "the exercise of all public [page146] power must find its ultimate source in a legal rule". Put another way, the relationship between the state and the individual must be regulated by law. Taken together, these three considerations make up a principle of profound constitutional and political significance .

"At its most basic level", as the Court affirmed, at para. 70, "the rule of law vouchsafes to the citizens and residents of the country a stable, predictable and ordered society in which to conduct their affairs. It provides a shield for individuals from arbitrary state action."

130 Because arbitrary state action is not permissible, the exercise of power must be justifiable. As the Chief Justice has noted,

... societies governed by the Rule of Law are marked by a certain ethos of justification. In a democratic society, this may well be the general characteristic of the Rule of Law within which the more specific ideals

... are subsumed. Where a society is marked by a culture of justification, an exercise of public power is only appropriate where it can be justified to citizens in terms of rationality and fairness.

(See the Honourable Madam Justice B. McLachlin, "The Roles of Administrative Tribunals and Courts in Maintaining the Rule of Law" (1998-1999), 12 C.J.A.L.P. 171, at p. 174 (emphasis in original) ; see also MacLauchlan, supra, at pp. 289-91.)

Judicial review on substantive grounds ensures that the decisions of administrative adjudicators are capable of rational justification; review on procedural grounds (i.e., does the decision meet the requirements of procedural fairness?) ensures that they are fair.

131 In recent years, this Court has recognized that both courts and administrative adjudicators have an important role to play in upholding and applying the rule of law. As Wilson J. outlined in National Corn Growers, supra, courts have come to accept that "statutory provisions often do not yield a single, uniquely correct interpretation" and that an expert administrative adjudicator may be "better equipped than a reviewing court to resolve the ambiguities and fill the voids in the statutory language" in a [page147] way that makes sense in the specialized context in which that adjudicator operates (p. 1336, citing J. M. Evans et al., Administrative Law (3rd ed. 1989), at p. 414). The interpretation and application of the law is thus no longer seen as exclusively the province of the courts. Administrative adjudicators play a vital and increasing role. As McLachlin J. helpfully put it in a recent speech on the roles of courts and administrative tribunals in maintaining the rule of law: "A culture of justification shifts the analysis from the institutions themselves to, more subtly, what those institutions are capable of doing for the rational advancement of civil society. The Rule of Law, in short, can speak in several voices so long as the resulting chorus echoes its underlying values of fairness and rationality" (McLachlin, supra, at p. 175).

132 In affirming the place for administrative adjudicators in the interpretation and application of the law, however, there is an important distinction that must be maintained: to say that the administrative state is a legitimate player in resolving legal disputes is properly to say that administrative adjudicators are capable (and perhaps more capable) of choosing among reasonable decisions. It is not to say that unreasonable decision making is a legitimate presence in the legal system. Is this not the effect of a standard of patent unreasonableness informed by an intermediate standard of reasonableness simpliciter?

133 On the assumption that we can distinguish effectively between an unreasonable and a patently unreasonable decision, there are situations where an unreasonable (i.e., irrational) decision must be allowed to stand. This would be the case where the standard of review is patent unreasonableness and the decision under review is unreasonable, but not patently so. As I have noted, I doubt that such an outcome could be reconciled with the intent of the legislature which, in theory, the pragmatic and functional analysis aims to reflect as faithfully as possible. As a matter of statutory interpretation, courts [page148] should always be very hesitant to impute to the legislature any intent to let irrational administrative acts stand, absent the most unequivocal statement of such an intent (see Sullivan and Driedger on the Construction of Statutes (4th ed. 2002), at pp. 367-68) . As a matter of theory, the constitutional principle of the primacy of the rule of law, which is an ever-present background principle of interpretation in this context, reinforces the point: if a court concludes that the legislature intended that there be no recourse from an irrational decision, it seems highly likely that the court has misconstrued the intent of the legislature.

134 Administrative law has developed considerably over the last 25 years since CUPE. This evolution, which reflects a strong sense of deference to administrative decision makers and an acknowledgment of the importance of their role, has given rise to some problems or concerns. It remains to be seen, in an appropriate case, what should be the solution to these difficulties. Should courts move to a two standard system of judicial review, correctness and a revised unified standard of reasonableness? Should we attempt to more clearly define the nature and scope of each standard or rethink their relationship and application? This is perhaps some of the work which lies ahead for courts, building on the developments of recent years as well as on the legal tradition which created the framework of the present law of judicial review.

Municipal law — Government — Council members — Wards — Appeal by City of Toronto from judgment of Ontario Court of Appeal that held Better Local Government Act, 2018, was constitutional dismissed — During City's municipal election campaign, Province enacted Better Local Government Act, 2018, which reduced size of City's Council — City challenged constitutionality of Act — Application judge found legislation violated s. 2(b) of the Charter, which Court of Appeal overturned — Province had acted constitutionally — City was advancing a positive rights claim, to which the Baier framework applied — City failed to demonstrate a substantial interference with freedom of expression — Unwritten constitutional principle of democracy could not be used to narrow provincial authority under s. 92(8) of Constitution Act, 1867 or to read municipalities into s. 3 of Charter — Better Local Government Act, 2018.

Appeal by the City of Toronto from a judgment of the Ontario Court of Appeal that held that the Better Local Government Act, 2018, was constitutional. During the City of Toronto's municipal election campaign, the Province of Ontario enacted the Better Local Government Act, 2018, which reduced the size of Toronto City Council from 47 wards to 25. The City challenged the constitutionality of the legislation and applied for orders restoring the 47-ward structure. The application judge found the Act limited municipal candidates' right to freedom of expression and municipal voters' right to effective representation under s. 2(b) of the Charter. He found the limits could not be justified under s. 1 of the Charter and set aside the impugned provisions of the Act. The Court of Appeal granted a stay of the judgment. The municipal election proceeded on the basis of the 25-ward structure established by the Act. The Court of Appeal subsequently allowed Ontario's appeal, finding no limit on freedom of expression. HELD: Appeal dismissed.

The Province had acted constitutionally. The City was advancing a positive rights claim, to which the framework established in Baier v. Alberta applied. The Baier framework set an elevated threshold for positive claims, requiring "substantial interference" with freedom of expression. The applicable factors could usefully be distilled to a single core question: was the claim grounded in the fundamental Charter freedom of expression, such that, by denying access to a statutory platform or by otherwise failing to act, the government had either substantially interfered with freedom of expression, or had the purpose of interfering with freedom of expression? The City had failed to demonstrate a substantial interference with freedom of expression. The change in ward structure did not prevent electoral participants from engaging in further political expression on election issues under the new ward structure. The Act imposed no limit on freedom of expression and did not violate s. 2(b) of the Charter. Despite their value as interpretive aids, unwritten constitutional principles could not be used as a basis for invalidating legislation. There was no freestanding right to effective representation outside s. 3 of the Charter. The unwritten constitutional principle of democracy could not be used to narrow provincial authority under s. 92(8) of the Constitution Act, 1867 or to read municipalities into s. 3 of the Charter. Dissenting reasons were provided.

Court Catchwords:

Constitutional law -- Charter of Rights -- Freedom of expression -- Municipal elections -- Province enacting legislation redrawing municipality's electoral ward boundaries and reducing number of wards during election campaign -- Whether legislation limits electoral participants' right to freedom of expression and, if so, whether limitation justified -- Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 1, 2(b) -- Better Local Government Act, 2018, S.O. 2018, c. 11.

Constitutional law -- Unwritten constitutional principles -- Democracy -- Province enacting legislation redrawing municipality's electoral ward boundaries and reducing number of wards during election campaign -- Whether legislation unconstitutional for violating unwritten constitutional principle of democracy.

Court Summary:

On May 1, 2018, the City of Toronto municipal election campaign commenced and nominations opened in preparation for an election day on October 22, 2018. On July 27, 2018, the closing day for nominations, Ontario announced its intention to introduce legislation reducing the size of Toronto City Council. On August 14, 2018, the Better Local Government Act, 2018, came into force, reducing the number of wards from 47 to 25.

The City and two groups of private individuals challenged the constitutionality of the Act and applied for orders restoring the 47-ward structure. The application judge found that the Act limited the municipal candidates' right to freedom of expression under s. 2(b) of the Charter and municipal voters' s. 2(b) right to effective representation. He held that these limits could not be justified under s. 1 of the Charter and set aside the impugned provisions of the Act. Ontario appealed and moved to stay the judgment pending appeal. The Court of Appeal granted the stay and, on October 22, 2018, the municipal election proceeded on the basis of the 25-ward structure created by the Act. The Court of Appeal later allowed the appeal, finding no limit on freedom of expression. The majority held that the City had advanced a positive rights claim, which was not properly grounded in s. 2(b) of the Charter, and concluded that the application judge had erred in finding that the Act substantially interfered with the candidates' freedom of expression and in finding that the right to effective representation applies to municipal elections and bears any influence over the s. 2(b) analysis. The majority also held that unwritten constitutional principles do not confer upon the judiciary power to invalidate legislation that does not otherwise infringe the Charter, nor do they limit provincial legislative authority over municipal institutions.

Held (Abella, Karakatsanis, Martin and Kasirer JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be dismissed.

Per Wagner C.J. and Moldaver, Côté, Brown and Rowe JJ.: Ontario acted constitutionally. The Act imposed no limit on freedom of expression. Further, unwritten constitutional principles cannot be used as bases for invalidating legislation, nor can the unwritten constitutional principle of democracy be used to narrow provincial authority under s. 92(8) of the Constitution Act, 1867, or to read municipalities into s. 3 of the Charter.

A purposive interpretation of Charter rights must begin with, and be rooted in, the text and not overshoot the purpose of the right but place it in its appropriate linguistic, philosophic and historical contexts. Section 2(b) of the Charter, which provides that everyone has the fundamental freedoms of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication, has been interpreted as generally imposing a negative obligation rather than a positive obligation of protection or assistance. A claim is properly characterized as negative where the claimant seeks freedom from government legislation or action suppressing an expressive activity in which people would otherwise be free to engage. Such claims of right under s. 2(b) are considered under the framework established in Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 927.

However, as explained in Baier v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 31, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 673, s. 2(b) may, in certain circumstances, impose positive obligations on the government to facilitate expression. Many constitutional rights have both positive and negative dimensions and this is so for s. 2(b). Central to whether s. 2(b) has been limited is, therefore, the appropriate characterization of the claim as between a negative and positive claim of right.

In the context of positive claims under s. 2(b), where a claimant seeks to impose an obligation on the government (or legislature) to provide access to a particular statutory or regulatory platform for expression, the applicable framework is that of Baier. As held in Baier, to succeed, a positive claim must satisfy the following three factors first set forth in Dunmore v. Ontario (Attorney General), 2001 SCC 94, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 1016: (1) the claim should be grounded in freedom of expression, rather than in access to a particular statutory regime; (2) the claimant must demonstrate that lack of access to a statutory regime has the effect of a substantial interference with freedom of expression, or has the purpose of infringing freedom of expression; and (3) the government must be responsible for the inability to exercise the fundamental freedom. These factors set an elevated threshold for positive claims and can usefully be distilled to a single core question: is the claim grounded in the fundamental Charter freedom of expression, such that, by denying access to a statutory platform or by otherwise failing to act, the government has either substantially interfered with freedom of expression, or had the purpose of interfering with freedom of expression? This single question, a salutary clarification of the Baier test, emphasizes the elevated threshold in the second Dunmore factor while encompassing the considerations of the first and third factors. Substantial interference with freedom of expression occurs where lack of access to a statutory platform has the effect of radically frustrating expression to such an extent that meaningful expression is effectively precluded. While meaningful expression need not be rendered absolutely impossible, effective preclusion represents an exceedingly high bar that would be met only in extreme and rare cases.

In the present case, the City has not established a limit on s. 2(b). The City's claim is a claim for access to a particular statutory platform, and is thus, in substance, a positive claim. The Baier framework therefore applies, and the City had to show that the Act radically frustrated the expression of election participants such that meaningful expression was effectively precluded. The candidates and their supporters had 69 days to re-orient their messages and freely express themselves according to the new ward structure. The Act imposed no restrictions on the content or meaning of the messages that participants could convey. Many of the challengers who continued to campaign ultimately had successful campaigns, raising significant amounts of money and receiving significant numbers of votes. This would not have been possible had their s. 2(b) rights been so radically frustrated so as to effectively preclude meaningful expression. Some of the candidates' prior expression may have lost its relevance, but something more than diminished effectiveness is required under the Baier framework. In the context of a positive claim, only extreme government action that extinguishes the effectiveness of expression may rise to the level of a substantial interference with freedom of expression. Section 2(b) is not a guarantee of the effectiveness or continued relevance of a message, or that campaign materials otherwise retain their usefulness throughout the campaign.

Furthermore, the unwritten constitutional principle of democracy cannot be used as a device for invalidating otherwise valid provincial legislation such as the impugned provisions of the Act. Unwritten principles are part of the law of the Constitution, in the sense that they form part of the context and backdrop to the Constitution's written terms. Their legal force lies in their representation of general principles within which the constitutional order operates and, therefore, by which the Constitution's written terms -- its provisions -- are to be given effect. In practical terms, unwritten constitutional principles may assist courts in only two distinct but related ways.

First, they may be used in the interpretation of constitutional provisions. Where the constitutional text is not itself sufficiently definitive or comprehensive to furnish the answer to a constitutional question, a court may use unwritten constitutional principles as interpretive aids. When applied to Charter rights, unwritten principles assist with purposive interpretation, informing the character and the larger objects of the Charter itself, the language chosen to articulate the specific right or freedom, and the historical origins of the concepts enshrined. Where unwritten constitutional principles are used as interpretive aids, their substantive legal force must arise by necessary implication from the Constitution's text. Secondly, and relatedly, unwritten principles can be used to develop structural doctrines unstated in the written Constitution per se, but necessary to the coherence of, and flowing by implication from, its architecture. Structural doctrines can fill gaps and address important questions on which the text of the Constitution is silent.

Neither of these functions support the application of unwritten constitutional principles as an independent basis for invalidating legislation. On the contrary, unwritten constitutional principles, such as democracy, a principle by which the Constitution is to be understood and interpreted, strongly favour upholding the validity of legislation that conforms to the text of the Constitution. Subject to the Charter, a province, under s. 92(8) of the Constitution Act, 1867, has absolute and unfettered legal power to legislate with respect to municipalities. This plenary jurisdiction is unrestricted by any constitutional principle.

As for s. 3 of the Charter, it guarantees citizens the right to vote and run for office in provincial and federal elections, and includes a right to effective representation. The text of s. 3 makes clear, however, that it does not extend to municipal elections. Effective representation is not a principle of s. 2(b) of the Charter, nor can the concept be imported wholesale into s. 2(b). Section 3 and its requirement of effective representation also cannot be made relevant to the current case by using the democratic principle. Section 3 democratic rights were not extended to candidates or electors to municipal councils. The absence of municipalities in the constitutional text is not a gap to be addressed judicially; rather, it is a deliberate omission. The text of the Constitution makes clear that municipal institutions lack constitutional status, leaving no open question of constitutional interpretation to be addressed and, accordingly, no role to be played by the unwritten principles.

Per Abella, Karakatsanis, Martin and Kasirer JJ. (dissenting): The appeal should be allowed and the application judge's declaration that the timing of the Act unjustifiably infringed s. 2(b) of the Charter restored. Changing the municipal wards in the middle of an ongoing municipal election was unconstitutional.

When a democratic election takes place in Canada, including a municipal election, freedom of expression protects the rights of candidates and voters to meaningfully express their views and engage in reciprocal political discourse on the path to voting day. That is at the core of political expression, which in turn is at the core of what is protected by s. 2(b) of the Charter. The right to disseminate and receive information connected with elections has long been recognized as integral to the democratic principles underlying freedom of expression, and as a result, has attracted robust protection.

A stable election period is crucial to electoral fairness and meaningful political discourse. As such, state interference with individual and collective political expression in the context of an election strikes at the heart of the democratic values that freedom of expression seeks to protect, including participation in social and political decision-making.

A two-part test for adjudicating freedom of expression claims was established in Irwin Toy. The first asks whether the activity is within the sphere of conduct protected by freedom of expression. If the activity conveys or attempts to convey a meaning, it has expressive content and prima facie falls within the scope of the guarantee. The second asks whether the government action, in purpose or effect, interfered with freedom of expression.

The legal framework set out in Baier, which was designed to address under inclusive statutory regimes, only applies to claims placing an obligation on government to provide individuals with a particular platform for expression. Claims of government interference with expressive rights that attach to an electoral process are the kind of claims governed by the Irwin Toy framework.

The distinction between positive and negative rights is an unhelpful lens for adjudicating Charter claims. All rights have positive dimensions since they exist within, and are enforced by, a positive state apparatus. They also have negative dimensions because they sometimes require the state not to intervene. A unified purposive approach has been adopted to rights claims, whether the claim is about freedom from government interference in order to exercise a right, or the right to governmental action in order to get access to it. The threshold does not vary with the nature of the claim to a right. Each right has its own definitional scope and is subject to the proportionality analysis under s. 1 of the Charter. There is therefore no reason to superimpose onto the constitutional structure the additional hurdle of dividing rights into positive and negative ones for analytic purposes.

In the present case, the s. 2(b) claim is about government interference with the expressive rights that attach to the electoral process and it is precisely the kind of claim that is governed by the Irwin Toy framework. Applying that framework, it is clear that the timing of the legislation, by interfering with political discourse in the middle of an election, violated s. 2(b) of the Charter. By radically redrawing electoral boundaries during an active election that was almost two-thirds complete, the legislation interfered with the rights of all participants in the electoral process to engage in meaningful reciprocal political discourse. The Act eradicated nearly half of the active election campaigns, and required candidates to file a change of ward notification form to continue in the race. The redrawing of ward boundaries meant that candidates needed to reach new voters with new priorities. Voters who had received campaign information, learned about candidates' mandates and engaged with them based on the 47-ward structure had their democratic participation put into abeyance. The timing of the Act breathed instability into the election, undermining the ability of candidates and voters in their wards to meaningfully discuss and inform one another of their views on matters of local concern.

The limitation on s. 2(b) rights in this case was the timing of the legislative changes. Ontario offered no explanation, let alone a pressing and substantial one, for why the changes were made in the middle of an ongoing election. In the absence of any evidence or explanation for the timing of the Act, no pressing and substantial objective exists for this limitation and it cannot, therefore, be justified in a free and democratic society.

As for the role of unwritten constitutional principles, there is disagreement with the majority's observations circumscribing their scope and power in a way that reads down the Court's binding jurisprudence. Unwritten constitutional principles may be used to invalidate legislation. The precedential Constitution of the United Kingdom is not a written document, but is comprised of unwritten norms, Acts of Parliament, Crown prerogative, conventions, custom of Parliament, and judicial decisions, among other sources. Canada's Constitution, as a result, embraces unwritten as well as written rules. Unwritten constitutional principles have been held to be the lifeblood of the Constitution and the vital unstated assumptions upon which the text is based. They are not merely "context" or "backdrop" to the text. On the contrary, they are the Constitution's most basic normative commitments from which specific textual provisions derive. The specific written provisions are elaborations of the underlying, unwritten, and organizing principles found in the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867. Constitutional text emanates from underlying principles, but it will not always be exhaustive of those principles.

Apart from written provisions of the Constitution, principles deriving from the Constitution's basic structure may constrain government action. Those principles exist independently of and, as in the case of implied fundamental rights before the promulgation of the Charter, prior to the enactment of express constitutional provisions. The legislative bodies in Canada must conform to these basic structural imperatives and can in no way override them. Accordingly, unwritten principles may be used to invalidate legislation if a case arises where legislation elides the reach of any express constitutional provision but is fundamentally at odds with the Constitution's internal architecture or basic constitutional structure. This would undoubtedly be a rare case; however, to foreclose the possibility that unwritten principles can be used to invalidate legislation in all circumstances is imprudent. It not only contradicts the Court's jurisprudence, it is fundamentally inconsistent with the case law confirming that unwritten constitutional principles can be used to review legislation for constitutional compliance. Reviewing legislation for constitutional compliance means upholding, revising or rejecting it.

Unwritten constitutional principles are the foundational organizing principles of the Constitution and have full legal force. They serve to give effect to the structure of the Constitution and function as independent bases upon which to attack the validity of legislation since they have the same legal status as the text. Unwritten constitutional principles not only give meaning and effect to constitutional text and inform the language chosen to articulate the specific right or freedom, they assist in developing an evolutionary understanding of the rights and freedoms guaranteed in the Constitution, which have long been described as a living tree capable of growth and expansion. Unwritten constitutional principles are a key part of what makes the tree grow. They are also substantive legal rules in their own right. In appropriate cases, they may well continue to serve, as they have done in the past, as the basis for declaring legislation unconstitutional.

I. Introduction

1 While cast as a claim of right under s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, this appeal, fundamentally, concerns the exercise of provincial legislative authority over municipalities. The issue, simply put, is whether and how the Constitution of Canada restrains a provincial legislature from changing the conditions by and under which campaigns for elected municipal councils are conducted.

2 Section 92(8) of the Constitution Act, 1867 assigns to provinces exclusive legislative authority regarding "Municipal Institutions in the Province". Municipalities incorporated under this authority therefore hold delegated provincial powers; like school boards or other creatures of provincial statute, they do not have independent constitutional status (Public School Boards' Assn. of Alberta v. Alberta (Attorney General), 2000 SCC 45, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 409, at paras. 33-34). The province has "absolute and unfettered legal power to do with them as it wills" (Ontario English Catholic Teachers' Assn. v. Ontario (Attorney General), 2001 SCC 15, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 470, at para. 58, quoting with approval Campbell J. in Ontario Public School Boards' Assn. v. Ontario (Attorney General) (1997), 151 D.L.R. (4th) 346 (Ont. C.J. (Gen. Div.)), at p. 361). No constitutional norms or conventions prevent a province from making changes to municipal institutions without municipal consent (East York (Borough) v. Ontario (1997), 36 O.R. (3d) 733 (C.A.), at pp. 737-38, per Abella J.A.). And "it is not for this Court to create constitutional rights in respect of a third order of government where the words of the Constitution read in context do not do so" (Baier v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 31, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 673, at para. 39).

3 Aside from one reference to s. 92(8) -- and an acknowledgement that the Province of Ontario had constitutional authority to act as it did in this case -- our colleague Abella J. all but ignores this decisive constitutional context (para. 112). And yet, these considerations loom large here. After the closing of a nomination period for elections to the Toronto City Council, the Province legislated a new, reduced ward structure for the City of Toronto and a correspondingly reduced Council. The City says that doing so was unconstitutional, because it limited the s. 2(b) Charter rights of electoral participants and violated the unwritten constitutional principle of democracy. It also, says the City, ran afoul of the constitutional requirements of effective representation, which it says flow from s. 2(b) of the Charter and s. 92(8) of the Constitution Act, 1867 by virtue of that same unwritten constitutional principle of democracy.

4 None of these arguments have merit, and we would dismiss the City's appeal. In our view, the Province acted constitutionally. As to the s. 2(b) claim, the City seeks access to a statutory platform which must be considered under the framework stated in Baier. The change to the ward structure did not prevent electoral participants from engaging in further political expression on election issues under the new ward structure in the 69 days between the Act coming into force and the election day. There was no substantial interference with the claimants' freedom of expression and thus no limitation of s. 2(b).

5 Nor did the Act otherwise violate the Constitution. Unwritten constitutional principles cannot in themselves ground a declaration of invalidity under s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, and there is no freestanding right to effective representation outside s. 3 of the Charter. Further, the unwritten constitutional principle of democracy cannot be used to narrow provincial authority under s. 92(8), or to read municipalities into s. 3.

II. Background

6 In 2013, the City of Toronto engaged consultants to conduct the Toronto Ward Boundary Review of Toronto's then 44-ward structure. They recommended an expanded 47-ward structure, which the City adopted in 2016.

7 On May 1, 2018, the City of Toronto campaign commenced and nominations opened in preparation for an election day on October 22, 2018. By the close of nominations on July 27, 2018, just over 500 candidates had registered to run in the 47 wards. That same day, the Government of Ontario announced its intention to introduce legislation reducing the size of Toronto City Council to 25 wards. On August 14, 2018, the Better Local Government Act, 2018, S.O. 2018, c. 11 ("Act"), came into force, reducing the number of wards from 47 to 25 (based on the boundaries of the federal electoral districts), and extending the nomination period to September 14.

8 The City and two groups of private individuals applied on an urgent basis to the Ontario Superior Court of Justice challenging the constitutionality of these measures and seeking orders restoring the 47-ward structure. They argued that the Act breached Charter guarantees of freedom of expression, freedom of association, and equality, and that it violated the unwritten constitutional principles of democracy and the rule of law.

9 The application judge agreed, finding two limits on s. 2(b) of the Charter (2018 ONSC 5151, 142 O.R. (3d) 336). First, he found that the Act limited the municipal candidates' s. 2(b) right to freedom of expression, a conclusion largely tied to the timing of the Act, enacted as it was during the election campaign. Secondly, he found that the Act limited municipal voters' s. 2(b) right to effective representation -- despite the fact that effective representation is a principle of s. 3 (and not s. 2(b)) of the Charter - - due to his conclusion that the ward population sizes brought about by the Act were too large to allow councillors to effectively represent their constituents. Neither of these limits could, he further held, be justified under s. 1 and he set aside the impugned provisions of the Act. As a result, the election was to proceed on the basis of the 47-ward system.

10 The Province appealed and moved to stay the judgment pending appeal. The Court of Appeal for Ontario granted the stay on September 19, 2018, concluding that there was a strong likelihood that the Province's appeal would be successful and, on October 22, 2018, the Toronto municipal election proceeded on the basis of the 25-ward structure created by the Act (2018 ONCA 761, 142 O.R. (3d) 481). No issue is taken with the integrity of the election or the results thereof.

11 When the Court of Appeal decided the Province's appeal on its merits, it divided. While the dissenters would have invalidated the Act as unjustifiably limiting freedom of expression, the majority allowed the appeal, finding no such limit (2019 ONCA 732, 146 O.R. (3d) 705). The City had advanced a positive rights claim -- that is, a claim for a particular platform and not protection from state interference with the conveyance of a message. Consistent with the Baier framework governing such claims, the majority applied the factors stated in Dunmore v. Ontario (Attorney General), 2001 SCC 94, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 1016, to conclude that the claim was not properly grounded in s. 2(b) of the Charter, and that the application judge had erred in finding that the Act substantially interfered with the candidates' freedom of expression. Further, he had erred in finding that the right to effective representation -- guaranteed by s. 3 -- applies to municipal elections and bears any influence over the s. 2(b) analysis. Finally, the majority held that unwritten constitutional principles do not confer upon the judiciary power to invalidate legislation that does not otherwise infringe the Charter, nor do they limit provincial legislative authority over municipal institutions. Though unwritten constitutional principles are sometimes used to fill gaps in the Constitution, no such gap exists here.

12 The Court of Appeal appears to have granted the City public interest standing to argue the appeal (para. 28). The City's standing was not challenged before this Court.

III. Issues

13 Two issues arise from the foregoing. First, did the Act limit (unjustifiably or at all) the freedom of expression of candidates and/or voters participating in the 2018 Toronto municipal election? And secondly, can the unwritten constitutional principle of democracy be applied, either to narrow provincial legislative authority over municipal institutions or to require effective representation in those institutions, so as to invalidate the Act?

IV. Analysis

A. Freedom of Expression

(1) Principles of Charter Interpretation in the Context of Section 2(b)

14 This appeal hinges on the scope of s. 2(b) of the Charter, which provides that everyone has the fundamental freedoms "of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication". A purposive interpretation of Charter rights must begin with, and be rooted in, the text (Quebec (Attorney General) v. 9147-0732 Québec inc., 2020 SCC 32, at paras. 8-10) and not overshoot the purpose of the right but place it in its appropriate linguistic, philosophic and historical contexts (R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295, at p. 344). Yet, it is undeniable that s. 2(b) has traditionally been interpreted expansively (Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 927, at p. 976; Ford v. Quebec (Attorney General), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 712, at pp. 765-67). Indeed, s. 2(b) has been interpreted so broadly that the framework has been criticized for setting too low a bar for establishing a s. 2(b) limitation, such that any consideration of its substantive reach and bounds is generally consigned to the limitations analysis under s. 1 (K. Chan, "Constitutionalizing the Registered Charity Regime: Reflections on Canada Without Poverty" (2020), 6 C.J.C.C.L. 151, at p. 174, citing M. Plaxton and C. Mathen, "Developments in Constitutional Law: The 2009-2010 Term" (2010), 52 S.C.L.R. (2d) 65). Following Irwin Toy, then, if an activity conveys or attempts to convey a meaning, it has expressive content and prima facie falls within the scope of "expression" (p. 969). Further, if the purpose or effect of the impugned governmental action is to control attempts to convey meaning through that activity, a limit on expressive freedom will be shown (p. 972).

15 Freedom of expression is not, however, presently recognized as being without internal limits. Activities may fall outside the scope of s. 2(b) where the method of the activity itself -- such as violence -- or the location of that activity is not consonant with Charter protection (Montréal (City) v. 2952-1366 Québec Inc., 2005 SCC 62, [2005] 3 S.C.R. 141, at paras. 60 and 62).

16 Further, and of particular significance to this appeal, s. 2(b) has been interpreted as "generally impos[ing] a negative obligation ... rather than a positive obligation of protection or assistance" (Baier, at para. 20 (emphasis added), citing Haig v. Canada, [1993] 2 S.C.R. 995, at p. 1035). A claim is properly characterized as negative where the claimant seeks "freedom from government legislation or action suppressing an expressive activity in which people would otherwise be free to engage" (Baier, at para. 35 (emphasis added)). Such claims of right under s. 2(b) are considered under this Court's Irwin Toy framework.

17 In Baier, however, this Court explained that s. 2(b) may, in certain circumstances, impose positive obligations on the government to facilitate expression. Put differently, while s. 2(b) typically "prohibits gags", it can also, in rare and narrowly circumscribed cases, "compel the distribution of megaphones" (para. 21, quoting Haig, at p. 1035). Hence the Court of Appeal's statement in this case that "[f]reedom of expression is respected, in the main, if governments simply refrain from actions that would be an unjustified interference with it", and that positive claims under s. 2(b) may be recognized in only "exceptional and narrow" circumstances (paras. 42 and 48 (emphasis in original)).

18 Central to whether s. 2(b) was limited by the Province here is, therefore, the appropriate characterization of the claim as between a negative and positive claim of right. In Baier, this Court shielded positive claims from the Irwin Toy framework and subjected them to an elevated threshold. This is necessary, given the ease with which claimants can typically show a limit to free expression under the Irwin Toy test. An elevated threshold for positive claims narrows the circumstances in which a government or legislature must legislate or otherwise act to support freedom of expression. To consider positive claims under Irwin Toy would be to force the government to justify, under s. 1, any decisions not to provide particular statutory platforms for expression.

19 The Baier framework is therefore not confined, as our colleague suggests, "to address[ing] underinclusive statutory regimes" (para. 148). This Court could not have been clearer in Baier that it applies "where a government defending a Charter challenge alleges, or the Charter claimant concedes, that a positive rights claim is being made under s. 2(b)" (para. 30). Were it otherwise -- that is, were Baier's application limited to cases of underinclusion -- claims seeking the creation or extension of a statutory platform for expression would be considered under Baier while claims seeking the preservation of that same platform would be considered under Irwin Toy. This is illogical. Baier's reach extends beyond cases of underinclusion or exclusion, and categorically limits the "obligation[s] on government to provide individuals with a particular platform for expression" (Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority v. Canadian Federation of Students -- British Columbia Component, 2009 SCC 31, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 295, at para. 35). This reflects the separation of powers; choices about whether and how to design a statutory or regulatory platform are best left to the elected orders of the state.

20 We should not be taken as suggesting that s. 2(b) is to be understood as conferring a right that is wholly positive or wholly negative. Many constitutional rights have both positive and negative dimensions and the Baier framework explicitly recognizes that this is so for s. 2(b). But the distinction between those positive and negative dimensions remains important when considering the nature of the obligation that the claim seeks to impose upon the state: a "right's positive dimensions require government to act in certain ways, whereas its negative dimensions require government to refrain from acting in other ways" (P. Macklem, "Aboriginal Rights and State Obligations" (1997), 36 Alta. L. Rev. 97, at p. 101; see also A. Sen, The Idea of Justice (2009), at p. 282). For instance, would the claim, if accepted, require government action, or is the claim concerned with restrictions on the content or meaning of expression? And, were the claim rejected, would it deny the claimant access to a particular platform for expression on a subject, or would it preclude altogether the possibility of conveying expression on that subject? While in Haig, L'Heureux-Dubé J. correctly noted that the distinction between positive and negative entitlements is "not always clearly made, nor ... always helpful", she nevertheless distinguished typical negative claims from those that might require "positive governmental action" (p. 1039). This is the distinction with which we concern ourselves here.

21 This appeal therefore presents an opportunity to affirm and clarify the application of Baier to positive claims under s. 2(b). Baier remains good law in the context of s. 2(b). It adopts a framework for analysis first set forth in Dunmore, which itself decided a claim under s. 2(d) (freedom of association). We need not decide here whether Dunmore remains applicable to s. 2(d) claims (an open question, given the decisions of this Court in Ontario (Attorney General) v. Fraser, 2011 SCC 20, [2011] 2 S.C.R. 3, and Mounted Police Association of Ontario v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 1, [2015] 1 S.C.R. 3). It suffices here for us to affirm Baier as a useful and necessary framework in the context of positive s. 2(b) claims (although, as we will explain, we would simplify the framework).

(2) The Baier Framework

22 The Baier framework applies if a claimant seeks to impose an obligation on the government (or legislature) to provide access to a particular statutory or regulatory platform for expression (para. 30; Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority, at para. 35). Here, therefore, if the City's claim would require the government or legislature to enact legislation or promulgate regulations, or otherwise act to provide a particular statutory or regulatory platform, it is advancing a positive claim (Baier, at para. 35).

23 In Baier, this Court held that, to succeed, a positive claim must satisfy the three Dunmore factors: (1) Is the claim grounded in freedom of expression, rather than in access to a particular statutory regime? (2) Has the claimant demonstrated that lack of access to a statutory regime has the effect of a substantial interference with freedom of expression, or has the purpose of infringing freedom of expression? (3) Is the government responsible for the inability to exercise the fundamental freedom?

24 These factors set an elevated threshold for positive claims. The first factor asks what the claimant is really seeking -- in other words, whether the claim is grounded in freedom of expression or whether it merely seeks access to a statutory regime. Likewise, the second factor -- which requires that the claimant establish a substantial interference with freedom of expression -- sets a higher threshold than that stated in Irwin Toy, which asks only whether "the purpose or effect of the government action in question was to restrict freedom of expression" (p. 971; see also Baier, at paras. 27-28 and 45).

25 So understood, these factors can usefully be distilled to a single core question: is the claim grounded in the fundamental Charter freedom of expression, such that, by denying access to a statutory platform or by otherwise failing to act, the government has either substantially interfered with freedom of expression, or had the purpose of interfering with freedom of expression? This is, to be clear, a single question which emphasizes the elevated threshold in the second Dunmore factor while encompassing the considerations of the first and third factors. Given what we see as the significant overlap among the factors -- particularly between the first and second -- this is, in our view, a salutary clarification of the Baier test, entirely consistent with this Court's approach in Baier and Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority. To be clear, s. 2(b) does not remove the authority that a legislature has to create or modify statutory platforms, because it does not include the right to access any statutory platform in particular. However, when a legislature chooses to provide such a platform, then it must comply with the Charter (Haig, at p. 1041).

26 If, therefore, a claimant can demonstrate that, by denying access to a statutory platform, the government has substantially interfered with freedom of expression or acted with the purpose of doing so, the claim may proceed.

Despite being a positive claim, the claimant has demonstrated a limit to its s. 2(b) right, and -- subject to justification of such limit under s. 1 -- government action or legislation may be required.

27 There is no suggestion here that the Province acted with the purpose of interfering with freedom of expression, and we therefore confine our observations here to the claim presented -- that is, a claim that a law has had the effect of substantially interfering with freedom of expression. In our view, a substantial interference with freedom of expression occurs where lack of access to a statutory platform has the effect of radically frustrating expression to such an extent that meaningful expression is "effectively preclude[d]" (Ontario (Public Safety and Security) v. Criminal Lawyers' Association, 2010 SCC 23, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 815, at para. 33). While meaningful expression need not be rendered absolutely impossible, we stress that effective preclusion represents an exceedingly high bar that would be met only in extreme and rare cases (Baier, at para. 27; Dunmore, at para. 25). For example, a statutory reduction of the length of an election campaign to two days may well, as a practical matter, be shown to have the effect of constituting a substantial interference with freedom of expression. In such a case, meaningful expression may very well be found to be effectively precluded.

28 The height of this bar of effective preclusion is demonstrated by Baier. There, legislation was amended to prohibit school employees from running for election as school trustees, and the Court -- applying the Dunmore factors -- concluded that no substantial interference with freedom of expression was demonstrated. The claim was grounded merely in access to a particular statutory platform governing school trusteeship, rather than a substantial interference with freedom of expression. And, in any event, there was no interference, substantial or otherwise, with the appellants' ability to express views on matters relating to the education system. Their exclusion from the statutory scheme deprived them only of one particular means of such expression (paras. 44 and 48).

(3) Application

(a) Nature of the Claim

29 The first question to answer in deciding this appeal is whether the City advances a positive claim. There are two ways in which the City's claim can be understood. Each leads to the conclusion that the claim is, in substance, a positive claim that must, therefore, show a substantial interference with freedom of expression.

30 The first possible view of the City's claim is that of restoring an earlier statutory platform, specifically the 47-ward structure. That this is so is evident from the City's requested disposition, which asks that the next municipal election be conducted under the previous framework (A.F., at para. 152). The City, then, would have the Province act (either by enacting new legislation or repealing the impugned provisions of the Act) to restore the previous statutory platform. This reveals a straightforward positive claim. The fact that the City and the participants in the election had previously enjoyed access to the 47-ward structure is of no legal significance. In Baier, this Court viewed a claim for restoring the status quo as a positive claim, equating it with a demand to legislate a framework for the first time. Such an approach is necessary to prevent fettering; "[t]o hold otherwise would mean that once a government had created a statutory platform, it could never change or repeal it without infringing s. 2(b)" (para. 36).

31 The second possible view of the City's claim is that of maintaining an existing statutory platform. The City frames its claim as asking the Province, once a municipal election period commences, to ensure access to whatever election platform existed at that time. In the City's view, what is otherwise political expression becomes what it calls "electoral expression" during an election period (A.F., at para. 54). Protection of this "electoral expression", it says, requires the maintenance of the particular electoral framework that was in place at the beginning of the electoral period. Framed thusly, the City's claim that the impugned provisions of the Act limited s. 2(b) turns squarely on the timing of the Act. Indeed, at the hearing of this appeal, the City conceded that barring any other potential issues, the Province was constitutionally permitted to enact this same legislation in the week following the election. Further, the City requested -- in the event that this Court finds only that the timing of the Act was unconstitutional -- a declaration to that effect, rather than a remedy that would restore the previous 47-ward structure.

32 The City's focus on the timing of the Act cannot, however, convert its positive claim into a negative one. While its claim is couched in language of non-interference -- something that superficially resembles a negative claim to be considered under the Irwin Toy framework -- the City does not seek protection of electoral participants' expression from restrictions tied to content or meaning (as was the case, for example, in Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority); rather, it seeks a particular platform (being whatever council structure existed at the outset of the campaign) by which to channel, and around which to structure, that expression.

33 So understood, the claim is akin to that rejected in Baier. The only point of distinction is that Baier involved a request for a specific type of legislative regime (i.e., one that permitted school employees to run for and serve as school board trustees), while the claim in this case is for temporary protection -- that is, for the duration of the campaign -- of whatever particular type of election structure existed at the outset of the election period. But, for the purposes of deciding constitutionality, there is no difference between the present case and a hypothetical scenario in which the Province were to scrap the ongoing election and replace it with a completely new platform with a different structure and a reasonable campaign period altogether. Here, the City is able to frame its claim only in terms of non-interference because the Act modified the existing structure without scrapping it. But the ultimate result is the same. The City's claim is still a claim for access to a particular statutory platform; the precise disposition requested simply depends on whatever electoral framework is in place at the outset of the election process. It is thus a positive claim. Because municipal elections are merely statutory platforms without a constitutional basis, provinces can -- subject to the elevated threshold of a substantial interference -- change the rules as they wish.

34 To hold otherwise would be to contemplate an unprecedented statutory freeze on provincial jurisdiction under s. 92(8), temporarily constitutionalizing a particular statutory platform for the duration of an election. What would normally be considered a positive claim under s. 2(b) would effectively transform into a negative claim for that period of time. This is constitutionally dubious, nonsensical, and even futile since the duration of such a freeze would depend entirely on the length of the election, over which the Province itself has ultimate authority. With respect, our colleague Abella J. ignores these concerns in holding that Irwin Toy ought to apply to a claim such as this. Provincial authority to legislate a change to Toronto's ward structure is accepted, but on our colleague's understanding this authority is operative only some of the time (para. 112). Combined with her broad articulation of the Irwin Toy threshold in this context -- whether legislation "destabiliz[es] the opportunity for meaningful reciprocal discourse" -- such an understanding would effectively freeze legislative authority to even tangentially affect a municipal election for the duration of the campaign (para. 115). Such a freeze sits awkwardly with the plenary authority that provinces enjoy under s. 92(8) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

35 In sum, the City advances a positive claim and the Baier framework applies.

(b) Application of Baier

36 As explained above, the Baier framework asks whether the claimant demonstrated that, by denying access to a statutory regime, the government has substantially interfered with freedom of expression. To repeat, this is a demanding threshold, requiring the City to show that the Act radically frustrated the expression of election participants such that meaningful expression was effectively precluded. In our view, the City cannot do so and therefore has not established a limit on s. 2(b).

37 Here, the candidates and their supporters had 69 days -- longer than most federal and provincial election campaigns -- to re-orient their messages and freely express themselves according to the new ward structure. (Our colleague Abella J. is simply incorrect to suggest, at para. 104, that only one month of the campaign remained. It was twice that.) The Act did not prevent candidates from engaging in further political speech under the new structure. Candidates continued to campaign vigorously, canvassing and debating about issues unrelated to the impugned provisions, the size of council or the ward boundaries. And even had they not, nothing in the Act prevented them from doing so. It imposed no restrictions on the content or meaning of the messages that participants could convey. Many of the challengers who continued to campaign ultimately had, by any measure, successful campaigns, raising significant amounts of money and receiving significant numbers of votes. This would not have been possible had their s. 2(b) rights been so radically frustrated so as to effectively preclude meaningful expression.

38 It is of course likely that some of the candidates' prior expression may have lost its relevance; pamphlets or other campaign paraphernalia with an old ward designation on them, for instance, had to be revised or discarded. But, with the new ward structure -- and larger ward populations -- came higher campaign expenditure limits, so candidates were able to raise more funds over the 69 days they had left in the campaign. This is, therefore, a complaint that the prior expression of the candidates was no longer meaningful or helpful in their project to secure election. It is, at its root, a complaint about diminished effectiveness.

39 While diminished effectiveness might be enough to amount to a limit of s. 2(b) in its traditional negative orientation -- see, for instance, Harper v. Canada (Attorney General), 2004 SCC 33, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 827, at para. 15, per McLachlin C.J. and Major J., dissenting in part, but not on this point, and Libman v. Quebec (Attorney General), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 569 -- more is required under the Baier framework. In the context of a positive claim, only extreme government action that extinguishes the effectiveness of expression -- for instance, instituting a two-day electoral campaign -- may rise to the level of a substantial interference with freedom of expression; such an act may effectively preclude meaningful expression in the context of the election. That is simply not what happened here. Section 2(b) is not a guarantee of the effectiveness or continued relevance of a message, or that campaign materials otherwise retain their usefulness throughout the campaign.

40 Even accepting that the change in structure diminished the effectiveness of the electoral candidates' prior political speech by rendering some of their 47-ward campaign communications less relevant, this does not rise to the level of substantial interference. Again, the campaign that took place over 69 days following the imposition of the 25-ward system was vigorously contested by candidates whose freedom of expression was clearly not radically frustrated. We acknowledge that the application judge found a substantial interference with freedom of expression (para. 32). There are, however, three problems with his finding. First, this finding was made in the context of legal error, since he erroneously applied the Irwin Toy framework for a negative claim. Secondly, and relatedly, the reasons of the judge make clear that this finding was tied to the diminished effectiveness of the candidates' expression, something that, as explained, is simply insufficient to show a limit on freedom of expression under the Baier framework. Finally, given the truncated timelines of the matter at first instance, the judge was required to make this finding on a limited factual record. With the benefit of fresh evidence adduced by the Province and admitted at this Court, it is clear that the candidates were not effectively precluded from expressing themselves in the context of the campaign. They conducted vigorous, hard-fought campaigns about the issues that mattered to them.

41 The City says that the expression at issue here -- again, what it calls "electoral expression" -- is uniquely connected to, and dependent on, the framework of the election itself. Therefore, it says, the scope of s. 2(b) encompasses not only the expression itself but also the structure of the election. Put thusly, however, the claim is not dissimilar to the "unique role" of school trusteeship claimed by the appellants, and rejected by the Court, in Baier. Claiming a unique role or dependence on a statutory platform is not the same as claiming a fundamental freedom (Baier, at para. 44). Doing so is simply to seek access to that statutory platform. That is what the City seeks here.

42 In sum, the Baier threshold is not met here. The Act imposed no limit on freedom of expression.

43 Having found no limit to s. 2(b), we need not consider s. 1. We note, however, that our colleague Abella J. decides s. 1 against the Province on the basis that it "offered no explanation, let alone a pressing and substantial one, for why the changes were made in the middle of an ongoing election" (para. 161). This ignores the Province's written and oral submissions that the newly elected government proceeded expeditiously so as to be able to implement these changes within the time constraints of its own elected mandate, rather than wait four years until the next municipal election (R.F., at para. 149; transcript, at pp. 111-12).

44 The City also says that the impugned provisions of the Act infringe "effective representation", an incident of the guarantee contained in s. 3 of the Charter which, the City says, can be imported into s. 2(b).

45 Section 3 guarantees citizens the right to vote and run for office in provincial and federal elections, and includes a right to effective representation. The text of s. 3 makes clear, however, that it guarantees "only the right to vote in elections of representatives of the federal and the provincial legislative assemblies" (Haig, at p. 1031 (emphasis added)) and "does not extend to municipal elections" (p. 1031 (emphasis added), citing P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (3rd ed. 1992), vol. 2, at p. 42-2). Simply put, ss. 2(b) and 3 record distinct rights which must be given independent meaning (Thomson Newspapers Co. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 877, at paras. 79-80; Harper, at para. 67). Effective representation is not a principle of s. 2(b), nor can the concept be imported wholesale from a different Charter right.

46 In any event, effective representation connotes voter parity which, while not exhaustive of the requirements of effective representation, is the overarching concern and the condition of "prime importance" (Reference re Prov. Electoral Boundaries (Sask.), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 158, at p. 184). What matters is the relative population of the wards, not their absolute size. To hold otherwise implies keeping the population of wards relatively constant by increasing the number of councillors to keep pace with population growth, a notion unknown to Canadian law (in s. 3 or elsewhere) and which would not be without its own difficulties, including potentially unwieldy growth in the size of Toronto City Council (M. Pal, "The Unwritten Principle of Democracy" (2019), 65 McGill L.J. 269, at pp. 298-99; J. C. Courtney, Commissioned Ridings: Designing Canada's Electoral Districts (2001), at pp. 15 and 19).

47 And even were effective representation to apply as a consideration here, we would not find that the principle has been violated due only to the larger population sizes of the wards created by the Act. It is not disputed that the 25-ward structure of the Act enhanced voter parity, relative to the 47-ward structure preferred by the City (which was not even designed to achieve voter parity until 2026) (A.F., at para. 150; R.F., at paras. 35, 38, 133, 143 and 148). Indeed, the Toronto Ward Boundary Review's reasoning for having rejected the 25-ward structure was criticized on this very basis (R.R. (short), vol. II, at pp. 65, 69, 72-73 and 77-78). While the principle of effective representation encompasses more than simple voter parity, those who rely upon the principle of effective representation here fail to identify any other factors -- geography, community history, community interests and minority representation -- that could conceivably justify a departure from parity (see Reference re Prov. Electoral Boundaries (Sask.), at p. 184).

B. Democracy

48 The second issue on appeal is whether the impugned provisions of the Act are unconstitutional for violating the unwritten constitutional principle of democracy. Specifically, the City argues that the change in ward structure violated the unwritten principle of democracy by denying voters effective representation and disrupting the election process (A.F., at para. 105). It therefore asks the Court to use the democratic principle as a basis for invalidating otherwise valid provincial legislation. It says this is made possible by drawing from this Court's s. 3 jurisprudence and from the concept of effective representation, and by viewing the principle as limiting provincial competence under s. 92(8). Conversely, and echoing the Court of Appeal on this point, the Attorney General of Ontario says that the unwritten constitutional principle of democracy cannot be used as a device for invalidating legislation, independently of written constitutional provisions and the law governing them. For the reasons that follow, the Attorney General is correct.

(1) Interpretive and Gap-Filling Roles of Unwritten Constitutional Principles

49 The Constitution of Canada embodies written and unwritten norms. This Court has recognized that our Constitution describes an architecture of the institutions of state and of their relationship to citizens that connotes certain underlying principles (Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 3, at para. 93; Reference re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217, at paras. 50-51). These principles, such as democracy and the rule of law, "infuse our Constitution" (Secession Reference, at para. 50).

Although not recorded outside of "oblique reference[s]" in the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867 and to the Constitution Act, 1982 (para. 51), these principles are "foundational" (para. 49), without which "it would be impossible to conceive of our constitutional structure" (para. 51). These principles have "full legal force" and may give rise to substantive legal obligations (para. 54, quoting Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution, [1981] 1 S.C.R. 753, at p. 845). "[L]ike all principles of political morality, [they] can guide and constrain the decision-making of the executive and legislative branches" (C.A. reasons, at para. 84, citing British Columbia v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2005 SCC 49, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 473, at para. 52).

50 Unwritten principles are therefore part of the law of our Constitution, in the sense that they form part of the context and backdrop to the Constitution's written terms. Our colleague Abella J. seizes upon a statement from a dissenting opinion in Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution to support the proposition that "full legal force" necessarily includes the power to invalidate legislation. But the complete passage in Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution, and the jurisprudence cited therein, demonstrates that Martland and Ritchie JJ. are discussing federalism; and, while specific aspects of federalism may be unwritten and judicially developed, it is indisputable that federalism has a strong textual basis. Nor does our colleague's reliance upon MacMillan Bloedel Ltd. v. Simpson, [1995] 4 S.C.R. 725 (at para. 176), support the capacity of unwritten constitutional principles to invalidate legislation, since the finding there was that granting exclusive jurisdiction to the youth court would infringe ss. 96 to 101 and 129 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Regardless, any uncertainty on the question of whether unwritten constitutional principles may invalidate legislation that may have remained after the Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution and the Secession Reference was, as we will explain, fully put to rest in Imperial Tobacco.

51 Further, the authorities she cites as "recogniz[ing] that unwritten constitutional principles have full legal force and can serve as substantive limitations on all branches of government" (para. 166) do not support the proposition that unwritten constitutional principles can be applied to invalidate legislation. Indeed, it is quite the contrary -- for example, in R. (on the application of Miller) v. Prime Minister, [2019] UKSC 41, [2020] A.C. 373, at para. 41, the Supreme Court of the United Kingdom stated that the constitutional principle of parliamentary sovereignty means that legislation itself ("laws enacted by the Crown in Parliament"), under the Constitution of the United Kingdom, remains "the supreme form of law". While courts in the United Kingdom may find primary legislation to be inconsistent with the European Convention on Human Rights, 213 U.N.T.S. 221, they may only issue a declaration of incompatibility (Human Rights Act 1998 (U.K.), 1998, c. 42, s. 4); they have not used unwritten constitutional principles to invalidate legislation.

52 Our colleague is concerned about the "rare case" where "legislation [that] elides the reach of any express constitutional provision ... is fundamentally at odds with our Constitution's 'internal architecture' or 'basic constitutional structure'" and recourse must be had to unwritten constitutional principles (para. 170, quoting Secession Reference, at para. 50, and OPSEU v. Ontario (Attorney General), [1987] 2 S.C.R. 2, at p. 57). But it is inconceivable that legislation which is repugnant to our "basic constitutional structure" would not infringe the Constitution itself. And that structure, recorded in the Constitution's text (as we discuss below), is interpreted with the aid of unwritten constitutional principles. This is clear from the context of Martland and Ritchie JJ.'s statement that unwritten principles have "full legal force in the sense of being employed to strike down legislative enactments" (Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution, at p. 845). As noted above, that case was about federalism, as was the jurisprudence cited in support of their statement; Martland and Ritchie JJ. were describing the "constitutional requirements that are derived from the federal character of Canada's Constitution" (pp. 844-45 (emphasis added)). And this is precisely the point; while the specific aspects of federalism at issue there may not have been found in the express terms of the Constitution, federalism is.

53 To explain, federalism is fully enshrined in the structure of our Constitution, because it is enshrined in the text that is constitutive thereof; particularly, but not exclusively, in ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Structures are not comprised of unattached externalities; they are embodiments of their constituent, conjoined parts. The structure of our Constitution is identified by way of its actual provisions, recorded in its text. This is why our colleague can offer no example of legislation that would undermine the structure of the Constitution that cannot be addressed as we propose, which is via purposive textual interpretation. It is also why, once "constitutional structure" is properly understood, it becomes clear that, when our colleague invokes "constitutional structure", she is in substance inviting judicial invalidation of legislation in a manner that is wholly untethered from that structure.

54 Ultimately, what "full legal force" means is dependent on the particular context. Any legal instrument or device, such as a contract or a will or a rule, has "full legal force" within its proper ambit. Our colleague's position -- that because unwritten constitutional principles have "full legal force", they must necessarily be capable of invalidating legislation -- assumes the answer to the preliminary but essential question: what is the "full legal force" of unwritten constitutional principles? And in our view, because they are unwritten, their "full legal force" is realized not in supplementing the written text of our Constitution as "provisions of the Constitution" with which no law may be inconsistent and remain of "force or effect" under s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. Unwritten constitutional principles are not "provisions of the Constitution". Their legal force lies in their representation of general principles within which our constitutional order operates and, therefore, by which the Constitution's written terms -- its provisions -- are to be given effect. In practical terms, this means that unwritten constitutional principles may assist courts in only two distinct but related ways.

55 First, they may be used in the interpretation of constitutional provisions. Indeed, that is the "full legal force" that this Court described in Secession Reference (para. 54). In this way, the unwritten constitutional principles of judicial independence and the rule of law have aided in the interpretation of ss. 96 to 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which have come to safeguard the core jurisdiction of the courts which fall within the scope of those provisions (Provincial Court Judges Reference, at paras. 88-89; MacMillan Bloedel, at paras. 10-11 and 27-28; Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2014 SCC 59, [2014] 3 S.C.R. 31, at paras. 29-33). When applied to Charter rights, unwritten principles assist with purposive interpretation, informing "the character and the larger objects of the Charter itself, ... the language chosen to articulate the specific right or freedom, [and] the historical origins of the concepts enshrined" (Quebec (Attorney General), at para. 7, quoting Big M Drug Mart Ltd., at p. 344; see also R. v. Poulin, 2019 SCC 47, at para. 32).

56 Secondly, and relatedly, unwritten principles can be used to develop structural doctrines unstated in the written Constitution per se, but necessary to the coherence of, and flowing by implication from, its architecture. In this way, structural doctrines can fill gaps and address important questions on which the text of the Constitution is silent, such as the doctrine of full faith and credit (Morguard Investments Ltd. v. De Savoye, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 1077; Hunt v. T&N plc, [1993] 4 S.C.R. 289); the doctrine of paramountcy (Huson v. The Township of South Norwich (1895), 24 S.C.R. 145); the remedy of suspended declarations of invalidity (Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 721); and the obligations to negotiate that would follow a declaration of secession by a province (Secession Reference).

57 Neither of these functions support the proposition advanced by the City that the force of unwritten principles extends to invalidating legislation. Indeed, the truth of the matter is to the contrary. Attempts to apply unwritten constitutional principles in such a manner as an independent basis to invalidate legislation, whether alone or in combination, suffer from a normative and a practical deficiency, each related to the other, and each fatal on its own.

58 First, such attempts trespass into legislative authority to amend the Constitution, thereby raising fundamental concerns about the legitimacy of judicial review and distorting the separation of powers (Imperial Tobacco, at paras. 53-54, 60 and 64-67; J. Leclair, "Canada's Unfathomable Unwritten Constitutional Principles" (2002), 27 Queen's L.J. 389, at pp. 427-32). Our colleague's approach, which invites the use of unwritten constitutional principles in a manner that is wholly untethered from the text, ignores this fundamental concern.

59 Secondly, unwritten constitutional principles are "highly abstract" and "[u]nlike the rights enumerated in the Charter -- rights whose textual formulations were debated, refined and ultimately resolved by the committees and legislative assemblies entrusted with constitution-making authority -- the concep[t] of democracy ... ha[s] no canonical formulatio[n]" (C.A. reasons, at para. 85). Unlike the written text of the Constitution, then, which "promotes legal certainty and predictability" in the exercise of judicial review (Secession Reference, at para. 53), the nebulous nature of the unwritten principles makes them susceptible to be interpreted so as to "render many of our written constitutional rights redundant and, in doing so, undermine the delimitation of those rights chosen by our constitutional framers" (Imperial Tobacco, at para. 65). Accordingly, there is good reason to insist that "protection from legislation that some might view as unjust or unfair properly lies not in the amorphous underlying principles of our Constitution, but in its text and the ballot box" (para. 66). In our view, this statement should be understood as covering all possible bases for claims of right (i.e., "unjust or unfair" or otherwise normatively deficient).

60 We add this. Were a court to rely on unwritten constitutional principles, in whole or in part, to invalidate legislation, the consequences of this judicial error would be of particular significance given two provisions of our Charter. First, s. 33 preserves a limited right of legislative override. Where, therefore, a court invalidates legislation using s. 2(b) of the Charter, the legislature may give continued effect to its understanding of what the Constitution requires by invoking s. 33 and by meeting its stated conditions (D. Newman, "Canada's Notwithstanding Clause, Dialogue, and Constitutional Identities", in G. Sigalet, G. Webber and R. Dixon, eds., Constitutional Dialogue: Rights, Democracy, Institutions (2019), 209, at p. 232). Were, however, a court to rely not on s. 2(b) but instead upon an unwritten constitutional principle to invalidate legislation, this undeniable aspect of the constitutional bargain would effectively be undone, since s. 33 applies to permit legislation to operate "notwithstanding a provision included in section 2 or sections 7 to 15" only. Secondly, s. 1 provides a basis for the state to justify limits on "the rights and freedoms set out" in the Charter. Unwritten constitutional principles, being unwritten, are not "set out" in the Charter. To find, therefore, that they can ground a constitutional violation would afford the state no corresponding justificatory mechanism.

61 Our colleague says that the application of s. 33 "is not directly before us" (para. 182). As the City has advanced its claim on the basis of s. 2(b), coupled with the unwritten principle of democracy, the prospect of circumventing s. 33's application to the invalidation of legislation under s. 2(b) by recourse to unwritten constitutional principles is indeed squarely before us.

62 We note an important caveat to the foregoing. The unwritten constitutional principle of the honour of the Crown is sui generis. As correctly noted in submissions of the interveners the Métis Nation of Ontario and the Métis Nation of Alberta, the honour of the Crown arises from the assertion of Crown sovereignty over pre-existing Aboriginal societies (Haida Nation v. British Columbia (Minister of Forests), 2004 SCC 73, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 511, at para. 32), and from the unique relationship between the Crown and Indigenous peoples (Guerin v. The Queen, [1984] 2 S.C.R. 335, at p. 385). We need not decide here whether the principle is capable of grounding the constitutional invalidation of legislation, but if it is, it is unique in this regard.

63 In sum, and contrary to the submissions of the City, unwritten constitutional principles cannot serve as bases for invalidating legislation. A careful review of the Court's jurisprudence supports this conclusion.

(a) The Provincial Court Judges Reference

64 In the Provincial Court Judges Reference, this Court considered whether judicial independence, "an unwritten norm, recognized and affirmed by the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867" (para. 109), restricted the extent to which a provincial government could reduce the salaries of provincial court judges. That principle, the Court held, emerged from the reading together of s. 11(d) of the Charter, and the preamble and ss. 96 to 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867 (para. 124). For the majority, Lamer C.J. was explicit in emphasizing the merely interpretive role of the unwritten constitutional principle of judicial independence in supplementing the text of ss. 96 and 100:

The point which emerges from this brief discussion is that the interpretation of ss. 96 and 100 has come a long way from what those provisions actually say. This jurisprudential evolution undermines the force of the argument that the written text of the Constitution is comprehensive and definitive in its protection of judicial independence. The only way to explain the interpretation of ss. 96 and 100, in fact, is by reference to a deeper set of unwritten understandings which are not found on the face of the document itself. [First and second emphasis added; third emphasis in original; para. 89.]

65 In other words, where the constitutional text is not itself sufficiently definitive or comprehensive to furnish the answer to a constitutional question, a court may use unwritten constitutional principles as interpretive aids. This is an approach that resorts to unwritten constitutional principles where necessary in order to give meaning and effect to constitutional text. It is thus not dissimilar to this Court's approach to purposive constitutional interpretation, which begins with and is grounded in the text (Quebec (Attorney General), at paras. 8-10); unwritten constitutional principles inform the purpose of the provisions of the text, thus guiding the purposive definition (R. Elliot, "References, Structural Argumentation and the Organizing Principles of Canada's Constitution" (2001), 80 Can. Bar Rev. 67, at p. 84). To be clear, this must be a textually faithful exercise; the text remains of primordial significance to identifying the purpose of a right, being "the first indicator of purpose" (Quebec (Attorney General), at para. 11), and the application of constitutional principles to the interpretive exercise may not allow a court to overshoot that purpose (paras. 4 and 10-11). More particularly, and as the Court affirmed in Quebec (Attorney General), the Constitution "is not 'an empty vessel to be filled with whatever meaning we might wish from time to time'" (para. 9, quoting Reference re Public Service Employee Relations Act (Alta.), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 313, at p. 394). Rather, constitutional interpretation "must first and foremost have reference to, and be constrained by, [its] text" (para. 9).

66 Our colleague resists this, notwithstanding the clear direction in Quebec (Attorney General) regarding the centrality to the interpretational exercise of constitutional text. Indeed, her approach is completely the opposite: far from being the primary element of the Constitution whose interpretation can be informed by unwritten constitutional principles, the text itself "emanates" from those principles, and thus it is the principles which are paramount (para. 168). This is entirely inconsistent with the Provincial Court Judges Reference, upon which she relies. Lamer C.J. applied the unwritten constitutional principle of judicial independence to guide his interpretation of the scope of provincial authority under s. 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867 and to fill a gap where provincial courts dealing with non-criminal matters were concerned (paras. 107-8). None of this supports applying unwritten constitutional principles as bases for invalidating legislation.

(b) The Secession Reference

67 In Secession Reference, this Court said:

Underlying constitutional principles may in certain circumstances give rise to substantive legal obligations (have "full legal force", as we described it in [Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution], supra, at p. 845), which constitute substantive limitations upon government action. These principles may give rise to very abstract and general obligations, or they may be more specific and precise in nature. The principles are not merely descriptive, but are also invested with a powerful normative force, and are binding upon both courts and governments. [para. 54]

A faithful reading of this passage must acknowledge the force ascribed to unwritten constitutional principles. Of significance, however, is that such force was conditioned by the nature of the questions posed in the reference -- the conditions for secession of a province from Confederation -- which the Court was called upon to answer. The case combined "legal and constitutional questions of the utmost subtlety and complexity with political questions of great sensitivity" (para. 1, quoting Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, at p. 728) to which the Court proposed an answer (being an obligation to negotiate in some circumstances) which, while constituting a "legal framework" in the form of a set of rules to legitimize secession, was enforceable only politically as "it would be for the democratically elected leadership of the various participants to resolve their differences" (para. 101 (emphasis added); see also Elliot, at p. 97).

68 Of course, the Court made clear that it had identified "binding obligations under the Constitution of Canada" (para. 153), and that a breach of those obligations would occasion "serious legal repercussions" (para. 102). But the Court also acknowledged the "non-justiciability of [the] political issues" involved (para. 102), which meant that the Court could have "no supervisory role" over the political negotiations (para. 100). Recognizing that the "reconciliation of the various legitimate constitutional interests is necessarily committed to the political rather than the judicial realm" (para. 153), the Court fashioned rules in the event of whose breach the "appropriate recourse" would lie in "the workings of the political process rather than the courts" (para. 102). This is another instance of the separation of powers: courts do not supervise the legislature or the executive as to political process.

69 Nothing, therefore, in the Secession Reference supports the proposition that unwritten constitutional principles can serve as an independent basis to invalidate legislation. While the obligations for the respective parties in that case had legal force by way of a judicial declaration, how that declaration would be given effect -- that is, enforced - was deemed a question of political process, not legal process. Here again, as in the case of constitutional interpretation, the structural gap-filling role of unwritten constitutional principles was not and, we say, could not, be applied to invalidate legislation in the sense of declaring it under s. 52 to be of no force or effect.

(c) Babcock and Imperial Tobacco

70 At issue in Babcock v. Canada (Attorney General), 2002 SCC 57, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 3, was the constitutionality of a provision of the Canada Evidence Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-5, that allowed for an exception to disclosure, in litigation, based on Cabinet confidence. The respondents argued that the provision was ultra vires Parliament due to its inconsistency with the unwritten constitutional principles of the rule of law, judicial independence, and the separation of powers (by allowing the executive to prevent disclosure of evidence of its own unconstitutional conduct). McLachlin C.J., writing for the majority, held that "[a]lthough the unwritten constitutional principles are capable of limiting government actions, ... they do not do so in this case" (para. 54 (emphasis added)). She reached this conclusion on the basis that "unwritten principles must be balanced against the principle of Parliamentary sovereignty" (para. 55), concluding:

It is well within the power of the legislature to enact laws, even laws which some would consider draconian, as long as it does not fundamentally alter or interfere with the relationship between the courts and the other branches of government. [para. 57]

71 McLachlin C.J.'s statement that unwritten constitutional principles are "capable of limiting government actions" was later explained by this Court in Imperial Tobacco. There, legislation authorizing action by the Province of British Columbia against tobacco manufacturers was challenged on the basis that it was inconsistent with, inter alia, the unwritten constitutional principle of the rule of law. For the Court, Major J. unequivocally rejected the appellants' proposed use of the rule of law to invalidate legislation for two reasons, only one of which is of relevance here:

... the appellants' arguments overlook the fact that several constitutional principles other than the rule of law that have been recognized by this Court -- most notably democracy and constitutionalism -- very strongly favour upholding the validity of legislation that conforms to the express terms of the Constitution (and to the requirements, such as judicial independence, that flow by necessary implication from those terms). Put differently, the appellants' arguments fail to recognize that in a constitutional democracy such as ours, protection from legislation that some might view as unjust or unfair properly lies not in the amorphous underlying principles of our Constitution, but in its text and the ballot box. [Emphasis added; para. 66.]

72 In other words, unwritten constitutional principles are indeterminate, such that they could be in theory deployed not only in service of invalidating legislation, but of upholding it. Major J. continued: the recognition of an unwritten constitutional principle such as the rule of law "is not an invitation to trivialize or supplant the Constitution's written terms", nor "is it a tool by which to avoid legislative initiatives of which one is not in favour. On the contrary, it requires that courts give effect to the Constitution's text, and apply, by whatever its terms, legislation that conforms to that text" (para. 67). From this, it follows that the statement in Babcock that unwritten constitutional principles are "capable of limiting government actions" is to be understood in a narrow and particular sense: legislative measures are restrained by the unwritten principle of the rule of law, "but only in the sense that they must comply with legislated requirements as to manner and form (i.e., the procedures by which legislation is to be enacted, amended and repealed)" (Imperial Tobacco, at para. 60). Again, this understanding of unwritten constitutional principles precludes entirely their application to invalidate legislation under s. 52.

73 This, we would add, is a complete answer to our colleague Abella J.'s assertions that this Court has "never, to date, limited" the role of unwritten constitutional principles, and that their interpretive role is not "narrowly constrained by textualism" (paras. 171 and 179). Our colleague reads Imperial Tobacco as narrowing the use of one specific unwritten constitutional principle -- the rule of law -- and not unwritten constitutional principles generally. But the problem of indeterminacy would inevitably arise with the use of any unwritten constitutional principle to invalidate legislation. Imperial Tobacco thus unequivocally affirmed both a narrow interpretive role for unwritten principles, and the primacy of the text in constitutional adjudication.

(d) Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia

74 In Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia, this Court was called upon to decide the constitutionality of court hearing fees imposed by British Columbia that denied some people access to the courts. For the majority, McLachlin C.J. held that those fees, enacted pursuant to s. 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867, violated s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 as they impermissibly infringed on the jurisdiction of superior courts by denying some people access to the courts (paras. 1-2). In obiter, she added that the connection between s. 96 and access to justice was "further supported by considerations relating to the rule of law" (para. 38), as "[t]here cannot be a rule of law without access, otherwise the rule of law is replaced by a rule of men and women who decide who shall and who shall not have access to justice" (para. 38, quoting B.C.G.E.U. v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 214, at p. 230). This was, she said, "consistent with the approach adopted by Major J. in Imperial Tobacco" (para. 37):

The legislation here at issue -- the imposition of hearing fees -- must conform not only to the express terms of the Constitution, but to the "requirements ... that flow by necessary implication from those terms" (para. 66). The right of Canadians to access the superior courts flows by necessary implication from the express terms of s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 as we have seen. It follows that the province does not have the power under s. 92(14) to enact legislation that prevents people from accessing the courts. [Emphasis added; para. 37.]

75 In our view, McLachlin C.J.'s invocation of Major J.'s "necessary implication" threshold from Imperial Tobacco signifies that, where unwritten constitutional principles are used as interpretive aids, their substantive legal force must arise by necessary implication from the Constitution's text. We therefore see nothing in this that is inconsistent with the Provincial Court Judges Reference and, in particular, with the limited scope of application of unwritten constitutional principles. The rule of law was used in Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia as an interpretive aid to s. 96, which in turn was used to narrow provincial legislative authority under s. 92(14). The rule of law was not being used as an independent basis for invalidating the impugned court fees. In this way, McLachlin C.J.'s reasoning simply reflects a purposive interpretation of s. 96 informed by unwritten constitutional principles.

(2) Relevance of the Democratic Principle to Municipal Elections

76 Democracy is, in light of the foregoing, a principle by which our Constitution is to be understood and interpreted. Though not explicitly identified in the text, the basic structure of our Constitution -- including its establishment of the House of Commons and of provincial legislatures -- connotes certain freely elected, representative, and democratic political institutions (Secession Reference, at para. 62).

77 The democratic principle has both individual and institutional dimensions (para. 61). It embraces not only the process of representative and responsible government and the right of citizens to participate in that process at the provincial and federal levels, but also substantive goals including the promotion of self-government (paras. 64-65). So understood, the democratic principle sits alongside and indeed overlaps with other unwritten constitutional principles that this Court has recognized, including federalism and the rule of law (paras. 66-67).

78 In this case, the democratic principle is relevant as a guide to the interpretation of the constitutional text. It supports an understanding of free expression as including political expression made in furtherance of a political campaign (Reference re Prov. Electoral Boundaries (Sask.); Reference re Alberta Statutes, [1938] S.C.R. 100; Switzman v. Elbling, [1957] S.C.R. 285; OPSEU). But it cannot be used in a manner that goes beyond this interpretive role. In particular, it cannot be used as an independent basis to invalidate legislation.

(a) Section 92(8) of the Constitution Act, 1867

79 The structure of neither the Constitution Act, 1867 nor the Constitution Act, 1982 requires by necessary implication the circumscription of provincial lawmaking authority under s. 92(8) in the manner proposed. Subject to the Charter, the province has "absolute and unfettered legal power" to legislate with respect to municipalities (Ontario English Catholic Teachers' Assn., at para. 58). And this Court cannot grant constitutional status to a third order of government "where the words of the Constitution read in context do not do so" (Baier, at para. 39).

80 Indeed, the City's submissions neglect the fact, recognized in the passage from Imperial Tobacco, at para. 66, cited above, that unwritten constitutional principles other than the rule of law that have been recognized by this Court, including democracy and constitutionalism, strongly favour upholding the validity of legislation that conforms to the text of the Constitution. It follows that the unwritten constitutional principle of democracy cannot be used to narrow legislative competence under s. 92(8); as this Court has recognized, the provinces have plenary jurisdiction under this head of power, unrestricted by any constitutional principle (Public School Boards' Assn. of Alberta).

(b) Section 3 of the Charter

81 Nor can the democratic principle be used to make s. 3 of the Charter -- including its requirement of effective representation -- relevant to the current case. There is no open question of constitutional interpretation here. Section 3 democratic rights were not extended to candidates or electors to municipal councils. This is not a gap to be addressed judicially. The absence of municipalities in the constitutional text is, on the contrary, a deliberate omission (Imperial Tobacco, at para. 65). As the intervener the Federation of Canadian Municipalities argues, municipalities (or at least chartered towns) predate the Magna Carta (1215). Their existence and importance would have been known to the framers in 1867. The constitutional status of municipalities, and whether they ought to enjoy greater independence from the provinces, was a topic of debate during patriation (House of Commons Debates, vol. X, 1st Sess., 32nd Parl., June 15, 1981, at p. 10585). In the end, municipalities were not constitutionalized, either in amendments to the Constitution Act, 1867 or by reference in the democratic rights enshrined in the Charter.

82 Unlike in the Provincial Court Judges Reference, therefore, there is no textual basis for an underlying constitutional principle that would confer constitutional status on municipalities, or municipal elections. The entitlement to vote in elections to bodies not mentioned in s. 3 is therefore a matter for Parliament and provincial legislatures (Haig, at p. 1033; Baier, at para. 39). Again, and like the school boards at issue in Baier, municipalities are mere creatures of statute who exercise whatever powers, through officers appointed by whatever process, that provincial legislatures consider fit. Were the unwritten democratic principle applied to require all elections to conform to the requirements of s. 3 (including municipal elections, and not just elections to the House of Commons or provincial legislatures), the text of s. 3 would be rendered substantially irrelevant and redundant (Imperial Tobacco, at para. 65). To repeat: the withholding of constitutional status for municipalities, and their absence from the text of s. 3, was the product of a deliberate omission, not a gap. The City's submissions ignore that application of the democratic principle is properly applied to interpreting constitutional text, and not amending it or subverting its limits by ignoring "the primordial significance assigned by this Court's jurisprudence to constitutional text in undertaking purposive interpretation" (Quebec (Attorney General), at para. 4). It is not for the Court to do by "interpretation" what the framers of our Constitution chose not to do by enshrinement, or their successors by amendment.

(3) Conclusion on the Democratic Principle

83 Even had the City established that the Act was inconsistent with the principle of democracy, it follows from the foregoing discussion that a court could not rely on that inconsistency to find the Act unconstitutional. The Act was enacted pursuant to a valid legislative process and the Province had no obligation to consult with the City before it introduced the legislation, or to introduce the legislation at a particular time. (As the application judge correctly noted, the City of Toronto Act, 2006, S.O. 2006, c. 11, Sch. A, does not impose an immutable obligation to consult since the Province could enact the Act and overrule its previous enactment. Moreover, the related Toronto-Ontario Cooperation and Consultation Agreement did not bind the Province in law.)

84 In short, and despite their value as interpretive aids, unwritten constitutional principles cannot be used as bases for invalidating legislation, nor can they be applied to support recognizing a right to democratic municipal elections by narrowing the grant to provinces of law-making power over municipal institutions in s. 92(8) of the Constitution Act, 1867. Nor can they be applied to judicially amend the text of s. 3 of the Charter to require municipal elections or particular forms thereof. The text of our Constitution makes clear that municipal institutions lack constitutional status, leaving no open question of constitutional interpretation to be addressed and, accordingly, no role to be played by the unwritten principles.

V. Conclusion

85 We would dismiss the appeal.

The reasons of Abella, Karakatsanis, Martin and Kasirer JJ. were delivered by

R.S. ABELLA J. (dissenting)

86 Elections are to democracy what breathing is to life, and fair elections are what breathe life into healthy democracies. They give the public a voice into the laws and policies they are governed by, and a chance to choose who will make those laws and policies. It is a process of reciprocal political discourse.

87 The rules of an election, including the electoral boundaries and the timelines for campaigns, structure the process of reciprocal dialogue between candidates and voters in their electoral districts. The final act of voting, itself a form of political expression, is the culmination of the process of deliberative engagement throughout an election period. The stability of the electoral process is therefore crucial not only to political legitimacy, but also to the rights of candidates and voters to meaningfully engage in the political discourse necessary for voters to cast an informed vote, and for those elected to govern in response to the expressed views of the electorate.

88 The 2018 Toronto municipal election had been underway for three and a half months when the Province of Ontario enacted legislation that radically redrew the City of Toronto's electoral ward boundaries by reducing the number of wards from 47 to 25. Nominations had closed, campaigns were in full swing, and voters had been notified of who wanted to represent them and why.

89 The issue in this appeal is not whether the Province had the legal authority to change the municipal wards. It is whether the Province could do so in the middle of an ongoing municipal election, thereby destabilizing the foundations of the electoral process and interfering with the ability of candidates and voters to engage in meaningful political discourse during the period leading up to voting day.

90 Completely revamping the electoral process in the middle of an election was unprecedented in Canadian history. The question is whether it was also unconstitutional. In my respectful view, it was.

Background

91 In June 2013, City Council approved a Toronto Ward Boundary Review under its authority to establish, change or dissolve wards (City of Toronto Act, 2006, S.O. 2006, c. 11, Sch. A, s. 128(1)). The mandate of the Boundary Review was "to bring a recommendation to Toronto City Council on a ward boundary configuration that respects the principle of 'effective representation'" (Canadian Urban Institute, Draw the Line: Toronto Ward Boundary Review Project Work Plan, Civic Engagement & Public Consultation Strategy, April 28, 2014 (online), at p. 1). At the time, there were 44 wards in the City of Toronto.

92 Over the next nearly four years, the Boundary Review conducted research, held public hearings, and consulted extensively. External consultants were hired who developed recommendations, organized extensive stakeholder consultations, held meetings with City Council and the Mayor's staff, and individually interviewed members of the 2010-2014 City Council and new 2014-2018 members. Altogether, they held over 100 face-to-face meetings with City Council, school boards and other stakeholders, as well as 24 public meetings and information sessions.

93 The four year process resulted in seven reports. A draft of each report was reviewed by an outside five-person Advisory Panel. The Boundary Review's Options Report, in August 2015, analyzed eight options for drawing new ward boundaries, concluding that five options met the requirement of effective representation. Of particular significance to this appeal, one of the rejected options was redesigning the wards to mirror the 25 federal electoral districts.

94 The Boundary Review's Final Report, in May 2016, recommended increasing the number of wards from 44 to 47.

95 At the direction of the Executive Committee of City Council, two further reports were prepared by the Boundary Review in 2016, one in August and one in October. Among other options, the 25 federal electoral district proposal was again examined. Those reports again recommended the 47-ward structure, concluding that applying the boundaries of the 25 federal electoral districts would not achieve effective representation or resolve significant population imbalances, in part, since they were based on the 2011 census and were expected to be redrawn after the 2021 census. The Boundary Review, on the other hand, was based on population estimates for 2026 "to ensure that any new ward structure will last for several elections and constant ward boundary reviews are not required" (Additional Information Report, August 2016 (online), at p. 10).

96 City Council adopted the 47-ward structure in November 2016, which was enacted through By-laws Nos. 267-2017 and 464-2017 in March and April 2017. The goal was to create a stable electoral framework for multiple elections. The By-laws were intended to govern the City of Toronto's municipal elections from 2018 to 2026, and, possibly, 2030.

97 The 47-ward structure was appealed to the Ontario Municipal Board by various individuals, including those seeking to have the city divided into wards that mirrored the 25 federal electoral districts. After seven days of hearings, a majority of the Board rejected the appeals and approved the By-laws on December 15, 2017 (Di Ciano v. Toronto (City), 2017 CanLII 85757). In its decision, the Board explained why it found the By-laws to be reasonable:

The Board finds that the work undertaken by the [Boundary Review] culminating in the By-laws setting out a 47-ward structure was comprehensive. The ward structure delineated in the By-laws provides for effective representation and corrects the current population imbalance amongst the existing 44 wards. The decision made by Council to adopt the By-laws was defensible, fair and reasonable. The decision by Council to implement a 47-ward structure does not diverge from the principles of voter equity and effective representation. In this regard, there is nothing unreasonable in the decision of Council. [para. 51]

98 An application was made to the Divisional Court for leave to appeal the Board's decision by two individuals who had unsuccessfully argued before the Board that the 25 federal electoral districts should be implemented. On March 6, 2018, the motion was dismissed (Natale v. City of Toronto, 2018 ONSC 1475, 1 O.M.T.R. 349). Swinton J. concluded that the Board applied the correct governing principle, namely, "effective representation":

Setting electoral boundaries is an exercise that requires a weighing of many policy considerations. The Board heard from a number of expert witnesses over the course of a seven day hearing. It considered relative voter parity as well as other factors. It concluded that communities of interest are best respected in a 47 ward structure. It also noted that a 25 ward structure could increase voter population in the wards "resulting in a significant impact on the capacity to represent". [Citations omitted; para. 10.]

99 On May 1, 2018, nominations opened for candidates seeking election in Toronto's 47 wards.

100 On June 7, 2018, a new provincial government was elected. On the day that nominations for City Council closed, July 27, 2018, the Premier, Doug Ford, announced that the government intended to introduce legislation that would reduce the size of Toronto's City Council from 47 to 25 councillors.

101 The Boundary Review had researched the issue of effective representation for nearly 4 years, concluding that the 25 federal electoral districts would not achieve effective representation and would have an insignificant difference in terms of voter parity. Ontario did not conduct any redistricting studies or send the proposed legislation to Committee for consultation before it was enacted.

102 The legislation was introduced for the first reading in the Legislative Assembly on July 30, 2018 and came into force on August 14, 2018, 69 days before the scheduled election date. The election had been underway for three and a half months. By then, thousands of candidates had signed up and 509 were certified and actively campaigning in Toronto's 47 wards.

103 The nomination period was extended to September 14, 2018, but the election date remained the same -- October 22, 2018. That gave candidates, all of whom would have to seek new nominations or notify the City Clerk of their intention to continue in the race by filing a change of ward notification form, just over one month to campaign in the new wards. Until nominations closed again on September 14, 2018, candidates and voters were in legal limbo awaiting the passage of regulations for the new electoral regime and the adjudication of a constitutional challenge to the mid-election changes that gave rise to this appeal. It was only after nominations closed that voters and candidates had a full picture of which candidates were running and in what wards.

104 The new one-month campaign period was also characterized by the disruptive impact of abruptly changing the number, size and boundaries of the wards. Candidates who had been canvassing, responding to local issues, incurring expenses and developing community relationships were now faced with deciding whether and where to run. The old wards were eradicated, many of the new ones were almost twice as large, the populations were different, and there was only one month left to change wards, meet the new constituencies, learn what their concerns were, and engage with them on those issues.

105 In the absence of any notice or additional time to fundraise, many previously certified candidates could no longer afford to run in these new and larger wards. Certified candidates had until September 14, 2018 to file a change of ward notification form or else their nominations would be deemed to be withdrawn (Better Local Government Act, 2018, S.O. 2018, c. 11 ("Act"), Sch. 3, s. 1; Municipal Elections Act, 1996, S.O. 1996, c. 32, Sch., s. 10.1(8)). When the present constitutional challenge was decided only days before that deadline, only 293 of the 509 previously certified candidates had taken the necessary steps to continue in the race. In the end, more than half of the previously certified candidates dropped out of the race before voting day.

106 The City of Toronto and a number of candidates and electors applied to the Ontario Superior Court of Justice for an order declaring the legislation reducing the number of wards from 47 to 25 of no force or effect, pursuant to s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982.

107 On September 10, 2018, Belobaba J. held that the Act was unconstitutional, infringing the rights of both candidates and voters under s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (2018 ONSC 5151, 142 O.R. (3d) 336). He held that the legislation violated the expressive rights of candidates by radically redrawing ward boundaries mid-election, and that it breached the rights of voters to cast a vote that could result in effective representation by doubling the population sizes of the wards.

108 On September 19, 2018, the Ontario Court of Appeal ordered an interim stay of Belobaba J.'s order, meaning that the election would take place based on the new 25-ward structure (2018 ONCA 761, 142 O.R. (3d) 481). It took place on October 22, 2018.

109 On September 19, 2019, the Court of Appeal allowed the appeal from Belobaba J.'s order (2019 ONCA 732, 146 O.R. (3d) 705). Writing for a 3-2 majority, Miller J.A. held that Belobaba J. "impermissibly extended the scope [of] s. 2(b)" to protect the effectiveness of efforts to convey political messages and to include a right to effective representation.

110 In dissent at the Court of Appeal, MacPherson J.A. held that the timing of the Act infringed s. 2(b), concluding that "[b]y extinguishing almost half of the city's existing wards midway through an active election, Ontario blew up the efforts, aspirations and campaign materials of hundreds of aspiring candidates, and the reciprocal engagement of many informed voters".

111 I agree with MacPherson J.A.

Analysis

112 Under s. 92(8) of the Constitution Act, 1867, the provinces have exclusive jurisdiction over "Municipal Institutions in the Province". The question therefore of whether the Province has the authority to legislate a change in Toronto's ward structure is not the issue in this appeal. The issue is whether this timing mid-way through a municipal election was in violation of s. 2(b) of the Charter, which states:

2 Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms:

(b) freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication;

113 The 2018 Toronto municipal election had already been underway for three and a half months when the number, size and boundaries of all the wards were changed.

114 It is entirely beside the point to observe that elected municipal councils are creatures of statute. Section 2(b) of the Charter applies with equal vigour to protect political discourse during a municipal election as a federal or provincial one. When a province chooses to vest certain powers in a democratic municipality, municipal elections invariably become the locus of deliberative engagement on those delegated policy issues. It is incumbent on a provincial legislature to respect the rights of its citizens to engage in meaningful dialogue on municipal issues during an election period and, in particular, the rights of candidates and voters to engage in meaningful exchanges before voting day.

115 When a democratic election takes place in Canada, including a municipal election, freedom of expression protects the rights of candidates and voters to meaningfully express their views and engage in reciprocal political discourse on the path to voting day. That is at the core of political expression, which in turn is at the core of what is protected by s. 2(b) of the Charter. When the state enacts legislation that has the effect of destabilizing the opportunity for meaningful reciprocal discourse, it is enacting legislation that interferes with the Constitution.

116 Municipal elections have been a part of political life in Canada since before Confederation, and municipalities are a crucial level of government. The 1996 Greater Toronto Area Task Force explained their significance, emphasizing that "services should be delivered by local municipalities to ensure maximum efficiency and responsiveness to local needs and preferences" (Greater Toronto, at p. 174; see also D. Siegel, "Ontario", in A. Sancton and R. Young, eds., Foundations of Governance: Municipal Government in Canada's Provinces (2009), 20, at p. 22; A. Flynn, "Operative Subsidiarity and Municipal Authority: The Case of Toronto's Ward Boundary Review" (2019), 56 Osgoode Hall L.J. 271, at pp. 275-76). As Professor Kristin R. Good explains, municipalities are not "mere 'creatures of the provinces'", they are important democratic governments in their own right. The variations in multicultural policy making in Canadian cities are evidence that local choices, policies, and politics matter. Municipalities are important vehicles of the democratic will of local communities as well as important sites of multicultural democratic citizenship.

Immigration in Toronto and Vancouver (2009), at p. 5)

117 The democratically accountable character of municipalities is well established in our jurisprudence. In Godbout v. Longueuil (City), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 844, La Forest J. wrote that "municipal councils are democratically elected by members of the general public and are accountable to their constituents in a manner analogous to that in which Parliament and the provincial legislatures are accountable to the electorates" (para. 51). Similarly, in Catalyst Paper

Corp. v. North Cowichan (District), [2012] 1 S.C.R. 5, McLachlin C.J. recognized that municipal councillors "serve the people who elected them and to whom they are ultimately accountable" (para. 19).

118 The increasing significance of municipal governance has been accompanied by an increasingly generous interpretation of municipal powers. Writing for a unanimous Court in United Taxi Drivers' Fellowship of Southern Alberta v. Calgary (City), [2004] 1 S.C.R. 485, Bastarache J. observed that "[t]he evolution of the modern municipality has produced a shift in the proper approach to the interpretation of statutes empowering municipalities" (para. 6). And in 114957 Canada Ltée (Spraytech, Société d'arrosage) v. Hudson (Town), [2001] 2 S.C.R. 241, L'Heureux-Dubé J. confirmed that "law-making and implementation are often best achieved at a level of government that is ... closest to the citizens affected and thus most responsive to their needs, to local distinctiveness, and to population diversity" (para. 3; see also Nanaimo (City) v. Rascal Trucking Ltd., [2000] 1 S.C.R. 342).

119 These cases built on McLachlin J.'s dissent in Shell Canada Products Ltd. v. Vancouver (City), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 231, which stressed the "fundamental axiom" that courts must accord proper respect to the democratic responsibilities of elected municipal officials and the rights of those who elect them. This is important to the continued healthy functioning of democracy at the municipal level. If municipalities are to be able to respond to the needs and wishes of their citizens, they must be given broad jurisdiction to make local decisions reflecting local values. [Emphasis added; p. 245.]

120 The reciprocal relationship between the democratic responsibilities of elected municipal officials and the rights of those who elected them is crucial. It requires what Duff C.J. called "the free public discussion of affairs" so that two sets of duties can be discharged -- the duties of elected members "to the electors", and of electors "in the election of their representatives" (Reference re Alberta Statutes, [1938] S.C.R. 100, at p. 133; see also Switzman v. Elbling, [1957] S.C.R. 285, at pp. 306 and 326-27; RWDSU v. Dolphin Delivery Ltd., [1986] 2 S.C.R. 573, at p. 583).

121 How then does all this relate to the rights in s. 2(b) of the Charter? Because in dealing with municipal elections, we are dealing with the political processes of democratic government and it is undeniable that s. 2(b) protects "the political discourse fundamental to democracy" (R. v. Sharpe, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 45, at para. 23; see also Ford v. Quebec (Attorney General), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 712, at p. 765).

122 In Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 927, this Court held that one of the three underlying principles of the s. 2(b) right is that "participation in social and political decision-making is to be fostered and encouraged" (p. 976). Professors P. W. Hogg and W. K. Wright have referred to political expression as being "at the core of s. 2(b)", and curtailed under s. 1 "only in service of the most compelling governmental interest" (Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.), at p. 43-9).

123 This brings us to the central issue in this appeal, namely, whether the timing of the legislation, in redrawing and reducing the number of wards from 47 to 25 in the middle of an election, infringed the expressive rights protected by s. 2(b) of the Charter.

124 Irwin Toy established a two-part test for adjudicating freedom of expression claims. The first asks whether the activity is within the sphere of conduct protected by freedom of expression. If the activity conveys or attempts to convey a meaning, it has expressive content and prima facie falls within the scope of the guarantee. The second part asks whether the government action, in purpose or effect, interfered with freedom of expression.

125 Dealing with the first part, the "activity" at the heart of this appeal is the expression of political views and the reciprocal political discourse among electoral participants during an election period, which engages the rights of both those seeking election and those deciding whom to elect. Political discourse undoubtedly has expressive content, and therefore, prima facie falls within the scope of the guarantee. Dickson C.J. in R. v. Keegstra, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 697, noted that

[t]he connection between freedom of expression and the political process is perhaps the linchpin of the s. 2(b) guarantee, and the nature of this connection is largely derived from the Canadian commitment to democracy. Freedom of expression is a crucial aspect of the democratic commitment, not merely because it permits the best policies to be chosen from among a wide array of proffered options, but additionally because it helps to ensure that participation in the political process is open to all persons. Such open participation must involve to a substantial degree the notion that all persons are equally deserving of respect and dignity. [Emphasis added; pp. 763-64.]

126 The second part of the test, namely, whether the state action interfered with the right in purpose or effect, is not, with respect, particularly complicated either. This Court's jurisprudence under s. 2(b) of the Charter has usually arisen in circumstances where the purpose of the government action was to restrict expression by regulating who can speak, what they can say or how their messages can be heard.¹ The case before us, on the other hand, deals with whether the effect of the legislation -- redrawing the ward boundaries and cutting the number of wards nearly in half mid-election -- was to interfere with these expressive activities.

127 Freedom of expression does not simply protect the right to speak; it also protects the right to communicate with one another (R. Moon, The Constitutional Protection of Freedom of Expression (2000), at pp. 3-4). The words of Marshall J., in dissent, resonate with the reciprocal nature of expression:

... the right to speak and hear -- including the right to inform others and to be informed about public issues - - are inextricably part of [the First Amendment]. The freedom to speak and the freedom to hear are inseparable; they are two sides of the same coin. But the coin itself is the process of thought and discussion. The activity of speakers becoming listeners and listeners becoming speakers in the vital interchange of thought is the "means indispensable to the discovery and spread of political truth." [Citations omitted.]

128 In the electoral context, freedom of expression involves the rights of both candidates and voters to reciprocal deliberative engagement. The right to disseminate and receive information connected with elections has long been recognized as integral to the democratic principles underlying freedom of expression, and as a result, has attracted robust protection (see e.g. Thomson Newspapers Co. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 877; R. v. Bryan, [2007] 1 S.C.R. 527; Harper v. Canada (Attorney General), [2004] 1 S.C.R. 827; B.C. Freedom of Information and Privacy Association v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [2017] 1 S.C.R. 93; see also K. Roach and D. Schneiderman, "Freedom of Expression in Canada" (2013), 61 S.C.L.R. (2d) 429; J. Weinrib, "What is the Purpose of Freedom of Expression?" (2009), 67 U.T. Fac. L. Rev. 165).

129 Political expression during an election period is always "taking place within and being constrained by the legal and institutional framework of an election" (Y. Dawood, "The Right to Vote and Freedom of Expression in Political Process Cases Under the Charter" (2021), 100 S.C.L.R. (2d) 105, at p. 131). In Libman v. Quebec (Attorney General), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 569, this Court explained that elections and referendums are "procedural structure[s] allowing for public discussion of political issues essential to governing", which serve to ensure "a reasonable opportunity to speak and be heard" and "the right of electors to be adequately informed of all the political positions advanced by the candidates and by the various political parties" (paras. 46-47).

130 The Intervener, the David Asper Centre for Constitutional Rights, cogently explained how there are different aspects of an election, each of which requires protection:

Election campaigns provide a special forum for voters and candidates to interact with each other. Citizens engage in the democratic process when they identify issues, test policy positions, bring incumbents to account, and assess new candidates' skills, policies and positions. All exercises of expression, at each and every stage of the electoral process -- not only the final act of voting -- must receive consistent and robust Charter protection. [Footnotes omitted.]

(I.F., at para. 8)

131 The democratic dialogue that occurs throughout an election period is crucial to the formation of public opinion and the ability to cast an informed vote. The process of deliberative engagement during an election period was aptly described by Professor Saul Zipkin:

... the electoral process is the primary site in which the representative relationship is constructed. Indeed, "[c]ampaigns ... are a main point -- perhaps the main point -- of contact between officials and the populace over matters of public policy." The period in which the putative representative goes before the voters for their approval is a time of creating that relationship, calling for special attention to the proper functioning of the democratic process at that time. As the representative relationship is historically a matter of constitutional concern, and is shaped by political activity and speech in the electoral setting, we might broaden the narrow focus on ballot-casting in our assessment of the democratic process. [Emphasis in original; footnotes omitted.]

("The Election Period and Regulation of the Democratic Process" (2010), 18 Wm. & Mary Bill Rts. J. 533, at pp. 545-46; see also A. Bhagwat and J. Weinstein, "Freedom of Expression and Democracy", in A. Stone and F. Schauer, eds., The Oxford Handbook of Freedom of Speech (2021), 82; N. Urbinati, "Free Speech as the Citizen's Right", in R. C. Post, Citizens Divided: Campaign Finance Reform and the Constitution (2014), 125.)

132 An election is a process of allowing candidates and voters, as both speakers and listeners, to participate in reciprocal discourse so that their respective views can be fully expressed and heard. It is only through this process of free public discussion and debate that an informed vote can be cast, and ultimately, those elected can be responsive to the views of the electorate.

133 State interference with individual and collective political expression in the context of an election strikes at the heart of the democratic values that freedom of expression seeks to protect, including "participation in social and political decision-making" (Irwin Toy, at p. 976). The Irwin Toy test is, as a result and as discussed later in these reasons, the appropriate legal framework for adjudicating the present claim of state interference with political expression during an election period.

134 A stable election period is crucial to electoral fairness and meaningful political discourse. Redrawing the number, size and boundaries of electoral wards during this period destabilizes the process by "[i]nterrupting an election mid-campaign to change the rules of the game, including the electoral districts upon which candidates have crafted their campaigns and voters will have their preferences channelled" (M. Pal, "The Unwritten Principle of Democracy" (2019), 65 McGill L.J. 269, at p. 302).

135 For three and a half months, candidates and voters engaged in political dialogue within the legal and institutional structure created in advance of the 2018 municipal election after years of research, public engagement and, finally, endorsement from the Ontario Municipal Board.

136 After the Act came into force, candidates and voters found themselves in a suddenly altered electoral landscape. The Act eradicated nearly half of the active election campaigns, requiring those candidates to file a change of ward notification form to continue in the race. The redrawing of ward boundaries meant that candidates needed to reach new voters with new priorities. Campaign materials such as lawn signs or advertisements for abolished wards "no longer play[ed] the function of electoral expression given the change to the underlying institutional context within which that expression [was] taking place" (Dawood, at p. 132). Voters who had received campaign information, learned about candidates' mandates and engaged with them based on the 47-ward structure had their democratic participation put into abeyance.

137 The impact on some of the candidates and voters provides illuminating metaphors. One candidate, for example, Dyanoosh Youssefi, explained that she had been canvassing, e-mailing and organizing since the beginning of the campaign for 12-15 hours per day and all of her efforts had "focused on the concerns and the needs of the approximately 55,000 residents of Ward 14" (A.R., vol. XV, at p. 80). Ward 14 was abolished by the Act.

138 Another candidate, Chiara Padovani, who had been campaigning in Ward 11, described the effect of combining Ward 11 and Ward 12 into a new Ward 5:

Even before my registration as a candidate for the 2018 election, I engaged in substantial efforts to engage community members around important local issues in Ward 11 for over a one and a half year period such as flooding, road safety, and tenant rights. As a result, I ... know where residents feel there should be additional speedbumps, crosswalks, and reduction in speed limits. I do not have this type of knowledge for any other ward, including Ward 12.

If I had notice of the change in ward boundaries prior to the commencement of the campaign, I would have been able to plan my ground strategy, and I would have attempted to gain a deeper knowledge of the local issues affecting residents in Ward 12 by actively canvassing in that ward. At this point, it will be impossible for me to carry out double the amount of canvassing that I have completed with the limited time remaining.

(A.R., vol. XI, at pp. 15-16)

139 Ever since the 47-ward structure was enacted in 2017, Chris Moise, a Black and openly gay candidate, had been organizing a campaign in Ward 25. He had decided to run in Ward 25 because it encompassed the Gay Village and Yorkville. These were communities he felt he could meaningfully serve based on his experiences as a School Board Trustee for the area, an LGBTQ activist, a former police officer with an interest in police relations with the Black and LGBTQ communities in the Village, and a resident and property owner in Yorkville. When the legislation abolished Ward 25, he dropped out of the race because he could not pivot his campaign on such short notice to either the new Ward 13, which excluded Yorkville where he lived, or the new Ward 11, which had only a very small geographical overlap with the previous Ward 25 and excluded the Village where he had the most meaningful connections and policy goals.

140 Another candidate, Jennifer Hollett, explained the effect of the two week "legal limbo" (A.R., vol. XI, at p. 144) before the legislation received Royal Assent:

Even after [the legislation] passed, my campaign team was uncertain what was going to happen to our campaign funds, and whether those funds could be transferred to a new campaign, or whether those funds could be refunded. It was only when regulations made pursuant to the Minister's powers in [the legislation] were passed that we received any direction. The effect of that uncertainty is that my team did not make any campaign expenditures after July 27.

The voters I speak with are confused. They understand that the rules have changed, but do not understand why those rules have changed and how. Instead of discussing municipal issues in the campaign, such as transit and safer streets, residents are asking about ward boundary changes and how they affect them. [pp. 145-46]

141 Megann Wilson, another candidate and participant in the Women Win TO's training program, described the ensuing uncertainty vividly:

Since ... the imposition of a 25-ward model, I have struggled to engage with residents on my platform, or key issues and policies in the ward. Many residents are simply tired of the changing wards, and no longer know what ward they live in -- and that is what I spend my time talking to residents about when I am canvassing. In my view, the level of confusion in my ward will make it more difficult for voters to make a good decision about what candidate to vote for since electors are not even aware of what ward they now live in let alone who the candidates are, given the sudden changes. Further, as a result of lack of communication to residents about the new ward boundaries, I have found myself having to fill that gap while canvassing residents - - a significant distraction from the municipal issues I am trying to engage residents about.

As a result of [the legislation] I am hindered in getting to the root of municipal issues affecting electors while I am canvassing. I am now spending most of my time with voters explaining the changes to the ward boundaries, and discussing the provincial politics that led to these sudden changes. Time with prospective voters is precious for all candidates and [the legislation] has interrupted my ability to engage directly with voters about my platform and my ideas for the ward and its residents.

142 Since the Act did not reset campaign finance limits, new candidates entered the race with untapped campaign spending limits, while candidates who had already been campaigning lost what they had invested in now-defunct districts and continued in the race on a reduced budget. Some previously certified candidates stopped producing campaign materials entirely due to the uncertainty surrounding the transfer of campaign funds and expenditures to a new campaign. Others could not afford to compete in the new and larger wards. As one campaign volunteer described:

We do not know whether a donor who donated the maximum amount to a Ward 23 candidacy can now make a fresh donation to a Ward 13 candidacy. This is important because funds were spent on materials for the Ward 23 candidacy that are no longer useable... . It will likely not be possible to undertake sufficient fundraising to replace all of the items that are no longer usable, particularly given the limited amount of time in the campaign. Prior donors will likely not be able or willing to donate again, and it is unlikely we will be able to find enough new donors to produce sufficient new materials for a fresh campaign for a much larger ward area, particularly compared to more well-resourced incumbents.

143 Voters, too, were affected. One voter, Ish Aderonmu, explained the consequence of candidates dropping out of the race as "deeply disappointing ... as an elector who has been working to advance one of these campaigns, expressing myself politically for the first time" (A.R., vol. IX, at p. 124). Another voter, who had endorsed a candidate who dropped out of the race, conveyed that "his own political expression has been compromised" and that "candidates remaining in the race are dealing with making major changes to their campaigns, and are not available to discuss [important] issues with him" (A.R., vol. IX, at p. 104).

144 It is important to remember the timeline. Nominations opened on May 1, 2018, and closed on July 27, 2018. On the same day that nominations closed, the government announced that it intended to introduce new legislation, cutting the wards nearly in half and radically redrawing ward boundaries mid-election. No one knew what the impact of the new boundaries would be. Candidates did not know how the new electoral wards would affect their campaigns, and voters had no idea who their new candidates would be. All this after being in an ongoing electoral process for almost three months.

145 The new legislation came into force two weeks later on August 14, 2018. By then, candidates had been campaigning and engaging with voters for 105 days in the existing 47 wards. Candidates who had developed mandates to respond to the specific needs and interests of their wards had their campaign efforts eradicated, along with their opportunity to meaningfully engage with the right voters on those issues. Voters who had formed opinions, been persuaded on issues, refined their preferences and expressed their views to their preferred representatives had their political expression thwarted. Some candidates persevered; others dropped out of the race. Volunteers quit, campaign endorsements were rescinded and confusion ensued.

146 Nominations were extended to September 14, leaving only five weeks -- from the date that nominations closed, solidifying which candidates were running and in what wards -- for an election that was supposed to last nearly six months. More importantly, those five weeks were marred by the destabilizing impact of the timing of the legislation in the middle of an election that was technically 60 percent complete. The additional month for new candidates to seek nomination could not undo the damage and uncertainty that the change had created for candidates who had already been certified and voters who had already participated in three and a half months of deliberative engagement.

147 The timing of the Act, in the middle of an ongoing election, breathed instability into the 2018 municipal election, undermining the ability of candidates and voters in their wards to meaningfully discuss and inform one another of their views on matters of local concern. For the remaining campaign period, candidates spent more time on doorsteps discussing the confusing state of affairs with voters than the relevant political issues. The timing of the legislation, by interfering with political discourse in the middle of an election, was a clear breach of s. 2(b) of the Charter.

148 With respect, this leaves no role for the legal framework set out in Baier v. Alberta, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 673. It was designed to address underinclusive statutory regimes. The line of authority preceding Baier involved claims by individuals or groups seeking inclusion in an existing statutory regime, alleging that the absence of government support for them constituted a substantial interference with their exercise of a fundamental freedom.² The Baier framework was originally developed for an underinclusive labour relations regime in Dunmore v. Ontario (Attorney General), [2001] 3 S.C.R. 1016, and then modified for an allegedly underinclusive school board trustee election regime in Baier. The framework specifically refers to "claims of underinclusion", "exclusion from a statutory regime" and "underinclusive state action" (Dunmore, at paras. 24-26; Baier, at paras. 27-30). It has no relevance to the legal or factual issues in this case.

149 The Baier framework was, additionally, confined to its unique circumstances by this Court's subsequent decision in Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority v. Canadian Federation of Students -- British Columbia Component, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 295. Writing for a 7-1 majority, Deschamps J. explained that Baier"summarized the criteria for identifying the limited circumstances in which s. 2(b) requires the government to extend an underinclusive means of, or 'platform' for, expression to a particular group or individual" (para. 30). She also cautioned against extending Baier beyond these narrow confines:

... taken out of context, [Baier] could be construed as transforming many freedom of expression cases into "positive rights claims". Expression in public places invariably involves some form of government support or enablement. Streets, parks and other public places are often created or maintained by government legislation or action. If government support or enablement were all that was required to trigger a "positive rights analysis", it could be argued that a claim brought by demonstrators seeking access to a public park should be dealt with under the Baier analysis because to give effect to such a claim would require the government to enable the expression by providing the necessary resource (i.e., the place). But to argue this would be to misconstrue Baier.

When the reasons in Baier are read as a whole, it is clear that "support or enablement" must be tied to a claim requiring the government to provide a particular means of expression. In Baier, a distinction was drawn between placing an obligation on government to provide individuals with a particular platform for expression and protecting the underlying freedom of expression of those who are free to participate in expression on a platform (para. 42). [Emphasis added; paras. 34-35.]

150 The Baier test has no application to this appeal. As Deschamps J.'s full quote shows, it is clear that Baier only applies to claims "placing an obligation on government to provide individuals with a particular platform for expression". Irwin Toy, on the other hand, applies to claims that are about "protecting the underlying freedom of expression of those who are free to participate in expression on a platform", like the case before us.

151 None of the claimants involved in this case was excluded from participating in the 2018 Toronto municipal election, nor did they claim that s. 2(b) of the Charter requires the Province to provide them with a municipal election so that they can express themselves. The s. 2(b) claim in this case is about government interference with the expressive rights that attach to an electoral process. This is precisely the kind of claim that is governed by the Irwin Toy framework, not Baier (Baier, at para. 42; Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority, at para. 35; Ontario (Public Safety and Security) v. Criminal Lawyers' Association, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 815, at para. 31).

152 In any event, the distinction between positive and negative rights is an unhelpful lens for adjudicating Charter claims. During nearly four decades of Charter litigation, this Court has recognized that rights and freedoms have both positive and negative dimensions. That recognition has led the Court to adopt a unified purposive approach to rights claims, whether the claim is about freedom from government interference in order to exercise a right, or the right to governmental action in order to get access to it.³ To paraphrase Gertrude Stein, a right is a right is a right. The threshold does not vary with the nature of the claim to a right. Each right has its own definitional scope and is subject to the proportionality analysis under s. 1 of the Charter.

153 All rights have positive dimensions since they exist within, and are enforced by, a positive state apparatus (S. Fredman, "Human Rights Transformed: Positive Duties and Positive Rights", [2006] P.L. 498, at p. 503; J. Rawls, Political Liberalism (exp. ed. 2005), at pp. 361-62; A. Sen, The Idea of Justice (2009), at p. 228). They also have negative dimensions because they sometimes require the state not to intervene. The distinction "is notoriously difficult to make Appropriate verbal manipulations can easily move most cases across the line" (S. F. Kreimer, "Allocational Sanctions: The Problem of Negative Rights in a Positive State" (1984), 132 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1293, at p. 1325).

154 It is true that freedom of expression was once described by L'Heureux-Dubé J. in Haig v. Canada, [1993] 2 S.C.R. 995, as prohibiting "gags" but not compelling "the distribution of megaphones" (p. 1035; see also K. Chan, "Constitutionalizing the Registered Charity Regime: Reflections on Canada Without Poverty" (2020), 6 C.J.C.C.L. 151, at p. 173). But even in Haig -- a precursor to Baier -- L'Heureux-Dubé J. acknowledged that this was an artificial distinction that is "not always clearly made, nor ... always helpful" (p. 1039; see also Native Women's Assn. of Canada v. Canada, [1994] 3 S.C.R. 627, at pp. 666-68, per L'Heureux-Dubé J., concurring).

155 There is no reason to superimpose onto our constitutional structure the additional hurdle of dividing rights into positive and negative ones for analytic purposes. Dividing the rights "baby" in half is not Solomonic wisdom, it is a jurisprudential sleight-of-hand that promotes confusion rather than rights protection.

156 The purpose of the s. 2(b) right is not merely to restrain the government from interfering with expression, but also to cultivate public discourse "as an instrument of democratic government" (Hogg and Wright, at p. 43-8; see also Weinrib). Political discourse is at the heart of s. 2(b). Protecting the integrity of reciprocal political discourse among candidates and voters during an election period is therefore integral to s. 2(b)'s purpose. Elevating the legal threshold, as the majority proposes to do by applying Baier, adds a gratuitous hurdle, making it harder to prove a breach of this core aspect of s. 2(b) than other expressive activities. What should be applied instead is the foundational framework in Irwin Toy, which simply asks whether the activity in question falls within the scope of s. 2(b) and whether the government action, in purpose or effect, interfered with that expressive activity.

157 Applying that framework, it is clear that the timing of the legislation violated s. 2(b) of the Charter. By radically redrawing electoral boundaries during an active election that was almost two-thirds complete, the legislation interfered with the rights of all participants in the electoral process to engage in meaningful reciprocal political discourse.

158 This brings us to s. 1 of the Charter. The purpose of the s. 1 analysis is to determine whether the state can justify the limitation as "demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society" (Charter, s. 1; Fraser v. Canada (Attorney General), 2020 SCC 28, at para. 125). The limitation on s. 2(b) rights in this case was the timing of the legislative changes.

159 But rather than explaining the purpose and justification for the timing of the changes, Ontario relied on the pressing and substantial objectives of the changes themselves as the basis for the s. 1 analysis, saying they were to achieve voter parity, improve efficiency and save costs. This was set out in the press release announcing the proposed legislation, which stated: "We ran on a commitment to restore accountability and trust, to reduce the size and cost of government, including an end to the culture of waste and mismanagement" (Office of the Premier, Ontario's Government for the People Announces Reforms to Deliver Better Local Government, July 27, 2018 (online)). And at the second reading of the legislation, the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing, the Hon. Steve Clark, declared:

During the recent provincial election campaign, my caucus colleagues and I heard very strongly from Ontarians that they want us to respect those taxpayers' dollars. We heard very clearly from Ontarians that government is supposed to work for them. I think Ontario sent a very clear message on June 7 that they want a government that looks after those taxpayers' dollars, and that is exactly what we're doing with this bill.

So, Speaker, I want to get into some of the details of the bill, and specifically I want to talk first about the city of Toronto. The bill, if passed, would reduce the size of Toronto city council to 25 councillors from the present 47 plus the mayor. This would give the taxpayers of Toronto a streamlined, more effective council that is ready to work quickly and puts the needs of everyday people first.

160 Leaving aside that voter parity was hardly mentioned in the legislative debates, this Court has never found voter parity to be the electoral lodestar, asserting, on the contrary, that the values of a free and democratic society "are better met by an electoral system that focuses on effective representation than by one that focuses on mathematical parity" (Reference re Prov. Electoral Boundaries (Sask.), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 158, at p. 188).

161 But of overriding significance, the government offered no explanation, let alone a pressing and substantial one, for why the changes were made in the middle of an ongoing election. There was no hint of urgency, nor any overwhelming immediate policy need.

162 In the absence of any evidence or explanation for the timing of the Act, no pressing and substantial objective exists for this limitation and it cannot, therefore, be justified in a free and democratic society. The legislation is, as a result, an unjustified breach of s. 2(b).

163 While this dispenses with the merits of the appeal, the majority's observations circumscribing the scope and power of unwritten constitutional principles in a way that reads down this Court's binding jurisprudence warrants a response.

164 In the Reference re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217 ("Secession Reference"), the Court identified the unwritten constitutional principles of democracy, judicial independence, federalism, constitutionalism and the rule of law, and the protection of minorities. These principles are derived from the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867, which describes our Constitution as "a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom" (Secession Reference, at paras. 44-49; see also P. C. Oliver, "A Constitution Similar in Principle to That of the United Kingdom: The Preamble, Constitutional Principles, and a Sustainable Jurisprudence" (2019), 65 McGill L.J. 207).

165 The precedential Constitution of the United Kingdom is not a written document, but is comprised of unwritten norms, Acts of Parliament, Crown prerogative, conventions, custom of Parliament, and judicial decisions, among other sources (Oliver, at p. 216; M. Rowe and N. Déplanche, "Canada's Unwritten Constitutional Order: Conventions and Structural Analysis" (2020), 98 Can. Bar Rev. 430, at p. 438). Our Constitution, as a result, "embraces unwritte[n] as well as written rules" (Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 3 ("Provincial Judges Reference"), at para. 92, per Lamer C.J.).

166 It is notable that many Parliamentary systems, notwithstanding their different constitutional arrangements, have also recognized that unwritten constitutional principles have full legal force and can serve as substantive limitations on all branches of government.⁴

167 Unwritten constitutional principles have been held to be the "lifeblood" of our Constitution (Secession Reference, at para. 51) and the "vital unstated assumptions upon which the text is based" (para. 49). They are so foundational that including them in the written text "might have appeared redundant, even silly, to the framers" (para. 62).

168 Unwritten constitutional principles are not, as the majority suggests, merely "context" or "backdrop" to the text. On the contrary, unwritten principles are our Constitution's most basic normative commitments from which specific textual provisions derive. The specific written provisions are "elaborations of the underlying, unwritten, and organizing principles found in the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867" (Provincial Judges Reference, at para. 107; see also Switzman, at p. 306, per Rand J.). Constitutional text emanates from underlying principles, but it will not always be exhaustive of those principles. In other words, the text is not exhaustive of our Constitution (New Brunswick Broadcasting Co. v. Nova Scotia (Speaker of the House of Assembly), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 319, at p. 378, per McLachlin J.).

169 Apart from written provisions of the Constitution, principles deriving from the Constitution's basic structure may constrain government action. Those principles exist independently of and, as in the case of implied fundamental rights before the promulgation of the Charter, prior to the enactment of express constitutional provisions (see e.g. Reference re Alberta Statutes, per Duff C.J.; Switzman, at pp. 327-28, per Abbott J.; OPSEU v. Ontario (Attorney General), [1987] 2 S.C.R. 2, at p. 57, per Beetz J.). As Beetz J. wrote for the majority in OPSEU, at p. 57, "quite apart from Charter considerations, the legislative bodies in this country must conform to these basic structural imperatives and can in no way override them":

There is no doubt in my mind that the basic structure of our Constitution, as established by the Constitution Act, 1867, contemplates the existence of certain political institutions, including freely elected legislative bodies at the federal and provincial levels. In the words of Duff C.J. in Reference re Alberta Statutes, at p. 133, "such institutions derive their efficacy from the free public discussion of affairs" and, in those of Abbott J. in Switzman v. Elbling, at p. 328, neither a provincial legislature nor Parliament itself can "abrogate this right of discussion and debate". Speaking more generally, I hold that neither Parliament nor the provincial legislatures may enact legislation the effect of which would be to substantially interfere with the operation of this basic constitutional structure. [p. 57]

170 This leads inescapably to the conclusion -- supported by this Court's jurisprudence until today -- that unwritten principles may be used to invalidate legislation if a case arises where legislation elides the reach of any express constitutional provision but is fundamentally at odds with our Constitution's "internal architecture" or "basic constitutional structure" (Secession Reference, at para. 50; OPSEU, at p. 57). This would undoubtedly be a rare case. But with respect, the majority's decision to foreclose the possibility that unwritten principles be used to invalidate legislation in all circumstances, when the issue on appeal does not require them to make such a sweeping statement, is imprudent. It not only contradicts our jurisprudence, it is fundamentally inconsistent with the case law confirming that unwritten constitutional principles can be used to review legislation for constitutional compliance. Reviewing legislation for constitutional compliance means upholding, revising or rejecting it. Otherwise, there is no point to reviewing it.

171 In the Secession Reference, a unanimous Court confirmed that "[u]nderlying constitutional principles may in certain circumstances give rise to substantive legal obligations (have 'full legal force', as we described it in the Patriation Reference, supra, at p. 845), which constitute substantive limitations upon government action" (para. 54, quoting Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution, [1981] 1 S.C.R. 753 ("Patriation Reference"); see also Babcock v. Canada (Attorney General), [2002] 3 S.C.R. 3, at para. 54, per McLachlin C.J.). That means they can be used to assess state action for constitutional compliance, which in turn can lead to endorsing, rejecting, limiting or expanding the acts of the executive or legislative branches of government. Again, with respect, we have never, to date, limited their role in the manner the majority proposes.

172 The Court's reference to Patriation Reference dispels any doubt as to what it meant when it said that these principles have "full legal force". In the passage cited approvingly from the Patriation Reference, Martland and Ritchie JJ., dissenting in part, explained that unwritten constitutional principles "have been accorded full legal force in the sense of being employed to strike down legislative enactments" (p. 845 (emphasis added)). While Martland and Ritchie JJ. dissented in the result in the Patriation Reference, they cited judgments in support of the principle of federalism that remain good law and were viewed as necessary to "preserving the integrity of the federal structure" (p. 821), notably Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for Ontario, [1937] A.C. 326 (P.C.), and Attorney General of Nova Scotia v. Attorney General of Canada, [1951] S.C.R. 31 (see also Secession Reference, at para. 81, citing Reference re Authority of Parliament in relation to the Upper House, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 54, at p. 71). In other words, structural doctrine helps identify what the unwritten principles are, it does not limit their role.

173 This Court expressly endorsed the unwritten principles of democracy as the "baseline against which the framers of our Constitution, and subsequently, our elected representatives under it, have always operated" (Secession Reference, at para. 62); the rule of law as "a fundamental postulate of our constitutional structure" (Roncarelli v. Duplessis, [1959] S.C.R. 121, at p. 142, per Rand J.), "the very foundation of the Charter" (B.C.G.E.U. v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 214, at p. 229, per Dickson C.J.), and the source of judicial authority to override legislative intent "where giving effect to that intent is precluded by the rule of law" (Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Vavilov, 2019 SCC 65, at para. 23); federalism as "a foundational principle of the Canadian Constitution" (References re Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act, 2021 SCC 11, at para. 3, per Wagner C.J.); and judicial independence as a "constitutional imperative" in light of "the central place that courts hold within the Canadian system of government" (Provincial Judges Reference, at para. 108). And of course, the unwritten constitutional principle of the honour of the Crown has been affirmed by this Court and accorded full legal force (Beckman v. Little Salmon/Carmacks First Nation, [2010] 3 S.C.R. 103, at para. 42, per Binnie J.; Haida Nation v. British Columbia (Minister of Forests), [2004] 3 S.C.R. 511, at para. 16, per McLachlin C.J.).

174 In the Provincial Judges Reference, this Court relied, in part, on the unwritten constitutional principle of judicial independence to strike down legislative provisions in various provincial statutes. The issue was whether the principle of judicial independence restricts the manner and extent to which provincial legislatures can reduce the salaries of provincial court judges. While the principle of judicial independence finds expression in s. 11(d) of the Charter, which guarantees the right of an accused to an independent tribunal, and ss. 96 to 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which govern superior courts in the province, the unwritten principle of judicial independence was used to fill a gap in the written text to cover provincial courts in circumstances not covered by the express provisions. Writing for the majority, Lamer C.J. held that

[j]udicial independence is an unwritten norm, recognized and affirmed by the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867. In fact, it is in that preamble, which serves as the grand entrance hall to the castle of the Constitution, that the true source of our commitment to this foundational principle is located. [para. 109]

175 In Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 721, this Court invoked the unwritten principle of the rule of law to create a novel constitutional remedy -- the suspended declaration of constitutional invalidity. The Court developed this remedy notwithstanding that the text of s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 states that unconstitutional laws are "of no force or effect" suggesting, when interpreted technically and in isolation from underlying constitutional principles, that declarations of invalidity can only be given immediate effect. As Karakatsanis J. wrote for the majority in Ontario (Attorney General) v. G, 2020 SCC 38, although s. 52(1) "does not explicitly provide the authority to suspend a declaration, in adjudicating constitutional issues, courts 'may have regard to unwritten postulates which form the very foundation of the Constitution of Canada'" (para. 120, quoting Manitoba Language Rights, at p. 752).

176 Beyond the Reference context, in MacMillan Bloedel Ltd. v. Simpson, [1995] 4 S.C.R. 725, this Court used the rule of law principle to read down s. 47(2) of the Young Offenders Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. Y-1, which granted youth courts exclusive jurisdiction over contempt of court by a young person, so as not to oust the jurisdiction of superior courts. Writing for the majority, Lamer C.J. held that Parliament cannot remove the contempt power from a superior court without infringing "the principle of the rule of law recognized both in the preamble and in all our conventions of governance" (para. 41).

177 And in Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [2014] 3 S.C.R. 31, this Court struck down a regulation imposing hearing fees that were found to deny people access to the courts based in part on the unwritten constitutional principle of the rule of law, and relatedly, access to justice.

Court's repeated declarations that unwritten constitutional principles are the foundational organizing principles of our Constitution and have full legal force. Being unwritten means there is no text. They serve to give effect to the structure of our Constitution and "function as independent bases upon which to attack the validity of legislation ... since they have the same legal status as the text" (R. Elliot, "References, Structural Argumentation and the Organizing Principles of Canada's Constitution" (2001), 80 Can. Bar Rev. 67, at p. 95; see also H.-R. Zhou, "Legal Principles, Constitutional Principles, and Judicial Review" (2019), 67 Am. J. Comp. L. 889, at p. 924). By definition, an emphasis on the words of the Constitution demotes unwritten principles to a diluted role. "Full legal force" means full legal force, independent of the written text.

179 Unwritten constitutional principles do not only "give meaning and effect to constitutional text" and inform "the language chosen to articulate the specific right or freedom", they also assist in developing an evolutionary understanding of the rights and freedoms guaranteed in our Constitution, which this Court has long described as "a living tree capable of growth and expansion" (Hunter v. Southam Inc., [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145, at p. 156, quoting Edwards v. Attorney-General for Canada, [1930] A.C. 124 (P.C.), at p. 136). Unwritten constitutional principles are a key part of what makes the tree grow (Secession Reference, at para. 52; Provincial Judges Reference, at para. 106). This Court has never held that the interpretive role of unwritten constitutional principles is narrowly constrained by textualism.

180 Unwritten constitutional principles are, additionally, substantive legal rules in their own right. As Lamer C.J. wrote in the Provincial Judges Reference:

[The preamble] recognizes and affirms the basic principles which are the very source of the substantive provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867. As I have said above, those provisions merely elaborate those organizing principles in the institutional apparatus they create or contemplate. As such, the preamble is not only a key to construing the express provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867, but also invites the use of those organizing principles to fill out gaps in the express terms of the constitutional scheme. It is the means by which the underlying logic of the Act can be given the force of law. [Emphasis added; para. 95.]

181 Professor Mark D. Walters effectively explained why the role of unwritten constitutional principles has not been limited as the majority suggests:

The relationship between unwritten and written constitutional law in Canada may be conceived in different ways. At one point, Chief Justice Antonio Lamer observed that the role of unwritten principles is "to fill out gaps in the express terms of the constitutional scheme." This statement might suggest that judges are just reading between the lines in order to make the text complete. Or, to use another metaphor, judges are constructing bridges over the waters that separate islands of constitutional text, creating a unified and useable surface.

But the gap-filling and bridge metaphors do not capture fully the theory of unwritten constitutionalism as it has developed in the Canadian cases... . We must alter the bridge metaphor accordingly: The textual islands are merely the exposed parts of a vast seabed visible beneath the surrounding waters, and the bridges constructed by judges between these islands are actually causeways moulded from natural materials brought to the surface from this single underlying foundation. The constitutional text is not just supplemented by unwritten principles; it rests upon them. [Emphasis added; footnote omitted.]

182 It is also difficult to understand the need for the majority's conclusion that using unwritten constitutional principles to strike down legislation would circumvent the legislative override power in s. 33 of the Charter. This question is not directly before us.

183 Finally, I see no merit to the majority's argument that courts cannot declare legislation invalid on the basis of unwritten constitutional principles because s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 only applies to written text. This argument extinguishes the entire jurisprudence establishing that unwritten principles have full legal force. Section 52(1) provides that "any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is ... of no force or effect".

The majority's reading of s. 52(1), like much of the rest of its analysis, is a highly technical exegetical exercise designed to overturn our binding authority establishing that unwritten constitutional principles are a full constitutional partner with the text, including for the purposes of s. 52 (New Brunswick Broadcasting Co., at pp. 375-78; Manitoba Language Rights, at p. 752; Ontario (Attorney General) v. G, at para. 120).

184 It is true that in British Columbia v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., [2005] 2 S.C.R. 473, the Court questioned whether the rule of law could be used to invalidate legislation based on its content, but this was based on the specific contours of one unwritten principle, not unwritten principles in general. The Court did not constrain the reach of judicial independence, the other unwritten constitutional principle raised in that case. As Major J. explained in describing the limits of the content of the rule of law:

... it is difficult to conceive of how the rule of law could be used as a basis for invalidating legislation such as the Act based on its content. That is because none of the principles that the rule of law embraces speak directly to the terms of legislation. The first principle requires that legislation be applied to all those, including government officials, to whom it, by its terms, applies. The second principle means that legislation must exist. And the third principle, which overlaps somewhat with the first and second, requires that state officials' actions be legally founded. See R. Elliot, "References, Structural Argumentation and the Organizing Principles of Canada's Constitution" (2001), 80 Can. Bar Rev. 67, at pp. 114-15. [para. 59]

Never, however, has this Court, until now, foreclosed the possibility of all unwritten constitutional principles ever invalidating legislation.

185 The inevitable consequence of this Court's decades-long recognition that unwritten constitutional principles have "full legal force" and "constitute substantive limitations" on all branches of government is that, in an appropriate case, they may well continue to serve, as they have done in the past, as the basis for declaring legislation unconstitutional (Secession Reference, at para. 54; see also Elliot, at p. 95; (A.) J. Johnson, "The Judges Reference and the Secession Reference at Twenty: Reassessing the Supreme Court of Canada's Unfinished Unwritten Constitutional Principles Project" (2019), 56 Alta. L. Rev. 1077, at p. 1082; P. Bobbitt, Constitutional Fate: Theory of the Constitution (1982)). There is no need, as a result, to constrain the role of unwritten constitutional principles and newly declare that their full legal force does not include the ability, in appropriate circumstances, to declare legislation to be constitutionally invalid.

186 I would allow the appeal and restore Belobaba J.'s declaration that the timing of the Act unjustifiably infringed s. 2(b) of the Charter.

Administrative law — Natural justice — Procedural fairness — Motion by defendants to strike claims against them allowed — Plaintiff sought damages related to closure of plaintiffs' college — Plaintiffs' claims related to fairness of regulatory process and ought to have been subject to statutory appeal or judicial review — Fact that damages were not available on judicial review was not sufficient to ground action — None of plaintiffs' claims established reasonable cause of action — Plaintiffs' claims struck as abuse of process and as disclosing no reasonable claim — Supreme Court Civil Rules, Rule 9-5(1).

Civil litigation — Civil procedure — Pleadings — Striking out pleadings or allegations — Grounds — Failure to disclose a cause of action or defence — False, frivolous, vexatious or abuse of process — Motion by defendants to strike claims against them allowed — Plaintiff sought damages related to closure of plaintiffs' college — Plaintiffs' claims related to fairness of regulatory process and ought to have been subject to statutory appeal or judicial review — Fact that damages were not available on judicial review was not sufficient to ground action — None of plaintiffs' claims established reasonable cause of action — Plaintiffs' claims struck as abuse of process and as disclosing no reasonable claim — Supreme Court Civil Rules, Rule 9-5(1).

Constitutional law — Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms — Mobility rights — To reside or earn a livelihood in any province — Legal rights — Protection against unreasonable search and seizure — Motion by defendants to strike claims against them allowed — Plaintiff alleged closure of college violated Charter rights — None of plaintiffs' claims established reasonable cause of action — Plaintiff did not have Charter right to pursue livelihood so as to override applicable provincial legislation — Claim of unreasonable search and seizure was essentially allegation of breach of rules of natural justice and procedural fairness, which was properly subject of judicial review proceedings — Plaintiffs' claims struck as abuse of process and as disclosing no reasonable claim — Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, 1982, ss. 6(2)(b), 8.

Tort law — Practice and procedure — Pleadings — Amendment — Adding or striking out a claim — Motion by defendants to strike claims against them allowed — Plaintiff alleged misfeasance in public office, conspiracy, abuse of process and intentional interference with economic relations — Plaintiffs' claims related to fairness of regulatory process and ought to have been subject to statutory appeal or judicial review — Fact that damages were not available on judicial review was not sufficient to ground action — None of plaintiffs' claims established reasonable cause of action — Plaintiffs' claims struck as abuse of process and as disclosing no reasonable claim — Supreme Court Civil Rules, Rule 9-5(1).

Motion by defendants to strike claims against them. Following a complaint by a former student of the plaintiffs' college, the defendant regulatory agency cancelled the college's accreditation and the defendant ministers obtained an interlocutory injunction restraining the college from issuing certificates. The plaintiff alleged misfeasance in public office, conspiracy, abuse of process, intentional interference with economic relations and Charter violations. The regulatory agency sought to strike the claims against it on the grounds that the claims were an impermissible collateral attack on its administrative process, which should have been subject to statutory appeal or judicial review. The crown defendants argued that the claim disclosed no cause of action against them. The minister defendants argued that the action was a collateral attack on the injunction proceedings. The plaintiffs argued that its action was not an abuse of process because its claim for damages was not available in judicial review.

HELD: Motions allowed.

To the extent that the plaintiffs' claims against the regulatory agency related to the fairness of the administrative process, they ought to have pursued the remedies available under the legislation. The fact that damages are not available in an application for judicial review was not sufficient to ground the action where the essential complaint stemmed from dissatisfaction with the conduct and decisions of an administrative agency. The claim for damages was struck as an abuse of process. The pleadings did not support the claims of misfeasance in public office or abuse of process. The claim of intentional interference with economic relations was certain to fail. The pleadings were insufficient to ground the claim of conspiracy. The claim based on the right to earn a livelihood in any provide was certain to fail. The plaintiff did not have an independent Charter right to pursue a livelihood so as to override applicable provincial legislation. The claim of unreasonable search and seizure was essentially an allegation of a breach of the rules of natural justice and procedural fairness, which was properly the subject of judicial review proceedings. The claims against the registrar of the regulatory agency were certain to fail. The plaintiffs pleaded nothing to suggest that the registrar conducted himself in a manner that was separate from the agency or that he was acting outside the scope of his employment. The claims against the agency and the registrar constituted an impermissible collateral attack and were struck as an abuse of process. There was nothing in the claim that asserted any cause of action against the crown. The claim against the ministers made the same allegations as in the injunction proceedings. In the circumstances, it would be contrary to the interests of justice to permit the plaintiffs to make the same claim in two extant proceedings. The ministers named in the proceedings were no longer in those positions, and allegations of abuse of process could not succeed against nominal defendants. The claim against the ministers based on vicarious liability could not possibly succeed. The plaintiffs were denied leave to amend their pleadings, as it was apparent that the plaintiffs' primary issues were with the other defendants.

B. FISHER J.

1 The applications before the court are by some of the defendants in this proceeding who seek to have the claims against them struck under Rule 9-5 or dismissed by way of summary judgment under Rule 9-6 of the Supreme Court Civil Rules.

2 The defendants Private Career Training Institutions Agency of British Columbia (PCTIA) and its Registrar, Jim Wright, seek to strike portions of the Notice of Civil Claim pertaining to them. I will refer to these defendants as the Agency defendants.

3 The defendants the Honourable Ida Chong, Minister of Regional Economic and Skills Development, the Honourable Colin Hansen, Minister of Health Services, Her Majesty the Queen in Right of the Province of British Columbia, and the Attorney General of British Columbia apply for orders striking portions of the Notice of Civil Claim and dismissing the claims against them, or alternatively staying the proceedings. These defendants also apply in the alternative for an order that the two named ministers cease to be defendants. I will refer to these defendants as the Crown defendants and to the named ministers as the Ministers.

Background

4 The plaintiff, Sky Willow, is a Ph.D. of Traditional Chinese Medicine, the principal of the plaintiff Shanghai TCM College of BC Canada Ltd. (Shanghai College) and board member of the plaintiff Council of Natural Medicine College of Canada (Council of Natural Medicine). These plaintiffs have brought claims against numerous defendants which relate to issues surrounding the closure of Shanghai College in Vancouver. They seek damages for losses associated with this closure.

5 Until October 25, 2010, Shanghai College was registered and accredited to provide career training under the Private Career Training Institutions Act, SBC 2003 c 79 (PCTI Act or the Act). It provided training in acupuncture and traditional Chinese medicine and was entitled to award qualifications to its students on completion of their training. The defendant PCTIA is the regulatory agency for private training institutions and it acts under the authority of the PCTI Act.

6 In 2009, the defendant Stephen Harvey made a complaint about Shanghai College to PCTIA after learning that he would not be able to practice acupuncture and traditional Chinese medicine by any professional title, and he sought a refund of the tuition he had paid to the College. After an investigation, PCTIA refunded the amount of the tuition fees to Mr. Harvey from a fund established under the PCTI Act. On September 22, 2010, PCTIA demanded that Shanghai College pay it the amount of the fees that had been refunded to Mr. Harvey. On October 25, 2010, PCTIA searched Shanghai College's premises, seized documents, and cancelled Shanghai College's registration and accreditation under the Act.

7 In December 2010, the Ministers commenced an action against Shanghai College and the Council of Natural Medicine seeking an interlocutory and permanent injunction restraining them from issuing or offering to issue certificates for doctoral degrees and certificates indicating or implying that the holder is a doctor entitled to practice as a doctor (I will refer to this as the Ministers' Action). The Ministers alleged that Shanghai College was not authorized by the Minister of Regional Economic and Skills Development under the Degree Authorization Act, SBC 2002, c 24 to confer degrees on persons, or to sell, offer or advertise for sale degree certificates, and was not a college authorized under the Health Professions Act, RSBC 1996, c 183, to register a person as a member of the college entitled to use the title "doctor" in his or her work.

8 Shanghai College and the Council of Natural Medicine defended the Ministers' Action by alleging that it was commenced and continued primarily for a collateral or improper purpose that amounted to an abuse of process.

9 On February 7, 2011, an interlocutory injunction was granted in the Ministers' Action against Shanghai College and the Council of Natural Medicine. No steps have been taken in the Ministers' Action since then.

The Claims

10 This action was commenced in January 2011.

1. As against the Agency defendants

11 The claims against the Agency defendants stem from PCTIA's September 22, 2010 decision that Shanghai College pay the amount of the fees that had been refunded to Mr. Harvey and its search of Shanghai College's premises on October 25, 2010 and seizure of documents.

12 The plaintiffs allege that Jim Wright, the Registrar of PCTIA, authorized staff "to break into" Shanghai College's premises and remove documents and materials and that PCTIA and Jim Wright "acted with malice and without reasonable or probable cause or a primary purpose other than that of carrying the law into effect". They allege that the Agency defendants, with knowledge of the contractual relationship between Shanghai College and its students, "and with intent to prevent performance of the contract, wrongfully and without lawful right to do so", caused Shanghai College to be closed down after removing documents and cancelling its registration and accreditation. They say that this was done with malice and intent to injure them and that it caused them to lose the benefit of tutoring students and earning an income, resulting in a loss of profits.

13 The plaintiffs also allege that the Agency defendants, along with the Ministers, breached the principles of natural justice "motivated by malice, bad faith and wrongful interference with the economic and contractual relations" and violated s. 6(2)(b) of the Charter, and "the Trespass, Search and Seizure" committed by both the Ministers and the Agency defendants were unreasonable and violated s. 8 of the Charter.

2. As against the Crown defendants

14 The claims against the Crown defendants are primarily for abuse of process stemming from the Ministers' Action. The plaintiffs make the same allegations as in their response to the Ministers' Action. They allege that the Ministers' Action was commenced and continued by the Ministers "primarily for a collateral or improper purpose that was unrelated to the ostensible purpose" of the Action.

15 They also allege that (1) the injunctive relief sought by the Ministers is res judicata due to similar relief having been sought by the College of Traditional Chinese Medicine Practitioners and Acupuncturists of British Columbia in Federal Court; (2) the Ministers caused them damages that include "(a) financial hardship; (b) anxiety; (c) frustration, confusion and insecurity; (d) despondency; and (e) emotional trauma"; (3) the Ministers' conduct in instituting the Ministers' Action "amounts to an abuse of process which amounts to a collateral and improper purpose other than to carry the law into effect"; and (4) the Ministers "committed a tortious act of abuse of process which amounts to a wilful misuse or perversion of the court's process for a purpose extraneous or ulterior to that which the process was designed to serve".

16 The plaintiffs make some claims against the Ministers together with PCTIA and Jim Wright on the basis that the Ministers control the training and issuing of certificates. These claims include alleged breaches of the principles of natural justice "motivated by malice, bad faith and wrongful interference with the economic and contractual relations" between the plaintiffs and their students, which violated s. 6(2)(b) of the Charter. They also say that PCTIA and Jim Wright acted on instructions or under the authority of the Ministers and the Ministers are vicariously liable for the conduct of the Agency defendants. Finally, they allege that "the Trespass, Search and Seizure" committed by both the Ministers and the Agency defendants were unreasonable and violated s. 8 of the Charter.

Applications to strike pleadings - Rule 9-5

17 Rule 9-5(1) provides:

At any stage of a proceeding, the court may order to be struck out or amended the whole or any part of a pleading, petition or other document on the ground that

- (a) it discloses no reasonable claim or defence, as the case may be,
- (b) it is unnecessary, scandalous, frivolous or vexatious,
- ... or
- (d) it is otherwise an abuse of the process of the court, and the court may pronounce judgment or order the proceeding to be stayed or dismissed and may order the costs of the application to be paid as special costs.

18 The test for striking a claim as disclosing no reasonable claim under Rule 9-5(1)(a), set out in Hunt v Carey Canada Inc., [1990] 2 SCR 959 and reiterated more recently in R. v Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2011 SCC 42, is whether it is "plain and obvious," assuming the facts pleaded are true, that the claim discloses no reasonable cause of action, has no reasonable prospect of success, or if the action is "certain to fail." If there is a chance that the plaintiffs might succeed, then they should not be "driven from the judgment seat." No evidence is admissible on an application under Rule 9-5(1)(a).

19 The rule that material facts in a notice of civil claim must be taken as true does not mean that allegations based on assumption and speculation must be taken as true. This was discussed in Operation Dismantle Inc. v The Queen, [1985] 1 SCR 441, where Dickson J. (as he then was) stated that "[n]o violence is done to the rule where allegations, incapable of proof, are not taken as proven". In Young v Borzoni, 2007 BCCA 16, the court stated (at paras. 30-31) that great caution must be taken in relying on Operation Dismantle as a general authority that allegations in pleadings should be weighed as to their truth, but it is not fundamentally wrong to look behind allegations in some cases, and it may be appropriate to subject the allegations in the pleadings to a sceptical analysis. It was considered appropriate in Young, where the plaintiff made sweeping allegations of things like intolerance, deceit, harassment, intimidation and falsifying documents against the defendants, which the court concluded could only be viewed as speculation.

20 Under Rule 9-5(1)(b), a pleading is unnecessary or vexatious if it does not go to establishing the plaintiff's cause of action, if it does not advance any claim known in law, where it is obvious that an action cannot succeed, or where it would serve no useful purpose and would be a waste of the court's time and public resources: Citizens for Foreign Aid Reform Inc. v Canadian Jewish Congress, [1999] BCJ No. 2160 (SC); Skender v Farley, 2007 BCCA 629. If a pleading is so confusing that it is difficult to understand what is pleaded, it may also be unnecessary, frivolous or vexatious. An application under this sub-rule may be supported by evidence.

21 Abuse of process under Rule 9-5(1)(d) or the court's inherent discretion is a flexible doctrine. It allows the court to prevent a claim from proceeding where to do so would violate principles of judicial economy, consistency, finality and the integrity of the administration of justice. A claim may be struck where it is a collateral attack on an administrative decision that is subject to appeal or judicial review: Cimaco International Sales Inc. v British Columbia, 2010 BCCA 342; Stephen v HMTQ, 2008 BCSC 1656; Varzeliotis v British Columbia, 2007 BCSC 620; Gemex Developments Corp. v City of Coquitlam, 2002 BCSC 412; Berscheid v Ensign, [1999] BCJ No. 1172 (SC). A claim may also be struck as an abuse of process where it is an attempt to re-litigate an issue that has already been decided: Toronto (City) v Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE), Local 79, 2003 SCC 63.

22 The plaintiffs have an obligation to clearly plead the material facts upon which they rely in making their claim. A material fact is a fact that is essential in formulating a complete cause of action: see Young at para. 20.

23 In considering an application to strike under Rule 9-5, the court should consider whether defective pleadings can be corrected by way of an amendment and whether it would be appropriate to give leave to do so: see Greville v Convoy Supply Ltd. (14 January 2004), Vancouver S033090 (BCSC).

Summary judgment - Rule 9-6

24 Rule 9-6(4) permits a party to apply for judgment dismissing all or part of a claim. Rule 9-6(5) provides that on hearing such an application, the court

- (a) if satisfied that there is no genuine issue for trial with respect to a claim ..., must ... dismiss the claim accordingly,
- (b) if satisfied that the only genuine issue is the amount to which the claiming party is entitled, may order a trial of that issue or pronounce judgment with a reference or an accounting to determine the amount,
- (c) if satisfied that the only genuine issue is a question of law, may determine the question and pronounce judgment accordingly, and
- (d) may make any other order it considers will further the object of these Supreme Court Civil Rules.

25 The test to be applied for summary judgment is whether there is a bona fide triable issue to be determined: see Pitt v Holt, 2007 BCSC 1555 at para. 10, citing Serup v Board of School Trustees (1989), 54 BCLR (2d) 258 (CA), and Skybridge Investments Ltd. v Metro Motors Ltd., 2006 BCCA 500. The court must be satisfied that it is "plain and obvious" or "beyond a doubt" the action will not succeed: Saxton v Credit Union Deposit Guarantee Corporation, 2006 ABCA 175. The application should be dismissed if the court is left in doubt as to whether there is a triable issue: Progressive Construction Ltd. v Newton (1980), 25 BCLR 330 (SC).

26 In Skybridge, Thackray J.A. held (at para. 10) that a judge hearing an application under this rule must "examine the pleaded facts to determine which causes of action they may support; identify the essential elements required to be proved at trial in order to succeed on each cause of action; and determine if sufficient material facts have been pleaded to support each element of a given cause of action."

27 In determining whether there is a bona fide issue, the judge is to assume that uncontested material facts as pleaded by the plaintiff are true: Van Den Akker v Naudi, [1997] BCJ No. 1649 (CA).

The application of the Agency defendants

28 The Agency defendants seek to strike out the portions of the Notice of Civil Claim as it relates to them, pursuant to Rule 9-5(1).

29 Their primary submission is that the claims against them are an impermissible collateral attack on the decisions of PCTIA to order Shanghai College to pay $51,200 for the fees that had been refunded to Mr. Harvey, to search its premises and seize documents, and to cancel its registration and accreditation under the PCTI Act. They say that all of the allegations arise from the plaintiffs' dissatisfaction with these decisions and actions, all of which are subject to statutory appeal or judicial review. They submit that this action is a collateral attack on the administrative process under the PCTI Act and should be struck in its entirety as an abuse of process under Rule 9-5(1)(d).

30 The Agency defendants also submit that the plaintiffs have based their pleadings on broad statements and allegations of unlawful conduct with insufficient material facts, and the pleadings are prolix and confusing, and as such the claims against them should be struck as disclosing no reasonable cause of action under Rule 9-5(1)(a) or as unnecessary and vexatious under Rule 9-5(1)(b).

31 The plaintiffs submit that this action is not an abuse of process because their claim for damages is not available in judicial review. They also submit that they have properly pleaded causes of action of malice in relation to misfeasance in public office, intentional interference with contractual relations, conspiracy, and violations of the Charter.

Abuse of process

32 I agree with the Agency defendants that the plaintiffs' claims against them stem from their dissatisfaction with how and what PCTIA decided against Shanghai College. The essence of their claim is that PCTIA breached the rules of natural justice and due process. They allege that (1) PCTIA failed to hold a hearing and breached the principle of audi alteram partem in deciding that Shanghai College was required to pay Mr. Harvey's tuition fees; (2) Mr. Wright improperly authorized PCTIA staff to search Shanghai College's premises and seize documents; and (3) PCTIA and Mr. Wright wrongfully caused Shanghai College to close down.

33 To these essential complaints the plaintiffs add allegations of malice, intent to interfere with contractual relations, and intent to injure. Despite these allegations, I have concluded that substantively, the plaintiffs' claims against the Agency defendants are based on alleged errors that were either appealable under the PCTI Act or judicially reviewable under the Judicial Review Procedure Act, RSBC 1996, c 241.

The role of PCTIA under the legislation

34 To view the plaintiffs' claims in the proper context, I will review the role of PCTIA and the registrar under the PCTI Act. Section 3 establishes that PCTIA has three objectives:

- (a) to establish basic education standards for registered institutions and to provide consumer protection to the students and prospective students of registered institutions;
- (b) to establish standards of quality that must be met by accredited institutions;
- (c) to carry out, in the public interest, its powers, duties and functions under this Act.

35 PCTIA is operated by a board of up to 10 members. The board has authority under s. 6 to make bylaws in relation to numerous matters, including (h) requirements for registration of institutions; (k) establishing the standards of quality to be met by accredited institutions; (l) establishing requirements for renewal, suspension, cancellation or reinstatement of registration or accreditation of institutions; and (m) regulating and prohibiting advertising or types of advertising by registered or accredited institutions.

36 An institution providing career training must be registered under the Act. An institution may also be accredited. Accreditation, which is voluntary, permits an institution to represent itself as such and requires it to demonstrate continuous compliance with PCTIA's standards of quality. The registrar grants registration under s. 8 and accreditation under s. 9 of the Act. Under s. 12, the registrar may appoint inspectors for the purpose of determining whether it is appropriate to suspend or cancel a registration or accreditation or change the terms and conditions of a suspension, or whether a person has failed to comply with the Act, regulations, bylaws or terms and conditions of a suspension. Under s. 12(2), an inspector conducting an investigation has the authority, without warrant, to:

- (a) enter business premises,
- (b) examine a record or any other thing,
- (c) demand that a document or any other thing be produced for inspection,

- (d) remove a record or any other thing for review and copying, after providing a receipt,
- (e) use data storage, information processing or retrieval devices or systems that are normally used in carrying on business in the premises to produce a record in readable form, or
- (f) question a person.

37 Section 10 provides that a person who is affected by a cancellation of registration or accreditation may request a reconsideration of the decision by the registrar, who may confirm or vary the decision, and a further right of appeal to the board of PCTIA. The board may dismiss the appeal, allow the appeal and give any directions it considers appropriate, vary the decision, and set terms and conditions. If a person remains dissatisfied with the decision of the board, he or she may seek judicial review under the Judicial Review Procedure Act.

38 A Student Training Compensation Fund is established in s. 13 of the Act. This fund is administered by the board, which, under s. 15, may authorize payments to be made for a number of purposes, including:

- (a.1) refunding a portion of the tuition fees a student has paid to a registered institution that, in the opinion of the board, has misled a student regarding the institution or any aspect of its operations;

39 Section 16(3) and (4) provide that the board has exclusive jurisdiction to hear and decide claims against the Fund, subject to judicial review on a question of law or excess of jurisdiction. The board also has the authority, under s. 16(5), to reconsider its own decisions.

Collateral attack

40 Neither Shanghai College nor the other plaintiffs pursued this matter by launching an appeal to the board or seeking judicial review.¹ To the extent that the plaintiffs' claims relate to the fairness of the process and the basis for the decisions and actions taken by the registrar and PCTIA, they ought to have pursued the remedies available to them under the legislation. In my opinion, it is improper to pursue such claims in an action for damages. This issue had been the subject of several decisions in this court and the Court of Appeal that have many similarities with this case.

41 In Cimaco, the plaintiff alleged several causes of action, including misfeasance in public office against the Business Practices and Consumer Protection Authority when the Authority suspended its licence under the Travel Agents Act, RSBC 1996, c 459. It alleged that the Authority acted with malice and the intention to deliberately injure the plaintiff, and for an improper purpose, contrary to the duty of fairness. The plaintiff sought damages and constitutional declarations. It did not seek an order setting aside the suspension because the business had been lost.

42 The claims were struck by the Chambers judge, [2009] B.C.J. No. 1394, and this was upheld on appeal. Kirkpatrick J.A. for the court described Cimaco's pleadings as "prolix and unfocussed" at para. 46:

There are many interlaced claims that make it difficult to extract discrete claims. There is an element of abuse of process throughout the claims, since Cimaco's essential complaint concerns the revocation of its license following its failure to provide security, a claim properly the subject of judicial review. When reduced to their essence, all of the claims fundamentally rest on the assertion that the Authority was wrong in its conclusion that the Regulation applied to Cimaco. However, instead of commencing judicial review proceedings, Cimaco commenced this action.

43 The court went on to analyze the various causes of action set out in the plaintiff's claim and concluded that each of them was bound to fail. With respect to the claim that the Authority acted with improper purpose, without authority and contrary to the duty of fairness, the court held that this constituted an impermissible collateral attack of the Authority's decision, reasoning as follows at paras. 58 and 59:

Clearly, this claim is properly a matter for judicial review, not a tort claim. A civil claim is not the appropriate forum for a court to consider the process of an administrative decision maker. Therefore this pleading is clearly an abuse of process.

It is plain that Cimaco's core allegation is that the Authority misinterpreted the Regulation and knew it had no basis on which to suspend Cimaco's license. All of its allegations are linked to this central allegation.

44 Similar issues were addressed by this court in Stephen, where the plaintiff alleged various causes of action against a number of defendants, including the Human Rights Tribunal and its members. Joyce J. concluded that the plaintiff's claims stemmed from alleged errors in decisions made by the Tribunal that were all judicially reviewable and as such, a collateral attack. At para. 72 he explained:

I agree with counsel for the Tribunal Defendants that the claims against them are an abuse of process in that the plaintiff is attempting to collaterally attack the Tribunal's decisions. The essence of the plaintiff's claims against the Tribunal Defendants is that due to some bias favouring the respondents, unfairness or breaches of natural justice in the handling of the plaintiff's human rights complaints, or errors in decision-making, or both, the Tribunal's decisions and the exercise of statutory powers and duties by the individual Tribunal members produced outcomes that were wrong.

45 In Varzeliotis, the plaintiff made claims against the Information and Privacy Commissioner seeking relief that was generally available under the Judicial Review Procedure Act, as well as special and punitive damages. Macauley J. held that a claim for damages is not available as an alternative where a party has available administrative law remedies on judicial review. He struck these claims as an abuse of process.

46 The plaintiffs submit that this case is distinguishable from Cimaco, Stephen and Varzeliotis because they have viable claims for damages for misfeasance in public office, intentional interference with contractual relations, conspiracy and Charter violations. Because damages are not available in judicial review, they say that this action against the Agency defendants is not an abuse of process.

47 It is well known that damages are not available in applications for judicial review: see, for example, McLean v British Columbia, 2004 BCSC 285 at paras. 47-49; Clubb v Saanich (District) (1995), 35 Admin LR (2d) 309 (BCSC); Stoneman v Denman Island Local Trust Committee, 2010 BCSC 636 at para. 86. However, that principal alone is not sufficient to ground an action for damages where the essential complaint stems from dissatisfaction with the conduct and the decisions of an administrative agency. The plaintiffs must have viable causes of action in and of themselves.

48 As I explain below, the plaintiffs' pleadings are prolix and confusing in that it is difficult to ascertain what causes of action are alleged. They make broad allegations of unlawful conduct with insufficient material facts. As pleaded, none of these claims establishes a reasonable cause of action and all of them are bound to fail. Therefore, I have concluded that the addition of a claim for damages in these circumstances constitutes an impermissible collateral attack of the decisions of PCTIA and must be struck as an abuse of process.

No reasonable causes of action

Misfeasance of public office

49 The plaintiffs' claim of misfeasance in public office is based on their allegations that PCTIA and Mr. Wright unlawfully searched Shanghai College premises and seized documents. The pleadings related to this are in paragraphs 24 to 26 of the Notice of Civil Claim, under the heading "Principle of Natural Justice - Due Process":

24. On or about October 25, 2010 the Defendant, Jim Wright, in a tortious act of malfeasance authorized staff of the PCTIA to break into the premises of the Plaintiff, Shanghai, and remove documents, lecturing material, personal property of the Plaintiff Sky Willow and signage of the College from the Plaintiff, Shanghai's, business premises ... (the "Trespass, Search and Seizure").
25. The Plaintiffs, Shanghai and Sky Willow, state that the Defendants, the PCTIA and Jim Wright, acted with malice and without reasonable or probable cause or a primary purpose other than that of carrying the law into effect. The conduct of the Defendants, the PCTIA and Jim Wright, further amount to an abuse of process or malfeasance.

26. Particulars of the malice and malfeasance are inter alia as follows:

- (a) Attempted to gain a private collateral advantage;
- (b) Acted with spite, ill-will or vengeance;
- (c) Violated the Plaintiffs, Shanghai and Sky Willow's, autonomy and respect and status in the community;
- (d) Violated the Plaintiffs, Shanghai and Sky Willow's, right to receive a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of natural justice;
- (e) Pursuing the Plaintiff, Sky Willow, for alleged misconduct, which prosecution is clearly motivated by malice, bad faith and wrongful interference with respect to the Plaintiff, Sky Willow's, right to pursue a livelihood as stated in Section 6(2)(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

50 The tort of misfeasance in public office was described in Odhavji Estate v Woodhouse, 2003 SCC 69 at para. 32, as an intentional tort with two distinguishing elements: (1) deliberate unlawful conduct in the exercise of public functions; and (2) awareness that the conduct is unlawful and likely to injure the plaintiff. A plaintiff must also prove the other requirements common to all torts, including causation and compensable damages.

51 The plaintiffs' pleadings confuse misfeasance in public office with abuse of process. They say nothing of deliberate conduct by these defendants or an awareness of unlawful conduct that is likely to injure the plaintiffs, nor do they provide material facts related to each of these two elements of the tort. There is simply a bare allegation of "a tortious act of malfeasance" by Mr. Wright in authorizing the search of Shanghai College and seizure of documents, and a bare allegation that the Agency defendants "acted with malice and without reasonable or probable cause or a primary purpose other than carrying the law into effect". While this latter allegation could be interpreted as deliberate unlawful conduct, none of the particulars provided constitute material facts supporting either required element of the tort. They are simply bare allegations that can only be viewed as speculation.

52 In my view, the pleadings do not adequately make out a claim for misfeasance in public office and such a claim has no reasonable prospect of success.

The tort of abuse of process

53 It is not clear if the plaintiffs allege the tort of abuse of process. Paragraph 25 of the Notice of Civil Claim states that the conduct of PCTIA and Mr. Wright, in acting with "malice and without reasonable or probable cause or a primary purpose other than carrying the law into effect", is also an abuse of process. In the legal basis for the claim, the plaintiffs claim "general damages for abuse of process and violation of the principles of natural justice".

54 The tort of abuse of process requires the following elements to be established: (1) a willful misuse or perversion of a court process for an extraneous or improper purpose; and (2) some damage resulting: Border Enterprises Ltd. v Beazer East Inc., 2002 BCCA 449 at para. 51. An additional element, that some act or threat has been made in furtherance of the process, may also be required, although this is not clear in British Columbia: see Smith v Rusk, 2009 BCCA 96 at para. 34; Bajwa v British Columbia Veterinary Medical Association, 2012 BCSC 878 at paras. 178-181; and Home Equity Development Inc. v Crow, 2002 BCSC 1747 at para. 19. In Home Equity, it was held that some definite conduct in furtherance of an illegitimate purpose is essential, as there is no liability where the defendant is employing its regular process, even if it does so with bad intentions: see para. 20, citing Guilford Industries Ltd. v Hankinson Management Services Ltd., [1974] 1 WWR 141.

55 The plaintiffs' pleadings appear to allege a collateral purpose but this is confusingly stated as "a primary purpose other than carrying the law into effect". Importantly, they do not provide any material facts to support this allegation, nor do they plead what act was done in furtherance of the process. It is possible that the pleading in para. 24 regarding the search and seizure authorized by Mr. Wright could be interpreted as the act made in furtherance of the process, but nothing is pleaded clearly or in relation to PCTIA. Here again, there are only bare allegations and there is nothing to support any allegation that the Agency defendants were not acting within the authority of the PCTI Act.

56 The pleadings do not make out a claim in the tort of abuse of process. It appears to me that the plaintiffs have confused abuse of process with procedural fairness issues. This is exemplified in part in the particulars of the "malice and malfeasance" in paragraph 26, which include the allegation that the Agency defendants violated Shanghai College and Sky Willow's right to receive "a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of natural justice".

57 In my opinion, the plaintiffs' real complaint here relates to the fairness of the process employed by PCTIA and is not properly the subject of an action for damages. Any claim for abuse of process has no reasonable prospect of success.

Intentional interference with contractual and economic relations

58 The claims for intentional interference with contractual and economic relations are set out in paras. 27, 28 and 29 of the Notice of Civil Claim:

27. The conduct of the Defendants, the PCTIA and Jim Wright, further amounts to intentional interference with the contractual and economic relations between the Plaintiff, Shanghai, and its students.
28. The Defendants, the PCTIA and Jim Wright, with knowledge of the contractual relationship between the Plaintiff, Shanghai, and its students and with the intent to prevent performance of the contract, wrongfully and without lawful right to do so, caused the Plaintiffs, Shanghai and Sky Willow, to close down the Plaintiff, Shanghai's, business after the said Defendants removed the Plaintiff Shanghai's material and assets from its business premises and after cancelling the registration and accreditation as of October 25, 2010.
29. The conduct of the Defendants, the PCTIA and Jim Wright, was done with malice and with the intent to injure the Plaintiffs which conduct has the result that the Plaintiffs are losing the benefit of tutoring students and earning an income and has lost profit the Plaintiffs would otherwise have made and have been greatly injured in the Plaintiff, Shanghai's, business and have suffered and continue to suffer loss and damage.

59 The intentional tort of interference with contractual relations has five elements: (1) the existence of a valid and enforceable contract; (2) awareness of the defendants of the existence of the contract; (3) breach of the contract procured by the defendants; (4) wrongful interference; and (5) damages: Potter v Rowe, [1990] B.C.J. No. 2912 at para. 54. Wrongful interference was described in D.C. Thomson & Co. Ltd. v Deakin, [1952] Ch. 646 (CA) at 702, cited in Potter at para. 55:

The tort is committed if a person without justification knowingly and intentionally interferes with a contract between two other persons. There must, therefore, be knowledge of the existence of contractual relations between others and the intentional commission, without justification, of some act which interferes with those contractual relations so as to bring about or procure or induce a breach resulting in damage.

60 The tort of unlawful interference with economic relations is similar. It has these elements:

- (1) the existence of a valid business relationship or business expectancy between the plaintiff and another party; (2) knowledge by the defendant of that business relationship or expectancy; (3) intentional interference which induces or causes a termination of the business relationship or expectancy; (4) the interference is by way of unlawful means; (5) the interference by the defendant must be the proximate cause of the termination of the business relationship or expectancy; and (6) there is a resultant loss to the plaintiff:

671122 Ontario Ltd. v Sagaz Industries Canada Inc. (1998), 40 OR (3d) 229; varied (2000), 46 OR (3d) 760, aff'd 2001 SCC 59, cited in Reid v British Columbia (Egg Marketing Board), 2007 BCSC 155 at para. 150.

61 In Reid, it was noted by H. Holmes J. that courts take a fairly broad view of the required element of "unlawful means" as an act that is not legally justified. She held that a regulatory body may act by unlawful means if it uses its powers for purposes incompatible with the purposes contemplated in its authorizing legislation: see para. 152.

62 The basis of the Agency defendants' submission is that the plaintiffs have not pleaded that they were acting by unlawful means. I do not interpret their pleadings that way. While awkwardly drafted, they do allege in paragraph 25 that the Agency defendants acted with "a primary purpose other than that of carrying the law into effect" (my emphasis). Paragraphs 27 to 29 refer to the conduct of these defendants (as described in the previous paragraphs) as constituting intentional interference with contractual and economic relations between Shanghai College and its students. All of these paragraphs, when considered together, set out the elements of these torts.

63 However, these causes of action suffer from the same problem as the others, as there are again mainly bare allegations and no material facts pleaded which support each element of these torts. The only material facts that can be discerned appear in paragraph 28, which alleges that the Agency defendants caused Shanghai College to close after they removed Shanghai College's "material and assets" from its business premises and after cancelling the registration and accreditation. This demonstrates, in my view, that the plaintiffs' complaints against the Agency defendants stem only from the actions they took and the decisions they made under the PCTI Act. The essential element of unlawful means is supported with only a bare allegation of "a primary purpose other than that of carrying the law into effect", which again, is speculation.

64 This is an insufficient pleading that discloses no reasonable claim and is certain to fail.

Conspiracy

65 The plaintiffs make a claim of conspiracy in paragraph 43 of the Notice of Civil Claim:

43. The Defendants, the CTCMA [the College of Traditional Chinese Medicine Practitioners and Acupuncturists of British Columbia], Mary S. Watterson, the PCTIA and Stephen Harvey (the "Conspirator Defendants") conspired with each other and with the intent to injure the Plaintiff, Shanghai, to change or amend the Bylaws of the PCTIA to enable the PCTIA to demand a refund to be paid by the Plaintiff, Shanghai, an amount of $51,200.00 to the Defendant, Stephen Harvey. The Defendant, the PCTIA, in fact amended its Bylaws to give themselves the authority to claim that the Plaintiff, Shanghai, refund the tuition fees of the Defendant, Stephen Harvey, in the amount of $51,200.00.

66 Paragraph 47 adds that the CTCMA "used the authority and power" of PCTIA to close down Shanghai College.

67 The tort of conspiracy requires three essential elements, all of which must be pleaded: (1) an agreement, including a joint plan or common intention by the defendant, to do the act which is the object of the conspiracy; (2) an overt act consequent on the agreement; and (3) resulting damage: Kuhn v American Credit Indemnity Co., [1992] B.C.J. No. 953 (SC). In Kuhn, the court added:

The defendants must intend to be a party to the combination. Mere knowledge of or approval of or acquiescence in the act is not sufficient to establish the existence of a common plan or design. The defendants must have intentionally participated in the act with a view to furtherance of the common design and purpose.

68 The pleadings do not contain all of the elements of a conspiracy. As against PCTIA, they allege only that it amended its bylaws to give itself authority to make the order to refund tuition fees. They say nothing about any intentional participation by PCTIA in an agreement or joint plan. This is insufficient on which to ground a claim in conspiracy and as pleaded it is certain to fail.

Charter violations

- 69 The plaintiffs allege causes of action arising from breaches of s. 6(2)(b) and s. 8 of the Charter.
- 70 Section 6(2)(b) addresses rights to move and gain livelihood:
Every citizen of Canada and every person who has the status of a permanent resident of Canada has the right ...
(b) to pursue the gaining of a livelihood in any province.
- 71 Section 8 provides that "[e]veryone has the right to be secure against unreasonable search or seizure".
- 72 The plaintiffs' refer to s. 6(2)(b) of the Charter in paras. 30 and 51 of the Notice of Civil Claim.
30. The Plaintiffs state that the Defendants ... the PCTIA and Jim Wright, are in breach of the principles of natural justice, motivated by malice, bad faith and wrongful interference with the economic and contractual relations the Plaintiffs had with students to pursue a livelihood as stated in Section 6(2)(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.
- ...
51. The Defendants ... the PCTIA ... further violated the Plaintiffs' rights protected under Section 6(2)(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.
- 73 They also refer to s. 6(2)(b) in the particulars of malice and misfeasance set out in para. 26(e):
(e) Pursuing the Plaintiff, Sky Willow, for alleged misconduct, which prosecution is clearly motivated by malice, bad faith and wrongful interference with respect to the Plaintiff, Sky Willow's, right to pursue a livelihood as stated in Section 6(2)(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.
- 74 The alleged breach of s. 8 of the Charter is found in para. 50:
50. The Plaintiffs state that the Trespass, Search and Seizure committed by the Defendants, the PCTIA, Jim Wright ... were unreasonable and violated Section 8 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.
- 75 The plaintiffs claim general damages "for wrongful interference with the Plaintiffs' constitutional right to earn a livelihood and unreasonable search and seizure".
- 76 The Agency defendants submit that s. 6 of the Charter does not override provincial regulatory legislation to provide a right to work in a particular profession or occupation in any province. They also submit that s. 8 of the Charter does not apply to purely economic interests.
- 77 The plaintiffs submit that the court should not consider these arguments because there is nothing in the Response to Civil Claim filed by these defendants that challenges these Charter actions.
- 78 I cannot accept the submission of the plaintiffs. While the Agency defendants' Response challenges many specifics of the claims, it states generally that the entire Notice of Civil Claim discloses no reasonable cause of action against them. In bringing this application, it is open to these defendants to challenge all aspects of the legal basis for the claims, particularly in the circumstances here, where the claim is confusing and it is difficult to discern precisely what causes of action are pleaded.
- 79 In Bajwa, Armstrong J. struck out a similar claim based on a breach of s. 6(2)(b) of the Charter because the plaintiff had not pleaded any facts to suggest that his interprovincial mobility had been restricted in any way. He referred to Law Society of Upper Canada v Skapinker, [1984] 1 SCR 357, which held that s. 6(2)(b) does not establish a separate and distinct right to work divorced from the mobility provisions in the Charter; the two rights in

s. 6(2)(a) and (b) both relate to movement into another province, either for the taking up of residence, or to work without establishing residence.

80 The plaintiffs' claim based on a breach of s. 6(2)(b) of the Charter is certain to fail, as these cases establish that this section does not give the plaintiffs an independent constitutional right to pursue a livelihood in British Columbia so as to override any applicable provincial legislation, such as the PCTI Act.

81 With respect to s. 8, the Agency defendants referred me to British Columbia Teachers' Federation v Vancouver School District No. 39, 2003 BCCA 100, where the majority held that purely economic interests, which include matters related to employment, are not interests that engage the provisions of the right to life, liberty and the security of the person under s. 7 of the Charter. They submit that the same principle applies to the more specific deprivations of this general right such as the right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure under s. 8. In Reference re Motor Vehicle Act (British Columbia) s. 94(2), [1985] 2 SCR 486, it was held that sections 8 to 14 of the Charter are illustrative of instances in which the right to life, liberty and security of the person would be violated in a manner that is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

82 The plaintiffs challenge this submission, noting that there was no risk of any penal sanction in the BC Teachers' Federation case. They submit that the underlying issue here is that PCTIA relied on s. 12 of the PCTI Act to authorize the search and seizure and that this was in breach of s. 8, as "it was all taken away without a hearing."

83 It is not necessary to decide this interesting issue. Whether or not the economic interests at stake in this case engage s. 8 of the Charter, this claim falls along with the other claims. Its essence is an allegation of a breach of the rules of natural justice and procedural fairness, which is properly the subject of judicial review proceedings. It relates primarily to paras. 24 and 25 of the Notice of Civil Claim, which contain only bare allegations of "malfeasance" by Mr. Wright in authorizing the search of Shanghai College and seizure of documents, and of the Agency defendants acting with "malice and without reasonable or probable cause or a primary purpose other than carrying the law into effect". A claim of a breach of s. 8 of the Charter is certain to fail because there are no material facts pleaded to support it and the complaint is one that ought to have been made in a judicial review.

Claims against Mr. Wright personally

84 Mr. Wright submits that to establish a cause of action against him personally, the plaintiffs must establish that he committed a tortious act which demonstrated an identity or interest separate from PCTIA. There is no factual basis to suggest that Mr. Wright was acting outside the scope or course of his employment and there is nothing in the pleading that alleges that he committed an act separate from those alleged against PCTIA, and on this basis Mr. Wright says that the claims against him in his personal capacity should be struck as disclosing no reasonable claim.

85 The plaintiffs submit that the claims of misfeasance and bad faith are appropriately made against Mr. Wright.

86 It is a well-accepted principle, expressed in cases such as ScotiaMcLeod Inc. v. Peoples Jewellers Ltd. (1995), 26 OR (3d) 481 (SCJ), that officers and employees of corporations are protected from personal liability unless it can be shown that their actions are themselves tortious or exhibit a separate identity or interest from that of the corporation so as to make the act or conduct complained of their own: see also Morriss v HMTQ, 2001 BCSC 281; Rafiki Properties Ltd. v Integrated Housing Development Ltd. (1999), 45 BLR (2d) 316 (BCSC); Greville v Convoy Supply Ltd.

87 I agree with Mr. Wright that the plaintiffs have pleaded nothing which suggests that he conducted himself in a manner that was separate from PCTIA or that he was acting outside the scope of his employment. The allegations against PCTIA and Mr. Wright are essentially the same.

88 However, in this case, s. 21 of the PCTI Act provides personal liability protection to Mr. Wright as an employee of PCTIA, but not where he acts in bad faith:

- (1) Subject to subsection (2), no legal proceeding for damages lies or may be commenced or maintained against a board member or an officer or employee of the agency because of anything done or omitted
 - (a) in the performance or intended performance of any duty under this Act, or
 - (b) in the exercise or intended exercise of any power under this Act.
- (2) Subsection (1) does not apply to a person referred to in that subsection in relation to anything done or omitted by that person in bad faith.

89 While the allegations of malice and "malfeasance" as against Mr. Wright would not be protected by s. 21, given my conclusions about these causes of action, the claims against Mr. Wright are certain to fail in any event.

Conclusion

90 For all of these reasons, it is my opinion that the pleadings do not disclose reasonable claims against either PCTIA or Mr. Wright in misfeasance of public office, abuse of process, intentional interference with contractual and economic relations, conspiracy, or violations of the Charter, and the plaintiffs' essential complaints against these defendants stem from alleged errors in procedure and substance within their role in a statutory, administrative process. Consequently, the plaintiffs' claim for damages cannot found a proper action sufficient to take these claims outside of the administrative law context. The essential claims constitute an impermissible collateral attack of the decisions of Mr. Wright as registrar and PCTIA, and must be struck as an abuse of process.

The applications of the Crown defendants and the Ministers (Rule 9-5(1))

91 The Ministers and the Crown defendants seek to strike out the portions of the Notice of Civil Claim as it relates to them, pursuant to Rule 9-5(1).

92 The Crown defendants say that the claim discloses no cause of action against them and should be struck on that basis.

93 The Ministers say that their only involvement in the claim arises as a result of the Ministers' Action. They submit that launching a fresh action is a collateral attack on that Action, which itself is an abuse of process, as the correct response to proceedings that are alleged to be an abuse of process is to apply to dismiss or stay those proceedings. The Ministers also say that the claim does not properly plead the elements of the tort of abuse of process.

94 The plaintiffs submit that launching this action against these defendants is not an abuse of process because they simply defended the Ministers' Action and opposed the application for an interlocutory injunction, and in this action they claim damages. They say that the claims should not be struck and that they have properly pleaded a cause of action against the Ministers and the Crown defendants.

95 I have considerable difficulty with the plaintiffs' submissions.

Crown defendants

96 I will deal with the Crown defendants first. There is nothing in the claim that asserts any cause of action against them. Mr. Fraser submitted that "presumably" they have been added because it might be alleged that the Province is liable as employer for the conduct of the Ministers but the need for the involvement of the Attorney General is unclear.

97 In my view, whatever can be presumed, the claim makes no allegations against the Crown defendants, discloses no cause of action against them, and must be struck under Rule 9-5(1)(a).

The Ministers - abuse of process (Rule 9-5(1)(b) and (d))

98 With respect to the Ministers, the claim makes the very same allegations as are contained in the plaintiffs'

Response to the Ministers' Action. Paragraphs 16, 20 and 21 of the claim make the same allegations of abuse of process as paras. 6, 7 and 8 of the Response. Paragraphs 22 to 25 and 27 to 31 of the claim make the same allegations of breaches of natural justice and due process as paragraphs 9 to 17 of the Response. Paragraph 50 of the claim makes the same allegation of a breach of s. 8 of the Charter as para. 18 of the Response. Paragraph 51 of the claim makes the same allegation of a breach of s. 6(2)(b) of the Charter as para. 19 of the Response. Paragraph 52 challenges s. 12 of the PCTIA Act and the same challenge appears in para. 20 of the Response.

99 Had a final decision been made in the Ministers' Action, the doctrine of issue estoppel would preclude this proceeding. As the Supreme Court of Canada held in Toronto (City) at para. 23, issue estoppel, which precludes the re-litigation of issues previously decided in another proceeding, has three preconditions: (1) the issue must be the same as the one decided in the prior decision; (2) the prior judicial decision must have been final; and (3) the parties to both proceedings must be the same (or their privies).

100 However, on February 7, 2011, an interlocutory injunction was granted in the Ministers' Action on the same terms as those sought for a final order. This order was granted after a hearing where both sides appeared and made submissions. No steps have been taken by either side since this order was made. The Ministers submit that it would be absurd to allow injunction proceedings to continue on their merits, accepting an interlocutory injunction made in those proceedings, while at the same time in another action to claim damages or injunctive relief in respect of the injunction proceedings. This, they say, is an abuse of process.

101 I agree with the Ministers. In my opinion, it is unfair and contrary to the interests of justice to permit a party to make the same claims in two extant proceedings, particularly where there is a binding interlocutory order in place in the first proceeding that, at least on a prima facie basis, is completely inconsistent with these claims, and where the claims in the second proceeding arise from the existence of the first one. The addition of a claim for damages in this action does not change the fact that the claims stem from the Ministers' Action itself and are based on the very same allegations that have been put in issue in the Ministers' Action.

102 In this regard, I refer to the principles expressed in Toronto (City) at paras. 35 and 37:

[35] Judges have an inherent and residual discretion to prevent an abuse of the court's process. This concept of abuse of process was described at common law as proceedings "unfair to the point that they are contrary to the interest of justice" (R. v. Power, [1994] 1 S.C.R. 601, at p. 616), and as "oppressive treatment" (R. v. Conway, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1659, at p. 1667). McLachlin J. (as she then was) expressed it this way in R. v. Scott, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 979, at p. 1007:

. . . abuse of process may be established where: (1) the proceedings are oppressive or vexatious; and, (2) violate the fundamental principles of justice underlying the community's sense of fair play and decency ... But the doctrine evokes as well the public interest in a fair and just trial process and the proper administration of justice.

[37] ... the doctrine of abuse of process engages "the inherent power of the court to prevent the misuse of its procedure, in a way that would . . . bring the administration of justice into disrepute" ... Canadian courts have applied the doctrine of abuse of process to preclude relitigation in circumstances where the strict requirements of issue estoppel (typically the privity/mutuality requirements) are not met, but where allowing the litigation to proceed would nonetheless violate such principles as judicial economy, consistency, finality and the integrity of the administration of justice ...

103 It is my view that to allow the claims against the Ministers to proceed in the rather unique circumstances here would violate the principles of judicial economy, consistency and the integrity of the judicial process. I consider the proceedings against the Ministers in this action to be vexatious and as such, an abuse of process, justifying an order to strike the pleadings under Rule 9-5(1)(b) and (d).

The Ministers - no reasonable claim (Rule 9-5(1)(a)) 104 The Ministers also submit that the claims against them should be struck as disclosing no reasonable claim, under Rule 9-5(1)(a).

The tort of abuse of process

105 The plaintiffs' primary claim against the Ministers is for the tort of abuse of process. The allegations are found at paragraphs 16 to 21 of the Notice of Civil Claim. I will reproduce the salient portions of those paragraphs:

16. The [Ministers' Action] was commenced by the Defendants [the Ministers] and continued by the said Defendants primarily for a collateral or improper purpose that was unrelated to the ostensible purpose of the [Ministers' Action]. Particulars of the Defendants' ... collateral or improper purpose are as follows:
 - (a) To ruin the Plaintiffs financially;
 - (b) To harass, victimize and traumatize the Plaintiffs;
 - (c) To eliminate the Plaintiffs as competition for the Defendants Mary S. Watterson and the CTCMA .
17. The Defendants ... control the training and issuing of any Certificate indicating or implying that the holder has been awarded a degree in Traditional Chinese Medicine through the Defendants, the CTCMA and the PCTIA, through the Health Professions Act and the Private Career Training Institutions Act.
18. The Plaintiffs state that the injunctive relief sought against the Plaintiff [Council of Natural Medicine] is res judicata in that the Plaintiff in the Federal Court case, the CTCMA, requested the following relief: [a permanent injunction restraining the use of various titles associated with the practice of acupuncture and traditional Chinese medicine, and other orders] ...
19. The Defendants ... by commencing the [Ministers' Action] and engaging in the conduct described in this Notice of Civil Claim caused the Plaintiff, [Council of Natural Medicine], actual damage and thereby committed the tort of abuse of process. The damage caused in this regard are inter alia as follows:
 - (a) Financial hardship;
 - (b) Anxiety;
 - (c) Frustration, confusion and insecurity;
 - (d) Despondency; and
 - (e) Emotional trauma.
20. The Plaintiffs state that the Defendants, the CTCMA and [the Ministers] conduct to institute the [Ministers' Action] amounts to an abuse of process which amounts to a collateral and improper process other than to carry the law into effect.
21. The Plaintiffs further state that the Defendants, the CTCMA, and [the Ministers], committed a tortious act of abuse of process which amounts to a willful misuse or perversion of the court's process for a purpose extraneous or ulterior to that which the process was designed to serve.

106 The Ministers submit that the plaintiffs have not pleaded sufficient material facts to support the elements of the tort of abuse of process. They say that the damages alleged may be the result of the proper enforcement of legislation, and only where such enforcement is undertaken without any genuine belief in the merits of the claim will a case of abuse of process be made out. In the absence of a pleading to this effect, the claim has no reasonable prospect of success.

107 I have already reviewed the elements of this tort. There must be a wilful misuse or perversion of a court process for an extraneous or improper purpose, and some damage resulting. The plaintiffs have pleaded these essential elements but again, provide no material facts to support their bare allegations.

108 The closest they come is in para. 18, where they allege that the injunctive relief sought against the plaintiff, Council of Natural Medicine, is res judicata because of Federal Court proceedings initiated by the defendant, College of Traditional Chinese Medicine Practitioners and Acupuncturists of British Columbia. This allegation is certain to fail as against the Ministers, as the conditions for issue estoppel (a branch of res judicata) requires that the parties to both proceedings must be the same. The Ministers were not parties to the Federal Court proceedings.

109 It is of some significance, in my view, that the Ministers named in this proceeding are no longer in those positions. This is because the Ministers' Action was commenced under the Degree Authorization Act and the Health Professions Act at a time when these individuals were the Ministers. Section 8 of the Degree Authorization Act requires an application by the minister to seek injunctive relief. The same is not required under the Health Professions Act (where any person may make such an application), but I am advised by counsel that the same practice is employed for consistency. Accordingly, the Ministers are nominal defendants only. None of this is disputed by the plaintiffs, who are content to amend the pleadings to include the individuals who currently hold the Ministers' positions.

110 It is difficult to conceive how allegations of abuse of process could succeed against nominal defendants in these circumstances, as the tort requires wilful acts and wilful acts require knowledge and intention.

111 Accordingly, I am of the view that the plaintiffs' claim against the Ministers for abuse of process has no reasonable chance of success and should also be struck under Rule 9-5(1)(a).

Charter violations

112 The plaintiffs also make the same claims against the Ministers as they do against PCTIA and Mr. Wright in respect of breaches of natural justice and violations of s. 6(2)(b) and s. 8 of the Charter. These are found in paragraphs 30, 50 and 51:

30. The Plaintiffs state that the Defendants [the Ministers], the PCTIA and Jim Wright, are in breach of the principles of natural justice, motivated by malice, bad faith and wrongful interference with the economic and contractual relations the Plaintiffs had with students to pursue a livelihood as stated in Section 6(2)(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

50. The Plaintiffs state that the Trespass, Search and Seizure committed by the Defendants, the PCTIA, Jim Wright, and [the Ministers] were unreasonable and violated Section 8 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

51. The Defendants, the CTCMA, the PCTIA, and [the Ministers], further violated the Plaintiffs' rights protected under Section 6(2)(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

113 These claims should be struck as disclosing no reasonable claim for the same reasons I have expressed in relation to the Agency defendants.

Vicarious liability

114 There is one other claim against the Ministers in paragraph 31 of the Notice of Civil Claim, which asserts that they are vicariously liable for the conduct of PCTIA and Mr. Wright:

31. The Defendants, the PCTIA and Jim Wright, at all material times acted on instructions and/or under the authority or auspices of the Defendants [the Ministers], and the said Defendants [the Ministers] are as such vicariously liable for the conduct of the Defendants, the PCTIA and Jim Wright.

115 This claim cannot possibly succeed. It is nothing more than speculation to allege that an administrative agency, established by legislation, and its registrar, acted on instructions from Ministers who are nominal defendants, nor is there any basis to allege vicarious liability in such circumstances.

Conclusion

116 For these reasons, I have concluded that the plaintiffs' claims against the Crown defendants must be struck as disclosing no reasonable claim under Rule 9-5(1)(a) and the claims against the Ministers must be struck as both an abuse of process under Rule 9-5(1)(b) and (d) and as disclosing no reasonable claim under Rule 9-5(1)(a).

117 Given these conclusions, it is not necessary to address the Ministers' alternative application for summary judgment under Rule 9-6 or their further alternative application that they cease to be defendants.

Concluding remarks

118 I do not consider it appropriate to grant leave to the plaintiffs to amend their pleadings as they pertain to any of these defendants, due to the nature of the issues that have been raised in these applications and the breadth of the omissions of material facts. It became apparent after two days of submissions that the plaintiffs' primary issues are with the other defendants, particularly the College of Traditional Chinese Medicine Practitioners and Acupuncturists of British Columbia, and they pertain to a perception of unequal treatment as between Shanghai College and another College that has remained in operation.

119 The applicants will have their costs of the applications at the usual scale.

Case Summary

Civil procedure — Disposition without trial — Dismissal of action — Action unfounded in law — Frivolous, vexatious or abuse of process — Appeal by Youngs from dismissal of action against lawyer acting for opponents in other litigation dismissed — Pleadings did not disclose any new evidence other than that ruled on in previous actions — Action was merely attempt to re-litigate termination of Youngs' tenancy.

Legal profession — Barristers and solicitors — Liability — Appeal by Youngs from dismissal of action against lawyer acting for opponents in other litigation dismissed — Lawyer acting for landlord and others in proceedings involving Youngs, tenants, did not have duty of care to Youngs.

Professional responsibility — Professional duties — Duties of care and negligence — Legal profession — Barristers and solicitors — Liability — Appeal by Youngs from dismissal of action against lawyer acting for opponents in other litigation dismissed — Lawyer acting for landlord and others in proceedings involving Youngs, tenants, did not have duty of care to Youngs.

Professions — Legal — Lawyers — Legal profession — Barristers and solicitors — Liability — Appeal by Youngs from dismissal of action against lawyer acting for opponents in other litigation dismissed — Lawyer acting for landlord and others in proceedings involving Youngs, tenants, did not have duty of care to Youngs.

Appeal by the Youngs from an order dismissing their action against Borzoni, a solicitor who had represented their opponents in related proceedings, on grounds that the Youngs' statement of claim disclosed no cause of action, that the action was unnecessary, frivolous, and vexatious, and that the action was an abuse of the court's process. The Youngs entered into a tenancy agreement with Capital Region to rent an apartment, and moved in on August 31, 2001. Their neighbours complained about an odour of marijuana emanating from the Youngs' apartment. Mr. Young was legally entitled to smoke marijuana because of a medical condition. The Youngs complained that their neighbours, Capital Region, and the police were harassing them. The Youngs were served with a notice terminating their tenancy on July 10, 2002, effective August 31, 2002. The Youngs applied for arbitration by the Residential Tenancy Board. Borzoni represented Capital Region at the hearing before Arbitrator Gilbert. Gilbert held Capital Region established sufficient cause for ending the Youngs' tenancy. The Youngs applied for review of Gilbert's decision. Capital Region applied for an order of possession, which was adjourned pending the review. The review was denied by Arbitrator Katz on October 4, 2002. The Youngs commenced a court action seeking judicial review of the decisions by Gilbert and Katz. Borzoni was retained to represent Capital Region in the review. The Youngs commenced another action, naming Capital Region and the police as respondents, alleging breaches of their rights to grow and use marijuana. The actions were ordered heard together. Borzoni represented the police as well as Capital Region in the resulting action, which was dismissed June 13, 2003. In her reasons, the judge noted there was no evidence to support the Youngs' allegations of wrongdoing on the part of Borzoni. The Youngs unsuccessfully appealed from the dismissal of their Charter proceeding. Following a hearing, Capital Region was granted an order of possession for the Youngs' apartment, effective August 31, 2003. The Youngs unsuccessfully applied for an order prohibiting Capital Region from proceeding with possession. Their appeal from this decision was dismissed, and they consented to vacate the apartment by October 31, 2003. The Youngs then commenced a defamation action naming several former tenants from their apartment building who had testified in the hearing before Gilbert. They also commenced an action against Borzoni, claiming he owed them a duty of care as non-client third persons. The Youngs claimed Borzoni influenced their neighbours to intimidate them, who then engaged in a pattern of harassment under Borzoni's advice. The Youngs also alleged Borzoni wrote and commissioned affidavits he knew were false, made statements to tribunals and courts that were false, and advised Capital Region and the police to falsify documents placed before the court. They sought damages of $1 million for conduct in bad faith and with malice, $70,000 for intentional infliction of mental suffering, and $40,000 for costs. Mr. Young wrote to Borzoni, informing him the Youngs intended to have him removed as counsel of record for Capital Region and the police due to a conflict of interest. Borzoni replied he would be applying to have the Youngs' action against him dismissed. Borzoni's motion was heard first, with the Youngs' consent. The result was a decision dismissing the Youngs' action against Borzoni. The judge concluded the Youngs' action was merely an attempt to re-litigate the eviction issue, rendering the action unnecessary, scandalous, vexatious, and frivolous. He did not find the facts as alleged supported the Youngs' contention Borzoni owed them a duty of care. He found the Youngs' statement of claim did not disclose any action by Borzoni that would give rise to liability for intentionally inflicting nervous shock on the Youngs.

HELD: Appeal dismissed.

The direct allegations against Borzoni regarding false statements and affidavits were dismissed, as they had already been dealt with by the judge. As there was no way the Youngs could obtain evidence showing Borzoni had influenced his clients to place false documents before the court, these allegations were dismissed as pure speculation. The pleaded facts did not support the Youngs' position that they sustained emotional injuries caused by the alleged actions of Borzoni, since no evidence of actual psychiatric damage was provided. No material facts were pleaded which could establish there was a relationship of sufficient proximity between Borzoni and the Youngs to give rise to a duty of care. As the Youngs' action against Borzoni contained no new relevant evidence or evidence not considered in previous proceedings, it was correctly found to be unnecessary, scandalous, frivolous, and vexatious. It was also fitting for the judge to find the action was an abuse of process, where it was clearly commenced for the purpose of having Borzoni removed as counsel in the related proceeding.

Counsel

Eric Young: In person for the Appellants

P.C. Freeman, Q.C.: Counsel for the Respondents

THACKRAY J.A.

1 Marlene Young and Eric Young appeal the order entered upon the judgment of Mr. Justice Bouck dismissing the action against Anthony Borzoni, a solicitor who represented the other named defendants in related proceedings, on the grounds that the statement of claim alleged no cause of action, that the action was unnecessary, frivolous, vexatious, and that the action was an abuse of the court's process. The judgment was delivered orally (10 March 2005, Victoria Registry No. 04-2367).

Background

2 The appellants entered into a tenancy agreement with the Capital Region Housing Corporation for the rental of apartment #106, Beechwood Park, 3936 Gordon Head Road, Victoria, British Columbia. They moved into the suite on or about 31 August 2001. The Corporation received complaints from other tenants regarding the odour of marijuana smoke emanating from the appellants' apartment. Mr. Young can legally smoke marijuana due to a medical condition from which he suffers.

3 The appellants also laid complaints. They alleged harassment and misconduct by their neighbours, the Corporation and the Saanich Police Department. On 10 July 2002 the appellants were served with a notice terminating the tenancy effective 31 August 2002. On 16 July 2002 the appellants filed an application for arbitration by the Residential Tenancy Board. The respondent, Mr. Borzoni, represented the Corporation at the hearing before Arbitrator Gilbert. In extensive reasons dated 29 August 2002 Mr. Gilbert held that the Corporation had established sufficient cause for ending the tenancy and dismissed the appellants' application to set aside the notice terminating the tenancy.

4 The appellants filed an application for a review of the arbitrator's decision with the Board. On 4 September 2002 the Corporation applied to the Residential Tenancy Branch for an order of possession, which was adjourned pending the Board's review decision. In written reasons dated 4 October 2002 the application for review was denied by Arbitrator Katz.

5 On 7 October 2002 the appellants commenced a court action seeking a judicial review of the decisions of Arbitrators Gilbert and Katz: Young v. Capital Region Housing Corporation, Action No. 02-4528. Mr. Borzoni was retained to represent the Corporation. On 15 November 2002 the appellants commenced Action No. 02-5145, naming The Capital Regional District and The Saanich Police Department as respondents. It alleged Charter breaches based on interference with the rights of the petitioners to grow and use marijuana. Madam Justice Dorgan ordered that the two actions be heard together commencing on 18 February 2003. Mr. Borzoni was retained to represent both respondents. Mr. Justice Macaulay dismissed the proceedings brought under both actions in reasons dated 13 June 2003, [2003] B.C.J. No. 1464.

6 Mr. Justice Macaulay said as follows regarding Mr. Borzoni:

[114] ... During his submission Mr. Young referred several times to his concern that Mr. Borzoni, who acted as counsel for all the respondents, performed some improper function related to this allegation. There was simply no evidence to support any allegation of wrongdoing on the part of counsel.

7 Mr. Justice Macaulay held at paragraph 80 that the appellants "completely failed to offer any evidentiary foundation capable of supporting the allegations against the police and it is unnecessary for me to analyze them." He concluded as follows:

[131] As none of the alleged Charter breaches were made out, the petition filed under Action 02/5145 is dismissed as against both the [Saanich Police Department] and [The Capital Region District].

8 On 10 July 2003 the appellants filed a Notice of Appeal in the Charter proceeding. The appeal was heard in April 2004. In reasons for judgment, cited as [2004] B.C.J. No. 779, 2004 BCCA 224, the appeal was dismissed. The Supreme Court of Canada dismissed an application for leave to appeal: [2004] S.C.C.A. No. 255.

9 On 15 July 2003 the Corporation applied to the Residential Tenancy Branch for an order of possession. A hearing took place in June and July 2003, before Arbitrator Pyne. He issued reasons in which he granted an order of possession effective 31 August 2003. On 21 July 2003 the appellants filed a petition for judicial review of Mr. Pyne's order: Action No. 03-3026.

10 On 19 August 2003 the appellants applied for an order prohibiting the Corporation from proceeding with possession. In oral reasons for judgment Mr. Justice Bauman dismissed the application. On 2 September 2003 the Corporation obtained a writ of possession: Action No. 03-3574. On 5 September 2003 the appellants filed a Notice of Appeal from the decision granting the writ of possession and for a stay of the order for possession. This was dismissed on 12 September 2003. The appellants consented to vacate the premises by 31 October 2003.

11 The appellants commenced defamation Action No. 04-0304 in the Supreme Court on 23 January 2004. That action named several former tenants in the Beechwood complex, some of whom had testified before Arbitrator Gilbert.

12 On 28 May 2004 the appellants commenced this action alleging that Mr. Borzoni owed a duty to care to the plaintiffs as "non-client third persons." The specifics included allegations that Mr. Borzoni influenced neighbours to intimidate the plaintiffs and that other defendants, "with and/or under advice of Defendant Mr. Borzoni" engaged in a pattern of harassment. The relief claimed against Mr. Borzoni is for aggravated and punitive damages in the amount of $1 million for acting with malice and in bad faith"; and damages in the amount of $70,000 for intentional infliction of mental suffering causing "pain and suffering", "emotional stress and mental anxiety", and "loss of enjoyment of life"; and $40,000 for "costs to trial."

13 On 13 October 2004 Mr. Young wrote to Mr. Borzoni and asked if he was "continuing to act as Counsel in [Action No. 04-0304] in light of the conflict of interest between you and your clients." On 8 November 2004 he told Mr. Borzoni that "given the nature of the scandalous allegations" made against him in Action No. 04-2366 "which amount to breaches of your professional ethics and to violations of the law, it is inappropriate for you to act as Counsel in these matters." He added that he would be seeking to have Mr. Borzoni "removed as Solicitor of Record." In a subsequent letter of the same date Mr. Young purported to delete the word "scandalous."

14 On 4 November 2004 counsel for Mr. Borzoni informed Mr. Young that she would be applying for an order dismissing the action against her client. On 5 November 2004 Mr. Young served a notice of motion to have Mr. Borzoni removed as solicitor of record in Action No. 04-0304. Agreement was reached that Mr. Young's motion would await the hearing of Mr. Borzoni's motion. Mr. Borzoni's motion was heard by Mr. Justice Bouck and it is his decision that is appealed herein.

Reasons for Judgment of Mr. Justice Bouck

15 Mr. Justice Bouck noted that Mr. Borzoni was applying for dismissal of the action as against him pursuant to Rule 19(24)(a), (b) and (d) of the Rules of the Supreme Court of British Columbia. They provide as follows:

19(24) At any stage of a proceeding the court may order to be struck out or amended the whole or any part of an endorsement, pleading, petition or other document on the ground that

- (a) it discloses no reasonable claim ... ,
- (b) it is unnecessary, scandalous, frivolous, or vexatious,
- (c) it is otherwise an abuse of the process of the court, and the court may grant judgment or order the proceedings to be stayed or dismissed and may order the costs of the application to be paid as special costs.

16 Mr. Justice Bouck said Mr. Young was a tenant on the premises "during a period of about November 2001 to April 2002" and he noted they had been evicted, resulting in litigation. The full balance of his reasons are as follows:

[5] The plaintiffs allege Mr. Borzoni breached his professional ethics while acting for the defendants in the earlier proceedings. They also say Mr. Borzoni owed them a duty of care, his conduct was malicious, it caused them nervous shock, and severe psychological harm. They claim compensatory, aggravated, and punitive damages of $1,000,000 for Mr. Borzoni's alleged bad faith conduct while acting for the other defendants in this case.

[6] I agree with the written argument advanced by counsel for Mr. Borzoni presented to me at the hearing. The plaintiffs seek to try the eviction issue all over again. While acting for the defendants in the other proceedings, the alleged facts do not support the Youngs' contention that he owed the Youngs a duty of care. A lawyer owes an ethical duty to the court to be candid and fair, but the only party to whom a lawyer owes an actionable duty is to his or her client, Lawrence v. Sandilands, [2003] B.C.J. No. 343 (B.C.S.C.), at paragraph 79, Wedge J..

[7] If lawyers owed a duty of care to their opponents' clients then, before taking any steps in an action, lawyers on both sides would have to consult with the other lawyers' clients. They would have to ensure they would not breach their duty of care to those adversarial parties. If the effect of the proposed proceeding was adverse to those opponents, the action could not proceed, even though it was a necessary procedure to protect their own clients' interests. Our adversarial system of justice could not function in these circumstances.

[8] The Youngs' statement of claim fails to plead the necessary elements of the tort of intentional infliction of nervous shock or that Mr. Borzoni acted without legal justification. The statement of claim does not establish any overt act of a flagrant and extreme nature done by Mr. Borzoni without legal justification that would give rise to his liability for intentionally inflicting nervous shock, Linden and Klar, Remedies in Tort, at pages 10-7 and 10-11.

[9] A statement of claim can be vexatious or abusive when the grounds raised tend to be rolled forward into subsequent actions repeated and supplemented with actions brought against the lawyers who have acted against the litigants in earlier proceedings.

[10] Many of the facts and issues underlying the Youngs' claim against Mr. Borzoni were previously determined in other proceedings arising out of the same set of facts. That makes the claim against Mr. Borzoni unnecessary, scandalous, vexatious, and frivolous as well as an abuse of the court's process, Lawrence v. Sandilands, supra, at paragraphs 95 and 96.

[11] One must have deep sympathy for Mr. Young and his fight to ward off the devastating effects of multiple sclerosis. On the other hand, he seems to believe he is a person who has all the rights. In his eyes, everyone else only has responsibilities and those responsibilities are to him. Happily, most other Canadians do not possess similar selfish qualities.

[12] The plaintiffs have become professional litigants. They are using the court system as a play thing to harass others they do not like. Instead of getting on with their lives, they choose to alienate others who might choose to help them.

Judgment

[13] For these reasons, I grant Mr. Borzoni's application to dismiss the plaintiffs' claim against him. Costs follow the event.

Analysis

17 I will analyze this case using, in altered wording, the errors that are alleged by the appellants.

1. No reasonable cause of action against Mr. Borzoni is disclosed in the statement of claim 18 Rule 19(24)(a) provides that the court may strike out the whole or any part of a pleading on the ground that it discloses no reasonable claim and may order the proceedings to be dismissed. The appellants argue that Bouck J. erred when he dismissed their claims in tort against Mr. Borzoni.

19 The Supreme Court of Canada set out in Odhavji Estate v. Woodhouse, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 263 the test for striking out a statement of claim on the basis that it disclosed no reasonable claim:

[14] ... a court may strike out a statement of claim that discloses no reasonable cause of action. The rules with respect to striking out a statement of claim are much the same in other provinces. In British Columbia, for example, Rule 19(24)(a) of the Rules of Court, B.C. Reg. 221/90, states that a court may strike out a pleading on the ground that it discloses no reasonable claim.

... assuming that the facts as stated in the statement of claim can be proved, is it "plain and obvious" that the plaintiff's statement of claim discloses no reasonable cause of action? As in England, if there is a chance that the plaintiff might succeed, then the plaintiff should not be "driven from the judgment seat". Neither the length and complexity of the issues, the novelty of the cause of action, nor the potential for the defendant to present a strong defence should prevent the plaintiff from proceeding with his or her case. Only if the action is certain to fail because it contains a radical defect ... should the relevant portions of a plaintiff's statement of claim be struck out

The test is a stringent one. The facts are to be taken as pleaded. When so taken, the question that must then be determined is whether ... it is "plain and obvious" that the action must fail. It is only if the statement of claim is certain to fail because it contains a "radical defect" that the plaintiff should be driven from the judgment.

20 The Rules of the Supreme Court of British Columbia provide as follows:

19(1) A pleading should be as brief as the nature of the case will permit and must contain a statement in summary form of the material facts on which the party relies, but not the evidence by which the facts are to be proved.

19(9.1) Conclusions of law may be pleaded only if the material facts supporting them are pleaded.

"Material fact" is defined in Delaney & Friends Cartoon Productions Ltd. v. Radical Entertainment Inc., [2005] B.C.J. No. 573, 2005 BCSC 371 at paragraph 9 as, "one that is essential in order to formulate a complete cause of action. If a material fact is omitted, a cause of action is not effectively pleaded."

21 Those portions of the statement of claim that directly involve Mr. Borzoni are as follows:

1. This claim arises out of the actions of the Defendants and their parts in the events which took place, from July 2001 to April 2004, surrounding the Plaintiffs residency in apartment #106 at Beechwood Park, 3936 Gordon Head Road, Victoria, B.C.
18. Defendant Anthony R. Borzoni, partner at Randall & Company and now working at Jones Emery Hargreaves Swan, Victoria, B.C. was counsel for the Defendants CRD, CRHC, and SPD, in this matter, at the material times.
34. Defendant Mr. Borzoni owes a duty to care to the Plaintiffs as non-client third persons.
40. The Defendants were intolerant of Plaintiff Mr. Young's consumption and the Plaintiffs cultivating of cannabis for medicinal purpose and intended, in bad faith, to eradicate what they perceived to be a problem in a social housing complex managed by Defendant CRHC.

41. The Defendants knew that there was no secondhand smoke in the hallway from Plaintiff Mr. Young's medicinal consumption of cannabis.
45. The Defendants received many written and oral complaints from the Plaintiffs about the harassment the Plaintiffs were suffering at the hands of some of their neighbours while living at Beechwood Park, the conduct of the officers of Defendant SPD, and employees and/or officers of the CRD and/or CRHC.
46. The Defendants failed to stop, allowed, influenced, encouraged, coordinated, and/or supported the efforts of some of the Plaintiffs' neighbours to intimidate and disrupt the life of the Plaintiffs, over a period of more than 2 years with the intention to drive the Plaintiffs out of their subsidized home, including but not limited to, attempts to collide with the Plaintiffs' moving car, vandalism to the Plaintiffs' property, uttering threats, trespassing, and watching of the Plaintiffs and their home.
47. Employees and/or officers of Defendants CRD and/or CRHC, including but not limited to, Defendants Ms. Jaarsma, Ms. Joy, and Mr. Weeks, with and /or under advice of Defendant Mr. Borzoni, engaged in a pattern of harassment, including but not limited to, malicious written correspondence, attempts to inspect, trespassing, taking of pictures, and watching of the Plaintiffs and their home.
59. Defendants Mr. Borzoni, CRD and CRHC have not respected the Plaintiffs' right to appeal by taking legal steps without allowing for the Plaintiffs to follow the legal process.
63. The Defendants CRD, CRHC, and SPD, with and/or under advice of Defendant Mr. Borzoni, fabricated and falsified documents, including but not limited to, documents destined for RTB and for the Supreme Court of British Columbia.
64. Defendant Mr. Borzoni wrote and commissioned affidavits, in connection to litigation related to the Plaintiffs' tenancy at Beechwood Park, knowing them to be false and/or reckless to their veracity.
65. Defendant Mr. Borzoni knowingly and/or reckless to their veracity made false statements in regards to the Plaintiffs in his opening statements at the RTB, in the Supreme Court of British Columbia, and in the Court of Appeal for British Columbia.
67. Defendant Mr. Borzoni, the Officers of Defendant SPD, including but not limited to, Defendant Chief Constable Egan and the Defendant Constables, and employees and/or officers of Defendants CRD and/or CRHC, including but not limited to, Defendants Ms. Jaarsma, Ms. Joy, and Mr. Weeks, through their malicious conduct, as set out above, intended to inflict nervous shock.
83. Defendant Borzoni was negligent in his duty to care owed to the Plaintiffs as non-client third persons when he made false statements, ignored and/or assisted his clients in fabricating documents and harassing the Plaintiffs, as set out above.
84. As a consequence of the Defendants' conduct, as set out above, the Plaintiffs have lost trust in government, police forces, landlords, and communities.
85. As a result of the Defendants' conduct, as set out above, the Plaintiffs lost their sense of security, their peace and quiet enjoyment of their home, including their patio, while living at Beechwood Park and eventually lost their affordable home with all the ensuing economic and quality of life benefits.
87. The Defendants' conduct, as set out above, has caused severe emotional stress and mental anguish, and extreme despair.

Relief

The Plaintiffs claim as follows:

- (c) compensatory damages against all Defendants for intent to inflict nervous shock causing severe psychological harm:

$10,000 for pain and suffering;

$40,000 for legal costs to trial;

$20,000 for emotional stress and mental anxiety;

$40,000 for loss of enjoyment of life; and general damages;

(g) aggravated and punitive damages against Defendant Mr. Borzoni for acting with malice and in bad faith:

$1,000,000 for negligence of duty to care to non-client third persons.

(o) costs

22 The appellants submit that these pleadings disclose the material facts essential in order to formulate two complete causes of action in tort against Mr. Borzoni: a) intentional infliction of nervous shock and b) breach of duty of care.

a) Intentional infliction of nervous shock/mental suffering

23 In Frame v. Smith, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 99 at 127, Wilson J. (dissenting) wrote:

... The requirements of this cause of action [the tort of intentional infliction of mental suffering] were set out in the case of Wilkinson v. Downton, [1897] 2 Q.B.D. 57. In that case the defendant as a "practical joke" told the plaintiff that her husband had been involved in an accident and had broken his legs. The plaintiff believed the defendant and as a result suffered nervous shock and a number of physical consequences. In granting recovery, Wright J. stated (at p. 59):

One question is whether the defendant's act was so plainly calculated to produce some effect of the kind which was produced that an intention to produce it ought to be imputed to the defendant, regard being had to the fact that the effect was produced on a person proved to be in an ordinary state of health and mind. I think that it was. It is difficult to imagine that such a statement, made suddenly and with apparent seriousness, could fail to produce grave effects under the circumstances upon any but an exceptionally indifferent person, and therefore an intention to produce such an effect must be imputed, and it is no answer in law to say that more harm was done than was anticipated, for that is commonly the case with all wrongs. The other question is whether the effect was, to use the ordinary phrase, too remote to be in law regarded as a consequence for which the defendant is answerable.

24 In Prinzo v. Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care (2002), 60 O.R. (3d) 474 (C.A.), Weiler J.A. wrote:

[48] A review of the case-law and the commentators confirms the existence of the tort of the intentional infliction of mental suffering, the elements of which may be summarized as: (1) flagrant or outrageous conduct; (2) calculated to produce harm; and (3) resulting in a visible and provable illness.

The appellants agree with this and with Mr. Justice Bouck's finding that a pleading of intentional infliction of nervous shock must include an allegation of "an overt act of a flagrant and extreme nature done by Mr. Borzoni without legal justification."

25 The appellants assert that the statement of claim contains the required material facts and that they must be taken to be true and are thus beyond scrutiny. The authority usually cited in support of this proposition is Hunt v. Carey Canada Inc., [1990] 2 S.C.R. 959 at 978 where Madam Justice Wilson referred to Minnes v. Minnes (1962), 39 W.W.R. 112 (B.C.C.A.) wherein Norris J.A. said at page 116 that what was required of the plaintiff on a motion to strike out a claim was to "show that on the statement of claim, accepting the allegations therein made as true, there was disclosed ... a proper case to be tried." Wilson J. concluded at page 991 that "on a motion to strike we are required to assume that the facts as pleaded are true."

26 A consideration of that premise was discussed in Operation Dismantle Inc. v. The Queen, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 441, often referred to as the "Cruise Missile" case. Dickson J. at page 447, said the causal link between the defendant and the alleged violation of the appellants' rights was "simply too uncertain, speculative and hypothetical to sustain a cause of action." At page 449 he cited Attorney General of Canada v. Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, [1980] 2 S.C.R. 735 at 740, where Estey J. said:

As I have said, all the facts pleaded in the statement of claim must be deemed to have been proven. On a motion such as this a court should, of course, dismiss the action or strike out any claim made by the plaintiff only in plain and obvious cases and where the court is satisfied that "the case is beyond doubt": Ross v. Scottish Union and National Insurance Co. (1920), 47 O.L.R. 308 (App. Div.).

However, Dickson J. went on to say at page 455:

27. We are not, in my opinion, required by the principle enunciated in Inuit Tapirisat, supra, to take as true the appellants' allegations concerning the possible consequences of the testing of the cruise missile. The rule that the material facts in a statement of claim must be taken as true for the purpose of determining whether it discloses a reasonable cause of action does not require that allegations based on assumptions and speculations be taken as true. The very nature of such an allegation is that it cannot be proven to be true by the adduction of evidence. It would, therefore be improper to accept that such an allegation is true. No violence is done to the rule where allegations, incapable of proof, are not taken as proven.

27 In Madam Justice Wilson's concurring minority reasons, she agreed that the statement of claim should be struck out. However, she wrote at pages 477 to 479 that several of the allegations in the statement of claim were "statements of intangible fact" inviting inferences and anticipating probable consequences, and that those allegations might "be susceptible to proof by inference from real facts or by expert testimony or through the application of common sense principles'." She added:

We may entertain serious doubts that the plaintiffs will be able to prove them by any of these means. It is not, however, the function of the Court at this stage to prejudge that question. I agree with Cattnach J. that the statement of claim contains sufficient allegations to raise a justiciable issue.

28 In Rogers v. Bank of Montreal (1985), 64 B.C.L.R. 63 (S.C.) the defendants applied to strike out the writ and statement of claim as disclosing no cause of action. Mr. Justice McKenzie said, at page 101:

I cannot accept the allegations in the statement of claim "as true" in the sense of there being any actions of the defendants which were truly directed against the target separate from Abacus. It is true that the statement of claim says the allegations have a separate target but the reality is that they do not. I see only language, not reality. It is the same story with a different title.

29 On appeal, (1986), 9 B.C.L.R. (2d) 190 (C.A.), Mr. Justice Esson, referring to that paragraph, said at page 192:

Insofar as that passage reflects the process which was carried out at great length by Mr. Justice McKenzie of subjecting the allegations in the pleadings to sceptical analysis in order to determine their true character, I consider that to have been an entirely appropriate procedure.

Esson J.A. added that there was a necessity to go "behind the form of the proceeding in order to get at its true nature, and that must be done even when the matter is dealt with on the pleadings." However, he said at page 193 that "it was not right to go so far as to consider the intrinsic improbability that these defendants would do what they were alleged to have done. This is an application on the pleadings and essentially must be decided upon what is alleged there." He continued:

The approach taken by the chambers judge appears to have resulted from some of the language used by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Cruise Missile case [Operation Dismantle] and in particular certain observations to the effect that the court was not required to accept as true certain allegations that were made by the plaintiffs there. But those were allegations of a special nature; they were allegations to the effect that to allow testing of the Cruise missile would increase the likelihood of nuclear war. It was in relation to that that Chief Justice Dickson said [p. 455]:

The very nature of such an allegation is that it cannot be proven to be true by the adduction of evidence. It would, therefore, be improper to accept that such an allegation is true. No violence is done to the rule where allegations, incapable of proof, are not taken as proven.

When regard is had to the special nature of the allegations, I think it is clear that that case must be viewed with great caution as a general authority touching on the extent to which allegations in pleadings should be taken as true in proceedings of this kind.

30 It is clear that great caution must be taken in relying on Operation Dismantle as a "general authority" that allegations in pleadings should be weighed as to their truth in proceedings of this kind. However, my consideration of the above authorities leads me to the conclusion that it is not fundamentally wrong to look behind the allegations in some cases. This can be taken from the statement of Estey J. in Operation Dismantle that the "rule ... does not require that allegations based on assumptions and speculation be taken as true. ... No violence is done to the rule where allegations, incapable of proof, are not taken as proven." This is also supported by the comment of Esson J.A. in Rogers that, "the process ... of subjecting the allegations in the pleadings to sceptical analysis in order to determine their true character, I consider that to have been an entirely appropriate procedure."

31 Therefore, in my opinion, considering the circumstances, litigation history and allegations in the case at bar it is appropriate to subject them to a sceptical analysis. Paragraphs 40, 41, 45, 46 and 47 of the statement of claim allege, against all of the defendants, intolerance, deceit, harassment, intimidation, writing malicious letters, falsifying documents and, in general, in disrupting the appellants' lives. They include an allegation that all of the defendants allowed, encouraged and influenced some of the Youngs' neighbours in "attempts to collide with the Plaintiffs' moving car, vandalism to the Plaintiff's property, uttering threats, trespassing, and watching of the Plaintiffs and their home." Paragraph 63 alleges that the "corporate" defendants, "under advice of Defendant Mr. Borzoni, fabricated and falsified documents destined" for the Tribunal and the Supreme Court.

32 Most of these wide and sweeping allegations would not, even if true, ground an action for intentional infliction of nervous shock or for negligence by way of a breach of duty. However, particularly in that they are directed at all defendants, which includes a police department, a Regional District, corporations and individuals, the allegations can only be viewed as wild speculation. As said by Mr. Justice McKenzie, they are "only language, not reality." More substantively it can be said, paraphrasing from Operation Dismantle, that they are but speculation and it is not required that they be taken as true.

33 Only paragraphs 64 and 65 single out Mr. Borzoni. They assert that he participated in writing and commissioning affidavits that he knew were false and that he knowingly made false statements to the Tribunal, the Supreme Court and to this Court. There was no such finding by the Tribunal, the allegations were specifically rejected by Mr. Justice Macaulay of the Supreme Court and, for my part, I reject them with respect to this Court.

34 In Operation Dismantle Madam Justice Wilson suggested at paragraph 79 that when "statements of intangible fact" are pleaded, some "invite inferences" while "others anticipate probable consequences." She said that these "may be susceptible to proof by inference from real facts or by expert testimony or through the application of common sense principles." However, the case at bar has the unique concession by Mr. Young, given at the oral hearing, that the appellants have no evidence that Mr. Borzoni counselled any inappropriate conduct on the part of his clients or participated in the events alleged. Mr. Young said that all they have is that Mr. Borzoni was seen at Beechwood Gardens. There is no possibility, particularly in that client privilege stands in the way, of the appellants ever obtaining any evidence in support of such allegations - allegations based purely on assumptions and speculation.

35 However, even if the facts are taken as pleaded to be true, I am of the opinion that the statement of claim still fails to plead the material facts necessary to complete the cause of action in the tort of intentional infliction of nervous shock. While intentional infliction of mental suffering may arise from a deliberate course of conduct over time (see Clark v. Canada, [1994] 3 F.C. 323 (T.D.)), the conduct must not only be flagrant, outrageous and extreme, but also of a type calculated to cause a recognizable psychiatric illness in the plaintiff.

36 The statement of claim alleges that Mr. Borzoni's conduct resulted in a visible and provable illness and that through his alleged malicious conduct he intended to inflict nervous shock, anguish, and extreme despair. In Guay v. Sun Publishing Co., [1953] 2 S.C.R. 216 at 238, Estey J., in his majority concurring judgment, set out what must be proved on the latter element in order that damages may be recovered citing the following from Pollock on Torts, 15th ed. at p. 37:

A state of mind such as fear or acute grief is not in itself capable of assessment as measurable temporal damage. But visible and provable illness may be the natural consequence of violent emotion, and may furnish a ground of action against a person whose wrongful act or want of due care produced that emotion. In every case the question is whether the shock and the illness were in fact natural or direct consequences of the wrongful act or default; if they were, the illness, not the shock, furnishes the measurable damage, and there is no more difficulty in assessing it than in assessing damages for bodily injuries of any kind.

37 In my opinion the pleaded material facts do not support the proposition that the suggested injuries were caused by the alleged actions of Mr. Borzoni. Recognizable psychiatric illnesses, such as are defined in the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM-IV) for example, amount to visible and provable illnesses for the purposes of the tort of the intentional infliction of mental suffering. However, emotional stress, mental anguish and despair, the emotional states pleaded by the appellants, are not generally accepted as amounting to "visible and provable illness" for the purposes of the tort of the intentional infliction of mental suffering. In Mustapha v. Culligan of Canada Ltd., [2006] O.J. No. 4964 (C.A.), the Ontario Court of Appeal reaffirmed its earlier position with respect to liability in cases of psychiatric harm:

In Canadian law, a plaintiff can recover for the negligent infliction of psychiatric damage if he or she establishes two propositions - first, that the psychiatric damage suffered was a foreseeable consequence of the negligent conduct; second, that the psychiatric damage was so serious that it resulted in a recognizable psychiatric illness: see Linden, Canadian Tort Law, supra, at pp. 389-92.

38 The principle that the psychiatric damage must be so serious that it results in a recognizable psychiatric illness is not novel: See for example: Topgro Greenhouses Ltd. v. Houweling, [2006] B.C.J. No. 831, 2006 BCCA 183 at para. 62; Mackenzie J.A.'s minority concurring judgment in Devji v. Burnaby (District), [1999] B.C.J. No. 2320, 1999 BCCA 599 at paras. 79-113; Kalaman v. Singer Valve Co. (1997), 93 B.C.A.C. 93 at para. 63.

39 The appellants have not, in my opinion, demonstrated any error on the part of Bouck J. in his conclusion that the "statement of claim fails to plead the necessary elements of the tort of intentional infliction of nervous shock."

40 While this aspect of the appeal is complete with the above analysis, Mr. Young spent considerable effort in the oral hearing arguing that Bouck J. "overlooked, neglected, or misapprehended" paragraphs 1, 41, 45-47 of the appellants' statement of claim. The reference to paragraph 1 is to Bouck J.'s comment that the appellants were tenants from "about November 2001", whereas they apparently moved in about 31 August 2001. At the oral hearing Mr. Young said "the main events occurred before we moved in." However, as noted by Mr. Justice Macaulay at paragraph 16 of his reasons, the appellants' difficulties commenced with the receipt of an anonymous letter on 7 October 2001. That letter was but a courteous suggestion that the appellants allow smoke to disperse outside through windows or doors, rather than into the common hallways of the building. The appellants replied with a spiteful letter. Mr. Young reported the letter he had received to the Corporation which, to that point, had not received any complaints. It was not until 20 October 2001 that complaints surfaced regarding marijuana smoke. On about 26 October 2001 a lawyer for the Youngs sent a letter to the Corporation.

41 Paragraph 46 states that the intimidation of the appellants and the disruption of their lives took place "over a period of two years." No alleged intimidation or harassment could have commenced before 7 October 2001, the date the Youngs received the anonymous letter. There is nothing to substantiate that the "main events" occurred before that date. In any event, there is no suggestion that the judge was not aware of the factual events, regardless of the dates. Nothing turns on the date of occupancy relied on by the judge.

42 Paragraph 41 states that all of the defendants "knew there was no second hand smoke in the hallway." The appellants rely on this to say the "actions" of Mr. Borzoni "were based on known falsehoods" - namely, allegations that the appellants were "unreasonably disturbing some neighbours" - and the allegations "were without legal justification." That pleading is not capable of supporting the claim of intentional infliction of nervous shock. Even on its face it is but an innuendo of unprofessional conduct by Mr. Borzoni.

43 With respect to paragraphs 45, 46 and 47, the appellants' factum reads as follows:

Further, the learned Chambers Judge overlooked, neglected, or misapprehended paras. 45, 46 and 47 of the Statement of Claim which plead[ed] that Respondent Mr. Borzoni gave advice to Defendants CRHC, and SPD to allow, influence, encourage, coordinate, and/or support the efforts of some of the Appellants' neighbours and staff of Defendant CRHC to intimidate and disrupt the lives of the Appellants with the intention to drive the Appellants out of their subsidized home and gave advice to ignore the Appellants' plea for assistance.

The appellants expand on this by submitting that "a reasonable person in the position of Respondent Mr. Borzoni would reasonably foresee an emotional upset on the part of the appellants who ... were being harassed by some neighbours and staff of [the Corporation]."

44 Paragraph 47 does not allege that Mr. Borzoni advised anybody to trespass, write malicious letters or engage in harassment of the appellants. It does not make an allegation that Mr. Borzoni gave advice "to drive the Appellants out of their subsidized home and [give] advice to ignore the Appellants' plea for assistance." In that Mr. Borzoni was legal counsel to defendants it follows that they were "under advice of Defendant Borzoni." That plea is not material to the claim of intentional infliction of nervous shock.

45 Bouck J. did not err in concluding that the statement of claim fails to plead the necessary elements of the tort of intentional infliction of nervous shock.

b) Breach of duty of care (negligence)

46 Writing for the Court in Odhavji, Iacobucci J. stated at paragraph 44 that:

In order for an action in negligence to succeed, a plaintiff must be able to establish three things: (i) that the defendant owed the plaintiff a duty of care; (ii) that the defendant breached that duty of care; and (iii) that damages resulted from that breach. The primary question that arises on this appeal is in respect of the first element, namely, whether the defendants owed to the appellants a duty to take reasonable care.

The same primary question arises on this appeal.

47 The appellants submit that Mr. Borzoni owed them a duty of care, that he breached that duty and that the breach inflicted loss and damage to them. They say that Bouck J. erred when he found that there was no such duty owed by Mr. Borzoni to the appellants. To merely plead that there is a duty of care is a conclusion of law which Rule 19(9.1) provides must be supported by material facts. The appellants pleaded this conclusion of law in paragraph 13 of their statement of claim, but not the material facts supporting that conclusion.

48 The following statement from Odhavji is instructive:

[45] It is a well-established principle that a defendant is not liable in negligence unless the law exacts an obligation in the circumstances to take reasonable care. As Lord Esher concluded in Le Lievre v. Gould, [1893] 1 Q.B. 491 (C.A.), at p. 497, "[a] man is entitled to be as negligent as he pleases towards the whole world if he owes no duty to them." Duty may therefore be defined as an obligation, recognised by law, to take reasonable care to avoid conduct that entails an unreasonable risk of harm to others.

[46] It is now well established in Canada that the existence of such a duty is to be determined in accordance with the two-step analysis first enunciated by the House of Lords in Anns v. Merton London Borough Council, [1978] A.C. 728, at pp. 751-52:

First one has to ask whether, as between the alleged wrongdoer and the person who has suffered damage there is a sufficient relationship of proximity or neighbourhood such that, in the reasonable contemplation of the former, carelessness on his part may be likely to cause damage to the latter - in which case a prima facie duty of care arises. Secondly, if the first question is answered affirmatively, it is necessary to consider whether there are any considerations which ought to negative, or to reduce or limit the scope of the duty or the class of person to whom it is owed or the damages to which a breach of it may give rise.

49 There are no material facts pleaded in the appellants' statement of claim which could establish that as between Mr. Borzoni and the Youngs there is a sufficient relationship of proximity such that, in the reasonable contemplation of the former, carelessness on his part may be likely to cause damage to the latter.

50 Mr. Justice Bouck stated that "the only party to whom a lawyer owes an actionable duty is to his or her client." In support he referenced Lawrence v. Sandilands, [2003] B.C.J. No. 343, 2003 BCSC 211:

[79] While a solicitor may owe an ethical duty to the court to be candid and fair, the only party to whom a solicitor owes an actionable duty is his or her client (Jensen v. MacGregor (1992), 65 B.C.L.R. (2d) 224 at p. 228 (B.C.S.C.)).

I raise this because I do not accept that statement of law as being absolute. In Garrant v. Cawood (1984), 40 Sask.R. 162 (Q.B.), aff'd (1985) 40 Sask.R. 155 (C.A.), Matheson J. said at paragraph 10 that "a professional person can be liable in tort to other persons than his client for breach of a duty to use reasonable care in the performance of professional activities." Matheson J. was citing Haig v. Bamford, [1977] 1 S.C.R. 466, where the Supreme Court considered whether accountants might be found to owe a duty of care to third-parties not their employer or client. The majority held that a duty of care could arise in such circumstances when the accountant had actual knowledge of the limited class of persons that would use and rely on the accountant's financial statement and the auditor's report thereon. A direct analogy between accountants as discussed in Haig and lawyers as in the present case is not possible in that lawyers do not generally produce statements or reports intended to be relied on by third-parties.

51 The circumstances in Crooks v. Manolescu, [1995] B.C.J. No. 17 (S.C.) are closely analogous to the case at bar. Solicitor A was alleged to have assisted a client to falsely shield assets from execution. In an action brought on behalf of persons said to have been defrauded, solicitor A was named as a defendant. Solicitor B acted for solicitor A and it was submitted that she owed to the plaintiffs "a fiduciary duty and a duty to take care in respect of the plaintiffs' interests." The allegations against her included failing to warn the plaintiffs of fraudulent acts by her client and continuing to act in circumstances where she ought to have known of fraudulent activity.

52 An application was brought to strike out portions of the statement of claim as disclosing no reasonable claim. In a well written judgment Master Bolton said:

[8] ... The existence of a fiduciary duty or duty of care is not an allegation of fact, however, but a conclusion of law which must depend on proof (or for present purposes, allegations) of fact. And particulars of the breach of a duty are not relevant to the question of the existence of the duty. Thus, while I accept as a fact, for example, for the purposes of this hearing, that [solicitor B] filed affidavits which she ought to have known were false, that fact is of absolutely no significance to the question of the existence of a duty of care to the plaintiffs.

[10] ... the plaintiff's position is tantamount to an assertion that all counsel who represent litigants owe a fiduciary duty or a duty of care to the other party to the litigation. This is patently absurd, as in the course of counsel's representation of her own client, much may be done that is intentionally and necessarily directed toward injuring the opposing party's interests. On the facts as pleaded here, it is, to borrow the emphatic language of Taylor J.A. in Kamahap Enterprises Ltd. v. Chu's Central Market Ltd. (1990), 40 B.C.L.R. (2d) 288, impossible that [solicitor B] could owe a duty of care to Ms. Crooks.

[12] The impossibility of the existence of a duty of care that I referred to in paragraph 10 above is an impossibility on these pleadings. Clearly, a solicitor will in some circumstances be held to owe a duty to persons other than her own client, and so may be a barrister. I do not intend to say that [solicitor B] could in no circumstances be held to owe a duty of care to Ms. Crooks. But I do say that before such a duty can be found to exist, facts must be proved in evidence - and alleged in pleadings - which describe the relationship and the circumstances from which the duty arose.

Master Bolton then cited case authorities as to the basis for the imposition of a duty of care. He concluded as follows:

[15] It is not for me to speculate about what additional facts would support the existence of a duty of care in the case now before me. All that I can say is that on the facts as presently pleaded, no such duty could possibly be held to exist; the impugned paragraphs disclose no reasonable cause of action.

53 Those comments apply equally to the case at bar. The pleadings as presented fail to present any material fact that supports either that Mr. Borzoni had a duty of care towards the appellants or, if he did have such a duty, that he was in breach thereof. Bouck J. did not err in dismissing the appellants' claim in the tort of negligence against Mr. Borzoni.

2. The action is unnecessary, scandalous, frivolous and vexatious

54 The appellants assert that "this is a whole new case", therefore it is not unnecessary. The basis for this contention is that the earlier proceedings were based "on fraudulent evidence and [that] there is new, previously unavailable, conclusive evidence thus the claim is not unnecessary, scandalous, vexatious and frivolous." The "new evidence" advanced by the appellants is, in summary, as follows:

Mr. Borzoni knew before the appellants took occupancy that Mr. Young had an exemption to use marijuana.

Mr. Borzoni knew there was no second hand marijuana smoke in the building.

Mr. Borzoni, and the other defendants, fabricated evidence for submission to the Residential Tenancy Office or to the Supreme Court of British Columbia.

The appellants have suffered personal harm.

55 At paragraph 10 of his reasons Bouck J. found the action to be unnecessary, scandalous, vexatious and frivolous because "the facts and issues underlying the Youngs' claim against Mr. Borzoni were previously determined in other proceedings arising out of the same set of facts." That finding is, in my opinion, beyond denial. The reasons emanating from the various proceedings are extensive so I will only note some of the findings in the most summary way.

56 In his reasons for judgment of 13 June 2003 Mr. Justice Macaulay, at paragraph 40, commenced a review of the hearing before Arbitrator Gilbert. He noted that Arbitrator Gilbert said that the Corporation received approximately 38 complaints from residents regarding marijuana odour and identified the premises of origin as that of the appellants. The appellants filed a complaint about harassment and discrimination which was heard by Human Rights Officer Down. Macaulay J. noted at paragraph 51 that Ms. Down concluded that "the Complainant's unit is the source of marijuana smoke" and that she dismissed the appellants' complaint because there was no reasonable basis to justify referring it to the tribunal.

57 Commencing at paragraph 64 Mr. Justice Macaulay detailed the Charter issues raised in Action No. 02-5145. He said that the appellants had "taken a string of relatively benign unconnected events and forced them into a conspiracy theory." He held, at paragraph 69, that the Corporation "attempted to take reasonable steps to accommodate the petitioners, but the petitioners refused to cooperate. The [Corporation] was entitled to rely on the statute and did so in seeking to evict."

58 Macaulay J. held, at paragraph 72, that the appellants' "claims cannot possibly succeed." He then drew a number of assumptions in favour of the appellants, but said, at paragraph 78: "one key assumption that I cannot make in the petitioners' favour is that the neighbours' complaints of marihuana smell were unfounded. The arbitrator came to the opposite conclusion based on the evidence before him, as he was entitled to do." The judge then dealt with the issues raised by the appellants against the Saanich Police Department and The Capital Regional District, during which he noted as follows:

[114] ... During his submission, Mr. Young referred several times to his concern that Mr. Borzoni, who acted as counsel for all the respondents, performed some improper function related to this allegation. There was simply no evidence to support any allegation of wrongdoing on the part of counsel.

59 Mr. Justice Macaulay noted that the appellants contended that the decisions of Arbitrators Gilbert and Katz should be set aside. They submitted that Arbitrator Gilbert committed numerous procedural errors, misapprehended the evidence before him and was biased. Macaulay J. said, at paragraph 159, that he had reviewed the finding of Arbitrator Gilbert to determine whether there was evidence on which he could reasonably conclude that there were smells associated with the appellants' use of marijuana that adversely affected other tenants in the complex. He held that there was such evidence and concluded:

[160] I decline to set aside the order of Arbitrator Gilbert. It follows from the foregoing that I agree with the result obtained before Arbitrator Katz on review. I also decline to set aside that order.

[161] I dismiss the proceedings brought under both actions.

60 On appeal this Court, in reasons delivered orally, noted that the appellants alleged seven errors on the part of Mr. Justice Macaulay. The appeal was dismissed: Young et al v. Saanich Police Department, 2004 BCCA 224.

61 The appellants further submitted that the judge "overlooked, neglected or misapprehended" paragraphs 37, 38, 63-65 of the statement of claim. Those paragraphs state that the respondents became aware on specific dates that Mr. Young legally used marijuana and that Mr. Borzoni made false statements and fabricated documents. There is no evidence that Bouck J. was unaware of those paragraphs, and an inference that he was unaware of them cannot be drawn.

62 Issues of res judicata and issue estoppel were dealt with in some detail by the respondent in his factum. I do not find it necessary in the circumstances of this case to delve into those complex legal areas. There is nothing in the proposed "new evidence" that is either relevant or was not considered in the earlier proceedings.

63 I am of the opinion that no error has been demonstrated in Bouck J.'s finding that this action against Mr. Borzoni is unnecessary, scandalous, frivolous and vexatious.

3. Abuse of process

64 Mr. Justice Bouck held that the claim was an abuse of the court's process. He stated that the appellants were "using the court system as a plaything to harass others they do not like." The appellants submit that in doing so he overlooked a significant number of paragraphs in the statement of claim. There is no substance in that submission. They also contend that they have new evidence. The "new evidence" is of no more value under this heading than it was under the previous one.

65 Bouck J. cited Lawrence v. Sandilands at paragraphs 95 and 96 in support of his finding of abuse of process. Paragraph 95 reads as follows:

[95] When determining whether proceedings constitute an abuse of process, the court may consider whether the court process is being used dishonestly or unfairly, or for some ulterior or improper purpose. It may also consider whether there have been multiple or successive related proceedings that are likely to cause vexation or oppression (Babovic v. Babowech, [1993] B.C.J. No. 1802 (B.C.S.C.)).

66 I am of the opinion that in view of the multiple and successive proceedings instigated by the appellants arising out of the same facts, that it was fitting to find an abuse of process. This is supported by the submission of Mr. Freeman that the appellants' motivation for joining Mr. Borzoni as a defendant is to have him removed as counsel in Action No. 04-0304. A series of letters from Mr. Young to Mr. Borzoni, mentioned earlier in these reasons, gives credence to that submission.

67 I would dismiss the appeal.

Costs

68 Mr. Freeman asked for special costs if this appeal is dismissed. I am of the opinion that his client is clearly so entitled. While the appellants' frivolous and vexatious litigiousness may not amount to "scandalous or outrageous" conduct, it is certainly "reprehensible," being "misconduct deserving of reproof or rebuke." Garcia v. Crestbrook Forest Industries Ltd. (1994), 45 B.C.A.C. 222 at paragraph 17 states:

[17] ... the single standard for the awarding of special costs is that the conduct in question properly be categorized as "reprehensible". As Chief Justice Esson said in Leung v. Leung, [1993] B.C.J. No. 2909, the word reprehensible is a word of wide meaning. It encompasses scandalous or outrageous conduct but it also encompasses milder forms of misconduct deserving of reproof or rebuke. Accordingly, the standard represented by the word reprehensible, taken in that sense, must represent a general and all encompassing expression of the applicable standard for the award of special costs.

Court Rules Act

SUPREME COURT CIVIL RULES

B.C. Reg. 168/2009

Deposited July 7, 2009 and effective July 1, 2010
Last amended April 4, 2022 by B.C. Reg. 321/2021 and includes amendments by B.C. Reg. 8/2022

Consolidated Regulations of British Columbia

This is an unofficial consolidation.

Part 3 — Proceedings Started by Filing a Notice of Civil Claim

Rule 3-1 — Notice of Civil Claim

Notice of civil claim

- (1) To start a proceeding under this Part, a person must file a notice of civil claim in Form 1.

Contents of notice of civil claim

- (2) A notice of civil claim must do the following:
 - (a) set out a concise statement of the material facts giving rise to the claim;
 - (b) set out the relief sought by the plaintiff against each named defendant;
 - (c) set out a concise summary of the legal basis for the relief sought;
 - (d) set out the proposed place of trial;
 - (e) if the plaintiff sues or a defendant is sued in a representative capacity, show in what capacity the plaintiff sues or the defendant is sued;
 - (f) provide the data collection information required in the appendix to the form;
 - (g) otherwise comply with Rule 3-7.

Rule 3-7 — Pleadings Generally

Content of Pleadings

Pleading must not contain evidence

- (1) A pleading must not contain the evidence by which the facts alleged in it are to be proved.

Documents and conversations

- (2) The effect of any document or the purport of any conversation referred to in a pleading, if material, must be stated briefly and the precise words of the documents or conversation must not be stated, except insofar as those words are themselves material.

When presumed facts need not be pleaded

- (3) A party need not plead a fact if
 - (a) the fact is presumed by law to be true, or
 - (b) the burden of disproving the fact lies on the other party.

When performance of a condition precedent need not be pleaded

- (4) A party need not plead the performance of a condition precedent necessary for the party's case unless the other party has specifically denied it in the other party's pleadings.

Matters arising since start of proceeding

- (5) A party may plead a matter that has arisen since the start of the proceeding.

Inconsistent allegations

- (6) A party must not plead an allegation of fact or a new ground or claim inconsistent with the party's previous pleading.

Alternative allegations

- (7) Subrule (6) does not affect the right of a party to make allegations in the alternative or to amend or apply for leave to amend a pleading.

Objection in point of law

- (8) A party may raise in a pleading an objection in point of law.

Pleading conclusions of law

- (9) Conclusions of law must not be pleaded unless the material facts supporting them are pleaded.

Status admitted

- (10) Unless the incorporation of a corporate party or the office or status of a party is specifically denied, it is deemed to be admitted.

Set-off or counterclaim

- (11) A defendant in an action may set off or set up by way of counterclaim any right or claim, whether the set-off or counterclaim is for damages or not, so as to enable the court to pronounce a final judgment on all claims in the same action.

Pleading after the notice of civil claim

- (12) In a pleading subsequent to a notice of civil claim, a party must plead specifically any matter of fact or point of law that
- (a) the party alleges makes a claim or defence of the opposite party not maintainable,
 - (b) if not specifically pleaded, might take the other party by surprise, or
 - (c) raises issues of fact not arising out of the preceding pleading.

General relief

- (13) A pleading need not ask for general or other relief.

General damages must not be pleaded

- (14) If general damages are claimed, the amount of the general damages claimed must not be stated in any pleading.

Substance to be answered

- (15) If a party in a pleading denies an allegation of fact in the previous pleading of the opposite party, the party must not do so evasively but must answer the point of substance.

Denial of contract

- (16) If a contract, promise or agreement is alleged in a pleading, a bare denial of it by the opposite party is to be construed only as a denial of fact of the express contract, promise or agreement alleged, or of the matters of fact from which it may be implied by law, and not as a denial of the legality or sufficiency in law of that contract, promise or agreement.

Allegation of malice

- (17) It is sufficient to allege malice, fraudulent intention, knowledge or other condition of the mind of a person as a fact, without setting out the circumstances from which it is to be inferred.

Particulars

When particulars necessary

- (18) If the party pleading relies on misrepresentation, fraud, breach of trust, wilful default or undue influence, or if particulars may be necessary, full particulars, with dates and items if applicable, must be stated in the pleading.

Lengthy particulars

- (19) If the particulars required under subrule (18) of debt, expenses or damages are lengthy, the party pleading may refer to this fact and, instead of pleading the particulars, must serve the particulars in a separate document either before or with the pleading.

Further particulars

- (20) Particulars need only be pleaded to the extent that they are known at the date of pleading, but further particulars
- (a) may be served after they become known, and
 - (b) must be served within 10 days after a demand is made in writing.

Particulars in libel or slander

- (21) In an action for libel or slander,
- (a) if the plaintiff alleges that the words or matter complained of were used in a derogatory sense other than their ordinary meaning, the plaintiff must give particulars of the facts and matters on which the plaintiff relies in support of that sense, and
 - (b) if the defendant alleges that, insofar as the words complained of consist of statements of fact, they are true in substance and in fact, and that insofar as they consist of expressions of opinion, they are fair comment on a matter of public interest, the defendant must give particulars stating which of the words complained of the defendant alleges are statements of fact and of the facts and matters relied on in support of the allegation that the words are true.

Order for particulars

- (22) The court may order a party to serve further and better particulars of a matter stated in a pleading.

Demand for particulars

- (23) Before applying to the court for particulars, a party must demand them in writing from the other party.

Demand for particulars not a stay of proceedings

- (24) A demand for particulars does not operate as a stay of proceedings or give an extension of time, but a party may apply for an extension of time for serving a responding pleading on the ground that the party cannot answer the originating pleading until particulars are provided.

Rule 9-5 — Striking Pleadings

Scandalous, frivolous or vexatious matters

(1) At any stage of a proceeding, the court may order to be struck out or amended the whole or any part of a pleading, petition or other document on the ground that

- (a) it discloses no reasonable claim or defence, as the case may be,
- (b) it is unnecessary, scandalous, frivolous or vexatious,
- (c) it may prejudice, embarrass or delay the fair trial or hearing of the proceeding, or
- (d) it is otherwise an abuse of the process of the court, and the court may pronounce judgment or order the proceeding to be stayed or dismissed and may order the costs of the application to be paid as special costs.

[am. B.C. Reg. 119/2010, Sch. A, s. 22.]

Admissibility of evidence

(2) No evidence is admissible on an application under subrule (1) (a).

Powers of registrar

(3) If, on the filing of a document, a registrar considers that the whole or any part of the document could be the subject of an order under subrule (1),

- (a) the registrar may, despite any other provision of these Supreme Court Civil Rules,
 - (i) retain the document and all filed copies of it, and
 - (ii) refer the document to the court, and
- (b) the court may, after a summary hearing, make an order under subrule (1).

Reconsideration of order

(4) If the court makes an order referred to in subrule (3) (b),

- (a) the registrar must give notification of the order, in the manner directed by the court, to the person who filed the document,
- (b) the person who filed the document may, within 7 days after being notified, apply to the court, and
- (c) the court may confirm, vary or rescind the order.

Rule 14-1 — Costs

How costs assessed generally

- (1) If costs are payable to a party under these Supreme Court Civil Rules or by order, those costs must be assessed as party and party costs in accordance with Appendix B unless any of the following circumstances exist:
 - (a) the parties consent to the amount of costs and file a certificate of costs setting out that amount;
 - (b) the court orders that
 - (i) the costs of the proceeding be assessed as special costs, or
 - (ii) the costs of an application, a step or any other matter in the proceeding be assessed as special costs in which event, subject to subrule (10), costs in relation to all other applications, steps and matters in the proceeding must be determined and assessed under this rule in accordance with this subrule;
 - (c) the court awards lump sum costs for the proceeding and fixes those costs under subrule (15) in an amount the court considers appropriate;
 - (d) the court awards lump sum costs in relation to an application, a step or any other matter in the proceeding and fixes those costs under subrule (15), in which event, subject to subrule (10), costs in relation to all other applications, steps and matters in the proceeding must be determined and assessed under this rule in accordance with this subrule;
 - (e) a notice of fast track action in Form 61 has been filed in relation to the action under Rule 15-1, in which event Rule 15-1 (15) to (17) applies;
 - (f) subject to subrule (10) of this rule,
 - (i) the only relief granted in the action is one or more of money, real property, a builder's lien and personal property and the plaintiff recovers a judgment in which the total value of the relief granted is $100 000 or less, exclusive of interest and costs, or
 - (ii) the trial of the action was completed within 3 days or less,in which event, Rule 15-1 (15) to (17) applies to the action unless the court orders otherwise.

Assessment of party and party costs

- (2) On an assessment of party and party costs under Appendix B, a registrar must
 - (a) allow those fees under Appendix B that were proper or reasonably necessary to conduct the proceeding, and
 - (b) consider Rule 1-3 and any case plan order.

Assessment of special costs

- (3) On an assessment of special costs, a registrar must
 - (a) allow those fees that were proper or reasonably necessary to conduct the proceeding, and
 - (b) consider all of the circumstances, including the following:
 - (i) the complexity of the proceeding and the difficulty or the novelty of the issues involved;

- (ii) the skill, specialized knowledge and responsibility required of the lawyer;
- (iii) the amount involved in the proceeding;
- (iv) the time reasonably spent in conducting the proceeding;
- (v) the conduct of any party that tended to shorten, or to unnecessarily lengthen, the duration of the proceeding;
- (vi) the importance of the proceeding to the party whose bill is being assessed, and the result obtained;
- (vii) the benefit to the party whose bill is being assessed of the services rendered by the lawyer;
- (viii) Rule 1-3 and any case plan order.

Assessment officer

- (4) The officer before whom costs are assessed is a registrar.

Disbursements

- (5) When assessing costs under subrule (2) or (3) of this rule, a registrar must
 - (a) determine which disbursements have been necessarily or properly incurred in the conduct of the proceeding, and
 - (b) allow a reasonable amount for those disbursements.

Repealed

- (6) Repealed. [B.C. Reg. 44/2014, Sch. 2, s. 2.]

Directions

- (7) If the court has made an order for costs,
 - (a) any party may, at any time before a registrar issues a certificate under subrule (27), apply for directions to the judge or master who made the order for costs,
 - (b) the judge or master may direct that any item of costs, including any item of disbursements, be allowed or disallowed, and
 - (c) the registrar is bound by any direction given by the judge or master.

Tax in respect of legal services and disbursements

- (8) If tax is payable by a party in respect of legal services or disbursements, a registrar must, on an assessment under subrule (2) or (3), allow an additional amount to compensate for that tax as follows:
 - (a) if the tax is payable in respect of legal services, the additional amount to compensate for the tax must be determined by multiplying the percentage rate of the tax by,
 - (i) in the case of a judgment entered on default of response to civil claim, the costs allowed under Item 1 or 2, as the case may be, of Schedule 1 of Appendix B,
 - (ii) in the case of a writ of execution, a garnishing order, a subpoena to debtor in Form 56, a notice of application for committal in Form 58 or an order of committal in Form 59, the costs allowed under Item 1 or 2, as the case may be, of Schedule 2 of Appendix B, or

- (iii) in any other case, the monetary value of the units assessed;
- (b) if the tax is payable in respect of disbursements, the additional amount to compensate for the tax must be determined by multiplying the percentage rate of the tax by the monetary value of the disbursements as assessed.

Costs to follow event

- (9) Subject to subrule (12), costs of a proceeding must be awarded to the successful party unless the court otherwise orders.

Costs in cases within small claims jurisdiction

- (10) A plaintiff who recovers a sum within the jurisdiction of the Provincial Court under the Small Claims Act is not entitled to costs, other than disbursements, unless the court finds that there was sufficient reason for bringing the proceeding in the Supreme Court and so orders.

Costs where party represented by an employee

- (11) A party is not disentitled to costs merely because the party's lawyer is an employee of the party.

Costs of applications

- (12) Unless the court hearing an application otherwise orders,
 - (a) if the application is granted, the party who brought the application is entitled to costs of the application if that party is awarded costs at trial or at the hearing of the petition, but the party opposing the application, if any, is not entitled to costs even though that party is awarded costs at trial or at the hearing of the petition, and
 - (b) if the application is refused, the party who brought the application is not entitled to costs of the application even though that party is awarded costs at trial or at the hearing of the petition, but the party opposing the application, if any, is entitled to costs if that party is awarded costs at trial or at the hearing of the petition.

When costs payable

- (13) If an entitlement to costs arises during a proceeding, whether as a result of an order or otherwise, those costs are payable on the conclusion of the proceeding unless the court otherwise orders.

Costs arising from improper act or omission

- (14) If anything is done or omitted improperly or unnecessarily, by or on behalf of a party, the court or a registrar may order
 - (a) that any costs arising from or associated with any matter related to the act or omission not be allowed to the party, or
 - (b) that the party pay the costs incurred by any other party by reason of the act or omission.

Costs of whole or part of proceeding

- (15) The court may award costs
 - (a) of a proceeding,

- (b) that relate to some particular application, step or matter in or related to the proceeding, or
- (c) except so far as they relate to some particular application, step or matter in or related to the proceeding and in awarding those costs the court may fix the amount of costs, including the amount of disbursements.

Costs payable from estate or property

- (16) If it is ordered that any costs are to be paid out of an estate or property, the court may direct out of what portion of the estate or property the costs are to be paid.

Set-off of costs

- (17) If a party entitled to receive costs is liable to pay costs to another party, a registrar may assess the costs the party is liable to pay and may adjust them by way of deduction or set-off or may delay the allowance of the costs the party is entitled to receive until the party has paid or tendered the costs the party is liable to pay.

Costs of one defendant payable by another

- (18) If the costs of one defendant against a plaintiff ought to be paid by another defendant, the court may order payment to be made by one defendant to the other directly, or may order the plaintiff to pay the costs of the successful defendant and allow the plaintiff to include those costs as a disbursement in the costs payable to the plaintiff by the unsuccessful defendant.

Unnecessary expense after judgment

- (19) If after pronouncement of judgment a party puts another party to unnecessary proceedings or expense, a registrar may award costs as the registrar considers appropriate against the offending party.

Form of bill of costs

- (20) A bill of costs must be in Form 62 or, if the bill of costs pertains to a judgment under Rule 3-8, Form 63.

Appointment to review a bill, examine an agreement or assess costs

- (21) Except as provided in subrule (26), a person who seeks a review of a bill or an examination of an agreement under the Legal Profession Act or who seeks to have costs assessed must
 - (a) obtain a date for an appointment before a registrar,
 - (b) file an appointment in Form 49 to which is attached
 - (i) the bill to be reviewed,
 - (ii) the agreement to be examined, or
 - (iii) the bill of costs to be assessed, and
 - (c) at least 5 days before the date of the appointment, serve a copy of the filed Form 49 appointment and any affidavit in support,
 - (i) in the case of a bill to be reviewed, on the lawyer whose bill is to be reviewed, on the person who is charged with the bill or on the person who has agreed to indemnify the person charged, as the case may be,

- (ii) in the case of an agreement to be examined, on the lawyer who is a party to the agreement to be examined, or
- (iii) in the case of a bill of costs to be assessed, in accordance with subrule (25).

Place for review or examination

- (22) An appointment for review of a bill, examination of an agreement or assessment of costs must be taken out,
- (a) in the case of a bill to be reviewed or an agreement to be examined,
 - (i) if the bill or agreement relates to a court proceeding, at the registry at which the proceeding is being conducted, or
 - (ii) if the bill or agreement does not relate to a court proceeding, at the registry nearest to the place of business of the lawyer concerned,
 - (b) in the case of a bill of costs to be assessed, at the registry at which the proceeding is being conducted, or
 - (c) at any other registry to which the parties to the appointment may agree.

Further particulars

- (23) A registrar may order further particulars or details of
- (a) a bill under review,
 - (b) an agreement under examination, or
 - (c) a bill of costs being assessed.

Assessment of sheriff's fees

- (24) If a sheriff who has charged fees for services set out in Schedule 2 of Appendix C or a person affected by those fees wishes to have those fees assessed, the person seeking the assessment must
- (a) obtain an appointment from a registrar in Form 49 and attach to that appointment a copy of the bill to be assessed, if available, and
 - (b) at least 5 days before the assessment, serve a copy of the filed appointment and any filed affidavit in support on all persons affected by the fees.

Service of appointment

- (25) A person seeking an assessment of costs must serve an appointment in Form 49, to which is attached the bill of costs, and any affidavit in support on
- (a) the person against whom costs are to be assessed, and
 - (b) every other person whose interest, whether in a fund or estate or otherwise, may be affected.

Costs on default judgment

- (26) On signing a default judgment, a registrar may, without an appointment, fix the costs to which the plaintiff is entitled against the defendant in default, and set out the amount allowed in
- (a) the judgment, or
 - (b) a separate certificate.

Certificate of costs

- (27) On the conclusion of an assessment of costs, or if the party charged has consented to the amount, a registrar must, either by endorsing the original bill or by issuing a certificate of costs in Form 64, certify the amount of costs awarded, and the party assessing costs must file the certificate.

Certificate of fees

- (28) On the conclusion of a review of a bill under the Legal Profession Act, or if the parties to the review have consented to the amount due under the bill, a registrar must, by issuing a certificate of fees in Form 65, certify the amount due, and either party to the review may file the certificate.

Review of an assessment

- (29) A party who is dissatisfied with a decision of a registrar on an assessment of costs may, within 14 days after the registrar has certified the costs, apply to the court for a review of the assessment.

Form of bill in certain cases

- (30) A bill for special costs or a bill under the Legal Profession Act may be rendered on a lump sum basis.

Description of services

- (31) A lump sum bill must contain a description of the nature of the services and of the matter involved as would, in the opinion of a registrar, afford any lawyer sufficient information to advise a client on the reasonableness of the charge made.

Evidence of lawyer

- (32) A party to an assessment of costs or a review of a lump sum bill may put in evidence the opinion of a lawyer as to the nature and importance of the services rendered and of the matter involved and the reasonableness of the charges made, but a party must not put in evidence the opinions of more than 2 lawyers, and a lawyer giving an opinion may be required to attend for examination and cross-examination.

Disallowance of fees and costs

- (33) If the court considers that a party's lawyer has caused costs to be incurred without reasonable cause, or has caused costs to be wasted through delay, neglect or some other fault, the court may do any one or more of the following:
- (a) disallow any fees and disbursements between the lawyer and the lawyer's client or, if those fees or disbursements have been paid, order that the lawyer repay some or all of them to the client;
 - (b) order that the lawyer indemnify his or her client for all or part of any costs that the client has been ordered to pay to another party;
 - (c) order that the lawyer be personally liable for all or part of any costs that his or her client has been ordered to pay to another party;
 - (d) make any other order that the court considers will further the object of these Supreme Court Civil Rules.

Costs may be ordered without assessment

(34) If the court makes an order under subrule (33), the court may

(a) direct a registrar to conduct an inquiry and file a report with recommendations as to the amount of costs, or

(b) subject to subrule (37), fix the costs with or without reference to the tariff in Appendix B.

Notice

(35) An order against a lawyer under subrule (33) or (34) must not be made unless the lawyer is present or has been given notice.

Order to be served

(36) A lawyer against whom an order under subrule (33) or (34) has been made must promptly serve a copy of the entered order on his or her client.

Limitation

(37) An order by the court under subrule (34) (b) in respect of the costs of an application must not exceed $1 000.

Refusal or neglect to procure assessment

(38) If a party entitled to costs fails to assess costs and prejudices another party by failing to do so, a registrar may certify the costs of the other party and certify the failure and disallow all costs of the party in default.

Referrals

(39) Unless the court otherwise orders, fees to lawyers, accountants, engineers, actuaries, valuers, merchants and other scientific persons to whom any matter or question is referred by the court must be determined by a registrar, subject to an appeal to the court.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 20A87

ROMAN CATHOLIC DIOCESE OF BROOKLYN,
NEW YORK v. ANDREW M. CUOMO,
GOVERNOR OF NEW YORK

ON APPLICATION FOR INJUNCTIVE RELIEF

[November 25, 2020]

PER CURIAM.

The application for injunctive relief presented to JUSTICE BREYER and by him referred to the Court is granted. Respondent is enjoined from enforcing Executive Order 202.68's 10- and 25-person occupancy limits on applicant pending disposition of the appeal in the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit and disposition of the petition for a writ of certiorari, if such writ is timely sought. Should the petition for a writ of certiorari be denied, this order shall terminate automatically. In the event the petition for a writ of certiorari is granted, the order shall terminate upon the sending down of the judgment of this Court.

* * * * *

This emergency application and another, Agudath Israel of America, et al. v. Cuomo, No. 20A90, present the same issue, and this opinion addresses both cases.

Both applications seek relief from an Executive Order issued by the Governor of New York that imposes very severe restrictions on attendance at religious services in areas classified as "red" or "orange" zones. In red zones, no more than 10 persons may attend each religious service, and in orange zones, attendance is capped at 25. The two applications, one filed by the Roman Catholic Diocese of Brooklyn and the other by Agudath Israel of America and affiliated entities, contend that these restrictions violate the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment, and they ask us to enjoin enforcement of the restrictions while they pursue appellate review. Citing a variety of remarks made by the Governor, Agudath Israel argues that the Governor specifically targeted the Orthodox Jewish community and gerrymandered the boundaries of red and orange zones to ensure that heavily Orthodox areas were included. Both the Diocese and Agudath Israel maintain that the regulations treat houses of worship much more harshly than comparable secular facilities. And they tell us without contradiction that they have complied with all public health guidance, have implemented additional precautionary measures, and have operated at 25% or 33% capacity for months without a single outbreak.

The applicants have clearly established their entitlement to relief pending appellate review. They have shown that their First Amendment claims are likely to prevail, that denying them relief would lead to irreparable injury, and that granting relief would not harm the public interest. See Winter v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc., 555 U. S. 7, 20 (2008). Because of the need to issue an order promptly, we provide only a brief summary of the reasons why immediate relief is essential.

Likelihood of success on the merits. The applicants have made a strong showing that the challenged restrictions violate “the minimum requirement of neutrality” to religion. Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. Hialeah, 508 U. S. 520, 533 (1993). As noted by the dissent in the court below, statements made in connection with the challenged rules can be viewed as targeting the “‘ultra-Orthodox [Jewish] community.’” ___ F. 3d ___, ___, 2020 WL 6750495, *5 (CA2, Nov. 9, 2020) (Park, J., dissenting). But even if we put those comments aside, the regulations cannot be viewed as neutral because they single out houses of worship for especially harsh treatment.¹

In a red zone, while a synagogue or church may not admit more than 10 persons, businesses categorized as “essential” may admit as many people as they wish. And the list of “essential” businesses includes things such as acupuncture facilities, camp grounds, garages, as well as many whose services are not limited to those that can be regarded as essential, such as all plants manufacturing chemicals and microelectronics and all transportation facilities. See New York State, Empire State Development, Guidance for Determining Whether a Business Enterprise is Subject to a Workforce Reduction Under Recent Executive Orders, <https://esd.ny.gov/guidance-executive-order-2026>. The disparate treatment is even more striking in an orange zone. While attendance at houses of worship is limited to 25 persons, even non-essential businesses may decide for themselves how many persons to admit.

These categorizations lead to troubling results. At the hearing in the District Court, a health department official testified about a large store in Brooklyn that could “literally have hundreds of people shopping there on any given day.” App. to Application in No. 20A87, Exh. D, p. 83. Yet a nearby church or synagogue would be prohibited from allowing more than 10 or 25 people inside for a worship service. And the Governor has stated that factories and schools have contributed to the spread of COVID–19, id., Exh. H, at 3; App. to Application in No. 20A90, pp. 98, 100, but they are treated less harshly than the Diocese’s churches and Agudath Israel’s synagogues, which have admirable safety records.

Because the challenged restrictions are not “neutral” and

of “general applicability,” they must satisfy “strict scrutiny,” and this means that they must be “narrowly tailored” to serve a “compelling” state interest. Church of Lukumi, 508 U. S., at 546. Stemming the spread of COVID–19 is unquestionably a compelling interest, but it is hard to see how the challenged regulations can be regarded as “narrowly tailored.” They are far more restrictive than any COVID–related regulations that have previously come before the Court,² much tighter than those adopted by many other jurisdictions hard-hit by the pandemic, and far more severe than has been shown to be required to prevent the spread of the virus at the applicants’ services. The District Court noted that “there ha[d] not been any COVID–19 outbreak in any of the Diocese’s churches since they reopened,” and it praised the Diocese’s record in combatting the spread of the disease. ___ F. Supp. 3d ___, ___, 2020 WL 6120167, *2 (EDNY, Oct. 16, 2020). It found that the Diocese had been constantly “ahead of the curve, enforcing stricter safety protocols than the State required.” Ibid. Similarly, Agudath Israel notes that “[t]he Governor does not dispute that [it] ha[s] rigorously implemented and adhered to all health protocols and that there has been no outbreak of COVID–19 in [its] congregations.” Application in No. 20A90, at 36.

Not only is there no evidence that the applicants have contributed to the spread of COVID–19 but there are many other less restrictive rules that could be adopted to minimize the risk to those attending religious services. Among other things, the maximum attendance at a religious service could be tied to the size of the church or synagogue. Almost all of the 26 Diocese churches immediately affected ²See Calvary Chapel Dayton Valley v. Sisolak, 591 U. S. ___ (2020) (directive limiting in-person worship services to 50 people); South Bay United Pentecostal Church v. Newsom, 590 U. S. ___ (2020) (Executive Order limiting in-person worship to 25% capacity or 100 people, whichever was lower).

by the Executive Order can seat at least 500 people, about 14 can accommodate at least 700, and 2 can seat over 1,000. Similarly, Agudath Israel of Kew Garden Hills can seat up to 400. It is hard to believe that admitting more than 10 people to a 1,000-seat church or 400-seat synagogue would create a more serious health risk than the many other activities that the State allows.

Irreparable harm. There can be no question that the challenged restrictions, if enforced, will cause irreparable harm. “The loss of First Amendment freedoms, for even minimal periods of time, unquestionably constitutes irreparable injury.” Elrod v. Burns, 427 U. S. 347, 373 (1976) (plurality opinion). If only 10 people are admitted to each service, the great majority of those who wish to attend Mass on Sunday or services in a synagogue on Shabbat will be barred. And while those who are shut out may in some instances be able to watch services on television, such remote viewing is not the same as personal attendance. Catholics who watch a Mass at home cannot receive communion, and there are important religious traditions in the Orthodox Jewish faith that require personal attendance. App. to Application in No. 20A90, at 26–27.

Public interest. Finally, it has not been shown that granting the applications will harm the public. As noted, the State has not claimed that attendance at the applicants’ services has resulted in the spread of the disease. And the State has not shown that public health would be imperiled if less restrictive measures were imposed.

Members of this Court are not public health experts, and we should respect the judgment of those with special expertise and responsibility in this area. But even in a pandemic, the Constitution cannot be put away and forgotten. The restrictions at issue here, by effectively barring many from attending religious services, strike at the very heart of the First Amendment’s guarantee of religious liberty. Before allowing this to occur, we have a duty to conduct a serious examination of the need for such a drastic measure.

The dissenting opinions argue that we should withhold relief because the relevant circumstances have now changed. After the applicants asked this Court for relief, the Governor reclassified the areas in question from orange to yellow, and this change means that the applicants may hold services at 50% of their maximum occupancy. The dissents would deny relief at this time but allow the Diocese and Agudath Israel to renew their requests if this recent reclassification is reversed.

There is no justification for that proposed course of action. It is clear that this matter is not moot. See Federal Election Comm'n v. Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc., 551 U. S. 449, 462 (2007); Friends of the Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Environmental Services (TOC), Inc., 528 U. S. 167, 189 (2000). And injunctive relief is still called for because the applicants remain under a constant threat that the area in question will be reclassified as red or orange. See, e.g., Susan B. Anthony List v. Driehaus, 573 U. S. 149, 158 (2014). The Governor regularly changes the classification of particular areas without prior notice.³ If that occurs again, the reclassification will almost certainly bar individuals in the affected area from attending services before judicial relief can be obtained. At most Catholic churches, Mass is celebrated daily, and “Orthodox Jews pray in [Agudath Israel’s] synagogues every day.” Application in No. 20A90, at 4. Moreover, if reclassification occurs late in a week, as has happened in the past, there may not be time for applicants to seek and obtain relief from this Court before another Sabbath passes. Thirteen days have gone by since the Diocese filed its application, and Agudath Israel’s application was filed over a week ago. While we could presumably act more swiftly in the future, there is no guarantee that we could provide relief before another weekend passes. The applicants have made the showing needed to obtain relief, and there is no reason why they should bear the risk of suffering further irreparable harm in the event of another reclassification.

³ Recent changes were made on the following dates: Monday, November 23; Thursday, November 19; Wednesday, November 18; Wednesday, November 11; Monday, November 9; Friday, November 6; Wednesday, October 28; Wednesday, October 21.

For these reasons, we hold that enforcement of the Governor's severe restrictions on the applicants' religious services must be enjoined.

It is so ordered.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 20A87

ROMAN CATHOLIC DIOCESE OF BROOKLYN,
NEW YORK v. ANDREW M. CUOMO,
GOVERNOR OF NEW YORK

ON APPLICATION FOR INJUNCTIVE RELIEF

[November 25, 2020]

JUSTICE GORSUCH, concurring.

Government is not free to disregard the First Amendment in times of crisis. At a minimum, that Amendment prohibits government officials from treating religious exercises worse than comparable secular activities, unless they are pursuing a compelling interest and using the least restrictive means available. See Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. Hialeah, 508 U. S. 520, 546 (1993). Yet recently, during the COVID pandemic, certain States seem to have ignored these long-settled principles.

Today’s case supplies just the latest example. New York’s Governor has asserted the power to assign different color codes to different parts of the State and govern each by executive decree. In “red zones,” houses of worship are all but closed—limited to a maximum of 10 people. In the Orthodox Jewish community that limit might operate to exclude all women, considering 10 men are necessary to establish a minyan, or a quorum. In “orange zones,” it’s not much different. Churches and synagogues are limited to a maximum of 25 people. These restrictions apply even to the largest cathedrals and synagogues, which ordinarily hold hundreds. And the restrictions apply no matter the precautions taken, including social distancing, wearing masks, leaving doors and windows open, forgoing singing, and disinfecting spaces between services.

GORSUCH, J., concurring

At the same time, the Governor has chosen to impose no capacity restrictions on certain businesses he considers “essential.” And it turns out the businesses the Governor considers essential include hardware stores, acupuncturists, and liquor stores. Bicycle repair shops, certain signage companies, accountants, lawyers, and insurance agents are all essential too. So, at least according to the Governor, it may be unsafe to go to church, but it is always fine to pick up another bottle of wine, shop for a new bike, or spend the afternoon exploring your distal points and meridians. Who knew public health would so perfectly align with secular convenience?

As almost everyone on the Court today recognizes, squaring the Governor’s edicts with our traditional First Amendment rules is no easy task. People may gather inside for extended periods in bus stations and airports, in laundromats and banks, in hardware stores and liquor shops. No apparent reason exists why people may not gather, subject to identical restrictions, in churches or synagogues, especially when religious institutions have made plain that they stand ready, able, and willing to follow all the safety precautions required of “essential” businesses and perhaps more besides. The only explanation for treating religious places differently seems to be a judgment that what happens there just isn’t as “essential” as what happens in secular spaces. Indeed, the Governor is remarkably frank about this: In his judgment laundry and liquor, travel and tools, are all “essential” while traditional religious exercises are not. That is exactly the kind of discrimination the First Amendment forbids.

Nor is the problem an isolated one. In recent months, certain other Governors have issued similar edicts. At the flick of a pen, they have asserted the right to privilege restaurants, marijuana dispensaries, and casinos over churches, mosques, and temples. See Calvary Chapel Dayton Valley v. Sisolak, 591 U. S. ___, ___ (2020) (GORSUCH, J., dissenting). In far too many places, for far too long, our first freedom has fallen on deaf ears.

What could justify so radical a departure from the First Amendment's terms and long-settled rules about its application? Our colleagues offer two possible answers. Initially, some point to a solo concurrence in South Bay Pentecostal Church v. Newsom, 590 U. S. ____ (2020), in which THE CHIEF JUSTICE expressed willingness to defer to executive orders in the pandemic's early stages based on the newness of the emergency and how little was then known about the disease. Post, at 5 (opinion of BREYER, J.). At that time, COVID had been with us, in earnest, for just three months. Now, as we round out 2020 and face the prospect of entering a second calendar year living in the pandemic's shadow, that rationale has expired according to its own terms. Even if the Constitution has taken a holiday during this pandemic, it cannot become a sabbatical. Rather than apply a nonbinding and expired concurrence from South Bay, courts must resume applying the Free Exercise Clause. Today, a majority of the Court makes this plain.

Not only did the South Bay concurrence address different circumstances than we now face, that opinion was mistaken from the start. To justify its result, the concurrence reached back 100 years in the U. S. Reports to grab hold of our decision in Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U. S. 11 (1905). But Jacobson hardly supports cutting the Constitution loose during a pandemic. That decision involved an entirely different mode of analysis, an entirely different right, and an entirely different kind of restriction.

Start with the mode of analysis. Although Jacobson predated the modern tiers of scrutiny, this Court essentially applied rational basis review to Henning Jacobson's challenge to a state law that, in light of an ongoing smallpox pandemic, required individuals to take a vaccine, pay a $5 fine, or establish that they qualified for an exemption. Id., at 25 (asking whether the State’s scheme was “reasonable”); id., at 27 (same); id., at 28 (same). Rational basis review is the test this Court normally applies to Fourteenth Amendment challenges, so long as they do not involve suspect classifications based on race or some other ground, or a claim of fundamental right. Put differently, Jacobson didn’t seek to depart from normal legal rules during a pandemic, and it supplies no precedent for doing so. Instead, Jacobson applied what would become the traditional legal test associated with the right at issue—exactly what the Court does today. Here, that means strict scrutiny: The First Amendment traditionally requires a State to treat religious exercises at least as well as comparable secular activities unless it can meet the demands of strict scrutiny—showing it has employed the most narrowly tailored means available to satisfy a compelling state interest. Church of Lukumi, 508 U. S., at 546.

Next, consider the right asserted. Mr. Jacobson claimed that he possessed an implied “substantive due process” right to “bodily integrity” that emanated from the Fourteenth Amendment and allowed him to avoid not only the vaccine but also the $5 fine (about $140 today) and the need to show he qualified for an exemption. 197 U. S., at 13–14. This Court disagreed. But what does that have to do with our circumstances? Even if judges may impose emergency restrictions on rights that some of them have found hiding in the Constitution’s penumbras, it does not follow that the same fate should befall the textually explicit right to religious exercise.

Finally, consider the different nature of the restriction. In Jacobson, individuals could accept the vaccine, pay the fine, or identify a basis for exemption. Id., at 12, 14. The imposition on Mr. Jacobson’s claimed right to bodily integrity, thus, was avoidable and relatively modest. It easily survived rational basis review, and might even have survived strict scrutiny, given the opt-outs available to certain objectors. Id., at 36, 38–39. Here, by contrast, the State has effectively sought to ban all traditional forms of worship in affected “zones” whenever the Governor decrees and for as long as he chooses. Nothing in Jacobson purported to address, let alone approve, such serious and long-lasting intrusions into settled constitutional rights. In fact, Jacobson explained that the challenged law survived only because it did not “contravene the Constitution of the United States” or “infringe any right granted or secured by that instrument.” Id., at 25.

Tellingly no Justice now disputes any of these points. Nor does any Justice seek to explain why anything other than our usual constitutional standards should apply during the current pandemic. In fact, today the author of the South Bay concurrence even downplays the relevance of Jacobson for cases like the one before us. Post, at 2 (opinion of ROBERTS, C. J.). All this is surely a welcome development. But it would require a serious rewriting of history to suggest, as THE CHIEF JUSTICE does, that the South Bay concurrence never really relied in significant measure on Jacobson. That was the first case South Bay cited on the substantive legal question before the Court, it was the only case cited involving a pandemic, and many lower courts quite understandably read its invocation as inviting them to slacken their enforcement of constitutional liberties while COVID lingers. See, e.g., Elim Romanian Pentecostal Church v. Pritzker, 962 F. 3d 341, 347 (CA7 2020); Legacy Church, Inc. v. Kunkel, ___ F. Supp. 3d ___, ___ (NM 2020).

Why have some mistaken this Court’s modest decision in Jacobson for a towering authority that overshadows the Constitution during a pandemic? In the end, I can only surmise that much of the answer lies in a particular judicial impulse to stay out of the way in times of crisis. But if that impulse may be understandable or even admirable in other circumstances, we may not shelter in place when the Constitution is under attack. Things never go well when we do.

That leaves my colleagues to their second line of argument. Maybe precedent does not support the Governor's actions. Maybe those actions do violate the Constitution. But, they say, we should stay our hand all the same. Even if the churches and synagogues before us have been subject to unconstitutional restrictions for months, it is no matter because, just the other day, the Governor changed his color code for Brooklyn and Queens where the plaintiffs are located. Now those regions are "yellow zones" and the challenged restrictions on worship associated with "orange" and "red zones" do not apply. So, the reasoning goes, we should send the plaintiffs home with an invitation to return later if need be.

To my mind, this reply only advances the case for intervention. It has taken weeks for the plaintiffs to work their way through the judicial system and bring their case to us. During all this time, they were subject to unconstitutional restrictions. Now, just as this Court was preparing to act on their applications, the Governor loosened his restrictions, all while continuing to assert the power to tighten them again anytime as conditions warrant. So if we dismissed this case, nothing would prevent the Governor from reinstating the challenged restrictions tomorrow. And by the time a new challenge might work its way to us, he could just change them again. The Governor has fought this case at every step of the way. To turn away religious leaders bringing meritorious claims just because the Governor decided to hit the "off" switch in the shadow of our review would be, in my view, just another sacrifice of fundamental rights in the name of judicial modesty.

Even our dissenting colleagues do not suggest this case is moot or otherwise outside our power to decide. They counsel delay only because “the disease-related circumstances [are] rapidly changing.” Post, at 5 (opinion of BREYER, J.). But look at what those “rapidly changing” circumstances suggest. Both Governor Cuomo and Mayor de Blasio have “indicated it’s only a matter of time before [all] five boroughs” of New York City are flipped from yellow to orange. J. Skolnik, D. Goldiner, & D. Slattery, Staten Island Goes ‘Orange’ As Cuomo Urges Coronavirus ‘Reality Check’ Ahead of Thanksgiving, N. Y. Daily News (Nov. 23, 2020), <https://www.nydailynews.com/coronavirus/ny-coronavirus-cuomo-thanksgiving-20201123-yyhxfo3kzbdinbfbsqos3tvrku-story-html>. On anyone’s account, then, it seems inevitable this dispute will require the Court’s attention.

It is easy enough to say it would be a small thing to require the parties to “refile their applications” later. Post, at 3 (opinion of BREYER, J.). But none of us are rabbis wondering whether future services will be disrupted as the High Holy Days were, or priests preparing for Christmas. Nor may we discount the burden on the faithful who have lived for months under New York’s unconstitutional regime unable to attend religious services. Whether this Court could decide a renewed application promptly is beside the point. The parties before us have already shown their entitlement to relief. Saying so now will establish clear legal rules and enable both sides to put their energy to productive use, rather than devoting it to endless emergency litigation. Saying so now will dispel, as well, misconceptions about the role of the Constitution in times of crisis, which have already been permitted to persist for too long.

It is time—past time—to make plain that, while the pandemic poses many grave challenges, there is no world in which the Constitution tolerates color-coded executive edicts that reopen liquor stores and bike shops but shutter churches, synagogues, and mosques.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

ROMAN CATHOLIC DIOCESE OF BROOKLYN,
NEW YORK v. ANDREW M. CUOMO,
GOVERNOR OF NEW YORK

ON APPLICATION FOR INJUNCTIVE RELIEF

[November 25, 2020]

JUSTICE KAVANAUGH, concurring.

I vote to grant the applications of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Brooklyn and Agudath Israel of America for temporary injunctions against New York’s 10-person and 25-person caps on attendance at religious services. On this record, temporary injunctions are warranted because New York’s severe caps on attendance at religious services likely violate the First Amendment. Importantly, the Court’s orders today are not final decisions on the merits. Instead, the Court simply grants temporary injunctive relief until the Court of Appeals in December, and then this Court as appropriate, can more fully consider the merits.

To begin with, New York’s 10-person and 25-person caps on attendance at religious services in red and orange zones (which are areas where COVID–19 is more prevalent) are much more severe than most other States’ restrictions, including the California and Nevada limits at issue in South Bay United Pentecostal Church v. Newsom, 590 U. S. ____ (2020), and Calvary Chapel Dayton Valley v. Sisolak, 591 U. S. ____ (2020). In South Bay, houses of worship were limited to 100 people (or, in buildings with capacity of under 400, to 25% of capacity). And in Calvary, houses of worship were limited to 50 people.

New York has gone much further. In New York’s red zones, most houses of worship are limited to 10 people; in orange zones, most houses of worship are limited to 25 people. Those strict and inflexible numerical caps apply even to large churches and synagogues that ordinarily can hold hundreds of people and that, with social distancing and mask requirements, could still easily hold far more than 10 or 25 people.

Moreover, New York's restrictions on houses of worship not only are severe, but also are discriminatory. In red and orange zones, houses of worship must adhere to numerical caps of 10 and 25 people, respectively, but those caps do not apply to some secular buildings in the same neighborhoods. In a red zone, for example, a church or synagogue must adhere to a 10-person attendance cap, while a grocery store, pet store, or big-box store down the street does not face the same restriction. In an orange zone, the discrimination against religion is even starker: Essential businesses and many non-essential businesses are subject to no attendance caps at all.

The State's discrimination against religion raises a serious First Amendment issue and triggers heightened scrutiny, requiring the State to provide a sufficient justification for the discrimination. See Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. Hialeah, 508 U. S. 520, 537–538 (1993); Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Ore. v. Smith, 494 U. S. 872, 884 (1990). But New York has not sufficiently justified treating houses of worship more severely than secular businesses.

The State argues that it has not impermissibly discriminated against religion because some secular businesses such as movie theaters must remain closed and are thus treated less favorably than houses of worship. But under this Court's precedents, it does not suffice for a State to point out that, as compared to houses of worship, some secular businesses are subject to similarly severe or even more severe restrictions. See Lukumi, 508 U. S., at 537–538; Smith, 494 U. S., at 884; see also Calvary, 591 U. S., at ___ (KAVANAUGH, J., dissenting from denial of application for injunctive relief) (slip op., at 7). Rather, once a State creates a favored class of businesses, as New York has done in this case, the State must justify why houses of worship are excluded from that favored class. Here, therefore, the State must justify imposing a 10-person or 25-person limit on houses of worship but not on favored secular businesses. See Lukumi, 508 U. S., at 537–538; Smith, 494 U. S., at 884. The State has not done so.

To be clear, the COVID–19 pandemic remains extraordinarily serious and deadly. And at least until vaccines are readily available, the situation may get worse in many parts of the United States. The Constitution “principally entrusts the safety and the health of the people to the politically accountable officials of the States.” South Bay, 590 U. S., at ____ (ROBERTS, C. J., concurring in denial of application for injunctive relief) (slip op., at 2) (internal quotation marks and alteration omitted). Federal courts therefore must afford substantial deference to state and local authorities about how best to balance competing policy considerations during the pandemic. See ibid. But judicial deference in an emergency or a crisis does not mean wholesale judicial abdication, especially when important questions of religious discrimination, racial discrimination, free speech, or the like are raised.

In light of the devastating pandemic, I do not doubt the State’s authority to impose tailored restrictions—even very strict restrictions—on attendance at religious services and secular gatherings alike. But the New York restrictions on houses of worship are not tailored to the circumstances given the First Amendment interests at stake. To reiterate, New York’s restrictions on houses of worship are much more severe than the California and Nevada restrictions at issue in South Bay and Calvary, and much more severe than the restrictions that most other States are imposing on attendance at religious services. And New York's restrictions discriminate against religion by treating houses of worship significantly worse than some secular businesses.

For those reasons, I agree with THE CHIEF JUSTICE that New York's "[n]umerical capacity limits of 10 and 25 people . . . seem unduly restrictive" and that "it may well be that such restrictions violate the Free Exercise Clause." Post, at 1. I part ways with THE CHIEF JUSTICE on a narrow procedural point regarding the timing of the injunctions. THE CHIEF JUSTICE would not issue injunctions at this time. As he notes, the State made a change in designations a few days ago, and now none of the churches and synagogues who are applicants in these cases are located in red or orange zones. As I understand it, THE CHIEF JUSTICE would not issue an injunction unless and until a house of worship applies for an injunction and is still in a red or orange zone on the day that the injunction is finally issued. But the State has not withdrawn or amended the relevant Executive Order. And the State does not suggest that the applicants lack standing to challenge the red-zone and orange-zone caps imposed by the Executive Order, or that these cases are moot or not ripe. In other words, the State does not deny that the applicants face an imminent injury today. In particular, the State does not deny that some houses of worship, including the applicants here, are located in areas that likely will be classified as red or orange zones in the very near future. I therefore see no jurisdictional or prudential barriers to issuing the injunctions now.

There also is no good reason to delay issuance of the injunctions, as I see it. If no houses of worship end up in red or orange zones, then the Court's injunctions today will impose no harm on the State and have no effect on the State's response to COVID-19. And if houses of worship end up in red or orange zones, as is likely, then today's injunctions will ensure that religious organizations are not subjected to the unconstitutional 10-person and 25-person caps. Moreover, issuing the injunctions now rather than a few days from now not only will ensure that the applicants' constitutional rights are protected, but also will provide some needed clarity for the State and religious organizations.

On this record, the applicants have shown: a likelihood that the Court would grant certiorari and reverse; irreparable harm; and that the equities favor injunctive relief. I therefore vote to grant the applications for temporary injunctive relief until the Court of Appeals in December, and then this Court as appropriate, can more fully consider the merits.

ROBERTS, C. J., dissenting

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 20A87

ROMAN CATHOLIC DIOCESE OF BROOKLYN,
NEW YORK v. ANDREW M. CUOMO,
GOVERNOR OF NEW YORK

ON APPLICATION FOR INJUNCTIVE RELIEF

[November 25, 2020]

CHIEF JUSTICE ROBERTS, dissenting.

I would not grant injunctive relief under the present circumstances. There is simply no need to do so. After the Diocese and Agudath Israel filed their applications, the Governor revised the designations of the affected areas. None of the houses of worship identified in the applications is now subject to any fixed numerical restrictions. At these locations, the applicants can hold services with up to 50% of capacity, which is at least as favorable as the relief they currently seek.

Numerical capacity limits of 10 and 25 people, depending on the applicable zone, do seem unduly restrictive. And it may well be that such restrictions violate the Free Exercise Clause. It is not necessary, however, for us to rule on that serious and difficult question at this time. The Governor might reinstate the restrictions. But he also might not. And it is a significant matter to override determinations made by public health officials concerning what is necessary for public safety in the midst of a deadly pandemic. If the Governor does reinstate the numerical restrictions the applicants can return to this Court, and we could act quickly on their renewed applications. As things now stand, however, the applicants have not demonstrated their entitlement to “the extraordinary remedy of injunction.”

ROBERTS, C. J., dissenting

Nken v. Holder, 556 U. S. 418, 428 (2009) (internal quotation marks omitted). An order telling the Governor not to do what he’s not doing fails to meet that stringent standard.

As noted, the challenged restrictions raise serious concerns under the Constitution, and I agree with JUSTICE KAVANAUGH that they are distinguishable from those we considered in South Bay United Pentecostal Church v. Newsom, 590 U. S. ___ (2020), and Calvary Chapel Dayton Valley v. Sisolak, 591 U. S. ___ (2020). See ante, at 1, 3–4 (concurring opinion). I take a different approach than the other dissenting Justices in this respect.

To be clear, I do not regard my dissenting colleagues as “cutting the Constitution loose during a pandemic,” yielding to “a particular judicial impulse to stay out of the way in times of crisis,” or “shelter[ing] in place when the Constitution is under attack.” Ante, at 3, 5–6 (opinion of GORSUCH, J.). They simply view the matter differently after careful study and analysis reflecting their best efforts to fulfill their responsibility under the Constitution.

One solo concurrence today takes aim at my concurring opinion in South Bay. See ante, at 3–6 (opinion of GORSUCH, J.). Today’s concurrence views that opinion with disfavor because “[t]o justify its result, [it] reached back 100 years in the U. S. Reports to grab hold of our decision in Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U. S. 11 (1905).” Ante, at 3. Today’s concurrence notes that Jacobson “was the first case South Bay cited on the substantive legal question before the Court,” and “it was the only case cited involving a pandemic.” Ante, at 5. And it suggests that, in the wake of South Bay, some have “mistaken this Court’s modest decision in Jacobson for a towering authority that overshadows the Constitution during a pandemic.” Ibid. But while Jacobson occupies three pages of today’s concurrence, it warranted exactly one sentence in South Bay. What did that one sentence say? Only that “[o]ur Constitution principally entrusts [t]he safety and the health of the people’ to the politically accountable officials of the States ‘to guard and protect.’” South Bay, 590 U. S., at ____ (ROBERTS, C. J., concurring) (quoting Jacobson, 197 U. S., at 38). It is not clear which part of this lone quotation today’s concurrence finds so discomfiting. The concurrence speculates that there is so much more to the sentence than meets the eye, invoking—among other interpretive tools—the new “first case cited” rule. But the actual proposition asserted should be uncontroversial, and the concurrence must reach beyond the words themselves to find the target it is looking for.

BREYER, J., dissenting

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 20A87

ROMAN CATHOLIC DIOCESE OF BROOKLYN,
NEW YORK v. ANDREW M. CUOMO,
GOVERNOR OF NEW YORK

ON APPLICATION FOR INJUNCTIVE RELIEF

[November 25, 2020]

JUSTICE BREYER, with whom JUSTICE SOTOMAYOR and JUSTICE KAGAN join, dissenting.

New York regulations designed to fight the rapidly spreading—and, in many cases, fatal—COVID–19 virus permit the Governor to identify hot spots where infection rates have spiked and to designate those hot spots as red zones, the immediately surrounding areas as orange zones, and the outlying areas as yellow zones. Brief in Opposition in No. 20A87, p. 12. The regulations impose restrictions within these zones (with the strictest restrictions in the red zones and the least strict restrictions in the yellow zones) to curb transmission of the virus and prevent spread into nearby areas. Ibid. In October, the Governor designated red, orange, and yellow zones in parts of Brooklyn and Queens. Brief in Opposition in Agudath Israel of America v. Cuomo, O. T. 2020, No. 20A90, pp. 10–11 (Brief in Opposition in No. 20A90). Among other things, the restrictions in these zones limit the number of persons who can be present at one time at a gathering in a house of worship to: the lesser of 10 people or 25% of maximum capacity in a red zone; the lesser of 25 people or 33% of maximum capacity in an orange zone; and 50% of maximum capacity in a yellow zone. Id., at 8–9.

Both the Roman Catholic Diocese of Brooklyn and Agudath Israel of America (together with Agudath Israel of Kew Garden Hills and its employee and Agudath Israel of Madison and its rabbi) brought lawsuits against the Governor of New York. They claimed that the fixed-capacity restrictions of 10 people in red zones and 25 people in orange zones were too strict—to the point where they violated the First Amendment’s protection of the free exercise of religion. Both parties asked a Federal District Court for a preliminary injunction that would prohibit the State from enforcing these red and orange zone restrictions.

BREYER, J., dissenting

After receiving evidence and hearing witness testimony, the District Court in the Diocese’s case found that New York’s regulations were “crafted based on science and for epidemiological purposes.” ___ F. Supp. 3d ___, ___, 2020 WL 6120167, *10 (EDNY, Oct. 16, 2020). It wrote that they treated “religious gatherings . . . more favorably than similar gatherings” with comparable risks, such as “public lectures, concerts or theatrical performances.” Id., at *9. The court also recognized the Diocese’s argument that the regulations treated religious gatherings less favorably than what the State has called “essential businesses,” including, for example, grocery stores and banks. Ibid. But the court found these essential businesses to be distinguishable from religious services and declined to “second guess the State’s judgment about what should qualify as an essential business.” Ibid. The District Court denied the motion for a preliminary injunction. The Diocese appealed, and the District Court declined to issue an emergency injunction pending that appeal. The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit also denied the Diocese’s request for an emergency injunction pending appeal, but it called for expedited briefing and scheduled a full hearing on December 18 to address the merits of the appeal. This Court, unlike the lower courts, has now decided to issue an injunction that would prohibit the State from enforcing its fixed-capacity restrictions on houses of worship in red and orange zones while the parties await the Second Circuit’s decision. I cannot agree with that decision.

For one thing, there is no need now to issue any such injunction. Those parts of Brooklyn and Queens where the Diocese’s churches and the two applicant synagogues are located are no longer within red or orange zones. Brief in Opposition in No. 20A90, at 17. Thus, none of the applicants are now subject to the fixed-capacity restrictions that they challenge in their applications. The specific applicant houses of worship are now in yellow zones where they can hold services up to 50% of maximum capacity. And the applicants do not challenge any yellow zone restrictions, as the conditions in the yellow zone provide them with more than the relief they asked for in their applications.

Instead, the applicants point out that the State might reimpose the red or orange zone restrictions in the future. But, were that to occur, they could refile their applications here, by letter brief if necessary. And this Court, if necessary, could then decide the matter in a day or two, perhaps even in a few hours. Why should this Court act now without argument or full consideration in the ordinary course (and prior to the Court of Appeals’ consideration of the matter) when there is no legal or practical need for it to do so? I have found no convincing answer to that question.

For another thing, the Court’s decision runs contrary to ordinary governing law. We have previously said that an injunction is an “extraordinary remedy.” Nken v. Holder, 556 U. S. 418, 428 (2009) (internal quotation marks omitted). That is especially so where, as here, the applicants seek an injunction prior to full argument and contrary to the lower courts’ determination. Here, we consider severe restrictions. Those restrictions limit the number of persons who can attend a religious service to 10 and 25 congregants (irrespective of mask-wearing and social distancing). And those numbers are indeed low. But whether, in present circumstances, those low numbers violate the Constitution’s Free Exercise Clause is far from clear, and, in my view, the applicants must make such a showing here to show that they are entitled to “the extraordinary remedy of injunction.” Ibid. (internal quotation marks omitted).

COVID–19 has infected more than 12 million Americans and caused more than 250,000 deaths nationwide. At least 26,000 of those deaths have occurred in the State of New York, with 16,000 in New York City alone. And the number of COVID–19 cases is many times the number of deaths. The Nation is now experiencing a second surge of infections. In New York, for example, the 7-day average of new confirmed cases per day has risen from around 700 at the end of the summer to over 4,800 last week. Nationwide, the number of new confirmed cases per day is now higher than it has ever been. Brief in Opposition in No. 20A87, at 1; COVID in the U. S.: Latest Map and Case Count (Nov. 24, 2020), <http://www.nytimes.com/interactive/2020/us/coronavirus-us-cases.html#states>; New York COVID Map and Case Count (Nov. 24, 2020), <http://www.nytimes.com/interactive/2020/us/new-york-coronavirus-cases.html>.

At the same time, members of the scientific and medical communities tell us that the virus is transmitted from person to person through respiratory droplets produced when a person or group of people talk, sing, cough, or breathe near each other. Brief in Opposition in No. 20A87, at 3 (citing the World Health Organization); Brief of the American Medical Association as Amici Curiae 5–6. Thus, according to experts, the risk of transmission is higher when people are in close contact with one another for prolonged periods of time, particularly indoors or in other enclosed spaces. Id., at 3–6. The nature of the epidemic, the spikes, the uncertainties, and the need for quick action, taken together, mean that the State has countervailing arguments based upon health, safety, and administrative considerations that must be balanced against the applicants’ First Amendment challenges. That fact, along with others that JUSTICE SOTOMAYOR describes, means that the applicants’ claim of a constitutional violation (on which they base their request for injunctive relief) is far from clear. See post, p. 1 (dissenting opinion). (All of these matters could be considered and discussed in the ordinary course of proceedings at a later date.) At the same time, the public’s serious health and safety needs, which call for swift government action in ever changing circumstances, also mean that it is far from clear that “the balance of equities tips in [the applicants] favor,” or “that an injunction is in the public interest.” Winter v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc., 555 U. S. 7, 20 (2008).

Relevant precedent suggests the same. We have previously recognized that courts must grant elected officials “broad” discretion when they “undertake to act in areas fraught with medical and scientific uncertainties.” South Bay United Pentecostal Church v. Newsom, 590 U. S. ____, ____ (2020) (ROBERTS, C. J., concurring) (slip op., at 2) (alteration omitted). That is because the “Constitution principally entrusts the safety and the health of the people to the politically accountable officials of the States.” Ibid. (alterations and internal quotation marks omitted). The elected branches of state and national governments can marshal scientific expertise and craft specific policies in response to “changing facts on the ground.” Id., at 3. And they can do so more quickly than can courts. That is particularly true of a court, such as this Court, which does not conduct evidentiary hearings. It is true even more so where, as here, the need for action is immediate, the information likely limited, the making of exceptions difficult, and the disease-related circumstances rapidly changing.

I add that, in my view, the Court of Appeals will, and should, act expeditiously. The State of New York will, and should, seek ways of appropriately recognizing the religious interests here at issue without risking harm to the health and safety of the people of New York. But I see no practical need to issue an injunction to achieve these objectives. Rather, as I said, I can find no need for an immediate injunction. I believe that, under existing law, it ought not to issue. And I dissent from the Court's decision to the contrary.

SOTOMAYOR, J., dissenting

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 20A87

ROMAN CATHOLIC DIOCESE OF BROOKLYN,
NEW YORK v. ANDREW M. CUOMO,
GOVERNOR OF NEW YORK

ON APPLICATION FOR INJUNCTIVE RELIEF

[November 25, 2020]

JUSTICE SOTOMAYOR, with whom JUSTICE KAGAN joins, dissenting.

Amidst a pandemic that has already claimed over a quarter million American lives, the Court today enjoins one of New York’s public health measures aimed at containing the spread of COVID–19 in areas facing the most severe outbreaks. Earlier this year, this Court twice stayed its hand when asked to issue similar extraordinary relief. See South Bay United Pentecostal Church v. Newsom, 590 U. S. ____ (2020); Calvary Chapel Dayton Valley v. Sisolak, 591 U. S. ____ (2020). I see no justification for the Court’s change of heart, and I fear that granting applications such as the one filed by the Roman Catholic Diocese of Brooklyn (Diocese) will only exacerbate the Nation’s suffering.¹

South Bay and Calvary Chapel provided a clear and workable rule to state officials seeking to control the spread of COVID–19: They may restrict attendance at houses of ¹Ironically, due to the success of New York’s public health measures, the Diocese is no longer subject to the numerical caps on attendance it seeks to enjoin. See Brief in Opposition in Agudath Israel of America v. Cuomo, No. 20A90, p. 17. Yet the Court grants this application to ensure that, should infection rates rise once again, the Governor will be unable to reimplement the very measures that have proven so successful at allowing the free (and comparatively safe) exercise of religion in New York.

SOTOMAYOR, J., dissenting

worship so long as comparable secular institutions face restrictions that are at least equally as strict. See South Bay, 590 U. S., at ___ (ROBERTS, C. J., concurring) (slip op., at 2). New York’s safety measures fall comfortably within those bounds. Like the States in South Bay and Calvary Chapel, New York applies “[s]imilar or more severe restrictions . . . to comparable secular gatherings, including lectures, concerts, movie showings, spectator sports, and theatrical performances, where large groups of people gather in close proximity for extended periods of time.” Ibid. Likewise, New York “treats more leniently only dissimilar activities, such as operating grocery stores, banks, and laundromats, in which people neither congregate in large groups nor remain in close proximity for extended periods.” Ibid. That should be enough to decide this case.

The Diocese attempts to get around South Bay and Calvary Chapel by disputing New York’s conclusion that attending religious services poses greater risks than, for instance, shopping at big box stores. Application in No. 20A87, p. 23 (Application). But the District Court rejected that argument as unsupported by the factual record. ___, F. Supp. 3d ___, ___–___, 2020 WL 6120167, *8–*9 (EDNY, Oct. 16, 2020). Undeterred, JUSTICE GORSUCH offers up his own examples of secular activities he thinks might pose similar risks as religious gatherings, but which are treated more leniently under New York’s rules (e.g., going to the liquor store or getting a bike repaired). Ante, at 2 (concurring opinion). But JUSTICE GORSUCH does not even try to square his examples with the conditions medical experts tell us facilitate the spread of COVID–19: large groups of people gathering, speaking, and singing in close proximity indoors for extended periods of time. See App. to Brief in Opposition in No. 20A87, pp. 46–51 (declaration of Debra S. Blog, Director of the Div. of Epidemiology, NY Dept. of Health); Brief for the American Medical Association et al.

as Amicus Curiae 3–6 (Brief for AMA). Unlike religious services, which “have every one of th[ose] risk factors,” Brief for AMA 6, bike repair shops and liquor stores generally do not feature customers gathering inside to sing and speak together for an hour or more at a time. Id., at 7 (“Epidemiologists and physicians generally agree that religious services are among the riskiest activities”). Justices of this Court play a deadly game in second guessing the expert judgment of health officials about the environments in which a contagious virus, now infecting a million Americans each week, spreads most easily.

In truth, this case is easier than South Bay and Calvary Chapel. While the state regulations in those cases generally applied the same rules to houses of worship and secular institutions where people congregate in large groups, New York treats houses of worship far more favorably than their secular comparators. Compare, e.g., Calvary Chapel, 591 U. S., at ____ (KAVANAUGH, J., dissenting) (slip op., at 8) (noting that Nevada subjected movie theaters and houses of worship alike to a 50-person cap) with App. to Brief in Opposition in No. 20A87, p. 53 (requiring movie theaters, concert venues, and sporting arenas subject to New York’s regulation to close entirely, but allowing houses of worship to open subject to capacity restrictions). And whereas the restrictions in South Bay and Calvary Chapel applied statewide, New York’s fixed-capacity restrictions apply only in specially designated areas experiencing a surge in COVID–19 cases.

The Diocese suggests that, because New York’s regulation singles out houses of worship by name, it cannot be neutral with respect to the practice of religion. Application 22. Thus, the argument goes, the regulation must, ipso facto, be subject to strict scrutiny. It is true that New York’s policy refers to religion on its face. But as I have just explained, that is because the policy singles out religious institutions for preferential treatment in comparison to secular gatherings, not because it discriminates against them. Surely the Diocese cannot demand laxer restrictions by pointing out that it is already being treated better than comparable secular institutions.²

Finally, the Diocese points to certain statements by Governor Cuomo as evidence that New York’s regulation is impermissibly targeted at religious activity—specifically, at combatting heightened rates of positive COVID–19 cases among New York’s Orthodox Jewish community. Application 24. The Diocese suggests that these comments supply “an independent basis for the application of strict scrutiny.” Reply Brief in No. 20A87, p. 9. I do not see how. The Governor’s comments simply do not warrant an application of strict scrutiny under this Court’s precedents. Just a few Terms ago, this Court declined to apply heightened scrutiny to a Presidential Proclamation limiting immigration from Muslim-majority countries, even though President Trump had described the Proclamation as a “Muslim Ban,” originally conceived of as a “total and complete shutdown of Muslims entering the United States until our country’s representatives can figure out what is going on.” Trump v. Hawaii, 585 U. S. ___, ___ (2018) (slip op., at 27). If the ²JUSTICE KAVANAUGH cites Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. Hialeah, 508 U. S. 520, 537–538 (1993), and Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Ore. v. Smith, 494 U. S. 872, 884 (1990), for the proposition that states must justify treating even noncomparable secular institutions more favorably than houses of worship. Ante, at 2 (concurring opinion). But those cases created no such rule. Lukumi struck down a law that allowed animals to be killed for almost any purpose other than animal sacrifice, on the ground that the law was a “religious gerrymander” targeted at the Santeria faith. 508 U. S., at 535. Smith is even farther afield, standing for the entirely inapposite proposition that “the right of free exercise does not relieve an individual of the obligation to comply with a valid and neutral law of general applicability on the ground that the law proscribes (or prescribes) conduct that his religion prescribes (or proscribes).” 494 U. S., at 879 (internal quotation marks omitted).

SOTOMAYOR, J., dissenting

President’s statements did not show “that the challenged restrictions violate the ‘minimum requirement of neutrality’ to religion,” ante, at 2 (quoting Lukumi, 508 U. S., at 533), it is hard to see how Governor Cuomo’s do.

Free religious exercise is one of our most treasured and jealously guarded constitutional rights. States may not discriminate against religious institutions, even when faced with a crisis as deadly as this one. But those principles are not at stake today. The Constitution does not forbid States from responding to public health crises through regulations that treat religious institutions equally or more favorably than comparable secular institutions, particularly when those regulations save lives. Because New York’s COVID–19 restrictions do just that, I respectfully dissent.

The Attorney General of Canada (Defendant), Appellant; and Inuit Tapirisat of Canada and the National Anti-poverty Organization (Plaintiffs), Respondents.

ON APPEAL FROM THE FEDERAL COURT OF APPEAL

Case Summary

Administrative law — Decision of CRTC — Review by Governor in Council — Rules of natural justice and duty of fairness — Whether Governor in Council subject to judicial review National Transportation Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. N-17 as amended, s. 64 — Railway Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. R-2 as amended, ss. 320, 321(1) — Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. I-23, s. 28.

After the approval by the CRTC of a new rate structure for Bell Canada, the plaintiffs-respondents appealed the CRTC decision to the Governor General in Council pursuant to s. 64(1) of the National Transportation Act. Their petitions having been denied, the respondents attacked the decisions of the Governor General in Council alleging that they had not been given a hearing in accordance with the principles of natural justice. This appeal arises from an application made in the Trial Division of the Federal Court for an order striking out the plaintiffs' statement of claim on the ground that the statement disclosed "no reasonable cause of action". The application was granted but the Federal Court of Appeal set aside the order of the Trial Division judge. Hence the appeal to this Court.

Held: The appeal should be allowed.

The substance of the question before this Court in this appeal is whether there is a duty to observe natural justice in, or at least a duty of fairness incumbent on, the Governor in Council in dealing with parties such as the respondents. upon their submission of a petition under s. 64(1) of the National Transportation Act.

Such petitions are to be contrasted with the mechanism for appeal to the Federal Court of Appeal on questions of law or jurisdiction provided in subs. (2) and following of s. 64. The courts have held that the rules of natural justice and the duty to act fairly depend on the circumstances of the case, the nature of the inquiry or investigation, the subject matter that is being dealt with, the consequences on the persons affected and so forth. The mere fact that a decision is made pursuant to a statutory power vested in the Governor in Council does not mean that it is beyond review if the latter fails to observe a condition precedent to the exercise of that power, whether such power is classified as administrative or quasi-judicial. However in this case, there is no failure to observe a condition precedent but rather the attack is directed at procedures adopted by the Governor in Council, once validly seized of the respondents' petitions. The very nature of the Governor in Council must be taken into account in assessing the technique of review which he adopted. The executive branch cannot be deprived of the right to resort to its staff, departmental personnel and ministerial members concerned with the various policy issues raised by a petition.

Under s. 64(1), the Governor in Council is not limited to varying orders made inter partes but he may act "of his motion"; he may act "at any time"; he may vary or rescind any order, decision, rule or regulation "in his discretion". Parliament has in s. 64(1) not burdened the Governor in Council with any standards or guidelines in the exercise of its rate review function. Nor were procedural standards imposed or even implied. The discretion of the Governor in Council is complete provided he observes the jurisdictional boundaries of s. 64(1). Furthermore there is no need for the Governor in Council to give reasons for his decision, to hold any kind of hearing, or even to acknowledge the receipt of a petition. Where the executive branch has been assigned a function performable in the past by the Legislature itself and where the res or subject matter is not an individual concern, considerations different from Nicholson v. Haldimand-Norfolk Regional Board of Commissioners of Police, [1979] 1 S.C.R. 311, arise. In such a circumstance the Court must fall back upon the basic jurisdictional supervisory role and in so doing construe the statute to determine whether the Governor in Council has performed its functions within the boundary of the parliamentary grant and in accordance with the terms of the parliamentary mandate.

Further, there is nothing in s. 64(1) to justify a variable yardstick for the application to that section of the principle of fairness according to the source of the information placed before the Governor in Council. Once the proper construction of the section is determined, it applies consistently throughout the proceedings before the Governor in Council.

ESTEY J.

ESTEY J.— This appeal relates to the proper disposition of an application made in the Trial Division of the Federal Court of Canada for an order pursuant to the rules of that Court striking out the statement of claim and dismissing this action on the grounds that the statement of claim discloses "no reasonable cause of action". Mr. Justice Marceau of the Trial Division of the Federal Court allowed the application, struck out the statement of claim, and dismissed the action. The Federal Court of Appeal set aside the order of the Trial Division although in doing so found that there was no basis for the relief sought in the statement of claim except with regard to one issue to which I will make reference later. The effect, therefore, of the disposition below is that if left undisturbed, the matter would go to trial on the basis of the pleadings as they now stand.

A brief outline of events leading up to these proceedings will be helpful. The Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (herein for brevity referred to as the CRTC), in response to an application from Bell Canada, conducted lengthy hearings concerning a proposed increase in telephone rates to be charged to subscribers in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec and in the Northwest Territories. The plaintiffs/respondents participated in these hearings as intervenants throughout. In conducting these proceedings, the CRTC was proceeding under authority provided in the Railway Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. R-2 as amended, the National Transportation Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. N-17 as amended, and the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications

Canada (Attorney General) v. Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, [1980] 2 S.C.R. 735

Commission Act, S.C. 1974-75-76, c. 49. We are not here concerned with the actual proceedings before the CRTC. The balance of the narrative can best be set out by quoting from the statement of claim which, because this is an application for dismissal, must be taken as proved.

5. On June 1st, 1977 the CRTC issued its decision in the matter, which decision denied some of the relief sought by each of the plaintiffs.
6. On June 10th, 1977 ITC [a respondent herein] appealed the decision of the CRTC to the Governor-in-Council pursuant to section 64 of the National Transportation Act, requesting the Governor-in-Council to set aside the relevant portion of the decision of the CRTC and to substitute its own order therefor. On June 29th, 1977 Bell Canada issued a reply thereto. While ITC was preparing its final reply to the reply of Bell Canada, the Governor-in-Council decided the appeal adversely to ITC. On July 14th, 1977 Order-in-Council P.C. 1977-2027 was made. ITC's final reply was never submitted.
7. On June 9th, 1977 NAPO [a respondent herein] also appealed the decision of the CRTC to the Governor-in-Council pursuant to section 64 of the National Transportation Act, to which Bell Canada prepared a reply dated June 29th, 1977. The Governor-in-Council decided this appeal adversely to NAPO without waiting to receive the final reply of NAPO. On July 14th, 1977 Order-in-Council P.C. 1977-2026 was made. NAPO's final reply was never submitted.
8. In arriving at its decision the Governor-in-Council, following customary practice, allowed no oral presentation but conducted the hearing entirely in writing. However, following the usual practice, the actual written submissions of the parties were not presented to the members of the Governor-in-Council but rather, evidence and opinions were obtained from officials of the Department of Communications as to:
 - a) What that Department thought were the positions of the parties in the appeal;
 - b) The position of the Department, or certain officials thereof, in relation to the facts and issues in the appeal;
 - c) Whether either or both of the appeals should be allowed. None of this evidence or these opinions have ever been communicated to the appellants (plaintiffs herein).
9. The CRTC was requested by the Governor-in-Council to submit its views as to the disposition of the appeals. These views of the CRTC were neither made available to the appellants (plaintiffs herein) by the CRTC itself, nor by the Governor-in-Council.
10. The Minister of Communications, at the meeting of the Governor-in-Council at which the appeals were decided, both participated in the making of the decisions and submitted to the meeting her recommendation that the decision be that the appeals be disallowed, together with evidence and argument in support of this recommendation. The submissions of the Minister were a conduit for, were based upon, or at least included evidence, opinions and recommendations from the CRTC and from officials of her Department. Neither the content of these opinions and recommendations nor of any evidence or argument submitted in support thereof has ever been communicated to the appellants (plaintiffs herein), and hence the plaintiffs have been denied an opportunity to make a reply thereto; yet the two decisions and the resultant Orders-in-Council were made on the basis of the submissions of the Minister.
11. The plaintiffs submit that the defendant Governor-in-Council, when deciding a matter on a petition pursuant to section 64 of the National Transportation Act, is a Federal Board, Commission or other tribunal within the meaning of section 18 of the Federal Court Act.
12. The plaintiffs submit that the defendant Governor-in-Council was required to decide these appeals himself and to reach these decisions by means of a procedure which is fair and in accordance with the principles of natural justice.
13. The plaintiffs submit that in the circumstances, the Governor-in-Council held no hearing in any meaningful sense of that word, and that, therefore, the decisions and Orders-in-Council made pursuant to them are nullities, Alternatively, it is submitted that if there was a hearing, the procedure employed did not result in a fair hearing, hence the decisions and orders resulting are nullities.

14. Accordingly, the plaintiffs pray for the following relief:

- i) [This paragraph being a prayer for issuance of writ of certiorari was omitted as the respondents, after the judgment of the court of first instance was issued, no longer advanced this claim. We are now concerned only with para. 14(ii) of the prayer for relief in which a declaration is sought.]
- ii) In the alternative, a declaration that the procedure employed by the Governor-in-Council in these two appeals resulted in:
 - a) no hearing having been held, or in the alternative,
 - b) such hearing as was held was not a full and fair hearing, in accordance with the principles of natural justice.
- iii) Such other relief as the Court deems proper.

Paragraph 14(ii) does not, of course, when read literally, frame a proper request for declaration. There is no declaration sought with reference to any rights or obligations allegedly arising in the parties to the proceeding. The declaration is with reference to a failure to hold a hearing, or, in any case, "a full and fair hearing" without reference to any statutory or other right or duty relating to the parties. The declaration sought should have related to the inferentially alleged invalidity of the two Orders-in-Council issued by the Governor-in-Council in response to the petition of the respondents, and I proceed to dispose of this appeal on the basis that the prayer for relief was so framed.

As I have said, all the facts pleaded in the statement of claim must be deemed to have been proven. On a motion such as this a court should, of course, dismiss the action or strike out any claim made by the plaintiff only in plain and obvious cases and where the court is satisfied that "the case is beyond doubt": Ross v. Scottish Union and National Insurance Co. [(1920), 47 O.L.R. 308 (App. Div.).] Here Bell Canada in its statement of defence has raised the issue of law as to the position of the Governor in Council when acting under s. 64 of the National Transportation Act, supra, and the power and jurisdiction of the court in relation thereto. The issue so raised requires for its disposition neither additional pleadings nor any evidence. I therefore agree with respect with the judge of first instance that it is a proper occasion for a court to respond in the opening stages of the action to such an issue as this application raises.

The defendants other than Bell Canada comprise the occupant of the office of the Governor General of Canada at the time of the commencement of these proceedings and the then members of the federal Cabinet, collectively described in the style of cause as the Governor in Council. I note that the term is defined in the Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. I-23, s. 28 in the following way:

"Governor in Council", or "Governor General in Council" means the Governor General of Canada, or person administering the Government of Canada for the time being, acting by and with the advice of, or by and with the advice and consent of, or in conjunction with the Queen's Privy Council for Canada.

The more traditional procedure has been to join only the Attorney General of Canada as a party representing the Governor in Council. Exception was taken to the particular procedure in the motion for dismissal but the learned trial judge did not find it necessary to refer to the matter because he dismissed the action; and the Federal Court of Appeal did not deal with it. Because of the disposition I shall propose, the matter does not require an answer to the second request in the appellant's application wherein the applicant asks that the claim be struck out as against all named defendants other than the Attorney General of Canada.

The CRTC proceedings concerned the application by Bell Canada for approval under s. 320 of the Railway Act, supra, of those telephone tolls proposed to be charged by Bell Canada for its services in areas including the Northwest Territories. Section 321(1) of the Railway Act, supra, requires that "all tolls shall be just and reasonable ...". Subsection (2) prohibits "unjust discrimination" and subs. (3) authorizes the CRTC to determine "as a question of fact" whether or not there has been unjust discrimination or unreasonable preference. The National Transportation Act, supra, makes further provision for such hearings by the CRTC and for appeals therefrom; and we are here principally concerned with s. 64 of that statute, as amended by R.S.C. 1970 (2nd Supp.), c. 10, s. 65 (Schedule II, Item 32). It provides as follows:

64. (1) The Governor in Council may at any time, in his discretion, either upon petition of any party, person or company interested, or of his own motion, and without any petition or application, vary or rescind any order, decision, rule or regulation of the Commission, whether such order or decision is made inter partes or otherwise, and whether such regulation is general or limited in its scope and application; and any order that the Governor in Council may make with respect thereto is binding upon the Commission and upon all parties.

(2) An appeal lies from the Commission to the Federal Court of Appeal upon a question of law, or a question of jurisdiction, upon leave therefor being obtained from that Court upon application made within one month after the making of the order, decision, rule or regulation sought to be appealed from or within such further time as a judge of that Court under special circumstances allows, and upon notice to the parties and the Commission, and upon hearing such of them as appear and dire to be heard; and the costs of such application are in the discretion of that Court.

The foregoing statutes were enacted at a time when the approval of telephone tariffs was a function of the Canadian Transport Commission and its predecessors. By the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission Act, supra, ss. 14, 17 and Schedule Items 2 and 5, the CRTC was assigned these responsibilities with reference to telephones and telegraphs.

The two respondent organizations participated "actively throughout the hearing" (to quote from the statement of claim) in the Bell Canada application "to increase the rates charged to customers". Not being satisfied with the decision of the CRTC, the two respondents had the alternative of appealing to the Federal Court of Appeal on a question of law or jurisdiction (s. 64(2), supra) or of filing a petition with the Governor in Council "to set aside the relevant portion of the decision of the CRTC and to substitute its own order therefor" (to quote from para. 6 of the statement of claim). The respondents elected to follow the latter course. The record does not reveal the contents of the respondents' petition and arguments, if any, in support of their application to the Governor in Council. Paragraph 10 of the claim asserts, and I treat it for the purposes of these proceedings as factually correct, that the Governor in Council received recommendations from the Minister of Communications, together with evidence and argument in support; evidence, opinions, and recommendations from the CRTC; reports from officials of the Department of Communications; and the reply of Bell Canada to each of the respondents' petitions. The respondents did not receive from the Governor in Council the contents of the recommendations and the material described in para. 10 of the claim, supra, but apparently did receive a copy of the Bell Canada reply to the petition. The Governor in Council denied the petitions of the respondents before the respondents had filed their respective responses to Bell Canada. According to the allegations made in the statement of claim, the Governor in Council did not communicate to the respondents the substance of the material received from the Minister and other sources mentioned above and did not invite and consequently did not receive the respondents' comments on such material. No oral hearing occurred in the sense of a session at which the Governor in Council heard the petitioners and the various respondents, and indeed the respondents do not insist that such a procedure is prescribed by law and do not now press for an 'oral' hearing. Before this Court the respondents' position was principally founded on the failure of the Governor in Council (a) to receive the actual petitions of the respondents and (b) to afford the respondents the opportunity to respond to the case made against them by the Minister, the departmental officials and the CRTC. To a much lesser extent the respondents objected to the lack of opportunity to answer the response by Bell Canada to the petitions, presumably because the respondents had already encountered at length the arguments and submissions of Bell Canada during the CRTC hearings and had no doubt anticipated Bell Canada's position in their respective petitions to the Governor in Council.

In support of these objections to the course followed by the Governor in Council the respondents submit:

- (a) that the Governor in Council acting under s. 64 is a quasi-judicial body or at least owes the respondents a duty of fairness;
- (b) the duty includes disclosure to the respondent of submissions received from the CRTC;
- (c) the respondents have the right to answer Bell Canada if it has introduced some new aspect or submission;

Canada (Attorney General) v. Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, [1980] 2 S.C.R. 735

- (d) the very minimum requirement is that the actual written submissions of the petitioners (respondents) must be placed before the Council and not a summary thereof prepared by officials;
- (e) the Governor in Council is required by s. 64 to give notice to all "parties" even if it moves on its own initiative (as the subsection authorizes it to do) so as to give prior notice to all those who may be affected by the rules to be established by the Governor in Council.

I turn then to the wording of s. 64 itself. This provision finds its roots in the Railway Act, 1868, 31 Vict., c. 68, subss. 12(9) and 12(10), which gave to the Governor in Council the power to approve rates and tariffs for the haulage of freight by rail. In 1903 the task was given to the Board of Railway Commissioners. Section 64 assumed its present form in the Railway Act, 1903, 3 Edw. VII, c. 58, s. 44. All these statutes related to railway rates in the first instance and eventually were extended to cover telephone and telegraph rates. In the meantime provision had been made for telephone rates and charges in the private statutes of incorporation of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, for example the 1892 Bell Telephone Company of Canada Act, 55-56 Vict., c. 67, s. 3:

The existing rates shall not be increased without the consent of the Governor in Council.

In its present state, s. 64 creates a right of appeal on questions of "law or jurisdiction" to the Federal Court of Appeal and an unlimited or unconditional right to petition the Governor in Council to "vary or rescind" any "order, decision, rule or regulation" of the Commission. These avenues of review by their terms are quite different. The Governor in Council may vary any such order on his own initiative. The power is not limited to an order of the Commission but extends to its rules or regulations. The review by the Governor in Council is not limited to an order made by the Commission inter partes or to an order limited in scope. It is to be noted at once that following the grant of the right of appeal to the Court in subs. (2), there are five subsections dealing with the details of an appeal to the Court. There can be found in s. 64 nothing to qualify the freedom of action of the Governor in Council, or indeed any guidelines, procedural or substantive, for the exercise of its functions under subs. (1).

The substance of the question before this Court in this appeal is this: is there a duty to observe natural justice in, or at least a lesser duty of fairness incumbent on, the Governor in Council in dealing with parties such as the respondents upon their submission of a petition under s. 64(1)? It will be convenient first to consider briefly the nature of the duty to be fair in our law.

It has been said by Lord Reid in Wiseman v. Borneman [[1971] A.C. 297., at p. 308:

Natural justice requires that the procedures before any tribunal which is acting judicially shall be fair in all the circumstances.

Such a broad statement depends for its validity upon the meaning to be ascribed to "any tribunal", and to the terms of its parent statute. This Court was concerned with such matters in Nicholson v. Haldimand-Norfolk Regional Board of Commissioners of Police and the Attorney General for Ontario [[1979] 1 S.C.R. 311.]. A probationary constable was dismissed without being told why his services were being dispensed with and without being given an opportunity to respond or to defend his position. In the result the majority decision of this Court required in those circumstances that the probationary constable should have been treated fairly, not arbitrarily, even though he was not entitled to all the procedural protection accorded to a full constable. The Chief Justice writing for the majority stated at p. 325:

What rightly lies behind this emergence is the realization that the classification of statutory functions as judicial, quasi-judicial or administrative is often very difficult, to say the least; and to endow some with procedural protection while denying others any at all would work injustice when the result of statutory decisions raise the same serious consequences for those adversely affected, regardless of the classification of the function in question.

The essence of the decision is found in the Chief Justice's remarks at p. 328:

In my opinion, the appellant should have been told why his services were no longer required and given an opportunity, whether orally or in writing as the Board might determine, to respond. The Board itself, I would think, would wish to be certain that it had not made a mistake in some fact or circumstance which it deemed relevant to its determination. Once it had the appellant's response, it would be for the Board to decide on what action to take, without its decision being reviewable elsewhere, always premising good faith. Such a course provides fairness to the appellant, and it is fair as well to the Board's right, as a public authority to decide, once it had the appellant's response, whether a person in his position should be allowed to continue in office to the point where his right to procedural protection was enlarged. Status in office deserves this minimal protection, however brief the period for which the office is held.

The House of Lords in the earlier decision of Pearlberg v. Varty [[1972] 1 W.L.R. 534.], had in effect found a presumption that the rules of natural justice apply to a tribunal entrusted with judicial or quasi-judicial functions but that no such presumption arises where the body is charged with administrative or executive functions. In the latter case courts will act on the presumption that Parliament had not intended to act unfairly and will "in suitable cases" imply an obligation in the body or person to act with fairness. See Lord Pearson at p. 547. Lord Hailsham L.C., combining the idea of fairness and natural justice, put it this way at p. 540:

The doctrine of natural justice has come in for increasing consideration in recent years and the courts generally, and your Lordships' House in particular, have, I think rightly, advanced its frontiers considerably. But at the same time they have taken an increasingly sophisticated view of what it requires in individual cases.

Tucker L.J., thirty years earlier, came closer to our situation in this appeal when he said in Russell v. Duke of Norfolk [[1949] 1 All E.R. 109.], at p. 118:

The requirements of natural justice must depend on the circumstances of the case, the nature of the inquiry, the rules under which the tribunal is acting, the subject-matter that is being dealt with, and so forth. Accordingly, I do not derive much assistance from the definitions of natural justice which have been from time to time used, but whatever standard is adopted, one essential is that the person concerned should have a reasonable opportunity of presenting his case.

The arena in which the broad rules of natural justice arose and the even broader rule of fairness now performs is described by Lord Denning M.R. in Selvarajan v. Race Relations Board [[1976] 1 All E.R. 12.] where His Lordship, after enumerating a number of authorities dealing with tribunals generally concerned with a lis inter partes in a variety of administrative fields, said at p. 19:

In all these cases it has been held that the investigating body is under a duty to act fairly; but that which fairness requires depends on the nature of the investigation and the consequences which it may have on persons affected by it. The fundamental rule is that, if a person may be subjected to pains or penalties, or be exposed to prosecution or proceedings or deprived of remedies or redress, or in some such way adversely affected by the investigation and report, then he should be told the case made against him and be afforded a fair opportunity of answering it.

(Even in those instances the Court went on to add that such a body may adopt its own procedure, can employ staff for all preliminary work, but in the end must come to its own decision.)

Let it be said at the outset that the mere fact that a statutory power is vested in the Governor in Council does not mean that it is beyond review. If that body has failed to observe a condition precedent to the exercise of that power, the court can declare that such purported exercise is a nullity. In Wilson v. Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company [[1922] 1 A.C. 202.], for example, the Privy Council considered the position of the Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia under the Vancouver Island Settlers' Rights Act, 1904, Amendment Act, 1917, S.B.C. 1917, c. 71. The effectiveness of a Crown land grant issued by order of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council was contested on the grounds that the Lieutenant-Governor in Council had no "reasonable proof" before them that the grantees had improved the lands in question or occupied them with an intention to reside thereon. The Court of Appeal found that there was no such evidence and hence declared the Order in Council to be void. The Privy Council proceeded on the basis that before the Lieutenant-Governor in Council could make the grant in question, it must determine that the statutorily prescribed conditions had been met by the applicant for the grant. As here, the allegation was made that the owners did not have "an adequate opportunity" to show that there was no factual foundation for the grant made by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. The Privy Council found against this submission stating at p. 213 through Duff J., sitting as a member of the Board:

The respondents were given the fullest opportunity to present before the Lieutenant-Governor in Council everything they might to urge against the view that the depositions produced in themselves constituted "reasonable proof," and they had the fullest opportunity also of supporting their contention that the depositions alone, in the absence of cross-examination, ought not to be considered sufficient, and that further time should be allowed to enable them to prepare their case. The appointed authority for dealing with the matter, it must be remembered, was the Executive Government of the Province directly answerable to the Legislature, and their Lordships agree without hesitation with the majority of the Court of Appeal in holding as they explicitly decided upon the same facts in Dunlop's case, that the Lieutenant-Governor in Council was not bound to govern himself by the rules of procedure regulating proceedings in a Court of justice.

It cannot be suggested that he proceeded without any regard to the rights of the respondents and the procedure followed must be presumed, in the absence of some conclusive reason to the contrary, to have been adopted in exercise of his discretion under the statute as a proper mode of discharging the duty entrusted to him. His decisions taken in the exercise of that discretion are, in their Lordships' opinion, final and not reviewable in legal proceedings.

The Privy Council also determined in the case that factual issues, including the "reasonableness" or "sufficiency" of the evidence, were exclusively for the Lieutenant-Governor whose decision would not be reviewable by a court if there was "some evidence in support of the application" (per Duff J. at p. 213).

The Ontario Court of Appeal was concerned with similar issues in Border Cities Press Club v. Attorney General for Ontario [[1955] 1 D.L.R. 404.]. The factual differences are such that it affords no direct assistance here. The statute prescribed conditions precedent to the exercise of the powers granted by the Legislature to the Lieutenant-Governor in Council in that "sufficient cause must be shown" before the letters patent in question might be cancelled. The trial court found that an unreasonable request had been made to the applicant by the province, no hearing or opportunity was afforded the applicant, and indeed no notice of the impending cancellation of the charter was given by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. The Court of Appeal set aside the declaration that the Order in Council was void for procedural reasons applicable to the powers of the court of the first instance and for reasons not here relevant, but in doing so stated through Pickup C.J.O. at p. 412:

I agree with the learned Judge in Weeky Court, for the reasons stated by him, that the power conferred is conditional upon sufficient cause being shown, and that without giving the respondent an opportunity of being heard, or an opportunity to show cause why the letters patent should not be forfeited, the Lieutenant-Governor in Council would not have jurisdiction under the statute to make the order complained of. In exercising the power referred to, the Lieutenant-Governor in Council is not, in my opinion, exercising a prerogative of the Crown, but a power conferred by statute, and such a statutory power can be validly exercised only by complying with statutory provisions which are, by law, conditions precedent to the exercise of such power.

It may be of interest to note that in approving the observations of the court below with respect to the statutory powers granted to the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, no express approval was given to the comment by the learned Judge in Weeky [sic] Court that in performing his function under the statute the Lieutenant-Governor in Council was required to act judicially.

However, no failure to observe a condition precedent is alleged here. Rather it is contended that, once validly seized of the respondents' petition, the Governor in Council did not fulfill the duty to be fair implicitly imposed upon him, the argument goes, by s. 64(1) of the National Transportation Act. While, after Nicholson, supra, and Martineau v. Matsqui Institution (No. 2) [[1980] 1 S.C.R. 602.], (decision of this Court handed down December 13, 1979) the existence of such a duty no longer depends on classifying the power involved as "administrative" or "quasi-judicial", it is still necessary to examine closely the statutory provision in question in order to discern whether it makes the decision-maker subject to any rules of procedural fairness.

Instructive in this regard is the decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal in Re Davisville Investment Co. Ltd. and City of Toronto et al. [(1977) 15 O.R. (2d) 553.], where judicial review of an Order in Council was sought. The applicant had unsuccessfully applied to the Ontario Municipal Board for review of an earlier Board decision. By petition the applicant sought to have the Lieutenant-Governor in Council rescind the earlier Board order and direct a public hearing by the Board "to correct the earlier denial thereof" by the Board. The statute under which the petition was filed provided that the Lieutenant-Governor in Council might confirm, vary or rescind the Board order or require the Board to hold a new hearing. Lacourciere J.A. speaking on behalf of the majority, after describing the alternative provision for appeal to the court on a question of law or jurisdiction, described the petition as "the political route to the Lieutenant-Governor in Council" and went on to state at pp. 555-56:

The petition does not constitute a judicial appeal or review. It merely provides a mechanism for a control by the executive branch of Government applying its perception of the public interest to the facts established before the Board, plus the additional facts before the Council. The Lieutenant-Governor in Council is not concerned with matters of law and jurisdiction which are within the ambit of judicial control. But it can do what Courts will not do, namely, it can substitute its opinion on a matter of public convenience and general policy in the public interest. This is what was done by the Order in Council: if it was done without any error of law, or without defects of a jurisdictional nature, the Divisional Court had no power to interfere and properly dismissed the application before it.

At p. 557 His Lordship returns to the same point:

Section 94 of The Ontario Municipal Board Act should not be construed restrictively as if it involved an inferior tribunal to which certain matters have been committed by the Legislature. I prefer to regard the power as one reserved by the legislative to the executive branch of Government acting on broad lines of policy. There is no reason to fetter and restrict the scope of the power by a narrow judicial interpretation.

In the Davisville proceeding the petition was treated as an appeal in writing and it may be noted that the respondent party filed a reply but no response thereto was made by the applicant. Blair J.A. dissented on the interpretation to be placed upon s. 94 as it related to the alternative courses open on such a petition to the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, but agreed with the majority of the court that the action of the Executive is reviewable only if the Lieutenant-Governor in Council acts outside the terms of the enabling statute.

It is not helpful in my view to attempt to classify the action or function by the Governor in Council (or indeed the Lieutenant-Governor in Council acting in similar circumstances) into one of the traditional categories established in the development of administrative law. The Privy Council in the Wilson case, supra, described the function of the Lieutenant-Governor as "judicial" as did the judge of first instance in the Border Cities Press proceedings, supra. However, in my view the essence of the principle of law here operating is simply that in the exercise of a statutory power the Governor in Council, like any other person or group of persons, must keep within the law as laid down by Parliament or the Legislature. Failure to do so will call into action the supervising function of the superior court whose responsibility is to enforce the law, that is to ensure that such actions as may be authorized by statute shall be carried out in accordance with its terms, or that a public authority shall not fail to respond to a duty assigned to it by statute.

I turn now to a consideration of s. 64(1) in light of those principles. Clearly the Governor in Council is not limited to varying orders made inter partes where a lis existed and was determined by the Commission. The Commission is empowered by s. 321 of the Railway Act, supra, and the section of the CRTC Act already noted to approve all charges for the use of telephones of Bell Canada. In so doing the Commission determines whether the proposed tariff of tolls is just and reasonable and whether they are discriminatory. Thus the statute delegates to the CRTC the function of approving telephone service tolls with a directive as to the standards to be applied. There is thereafter a secondary delegation of the rate-fixing function by Parliament to the Governor in Council but this function only comes into play after the Commission has approved a tariff of tolls; and on the fulfilment of that condition precedent, the power arises in the Governor in Council to establish rates for telephone service by the variation of the order, decision, rule or regulation of the CRTC. While the CRTC must operate within a certain framework when rendering its decisions, Parliament has in s. 64(1) not burdened the executive branch with any standards or guidelines in the exercise of its rate review function. Neither were procedural standards imposed or even implied. That is not to say that the courts will not respond today as in the Wilson case supra, if the conditions precedent to the exercise of power so granted to the executive branch have not been observed. Such a response might also occur if, on a petition being received by the Council, no examination of its contents by the Governor in Council were undertaken. That is quite a different matter (and one with which we are not here faced) from the assertion of some principle of law that requires the Governor in Council, before discharging its duty under the section, to read either individually or en masse the petition itself and all supporting material, the evidence taken before the CRTC and all the submissions and arguments advanced by the petitioner and responding parties. The very nature of the body must be taken into account in assessing the technique of review which has been adopted by the Governor in Council. The executive branch cannot be deprived of the right to resort to its staff, to departmental personnel concerned with the subject matter, and above all to the comments and advice of ministerial members of the Council who are by virtue of their office concerned with the policy issues arising by reason of the petition whether those policies be economic, political, commercial or of some other nature. Parliament might otherwise ordain, but in s. 64 no such limitation had been imposed on the Governor in Council in the adoption of the procedures for the hearing of petitions under subs. (1).

This conclusion is made all the more obvious by the added right in s. 64(1) that the Governor in Council may "of his motion" vary or rescind any rule or order of the Commission. This is legislative action in its purest form where the subject matter is the fixing of rates for a public utility such as a telephone system. The practicality of giving notice to "all parties", as the respondent has put it, must have some bearing on the interpretation to be placed upon s. 64(1) in these circumstances. In these proceedings the respondent challenged the rates established by the CRTC and confirmed in effect by the Governor in Council. There are many subscribers to the Bell Canada services all of whom are and will be no doubt affected to some degree by the tariff of tolls and charges authorized by the Commission and reviewed by the Governor in Council. All subscribers should arguably receive notice before the Governor in Council proceeds with its review. The concluding words of subs. (1) might be said to support this view where it is provided that:

... any order that the Governor in Council may make with respect thereto is binding upon the Commission and upon all parties.

I read these words as saying no more than this: if the nature of the matter before the Governor in Council under s. 64 concerns parties who have been involved in proceedings before the administrative tribunal whose decision is before the Governor in Council by virtue of a petition, all such persons, as well as the tribunal or agency itself, will be bound to give effect to the order in council issued by the Governor in Council upon a review of the petition. Different terminology to the same effect is found in predecessor statutes and I see no basis for reading into this statute any different parliamentary intent from that which I have ascribed to these words as they are found now in s. 64(1).

It was pointed out that in the past the Governor in Council has proceeded by way of an actual oral hearing in which the petitioner and the contending parties participated (P.C. 2166 dated 24/10/23; and P.C. 1170 dated 17/6/27). These proceedings do no more than illustrate the change in growth of our political machinery and indeed the size of the Canadian community. It was apparently possible for the national executive in those days to conduct its affairs under the Railway Act, supra, through meetings or hearings in which the parties appeared before some or all of the Cabinet. The population of the country was a fraction of that today. The magnitude of government operations bears no relationship to that carried on at the federal level at present. No doubt the Governor in Council could still hold oral hearings if so disposed. Even if a court had the power and authority to so direct (which I conclude it has not) it would be a very unwise and impractical judicial principle which would convert past practice into rigid, invariable administrative procedures. Even in cases mentioned above, while the order recites it to have been issued on the recommendation of the responsible Minister, there is nothing to indicate that the parties were informed of such a recommendation prior to the conduct of the hearing.

While it is true that a duty to observe procedural fairness, as expressed in the maxim audi alteram partem, need not be express (Alliance des Professeurs Catholiques de Montréal v. Commission des Relations Ouvrières de la Province de Québec [[1953] 2 S.C.R. 140]), it will not be implied in every case. It is always a question of construing the statutory scheme as a whole in order to see to what degree, if any, the legislator intended the principle to apply. It is my view that the supervisory power of s. 64, like the power in Davisville, supra, is vested in members of the Cabinet in order to enable them to respond to the political, economic and social concerns of the moment. Under s. 64 the Cabinet, as the executive branch of government, was exercising the power delegated by Parliament to determine the appropriate tariffs for the telephone services of Bell Canada. In so doing the Cabinet, unless otherwise directed in the enabling statute, must be free to consult all sources which Parliament itself might consult had it retained this function. This is clearly so in those instances where the Council acts on its own initiative as it is authorized and required to do by the same subsection. There is no indication in subs. (1) that a different interpretation comes into play upon the exercise of the right of a party to petition the Governor in Council to exercise this same delegated function or power. The wording adopted by Parliament in my view makes this clear. The Governor in Council may act "at any time". He may vary or rescind any order, decision, rule or regulation "in his discretion". The guidelines mandated by Parliament in the case of the CRTC are not repeated expressly or by implication in s. 64. The function applies to broad, quasi-legislative orders of the Commission as well as to inter-party decisions. In short, the discretion of the Governor in Council is complete provided he observes the jurisdictional boundaries of s. 64(1).

The procedure sanctioned by s. 64(1) has sometimes been criticized as an unjustifiable interference with the regulatory process: see Independent Administrative Agencies, Working Paper 25 of the Law Reform Commission of Canada (1980), at pp. 87-89. The Commission recommended that provisions for the final disposition by the Cabinet or a minister of appeals of any agency decisions except those requesting the equivalent of the exercise of the prerogative of mercy or a decision based on humanitarian grounds, should be abolished. (at p. 88)

Indeed it may be thought by some to be unusual and even counter-productive in an organized society that a carefully considered decision by an administrative agency, arrived at after a full public hearing in which many points of view have been advanced, should be susceptible of reversal by the Governor in Council. On the other hand, it is apparently the judgment of Parliament that this is an area inordinately sensitive to changing public policies and hence it has been reserved for the final application of such a policy by the executive branch of government. Given the interpretation of s. 64(1) which I adopt, there is no need for the Governor in Council to give reasons for his decision, to hold any kind of a hearing, or even to acknowledge the receipt of a petition. It is not the function of this Court, however, to decide whether Cabinet appeals are desirable or not. I have only to decide whether the requirements of s. 64(1) have been satisfied.

In reaching this conclusion concerning the procedures to be followed with reference to s. 64(1), I am assisted by the reasoning of Megarry J. in Bates v. Lord Hailsham [[1972] 1 W.L.R. 1973.] (cited by the majority judgment of this Court in Nicholson, supra). There the court was dealing with a challenge made to the legality of an order issued under the Solicitors Act abolishing a tariff of fees, on the grounds that the order should have been preceded by wider consideration by the rule enacting body. In refusing to intervene, Megarry J. stated at p. 1378:

Let me accept that in the sphere of the so-called quasi-judicial the rules of natural justice run, and that in the administrative or executive field there is a general duty of fairness. Nevertheless, these considerations do not seem to me to affect the process of legislation, whether primary or delegated. Many of those affected by delegated legislation, and affected very substantially, are never consulted in the process of enacting that legislation; and yet they have no remedy ... I do not know of any implied right to be consulted or make objections, or any principle upon which the courts may enjoin the legislative process at the suit of those who contend that insufficient time for consultation and consideration has been given.

Both the Bates case, supra, and this one deal with delegated legislation, the difference being that the delegatee in this case is, in effect, the executive branch of government while in the Bates case it was a committee of judges and solicitors constituted under s. 56 of the Solicitors Act. Under s. 56(2) the committee could make general orders prescribing and regulating in such manner as they think fit the remuneration of solicitors in respect of non-contentious business.

The Governor in Council under s. 64(1) is entitled to vary decisions on telephone tariffs already made by another body, but this difference does not strike me as material. Nor does the fact that a citizen may invoke the review procedure of s. 64(1) via petition, while no comparable right existed under the English act, constitute a valid ground of distinction. There is only one review procedure under s. 64(1) though it may be triggered in two ways, i.e., by petition or by the Governor in Council's own motion. It is clear that the orders in question in Bates and the case at bar were legislative in nature and I adopt the reasoning of Megarry J. to the effect that no hearing is required in such cases. I realize, however, that the dividing line between legislative and administrative functions is not always easy to draw: see Essex County Council v. Minister of Housing [(1967), 66 L.R.G. 23.].

The answer is not to be found in continuing the search for words that will clearly and invariably differentiate between judicial and administrative on the one hand, or administrative and legislative on the other. It may be said that the use of the fairness principle as in Nicholson, supra, will obviate the need for the distinction in instances where the tribunal or agency is discharging a function with reference to something akin to a lis or where the agency may be described as an 'investigating body' as in the Selvarajan case, supra. Where, however, the executive branch has been assigned a function performable in the past by the Legislature itself and where the res or subject matter is not an individual concern or a right unique to the petitioner or appellant, different considerations may be thought to arise. The fact that the function has been assigned as here to a tier of agencies (the CRTC in the first instance and the Governor in Council in the second) does not, in my view, alter the political science pathology of the case. In such a circumstance the Court must fall back upon the basic jurisdictional supervisory role and in so doing construe the statute to determine whether the Governor in Council has performed its functions within the boundary of the parliamentary grant and in accordance with the terms of the parliamentary mandate.

The precise terminology employed by Parliament in s. 64 does not reveal to me any basis for the introduction by implication of the procedural trappings associated with administrative agencies in other areas to which the principle in Nicholson, supra, was directed. The roots of that authority do not reach the area of law with which we are concerned in scanning s. 64(1).

As mentioned at the outset, the Federal Court of Appeal, speaking through Le Dain J., agreed with the trial division except with respect to the lack of opportunity for the respondents to respond to the reply forwarded to the Governor in Council by Bell Canada in the proceedings initiated by the petition of the respondents. Le Dain J. regarded this issue as being one of fact depending for its determination on the nature of Bell Canada's answer and the issues raised thereby, and on the reasonableness of the delay of two weeks before the issuance of the decision of the Governor in Council. His Lordship concluded:

Since the question is essentially one of fact, one cannot say before the issue has been tried that the Statement of Claim does not disclose a reasonable cause of action.

For the reasons already given I am unable, with respect, to conclude that the issue of fairness arises in these proceedings on a proper construction of s. 64(1). If there were to be a distinction between rights arising with reference to submissions from government sources and rights arising with reference to the response from the rate applicant Bell Canada, more compelling reasons exist for disclosure of the intra-governmental communications as the respondents were, by this stage in these lengthy proceedings, very familiar with the application made by Bell Canada and the position taken by that company before the Commission by reason of the respondents' active participation in the hearings before the CRTC. In any case, I can discern nothing in s. 64(1) to justify a variable yardstick for the application to that section of the principle of fairness according to the source of the information placed before the Governor in Council for the disposition of the respondents' petition. The basic issue is the interpretation of this statutory provision in the context of the pattern of the statute in which it is found. In my view, once the proper construction of the section is determined, it applies consistently throughout the proceedings before the Governor in Council.

I would therefore allow the appeal and restore the order of the trial court. As to costs, the respondent has never asked for costs and the Attorney General of Canada at the hearing in this Court placed himself in the hands of the Court. In all the circumstances of these proceedings, I would not consider this to be a case for costs and I would award no costs to any party in this Court or in any of the courts below.

Appeal allowed.

Case Summary

Practice — Pleadings — Striking out pleadings — Grounds, failure to disclose a cause of action or defence — Particulars — Failure to provide, effect of.

This was an application to strike a statement of claim. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant employer breached a fiduciary duty owed to her as an employee. The defendant argued that the claim did not disclose a reasonable cause of action as the cause of action was not known to the law. It also argued that a minimum level of disclosure of particulars had not been met and that the most appropriate remedy was to strike the pleadings as a whole.

HELD: The application was dismissed.

While the plaintiff's claim was a novel argument, the area of fiduciary duty was one that was continually being developed by the courts. Therefore it could not be said that the claim could not possibly succeed at trial so as to justify the exercise of the discretion to strike under Rule 21 of the Ontario Rules of Civil Procedure. The references in the pleadings to the Occupational Health and Safety Act were not to be struck. While the plaintiff had not alleged that a cause of action as a result of a breach of the Act arose, the alleged breaches might be relevant to other causes of action and whether an appropriate standard of conduct had been met. However the pleadings as a whole were not sufficiently coherent and particularized to enable the defendant to plead to it. As the pleading as a whole needed to be amended, ordering particulars on a piece meal basis would not be sufficient. Paragraphs 8 to 23 of the claim were to be struck out with leave to amend. The plaintiff was directed to provide particulars in the amended pleadings.

MOLLOY J. (orally)

1 The defendant moves to strike the Statement of Claim on various grounds. With respect to some of the claims, the allegation is that the claims do not disclose a reasonable cause of action and the motion to strike is under Rule 21. With respect to other aspects of the claim the defendant is moving under Rule 25.11 and 25.06 on the grounds that a minimum level of disclosure of particulars has not been met and that the appropriate remedy is to strike the pleading altogether, rather than to order particulars in a piecemeal fashion.

2 I will deal first with the allegations of no cause of action under Rule 21. The plaintiff alleges that the employer breached a fiduciary duty owed to her as employee. The defendant takes the position that this is a cause of action which is not known to the law, and should be struck on that basis. I agree that this is a novel argument. I am not aware of, and the parties have not been able to point me to, any case law that has recognized a breach of fiduciary duty by an employer as a cause of action. However, the Supreme Court of Canada has directed in Hunt v. Carey Canada Inc., [1990] 2 S.C.R. 959; 74 D.L.R. (4th) 321 that the power under Rule 21 to strike an action as disclosing no cause of action should be exercised with care and only in a situation where it is not possible that the claim can succeed at trial. A Statement of Claim should not be struck merely because the cause of action which is raised is novel. This is a novel cause of action. However the entire area of fiduciary duty is an emerging one and one which continues to be developed and fine tuned by the courts. We have yet to see how the concept will be affected by decisions from the Supreme Court of Canada such as the Lac Minerals v. Corona decision, [1989] 2 S.C.R. 574. Therefore I am not prepared to say that the breach of fiduciary duty cause of action cannot possibly succeed. It is possible that a cause of action can be founded on this concept. Therefore that aspect of the defendant's motion is dismissed.

3 With respect to the Occupational Health and Safety Act claim, the plaintiff is not alleging that she has a cause of action as a result of a breach of the Occupational Health and Safety Act. However, breaches of that Act are pleaded without any particular reference to how they are relevant. Counsel for the plaintiff argues that the Occupational Health and Safety Act breaches are relevant to show the standard of conduct or unacceptable level of standard of conduct by the employer. It is clear on the case law that a breach of a statute or of a statutory duty does not create a cause of action, either under the statute or at common law: See Board of Governors of Seneca College of Applied Arts and Technology v. Bhadauria (1981), 124 D.L.R. (3d) 193 (S.C.C.), see also Canada v. Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, [1983] 1 S.C.R. 205 (S.C.C.). However the breach of a statutory duty may be relevant to components of other causes of action and relevant to whether an appropriate standard of conduct has been met: See Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, supra. Therefore the defendant's motion to strike this paragraph (that is paragraph 17 of the Statement of Claim) as disclosing no cause of action is dismissed.

4 The balance of the defendant's motion to strike relates to a lack of particularity. Here I am in agreement with the position taken by counsel for the defendant, that the pleading as a whole is not sufficiently coherent and particularized to enable the defendant to plead to it. For example, breach of contract is alleged. However, in the portion of the claim that deals with particulars of the contract, a written contract is first alleged. The plaintiff then goes on to plead that this contract, and other written contracts which replaced it, are invalid and unenforceable and relies on the doctrine of non est factum. The plaintiff then goes on to plead a course of conduct in her employment which includes hours of work and hourly rates of pay which are not consistent with the written contract she has alleged nor with the schedule that she has attached showing what she was actually paid. It is not clear whether this allegation relates to an oral agreement which varies the written contract or whether it is an allegation of a breach of the written contract. Also, it is not clear whether the claim here is truly that the written contract is invalid, unconscionable or unenforceable for whatever reasons, or whether it is alleged that the written contract is binding and has been breached. It is difficult to simply order particulars of these kinds of deficiencies and still come out with a coherent and understandable pleading. It is far preferable, in my view, to strike the pleading with leave to amend, so that a logical and coherent pleading can be delivered which sets out clearly and precisely the nature of the contract, whether it was in writing or oral and the approximate dates of the contract, who the parties were, if there were oral representations, who made them, and then set out the nature of the breach, whether it is a breach of the written contract or a breach of oral amendments to the written contract, or whatever. If there are alternative claims with respect to the contract being invalid as opposed to breached, then they should be expressed as alternative claims.

5 With respect to the breach of fiduciary duty cause of action and the unjust enrichment claims, and in this regard I am mainly referring to the breach of fiduciary duty, the main difficulty is that there is no identification of which factual allegations relate to which causes of action. It may be the case that some factual components will relate to more than one cause of action or even all of the causes of action, but this is not apparent from the pleading as it is presently constituted. It would be of great assistance if the Statement of Claim was organized in categories identifying specifically what causes of action are alleged and which facts are pleaded to support each of those causes of action.

6 The same applies to the Occupational Health and Safety Act. I have dismissed the defendant's motion based on the argument that this paragraph should be struck entirely. However it is necessary to tie the breach or alleged breach of the Occupational Health and Safety Act to some aspect of the cause of action or causes of action. Also the particular sections of the Occupational Health and Safety Act which are alleged to have been breached should be pleaded with specificity.

7 In addition to these general matters there were some items of particulars which were identified in the Notice of Motion. Initially, there was a long list of them, but counsel managed to whittle that down to five subparagraphs of paragraph 2 in the Notice of Motion.

8 In subparagraph (v), particulars of "minimum sleep" were required, as referred to in paragraph 13 of the Statement of Claim. In my view this is not necessary for the defendant to plead and can be obtained on discovery. Also this not a matter which would be easily particularized. On balance, I find that the plaintiff does not need to provide particulars of this particular allegation.

9 With respect to subparagraph (ix), the defendant seeks particulars of the "numerous complaints" referred to by the plaintiff in paragraph 15 of the Statement of Claim. I believe this point is well taken. It may well be that the plaintiff cannot remember each and every incident of complaint or that she has not kept full records of them, but she must provide particulars of the information she does have. For example, if there are written complaints, the dates of those complaints should be itemized and the person to whom they were directed. If the complaints were oral, that should be stated as well as the person to whom the complaint was directed. The plaintiff should also provide the approximate date or range of dates, and in each of those situations, whether or not there was a response and what that response was from the defendant.

10 Subparagraphs (x) and (xii) of paragraph 2 both relate to the production of documentation to substantiate allegations made in the Statement of Claim. Those documents are not required by way of particulars and are not needed for the purpose of the defendant pleading. Therefore the defendant's request for particulars of these two subparagraphs is dismissed.

11 With respect to subparagraph (xiv), the defendant seeks particulars of the allegations of "deliberate, calculated and malicious" actions by the defendant as alleged in paragraph 21 of the Statement of Claim. In my view paragraph 21 of the Statement of Claim already provides the particulars of those actions and states that the actions referred to are the defendant's leaving the plaintiff at risk to her charges, who were known to have aggressive tendencies and against whom there was no protection in law. If in fact those are the only facts relied upon with respect to the punitive damages and with respect to the allegation of deliberate calculated and malicious conduct, then the requirements for particulars is met. The paragraph is plain enough on its face.

12 As I have already said, I do not consider this to be a situation in which ordering particulars on a piece meal basis would be sufficient. The pleading as a whole needs to be amended. I am therefore striking out paragraphs 8 to 23 of the Statement of Claim with leave to amend.

13 The plaintiff is directed to provide particulars in the amended pleading of the items set out in paragraph 2 (b) (ix) of the Statement of Claim. In other respects the defendant's motion is dismissed.

Air Canada, appellant; v. The Attorney General of British Columbia, respondent.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA

Case Summary

Crown — Proceedings against the Crown — Petition of right — Fiat — Appellant seeking redress from Crown for benefits obtained pursuant to an invalid statute — Fiat refused by Lieutenant-Governor on advice of Provincial Attorney General — Whether mandamus may be issued to direct Attorney General to advise Lieutenant-Governor to grant fiat — Crown Proceeding Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 86.

Appellant had in a separate action sought a declaration that the British Columbia Gasoline Tax Act was ultra vires and a declaration that it was entitled to be reimbursed all monies paid after August 1, 1974. For the monies paid before that date, however, appellant, in conformity with the Crown Proceeding Act, issued a petition of right seeking substantially the same relief. This Act preserved the traditional method of suit against the Crown by way of petition of right with respect to causes of action that arose before August 1, 1974, and required those seeking redress from the Crown to obtain a fiat. The provincial Attorney General advised the Executive Council to recommend that the Lieutenant Governor deny the fiat and he did. Appellant then applied to the Supreme Court of British Columbia pursuant to the Judicial Review Procedure Act for an order in the nature of mandamus to compel the Attorney General to consider the petition of right and then to advise the Lieutenant Governor whether to grant his fiat. The application was dismissed and the judgment affirmed by a majority of the Court of Appeal. This appeal is to determine whether an order may be issued directing a provincial Attorney General to advise the Lieutenant Governor to grant a fiat to a petition of right under which a claim is made for the return of money [page540] alleged to have been levied by the province under an unconstitutional statute.

Held: The appeal should be allowed and an order in the nature of mandamus should be issued directing the Attorney General of British Columbia to advise the Lieutenant-Governor to grant his fiat to the petition of right.

It has been established that a statute cannot permit the retention of monies obtained under an unconstitutional statute. Consequently, a similar result cannot be attained indirectly under a purported exercise of a discretion to refuse a fiat, whatever may be the legal foundation of that supposed discretion. The discretion to grant or refuse a fiat, like other executive powers, must be exercised in conformity with the dictates of the Constitution, and the Crown's advisers must govern themselves accordingly. Any other course would violate the federal structure of the Constitution. Under the British Columbia Attorney General Act, the Attorney General is the Lieutenant-Governor's principal legal adviser and the legal member of the Executive Council. Though his duty, technically, is simply to advise, the issue here was a legal one and one to which there was only one answer under the Constitution. The Attorney General was bound to advise the Lieutenant-Governor to grant his fiat, and the Executive Council was in turn bound to accept that advice.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

LA FOREST J.

1 The issue in this case is whether an order may be issued directing a provincial Attorney General to advise the Lieutenant Governor to grant a fiat to a petition of rights under which a claim is made for the return of money alleged to have been levied by the province under an unconstitutional statute.

2 In July 1980, the appellant, Air Canada, commenced an action in the Supreme Court of British Columbia seeking a declaration that the Gasoline Tax Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 152, does not apply to Air Canada or is ultra vires the province, an accounting of all monies paid under that Act by [page542] Air Canada and a declaration that the appellant is entitled to be repaid all monies paid after August 1, 1974. This action represented only a portion of Air Canada's claim. It had been paying taxes under the Act since 1937. However, as regards causes of action that arose before August 1, 1974, the Crown Proceeding Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 86, preserved the traditional method of suit against the Crown by way of petition of right which requires those seeking redress from the Crown to obtain a fiat. In conformity with this procedure, Air Canada in July 1981 issued a petition of right seeking substantially the same relief as in the action described above, but for monies paid before August 1, 1974. It is with this petition of rights that we are concerned on this appeal.

3 The petition was duly served on the Provincial Secretary and a copy was forwarded to the provincial Attorney General. The Attorney General advised the Executive Council to recommend that the Lieutenant Governor deny the fiat. The Provincial Secretary then forwarded a copy of the petition to the Lieutenant Governor along with the following advice:

After due deliberation and on the recommendation of the Attorney General, the Executive Council humbly advises that this is not an appropriate case for the granting of a Fiat. The Executive Council has instructed me to transmit this advice.

Pursuant to this advice, the Lieutenant Governor accordingly declined to grant the fiat and the Provincial Secretary communicated this fact to Air Canada.

4 Air Canada then applied to the Supreme Court of British Columbia pursuant to the Judicial Review Procedure Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 209, for:

(a) an order in the nature of mandamus compelling the Attorney General to consider the petition of right and then advise the Lieutenant-Governor whether to grant his fiat;

[page543]

(b) a declaration that the Attorney General has omitted to exercise his statutory power of decision to advise the Lieutenant-Governor and that he has a duty to do so;

(c) a direction to the Attorney General to reconsider and determine whether the Lieutenant-Governor should be advised to grant his fiat together with reasons.

5 Air Canada's application was heard by Callaghan J. who dismissed it in a judgment pronounced on October 1, 1982: 41 B.C.L.R. 41, 141 D.L.R. (3d) 530, [1982] 6 W.W.R. 415. Air Canada then appealed to the British Columbia Court of Appeal which, by majority (Taggart and Aikins JJ.A., Anderson J.A. dissenting), dismissed the appeal: (1983), 47 B.C.L.R. 341, 150 D.L.R. (3d) 653, [1983] 6 W.W.R. 689. Air Canada was then granted leave to appeal to this Court, [1983] 2 S.C.R. v.

6 In this Court, counsel for Air Canada did not press the arguments regarding judicial review of statutory powers, but essentially sought an order in the nature of mandamus, which formed the basis of the judgment of Anderson J.A., the dissenting judge in the Court of Appeal. Since I am substantially in agreement with Anderson J.A., I need not enter into a discussion of the other issues raised in the case.

7 The applicable law on this issue evolved from the well established principle that neither Parliament nor a legislature can preclude a determination of the constitutional validity of legislation. That principle was thus expressed by Laskin J. (as he then was) in Thorson v. Attorney General of Canada, [1975] 1 S.C.R. 138, at p. 151:

The question of the constitutionality of legislation has in this country always been a justiciable question. Any attempt by Parliament or a Legislature to fix conditions precedent, as by way of requiring consent of some public officer or authority, to the determination of an issue of constitutionality of legislation cannot foreclose the Courts merely because the conditions remain unsatisfied.

8 I cannot believe that if there was no Crown Proceeding Act permitting suits against the Crown, a court could, where the case was not frivolous, refuse access to the court to test the constitutionality of a statute simply because a fiat was refused. What is sought here, however, is more involved. The action is an attempt to obtain redress from the Crown for benefits obtained pursuant to an invalid statute.

9 This Court took an important step in that direction in British Columbia Power Corp. v. British Columbia Electric Co., [1962] S.C.R. 642. There the plaintiff sought the appointment of a receiver over property owned by a corporation whose common shares had been vested in the Crown in right of the province by a statute whose constitutional validity was contested. The Crown resisted the appointment of the receiver on the ground that this would affect its property and interests. This Court, however, rejected the Crown's contention. Kerwin C.J., giving the majority judgment, set forth the following principles at pp. 644-45:

In a federal system, where legislative authority is divided, as are also the prerogatives of the Crown, as between the Dominion and the Provinces, it is my view that it is not open to the Crown, either in right of Canada or of a Province, to claim a Crown immunity based upon an interest in certain property, where its very interest in that property depends completely and solely on the validity of the legislation which it has itself passed, if there is a reasonable doubt as to whether such legislation is constitutionally valid. To permit it to do so would be to enable it, by the assertion of rights claimed under legislation which is beyond its powers, to achieve the same results as if the legislation were valid.

10 In Amax Potash Ltd. v. Government of Saskatchewan, [1977] 2 S.C.R. 576, this Court went further and held ultra vires a statute that prohibited the recovery of taxes paid under protest pursuant to an unconstitutional statute. Dickson J. (as he then was) succinctly put the principle in these terms at p. 592:

The principle governing this appeal can be shortly and simply expressed in these terms: if a statute is found to be ultra vires the legislature which enacted it, legislation [page545] which would have the effect of attaching legal consequences to acts done pursuant to that invalid law must equally be ultra vires because it relates to the same subject-matter as that which was involved in the prior legislation. If a state cannot take by unconstitutional means it cannot retain by unconstitutional means.

11 Let us examine the present situation in the light of these principles. Until the passage of the Crown Proceeding Act, the traditional way to sue the Crown, we saw, was by petition of right, but no court would take cognizance of a case until the Lieutenant Governor had issued his fiat. This traditional procedure has been retained in British Columbia in respect of causes of action against the Crown that arose before August 1, 1974. The present is such an action. The Lieutenant Governor has refused his fiat. Thus, if this refusal is constitutionally permissible, what Amax declared was not possible has been effectively, if indirectly, accomplished by the exercise of the Crown's prerogative power to refuse a fiat.

12 In my view, if even a statute cannot permit the retention of monies obtained under an unconstitutional statute, that result cannot be achieved under a purported exercise of a discretion to refuse a fiat, whatever may be the legal foundation of that supposed discretion. All executive powers, whether they derive from statute, common law or prerogative, must be adapted to conform with constitutional imperatives.

13 There was considerable discussion in the courts below regarding the extent of the discretion of the Lieutenant Governor to grant or deny his fiat. There are indications in some cases that there is, in effect, a duty to grant the fiat unless a claim is frivolous; see Ryves v. Duke of Wellington (1846), 9 Beav. 579, 50 E.R. 467, at p. 475; In re Nathan (1884), 12 Q.B.D. 461, at p. 479. The fiat, Bowen L.J. states in the latter case, is granted as a matter of "invariable grace" by the Crown and it is the constitutional duty of his adviser not to advise refusal of a fiat unless the claim is frivolous. In Orpen v. Attorney General for Ontario, [1925] 2 D.L.R. 366 (Ont. H.C.) at p. 372, however, [page546] Riddell J. explained these remarks as simply reflecting the usual practice. The constitutional duty of the sovereign's advisers in such a case, he stated, is to act conscientiously in their best judgment (p. 375).

14 I need not consider which of these views should prevail in ordinary cases. For whatever discretion there may be in a non-constitutional matter, in a case like the present, the discretion must be exercised in conformity with the dictates of the Constitution, and the Crown's advisers must govern themselves accordingly. Any other course would violate the federal structure of the Constitution. Assuming there might still be a residual power to refuse a fiat in a truly frivolous case, no one can claim this is such a case, and no such contention was put forward.

15 It does not follow, as Taggart J.A. suggested, that if the foregoing constitutional position is correct, then there is no need for Air Canada to seek a fiat. The principle I have enunciated must be applied within the context of the institutional arrangements provided by law. The only machinery provided for obtaining a judgment for money against the Crown in circumstances like the present is, by virtue of the Crown Proceeding Act, by petition of rights, and to pursue a claim in that way, a fiat is necessary.

16 To achieve this result, Air Canada seeks to obtain an order by way of mandamus directing the Attorney General to advise the Lieutenant-Governor to grant a fiat because the Lieutenant-Governor acts on his advice in considering the grant of a fiat. This power of the Attorney General is exercised in conformity with s. 2(a) and (e) of the Attorney General Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 23, which read as follows:

2. The Attorney General

[page547]

- (a) is the official legal adviser of the Lieutenant Governor and the legal member of the Executive Council;
- . . .
- (e) is entrusted with the powers and charged with the duties which belong to the office of the Attorney General and Solicitor General of England by law or usage, so far as the same powers and duties are applicable to the Province, and also with the powers and duties which, by the laws of Canada and of the Province to be administered and carried into effect by the government of the Province, belong to the office of the Attorney General and Solicitor General;

These provisions make the Attorney General the official legal adviser of the Lieutenant-Governor and the legal member of the Executive Council and, by s. 2(e), entrusts him with the duties of the Attorney General of England as far as these are applicable to the province. This includes the right to advise the Crown regarding the grant of a fiat; see J.L.I.J. Edwards, The Law Officers of the Crown (1964), at p. 154; In re Nathan, supra, at pp. 468, 475, 479; Halsbury's Laws of England, 2nd ed. 1933, vol. 9, para. 1180, note (c). It is true that some cases mention that in England the sovereign acted on the advice of the Secretary of State; see Bombay and Persia Steam Navigation Co. v. MacLay, [1920] 3 K.B. 402, at p. 408; Irwin v. Grey (1862), 3 F. & F. 635, 176 E.R. 290 (C.P.), at p. 291. But as is obvious from the latter case, the Secretary's duties in this area were essentially to receive petitions of right and, after seeking the opinion of the law officers thereon, to advise Her Majesty accordingly.

17 A similar position prevails in British Columbia. There the Provincial Secretary is assigned the task of receiving petitions for transmittal to the Lieutenant Governor for consideration. This is done by s. 4 of the Crown Procedure Act, R.S.B.C. 1960, c. 89, which reads as follows:

4. (1) The petition shall be left with the Provincial Secretary, in order that the same may be submitted to the Lieutenant-Governor for his consideration, and in [page548] order that the Lieutenant-Governor, if he thinks fit, may grant his fiat that right be done.
- (2) No fee or sum of money shall be payable by the suppliant on so leaving the petition, or upon his receiving back the same.

18 As Taggart and Anderson J.J.A. in the Court of Appeal explain, however, the Provincial Secretary seeks the advice of the Attorney General, the legal member of the Executive Council, before referring the matter to the Executive Council. The Executive Council then advises the Lieutenant Governor as to the manner in which he should dispose of the matter on the recommendation of the Attorney General.

19 From the foregoing, it seems to me that the appropriate officer against whom an order by way of mandamus should issue in this case is the Attorney General. He is the Lieutenant Governor's principal legal adviser, and I am inclined to agree with Anderson J.A.'s view that, by virtue of s. 2 of the Attorney General Act, he is entrusted with the sole power and duty to advise the Lieutenant Governor whether or not to issue a fiat. That was the English position, which s. 2(e) adopts. One must make a distinction here between the Lieutenant Governor and the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. The latter includes the Executive Council; the former does not; see Interpretation Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 206, s. 29. It is to the Lieutenant-Governor alone that the power to issue a fiat is given by the Crown Procedure Act. That being so, as Anderson J.A. notes, there is no legal scope for the involvement of the Executive Council. The referral to the Council becomes a mere formality.

20 It is not really necessary, however, to pronounce definitively on the latter issues. Even on the assumption that under ordinary circumstances there is a meaningful role for the Executive Council to play in deciding whether or not a fiat should issue, I would retain the same view. Technicality must be tempered with realism. The Attorney General is the Lieutenant Governor's principal legal adviser and the legal member of the Executive Council. Though his duty is technically simply to advise, the issue here is a legal one, one moreover to which under the Constitution, there is only [page549] one answer. In giving advice, the Attorney General must conform to the requirements imposed by the federal structure of the Constitution. He is bound to advise the Lieutenant-Governor to grant his fiat. I cannot accept the proposition advanced by Callaghan J. and the majority of the Court of Appeal to the effect that the Attorney General complied with his duty to advise the Lieutenant Governor when he advised him to refuse a fiat.

21 The Executive Council is in turn bound to accept the advice of the Attorney General in a case like the present. For, even if it has a right to advise the Lieutenant Governor, it, too, is under an obligation to exercise that right consistently with constitutional imperatives. In any event, one could look at the order sought as being directed to the Attorney General in a representative capacity; see Attorney General of Canada v. Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, [1980] 2 S.C.R. 735.

22 Finally, I would note that there is precedent for the kind of order sought here. Teh Cheng Poh v. Public Prosecutor Malaysia, [1980] A.C. 458 (P.C.) stands for the proposition that mandamus lies to compel a minister to properly advise the executive where there has been a constitutional abuse of power by the Crown; see also Padfield v. Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries & Food, [1968] A.C. 997 (H.L.)

23 Finally, counsel for the respondent argued that a judgment along these lines would preclude the province's relying not only on Crown immunity, but also on limitation periods, retroactive remedial legislation and mutual mistake of law to retain monies collected under ultra vires legislation. While I do not wish to enter into these issues at any length, I do not think this conclusion necessarily follows. There is a difference between an executive act directly interfering with a recourse to the courts for the recovery of monies under an allegedly unconstitutional statute and relying on general principles of law like limitation periods which are aimed at different purposes, in that case, [page550] barring stale claims. The significance of this distinction is best left to be raised in the principal action when the matter, which was simply touched upon in this Court, can be examined in depth.

24 For these reasons, I would allow the appeal set aside the decision of the judge who heard the application, reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeal of British Columbia, and direct that an order in the nature of mandamus issue directing the Attorney General to advise the Lieutenant Governor to grant his fiat to the petition of right in this case.

Case Summary

Appeal by the Crown from an order of a motions judge setting aside a Prothonotary's order striking out the respondents' action for damages for breach of agreements respecting their snow crab fishing quotas, as result of the Minister's reallocation of the snow crab quota for other purposes. Although the respondents did not allege that this reallocation was unauthorized, they argued that they were entitled to compensation for any resulting loss in accordance with their agreements with the Minister. The Prothonotary ordered that all those portions of the respondents' pleadings that asserted their claim in contract were to be struck out, on the ground that they disclosed no reasonable cause of action since the Minister could not, by means of contract, fetter his discretion to award fishing quota. As for the balance of the claims, the Prothonotary ordered that they be stayed. The Motions Judge set aside the Prothonotary's decision striking the portions of the pleadings asserting a claim in contract on the basis that this was a complex issue of fact and law which should not be resolved on a motion to strike. With respect to the other claims asserted by the respondents, the Motions Judge was not prepared to find that it was plain and obvious that those claims would fail. The Crown argued that the claim was a collateral attack on the Minister's licensing decisions, the legality of which must first be established by means of an application for judicial review.

HELD: Appeal dismissed.

Since the respondents accepted that the Minister's decisions were validly made, the action should be allowed to proceed on that basis. Should it become apparent later that the respondents must rely upon the illegality of the Minister's decisions in order to succeed, the Crown's arguments could be dealt with at that time.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

PELLETIER J.A.

1 This is an appeal from the decision of Mr. Justice Martineau of the Federal Court (the Motions Judge), reported as Arsenault v. Canada, 2008 FC 299, 330 F.T.R. 8, in which the Motions Judge set aside a decision of Prothonotary Morneau. The issue in the appeal is the application of this Court's decision in Grenier v. Canada, 2005 FCA 348, [2006] 2 F.C.R. 287 (Grenier), to the facts pleaded in the respondents' statement of claim and, in particular, whether the claim should be stayed until the respondents have challenged certain decisions of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (the Minister) by way of judicial review.

2 The respondents are fishermen and residents of Prince Edward Island. Their allegations against the Minister are concisely set out in the Crown's memorandum of fact and law as follows:

4. According to the statement of claim, the Respondents allege that between 1990 and 2002 they entered into a series of agreements with the Minister (the Individual Quota Agreements) that provided them each with a certain quota out of the total allowable catch ("TAC") for Prince Edward Island for snow crab fishing.
5. In addition to the Individual Quota Agreements, the Respondents also claim to have entered into an agreement with the Minister pursuant to which First Nations would be brought into the fishery through a voluntary licence buy-back and that no increase in the number of fishing licenses or in the actual fishing effort would result from the integration of the aboriginal fishery (the "Marshall Agreement").
6. The Respondents claim that both the Individual Quota Agreements and the Marshall Agreement contained implicit promises that the appellant would compensate them for any breach of the agreements.
7. The Respondents claim that as a result of various measures taken by the Minister in May 2003, which were continued or repeated from 2004 to 2006, the agreements were broken. They claim that the Minister reallocated a portion of the snow crab quota, to which they were entitled under the Agreements, for other purposes in each of these years.

3 The respondents do not contest this statement of the facts.

4 The respondents claim that they are entitled to be compensated for the loss of quota, either as damages for breach of contract, or, if no enforceable contract is found, as damages for negligent misrepresentation. In addition, the respondents raise a number of other potential heads of recovery, but insist that their claim is first and foremost a claim for compensation from the Minister in accordance with his contractual undertaking to compensate them for loss of their share of the Total Allowable Catch (TAC).

5 The respondents do not allege that the Minister's reallocation of the TAC was unauthorized or otherwise unlawful. They agree that the Minister was entitled to exercise his discretion under the Fisheries Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. F-14, as he did, but say that if the exercise of that discretion caused them a loss, then they were entitled to be compensated in accordance with their agreement with the Minister.

6 In the Crown's view, the respondents' claim is, in essence, an attack upon the validity of the various decisions that the respondents claim have caused them a loss. As a result, the Crown brought a motion seeking to have the respondents' claim struck, or, in the alternative, for an order staying the respondents' claim until such time as the validity of the ministerial orders had been determined in an application for judicial review. The Prothonotary ordered that all those portions of the respondents' pleadings that assert their claim in contract were to be struck out on the ground that they disclosed no reasonable cause of action since the Minister could not, by means of contract, fetter his discretion to award fishing quota. As for the balance of the claims, the Prothonotary ordered that they be stayed and gave the respondents time to file a motion seeking an extension of time to commence an application for judicial review.

7 The Prothonotary's decision was appealed to the Federal Court. The Motions Judge set aside the Prothonotary's decision striking the portions of the pleadings asserting a claim in contract, on the basis that this was a complex issue of fact and law which should not be resolved on a motion to strike. With respect to the other claims asserted by the respondents, the Motions Judge was not prepared to find that it was plain and obvious that those claims would fail.

8 The Crown appeals from the Motions Judge's decision on two grounds. The first is that he erred in applying the "plain and obvious" test articulated in Hunt v. Carey Canada Inc., [1990] 2 S.C.R. 959, as this test is not appropriate when the issue is whether to strike a claim for want of jurisdiction. The second is that, notwithstanding the respondents' protestations to the contrary, their claim is a collateral attack on the Minister's licensing decisions whose legality must first be established by means of an application for judicial review.

9 The Crown's argument with respect to the "plain and obvious" test is simply that the Court either has jurisdiction or it does not, therefore the Court must make a positive finding on that issue rather than relying on the "plain and obvious" test. The Crown says that in order to do so, the Court is entitled to look past the causes of action pleaded by the respondents and to determine the "essence" or the "substance" of the respondents' claim. In point of fact, the two arguments advanced by the Crown are but two aspects of the same argument, namely that when one looks past the words of the respondents' claims to their true nature, the respondents are mounting a collateral attack on the Minister's decisions, as a result of which the Court is in a position to make a positive finding on the jurisdictional issue.

10 In my view, for the purposes of Rule 221(1) of the Federal Courts Rules, SOR/98-106, the moving party must take the opposing party's pleadings as they find them, and cannot resort to reading into a claim something which is not there. The Crown cannot, by its construction of the respondents' claim, make it say something which it does not say.

11 The Crown's preoccupation with jurisdiction, at this preliminary stage, is, it seems to me, misplaced. This Court's decision in Grenier makes it clear that a party cannot attack the legality of an administrative decision except by means of an application for judicial review. A party derives no advantage by commencing an action based on the illegality of an administrative decision without first having had the decision declared illegal because, eventually, Grenier will have to be dealt with. No one has an interest in spending thousands of dollars on an action which cannot succeed. If the pleadings do not raise illegality, the Court should not strive to find it for the purposes of forcing litigants into a judicial review application which is inconsistent with the position they have taken in their action.

12 Since the respondents accept that the Minister's decisions were validly made pursuant to the Fisheries Act, the action should be allowed to proceed on that basis. Should it become apparent later that the respondents must rely upon the illegality of the Minister's decisions in order to succeed, the issue of the application of Grenier can be dealt with at that time.

13 I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

William (Billy) Solosky (Plaintiff), Appellant; and Her Majesty The Queen (Defendant), Respondent.

ON APPEAL FROM THE FEDERAL COURT OF APPEAL

Case Summary

Prisons — Censorship of prisoners' mail — Right of prison inmates to communicate in confidence with their solicitors — Solicitor-client privilege — Inmate failing to establish entitlement to a declaration — Penitentiary Service Regulations, SOR/62-90 — Canadian Bill of Rights, 1960 (Can.), c. 44, ss. 1(b), (d), 2(c)(ii).

The appellant, imprisoned at Millhaven Institution, commenced an action in the Federal Court of Canada for a declaration that "properly identified items of correspondence directed to and received from his solicitor shall henceforth be regarded as privileged correspondence and shall be forwarded to their respective destinations unopened". The action was dismissed and on appeal to the Federal Court of Appeal the pleadings were amended to request a declaration "..... that henceforth all properly identified items of solicitor-client correspondence should be forwarded to their respective destinations unopened". The appeal failed, and at the opening of the appeal in this Court counsel for the appellant moved to substitute, for the prayer for relief in the statement of claim, a declaration that the order of the Director of Millhaven Institution that the appellant's mail be opened and read "insofar as it has been applied to mail originating from his solicitor David Cole, and to mail written by the Plaintiff to his solicitor David Cole, is not authorized by law".

In accordance with the Penitentiary Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. P-6, and Regulations thereunder, an institutional head of a penitentiary may order censorship of inmate correspondence to the extent considered necessary or desirable for the rehabilitation of the inmate or the security of the institution. The main ground upon which the appellant rested his case was solicitor-client privilege.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

Contrary to the views expressed by the Court below, the important issues raised in this case should not be determined by the particular form of wording employed in the prayer for relief, or on the basis that the question is hypothetical.

There could be no doubt that there was a real, and not a hypothetical, dispute between the parties. The declaration sought was a direct and present challenge to the censorship order of the Director of Millhaven Institute. That order, so long as it continues, from the past through the present and into the future, is in controversy. The fact that a declaration today cannot cure past ills, or may affect future rights, cannot of itself, deprive the remedy of its potential utility in resolving the dispute over the Director's continuing order. Once one accepts that the dispute is real and that the granting of judgment is discretionary, then the only further issue is whether the declaration is capable of having any practical effect in resolving the issues in the case. The determination of the right of prison inmates to correspond, freely and in confidence with their solicitors, is of great practical importance, although, admittedly, any such determination relates to correspondence not yet written. However poorly framed the prayer for relief may be, even as twice amended, the present claim was clearly directed to the procedures for handling prison mail and the invocation in relation thereto of solicitor-client privilege.

Recent case law has taken the traditional doctrine of solicitor-client privilege and placed it on a new plane. Privilege is no longer regarded merely as a rule of evidence which acts as a shield to prevent privileged materials from being tendered in evidence in a court room. The courts, unwilling to so restrict the concept, have extended its application well beyond those limits. However, while there is no question that the Canadian courts have been moving towards a broader concept of solicitor-client privilege, the concept has not been stretched far enough to save the appellant's case. Although there has been a move away from treating solicitor-client privilege as a rule of evidence that can only be asserted at the time the privileged material is sought to be introduced as evidence, the move from rigid temporal restrictions has not gone as far as the appellant contends. The appellant's suggestion that privilege has come to be recognized as a "fundamental principle", more properly characterized as a "rule of property", was not accepted. Without the evidentiary connection, which the law now requires, the privilege cannot be invoked.

The statutory disciplinary regime, described in this case, does not derogate from the common law doctrine of solicitor and client privilege, as presently conceived, but the appellant was seeking in this appeal something well beyond the limits of the privilege, even as amplified in modern cases.

In aid of his main submission, appellant argued faintly that the Penitentiary Service Regulations and Commissioner's Directive should not be construed and applied so as to abrogate, abridge, or infringe any of the rights or freedom recognized in the Canadian Bill of Rights by s. 1(b) (the right of the individual to equality before the law and the protection of the law), 1(d) (freedom of speech) and 2(c)(ii) (the right of a person arrested or detained to retain and instruct counsel without delay). This argument also failed.

One could depart from the current concept of privilege and approach the case on the broader basis that (i) the right to communicate in confidence with one's legal adviser is a fundamental civil and legal right, founded upon the unique relationship of solicitor and client, and (ii) a person confined to prison retains all of his civil rights, other than those expressly or impliedly taken from him by law. In that context, the Court was faced with the interpretation of the Penitentiary Service Regulations and Commissioner's Directive No. 219.

It was submitted there are three alternative interpretations of the scope of Regulations 2.17 and 2.18 which may govern the extent of the authority of the institutional head in dealing with an envelope which appears to have originated from a solicitor, or to be addressed to a solicitor, in circumstances where the institutional head has reason to believe that the unrestricted and unexamined passage of mail to or from the particular inmate in question represents a danger to the safety and security of the institution. The third such interpretation was as follows: "he may order that the envelope be subject to opening and examination to the minimum extent necessary to establish whether it is properly the subject of solicitor-client privilege". This alternative represents that interpretation of the scope of the Regulations which permits to an inmate the maximum opportunity to communicate with his solicitor through the mails that is consistent with the requirement to maintain the safety and security of the institution.

The "minimum extent necessary to establish whether it is properly the subject of solicitor-client privilege" should be interpreted in such manner that (i) the contents of an envelope may be inspected for contraband; (ii) in limited circumstances, the communication may be read to ensure that it, in fact, contains a confidential communication between solicitor and client written for the purpose of seeking or giving legal advice; (iii) the letter should only be read if there are reasonable and probable grounds for believing the contrary, and then only to the extent necessary to determine the bona fides of the communication; (iv) the authorized penitentiary official who examines the envelope, upon ascertaining that the envelope contains nothing in breach of security, is under a duty at law to maintain the confidentiality of the communication.

Per Estey J.: As to the above item (iii) in the catalogue of considerations in the interpretation of the expression "minimum extent necessary to establish whether it is properly the subject of solicitor-client privilege", any procedure adopted with reference to the scrutiny of letters passing from solicitor to client should, wherever reasonably possible, recognize the solicitor-client privilege long established in the law.

DICKSON J.

DICKSON J.— This case concerns the censorship of prisoners' mail and the right of an inmate of a federal penitentiary to communicate in confidence with his solicitor. The appellant, imprisoned at Millhaven Institution, commenced an action in the Federal Court for a declaration that "properly identified items of correspondence directed to and received from his solicitor shall henceforth be regarded as privileged correspondence and shall be forwarded to their respective destinations unopened".

I

Prison Disciplinary Regime

The penitentiary authorities rely upon the following statutes and Regulations as authorizing restrictions upon the personal correspondence of prison inmates. Section 660(1) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34, provides that a sentence of imprisonment shall be served in accordance with the enactments and rules that govern the institution to which the prisoner is sentenced. Section 29(1) of the Penitentiary Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. P-6, empowers the Governor in Council to make regulations for the custody, treatment, training, employment, and discipline of inmates, and, generally, for carrying into effect the purposes and provisions of The Penitentiary Act. Section 29(3) authorizes the Commissioner of Penitentiaries to make rules, known as Commissioner's directives, for the custody, treatment, training, employment, and discipline of inmates, and the good government of penitentiaries.

Pursuant to the foregoing, Penitentiary Service Relations SOR/62-90, were passed, which provide in part, as follows:

Institutional Heads

- 1.12(1) The institutional head is responsible for the direction of his staff, the organization, safety and security of his institution and the correctional training of all inmates confined therein.

Visiting and Correspondence

- 2.17 The visiting and correspondence privileges that may, in accordance with directives, be permitted to inmates shall be such as are, in all the circumstances, calculated to assist in the reformation and rehabilitation of the inmate.

Censorship

- 2.18 In so far as practicable the censorship of correspondence shall be avoided and the privacy of visits shall be maintained, but nothing herein shall be deemed to limit the authority of the Commissioner to direct or the institutional head to order censorship of correspondence or supervision of visiting to the extent considered necessary or desirable for the reformation and rehabilitation of inmates or the security of the institution.

It will be observed then that the Regulations, the validity of which are not challenged by the appellant, expressly recognize the authority of the institutional head of a penitentiary to order censorship of inmate correspondence to the extent considered necessary or desirable for the security of the institution. These Regulations are implemented by Commissioner's Directive No. 219 (as amended following the date of issuance of the statement of claim in these proceedings, but prior to the date of trial). The following paragraphs are pertinent to the present inquiry:

Directive

- 5.a. Penitentiary staff shall promote and facilitate correspondence between inmates and their families, friends, and other individuals and agencies who can be expected to make a contribution to the inmate's rehabilitation within the institution and to assist in his subsequent and eventual return to the community.
- c. Subject to the provisions of paragraph 14 every inmate shall be permitted to correspond with any person, and shall be responsible for the contents of every article of correspondence of which he is the author. There shall be no restriction to the number of letters sent or received by inmates, unless it is evident that there is mass production.

Paragraph 5 d. makes provision for inspection for contraband, in these terms:

- d. Subject to the provisions of paragraph 8, every item of correspondence to or from an inmate may be opened by institutional authorities for inspection for contraband.

Censorship, dealt with in para. 7, is defined as any examination (other than for the express purpose of searching for contraband) and includes the reading, reproducing, extracting, or withdrawing of inmate correspondence. Paragraph 7 b. makes the point that censorship in any form is to be avoided, but reserves to the Commissioner of Penitentiaries and to the Institutional Director the authority to censor for one of two purposes, the rehabilitation of the inmate, or the security of the institution. Paragraph 7 b. reads:

Censorship of correspondence in any form shall be avoided, but nothing herein shall be deemed to limit the authority of the Commissioner to direct, or the Institutional Director to order, censorship of correspondence in any form, to the extent considered necessary or desirable for the rehabilitation of the inmate or the security of the institution. (PSR 2.18). Any form of censorship shall be undertaken only with the approval of the Institutional Director.

The Directive seeks to maintain the confidentiality of the contents of correspondence. Paragraph 7 c. states that only authorized staff shall be allowed to read inmate mail, when necessary, and further provides that no comments, other than those required for official duties, shall be made to other members of the staff on the contents of the correspondence.

Paragraph 8 of Directive 219 speaks of "privileged correspondence", defined as "properly identified and addressed items directed to and received from" any of a lengthy list of persons including, among others, members of the Senate, members of the House of Commons, members of provincial legislatures, and provincial ombudsmen. Conspicuous is the absence of any reference to inmates' legal representatives. Privileged correspondence is forwarded to the addressee unopened with the proviso that in exceptional cases, where institutional staff suspect contraband in such privileged correspondence, the Commissioner's approval shall be obtained before it is opened. Paragraph 8 clearly countenances the maintenance of uncensored channels of mail for complaints and grievances. But the restricted listing of destinations assures that the channels through which grievances pass are limited to internal procedures (Solicitor General, Commissioner of Penitentiaries, Correctional Investigator) or political outlets (Members of Parliament and Senators). Lawyers are mentioned in paragraph 10 c. of Directive No. 219, "Use of Telephone and Telegraph", which reads:

- c. In urgent cases where lawyers call their inmate clients, and wish to communicate privately with them, the institutional authorities shall ask the lawyer to leave his name and telephone number and, following verification of the lawyer's identity, a call shall originate from the institution.

For the purposes of trial, an agreed statement of facts was filed. Paragraphs 4 and 5 of the statement are in the following terms:

4. Pursuant to section 6 paragraph (b) [s. 7(b), as amended,] of Directive No. 219, John Dowsett, Director of Millhaven Institution has ordered that William (Billy) Solosky's mail be opened and read. This order has been applied to mail originating from his solicitor David Cole.
5. William (Billy) Solosky's mail is being read because it is John Dowsett's opinion that William (Billy) Solosky's conduct, activities and attitude cause him to believe that attention should be paid to his incoming and outgoing correspondence. Those letters which are deemed to be significant with respect to the security of the institution are being brought to the attention of John Dowsett.

Paragraph 5 of the statement of defence clarifies any obscurity in para. 5 of the agreed statement of facts. The statement of defence reads "The security of the Millhaven Institution has required that the Plaintiff's mail be opened."

II

Judicial History

Mr. Justice Addy, at trial, was of the view that solicitor and client privilege, upon which the appellant founds his case, can only be claimed document by document and that each document is privileged only to the extent it meets the criteria which would support the privilege. Whether a letter does, in fact, contain a privileged communication cannot be determined until it has been opened and read. There is no logical nor legal justification for permitting correspondence which appears to have emanated from, or to be addressed to, a solicitor to enjoy any special aura of protection. Mr. Justice Addy relied upon these propositions in dismissing the appellant's action, with costs. He buttressed his conclusion by the argument that in this situation it would be too easy for a person to obtain envelopes and letterheads bearing the name and title of a real or fictitious solicitor, and equally as easy for a prisoner to camouflage the true identity of an addressee.

The appellant appealed to the Federal Court of Appeal. In that Court, his counsel amended the pleadings to request a declaration "... that henceforth all properly identified items of solicitor-client correspondence should be forwarded to their respective destinations unopened". The revised form of declaration differs little from that appearing in the amended statement of claim. Both are defective, at least to this extent--it is not every item of correspondence passing between solicitor and client to which privilege attaches, for only those in which the client seeks the advice of counsel in his professional capacity, or in which counsel gives advice, are protected. That a privilege may not encompass all solicitor and client communications is clearly illustrated by the correspondence exhibited in the present case. Some of the letters concerned the appellant's parole review. Others merely contained criticism of the administration, information about other inmates, and prison gossip. One letter enclosed a second letter with the request that the second letter be forwarded to a named magazine for publication.

The Federal Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal, holding that a declaration that all correspondence between the appellant and his solicitor be declared privileged would extend considerably the ambit of the solicitor-client privilege as it is generally known and understood. To grant the declaration sought would be to give to the appellant an extension of the privilege afforded to the ordinary citizen. As a second ground for rejecting the appeal, the Court held that by issuing an order relating to correspondence not yet written, the court would be granting relief on the basis of purely hypothetical issues, and in futuro. Assuming jurisdiction, the case was not one where jurisdiction should be asserted.

III

Declaratory Relief

At the opening of the appeal in this Court, counsel for the appellant moved to substitute, for the prayer for relief in the statement of claim, a declaration that the order of the Director of Millhaven Institution that the appellant's mail be opened and read "insofar as it has been applied to mail originating from his solicitor David Cole, and to mail written by the Plaintiff to his solicitor David Cole, is not authorized by law". The amended form of prayer seems to have been conceived with a view to meeting the point, taken by the Federal Court of Appeal, that the relief earlier sought would relate to letters not yet written.

With great respect for the views expressed in the Federal Court of Appeal, I do not think that the important issues raised in these proceedings should be determined by the particular form of wording employed in the prayer for relief, or on the basis that the question is hypothetical.

Declaratory relief is a remedy neither constrained by form nor bounded by substantive content, which avails persons sharing a legal relationship, in respect of which a 'real issue' concerning the relative interests of each has been raised and falls to be determined.

The principles which guide the court in exercising jurisdiction to grant declarations have been stated time and again. In the early case of Russian Commercial and Industrial Bank v. British Bank for Foreign Trade Ltd. [1921] 2 A.C. 438], in which parties to a contract sought assistance in construing it, the Court affirmed that declarations can be granted where real, rather than fictitious or academic, issues are raised. Lord Dunedin set out this test (at p. 448):

The question must be a real and not a theoretical question, the person raising it must have a real interest to raise it, he must be able to secure a proper contradictor, that is to say, someone presently existing who has a true interest to oppose the declaration sought.

In Pyx Granite Co. Ltd. v. Ministry of Housing and Local Government [[1958] 1 Q.B. 554], (rev'd [1960] A.C. 260, on other grounds), Lord Denning described the declaration in these general terms (p. 571):

... if a substantial question exists which one person has a real interest to raise, and the other to oppose, then the court has a discretion to resolve it by a declaration, which it will exercise if there is good reason for so doing.

The jurisdiction of the court to grant declaratory relief was again stated, in the broadest language, in Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain v. Dickson [[1970] A.C. 403 (H.L.)], a case in which the applicant sought a declaration that a proposed motion of the pharmaceutical society, if passed, would be ultra vires its objects and in unreasonable restraint of trade. In the course of his judgment, Lord Upjohn stated, at p. 433:

A person whose freedom of action is challenged can always come to the court to have his rights and position clarified, subject always, of course, to the right of the court in exercise of its judicial discretion to refuse relief in the circumstances of the case.

In the instant case, Mellstrom v. Garner [(1970), 1 W.L.R. 603], was cited in the Federal Court of Appeal in support of the proposition that courts will not grant declarations regarding the future. There, a chartered accountant and former partner of the defendant sought a declaration as to the true construction of the agreement by which the partnership had been dissolved. The plaintiff asked whether, having regard to a clause in the agreement, he would be in breach were he to solicit clients or business of the 'continuing partners'. Karminski L.J. held that declarations concerning the future ought to be approached with considerable reserve. Since neither the plaintiff nor the defendants had broken the provisions of the clause in question, nor sought to do so, there was no useful purpose to be gained in granting the declaration. The application was dismissed. That is a very different case from the present one.

As Hudson suggests in his article, "Declaratory Judgments in Theoretical Cases: The Reality of the Dispute" (1977), 3 Dal.L.J. 706:

The declaratory action is discretionary and the two factors which will influence the court in the exercise of its discretion are the utility of the remedy, if granted, and whether, if it is granted, it will settle the questions at issue between the parties.

The first factor is directed to the "reality of the dispute". It is clear that a declaration will not normally be granted when the dispute is over and has become academic, or where the dispute has yet to arise and may not arise. As Hudson stresses, however, one must distinguish, on the one hand, between a declaration that concerns "future" rights and "hypothetical" rights, and, on the other hand, a declaration that may be "immediately available" when it determines the rights of the parties at the time of the decision together with the necessary implications and consequences of these rights, known as future rights. (p. 710)

Here there can be no doubt that there is a real and not a hypothetical, dispute between the parties. The declaration sought is a direct and present challenge to the censorship order of the Director of Millhaven Institute. That order, so long as it continues, from the past through the present and into the future, is in controversy. The fact that a declaration today cannot cure past ills, or may affect future rights, cannot of itself, deprive the remedy of its potential utility in resolving the dispute over the Director's continuing order.

Once one accepts that the dispute is real and that the granting of judgment is discretionary, then the only further issue is whether the declaration is capable of having any practical effect in resolving the issues in the case.

The determination of the right of prison inmates to correspond, freely and in confidence with their solicitors, is of great practical importance, although, admittedly, any such determination relates to correspondence not yet written.

However poorly framed the prayer for relief may be, even as twice amended, the present claim is clearly directed to the procedures for handling prison mail and the invocation in relation thereto of solicitor-client privilege. It is not directed to the characterization of specific and individual items of correspondence. If the appellant is entitled to a declaration, it is within this Court's discretion to settle the wording of the declaration: see de Smith, Judicial Review of Administrative Action (3rd ed. 1973, p. 431). Further, s. 50 of the Supreme Court Act allows the Court to make amendments necessary to a determination of the "real issue", without application by the parties.

IV

Solicitor-Client Privilege

As I have indicated, the main ground upon which the appellant rests his case is solicitor-client privilege. The concept of privileged communications between a solicitor and his client has long been recognized as fundamental to the due administration of justice. As Jackett C.J. aptly stated in Re Director of Investigation and Research and Shell Canada Ltd. [(1975), 22 C.C.C. (2d) 70, [1975] F.C. 184], at pp. 78-9:

... the protection, civil and criminal, afforded to the individual by our law is dependent upon his having the aid and guidance of those skilled in the law untrammelled by any apprehension that the full and frank disclosure by him of all his facts and thoughts to his legal advisor might somehow become available to third persons so as to be used against him.

The history of the privilege can be traced to the reign of Elizabeth I (see Berd v. Lovelace [(1577), 21 E.R. 33] and Dennis v. Codrington [(1580), 21 E.R. 53]). It stemmed from respect for the 'oath and honour' of the lawyer, dutybound to guard closely the secrets of his client, and was restricted in operation to an exemption from testimonial compulsion. Thereafter, in stages, privilege was extended to include communications exchanged during other litigation, those made in contemplation of litigation, and finally, any consultation for legal advice, whether litigious or not. The classic statement of the policy grounding the privilege was given by Brougham L.C. in Greenough v. Gaskell [(1833), 39 E.R. 618], at p. 620:

The foundation of this rule is not difficult to discover. It is not (as has sometimes been said) on account of any particular importance which the law attributes to the business of legal professors, or any particular disposition to afford them protection (though certainly it may not be very easy to discover why a like privilege has been refused to others, and especially to medical advisers).

But it is out of regard to the interests of justice, which cannot be upholden, and to the administration of justice, which cannot go on without the aid of men skilled in jurisprudence, in the practice of the courts, and in those matters affecting rights and obligations which form the subject of all judicial proceedings. If the privilege did not exist at all, every one would be thrown upon his own legal resources. Deprived of all professional assistance, a man would not venture to consult any skilful person, or would only dare to tell his counsellor half his case.

The rationale was put this way by Jessel M.R. in Anderson v. Bank of British Columbia [(1976), 2 Ch. 644], at p. 649:

The object and meaning of the rule is this: that as, by reason of the complexity and difficulty of our law, litigation can only be properly conducted by professional men, it is absolutely necessary that a man, in order to prosecute his rights or to defend himself from an improper claim, should have resource to the assistance of professional lawyers, and it being so absolutely necessary, it is equally necessary, to use a vulgar phrase, that he should be able to make a clean breast of it to the gentleman whom he consults with a view to the prosecution of his claim, or the substantiating of his defence against the claim of others; that he should be able to place unrestricted and unbounded confidence in the professional agent, and that the communications he so makes to him should be kept secret, unless with his consent (for it is his privilege, and not the privilege of the confidential agent), that he should be enabled properly to conduct his litigation.

Wigmore [8 Wigmore, Evidence (McNaughton rev. 1961) para. 2292] framed the modern principle of privilege for solicitor-client communications, as follows:

Where legal advice of any kind is sought from a professional legal adviser in his capacity as such, the communications relating to the purpose made in confidence by the client are at his instance permanently protected from disclosures by himself or by the legal adviser, except the protection be waived.

There are exceptions to the privilege. The privilege does not apply to communications in which legal advice is neither sought nor offered, that is to say, where the lawyer is not contacted in his professional capacity. Also, where the communication is not intended to be confidential, privilege will not attach, O'Shea v. Woods [1891 P. 286], at p. 289. More significantly, if a client seeks guidance from a lawyer in order to facilitate the commission of a crime or a fraud, the communication will not be privileged and it is immaterial whether the lawyer is an unwitting dupe or knowing participant. The classic case is R. v. Cox and Railton [(1884), 14 Q.B.D. 153], in which Stephen J. had this to say (p. 167): "A communication in furtherance of a criminal purpose does not 'come in the ordinary scope of professional employment'."

Recent case law has taken the traditional doctrine of privilege and placed it on a new plane. Privilege is no longer regarded merely as a rule of evidence which acts as a shield to prevent privileged materials from being tendered in evidence in a court room. The courts, unwilling to so restrict the concept, have extended its application well beyond those limits. See Re Director of Investigation and Research and Canada Safeway Ltd. [(1972), 26 D.L.R. (3d) 745 (B.C.S.C.)]; Re Director of Investigation and Research and Shell Canada Ltd., supra; Re Presswood et al. and International Chemalloy Corp. [(1975), 65 D.L.R. (3d) 228 (Ont. N.C.)], Re Borden and Elliot and The Queen [(1975), 30 C.C.C. (2d) 337], (affirmed on other grounds [(1975), 30 C.C.C. (2d) 345 (Ont. While there is no question that the Canadian courts have been moving towards a broader concept of solicitor-client privilege, I do not think the concept has been stretched far enough to save the appellant's case. Although there has been a move away from treating solicitor-client privilege as a rule of evidence that can only be asserted at the time the privileged material is sought to be introduced as evidence, the move from rigid temporal restrictions has not gone as far as the appellant contends. In the factum of the appellant, it is suggested that the privilege has come to be recognized as a "fundamental principle", more properly characterized as a "rule of property". The cases cited in support of this proposition, however, all involved search warrants that caught documents to which the privilege unquestionably attached. In those cases, such as Re Borden & Elliot and The Queen, supra, the search warrant led to the seizure of documents believed "to afford evidence." If privilege were to attach to the documents, then such material could not afford evidence at trial and hence the evidentiary connection remained.

The judgments can be rationalized as merely shifting the time at which the privilege can be asserted. As the comment by Kasting in (1978), 24 McGill L.J. 115, "Recent Developments in the Law of Solicitor-Client Privilege" suggests, the shift away from the strict rule-of-evidence-at-trial approach has taken place by logical extensions. Chassé, in his annotation at (1977), 36 C.R.N.S. 349, The Solicitor-Client Privilege and Search Warrants, asserts that the privilege is being looked upon "as more akin to a rule of property rather than merely as a rule of evidence" (p. 350), but the privilege, in my view, is not yet near a rule of property. That is what the privilege must become if the appellant is to succeed.

There is no suggestion in the materials in the case at bar that the authorities intend to employ the letters or extracts obtained therefrom as evidence in any proceeding of any kind. Much as one might well wish to analogize from the search warrant cases to the censorship order here impugned, as a form of blanket search warrant upon appellant's mail, the order cannot be characterized as being directed to obtaining or affording evidence in any proceeding. Without the evidentiary connection, which the law now requires, the appellant cannot invoke the privilege.

As Mr. Justice Addy notes, privilege can only be claimed document by document, with each document being required to meet the criteria for the privilege--(i) a communication between solicitor and client; (ii) which entails the seeking or giving of legal advice; and (iii) which is intended to be confidential by the parties. To make the decision as to whether the privilege attaches, the letters must be read by the judge, which requires, at a minimum, that the documents be under the jurisdiction of a court. Finally, the privilege is aimed at improper use or disclosure, and not at merely opening.

The complication in this case flows from the unique position of the inmate. His mail is opened and read, not with a view to its use in a proceeding, but by reason of the exigencies of institutional security. All of this occurs within prison walls and far from a court or quasi-judicial tribunal. It is difficult to see how the privilege can be engaged, unless one wishes totally to transform the privilege into a rule of property, bereft of an evidentiary basis.

In my view, the statutory disciplinary regime, which I have earlier described, does not derogate from the common law doctrine of solicitor and client privilege, as presently conceived, but the appellant is seeking in this appeal something well beyond the limits of the privilege, even as amplified in modern cases.

V

In aid of his main submission, resting upon privilege, counsel for the appellant argued faintly that the Penitentiary Service Regulations and Commissioner's Directive should not be construed and applied so as to abrogate, abridge, or infringe any of the rights or freedoms recognized in the Canadian Bill of Rights by s. 1(b) (the right of the individual to equality before the law and the protection of the law), 1(d) (freedom of speech) and 2(c)(ii) (the right of a person arrested or detained to retain and instruct counsel without delay). The authorities relied upon by counsel were, in the main, breathalyzer cases dealing with the right of a motorist to communicate with his counsel in private and without delay. These, and other cases cited, give little assistance to the resolution of the issue now before the Court, due to the difference in factual context and relevant considerations. The question in this case is whether the appellant's right to retain and instruct counsel is incompatible with the right of prison authorities to prevent threat to the security of the institution. In my view, there is no such incompatibility provided the exercise of authority is not greater than is necessary to support the security interest. This, as I read it, is precisely the effect of para. 7b. of Directive 219.

With respect to s. 1(b) of the Bill, it has been held by this Court that equality before the law does not require "that all federal statutes must apply to all individuals in the same manner. Legislation dealing with a particular class of people is valid if it is enacted for the purpose of achieving a valid federal objective": Martland J., giving the unanimous reasons of this Court in Prata v. Minister of Manpower and Immigration [[1976] 1 S.C.R. 376], at p. 382.

It is difficult to attack the validity of Penitentiary Service Regulation 2.18 or Directive 219 with a freedom of speech argument, having regard to the will of Parliament, as reflected in the Penitentiary Act and in the Penitentiary Service Regulations, which preserves a limited right of censorship by penitentiary authorities in the interests of security and, at the same time, affords inmates a right to communicate freely through uncensored channels with members of Parliament and provincial legislatures, and the many persons listed in para. 8 of Directive 219.

VI

One may depart from the current concept of privilege and approach the case on the broader basis that (i) the right to communicate in confidence with one's legal adviser is a fundamental civil and legal right, founded upon the unique relationship of solicitor and client, and (ii) a person confined to prison retains all of his civil rights, other than those expressly or impliedly taken from him by law.

In that context, the Court is faced with the interpretation of the Penitentiary Service Regulations and Commissioner's Directive No. 219. Section 2.18 of the Regulations, as earlier noted, undoubtedly reserves the authority of the institutional head to order censorship of correspondence to the extent considered necessary or desirable for the security of the institution. As a general rule, I do not think it is open to the courts to question the judgment of the institutional head as to what may, or may not, be necessary in order to maintain security within a penitentiary. On the other hand, it is to be noted that Penitentiary Service Regulation 2.18 and Commissioner's Directive No. 219 speak in general terms, in their reference to the reading of correspondence and to other forms of censorship, without express mention of solicitor-client correspondence. The right to privacy in solicitor-client correspondence has not been expressly taken away by the language of the Regulations and the Directive.

Most prisons are sufficiently remote that the mail constitutes the prime means of communication to an inmate's solicitor. Nothing is more likely to have a "chilling" effect upon the frank and free exchange and disclosure of confidences, which should characterize the relationship between inmate and counsel, than knowledge that what has been written will be read by some third person, and perhaps used against the inmate at a later date. I do not understand counsel for the Crown to dispute the importance of these considerations.

The result, as I see it, is that the Court is placed in the position of having to balance the public interest in maintaining the safety and security of a penal institution, its staff and its inmates, with the interest represented by insulating the solicitor-client relationship. Even giving full recognition to the right of an inmate to correspond freely with his legal adviser, and the need for minimum derogation therefrom, the scale must ultimately come down in favour of the public interest. But the interference must be no greater than is essential to the maintenance of security and the rehabilitation of the inmate.

The difficulty is in ensuring that the correspondence between the inmate and his solicitor, whether within the doctrine of solicitor-client privilege or not, is not cloaking the passage of drugs, weapons, or escape plans. There must be some mechanism for verification of authenticity. That seems to be generally accepted. Yet, no one has so far suggested what third party mechanism might be adopted, or by what authority the courts could impose such a mechanism upon penitentiary authorities.

Counsel for the Crown submits there are three alternative interpretations of the scope of Regulations 2.17 and 2.18 which may govern the extent of the authority of the institutional head in dealing with an envelope which appears to have originated from a solicitor, or to be addressed to a solicitor, in circumstances where the institutional head has reason to believe that the unrestricted and unexamined passage of mail to or from the particular inmate in question represents a danger to the safety and security of the institution:

- (a) he may nonetheless permit the letter to be delivered unopened and unexamined to the inmate;
- (b) he may suspend the inmate's privilege to receive mail, in respect of that letter, pursuant to sections 2.17 and 2.18 of the Penitentiary Service Regulations.
- (c) he may order that the envelope be subject to opening and examination to the minimum extent necessary to establish whether it is properly the subject of solicitor-client privilege.

Counsel contends that to interpret the Regulations as requiring the first of these alternatives is to leave the institutional head without the authority he requires to control the potential passage of contraband, or of correspondence which may endanger the safety of the institution, under the guise of confidential communications passing between inmate and solicitor. I agree. I would also reject the second as providing no solution. I agree that the third alternative represents that interpretation of the scope of the Regulations which permits to an inmate the maximum opportunity to communicate with his solicitor through the mails that is consistent with the requirement to maintain the safety and security of the institution.

In my view, the "minimum extent necessary to establish whether it is properly the subject of solicitor-client privilege" should be interpreted in such manner that (i) the contents of an envelope may be inspected for contraband; (ii) in limited circumstances, the communication may be read to ensure that it, in fact, contains a confidential communication between solicitor and client written for the purpose of seeking or giving legal advice; (iii) the letter should only be read if there are reasonable and probable grounds for believing the contrary, and then only to the extent necessary to determine the bona fides of the communication; (iv) the authorized penitentiary official who examines the envelope, upon ascertaining that the envelope contains nothing in breach of security, is under a duty at law to maintain the confidentiality of the communication. Paragraph 7c. of Directive 219 underlines this point.

The appellant has failed to establish entitlement to a declaration in any of the three forms he has advanced in these proceedings. The appeal must be dismissed. The respondent is entitled to costs in this Court.

The following are the reasons delivered by

ESTEY J.

ESTEY J.:-- I have had the opportunity of reading the reasons for judgment of my brother Dickson and I concur therein. I only wish to add to item (iii) in his catalogue of considerations in the interpretation of the expression "minimum extent necessary to establish whether it is properly the subject of solicitor-client privilege". Item (iii) reads as follows:

- (iii) the letter only should be read if there are reasonable and probable grounds for believing the contrary, and then only to the extent necessary to confirm the bona fides of the communication;

In my respectful view, any procedure adopted with reference to the scrutiny of letters passing from solicitor to client should, wherever reasonably possible, recognize the solicitor-client privilege long established in the law. Any mechanics adopted for their examination should, subject only to special circumstances indicating an overriding necessity for intervention by the authorities, safeguard communications flowing under the protection of the privilege so as to ensure that the privilege is left in a practical, workable condition; for example, a covering letter from a solicitor forwarding a sealed communication which the solicitor states to be a communication of legal advice should ordinarily shield the enclosure from examination by the authorities. I would dispose of the appeal as proposed by Dickson J.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Summary:

K, a Canadian, has been detained by the U.S. military at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, since 2002, when he was a minor. In 2004, he was charged with war crimes, but the U.S. trial is still pending. In 2003, agents from two Canadian intelligence services, CSIS and DFAIT, questioned K on matters connected to the charges pending against him, and shared the product of these interviews with U.S. authorities. In 2004, a DFAIT official interviewed K again, with knowledge that he had been subjected by U.S. authorities to a sleep deprivation [page46] technique, known as the "frequent flyer program", to make him less resistant to interrogation. In 2008, in Canada (Justice) v. Khadr ("Khadr 2008"), this Court held that the regime in place at Guantanamo Bay constituted a clear violation of Canada's international human rights obligations, and, under s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ordered the Canadian government to disclose to K the transcripts of the interviews he had given to CSIS and DFAIT, which it did. After repeated requests by K that the Canadian government seek his repatriation, the Prime Minister announced his decision not to do so. K then applied to the Federal Court for judicial review, alleging that the decision violated his rights under s. 7 of the Charter. The Federal Court held that under the special circumstances of this case, Canada had a duty to protect K under s. 7 of the Charter and ordered the government to request his repatriation. The Federal Court of Appeal upheld the order, but stated that the s. 7 breach arose from the interrogation conducted in 2004 with the knowledge that K had been subjected to the "frequent flyer program".

Held: The appeal should be allowed in part.

Canada actively participated in a process contrary to its international human rights obligations and contributed to K's ongoing detention so as to deprive him of his right to liberty and security of the person, guaranteed by s. 7 of the Charter, not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. Though the process to which K is subject has changed, his claim is based upon the same underlying series of events considered in Khadr 2008. As held in that case, the Charter applies to the participation of Canadian officials in a regime later found to be in violation of fundamental rights protected by international law. There is a sufficient connection between the government's participation in the illegal process and the deprivation of K's liberty and security of the person. While the U.S. is the primary source of the deprivation, it is reasonable to infer from the uncontradicted evidence before the Court that the statements taken by Canadian officials are contributing to K's continued detention. The deprivation of K's right to liberty and security of the person is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. The interrogation of a youth detained without access to counsel, to elicit statements about serious criminal charges while knowing that the youth had been subjected to sleep deprivation and while knowing that the [page47] fruits of the interrogations would be shared with the prosecutors, offends the most basic Canadian standards about the treatment of detained youth suspects.

K is entitled to a remedy under s. 24(1) of the Charter. The remedy sought by K -- an order that Canada request his repatriation -- is sufficiently connected to the Charter breach that occurred in 2003 and 2004 because of the continuing effect of this breach into the present and its possible effect on K's ultimate trial. While the government must have flexibility in deciding how its duties under the royal prerogative over foreign relations are discharged, the executive is not exempt from constitutional scrutiny. Courts have the jurisdiction and the duty to determine whether a prerogative power asserted by the Crown exists; if so, whether its exercise infringes the Charter or other constitutional norms; and, where necessary, to give specific direction to the executive branch of the government. Here, the trial judge misdirected himself in ordering the government to request K's repatriation, in view of the constitutional responsibility of the executive to make decisions on matters of foreign affairs and the inconclusive state of the record. The appropriate remedy in this case is to declare that K's Charter rights were violated, leaving it to the government to decide how best to respond in light of current information, its responsibility over foreign affairs, and the Charter.

The following is the judgment delivered by

THE COURT

I. Introduction

1 Omar Khadr, a Canadian citizen, has been detained by the United States government at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, for over seven years. The Prime Minister asks this Court to reverse the decision of the Federal Court of Appeal requiring the Canadian government to request the United States to return Mr. Khadr from Guantanamo Bay to Canada.

2 For the reasons that follow, we agree with the courts below that Mr. Khadr's rights under s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms were violated. However, we conclude that the order made by the lower courts that the government request Mr. Khadr's return to Canada is not an appropriate remedy for that breach under s. 24(1) of the Charter. Consistent with the separation of powers and the well-grounded reluctance of courts to intervene in matters of foreign relations, the proper remedy is to grant Mr. Khadr a declaration that his Charter rights have been infringed, while leaving the government a measure of discretion in deciding how best to respond. We would therefore allow the appeal in part.

II. Background

3 Mr. Khadr was 15 years old when he was taken prisoner on July 27, 2002, by U.S. forces in Afghanistan. He was alleged to have thrown a grenade that killed an American soldier in the battle in which he was captured. About three months later, he was transferred to the U.S. military installation at Guantanamo Bay. He was placed in adult detention facilities.

4 On September 7, 2004, Mr. Khadr was brought before a Combatant Status Review Tribunal which affirmed a previous determination that he was an "enemy combatant". He was subsequently charged with war crimes and held for trial before a military commission. In light of a number of procedural delays and setbacks, that trial is still pending.

5 In February and September 2003, agents from the Canadian Security Intelligence Service ("CSIS") and the Foreign Intelligence Division of the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade ("DFAIT") questioned Mr. Khadr on matters connected to the charges pending against him [page51] and shared the product of these interviews with U.S. authorities. In March 2004, a DFAIT official interviewed Mr. Khadr again, with the knowledge that he had been subjected by U.S. authorities to a sleep deprivation technique, known as the "frequent flyer program", in an effort to make him less resistant to interrogation. During this interview, Mr. Khadr refused to answer questions. In 2005, von Finckenstein J. of the Federal Court issued an interim injunction preventing CSIS and DFAIT agents from further interviewing Mr. Khadr in order "to prevent a potential grave injustice" from occurring: Khadr v. Canada, 2005 FC 1076, [2006] 2 F.C.R. 505, at para. 46. In 2008, this Court ordered the Canadian government to disclose to Mr. Khadr the transcripts of the interviews he had given to CSIS and DFAIT in Guantanamo Bay, under s. 7 of the Charter: Canada (Justice) v. Khadr, 2008 SCC 28, [2008] 2 S.C.R. 125 ("Khadr 2008").

6 Mr. Khadr has repeatedly requested that the Government of Canada ask the United States to return him to Canada: in March 2005 during a Canadian consular visit; on December 15, 2005, when a welfare report noted that "[Mr. Khadr] wants his government to bring him back home" (Report of Welfare Visit, Exhibit "L" to Affidavit of Sean Robertson, December 15, 2005 (J.R., vol. IV, at p. 534)); and in a formal written request through counsel on July 28, 2008.

7 The Prime Minister announced his decision not to request Mr. Khadr's repatriation on July 10, 2008, during a media interview. The Prime Minister provided the following response to a journalist's question, posed in French, regarding whether the government would seek repatriation:

[TRANSLATION] The answer is no, as I said the former Government, and our Government with the notification of the Minister of Justice had considered all these [page52] issues and the situation remains the same... . We keep on looking for [assurances] of good treatment of Mr. Khadr.

(<http://watch.ctv.ca/news/clip65783#clip65783>, at 3'3", referred to in Affidavit of April Bedard, August 8, 2008 (J.R., vol. II, at pp. 131-32).)

8 On August 8, 2008, Mr. Khadr applied to the Federal Court for judicial review of the government's "ongoing decision and policy" not to seek his repatriation (Notice of Application filed by the respondent, August 8, 2008 (J.R., vol. II, at p. 113)). He alleged that the decision and policy infringed his rights under s. 7 of the Charter, which states:

7. Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

9 After reviewing the history of Mr. Khadr's detention and applicable principles of Canadian and international law, O'Reilly J. concluded that in these special circumstances, Canada has a "duty to protect" Mr. Khadr (2009 FC 405, 341 F.T.R. 300). He found that "[t]he ongoing refusal of Canada to request Mr. Khadr's repatriation to Canada offends a principle of fundamental justice and violates Mr. Khadr's rights under s. 7 of the Charter" (para. 92). Also, he held that "[t]o mitigate the effect of that violation, Canada must present a request to the United States for Mr. Khadr's repatriation to Canada as soon as practicable" (para. 92).

10 The majority judgment of the Federal Court of Appeal (per Evans and Sharlow J.J.A.) upheld O'Reilly J.'s order, but defined the s. 7 breach more narrowly. The majority of the Court of Appeal found that it arose from the March 2004 interrogation conducted with the knowledge that Mr. Khadr had been subject to the "frequent flyer program", characterized by the majority as involving cruel and abusive treatment contrary to the principles of fundamental justice: 2009 FCA 246, 310 D.L.R. (4th) 462. Dissenting, Nadon J.A. reviewed the many [page53] steps the government had taken on Mr. Khadr's behalf and held that since the Constitution conferred jurisdiction over foreign affairs on the executive branch of government, the remedy sought was beyond the power of the courts to grant.

III. The Issues

11 Mr. Khadr argues that the government has breached his rights under s. 7 of the Charter, and that the appropriate remedy for this breach is an order that the government request the United States to return him to Canada.

12 Mr. Khadr does not suggest that the government is obliged to request the repatriation of all Canadian citizens held abroad in suspect circumstances. Rather, his contention is that the conduct of the government of Canada in connection with his detention by the U.S. military in Guantanamo Bay, and in particular Canada's collaboration with the U.S. government in 2003 and 2004, violated his rights under the Charter, and requires as a remedy that the government now request his return to Canada. The issues that flow from this claim may be summarized as follows:

- A. Was There a Breach of Section 7 of the Charter?
- B. Does the Charter apply to the conduct of Canadian state officials alleged to have infringed Mr. Khadr's s. 7 Charter rights?
- C. If so, does the conduct of the Canadian government deprive Mr. Khadr of the right to life, liberty or security of the person?
- D. If so, does the deprivation accord with the principles of fundamental justice?

[page54]

- B. Is the Remedy Sought Appropriate and Just in All the Circumstances?

13 We will consider each of these issues in turn.

A. Was There a Breach of Section 7 of the Charter?

1. Does the Canadian Charter Apply to the Conduct of the Canadian State Officials Alleged to Have Infringed Mr. Khadr's Section 7 Charter Rights?

14 As a general rule, Canadians abroad are bound by the law of the country in which they find themselves and cannot avail themselves of their rights under the Charter. International customary law and the principle of comity of nations generally prevent the Charter from applying to the actions of Canadian officials operating outside of Canada: R. v. Hape, 2007 SCC 26, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 292, at para. 48, per LeBel J., citing United States of America v. Dynar, [1997] 2 S.C.R. 462, at para. 123. The jurisprudence leaves the door open to an exception in the case of Canadian participation in activities of a foreign state or its agents that are contrary to Canada's international obligations or fundamental human rights norms: Hape, at para. 52, per LeBel J.; Khadr 2008, at para. 18.

15 The question before us, then, is whether the rule against the extraterritorial application of the Charter prevents the Charter from applying to the actions of Canadian officials at Guantanamo Bay.

16 This question was addressed in Khadr 2008, in which this Court held that the Charter applied to the actions of Canadian officials operating at Guantanamo Bay who handed the fruits of their interviews over to U.S. authorities. This Court held, at para. 26, that "the principles of international law and comity that might otherwise preclude application of the Charter to Canadian officials acting abroad do not apply to the assistance they gave to U.S. authorities at Guantanamo Bay", given holdings of the Supreme Court of the United [page55] States that the military commission regime then in place constituted a clear violation of fundamental human rights protected by international law: see Khadr 2008, at para. 24; Rasul v. Bush, 542 U.S. 466 (2004), and Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, 548 U.S. 557 (2006). The principles of fundamental justice thus required the Canadian officials who had interrogated Mr. Khadr to disclose to him the contents of the statements he had given them. The Canadian government complied with this Court's order.

17 We note that the regime under which Mr. Khadr is currently detained has changed significantly in recent years. The U.S. Congress has legislated and the U.S. courts have acted with the aim of bringing the military processes at Guantanamo Bay in line with international law. (The Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, Pub. L. 109-148, 119 Stat. 2739, prohibited inhumane treatment of detainees and required interrogations to be performed according to the Army field manual. The Military Commissions Act of 2006, Pub. L. 109-366, 120 Stat. 2600, attempted to legalize the Guantanamo regime after the U.S. Supreme Court's ruling in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld. However, on June 12, 2008, in Boumediene v. Bush, 128 S. Ct. 2229 (2008), the U.S. Supreme Court held that Guantanamo Bay detainees have a constitutional right to habeas corpus, and struck down the provisions of the Military Commissions Act of 2006 that suspended that right.)

18 Though the process to which Mr. Khadr is subject has changed, his claim is based upon the same underlying series of events at Guantanamo Bay (the interviews and evidence-sharing of 2003 and 2004) that we considered in Khadr 2008. We are satisfied that the rationale in Khadr 2008 for applying the Charter to the actions of Canadian officials at Guantanamo Bay governs this case as well.

2. Does the Conduct of the Canadian Government Deprive Mr. Khadr of the Right to Life, Liberty or Security of the Person?

19 The United States is holding Mr. Khadr for the purpose of trying him on charges of war crimes. The United States is thus the primary source of the deprivation of Mr. Khadr's liberty and security of the person. However, the allegation on which his claim rests is that Canada has also contributed to his past and continuing deprivation of liberty. To satisfy the requirements of s. 7, as stated by this Court in Suresh v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2002 SCC 1, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 3, there must be "a sufficient causal connection between [the Canadian] government's participation and the deprivation [of liberty and security of the person] ultimately effected" (para. 54).

20 The record suggests that the interviews conducted by CSIS and DFAIT provided significant evidence in relation to these charges. During the February and September 2003 interrogations, CSIS officials repeatedly questioned Mr. Khadr about the central events at issue in his prosecution, extracting statements from him that could potentially prove inculpatory in the U.S. proceedings against him (CSIS Document, Exhibit "U" to Affidavit of Lt. Cdr. William Kuebler, November 7, 2003 (J.R., vol. II, at p. 280); Interview Summary, Exhibit "AA" to Affidavit of Lt. Cdr. William Kuebler, February 24, 2003 (J.R., vol. III, at p. 289); Interview Summary, Exhibit "BB" to Affidavit of Lt. Cdr. William Kuebler, February 17, 2003 (J.R., vol. III, at p. 292); Interview Summary, Exhibit "DD" to Affidavit of Lt. Cdr. William Kuebler, April 20, 2004 (J.R., vol. III, at p. 296)). A report of the Security Intelligence Review Committee titled CSIS's Role in the Matter of Omar Khadr (July 8, 2009), further indicated that CSIS assessed the interrogations of Mr. Khadr as being "highly successful, as evidenced by the quality intelligence information" elicited from Mr. Khadr (p. 13). These statements were shared with U.S. authorities and were summarized in U.S. investigative reports (Report of Investigative [page57] Activity, Exhibit "AA" to Affidavit of Lt. Cdr. William Kuebler, February 24, 2003 (J.R., vol. III, at pp. 289 ff.)). Pursuant to the relaxed rules of evidence under the U.S. Military Commissions Act of 2006, Mr. Khadr's statements to Canadian officials are potentially admissible against him in the U.S. proceedings, notwithstanding the oppressive circumstances under which they were obtained: see United States of America v. Jawad, Military Commission, September 24, 2008, D-008 Ruling on Defense Motion to Dismiss - Torture of the Detainee (online: <http://www.defense.gov/news/Ruling%20D-008.pdf>). The above interrogations also provided the context for the March 2004 interrogation, when a DFAIT official, knowing that Mr. Khadr had been subjected to the "frequent flyer program" to make him less resistant to interrogations, nevertheless proceeded with the interrogation of Mr. Khadr (Interview Summary, Exhibit "DD" to Affidavit of Lt. Cdr. William Kuebler, April 20, 2004 (J.R., vol. III, at p. 296)).

21 An applicant for a Charter remedy must prove a Charter violation on a balance of probabilities (R. v. Collins, [1987] 1 S.C.R. 265, at p. 277). It is reasonable to infer from the uncontradicted evidence before us that the statements taken by Canadian officials are contributing to the continued detention of Mr. Khadr, thereby impacting his liberty and security interests. In the absence of any evidence to the contrary (or disclaimer rebutting this inference), we conclude on the record before us that Canada's active participation in what was at the time an illegal regime has contributed and continues to contribute to Mr. Khadr's current detention, which is the subject of his current claim. The causal connection demanded by Suresh between Canadian conduct and the deprivation of liberty and security of person is established.

3. Does the Deprivation Accord With the Principles of Fundamental Justice?

22 We have concluded that the conduct of the Canadian government is sufficiently connected to the denial of Mr. Khadr's liberty and security of the person. This alone, however, does not establish a breach of Mr. Khadr's s. 7 rights under the Charter. To establish a breach, Mr. Khadr must show that this deprivation is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

23 The principles of fundamental justice "are to be found in the basic tenets of our legal system": Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486, at p. 503. They are informed by Canadian experience and jurisprudence, and take into account Canada's obligations and values, as expressed in the various sources of international human rights law by which Canada is bound. In R. v. D.B., 2008 SCC 25, [2008] 2 S.C.R. 3, at para. 46, the Court (Abella J. for the majority) restated the criteria for identifying a new principle of fundamental justice in the following manner:

- (1) It must be a legal principle.
- (2) There must be a consensus that the rule or principle is fundamental to the way in which the legal system ought fairly to operate.
- (3) It must be identified with sufficient precision to yield a manageable standard against which to measure deprivations of life, liberty or security of the person.

24 We conclude that Canadian conduct in connection with Mr. Khadr's case did not conform to the principles of fundamental justice. That conduct may be briefly reviewed. The statements taken by CSIS and DFAIT were obtained through participation in a regime which was known at the time to have refused detainees the right to challenge the legality of detention by way of habeas corpus. It was also known that Mr. Khadr was 16 years old at the time [page59] and that he had not had access to counsel or to any adult who had his best interests in mind. As held by this Court in Khadr 2008, Canada's participation in the illegal process in place at Guantanamo Bay clearly violated Canada's binding international obligations (Khadr 2008, at paras. 23-25; Hamdan v. Rumsfeld). In conducting their interviews, CSIS officials had control over the questions asked and the subject matter of the interviews (Transcript of cross-examination on Affidavit of Mr. Hooper, Exhibit "GG" to Affidavit of Lt. Cdr. William Kuebler, March 2, 2005 (J.R., vol. III, p. 313, at p. 22)). Canadian officials also knew that the U.S. authorities would have full access to the contents of the interrogations (as Canadian officials sought no restrictions on their use) by virtue of their audio and video recording (CSIS's Role in the Matter of Omar Khadr, at pp. 11-12). The purpose of the interviews was for intelligence gathering and not criminal investigation. While in some contexts there may be an important distinction between those interviews conducted for the purpose of intelligence gathering and those conducted in criminal investigations, here, the distinction loses its significance. Canadian officials questioned Mr. Khadr on matters that may have provided important evidence relating to his criminal proceedings, in circumstances where they knew that Mr. Khadr was being indefinitely detained, was a young person and was alone during the interrogations. Further, the March 2004 interview, where Mr. Khadr refused to answer questions, was conducted knowing that Mr. Khadr had been subjected to three weeks of scheduled sleep deprivation, a measure described by the U.S. Military Commission in Jawad as designed to "make [detainees] more compliant and break down their resistance to interrogation" (para. 4).

25 This conduct establishes Canadian participation in state conduct that violates the principles of fundamental justice. Interrogation of a youth, [page60] to elicit statements about the most serious criminal charges while detained in these conditions and without access to counsel, and while knowing that the fruits of the interrogations would be shared with the U.S. prosecutors, offends the most basic Canadian standards about the treatment of detained youth suspects.

26 We conclude that Mr. Khadr has established that Canada violated his rights under s. 7 of the Charter.

B. Is the Remedy Sought Appropriate and Just in All the Circumstances?

27 In previous proceedings (Khadr 2008), Mr. Khadr obtained the remedy of disclosure of the material gathered by Canadian officials against him through the interviews at Guantanamo Bay. The issue on this appeal is whether the breach of s. 7 of the Charter entitles Mr. Khadr to the remedy of an order that Canada request of the United States that he be returned to Canada. Two questions arise at this stage: (1) Is the remedy sought sufficiently connected to the breach? and (2) Is the remedy sought precluded by the fact that it touches on the Crown prerogative power over foreign affairs?

28 The judge at first instance held that the remedy sought was open to him. The Federal Court of Appeal held that he did not abuse his remedial discretion. On the basis of our answer to the second of the foregoing questions, we conclude that the trial judge, on the record before us, erred in the exercise of his discretion in granting the remedy sought.

29 First, is the remedy sought sufficiently connected to the breach? We have concluded that the Canadian government breached Mr. Khadr's s. 7 rights in 2003 and 2004 through its participation [page61] in the then-illegal military regime at Guantanamo Bay. The question at this point is whether the remedy now being sought -- an order that the Canadian government ask the United States to return Mr. Khadr to Canada -- is appropriate and just in the circumstances.

30 An appropriate and just remedy is "one that meaningfully vindicates the rights and freedoms of the claimants": Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), 2003 SCC 62, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 3, at para. 55. The first hurdle facing Mr. Khadr, therefore, is to establish a sufficient connection between the breaches of s. 7 that occurred in 2003 and 2004 and the order sought in these judicial review proceedings. In our view, the sufficiency of this connection is established by the continuing effect of these breaches into the present. Mr. Khadr's Charter rights were breached when Canadian officials contributed to his detention by virtue of their interrogations at Guantanamo Bay knowing Mr. Khadr was a youth, did not have access to legal counsel or habeas corpus at that time and, at the time of the interview in March 2004, had been subjected to improper treatment by the U.S. authorities. As the information obtained by Canadian officials during the course of their interrogations may be used in the U.S. proceedings against Mr. Khadr, the effect of the breaches cannot be said to have been spent. It continues to this day. As discussed earlier, the material that Canadian officials gathered and turned over to the U.S. military authorities may form part of the case upon which he is currently being held. The evidence before us suggests that the material produced was relevant and useful. There has been no suggestion that it does not form part of the case against Mr. Khadr or that it will not be put forward at his ultimate trial. We therefore find that the breach of Mr. Khadr's s. 7 Charter rights remains ongoing and that the remedy sought could potentially vindicate those rights.

31 The acts that perpetrated the Charter breaches relied on in this appeal lie in the past. But their impact on Mr. Khadr's liberty and security continue to this day and may redound into the future. The impact of the breaches is thus perpetuated into the present. When past acts violate present liberties, a present remedy may be required.

32 We conclude that the necessary connection between the breaches of s. 7 and the remedy sought has been established for the purpose of these judicial review proceedings.

33 Second, is the remedy sought precluded by the fact that it touches on the Crown prerogative over foreign affairs? A connection between the remedy and the breach is not the only consideration. As stated in Doucet-Boudreau, an appropriate and just remedy is also one that "must employ means that are legitimate within the framework of our constitutional democracy" (para. 56) and must be a "judicial one which vindicates the right while invoking the function and powers of a court" (para. 57). The government argues that courts have no power under the Constitution of Canada to require the executive branch of government to do anything in the area of foreign policy. It submits that the decision not to request the repatriation of Mr. Khadr falls directly within the prerogative powers of the Crown to conduct foreign relations, including the right to speak freely with a foreign state on all such matters: P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.), at p. 1-19.

34 The prerogative power is the "residue of discretionary or arbitrary authority, which at any given time is legally left in the hands of the Crown": Reference as to the Effect of the Exercise of the Royal Prerogative of Mercy Upon Deportation Proceedings, [1933] S.C.R. 269, at p. 272, per Duff C.J., quoting A. V. Dicey, Introduction to the Study [page63] of the Law of the Constitution (8th ed. 1915), at p. 420. It is a limited source of non-statutory administrative power accorded by the common law to the Crown: Hogg, at p. 1-17.

35 The prerogative power over foreign affairs has not been displaced by s. 10 of the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. E-22, and continues to be exercised by the federal government. The Crown prerogative in foreign affairs includes the making of representations to a foreign government: Black v. Canada (Prime Minister) (2001), 199 D.L.R. (4th) 228 (Ont. C.A.). We therefore agree with O'Reilly J.'s implicit finding (paras. 39, 40 and 49) that the decision not to request Mr. Khadr's repatriation was made in the exercise of the prerogative over foreign relations.

36 In exercising its common law powers under the royal prerogative, the executive is not exempt from constitutional scrutiny: Operation Dismantle v. The Queen, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 441. It is for the executive and not the courts to decide whether and how to exercise its powers, but the courts clearly have the jurisdiction and the duty to determine whether a prerogative power asserted by the Crown does in fact exist and, if so, whether its exercise infringes the Charter (Operation Dismantle) or other constitutional norms (Air Canada v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1986] 2 S.C.R. 539).

37 The limited power of the courts to review exercises of the prerogative power for constitutionality reflects the fact that in a constitutional democracy, all government power must be exercised in accordance with the Constitution. This said, judicial review of the exercise of the prerogative power for constitutionality remains sensitive to the fact that the executive branch of government is responsible for decisions under this power, and that the executive is better placed to make such decisions [page64] within a range of constitutional options. The government must have flexibility in deciding how its duties under the power are to be discharged: see, e.g., Reference re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217, at paras. 101-2. But it is for the courts to determine the legal and constitutional limits within which such decisions are to be taken. It follows that in the case of refusal by a government to abide by constitutional constraints, courts are empowered to make orders ensuring that the government's foreign affairs prerogative is exercised in accordance with the constitution: United States v. Burns, 2001 SCC 7, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 283.

38 Having concluded that the courts possess a narrow power to review and intervene on matters of foreign affairs to ensure the constitutionality of executive action, the final question is whether O'Reilly J. misdirected himself in exercising that power in the circumstances of this case (R. v. Bjelland, 2009 SCC 38, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 651, at para. 15; R. v. Regan, 2002 SCC 12, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 297, at paras. 117-18). (In fairness to the trial judge, we note that the government proposed no alternative (trial judge's reasons, at para. 78).) If the record and legal principle support his decision, deference requires we not interfere. However, in our view that is not the case.

39 Our first concern is that the remedy ordered below gives too little weight to the constitutional responsibility of the executive to make decisions on matters of foreign affairs in the context of complex and ever-changing circumstances, taking into account Canada's broader national interests. For the following reasons, we conclude that the appropriate remedy is to declare that, on the record before the Court, Canada infringed Mr. Khadr's s. 7 rights, and to leave it to the government to decide how best to respond to this judgment in light of [page65] current information, its responsibility for foreign affairs, and in conformity with the Charter.

40 As discussed, the conduct of foreign affairs lies with the executive branch of government. The courts, however, are charged with adjudicating the claims of individuals who claim that their Charter rights have been or will be violated by the exercise of the government's discretionary powers: Operation Dismantle.

41 In some situations, courts may give specific directions to the executive branch of the government on matters touching foreign policy. For example, in Burns, the Court held that it would offend s. 7 to extradite a fugitive from Canada without seeking and obtaining assurances from the requesting state that the death penalty would not be imposed. The Court gave due weight to the fact that seeking and obtaining those assurances were matters of Canadian foreign relations. Nevertheless, it ordered that the government seek them.

42 The specific facts in Burns justified a more specific remedy. The fugitives were under the control of Canadian officials. It was clear that assurances would provide effective protection against the prospective Charter breaches: it was entirely within Canada's power to protect the fugitives against possible execution. Moreover, the Court noted that no public purpose would be served by extradition without assurances that would not be substantially served by extradition with assurances, and that there was nothing to suggest that seeking such assurances would undermine Canada's good relations with other states: Burns, at paras. 125 and 136.

43 The present case differs from Burns. Mr. Khadr is not under the control of the Canadian [page66] government; the likelihood that the proposed remedy will be effective is unclear; and the impact on Canadian foreign relations of a repatriation request cannot be properly assessed by the Court.

44 This brings us to our second concern: the inadequacy of the record. The record before us gives a necessarily incomplete picture of the range of considerations currently faced by the government in assessing Mr. Khadr's request. We do not know what negotiations may have taken place, or will take place, between the U.S. and Canadian governments over the fate of Mr. Khadr. As observed by Chaskalson C.J. in Kaunda v. President of the Republic of South Africa, [2004] ZACC 5, 136 I.L.R. 452, at para. 77: "The timing of representations if they are to be made, the language in which they should be couched, and the sanctions (if any) which should follow if such representations are rejected are matters with which courts are ill-equipped to deal." It follows that in these circumstances, it would not be appropriate for the Court to give direction as to the diplomatic steps necessary to address the breaches of Mr. Khadr's Charter rights.

45 Though Mr. Khadr has not been moved from Guantanamo Bay in over seven years, his legal predicament continues to evolve. During the hearing of this appeal, we were advised by counsel that the U.S. Department of Justice had decided that Mr. Khadr will continue to face trial by military commission, though other Guantanamo detainees will now be tried in a federal court in New York. How this latest development will affect Mr. Khadr's situation and any ongoing negotiations between the United States and Canada over his possible repatriation is unknown. But it signals caution in the exercise of the Court's remedial jurisdiction.

46 In this case, the evidentiary uncertainties, the limitations of the Court's institutional competence, [page67] and the need to respect the prerogative powers of the executive, lead us to conclude that the proper remedy is declaratory relief. A declaration of unconstitutionality is a discretionary remedy: Operation Dismantle, at p. 481, citing Solosky v. The Queen, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 821. It has been recognized by this Court as "an effective and flexible remedy for the settlement of real disputes": R. v. Gamble, [1988] 2 S.C.R. 595, at p. 649. A court can properly issue a declaratory remedy so long as it has the jurisdiction over the issue at bar, the question before the court is real and not theoretical, and the person raising it has a real interest to raise it. Such is the case here.

47 The prudent course at this point, respectful of the responsibilities of the executive and the courts, is for this Court to allow Mr. Khadr's application for judicial review in part and to grant him a declaration advising the government of its opinion on the records before it which, in turn, will provide the legal framework for the executive to exercise its functions and to consider what actions to take in respect of Mr. Khadr, in conformity with the Charter.

IV. Conclusion

48 The appeal is allowed in part. Mr. Khadr's application for judicial review is allowed in part. This Court declares that through the conduct of Canadian officials in the course of interrogations in 2003-2004, as established on the evidence before us, Canada actively participated in a process contrary to Canada's international human rights obligations and contributed to Mr. Khadr's ongoing detention so as to deprive him of his right to liberty and security of the person guaranteed by s. 7 of the Charter, contrary to the principles of fundamental justice. Costs are awarded to Mr. Khadr.

Introduction

1 The respondent applies to dismiss this Petition on the basis that the petitioners lack legal standing. The petitioners argue, in response, that the Canadian Society for the Advancement of Science in Public Policy ("CSASPP") has public interest standing and Mr. Warner has private interest standing.

2 The Petition challenges public health orders made under the Public Health Act, S.B.C. 2008, c. 28 [PHA], requiring two COVID-19 vaccinations for healthcare providers in wide-ranging healthcare facilities across British Columbia.

3 It alleges that the impugned orders fail to provide reasonable exemptions and accommodations for persons with religious objections, vaccination risks, immunity from prior infection, and recent negative COVID-19 testing. It seeks to set aside the orders for infringing the Charter rights of unvaccinated healthcare workers, and as an unreasonable exercise of statutory powers contrary to the Judicial Review Procedure Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 241 [JRPA].

4 The respondent, the Provincial Health Officer, Dr. Bonnie Henry ("PHO"), submits that the orders are reasonable, precautionary public health measures. Implemented to limit transmission in higher-risk public settings, they protect public health, vulnerable populations, and functioning of the healthcare system.

5 For the reasons that follow, I find that CSASPP has public interest standing to bring the Petition. Mr. Warner does not, however, have private interest standing to do so, and his claims are therefore dismissed.

Parties

6 CSASPP is a not-for-profit society incorporated under the Societies Act, S.B.C. 2015, c. 18.

7 With a head-office in Vancouver, it describes itself as a non-partisan, secular organization, advocating for the development and advancement of science in the formation of public policy in British Columbia.

8 Mr. Warner, a British Columbia resident, is a software engineer and the executive director of CSASPP. He describes CSASPP's directors, officers, donors, and patrons as drawn from diverse communities across the political spectrum.

9 He deposes that, when the impugned healthcare vaccination requirements were ordered, CSASPP was contacted by more than a thousand self-identified healthcare workers in British Columbia, including many registered nurses, concerned about the medical justification for the vaccination mandates and the threat of losing their jobs.

10 As the Public Health Officer under s. 64 of the PHA, Dr. Henry is the Province's senior public health official. In that role, she has led the public health response to the emergencies created by the transmission of the novel coronavirus SARS-CoV-2 and the illness known as COVID-19.

Background Facts

Emergency Powers under the PHA

11 On March 18, 2020, the Minister of Public Safety declared a state of emergency throughout British Columbia because of the COVID-19 pandemic. The declaration expired on June 30, 2021.

12 On March 17, 2020, Dr. Henry issued a notice, under s. 52(2) of the PHA, that the transmission of the infectious SARS-CoV-2 virus constituted a "regional event" under s. 51. The PHA defines "regional event" as an "immediate and significant risk to public health throughout a region or the province".

13 Under s. 52, the notice enabled the PHO to exercise the "emergency powers" in Part 5 of the PHA. These powers include the issuance of orders for persons to do anything that the PHO reasonably believes is necessary "to prevent or stop a health hazard, or mitigate the harm or prevent further harm from a health hazard". They include the power to prohibit a class of persons from entering a particular place (PHA, ss. 31(1)(b), 39(3)).

The Impugned Orders

14 The Petition challenges three sets of orders, issued and updated by the PHO under the PHA emergency powers (the "Impugned Orders"):

- (i) Covid-19 Vaccination Status Information and Preventative Measures order of September 9, 2021, September 27, 2021 ("Vaccination Status Order");
- (ii) Residential Care Covid-19 Preventative Measures order of October 21, 2021 ("Residential Care Order"); and
- (iii) Hospital and Community (Health Care and other Services) Covid-19 Vaccination Status Information and Preventative Measures order of October 21, 2021 ("Hospital Order").

15 Broadly speaking, the Impugned Orders mandate that, as of mid-October 2021, only double-vaccinated persons may provide healthcare services in a wide-range of British Columbia healthcare settings, including long-term care facilities, hospitals and community care settings.

Reconsideration Request

16 By letter to the PHO of November 8, 2021, pursuant to s. 43 of the PHA, the petitioners requested a reconsideration of the Impugned Orders ("Reconsideration Request") on behalf of a broad class of healthcare workers in British Columbia.

17 Section 43(1) of the PHA says in part:

Reconsideration of orders

43 (1) A person affected by an order, or the variance of an order, may request the health officer who issued the order or made the variance to reconsider the order or variance if the person

- (a) has additional relevant information that was not reasonably available to the health officer when the order was issued or varied,
- (b) has a proposal that was not presented to the health officer when the order was issued or varied but, if implemented, would
- (c) meet the objective of the order, and

- (ii) be suitable as the basis of a written agreement under section 38 [may make written agreements], or
- (c) requires more time to comply with the order.

18 The Reconsideration Request contained a lengthy critique of the Impugned Orders from Dr. J. Kettner, Chief Medical Officer of Health and Chief Public Health Officer for the Province of Manitoba from 1999 to 2012. Arguing that the Impugned Orders failed to comply with generally accepted principles of public health governance and the Charter, it contained voluminous research, submissions regarding the principles governing public health orders, and examples of less restrictive measures in other jurisdictions.

19 The Reconsideration Request proposed, among other things, alternative approaches to satisfy the objectives of the Impugned Orders, including the following:

- i. Natural immunity through a positive RT-PCR or rapid antigen test result demonstrating recovery from COVID-19, issued no less than 11 days and no more than 6 months after the date on which a person first tested positive (e.g. France).
- ii. Negative PCR or antigen test less than 48 hours prior to attendance at a facility (e.g. Alberta).
- iii. Single vaccination after contracting COVID-19 after an interval of at least 21 days following the illness (e.g. Quebec).
- iv. Documentation from a physician or registered nurse providing medical reason for not being fully vaccinated (e.g. Ontario).

20 On November 9, 2021, under PHA s. 54(1)(h), the PHO issued a variance, with retroactive effect, halting s. 43 reconsideration requests except for medical reasons ("Reconsideration Variance").

21 The evidence filed on behalf of the PHO suggests that, due to hundreds of s. 43 requests, the Reconsideration Variance was necessary to protect public health until there was a significant reduction in transmissions, serious disease, and strain on the public health care system.

22 Section 54(1)(h) says:

General emergency powers

54 (1) A health officer may, in an emergency, do one or more of the following:

- (h) not reconsider an order under section 43 [reconsideration of orders], not review an order under section 44 [review of orders] or not reassess an order under section 45 [mandatory reassessment of orders];

23 By letter of January 17, 2022, relying on the Reconsideration Variance, the PHO declined to respond to the Reconsideration Request because it sought exemption from the Impugned Orders on non-medical grounds ("Reconsideration Response").

The Petition

24 The Petition alleges that the materials in the Reconsideration Request demonstrate the Charter violations and unreasonableness of the Impugned Orders.

25 It seeks a declaration that the Impugned Orders are of no force and effect for unjustifiably infringing the following rights and freedoms of unvaccinated healthcare workers:

- * section 2(a) (freedom of conscience and religion);

Canadian Society for the Advancement of Science in Public Policy v. British Columbia (Provincial Health Officer), [2022] B.C.J. No. 780

- * section 2(b) (freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression);
- * section 7 (life, liberty and security of the person); and
- * section 15(1) (equality rights).

26 It seeks orders, under the JRPA, quashing and setting aside the Impugned Orders, or declaring them ultra vires, as unreasonable or exceeding the PHO's statutory authority.

27 The petitioners also challenge the Reconsideration Response as an unreasonable refusal to consider the Reconsideration Request.

Governing Law

28 Public interest standing permits public-spirited litigants to prosecute issues of general interest and importance, thereby causing courts to fulfill their "constitutional role of scrutinizing the legality of government action, striking it down when it is unlawful and thus establishing and enforcing the rule of law" (Council of Canadians with Disabilities v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2020 BCCA 241, [CCD], para. 2).¹

29 Challenges to standing focus on whether "the public interest litigant is an appropriate party to advance a justiciable claim, not on the detail of intended trial evidence or the claim's ultimate prospect of success" (CCD, para. 87).

30 The litigant has the onus to demonstrate that public interest standing is warranted in the circumstances. The assessment focuses on three factors identified in Canada (Minister of Justice) v. Borowski, [1981] 2 S.C.R. 575 [Borowski]:

- (i) does the claim raise a serious justiciable issue?
- (ii) is the plaintiff directly affected by the action or does the plaintiff have a genuine interest in its outcome?
and
- (iii) is the action a reasonable and effective means to bring the claim to court?

31 The assessment should be flexible and generous, to serve the underlying purposes of upholding the legality principle and providing access to justice, particularly so for vulnerable and marginalized citizens broadly affected by legislation of questionable constitutional validity (Canada (Attorney General) v. Downtown Eastside Sex Workers United Against Violence Society, 2012 SCC 45 [Downtown Eastside], paras. 31, 51).

32 On the other side of the balance are the limiting factors of allocation of scarce judicial resources, screening of "busybody" litigants, and obtaining the viewpoints of those who are actually most directly impacted by the issues in question. For these reasons, a party with private interest standing is generally preferred to a public interest litigant seeking to advance a duplicative claim (Downtown Eastside, para. 37; CCD, paras. 71, 79-80, 83).

Analysis and Findings

The Society's Public Interest Standing

33 I turn to consider whether the Society satisfies the Borowski factors.

Serious Justiciable Issue

34 A serious justiciable issue is one that is appropriate for judicial determination and clearly not frivolous.

35 Justiciability asks whether the case suits the court's place in our constitutional system of government: Canada (Auditor General) v. Canada (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 49 [Auditor General] at 90-

91. Ultimately, the answer "depends on the appreciation by the judiciary of its own position in the constitutional scheme" (Auditor General at 91).

36 So long as the pleading reveals at least one serious issue, it will usually be unnecessary to examine every pleaded claim for the purpose of standing (Downtown Eastside, para. 42; CCD, paras. 90, 94).

37 The petitioners argue that challenges such as this -- to the constitutionality and legality of legislation -- are always considered justiciable (CCD, para 90). They say serious issues are raised by questioning the "circumvention of the legislature ... in the name of public health," to achieve goals normally achieved through the "legislative process, which is transparent, public, and fosters democratic debate."

38 The PHO argues the Petition "discloses no adjudicative facts and so is non-justiciable". The Petition, the PHO says, is devoid of any meaningful particulars permitting the inquiry sought (CCD, paras. 104, 107). The PHO relies on Beaudoin v. British Columbia, 2021 BCSC 512 [Beaudoin], to argue that the Reconsideration Request raises no serious issue, as in that case a similar request for reconsideration based on similar evidence from Dr. Kettner was ruled inadmissible.

39 Regarding justiciability, the Petition challenges state action based on legislatively-delegated discretionary powers. In my view, the petitioners are correct that whether those actions comply with the Charter and JRPA are clearly questions suitable for judicial determination (CCD, para 90).

40 Regarding a serious issue, the Impugned Orders directly impact members of a defined and identifiable group in a serious way that, at least on the surface, relates to their Charter rights. CSASPP alleges that its alternative proposals reflect a superior approach, taken in other Provinces and elsewhere around the world, much less intrusive on healthcare workers' Charter rights. In my view, this raises substantial questions that meet the threshold of "clearly not frivolous."

41 I do not accept the PHO's argument that Beaudoin shows there is no serious issue to be tried regarding the Reconsideration Response. In Beaudoin, the reconsideration materials were ruled inadmissible because the petitioners did not challenge the reconsideration decision. In this case, however, CSASPP seeks to impugn the PHO's Reconsideration Response.²

42 In Beaudoin, religious leaders challenged the PHO's prohibition of certain religious gatherings, for allegedly violating the Charter rights of freedoms of religion, expression, assembly and association. After the petition was filed, the PHO reconsidered the impugned orders and issued a conditional variance allowing outdoor worship services subject to certain conditions.

43 The petitioners challenged only the PHO's initial orders, however, not the decision responding to their reconsideration request. Chief Justice Hinkson ruled the reconsideration materials inadmissible for that reason:

[79] Moreover, as the religious petitioners have chosen not to amend their petition to seek judicial review of Dr. Henry's reconsideration decision, the main evidence they seek to rely on, namely the affidavits of Dr. Warren and Dr. Kettner, is not admissible on this petition because that evidence was not before Dr. Henry when she made the G&E Orders. ...

[102] Had the religious petitioners amended their petition to seek judicial review of Dr. Henry's decision to grant them a variance to her G&E Orders, then the "record of proceeding" would include all of the information before Dr. Henry when she made her decision on the variance (but not before her when she issued the G&E Orders). But then the review would be of only her variance decision, not the G&E Orders.

44 Overall, the serious justiciable issue factor supports standing.

Genuine Interest

45 The genuine interest factor asks if a litigant has a real stake in the proceedings or is engaged with the issues in question (CCD, para. 98). Its purpose is to achieve "concrete adverseness", and thereby ensure sharp debate, thorough argument, and economical use of judicial resources. A litigant's engagement is assessed by its reputation, continuing interest, and link with the claim (Downtown Eastside, paras. 29, 43).

46 CSASPP claims genuine interest, based on its membership, purposes, and Reconsideration Request. While not tracking personal information about its approximately 170 current members, it estimates at least 41 work in the healthcare field in British Columbia based on participation in its confidential forum for healthcare issues.

47 The purposes described in CSASPP's constitution of January 14, 2021 are:

To challenge the provincial COVID-19 measures instituted in British Columbia.

To advocate and promote the development and advancement of science in public policy in British Columbia.

48 Its constitution of October 12, 2021 revised the purposes to include the following:

(a) To improve health outcomes of people by advocating for the development and implementation of government and public health policy initiatives to be based on research conducting using the scientific method;

(b) To improve access to information on pandemic and epidemic threats and events;

(d) To oppose the dissemination of information that is not based on research conducted according to the scientific method;

...

(f) To promote critical thinking and public discussion that includes the widest possible expression of opinions and viewpoints in all public policy debates or discussion, regardless of the level of government of Canada or of any province or territory therein.

49 The PHO submits that CSASPP has no history of involvement in the issues raised by the Petition, and the evidence connecting its membership to healthcare is vague and weak. The PHO says CSASPP is merely a "purpose-built anti-COVID-19 measures entity".

50 The PHO relies on Atkins v. Anmore (Village), 2014 BCSC 2402, a petition to quash municipal bylaws brought by a petitioner in her capacity "as a citizen of the municipality" (para. 5). Justice Williams found this insufficient for a genuine interest in the validity of the bylaws and declined public interest standing:

[35] ... the petitioner has [not] established that she has an interest that is materially different than any other member of the community. While it may be inferred that she brings these proceedings in some role that is supported by the two councillors, that, in my view, does not provide the basis for a finding of the type of interest that the jurisprudence suggests is necessary.

51 In my view, creating a society committed to one side of an issue is not sufficient to create a genuine stake for purposes of standing. As in Atkins, the members of such a group are obviously interested in the issue but do not necessarily have a stake different from the community generally.

52 The genuine interest factor is concerned not just with a genuine stake in an issue, however, but also with engagement. Engagement tests for "concrete adverseness" and economical use of judicial resources (CCD, para. 98; Downtown Eastside, paras. 29, 43).

53 In my view, CSASPP's Reconsideration Request and allegations regarding the Reconsideration Response show an engaged, concrete adverseness counting in favour of standing. Also counting somewhat in favour is the evidence, albeit vague and inferential, of CSASPP's stake based on the healthcare workers amongst its membership.

54 Overall, the genuine interest factor supports standing.

Reasonable and Effective Means

55 This third Borowski factor is concerned with "whether the proposed suit is, in all of the circumstances, a reasonable and effective means of bringing the matter before the court".

56 The circumstances that the court should consider in making this inquiry include (Downtown Eastside, paras. 51-52):

- (a) The plaintiff's capacity to bring forward a claim and "whether the issue will be presented in a sufficiently concrete and well-developed factual setting";
- (b) Whether the case transcends the interests of those most directly affected by the challenged law or action;
- (c) Whether there are realistic alternative means which would favour a more efficient and effective use of judicial resources and would present a context more suitable for adversarial determination; and
- (d) The potential impact of the proceedings on the rights of others who are equally or more directly affected, especially where private and public interests may come into conflict.

57 The petitioners submit they have the necessary resources and expertise to prosecute the claim. They point to Dr. Kettner's report and the other materials in their Reconsideration Request. They say the importance of their case transcends the interests of individual healthcare workers and concerns society's interest in having healthcare decisions made in accordance with scientific research.

58 The PHO argues the petition is not a reasonable and effective way to bring the issue before the courts. It says that directly impacted healthcare workers are better suited to challenge the Impugned Orders. As stated by Dickson J.A. in CCD, "all other relevant considerations being equal, a plaintiff with private interest standing will usually be preferred over a public interest litigant seeking to advance a duplicative claim in a separate action" (para. 83).

59 As discussed in the hearing, numerous individual healthcare workers, allegedly having lost their jobs due to being unvaccinated, are challenging the Impugned Orders in another proceeding that is also in its early stages: Tatlock v. Attorney General for the Province of British Columbia, Vancouver Registry Court File No. S-222427.

60 Given the Tatlock proceedings, CSASPP's standing appears unnecessary for access to justice for impacted healthcare workers. Nevertheless, guided by Crowell J.'s flexible, purposive approach in Downtown Eastside, CSASPP's petition appears to be a reasonable and effective means of bringing forward the evidence and claims regarding the Reconsideration Request and Response. It appears that no similar issue is being pursued in Tatlock.

61 In my view, subject to the comments above about the shortcomings in its pleadings, the Petition represents a reasonable and effective means to bring forward the important and complex healthcare issues in the Reconsideration Request that transcend the interests of those directly involved.

62 Overall, the reasonable and effective means factor supports standing.

Conclusion

63 In my view, all three Borowski factors support CSASPP's public interest standing particularly given its role in the Reconsideration Request.

Mr. Warner's Private Interest Standing

64 Private interest standing is based on personal and direct interest in an issue by virtue of its impact on the party. It arises if the party has a private right at stake, or was specially impacted by the issue beyond the effect on the general public (Downtown Eastside, para. 1).

65 The PHO argues that Mr. Warner is a software engineer, without any apparent connection to healthcare, and his evidence discloses no actual personal or direct interest in the issues.

66 In argument, Mr. Warner withdrew his claim to public interest standing and argued only for private interest standing. His evidence of the personal impact of the Impugned Orders is limited to this:

... my ability to access medical services in a timely manner has been affected. For example, I have been on the waitlist for approximately one year for surgery related to a sports injury.

67 In my view, Mr. Warner offers no evidentiary basis, beyond this unsupported, conclusory statement, to suggest any right at stake, or any personal or special impact from the Impugned Orders. There is nothing, for example, to suggest his wait for surgery was unusual or impacted by the Impugned Orders.

68 In my view, for these reasons he does not satisfy the requirements for private interest standing.

Substitute Petitioners

69 The petitioners brought a back-up application, in case both were denied standing, to substitute, as petitioners, two healthcare workers who allege losing their jobs due to the Impugned Orders.

70 The PHO did not dispute the private interest standing of these two healthcare workers, but opposed their substitution because it fundamentally altered the pleadings and record. The PHO's position was therefore that, if standing were denied to the petitioners, the substitutes should commence new proceedings.

71 Having found CSASPP to have public interest standing, I will not decide this alternative application to substitute these two petitioners.

Conclusion

72 CSASPP is found to have public interest standing.

73 Mr. Warner is found not to have private interest standing and his claims are dismissed.

74 Costs of the application are in the cause unless the parties wish to speak to them.

S.R. COVAL J.

1 Leave to appeal granted by the Supreme Court of Canada, 2021 CanLII 24821.

2 At least for purposes of this application, the Reconsideration Request and Response appear central to CSASPP's case. They are prominent in the Petition, Part 2: Factual Basis, and CSASPP's evidence and argument at the hearing. The PHO acknowledged in argument that the petitioners' written submissions sought to impugn, by judicial review, the Reconsideration Response.

Having said that, I make no findings about the adequacy of CSASPP's current pleadings regarding the Reconsideration Request and Response. As the PHO points out, they are not referred to in the Petition, Part 1: Orders Sought, and are only indirectly referred to in Part 3: Legal Basis.

Case Summary

Catchwords:

Constitutional law — Division of powers — Interjurisdictional immunity — Criminal Code provisions prohibiting physician-assisted dying — Whether prohibition interferes with protected core of provincial jurisdiction over health — Constitution Act, 1867, ss. 91(27), 92(7), (13), (16).

Constitutional law — Charter of Rights — Right to life, liberty and security of the person — Fundamental justice — Competent adult with grievous and irremediable medical condition causing enduring suffering consenting to termination of life with physician assistance — Whether Criminal Code provisions prohibiting physician-assisted dying infringe s. 7 of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms — If so, whether infringement justifiable under s. 1 of Charter — Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, ss. 14, 241(b).

Constitutional law — Charter of Rights — Remedy — Constitutional exemption — Availability — Constitutional challenge of Criminal Code provisions prohibiting physician-assisted dying seeking declaration of invalidity of provisions and free-standing constitutional exemption for claimants — Whether constitutional exemption [page333] under s. 24(1) of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms should be granted.

Courts — Costs — Special costs — Principles governing exercise of courts' discretionary power to grant special costs on full indemnity basis — Trial judge awarding special costs to successful plaintiffs on basis that award justified by public interest, and ordering Attorney General intervening as of right to pay amount proportional to participation in proceedings — Whether special costs should be awarded to cover entire expense of bringing case before courts — Whether award against Attorney General justified.

Summary:

Section 241(b) of the Criminal Code says that everyone who aids or abets a person in committing suicide commits an indictable offence, and s. 14 says that no person may consent to death being inflicted on them. Together, these provisions prohibit the provision of assistance in dying in Canada. After T was diagnosed with a fatal neurodegenerative disease in 2009, she challenged the constitutionality of the Criminal Code provisions prohibiting assistance in dying. She was joined in her claim by C and J, who had assisted C's mother in achieving her goal of dying with dignity by taking her to Switzerland to use the services of an assisted suicide clinic; a physician who would be willing to participate in physician-assisted dying if it were no longer prohibited; and the British Columbia Civil Liberties Association. The Attorney General of British Columbia participated in the constitutional litigation as of right.

The trial judge found that the prohibition against physician-assisted dying violates the s. 7 rights of competent adults who are suffering intolerably as a result of a grievous and irremediable medical condition and concluded that this infringement is not justified under s. 1 of the Charter. She declared the prohibition unconstitutional, granted a one-year suspension of invalidity and provided T with a constitutional exemption. She awarded special costs in favour of the plaintiffs on the ground that this was justified by the public interest in resolving the legal issues raised by the case, and awarded 10 percent of the costs against the Attorney General of British Columbia in light of the full and active role it assumed in the proceedings.

The majority of the Court of Appeal allowed the appeal on the ground that the trial judge was bound to follow this Court's decision in Rodriguez v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 519, where a majority of the Court upheld the blanket prohibition on assisted suicide. The dissenting judge found no errors in the trial judge's assessment of stare decisis, her application of s. 7 or the corresponding analysis under s. 1. However, he concluded that the trial judge was bound by the conclusion in Rodriguez that any s. 15 infringement was saved by s. 1.

Held: The appeal should be allowed. Section 241(b) and s. 14 of the Criminal Code unjustifiably infringe s. 7 of the Charter and are of no force or effect to the extent that they prohibit physician-assisted death for a competent adult person who (1) clearly consents to the termination of life and (2) has a grievous and irremediable medical condition (including an illness, disease or disability) that causes enduring suffering that is intolerable to the individual in the circumstances of his or her condition. The declaration of invalidity is suspended for 12 months. Special costs on a full indemnity basis are awarded against Canada throughout. The Attorney General of British Columbia will bear responsibility for 10 percent of the costs at trial on a full indemnity basis and will pay the costs associated with its presence at the appellate levels on a party-and-party basis.

The trial judge was entitled to revisit this Court's decision in Rodriguez. Trial courts may reconsider settled rulings of higher courts in two situations: (1) where a new legal issue is raised; and (2) where there is a change in the circumstances or evidence that fundamentally shifts the parameters of the debate. Here, both conditions were met. The argument before the trial judge involved a different legal conception of s. 7 than that prevailing when Rodriguez was decided. In particular, the law relating to the principles of overbreadth and gross disproportionality had materially advanced since Rodriguez. The matrix of legislative and social facts in this case also differed from the evidence before the Court in Rodriguez.

The prohibition on assisted suicide is, in general, a valid exercise of the federal criminal law power under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867, and it does not impair the protected core of the provincial jurisdiction over health. Health is an area of concurrent jurisdiction, which suggests that aspects of physician-assisted dying may be the subject of valid legislation by both levels of government, depending on the circumstances and the focus of the legislation. On the basis of the record, the interjurisdictional immunity claim cannot succeed.

Insofar as they prohibit physician-assisted dying for competent adults who seek such assistance as a result of a grievous and irremediable medical condition that causes enduring and intolerable suffering, ss. 241(b) and 14 of the Criminal Code deprive these adults of their right to life, liberty and security of the person under s. 7 of the Charter. The right to life is engaged where the law or state action imposes death or an increased risk of death on a person, either directly or indirectly. Here, the prohibition deprives some individuals of life, as it has the effect of forcing some individuals to take their own lives prematurely, for fear that they would be incapable of doing so when they reached the point where suffering was intolerable. The rights to liberty and security of the person, which deal with concerns about autonomy and quality of life, are also engaged. An individual's response to a grievous and irremediable medical condition is a matter critical to their dignity and autonomy. The prohibition denies people in this situation the right to make decisions concerning their bodily integrity and medical care and thus trenches on their liberty. And by leaving them to endure intolerable suffering, it impinges on their security of the person.

The prohibition on physician-assisted dying infringes the right to life, liberty and security of the person in a manner that is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. The object of the prohibition is not, broadly, to preserve life whatever the circumstances, but more specifically to protect vulnerable persons from being induced to commit suicide at a time of weakness. Since a total ban on assisted suicide clearly helps achieve this object, individuals' rights are not deprived arbitrarily. However, the prohibition catches people outside the class of protected persons. It follows that the limitation on their [page336] rights is in at least some cases not connected to the objective and that the prohibition is thus overbroad. It is unnecessary to decide whether the prohibition also violates the principle against gross disproportionality.

Having concluded that the prohibition on physician-assisted dying violates s. 7, it is unnecessary to consider whether it deprives adults who are physically disabled of their right to equal treatment under s. 15 of the Charter.

Sections 241(b) and 14 of the Criminal Code are not saved by s. 1 of the Charter. While the limit is prescribed by law and the law has a pressing and substantial objective, the prohibition is not proportionate to the objective. An absolute prohibition on physician-assisted dying is rationally connected to the goal of protecting the vulnerable from taking their life in times of weakness, because prohibiting an activity that poses certain risks is a rational method of curtailing the risks. However, as the trial judge found, the evidence does not support the contention that a blanket prohibition is necessary in order to substantially meet the government's objective. The trial judge made no palpable and overriding error in concluding, on the basis of evidence from scientists, medical practitioners, and others who are familiar with end-of-life decision-making in Canada and abroad, that a permissive regime with properly designed and administered safeguards was capable of protecting vulnerable people from abuse and error. It was also open to her to conclude that vulnerability can be assessed on an individual basis, using the procedures that physicians apply in their assessment of informed consent and decisional capacity in the context of medical decision-making more generally. The absolute prohibition is therefore not minimally impairing. Given this conclusion, it is not necessary to weigh the impacts of the law on protected rights against the beneficial effect of the law in terms of the greater public good.

The appropriate remedy is not to grant a free-standing constitutional exemption, but rather to issue a declaration of invalidity and to suspend it for 12 months. Nothing in this declaration would compel physicians to provide assistance in dying. The Charter rights of patients and [page337] physicians will need to be reconciled in any legislative and regulatory response to this judgment.

The appellants are entitled to an award of special costs on a full indemnity basis to cover the entire expense of bringing this case before the courts. A court may depart from the usual rule on costs and award special costs where two criteria are met. First, the case must involve matters of public interest that are truly exceptional. It is not enough that the issues raised have not been previously resolved or that they transcend individual interests of the successful litigant: they must also have a significant and widespread societal impact. Second, in addition to showing that they have no personal, proprietary or pecuniary interest in the litigation that would justify the proceedings on economic grounds, the plaintiffs must show that it would not have been possible to effectively pursue the litigation in question with private funding. Finally, only those costs that are shown to be reasonable and prudent will be covered by the award of special costs. Here, the trial judge did not err in awarding special costs in the truly exceptional circumstances of this case. It was also open to her to award 10 percent of the costs against the Attorney General of British Columbia in light of the full and active role it played in the proceedings. The trial judge was in the best position to determine the role taken by that Attorney General and the extent to which it shared carriage of the case.

The following is the judgment delivered by

THE COURT

I. Introduction

1 It is a crime in Canada to assist another person in ending her own life. As a result, people who are grievously and irremediably ill cannot [page343] seek a physician's assistance in dying and may be condemned to a life of severe and intolerable suffering. A person facing this prospect has two options: she can take her own life prematurely, often by violent or dangerous means, or she can suffer until she dies from natural causes. The choice is cruel.

2 The question on this appeal is whether the criminal prohibition that puts a person to this choice violates her Charter rights to life, liberty and security of the person (s. 7) and to equal treatment by and under the law (s. 15). This is a question that asks us to balance competing values of great importance. On the one hand stands the autonomy and dignity of a competent adult who seeks death as a response to a grievous and irremediable medical condition. On the other stands the sanctity of life and the need to protect the vulnerable.

3 The trial judge found that the prohibition violates the s. 7 rights of competent adults who are suffering intolerably as a result of a grievous and irremediable medical condition. She concluded that this infringement is not justified under s. 1 of the Charter. We agree. The trial judge's findings were based on an exhaustive review of the extensive record before her. The evidence supports her conclusion that the violation of the right to life, liberty and security of the person guaranteed by s. 7 of the Charter is severe. It also supports her finding that a properly administered regulatory regime is capable of protecting the vulnerable from abuse or error.

4 We conclude that the prohibition on physician-assisted dying is void insofar as it deprives a competent adult of such assistance where (1) the person affected clearly consents to the termination of life; and (2) the person has a grievous and irremediable medical condition (including an illness, disease or disability) that causes enduring suffering that is [page344] intolerable to the individual in the circumstances of his or her condition. We therefore allow the appeal.

II. Background

5 In Canada, aiding or abetting a person to commit suicide is a criminal offence: see s. 241(b) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46. This means that a person cannot seek a physician-assisted death. Twenty-one years ago, this Court upheld this blanket prohibition on assisted suicide by a slim majority: Rodriguez v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 519. Sopinka J., writing for five justices, held that the prohibition did not violate s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and that if it violated s. 15, this was justified under s. 1, as there was "no halfway measure that could be relied upon with assurance" to protect the vulnerable (p. 614). Four justices disagreed. McLachlin J. (as she then was), with L'Heureux-Dubé J. concurring, concluded that the prohibition violated s. 7 of the Charter and was not justified under s. 1. Lamer C.J. held that the prohibition violated s. 15 of the Charter and was not saved under s. 1. Cory J. agreed that the prohibition violated both ss. 7 and 15 and could not be justified.

6 Despite the Court's decision in Rodriguez, the debate over physician-assisted dying continued. Between 1991 and 2010, the House of Commons and its committees debated no less than six private member's bills seeking to decriminalize assisted suicide. None was passed. While opponents to legalization emphasized the inadequacy of safeguards and the potential to devalue human life, a vocal minority spoke in favour of reform, highlighting the importance of dignity and autonomy and the limits of palliative care in addressing suffering. The Senate considered the matter as well, issuing a report on assisted suicide and euthanasia in 1995. The [page345] majority expressed concerns about the risk of abuse under a permissive regime and the need for respect for life. A minority supported an exemption to the prohibition in some circumstances.

7 More recent reports have come down in favour of reform. In 2011, the Royal Society of Canada published a report on end-of-life decision-making and recommended that the Criminal Code be modified to permit assistance in dying in some circumstances. The Quebec National Assembly's Select Committee on Dying with Dignity issued a report in 2012, recommending amendments to legislation to recognize medical aid in dying as appropriate end-of-life care (now codified in An Act respecting end-of-life care, CQLR, c. S-32.0001 (not yet in force)).

8 The legislative landscape on the issue of physician-assisted death has changed in the two decades since Rodriguez. In 1993 Sopinka J. noted that no other Western democracy expressly permitted assistance in dying. By 2010, however, eight jurisdictions permitted some form of assisted dying: the Netherlands, Belgium, Luxembourg, Switzerland, Oregon, Washington, Montana, and Colombia. The process of legalization began in 1994, when Oregon, as a result of a citizens' initiative, altered its laws to permit medical aid in dying for a person suffering from a terminal disease. Colombia followed in 1997, after a decision of the constitutional court. The Dutch Parliament established a regulatory regime for assisted dying in 2002; Belgium quickly adopted a similar regime, with Luxembourg joining in 2009. Together, these regimes have produced a body of evidence about the practical and legal workings of physician-assisted death and the efficacy of safeguards for the vulnerable.

9 Nevertheless, physician-assisted dying remains a criminal offence in most Western countries, and a number of courts have upheld the prohibition on such assistance in the face of constitutional and human rights challenges: see, e.g., Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702 (1997); Vacco v. Quill, 521 U.S. 793 (1997); Pretty v. United Kingdom, No. 2346/02, ECHR 2002-III; and Fleming v. Ireland, [2013] IESC 19. In a recent decision, a majority of the Supreme Court of the United Kingdom accepted that the absolute prohibition on assisted dying breached the claimants' rights, but found the evidence on safeguards insufficient; the court concluded that Parliament should be given an opportunity to debate and amend the legislation based on the court's provisional views (see R. (on the application of Nicklinson) v. Ministry of Justice, [2014] UKSC 38, [2014] 3 All E.R. 843).

10 The debate in the public arena reflects the ongoing debate in the legislative sphere. Some medical practitioners see legal change as a natural extension of the principle of patient autonomy, while others fear derogation from the principles of medical ethics. Some people with disabilities oppose the legalization of assisted dying, arguing that it implicitly devalues their lives and renders them vulnerable to unwanted assistance in dying, as medical professionals assume that a disabled patient "leans towards death at a sharper angle than the acutely ill - but otherwise non-disabled - patient" (2012 BCSC 886, 287 C.C.C. (3d) 1, at para. 811). Other people with disabilities take the opposite view, arguing that a regime which permits control over the manner of one's death respects, rather than threatens, their autonomy and dignity, and that the legalization of physician-assisted suicide will protect them by establishing stronger safeguards and oversight for end-of-life medical care.

11 The impetus for this case arose in 2009, when Gloria Taylor was diagnosed with a fatal neurodegenerative disease, amyotrophic lateral sclerosis (or ALS), which causes progressive muscle [page347] weakness. ALS patients first lose the ability to use their hands and feet, then the ability to walk, chew, swallow, speak and, eventually, breathe. Like Sue Rodriguez before her, Gloria Taylor did "not want to die slowly, piece by piece" or "wracked with pain," and brought a claim before the British Columbia Supreme Court challenging the constitutionality of the Criminal Code provisions that prohibit assistance in dying, specifically ss. 14, 21, 22, 222, and 241. She was joined in her claim by Lee Carter and Hollis Johnson, who had assisted Ms. Carter's mother, Kathleen ("Kay") Carter, in achieving her goal of dying with dignity by taking her to Switzerland to use the services of DIGNITAS, an assisted-suicide clinic; Dr. William Shoichet, a physician from British Columbia who would be willing to participate in physician-assisted dying if it were no longer prohibited; and the British Columbia Civil Liberties Association, which has a long-standing interest in patients' rights and health policy and has conducted advocacy and education with respect to end-of-life choices, including assisted suicide.

12 By 2010, Ms. Taylor's condition had deteriorated to the point that she required a wheelchair to go more than a short distance and was suffering pain from muscle deterioration. She required home support for assistance with the daily tasks of living, something that she described as an assault on her privacy, dignity, and self-esteem. She continued to pursue an independent life despite her illness, but found that she was steadily losing the ability to participate fully in that life. Ms. Taylor informed her family and friends of a desire to obtain a physician-assisted death. She did not want to "live in a bedridden state, stripped of dignity and independence", she said; nor did she want an "ugly death". This is how she explained her desire to seek a physician-assisted death:

I do not want my life to end violently. I do not want my mode of death to be traumatic for my family members. I [page348] want the legal right to die peacefully, at the time of my own choosing, in the embrace of my family and friends.

I know that I am dying, but I am far from depressed. I have some down time - that is part and parcel of the experience of knowing that you are terminal. But there is still a lot of good in my life; there are still things, like special times with my granddaughter and family, that bring me extreme joy. I will not waste any of my remaining time being depressed. I intend to get every bit of happiness I can wring from what is left of my life so long as it remains a life of quality; but I do not want to live a life without quality. There will come a point when I will know that enough is enough. I cannot say precisely when that time will be. It is not a question of "when I can't walk" or "when I can't talk." There is no pre-set trigger moment. I just know that, globally, there will be some point in time when I will be able to say - "this is it, this is the point where life is just not worthwhile." When that time comes, I want to be able to call my family together, tell them of my decision, say a dignified good-bye and obtain final closure - for me and for them.

My present quality of life is impaired by the fact that I am unable to say for certain that I will have the right to ask for physician-assisted dying when that "enough is enough" moment arrives. I live in apprehension that my death will be slow, difficult, unpleasant, painful, undignified and inconsistent with the values and principles I have tried to live by... .

... What I fear is a death that negates, as opposed to concludes, my life. I do not want to die slowly, piece by piece. I do not want to waste away unconscious in a hospital bed. I do not want to die wracked with pain.

13 Ms. Taylor, however, knew she would be unable to request a physician-assisted death when the time came, because of the Criminal Code prohibition and the fact that she lacked the financial resources to travel to Switzerland, where assisted suicide is legal and available to non-residents. This [page349] left her with what she described as the "cruel choice" between killing herself while she was still physically capable of doing so, or giving up the ability to exercise any control over the manner and timing of her death.

14 Other witnesses also described the "horrible" choice faced by a person suffering from a grievous and irremediable illness. The stories in the affidavits vary in their details: some witnesses described the progression of degenerative illnesses like motor neuron diseases or Huntington's disease, while others described the agony of treatment and the fear of a gruesome death from advanced-stage cancer. Yet running through the evidence of all the witnesses is a constant theme - that they suffer from the knowledge that they lack the ability to bring a peaceful end to their lives at a time and in a manner of their own choosing.

15 Some describe how they had considered seeking out the traditional modes of suicide but found that choice, too, repugnant:

I was going to blow my head off. I have a gun and I seriously considered doing it. I decided that I could not do that to my family. It would be horrible to put them through something like that... . I want a better choice than that.

A number of the witnesses made clear that they - or their loved ones - had considered or in fact committed suicide earlier than they would have chosen to die if physician-assisted death had been available to them. One woman noted that the conventional methods of suicide, such as carbon monoxide asphyxiation, slitting of the wrists or overdosing on street drugs, would require that she end her life "while I am still able bodied and capable of taking my life, well ahead of when I actually need to leave this life".

16 Still other witnesses described their situation in terms of a choice between a protracted or painful [page350] death and exposing their loved ones to prosecution for assisting them in ending their lives. Speaking of himself and his wife, one man said: "We both face this reality, that we have only two terrible and imperfect options, with a sense of horror and loathing."

17 Ms. Carter and Mr. Johnson described Kay Carter's journey to assisted suicide in Switzerland and their role in facilitating that process. Kay was diagnosed in 2008 with spinal stenosis, a condition that results in the progressive compression of the spinal cord. By mid-2009, her physical condition had deteriorated to the point that she required assistance with virtually all of her daily activities. She had extremely limited mobility and suffered from chronic pain. As her illness progressed, Kay informed her family that she did not wish to live out her life as an "ironing board", lying flat in bed. She asked her daughter, Lee Carter, and her daughter's husband, Hollis Johnson, to support and assist her in arranging an assisted suicide in Switzerland, and to travel there with her for that purpose. Although aware that assisting Kay could expose them both to prosecution in Canada, they agreed to assist her. In early 2010, they attended a clinic in Switzerland operated by DIGNITAS, a Swiss "death with dignity" organization. Kay took the prescribed dose of sodium pentobarbital while surrounded by her family, and passed away within 20 minutes.

18 Ms. Carter and Mr. Johnson found the process of planning and arranging for Kay's trip to Switzerland difficult, in part because their activities had to be kept secret due to the potential for criminal sanctions. While they have not faced prosecution in Canada following Kay's death, Ms. Carter and Mr. Johnson are of the view that Kay ought to have been able to obtain a physician-assisted suicide at home, surrounded by her family and friends, rather than undergoing the stressful and expensive [page351] process of arranging for the procedure overseas. Accordingly, they joined Ms. Taylor in pressing for the legalization of physician-assisted death.

III. Statutory Provisions

19 The appellants challenge the constitutionality of the following provisions of the Criminal Code:

14. No person is entitled to consent to have death inflicted on him, and such consent does not affect the criminal responsibility of any person by whom death may be inflicted on the person by whom consent is given.

21. (1) Every one is a party to an offence who

(b) does or omits to do anything for the purpose of aiding any person to commit it; or

...

(2) Where two or more persons form an intention in common to carry out an unlawful purpose and to assist each other therein and any one of them, in carrying out the common purpose, commits an offence, each of them who knew or ought to have known that the commission of the offence would be a probable consequence of carrying out the common purpose is a party to that offence.

22. (1) Where a person counsels another person to be a party to an offence and that other person is afterwards a party to that offence, the person who counselled is a party to that offence, notwithstanding that the offence was committed in a way different from that which was counselled.

(2) Every one who counsels another person to be a party to an offence is a party to every offence that the other commits in consequence of the counselling that the person who counselled knew or ought to have known was likely to be committed in consequence of the counselling.

(3) For the purposes of this Act, "counsel" includes procure, solicit or incite.

222. (1) A person commits homicide when, directly or indirectly, by any means, he causes the death of a human being.

[page352]

(2) Homicide is culpable or not culpable.

(3) Homicide that is not culpable is not an offence.

(4) Culpable homicide is murder or manslaughter or infanticide.

(5) A person commits culpable homicide when he causes the death of a human being,

(a) by means of an unlawful act;

241. Every one who

(a) counsels a person to commit suicide, or

(b) aids or abets a person to commit suicide, whether suicide ensues or not, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding fourteen years.

20 In our view, two of these provisions are at the core of the constitutional challenge: s. 241(b), which says that everyone who aids or abets a person in committing suicide commits an indictable offence, and s. 14, which says that no person may consent to death being inflicted on them. It is these two provisions that prohibit the provision of assistance in dying. Sections 21, 22, and 222 are only engaged so long as the provision of assistance in dying is itself an "unlawful act" or offence. Section 241(a) does not contribute to the prohibition on assisted suicide.

21 The Charter states:

1. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

7. Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

15. (1) Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

IV. Judicial History

A. British Columbia Supreme Court, 2012 BCSC 886, 287 C.C.C. (3d) 1

22 The action was brought by way of summary trial before Smith J. in the British Columbia Supreme Court. While the majority of the evidence was presented in affidavit form, a number of the expert witnesses were cross-examined, both prior to trial and before the trial judge. The record was voluminous: the trial judge canvassed evidence from Canada and from the permissive jurisdictions on medical ethics and current end-of-life practices, the risks associated with assisted suicide, and the feasibility of safeguards.

23 The trial judge began by reviewing the current state of the law and practice in Canada regarding end-of-life care. She found that current unregulated end-of-life practices in Canada - such as the administration of palliative sedation and the withholding or withdrawal of lifesaving or life-sustaining medical treatment - can have the effect of hastening death and that there is a strong societal consensus that these practices are ethically acceptable (para. 357). After considering the evidence of physicians and ethicists, she found that the "preponderance of the evidence from ethicists is that there is no ethical distinction between physician-assisted death and other end-of-life practices whose outcome is highly likely to be death" (para. 335). Finally, she found that there are qualified Canadian physicians who would find it ethical to assist a patient in dying if that act were not prohibited by law (para. 319).

24 Based on these findings, the trial judge concluded that, while there is no clear societal consensus on physician-assisted dying, there is a strong consensus that it would only be ethical with respect to voluntary adults who are competent, informed, grievously and irremediably ill, and where the assistance is "clearly consistent with the patient's wishes and best interests, and [provided] in order to relieve suffering" (para. 358).

25 The trial judge then turned to the evidence from the regimes that permit physician-assisted dying. She reviewed the safeguards in place in each jurisdiction and considered the effectiveness of each regulatory regime. In each system, she found general compliance with regulations, although she noted some room for improvement. The evidence from Oregon and the Netherlands showed that a system can be designed to protect the socially vulnerable. Expert evidence established that the "predicted abuse and disproportionate impact on vulnerable populations has not materialized" in Belgium, the Netherlands, and Oregon (para. 684). She concluded that although none of the systems has achieved perfection, empirical researchers and practitioners who have experience in those systems are of the view that they work well in protecting patients from abuse while allowing competent patients to choose the timing of their deaths. [para. 685]

While stressing the need for caution in drawing conclusions for Canada based on foreign experience, the trial judge found that "weak inference[s]" could be drawn about the effectiveness of safeguards and the potential degree of compliance with any permissive regime (para. 683).

26 Based on the evidence from the permissive jurisdictions, the trial judge also rejected the argument that the legalization of physician-assisted dying would impede the development of palliative care in the country, finding that the effects of a permissive regime, while speculative, would "not necessarily be negative" (para. 736). Similarly, she concluded that any changes in the physician-patient relationship following legalization "could prove to be neutral or for the good" (para. 746).

27 The trial judge then considered the risks of a permissive regime and the feasibility of implementing safeguards to address those risks. After reviewing the evidence tendered by physicians and experts in patient assessment, she concluded that physicians were capable of reliably assessing patient competence, including in the context of life-and-death decisions (para. 798). She found that it was possible to detect coercion, undue influence, and ambivalence as part of this assessment process (paras. 815, 843). She also found that the informed consent standard could be applied in the context of physician-assisted death, so long as care was taken to "ensure a patient is properly informed of her diagnosis and prognosis" and the treatment options described included all reasonable palliative care interventions (para. 831). Ultimately, she concluded that the risks of physician-assisted death "can be identified and very substantially minimized through a carefully-designed system" that imposes strict limits that are scrupulously monitored and enforced (para. 883).

28 Having reviewed the copious evidence before her, the trial judge concluded that the decision in Rodriguez did not prevent her from reviewing the constitutionality of the impugned provisions, because (1) the majority in Rodriguez did not address the right to life; (2) the principles of overbreadth and gross disproportionality had not been identified at the time of the decision in Rodriguez [page356] and thus were not addressed in that decision; (3) the majority only "assumed" a violation of s. 15; and (4) the decision in Alberta v. Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony, 2009 SCC 37, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 567, represented a "substantive change" to the s. 1 analysis (para. 994). The trial judge concluded that these changes in the law, combined with the changes in the social and factual landscape over the past 20 years, permitted her to reconsider the constitutionality on the prohibition on physician-assisted dying.

29 The trial judge then turned to the Charter analysis. She first asked whether the prohibition violated the s. 15 equality guarantee. She found that the provisions imposed a disproportionate burden on persons with physical disabilities, as only they are restricted to self-imposed starvation and dehydration in order to take their own lives (para. 1076). This distinction, she found, is discriminatory, and not justified under s. 1. While the objective of the prohibition - the protection of vulnerable persons from being induced to commit suicide at a time of weakness - is pressing and substantial and the means are rationally connected to that purpose, the prohibition is not minimally impairing. A "stringently limited, carefully monitored system of exceptions" would achieve Parliament's objective:

Permission for physician-assisted death for grievously ill and irremediably suffering people who are competent, fully informed, non-ambivalent, and free from coercion or duress, with stringent and well-enforced safeguards, could achieve that objective in a real and substantial way. [para. 1243]

30 Turning to s. 7 of the Charter, which protects life, liberty and security of the person, the trial judge found that the prohibition impacted all three [page357] interests. The prohibition on seeking physician-assisted dying deprived individuals of liberty, which encompasses "the right to non-interference by the state with fundamentally important and personal medical decision-making" (para. 1302). In addition, it also impinged on Ms. Taylor's security of the person by restricting her control over her bodily integrity. While the trial judge rejected a "qualitative" approach to the right to life, concluding that the right to life is only engaged by a threat of death, she concluded that Ms. Taylor's right to life was engaged insofar as the prohibition might force her to take her life earlier than she otherwise would if she had access to a physician-assisted death.

31 The trial judge concluded that the deprivation of the claimants' s. 7 rights was not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice, particularly the principles against overbreadth and gross disproportionality. The prohibition was broader than necessary, as the evidence showed that a system with properly designed and administered safeguards offered a less restrictive means of reaching the government's objective. Moreover, the "very severe" effects of the absolute prohibition in relation to its salutary effects rendered it grossly disproportionate (para. 1378). As with the s. 15 infringement, the trial judge found the s. 7 infringement was not justified under s. 1.

32 In the result, the trial judge declared the prohibition unconstitutional, granted a one-year suspension of invalidity, and provided Ms. Taylor with a constitutional exemption for use during the one-year period of the suspension. Ms. Taylor passed away prior to the appeal of this matter, without accessing the exemption.

33 In a separate decision on costs (2012 BCSC 1587, 271 C.R.R. (2d) 224), the trial judge ordered an award of special costs in favour of the plaintiffs. The issues in the case were "complex and [page358] momentous" (para. 87) and the plaintiffs could not have prosecuted the case without assistance from pro bono counsel; an award of special costs would therefore promote the public interest in encouraging experienced counsel to take on Charter litigation on a pro bono basis. The trial judge ordered the Attorney General of British Columbia to pay 10 percent of the costs, noting that she had taken a full and active role in the proceedings. Canada was ordered to pay the remaining 90 percent of the award.

B. British Columbia Court of Appeal, 2013 BCCA 435, 51 B.C.L.R. (5th) 213

34 The majority of the Court of Appeal, per Newbury and Saunders JJ.A., allowed Canada's appeal on the ground that the trial judge was bound to follow this Court's decision in Rodriguez. The majority concluded that neither the change in legislative and social facts nor the new legal issues relied on by the trial judge permitted a departure from Rodriguez.

35 The majority read Rodriguez as implicitly rejecting the proposition that the prohibition infringes the right to life under s. 7 of the Charter. It concluded that the post-Rodriguez principles of fundamental justice - namely overbreadth and gross disproportionality - did not impose a new legal framework under s. 7. While acknowledging that the reasons in Rodriguez did not follow the analytical methodology that now applies under s. 7, the majority held that this would not have changed the result.

36 The majority also noted that Rodriguez disposed of the s. 15 equality argument (which only two judges in that case expressly considered) by holding that any rights violation worked by the prohibition was justified as a reasonable limit under s. 1 of the Charter. The decision in Hutterian [page359] Brethren did not represent a change in the law under s. 1. Had it been necessary to consider s. 1 in relation to s. 7, the majority opined, the s. 1 analysis carried out under s. 15 likely would have led to the same conclusion - the "blanket prohibition" under s. 241 of the Criminal Code was justified (para. 323). Accordingly, the majority concluded that "the trial judge was bound to find that the plaintiffs' case had been authoritatively decided by Rodriguez" (para. 324).

37 Commenting on remedy in the alternative, the majority of the Court of Appeal suggested the reinstatement of the free-standing constitutional exemption eliminated in R. v. Ferguson, 2008 SCC 6, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 96, instead of a declaration of invalidity, as a suspended declaration presented the spectre of a legislative vacuum.

38 The majority denied the appellants their costs, given the outcome, but otherwise would have approved the trial judge's award of special costs. In addition, the majority held that costs should not have been awarded against British Columbia.

39 Finch C.J.B.C., dissenting, found no errors in the trial judge's assessment of stare decisis, her application of s.

7, or the corresponding analysis under s. 1. However, he concluded that the trial judge was bound by Sopinka J.'s conclusion that any s. 15 infringement was saved by s. 1. While he essentially agreed with her s. 7 analysis, he would have accepted a broader, qualitative scope for the right to life. He agreed with the trial judge that the prohibition was not minimally impairing, and concluded that a "carefully regulated scheme" could meet Parliament's objectives (para. 177); therefore, the breach of s. 7 could not be justified under s. 1. [page360] He would have upheld the trial judge's order on costs.

V. Issues on Appeal

40 The main issue in this case is whether the prohibition on physician-assisted dying found in s. 241(b) of the Criminal Code violates the claimants' rights under ss. 7 and 15 of the Charter. For the purposes of their claim, the appellants use "physician-assisted death" and "physician-assisted dying" to describe the situation where a physician provides or administers medication that intentionally brings about the patient's death, at the request of the patient. The appellants advance two claims: (1) that the prohibition on physician-assisted dying deprives competent adults, who suffer a grievous and irremediable medical condition that causes the person to endure physical or psychological suffering that is intolerable to that person, of their right to life, liberty and security of the person under s. 7 of the Charter; and (2) that the prohibition deprives adults who are physically disabled of their right to equal treatment under s. 15 of the Charter.

41 Before turning to the Charter claims, two preliminary issues arise: (1) whether this Court's decision in Rodriguez can be revisited; and (2) whether the prohibition is beyond Parliament's power because physician-assisted dying lies at the core of the provincial jurisdiction over health.

VI. Was the Trial Judge Bound by Rodriguez?

42 The adjudicative facts in Rodriguez were very similar to the facts before the trial judge. Ms. Rodriguez, like Ms. Taylor, was dying of ALS. [page361] She, like Ms. Taylor, wanted the right to seek a physician's assistance in dying when her suffering became intolerable. The majority of the Court, per Sopinka J., held that the prohibition deprived Ms. Rodriguez of her security of the person, but found that it did so in a manner that was in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. The majority also assumed that the provision violated the claimant's s. 15 rights, but held that the limit was justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

43 Canada and Ontario argue that the trial judge was bound by Rodriguez and not entitled to revisit the constitutionality of the legislation prohibiting assisted suicide. Ontario goes so far as to argue that "vertical stare decisis" is a constitutional principle that requires all lower courts to rigidly follow this Court's Charter precedents unless and until this Court sets them aside.

44 The doctrine that lower courts must follow the decisions of higher courts is fundamental to our legal system. It provides certainty while permitting the orderly development of the law in incremental steps. However, stare decisis is not a straitjacket that condemns the law to stasis. Trial courts may reconsider settled rulings of higher courts in two situations: (1) where a new legal issue is raised; and (2) where there is a change in the circumstances or evidence that "fundamentally shifts the parameters of the debate" (Canada (Attorney General) v. Bedford, 2013 SCC 72, [2013] 3 S.C.R. 1101, at para. 42).

45 Both conditions were met in this case. The trial judge explained her decision to revisit Rodriguez by noting the changes in both the legal framework for s. 7 and the evidence on controlling the risk of abuse associated with assisted suicide.

46 The argument before the trial judge involved a different legal conception of s. 7 than that prevailing when Rodriguez was decided. In particular, the law relating to the principles of overbreadth and gross disproportionality had materially advanced since Rodriguez. The majority of this Court in Rodriguez acknowledged the argument that the impugned laws were "over-inclusive" when discussing the principles of fundamental justice (see p. 590).

However, it did not apply the principle of overbreadth as it is currently understood, but instead asked whether the prohibition was "arbitrary or unfair in that it is unrelated to the state's interest in protecting the vulnerable, and that it lacks a foundation in the legal tradition and societal beliefs which are said to be represented by the prohibition" (p. 595). By contrast, the law on overbreadth, now explicitly recognized as a principle of fundamental justice, asks whether the law interferes with some conduct that has no connection to the law's objectives (Bedford, at para. 101). This different question may lead to a different answer. The majority's consideration of overbreadth under s. 1 suffers from the same defect: see Rodriguez, at p. 614. Finally, the majority in Rodriguez did not consider whether the prohibition was grossly disproportionate.

47 The matrix of legislative and social facts in this case also differed from the evidence before the Court in Rodriguez. The majority in Rodriguez relied on evidence of (1) the widespread acceptance of a moral or ethical distinction between passive and active euthanasia (pp. 605-7); (2) the lack of any "halfway measure" that could protect the vulnerable (pp. 613-14); and (3) the "substantial consensus" in Western countries that a blanket prohibition is necessary to protect against the slippery slope (pp. 601-6 and 613). The record before the trial judge in this case contained evidence that, if accepted, was capable of undermining each of these conclusions (see [page363] Ontario (Attorney General) v. Fraser, 2011 SCC 20, [2011] 2 S.C.R. 3, at para. 136, per Rothstein J.).

48 While we do not agree with the trial judge that the comments in Hutterian Brethren on the s. 1 proportionality doctrine suffice to justify reconsideration of the s. 15 equality claim, we conclude it was open to the trial judge to reconsider the s. 15 claim as well, given the fundamental change in the facts.

VII. Does the Prohibition Interfere With the "Core" of the Provincial Jurisdiction Over Health?

49 The appellants accept that the prohibition on assisted suicide is, in general, a valid exercise of the federal criminal law power under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867. However, they say that the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity means that the prohibition cannot constitutionally apply to physician-assisted dying, because it lies at the core of the provincial jurisdiction over health care under s. 92(7), (13) and (16) of the Constitution Act, 1867, and is therefore beyond the legislative competence of the federal Parliament.

50 The doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity is premised on the idea that the heads of power in ss. 91 and 92 are "exclusive", and therefore each have a "minimum and unassailable" core of content that is immune from the application of legislation enacted by the other level of government (Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 3, at paras. 33-34). To succeed in their argument on this point, the appellants must show that the prohibition, insofar as it extends to physician-assisted dying, impairs the "protected core" of the provincial jurisdiction over health: [page364] Tsilhqot'in Nation v. British Columbia, 2014 SCC 44, [2014] 2 S.C.R. 256, at para. 131.

51 This Court rejected a similar argument in Canada (Attorney General) v. PHS Community Services Society, 2011 SCC 44, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 134. The issue in that case was "whether the delivery of health care services constitutes a protected core of the provincial power over health care in s. 92(7), (13) and (16) ... and is therefore immune from federal interference" (para. 66). The Court concluded that it did not (per McLachlin C.J.):

... Parliament has power to legislate with respect to federal matters, notably criminal law, that touch on health. For instance, it has historic jurisdiction to prohibit medical treatments that are dangerous, or that it perceives as "socially undesirable" behaviour: R. v. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 30; Morgentaler v. The Queen, [1976] 1 S.C.R. 616; R. v. Morgentaler, [1993] 3 S.C.R. 463. The federal role in the domain of health makes it impossible to precisely define what falls in or out of the proposed provincial "core". Overlapping federal jurisdiction and the sheer size and diversity of provincial health power render daunting the task of drawing a bright line around a protected provincial core of health where federal legislation may not tread. [para. 68]

52 The appellants and the Attorney General of Quebec (who intervened on this point) say that it is possible to describe a precise core for the power over health, and thereby to distinguish PHS. The appellants' proposed core is described as a power to deliver necessary medical treatment for which there is no alternative treatment capable of meeting a patient's needs (A.F., at para. 43). Quebec takes a slightly different approach, defining the core as the power to establish the kind of health care offered to patients and supervise the process of consent required for that care (I.F., at para. 7).

53 We are not persuaded by the submissions that PHS is distinguishable, given the vague terms in which the proposed definitions of the "core" of the provincial health power are couched. In our view, the appellants have not established that the prohibition on physician-assisted dying impairs the core of the provincial jurisdiction. Health is an area of concurrent jurisdiction; both Parliament and the provinces may validly legislate on the topic: RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 199, at para. 32; Schneider v. The Queen, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 112, at p. 142. This suggests that aspects of physician-assisted dying may be the subject of valid legislation by both levels of government, depending on the circumstances and focus of the legislation. We are not satisfied on the record before us that the provincial power over health excludes the power of the federal Parliament to legislate on physician-assisted dying. It follows that the interjurisdictional immunity claim cannot succeed.

VIII. Section 7

54 Section 7 of the Charter states that "[e]veryone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice."

55 In order to demonstrate a violation of s. 7, the claimants must first show that the law interferes with, or deprives them of, their life, liberty or security of the person. Once they have established that s. 7 is engaged, they must then show that the deprivation in question is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

56 For the reasons below, we conclude that the prohibition on physician-assisted dying infringes the right to life, liberty and security of Ms. Taylor and of persons in her position, and that it does so in a manner that is overbroad and thus is not in [page366] accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. It therefore violates s. 7.

A. Does the Law Infringe the Right to Life, Liberty and Security of the Person?

(1) Life

57 The trial judge found that the prohibition on physician-assisted dying had the effect of forcing some individuals to take their own lives prematurely, for fear that they would be incapable of doing so when they reached the point where suffering was intolerable. On that basis, she found that the right to life was engaged.

58 We see no basis for interfering with the trial judge's conclusion on this point. The evidence of premature death was not challenged before this Court. It is therefore established that the prohibition deprives some individuals of life.

59 The appellants and a number of the interveners urge us to adopt a broader, qualitative approach to the right to life. Some argue that the right to life is not restricted to the preservation of life, but protects quality of life and therefore a right to die with dignity. Others argue that the right to life protects personal autonomy and fundamental notions of self-determination and dignity, and therefore includes the right to determine whether to take one's own life.

60 In dissent at the Court of Appeal, Finch C.J.B.C. accepted the argument that the right to life protects more than physical existence (paras. 84-89). In his view, the life interest is "intimately connected to the way a person values his or her lived experience. The point at which the meaning of life is lost, when life's positive attributes are so diminished as to render life valueless, ... is an intensely personal decision which 'everyone' has the right to make for him or herself" (para. 86). Similarly, in his dissent in Rodriguez, Cory J. accepted that the right to life included a right to die with dignity, on [page367] the ground that "dying is an integral part of living" (p. 630).

61 The trial judge, on the other hand, rejected the "qualitative" approach to the right to life. She concluded that the right to life is only engaged when there is a threat of death as a result of government action or laws. In her words, the right to life is limited to a "right not to die" (para. 1322 (emphasis in original)).

62 This Court has most recently invoked the right to life in Chaoulli v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2005 SCC 35, [2005] 1 S.C.R. 791, where evidence showed that the lack of timely health care could result in death (paras. 38 and 50, per Deschamps J.; para. 123, per McLachlin C.J. and Major J.; and paras. 191 and 200, per Binnie and LeBel JJ.), and in PHS, where the clients of Insite were deprived of potentially lifesaving medical care (para. 91). In each case, the right was only engaged by the threat of death. In short, the case law suggests that the right to life is engaged where the law or state action imposes death or an increased risk of death on a person, either directly or indirectly. Conversely, concerns about autonomy and quality of life have traditionally been treated as liberty and security rights. We see no reason to alter that approach in this case.

63 This said, we do not agree that the existential formulation of the right to life requires an absolute prohibition on assistance in dying, or that individuals cannot "waive" their right to life. This would create a "duty to live", rather than a "right to life", and would call into question the legality of any consent to the withdrawal or refusal of lifesaving or life-sustaining treatment. The sanctity of life is one of our most fundamental societal values. Section 7 is rooted in a profound respect for the value of human life. But s. 7 also encompasses life, liberty and security of the person during the passage to death. It is for this reason that the sanctity of [page368] life "is no longer seen to require that all human life be preserved at all costs" (Rodriguez, at p. 595, per Sopinka J.). And it is for this reason that the law has come to recognize that, in certain circumstances, an individual's choice about the end of her life is entitled to respect. It is to this fundamental choice that we now turn.

(2) Liberty and Security of the Person

64 Underlying both of these rights is a concern for the protection of individual autonomy and dignity. Liberty protects "the right to make fundamental personal choices free from state interference": Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), 2000 SCC 44, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 307, at para. 54. Security of the person encompasses "a notion of personal autonomy involving ... control over one's bodily integrity free from state interference" (Rodriguez, at pp. 587-88, per Sopinka J., referring to R. v. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 30) and it is engaged by state interference with an individual's physical or psychological integrity, including any state action that causes physical or serious psychological suffering (New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services) v. G. (J.), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 46, at para. 58; Blencoe, at paras. 55-57; Chaoulli, at para. 43, per Deschamps J.; para. 119, per McLachlin C.J. and Major J.; and paras. 191 and 200, per Binnie and LeBel JJ.). While liberty and security of the person are distinct interests, for the purpose of this appeal they may be considered together.

65 The trial judge concluded that the prohibition on assisted dying limited Ms. Taylor's s. 7 right to liberty and security of the person, by interfering with "fundamentally important and personal medical decision-making" (para. 1302), imposing pain and psychological stress and depriving her of control over her bodily integrity (paras. 1293-94). She found that the prohibition left people like Ms. Taylor to suffer physical or psychological pain [page369] and imposed stress due to the unavailability of physician-assisted dying, impinging on her security of the person. She further noted that seriously and irremediably ill persons were "denied the opportunity to make a choice that may be very important to their sense of dignity and personal integrity" and that is "consistent with their lifelong values and that reflects their life's experience" (para. 1326).

66 We agree with the trial judge. An individual's response to a grievous and irremediable medical condition is a matter critical to their dignity and autonomy. The law allows people in this situation to request palliative sedation, refuse artificial nutrition and hydration, or request the removal of life-sustaining medical equipment, but denies them the right to request a physician's assistance in dying. This interferes with their ability to make decisions concerning their bodily integrity and medical care and thus trenches on liberty. And, by leaving people like Ms. Taylor to endure intolerable suffering, it impinges on their security of the person.

67 The law has long protected patient autonomy in medical decision-making. In A.C. v. Manitoba (Director of Child and Family Services), 2009 SCC 30, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 181, a majority of this Court, per Abella J. (the dissent not disagreeing on this point), endorsed the "tenacious relevance in our legal system of the principle that competent individuals are - and should be - free to make decisions about their bodily integrity" (para. 39). This right to "decide one's own fate" entitles adults to direct the course of their own medical care (para. 40): it is this principle that underlies the concept of "informed consent" and is protected by s. 7's guarantee of liberty and security of the person (para. 100; see also R. v. Parker (2000), 49 O.R. (3d) 481 (C.A.)). As noted in Fleming v. Reid (1991), 4 O.R. (3d) 74 [page370] (C.A.), the right of medical self-determination is not vitiated by the fact that serious risks or consequences, including death, may flow from the patient's decision. It is this same principle that is at work in the cases dealing with the right to refuse consent to medical treatment, or to demand that treatment be withdrawn or discontinued: see, e.g., Ciarlariello v. Schacter, [1993] 2 S.C.R. 119; Malette v. Shulman (1990), 72 O.R. (2d) 417 (C.A.); and Nancy B. v. Hôtel-Dieu de Québec (1992), 86 D.L.R. (4th) 385 (Que. Sup. Ct.).

68 In Blencoe, a majority of the Court held that the s. 7 liberty interest is engaged "where state compulsions or prohibitions affect important and fundamental life choices" (para. 49). In A.C., where the claimant sought to refuse a potentially lifesaving blood transfusion on religious grounds, Binnie J. noted that we may "instinctively recoil" from the decision to seek death because of our belief in the sanctity of human life (para. 219). But his response is equally relevant here: it is clear that anyone who seeks physician-assisted dying because they are suffering intolerably as a result of a grievous and irremediable medical condition "does so out of a deeply personal and fundamental belief about how they wish to live, or cease to live" (ibid.). The trial judge, too, described this as a decision that, for some people, is "very important to their sense of dignity and personal integrity, that is consistent with their lifelong values and that reflects their life's experience" (para. 1326). This is a decision that is rooted in their control over their bodily integrity; it represents their deeply personal response to serious pain and suffering. By denying them the opportunity to make that choice, the prohibition impinges on their liberty and security of the person. As noted above, s. 7 recognizes the value of life, but it also honours the role that autonomy and dignity play at the end of that life. We therefore conclude that ss. 241(b) and 14 of the Criminal Code, insofar as they prohibit physician-assisted dying for competent adults who seek such assistance as a result of a grievous and irremediable medical condition that [page371] causes enduring and intolerable suffering, infringe the rights to liberty and security of the person.

69 We note, as the trial judge did, that Lee Carter and Hollis Johnson's interest in liberty may be engaged by the threat of criminal sanction for their role in Kay Carter's death in Switzerland. However, this potential deprivation was not the focus of the arguments raised at trial, and neither Ms. Carter nor Mr. Johnson sought a personal remedy before this Court. Accordingly, we have confined ourselves to the rights of those who seek assistance in dying, rather than of those who might provide such assistance.

(3) Summary on Section 7: Life, Liberty and Security of the Person

70 For the foregoing reasons, we conclude that the prohibition on physician-assisted dying deprived Ms. Taylor and others suffering from grievous and irremediable medical conditions of the right to life, liberty and security of the person. The remaining question under s. 7 is whether this deprivation was in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

B. The Principles of Fundamental Justice

71 Section 7 does not promise that the state will never interfere with a person's life, liberty or security of the person - laws do this all the time - but rather that the state will not do so in a way that violates the principles of fundamental justice.

72 Section 7 does not catalogue the principles of fundamental justice to which it refers. Over the course of 32 years of Charter adjudication, this [page372] Court has worked to define the minimum constitutional requirements that a law that trenches on life, liberty or security of the person must meet (Bedford, at para. 94). While the Court has recognized a number of principles of fundamental justice, three have emerged as central in the recent s. 7 jurisprudence: laws that impinge on life, liberty or security of the person must not be arbitrary, overbroad, or have consequences that are grossly disproportionate to their object.

73 Each of these potential vices involves comparison with the object of the law that is challenged (Bedford, at para. 123). The first step is therefore to identify the object of the prohibition on assisted dying.

74 The trial judge, relying on Rodriguez, concluded that the object of the prohibition was to protect vulnerable persons from being induced to commit suicide at a time of weakness (para. 1190). All the parties except Canada accept this formulation of the object.

75 Canada agrees that the prohibition is intended to protect the vulnerable, but argues that the object of the prohibition should also be defined more broadly as simply "the preservation of life" (R.F., at paras 66, 108, and 109). We cannot accept this submission.

76 First, it is incorrect to say that the majority in Rodriguez adopted "the preservation of life" as the object of the prohibition on assisted dying. Justice Sopinka refers to the preservation of life when discussing the objectives of s. 241(b) (pp. 590, 614). However, he later clarifies this comment, stating that "[s]ection 241(b) has as its purpose the protection of the vulnerable who might be induced in moments of weakness to commit suicide" (p. 595). Sopinka J. then goes on to note that this purpose is "grounded in the state interest in protecting life and reflects the policy of the state that human life should not be depreciated by allowing life to be taken" (ibid.). His remarks about the "preservation of life" in Rodriguez are best understood as a reference to an [page373] animating social value rather than as a description of the specific object of the prohibition.

77 Second, defining the object of the prohibition on physician-assisted dying as the preservation of life has the potential to short-circuit the analysis. In RJR-MacDonald, this Court warned against stating the object of a law "too broadly" in the s. 1 analysis, lest the resulting objective immunize the law from challenge under the Charter (para. 144). The same applies to assessing whether the principles of fundamental justice are breached under s. 7. If the object of the prohibition is stated broadly as "the preservation of life", it becomes difficult to say that the means used to further it are overbroad or grossly disproportionate. The outcome is to this extent foreordained.

78 Finally, the jurisprudence requires the object of the impugned law to be defined precisely for the purposes of s. 7. In Bedford, Canada argued that the bawdy-house prohibition in s. 210 of the Code should be defined broadly as to "deter prostitution" for the purposes of s. 7 (para. 131). This Court rejected this argument, holding that the object of the prohibition should be confined to measures directly targeted by the law (para. 132). That reasoning applies with equal force in this case. Section 241(b) is not directed at preserving life, or even at preventing suicide - attempted suicide is no longer a crime. Yet Canada asks us to posit that the object of the prohibition is to preserve life, whatever the circumstances. This formulation goes beyond the ambit of the provision itself. The direct target of the measure is the narrow goal of preventing vulnerable persons from being induced to commit suicide at a time of weakness.

79 Before turning to the principles of fundamental justice at play, a general comment is in order. [page374] In determining whether the deprivation of life, liberty and security of the person is in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice under s. 7, courts are not concerned with competing social interests or public benefits conferred by the impugned law. These competing moral claims and broad societal benefits are more appropriately considered at the stage of justification under s. 1 of the Charter (Bedford, at paras. 123 and 125).

80 In Bedford, the Court noted that requiring s. 7 claimants "to establish the efficacy of the law versus its deleterious consequences on members of society as a whole, would impose the government's s. 1 burden on claimants under s. 7" (para. 127; see also Charkaoui v. Canada (Citizenship and Immigration), 2007 SCC 9, [2007] 1 S.C.R. 350, at paras. 21-22). A claimant under s. 7 must show that the state has deprived them of their life, liberty or security of the person and that the deprivation is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. They should not be tasked with also showing that these principles are "not overridden by a valid state or communal interest in these circumstances": T. J. Singleton, "The Principles of Fundamental Justice, Societal Interests and Section 1 of the Charter" (1995), 74 Can. Bar Rev. 446, at p. 449. As this Court stated in R. v. Swain, [1991] 1 S.C.R. 933, at p. 977:

It is not appropriate for the state to thwart the exercise of the accused's right by attempting to bring societal interests into the principles of fundamental justice and to thereby limit an accused's s. 7 rights. Societal interests are to be dealt with under s. 1 of the Charter

81 In Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486 (the "Motor Vehicle Reference"), Lamer J. (as he then was) explained that the principles of fundamental justice are derived from the essential elements of our system of justice, which is itself founded on a belief in the dignity and worth of every human person. To deprive a person of constitutional [page375] rights arbitrarily or in a way that is overbroad or grossly disproportionate diminishes that worth and dignity. If a law operates in this way, it asks the right claimant to "serve as a scapegoat" (Rodriguez, at p. 621, per McLachlin J.). It imposes a deprivation via a process that is "fundamentally unfair" to the rights claimant (Charkaoui, at para. 22).

82 This is not to say that such a deprivation cannot be justified under s. 1 of the Charter. In some cases the government, for practical reasons, may only be able to meet an important objective by means of a law that has some fundamental flaw. But this does not concern us when considering whether s. 7 of the Charter has been breached.

(1) Arbitrariness

83 The principle of fundamental justice that forbids arbitrariness targets the situation where there is no rational connection between the object of the law and the limit it imposes on life, liberty or security of the person: Bedford, at para. 111. An arbitrary law is one that is not capable of fulfilling its objectives. It exacts a constitutional price in terms of rights, without furthering the public good that is said to be the object of the law.

84 The object of the prohibition on physician-assisted dying is to protect the vulnerable from ending their life in times of weakness. A total ban on assisted suicide clearly helps achieve this object. Therefore, individuals' rights are not limited arbitrarily.

(2) Overbreadth

85 The overbreadth inquiry asks whether a law that takes away rights in a way that generally supports the object of the law, goes too far by denying the rights of some individuals in a way that bears no relation to the object: Bedford, at paras. 101 [page376] and 112-13. Like the other principles of fundamental justice under s. 7, overbreadth is not concerned with competing social interests or ancillary benefits to the general population. A law that is drawn broadly to target conduct that bears no relation to its purpose "in order to make enforcement more practical" may therefore be overbroad (see Bedford, at para. 113). The question is not whether Parliament has chosen the least restrictive means, but whether the chosen means infringe life, liberty or security of the person in a way that has no connection with the mischief contemplated by the legislature. The focus is not on broad social impacts, but on the impact of the measure on the individuals whose life, liberty or security of the person is trammelled.

86 Applying this approach, we conclude that the prohibition on assisted dying is overbroad. The object of the law, as discussed, is to protect vulnerable persons from being induced to commit suicide at a moment of weakness. Canada conceded at trial that the law catches people outside this class: "It is recognised that not every person who wishes to commit suicide is vulnerable, and that there may be people with disabilities who have a considered, rational and persistent wish to end their own lives" (trial reasons, at para. 1136). The trial judge accepted that Ms. Taylor was such a person - competent, fully informed, and free from coercion or duress (para. 16). It follows that the limitation on their rights is in at least some cases not connected to the objective of protecting vulnerable persons. The blanket prohibition sweeps conduct into its ambit that is unrelated to the law's objective.

87 Canada argues that it is difficult to conclusively identify the "vulnerable", and that therefore it cannot be said that the prohibition is overbroad. Indeed, Canada asserts, "every person is potentially vulnerable" from a legislative perspective (R.F., at para. 115 (emphasis in original)).

88 We do not agree. The situation is analogous to that in Bedford, where this Court concluded that the prohibition on living on the avails of prostitution in s. 212(1)(j) of the Criminal Code was overbroad. The law in that case punished everyone who earned a living through a relationship with a prostitute, without distinguishing between those who would assist and protect them and those who would be at least potentially exploitive of them. Canada there as here argued that the line between exploitative and non-exploitative relationships was blurry, and that, as a result, the provision had to be drawn broadly to capture its targets. The Court concluded that that argument is more appropriately addressed under s. 1 (paras. 143-44).

(3) Gross Disproportionality

89 This principle is infringed if the impact of the restriction on the individual's life, liberty or security of the person is grossly disproportionate to the object of the measure. As with overbreadth, the focus is not on the impact of the measure on society or the public, which are matters for s. 1, but on its impact on the rights of the claimant. The inquiry into gross disproportionality compares the law's purpose, "taken at face value", with its negative effects on the rights of the claimant, and asks if this impact is completely out of sync with the object of the law (Bedford, at para. 125). The standard is high: the law's object and its impact may be incommensurate without reaching the standard for gross disproportionality (Bedford, at para. 120; Suresh v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2002 SCC 1, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 3, at para. 47).

90 The trial judge concluded that the prohibition's negative impact on life, liberty and security of the person was "very severe" and therefore grossly disproportionate to its objective (para. 1378). We agree that the impact of the prohibition is severe: it imposes unnecessary suffering on affected individuals, deprives them of the ability to determine what to do with their bodies and how those bodies [page378] will be treated, and may cause those affected to take their own lives sooner than they would were they able to obtain a physician's assistance in dying. Against this it is argued that the object of the prohibition - to protect vulnerable persons from being induced to commit suicide at a time of weakness - is also of high importance. We find it unnecessary to decide whether the prohibition also violates the principle against gross disproportionality, in light of our conclusion that it is overbroad.

(4) Parity

91 The appellants ask the Court to recognize a new principle of fundamental justice, the principle of parity, which would require that offenders committing acts of comparable blameworthiness receive sanctions of like severity. They say the prohibition violates this principle because it punishes the provision of physician assistance in dying with the highest possible criminal sanction (for culpable homicide), while exempting other comparable end-of-life practices from any criminal sanction.

92 Parity in the sense invoked by the appellants has not been recognized as a principle of fundamental justice in this Court's jurisprudence to date. Given our conclusion that the deprivation of Ms. Taylor's s. 7 rights is not in accordance with the principle against overbreadth, it is unnecessary to consider this argument and we decline to do so.

IX. Does the Prohibition on Assisted Suicide Violate Section 15 of the Charter?

93 Having concluded that the prohibition violates s. 7, it is unnecessary to consider this question.

X. Section 1

94 In order to justify the infringement of the appellants' s. 7 rights under s. 1 of the Charter, [page379] Canada must show that the law has a pressing and substantial object and that the means chosen are proportional to that object. A law is proportionate if (1) the means adopted are rationally connected to that objective; (2) it is minimally impairing of the right in question; and (3) there is proportionality between the deleterious and salutary effects of the law: R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103.

95 It is difficult to justify a s. 7 violation: see Motor Vehicle Reference, at p. 518; G. (J.), at para. 99. The rights protected by s. 7 are fundamental, and "not easily overridden by competing social interests" (Charkaoui, at para. 66). And it is hard to justify a law that runs afoul of the principles of fundamental justice and is thus inherently flawed (Bedford, at para. 96). However, in some situations the state may be able to show that the public good - a matter not considered under s. 7, which looks only at the impact on the rights claimants - justifies depriving an individual of life, liberty or security of the person under s. 1 of the Charter. More particularly, in cases such as this where the competing societal interests are themselves protected under the Charter, a restriction on s. 7 rights may in the end be found to be proportionate to its objective.

96 Here, the limit is prescribed by law, and the appellants concede that the law has a pressing and substantial objective. The question is whether the government has demonstrated that the prohibition is proportionate.

97 At this stage of the analysis, the courts must accord the legislature a measure of deference. Proportionality does not require perfection: Saskatchewan (Human Rights Commission) v. Whatcott, 2013 SCC 11, [2013] 1 S.C.R. 467, at para. 78. Section 1 only requires that the limits be "reasonable". This Court has emphasized that there may be a number of possible solutions to a particular social problem, and suggested that a "complex regulatory [page380] response" to a social ill will garner a high degree of deference (Hutterian Brethren, at para. 37).

98 On the one hand, as the trial judge noted, physician-assisted death involves complex issues of social policy and a number of competing societal values. Parliament faces a difficult task in addressing this issue; it must weigh and balance the perspective of those who might be at risk in a permissive regime against that of those who seek assistance in dying. It follows that a high degree of deference is owed to Parliament's decision to impose an absolute prohibition on assisted death. On the other hand, the trial judge also found - and we agree - that the absolute prohibition could not be described as a "complex regulatory response" (para. 1180). The degree of deference owed to Parliament, while high, is accordingly reduced.

(1) Rational Connection

99 The government must show that the absolute prohibition on physician-assisted dying is rationally connected to the goal of protecting the vulnerable from being induced to take their own lives in times of weakness. The question is whether the means the law adopts are a rational way for the legislature to pursue its objective. If not, rights are limited for no good reason. To establish a rational connection, the government need only show that there is a causal connection between the infringement and the benefit sought "on the basis of reason or logic": RJR-MacDonald, at para. 153.

100 We agree with Finch C.J.B.C. in the Court of Appeal that, where an activity poses certain risks, prohibition of the activity in question is a rational method of curtailing the risks (para. 175). We therefore conclude that there is a rational connection between the prohibition and its objective.

101 The appellants argue that the absolute nature of the prohibition is not logically connected to the object of the provision. This is another way [page381] of saying that the prohibition goes too far. In our view, this argument is better dealt with in the inquiry into minimal impairment. It is clearly rational to conclude that a law that bars all persons from accessing assistance in suicide will protect the vulnerable from being induced to commit suicide at a time of weakness. The means here are logically connected with the objective.

(2) Minimal Impairment

102 At this stage of the analysis, the question is whether the limit on the right is reasonably tailored to the objective. The inquiry into minimal impairment asks "whether there are less harmful means of achieving the legislative goal" (Hutterian Brethren, at para. 53). The burden is on the government to show the absence of less drastic means of achieving the objective "in a real and substantial manner" (ibid., at para. 55). The analysis at this stage is meant to ensure that the deprivation of Charter rights is confined to what is reasonably necessary to achieve the state's object.

103 The question in this case comes down to whether the absolute prohibition on physician-assisted dying, with its heavy impact on the claimants' s. 7 rights to life, liberty and security of the person, is the least drastic means of achieving the legislative objective. It was the task of the trial judge to determine whether a regime less restrictive of life, liberty and security of the person could address the risks associated with physician-assisted dying, or whether Canada was right to say that the risks could not adequately be addressed through the use of safeguards.

104 This question lies at the heart of this case and was the focus of much of the evidence at trial. In assessing minimal impairment, the trial judge heard evidence from scientists, medical practitioners, and others who were familiar with end-of-life decision-making in Canada and abroad. She also heard extensive evidence from each of the jurisdictions where physician-assisted dying is legal or regulated. In the trial judge's view, an absolute prohibition would [page382] have been necessary if the evidence showed that physicians were unable to reliably assess competence, voluntariness, and non-ambivalence in patients; that physicians fail to understand or apply the informed consent requirement for medical treatment; or if the evidence from permissive jurisdictions showed abuse of patients, carelessness, callousness, or a slippery slope, leading to the casual termination of life (paras. 1365-66).

105 The trial judge, however, expressly rejected these possibilities. After reviewing the evidence, she concluded that a permissive regime with properly designed and administered safeguards was capable of protecting vulnerable people from abuse and error. While there are risks, to be sure, a carefully designed and managed system is capable of adequately addressing them:

My review of the evidence in this section, and in the preceding section on the experience in permissive jurisdictions, leads me to conclude that the risks inherent in permitting physician-assisted death can be identified and very substantially minimized through a carefully-designed system imposing stringent limits that are scrupulously monitored and enforced. [para. 883]

106 The trial judge found that it was feasible for properly qualified and experienced physicians to reliably assess patient competence and voluntariness, and that coercion, undue influence, and ambivalence could all be reliably assessed as part of that process (paras. 795-98, 815, 837, and 843). In reaching this conclusion, she particularly relied on the evidence on the application of the informed consent standard in other medical decision-making in Canada, including end-of-life decision-making (para. 1368). She concluded that it would be possible for physicians to apply the informed consent standard to patients who seek assistance in dying, adding the caution that physicians should ensure that patients are properly informed of their diagnosis and prognosis and the range of available options [page383] for medical care, including palliative care interventions aimed at reducing pain and avoiding the loss of personal dignity (para. 831).

107 As to the risk to vulnerable populations (such as the elderly and disabled), the trial judge found that there was no evidence from permissive jurisdictions that people with disabilities are at heightened risk of accessing physician-assisted dying (paras. 852 and 1242). She thus rejected the contention that unconscious bias by physicians would undermine the assessment process (para. 1129). The trial judge found there was no evidence of inordinate impact on socially vulnerable populations in the permissive jurisdictions, and that in some cases palliative care actually improved post-legalization (para. 731). She also found that while the evidence suggested that the law had both negative and positive impacts on physicians, it did support the conclusion that physicians were better able to provide overall end-of-life treatment once assisted death was legalized (para. 1271). Finally, she found no compelling evidence that a permissive regime in Canada would result in a "practical slippery slope" (para. 1241).

(a) Canada's Challenge to the Facts

108 Canada says that the trial judge made a palpable and overriding error in concluding that safeguards would minimize the risk associated with assisted dying. Canada argues that the trial judge's conclusion that the level of risk was acceptable flies in the face of her acknowledgment that some of the evidence on safeguards was weak, and that there was evidence of a lack of compliance with safeguards in permissive jurisdictions. Canada also says the trial judge erred by relying on cultural differences between Canada and other countries in finding that problems experienced elsewhere were not likely to occur in Canada.

109 We cannot accede to Canada's submission. In Bedford, this Court affirmed that a trial judge's findings on social and legislative facts are entitled to the same degree of deference as any other factual findings (para. 48). In our view, Canada has not established that the trial judge's conclusion on this point is unsupported, arbitrary, insufficiently precise or otherwise in error. At most, Canada's criticisms amount to "pointing out conflicting evidence", which is not sufficient to establish a palpable and overriding error (Tsilhqot'in Nation, at para. 60). We see no reason to reject the conclusions drawn by the trial judge. They were reasonable and open to her on the record.

(b) The Fresh Evidence

110 Rothstein J. granted Canada leave to file fresh evidence on developments in Belgium since the time of the trial. This evidence took the form of an affidavit from Professor Etienne Montero, a professor in bioethics and an expert on the practice of euthanasia in Belgium. Canada says that Professor Montero's evidence demonstrates that issues with compliance and with the expansion of the criteria granting access to assisted suicide inevitably arise, even in a system of ostensibly strict limits and safeguards. It argues that this "should give pause to those who feel very strict safeguards will provide adequate protection: paper safeguards are only as strong as the human hands that carry them out" (R.F., at para. 97).

111 Professor Montero's affidavit reviews a number of recent, controversial, and high-profile cases of assistance in dying in Belgium which would not fall within the parameters suggested in these reasons, such as euthanasia for minors or persons with psychiatric disorders or minor medical conditions. Professor Montero suggests that these cases demonstrate that a slippery slope is at work in Belgium. In his view, "[o]nce euthanasia is allowed, [page385] it becomes very difficult to maintain a strict interpretation of the statutory conditions."

112 We are not convinced that Professor Montero's evidence undermines the trial judge's findings of fact. First, the trial judge (rightly, in our view) noted that the permissive regime in Belgium is the product of a very different medico-legal culture. Practices of assisted death were "already prevalent and embedded in the medical culture" prior to legalization (para. 660). The regime simply regulates a common pre-existing practice. In the absence of a comparable history in Canada, the trial judge concluded that it was problematic to draw inferences about the level of physician compliance with legislated safeguards based on the Belgian evidence (para. 680). This distinction is relevant both in assessing the degree of physician compliance and in considering evidence with regards to the potential for a slippery slope.

113 Second, the cases described by Professor Montero were the result of an oversight body exercising discretion in the interpretation of the safeguards and restrictions in the Belgian legislative regime - a discretion the Belgian Parliament has not moved to restrict. These cases offer little insight into how a Canadian regime might operate.

(c) The Feasibility of Safeguards and the Possibility of a "Slippery Slope"

114 At trial Canada went into some detail about the risks associated with the legalization of physician-assisted dying. In its view, there are many possible sources of error and many factors that can render a patient "decisionally vulnerable" and thereby give rise to the risk that persons without a rational and considered desire for death will in fact end up dead. It points to cognitive impairment, depression or other mental illness, coercion, undue influence, psychological or emotional manipulation, systemic prejudice (against the elderly or people with disabilities), and the possibility of ambivalence [page386] or misdiagnosis as factors that may escape detection or give rise to errors in capacity assessment. Essentially, Canada argues that, given the breadth of this list, there is no reliable way to identify those who are vulnerable and those who are not. As a result, it says, a blanket prohibition is necessary.

115 The evidence accepted by the trial judge does not support Canada's argument. Based on the evidence regarding assessment processes in comparable end-of-life medical decision-making in Canada, the trial judge concluded that vulnerability can be assessed on an individual basis, using the procedures that physicians apply in their assessment of informed consent and decisional capacity in the context of medical decision-making more generally. Concerns about decisional capacity and vulnerability arise in all end-of-life medical decision-making. Logically speaking, there is no reason to think that the injured, ill, and disabled who have the option to refuse or to request withdrawal of lifesaving or life-sustaining treatment, or who seek palliative sedation, are less vulnerable or less susceptible to biased decision-making than those who might seek more active assistance in dying. The risks that Canada describes are already part and parcel of our medical system.

116 As the trial judge noted, the individual assessment of vulnerability (whatever its source) is implicitly condoned for life-and-death decision-making in Canada. In some cases, these decisions are governed by advance directives, or made by a substitute decision-maker. Canada does not argue that the risk in those circumstances requires an absolute prohibition (indeed, there is currently no federal regulation of such practices). In A.C., Abella J. adverted to the potential vulnerability of adolescents who are faced with life-and-death decisions about medical treatment (paras. 72-78). Yet, this Court [page387] implicitly accepted the viability of an individual assessment of decisional capacity in the context of that case. We accept the trial judge's conclusion that it is possible for physicians, with due care and attention to the seriousness of the decision involved, to adequately assess decisional capacity.

117 The trial judge, on the basis of her consideration of various regimes and how they operate, found that it is possible to establish a regime that addresses the risks associated with physician-assisted death. We agree with the trial judge that the risks associated with physician-assisted death can be limited through a carefully designed and monitored system of safeguards.

118 Canada also argues that the permissive regulatory regime accepted by the trial judge "accepts too much risk", and that its effectiveness is "speculative" (R.F., at para. 154). In effect, Canada argues that a blanket prohibition should be upheld unless the appellants can demonstrate that an alternative approach eliminates all risk. This effectively reverses the onus under s. 1, requiring the claimant whose rights are infringed to prove less invasive ways of achieving the prohibition's object. The burden of establishing minimal impairment is on the government.

119 The trial judge found that Canada had not discharged this burden. The evidence, she concluded, did not support the contention that a blanket prohibition was necessary in order to substantially meet the government's objectives. We agree. A theoretical or speculative fear cannot justify an absolute prohibition. As Deschamps J. stated in Chaoulli, at para. 68, the claimant "d[oes] not have the burden of disproving every fear or every threat", nor can the government meet its burden simply by asserting an adverse impact on the public. Justification under s. 1 is a process of demonstration, not intuition or [page388] automatic deference to the government's assertion of risk (RJR-MacDonald, at para. 128).

120 Finally, it is argued that without an absolute prohibition on assisted dying, Canada will descend the slippery slope into euthanasia and condoned murder. Anecdotal examples of controversial cases abroad were cited in support of this argument, only to be countered by anecdotal examples of systems that work well. The resolution of the issue before us falls to be resolved not by competing anecdotes, but by the evidence. The trial judge, after an exhaustive review of the evidence, rejected the argument that adoption of a regulatory regime would initiate a descent down a slippery slope into homicide. We should not lightly assume that the regulatory regime will function defectively, nor should we assume that other criminal sanctions against the taking of lives will prove impotent against abuse.

121 We find no error in the trial judge's analysis of minimal impairment. We therefore conclude that the absolute prohibition is not minimally impairing.

(3) Deleterious Effects and Salutory Benefits

122 This stage of the Oakes analysis weighs the impact of the law on protected rights against the beneficial effect of the law in terms of the greater public good. Given our conclusion that the law is not minimally impairing, it is not necessary to go on to this step.

123 We conclude that s. 241(b) and s. 14 of the Criminal Code are not saved by s. 1 of the Charter.

[page389]

XI. Remedy

A. The Court of Appeal's Proposed Constitutional Exemption

124 The majority at the Court of Appeal suggested that this Court consider issuing a free-standing constitutional exemption, rather than a declaration of invalidity, should it choose to reconsider Rodriguez. The majority noted that the law does not currently provide an avenue for relief from a "generally sound law" that has an extraordinary effect on a small number of individuals (para. 326). It also expressed concern that it might not be possible for Parliament to create a fully rounded, well-balanced alternative policy within the time frame of any suspension of a declaration of invalidity (para. 334).

125 In our view, this is not a proper case for a constitutional exemption. We have found that the prohibition infringes the claimants' s. 7 rights. Parliament must be given the opportunity to craft an appropriate remedy. The concerns raised in Ferguson about stand-alone constitutional exemptions are equally applicable here: issuing such an exemption would create uncertainty, undermine the rule of law, and usurp Parliament's role. Complex regulatory regimes are better created by Parliament than by the courts.

B. Declaration of Invalidity

126 We have concluded that the laws prohibiting a physician's assistance in terminating life (Criminal Code, s. 241(b) and s. 14) infringe Ms. Taylor's s. 7 rights to life, liberty and security of the person in a manner that is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice, and that the infringement is not justified under s. 1 of the Charter. To the extent that the impugned laws deny the s. 7 rights of people like Ms. Taylor they are void by operation of s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982. It is for Parliament and the provincial legislatures to [page390] respond, should they so choose, by enacting legislation consistent with the constitutional parameters set out in these reasons.

127 The appropriate remedy is therefore a declaration that s. 241(b) and s. 14 of the Criminal Code are void insofar as they prohibit physician-assisted death for a competent adult person who (1) clearly consents to the termination of life; and (2) has a grievous and irremediable medical condition (including an illness, disease or disability) that causes enduring suffering that is intolerable to the individual in the circumstances of his or her condition. "Irremediable", it should be added, does not require the patient to undertake treatments that are not acceptable to the individual. The scope of this declaration is intended to respond to the factual circumstances in this case. We make no pronouncement on other situations where physician-assisted dying may be sought.

128 We would suspend the declaration of invalidity for 12 months.

129 We would not accede to the appellants' request to create a mechanism for exemptions during the period of suspended validity. In view of the fact that Ms. Taylor has now passed away and that none of the remaining litigants seeks a personal exemption, this is not a proper case for creating such an exemption mechanism.

130 A number of the interveners asked the Court to account for physicians' freedom of conscience and religion when crafting the remedy in this case. The Catholic Civil Rights League, the Faith and Freedom Alliance, the Protection of Conscience Project, and the Catholic Health Alliance of Canada all expressed concern that physicians who object to medical assistance in dying on moral grounds may be obligated, based on a duty to act in their patients' best interests, to participate in physician-assisted dying. They ask us [page391] to confirm that physicians and other health-care workers cannot be compelled to provide medical aid in dying. They would have the Court direct the legislature to provide robust protection for those who decline to support or participate in physician-assisted dying for reasons of conscience or religion.

131 The Canadian Medical Association reports that its membership is divided on the issue of assisted suicide. The Association's current policy states that it supports the right of all physicians, within the bounds of the law, to follow their conscience in deciding whether or not to provide aid in dying. It seeks to see that policy reflected in any legislative scheme that may be put forward. While acknowledging that the Court cannot itself set out a comprehensive regime, the Association asks us to indicate that any legislative scheme must legally protect both those physicians who choose to provide this new intervention to their patients, along with those who do not.

132 In our view, nothing in the declaration of invalidity which we propose to issue would compel physicians to provide assistance in dying. The declaration simply renders the criminal prohibition invalid. What follows is in the hands of the physicians' colleges, Parliament, and the provincial legislatures. However, we note - as did Beetz J. in addressing the topic of physician participation in abortion in Morgentaler - that a physician's decision to participate in assisted dying is a matter of conscience and, in some cases, of religious belief (pp. 95-96). In making this observation, we do not wish to pre-empt the legislative and regulatory response to this judgment. Rather, we underline that the Charter rights of patients and physicians will need to be reconciled.

XII. Costs

133 The appellants ask for special costs on a full indemnity basis to cover the entire expense of bringing this case before the courts.

134 The trial judge awarded the appellants special costs exceeding $1,000,000, on the ground that this was justified by the public interest in resolving the legal issues raised by the case. (Costs awarded on the usual party-and-party basis would not have exceeded about $150,000.) In doing so, the trial judge relied on Victoria (City) v. Adams, 2009 BCCA 563, 100 B.C.L.R. (4th) 28, at para. 188, which set out four factors for determining whether to award special costs to a successful public interest litigant: (1) the case concerns matters of public importance that transcend the immediate interests of the parties, and which have not been previously resolved; (2) the plaintiffs have no personal, proprietary or pecuniary interest in the litigation that would justify the proceeding on economic grounds; (3) the unsuccessful parties have a superior capacity to bear the cost of the proceedings; and (4) the plaintiffs did not conduct the litigation in an abusive, vexatious or frivolous manner. The trial judge found that all four criteria were met in this case.

135 The Court of Appeal saw no error in the trial judge's reasoning on special costs, given her judgment on the merits. However, as the majority overturned the trial judge's decision on the merits, it varied her costs order accordingly. The majority ordered each party to bear its own costs.

136 The appellants argue that special costs, while exceptional, are appropriate in a case such as this, where the litigation raises a constitutional issue of high public interest, is beyond the plaintiffs' means, and was not conducted in an abusive or vexatious manner. Without such awards, they argue, plaintiffs will not be able to bring vital issues of importance to all Canadians before the courts, to the detriment of justice and other affected Canadians.

137 Against this, we must weigh the caution that "[c]ourts should not seek on their own to bring an alternative and extensive legal aid system into being": Little Sisters Book and Art Emporium v. Canada (Commissioner of Customs and Revenue), 2007 SCC 2, [2007] 1 S.C.R. 38, at para. 44. With this concern in mind, we are of the view that Adams sets the threshold for an award of special costs too low. This Court has previously emphasized that special costs are only available in "exceptional" circumstances: Finney v. Barreau du Québec, 2004 SCC 36, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 17, at para. 48. The test set out in Adams would permit an award of special costs in cases that do not fit that description. Almost all constitutional litigation concerns "matters of public importance". Further, the criterion that asks whether the unsuccessful party has a superior capacity to bear the cost of the proceedings will always favour an award against the government. Without more, special costs awards may become routine in public interest litigation.

138 Some reference to this Court's jurisprudence on advance costs may be helpful in refining the criteria for special costs on a full indemnity basis. This Court set the test for an award of advance costs in British Columbia (Minister of Forests) v. Okanagan Indian Band, 2003 SCC 71, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 371. LeBel J. identified three criteria necessary to justify that departure from the usual rule of costs:

1. The party seeking interim costs genuinely cannot afford to pay for the litigation, and no other realistic option exists for bringing the issues to trial - in short, the litigation would be unable to proceed if the order were not made.
2. The claim to be adjudicated is prima facie meritorious; that is, the claim is at least of sufficient [page394] merit that it is contrary to the interests of justice for the opportunity to pursue the case to be forfeited just because the litigant lacks financial means.
3. The issues raised transcend the individual interests of the particular litigant, are of public importance, and have not been resolved in previous cases. [para. 40]

139 The Court elaborated on this test in Little Sisters, emphasizing that issues of public importance will not in themselves "automatically entitle a litigant to preferential treatment with respect to costs" (para. 35). The standard is a high one: only "rare and exceptional" cases will warrant such treatment (para. 38).

140 In our view, with appropriate modifications, this test serves as a useful guide to the exercise of a judge's discretion on a motion for special costs in a case involving public interest litigants. First, the case must involve matters of public interest that are truly exceptional. It is not enough that the issues raised have not previously been resolved or that they transcend the individual interests of the successful litigant: they must also have a significant and widespread societal impact. Second, in addition to showing that they have no personal, proprietary or pecuniary interest in the litigation that would justify the proceedings on economic grounds, the plaintiffs must show that it would not have been possible to effectively pursue the litigation in question with private funding. In those rare cases, it will be contrary to the interests of justice to ask the individual litigants (or, more likely, pro bono counsel) to bear the majority of the financial burden associated with pursuing the claim.

141 Where these criteria are met, a court will have the discretion to depart from the usual rule on costs and award special costs.

142 Finally, we note that an award of special costs does not give the successful litigant the right [page395] to burden the defendant with any and all expenses accrued during the course of the litigation. As costs awards are meant to "encourage the reasonable and efficient conduct of litigation" (Okanagan Indian Band, at para. 41), only those costs that are shown to be reasonable and prudent will be covered by the award.

143 Having regard to these criteria, we are not persuaded the trial judge erred in awarding special costs to the appellants in the truly exceptional circumstances of this case. We would order the same with respect to the proceedings in this Court and in the Court of Appeal.

144 The final question is whether the trial judge erred in awarding 10 percent of the costs against the Attorney General of British Columbia. The trial judge acknowledged that it is unusual for courts to award costs against an Attorney General who intervenes in constitutional litigation as of right. However, as the jurisprudence reveals, there is no firm rule against it: see, e.g., B. (R.) v. Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, [1995] 1 S.C.R. 315; Hegeman v. Carter, 2008 NWTSC 48, 74 C.P.C. (6th) 112; and Polglase v. Polglase (1979), 18 B.C.L.R. 294 (S.C.).

145 In her reasons on costs, the trial judge explained that counsel for British Columbia led evidence, cross-examined the appellants' witnesses, and made written and oral submissions on most of the issues during the course of the trial. She also noted that British Columbia took an active role in pre-trial proceedings. She held that an Attorney General's responsibility for costs when involved in constitutional litigation as of right varies with the role the Attorney General assumes in the litigation. Where the Attorney General assumes the role of a party, the court may find the Attorney General liable for costs in the same manner as a party (para. 96). She concluded that the Attorney General of British Columbia had taken a full and active role in the proceedings and should therefore be liable for costs [page396] in proportion to the time British Columbia took during the proceedings.

146 We stress, as did the trial judge, that it will be unusual for a court to award costs against Attorneys General appearing before the court as of right. However, we see no reason to interfere with the trial judge's decision to do so in this case or with her apportionment of responsibility between the Attorney General of British Columbia and the Attorney General of Canada. The trial judge was best positioned to determine the role taken by British Columbia and the extent to which it shared carriage of the case.

XIII. Conclusion

147 The appeal is allowed. We would issue the following declaration, which is suspended for 12 months:

Section 241(b) and s. 14 of the Criminal Code unjustifiably infringe s. 7 of the Charter and are of no force or effect to the extent that they prohibit physician-assisted death for a competent adult person who (1) clearly consents to the termination of life and (2) has a grievous and irremediable medical condition (including an illness, disease or disability) that causes enduring suffering that is intolerable to the individual in the circumstances of his or her condition.

148 Special costs on a full indemnity basis are awarded against Canada throughout. The Attorney General of British Columbia will bear responsibility for 10 percent of the costs at trial on a full indemnity basis and will pay the costs associated with its presence at the appellate levels on a party-and-party basis.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Case Summary

Practice — Pleadings — Striking out pleadings — Grounds — Failure to disclose a cause of action or defence — Scandalous, frivolous or vexatious — Damages — Deductions -- insurance proceeds.

Motion to strike certain paragraphs contained in the defendants' statement of defence and counter-claim. The action was against the partners of an accounting firm for damages arising from, inter alia, breach of contract and negligence. Of the four impugned paragraphs, the first two disputed the insurance benefits and tax recoveries that the plaintiff had obtained as a result of the alleged malfeasance of the defendant while the fourth one, as the foundation for a claim of punitive damages, alleged that the plaintiffs and their counsel had breached an implied undertaking not to use information obtained in the course of the action for an ulterior purpose. The plaintiffs contended that the first two paragraphs failed to disclose a reasonable defence while the other two were scandalous, frivolous and vexatious.

HELD: Motion allowed in part.

Only the paragraph pleading a reduction of the plaintiff's loss due to insurance proceeds received was struck as disclosing no reasonable defence. Payments received by the plaintiff under an insurance policy taken out and maintained by it could not be the basis for a reduction of the liability of a defendant and it was immaterial whether or not the insurer exercised its right of subrogation. However, the same did not apply for tax recoveries. The court was not satisfied that the use of the materials received by the plaintiffs from the defendants prior to the commencement of the proceedings would not be accepted by the trial judge as a factual underpinning for the defendants' claim to punitive damages.

1 In this motion the plaintiff seeks to strike certain paragraphs contained in the defendants' statement of defence and counterclaim. The paragraphs under attack can generally be described as follows:

I. No Reasonable Defence

- (a) a paragraph pleading that insurance benefits received by the plaintiff should be taken into consideration in determining the defendants' obligation to the plaintiff, if any (para. 68);
- (b) a paragraph pleading that the plaintiff's tax treatment of the loss should be taken into consideration in determining the defendants' obligation, if any, to the plaintiff (para. 67);

II. Scandalous, Frivolous and Vexatious

- (c) paragraphs referring to the involvement of plaintiff's counsel in the circumstances giving rise to the action (paras. 76-82); and
- (d) paragraphs alleging that the plaintiff and its counsel have breached an implied undertaking not to use information obtained in the course of the action for an ulterior purpose (paras. 83-88 and 90).

2 The issue is: do the impugned paragraphs constitute proper pleading? Do they raise legitimate issues to be considered at trial or are they otherwise frivolous and vexatious?

3 The action is against the partners of an accounting firm for damages arising from breach of contract, negligence, negligent misrepresentation, and exemplary and punitive damages. The plaintiff is a corporation that formerly engaged the services of the defendants for its accounting and auditing needs. From 1989 into 1992, the plaintiff's controller defrauded the plaintiff of over $600,000. Simply put, the plaintiff takes the position in this action that had it not been for the defendants' failure to audit, monitor and supervise the plaintiff's financial situation, the losses from the controller's theft would and should have been discovered and prevented.

4 I start with the proposition, advanced by the defendants, that although the Court has inherent jurisdiction to strike out a pleading as disclosing no legally tenable position, such power should be exercised sparingly and only when there is no doubt that no cause of action or defence exists. In order to foreclose the consideration of an issue past the pleadings stage, the moving party must show that there is an existing bar in the form of a decided case directly on point from the same jurisdiction demonstrating that the very issue has been squarely dealt with and rejected by our Courts. Only by restricting successful attacks of this nature to the narrowest of cases can the common law have a full opportunity to be refined or extended (see: Krause v. Chrysler Canada Limited, [1970] 3 O.R. 135 (H.C.J.)).

5 It is also fairly common ground that no pleaded fact that is relevant can be scandalous. I refer to the often quoted decision of Duryea v. Kaufman (1910), 21 O.L.R. 161, where Justice Riddell stated at p. 168:

... No pleading can be said to be embarrassing if it alleges only facts which may be proved the opposite party may be perplexed, astonished, startled, confused, troubled, annoyed, taken aback, and worried by such a pleading but in a legal sense he cannot be 'embarrassed.' But no pleading should set out a fact which would not be allowed to be proved that is embarrassing: Stratford Gas Co. v. Gordon (1892), 14 P.R. 407; Heugh v. Chamberlain (1877), 25 W.R. 742; Knowles v. Roberts (1888), 38 Ch. D. 263. Even if a pleading set out a fact that is not necessary to be proved, still, if it can be proved, the pleading will not be embarrassing. Anything which can have any effect at all in determining the rights of the parties can be proved, and consequently can be pleaded but the Court will not allow any fact to be alleged which is wholly immaterial and can have no effect upon the result: Rock v. Pursell (1887), 84 L.T.J. 45.

6 I accept these two propositions as correct statements of the law governing challenges to pleadings on the basis of no tenable cause of action or defence or as being scandalous, frivolous or embarrassing. I proceed to examine the impugned paragraphs using these tests.

1. (a) Insurance Proceeds - No Tenable Defence

7 The paragraph of the statement of defence and counterclaim sought to be struck out is as follows:

68. The defendants further plead that there have been certain insurance monies payable to and collected by Dalex, arising out of the defalcations, which have further reduced the loss.

8 The plaintiff argues that this paragraph does not constitute a proper or relevant pleading based on the proposition that recovery in tort is dependent on the plaintiff's establishing injury and loss resulting from an act of misfeasance or nonfeasance on the part of the tortfeasor. A tortfeasor should not, and in fact cannot, benefit from the sacrifice made by a plaintiff in obtaining an insurance policy.

9 The plaintiff relies upon a recent decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in a trilogy of cases known as Cunningham v. Wheeler, [1994] 1 S.C.R. 359.

10 In the actual Cunningham v. Wheeler case, the plaintiff was injured in a car accident. While he was off work he collected disability benefits pursuant to a collective agreement. These benefits were considered part of the plaintiff's annual remuneration. Benefits received from the defendants did not have to be paid to the employer or to the disability insurer. The trial judge held that the payments received by the plaintiff as a result of his employment should not be deducted in calculating the amount payable by the defendants for the wages lost by the plaintiff due to his injuries as the plaintiff had established that he had paid for these benefits as part of his wage package.

11 The Court of Appeal reversed the judgment. It determined that since there was no subrogation right, the plan was not in the nature of private insurance and the funds received should be deducted from the damage award. The Supreme Court of Canada allowed the appeal on the basis of its finding that the benefits received were in the nature of a private insurance policy.

12 In the second case of Cooper v. Miller, the plaintiff also suffered injuries from a car accident. Under a collective agreement, she received short-term disability benefits which she funded, in part, through payroll deductions. Again, she was not obliged to repay these benefits to the employer or insurance carrier. The trial judge, Court of Appeal, and Supreme Court of Canada all held that the plaintiff's benefits should not be deducted from her recovery for lost wages from the defendant, even though there was no subrogation provision, as she had bought and partially paid for the insurance.

13 Finally, in Shanks v. McNee, another motor vehicle accident case, the plaintiff received both short-term and long-term disability benefits. There was some form of contribution by the employee to the cost of each plan. There was a subrogation clause in the long-term disability plan but not in the short-term. The benefits received by the plaintiff were not deducted from the amount the defendants were ordered to pay pursuant to the judgment at trial. The Court of Appeal reversed the trial judge only in respect of the short-term disability payments since there was no direct contribution by the employee and there was no subrogation with respect to those benefits. The Supreme Court of Canada dismissed the defendants' appeal concerning the deductibility of the long-term benefits.

14 Three principles emerge from the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in this trilogy of cases. They are as follows:

1. The general proposition is that the plaintiff in a tort action is not entitled to a double recovery for any loss arising from an injury;
2. An exception to this general principle is the "insurance exception". To qualify, the plaintiff must show that the benefits received were in the nature of an insurance, i.e., some type of consideration must have been given up by the plaintiff in return for the benefit. Generally, subrogation is not relevant to a consideration of the deductibility of the benefits if they are found to be in the nature of insurance.
3. If the benefits do not fall within the insurance exception, then they must be deducted from the damages recovered, unless the third party who paid the benefits has the right of subrogation.

15 It is the plaintiff's submission that since the pleading itself refers to the plaintiff's recovery of insurance monies, it is clear that the case falls within the insurance exception and no deduction is permitted by law. If there is any doubt, it is also clear that the insurance company covering the plaintiff from theft by an employee has a right of subrogation at common law and most probably contractual as well. Using the Cunningham v. Wheeler rationale, it would appear that there can be no deduction from any amount found to be owing by the defendants to take into account insurance monies received by the plaintiff.

16 The defendants argue that the ratio established by the Cunningham v. Wheeler trilogy pertains only to employment cases. Since there has been no decision strictly on point other than in the discrete area of employment situations, the door remains open for refinement or development of the law involving the deductibility of insurance benefits received by a plaintiff from damages owed by defendants in other types of cases. As a result, the defendants submit that their pleading in this respect should be allowed to stand to enable them to argue that the law as set out by the Supreme Court of Canada in Cunningham v. Wheeler should not apply to the type of fact situation in this case.

17 I cannot accept this position for two reasons. First, even though the Cunningham v. Wheeler trilogy involved only employment situations, the Court in no way indicated an intention to confine the law concerning the deductibility of insurance benefits to those types of cases. I refer to statements such as that of Cory J. at p. 400 where he says without qualification that the proceeds of insurance should not be deducted from a plaintiff's damages. This statement follows a lengthy list of Canadian cases in which that principle of law has been consistently applied, some of which involve situations other than wage loss claims (see: Dawson v. Sawatzky, [1946] 1 W.W.R. 33 (Sask. C.A.); Canadian Pacific Ltd. v. Gill Principle, [1973] S.C.R. 654.)

18 The decision in Cunningham v. Wheeler does not, admittedly, contain a specific statement that the non-deductibility of insurance benefits received by the plaintiff from the calculation of the tortfeasor's obligation applies to a non-wage loss situation. However, in my view, the overall wording of the decision and the underlying rationale for the propositions listed above present a bar to the pleading proposed by the defendants in accordance with the test set out in Krause v. Chrysler, supra.

19 The second reason I would apply Cunningham v. Wheeler to this fact situation, relates to the Supreme Court of Canada's comments on the importance of the doctrine of subrogation on these types of situations. In my opinion, to restrict the principle of nondeductibility of insurance proceeds to employment situations would effectively destroy the doctrine of subrogation in respect of other types of tort claims for losses that are covered by insurance.

20 Subrogation operates where the insured has a legally enforceable right against a party other than the insurer to recover the amount of loss. Where the insured has a right in tort to recover damages from a negligent tortfeasor, the insurer is said to be subrogated to such a right so that the insured party cannot retain both the insurance money and the damages recovered from the third party. The following principles are relevant:

1. The right of subrogation does not arise unless and until the insurers have admitted the insured's claim and have paid the sum payable under the policy.
2. The right of subrogation only arises on contracts of indemnity. Where the insured would be paid twice for the pecuniary loss, the insurer has the right of subrogation. All insurance contracts are presumed to be contracts of indemnity, unless otherwise specified.
3. The rights to which the insurers are subrogated must, as a general rule, be enforced in the name of the insured. The mere fact of subrogation does not entitle them to enforce such rights in their own names.
4. The insurer has the right to pursue the insured's rights in the insured's name against any defendant who caused the loss. If the insured has already exercised the right against the third party and recovered the value of the loss, the insurer may seek reimbursement from the insured.
5. The right of subrogation is independent of statute or the express terms of the policy, although it may be modified by the express terms of the statute or the contract: Castellain v. Preston (1883), 11 Q.B.D. 380 (C.A.); Baer, "Rethinking Basic Concepts of Insurance Law" (1987), L.S.U.C. Special Lectures, p. 210.

21 To permit a tortfeasor to advance insurance proceeds as a defence in the reduction of damages conflicts with the doctrine of subrogation. If the plaintiff's damages were reduced by the amount received from the insurer, the insurer could not recover from the defendant the monies it paid to the plaintiff because the insurer is restricted to suing in the name of the plaintiff and in respect of the plaintiff's rights. The insurer could not be reimbursed by the plaintiff because the plaintiff would only have been awarded damages after deducting the insurance proceeds.

22 The superficial answer may be to allow the case to go to trial to enable the trial judge to examine the evidence as to what was paid under the insurance policy and as to the extent that a right of subrogation was exercised. This would be consistent with the reasoning of McLachlin J. in her dissent in Cunningham v. Wheeler and the majority in the previous decision of the court in Ratych v. Bloomer (1990), 39 O.A.C. 103 (S.C.C.).

23 McLachlin J., in her dissent in Cunningham v. Wheeler, suggested that subrogation is exercised very rarely in the wage benefits context. This would explain her comments about subrogation, in the decisions which she expressly stated are restricted to the wage benefits context, at pp. 386-387:

The argument that it makes sense for the tortfeasor to pay damages for wage losses already indemnified by others succeeds only if the employer or insurer who pays the wage benefit recovers the damages allocated to lost wages from the employee by way of subrogation. In this case there is no double recovery. The burden is properly placed on the tortfeasor rather than the employer or insurance company. The latter result, unlike the result of double payment to the plaintiff, is defensible economically and in justice. For this reason, Ratych v. Bloomer suggested that where subrogation is exercised, no deduction for double recovery need be made. (emphasis added)

And at p. 388:

The rare exercise of the right of subrogation suggests that the best approach is a regime of deductibility of employment plan benefits, subject to the plaintiff's right to claim the benefits if it is established that they will be paid over to the subrogated third party. In that case, the plaintiff would hold the recovered monies in trust on behalf of the subrogated insurer or employer: Ratych, supra, at p. 978. (emphasis added)

24 Cory J. in Cunningham v. Wheeler takes the contrary view, at p. 415:

25 Generally, subrogation has no relevance in a consideration of the deductibility of the disability benefits, if they are found to be in the nature of insurance. ... However, if the third party who paid the benefits has a right of subrogation then there should not be any deduction. It does not matter whether the right of subrogation is exercised or not. The exercise of the right is a matter that rests solely between the plaintiff and the third party. The failure to exercise the right cannot in any way affect the defendant's liability for damages. However, different considerations might well apply in a situation where the third party has formally released its subrogation right. (emphasis added)

26 Pursuant to Cory J.'s view of subrogation in Cunningham v. Wheeler, it is irrelevant whether the insurer actually exercises its right of subrogation. If the right of subrogation is paramount whether it is exercised or not, then the defence that there has been payment under the insurance policy must be irrelevant.

27 There has been previous judicial consideration of the relevance of the insurance benefits paid to the plaintiff to the determination of the defendant's obligations. In Pickin et al. v. Hesk and Lawrence, [1954] O.R. 713 (Ont. C.A.), the court stated as follows, at pp. 724-725:

... The trial judge seems to have had the opinion that because there was no evidence of insurance this action would not lie. The question of insurance or no insurance was entirely irrelevant. The only issue in this action was whether the plaintiffs had been damaged by the defendants. If they have been paid under a contract of indemnity between them and their insurers then in this action they are only nominal plaintiffs and the action is brought in their names for the benefit of their insurers. If they have not been paid then they are suing in their own right. (emphasis added)

28 Where a pleading discloses no reasonable cause of action or defence it should be struck: Rule 21.01(1)(b) of the Rules of Civil Procedure. Whether the decision in Cunningham v. Wheeler acts as a direct bar to the pleadings at issue because of the insurance proceeds exception or as a result of its comments on the doctrine of subrogation, the Supreme Court of Canada has stated the law in a way that, in my view, renders paragraph 68 of the statement of defence and counterclaim legally untenable and it therefore should be struck from the pleading.

(b) Tax Recovery

29 The paragraph that the plaintiff seeks to have struck is as follows:

67. The Defendants further plead that Dalex is entitled to and has made certain tax recoveries as a result of the fraudulent conduct of William Young. Such recoveries have significantly reduced the loss.

30 The plaintiff's submission is that tax recovery is a matter between the state and the individual and does not affect the damages due to the plaintiff from the defendants. If the plaintiff receives an unexpected windfall, that is a matter to be dealt with through legislation. The application of the current Income Tax Act should not affect the rights and obligations between the plaintiff and the defendants.

31 Again, the plaintiff looks to the Supreme Court of Canada trilogy of decisions in Cunningham v. Wheeler, supra, for support. In one of the trilogy of cases, Shanks v. McNee, an issue arose over the fact that damages were intended to replace lost wages but that damages, unlike wages, would not be taxed. The defendants argued that their liability to the plaintiff should be reduced in order that the plaintiff not be over-compensated.

32 In dealing with this issue, Cory J. observed that Canadian courts have consistently held that damage awards in personal injury cases should be calculated without taking into account any such tax advantage, whereas in other countries tax is taken into account. The Supreme Court of Canada used the trilogy to renew its support for ignoring the impact of tax, agreeing with the conclusion of the Ontario Law Reform Commission that "should the impact of the Income Tax Act be regarded as overgenerous to plaintiffs, the legislation may be amended by Parliament." (at pp. 417-418)

33 At first blush it would appear that paragraph 67 of the statement of defence and counterclaim should be struck on the basis of similar reasoning to that applied to the paragraph involving insurance proceeds. However, on closer examination, in my opinion, the paragraph should stand.

34 Unlike the jurisprudence involving the treatment of insurance proceed which included cases other than wage loss claims, the jurisprudence involving the tax deduction claimed by the defendants in Shanks v. McNee all appear to involve the income tax treatment of damages assessed for impairment of earning capacity. In these cases, damages were awarded to restore the plaintiff to the extent possible to the position in which he or she would have been but for the defendant's wrongdoing. Such damages would therefore represent compensation for loss of earning capacity and not for loss of earnings. In the case of personal injuries (as in each of these cases making up the trilogy), the plaintiff has lost some or all of his capital equipment necessary to earn an income and is not taxable according to the generally accepted taxation principles.

35 Since the wording of the Supreme Court of Canada in the trilogy appears to restrict the irrelevance of tax to earnings in personal injury cases and since the rationale for the decision in respect of tax cannot logically be applied to the case at bar I find that the Supreme Court of Canada has not definitively closed the door to the defendants' argument. Further, the plaintiff has not been able to refer me to any other case that clearly bars a defendant from claiming a reduction in damages payable by reason of the very business losses claimed in the action. Therefore, the defendants ought to be entitled to pursue this argument. The plaintiff's claim to have paragraph 67 of the statement of defence and counterclaim struck is dismissed.

II. (a) Retainer of the Defendants by Robert Staley - Scandalous, Frivolous and Vexatious

36 The plaintiff argued that reference in the pleading to a separate retainer of the accountants by one of the plaintiff's lawyers was vexatious and an abuse. The defendants conceded that any such references were in error and agreed to amend the pleading to correct these errors.

37 Any other reference to Mr. Staley does not fall into the category of a fact essential to the defence or counterclaim and in my view is designed to lay the foundation for a motion to remove from the record, the plaintiff's solicitors. This is an improper motive, is embarrassing and an abuse. Accordingly, the defendants must amend their pleading to remove all references to Mr. Staley.

II. (b) Breach of Undertaking Justifying Punitive Damages Scandalous, Frivolous and Vexatious

38 I finally turn to the defendants' claim in their counterclaim for punitive damages. The factual underpinning pleaded in support of this claim involves an alleged breach of an implied undertaking not to use information obtained in the course of an action for any ulterior purpose. Specifically, the defendants plead that counsel for the plaintiff requested information from their records supposedly to assist in the prosecution of the civil action against the former controller but really intending to use the data in an action against these defendants.

39 The plaintiff agrees that such a request was made but states that the materials were never provided. The plaintiff further argues that the implied undertaking applies to information and documents produced by a litigant during the discovery process and does not apply to the plaintiff's receipt of documents from its own accountant. The implied undertaking is designed to protect parties to litigation and the process itself by encouraging and facilitating full production without fear of ulterior purpose or use. At the time the request was made, the plaintiff and the defendants had no lis between them and therefore had no relationship which would give rise to an implied undertaking.

40 It is on this basis that the plaintiff urges me to find that the paragraphs in which this issue is addressed be struck as being scandalous, frivolous and vexatious, meant to embarrass the plaintiff and artificially bolster the defendants' claim for punitive damages.

41 The defendants candidly admit that the facts, as pleaded, do not come within the parameters of the law of implied undertaking as it currently exists in Ontario. However, they go on to submit that they out to be permitted to advance arguments that the law of implied undertaking ought to be extended to hold that information provided to a litigant by an expert retained to assist the litigant in an action, and which information the expert was obliged to provide to the litigant by the terms of its retainer, ought not to be used for the collateral purpose of suing that expert in a separate action.

42 I return to the words of Justice Riddell in Duryea v. Kaufman, set out earlier in this decision. Can it be said, without doubt, at this stage, that any evidence concerning the source and use of these materials would not be accepted by the trial judge as a factual underpinning for the defendants' claim to punitive damages?

43 I do not believe that this aspect of the defendants' pleading should be struck at this stage thereby precluding any opportunity for them to establish the factual basis to enable them to recover under this head of damage. Rather, I am of the view that the case should proceed to trial with this part of the pleading intact so that the issues can be determined by the evidence presented at that time.

44 It may be that there is no decided case extending the implied undertaking to the circumstances of this case. On the other hand, no decision has been brought to my attention that presents itself as a complete bar to such a finding. I believe it would be inappropriate at this early stage to deprive the defendants of this possible opportunity.

45 Accordingly, the plaintiff's attempt to have the implied undertaking allegations struck from paragraphs 82 to 88 and 90 is dismissed.

46 The defendants will have ten days from the date of entry of this order to amend their pleading to remove paragraph 68 and to remove all references to Mr. Staley anywhere in the pleading.

47 Success has been divided. There will be no order as to costs. Costs incurred in the appearance before Master Garfield are fixed at $200.00 to be paid by the plaintiff in any event of the cause.

The judgment of the Court was delivered orally by

THE CHIEF JUSTICE

1 We are all of the view that this appeal succeeds. The judgment of the Court will be delivered by Justice Wilson.

WILSON J.

2 The members of the Court are all of the view that the test laid down in Attorney General of Canada v. Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, [1980] 2 S.C.R. 735, for striking out a statement of claim is not met in this case. It cannot be said that the outcome of the case is "plain and obvious" or "beyond doubt".

3 Issues as to the proper interpretation of the relevant provisions of the Manitoba Act, 1870 and the Constitution Act, 1871 and the effect of the impugned ancillary legislation upon them would appear to be better determined at trial where a proper factual base can be laid.

4 The Court is of the view also that the subject matter of the dispute, inasmuch as it involves the constitutionality of legislation ancillary to the Manitoba Act, 1870 is justiciable in the courts and that declaratory relief may be granted in the discretion of the court in aid of extra-judicial claims in an appropriate case.

5 We see no reason, therefore, why the action should not proceed to trial. The appeal is accordingly allowed and the order of the Court of Appeal [page281] striking out the appellants' claim against the Attorney General of Canada is set aside.

Fleming v. Reid by his litigation guardian, the Public Trustee; Fleming v. Gallagher (a.k.a. Gallacher) by his litigation guardian, the Public Trustee

Counsel

Carla McKague and Anne Molloy, for appellants.

Rosalyn Train, for respondent.

Elizabeth Goldberg, for Attorney General of Ontario, intervener.

The judgment of the court was delivered by

ROBINS J.A.

1 The central issue in these two appeals is whether the state may administer neuroleptic drugs in non-emergency situations to involuntary incompetent psychiatric patients who have, while mentally competent, expressed the wish not to be treated with such drugs.

I

2 The appellants George Reid and Kenneth Gallagher are involuntary patients at the Oak Ridge Division of the Penetanguishene Medical Health Centre under the authority of Lieutenant Governor's Warrants, having been found not guilty by reason of insanity of criminal offences. Each of the appellants has a long history of mental illness, dating, in the case of Mr. Reid, back to 1978 and, in the case of Mr. Gallagher, back to 1973. They have both been diagnosed as schizophrenic.

3 The issues raised by these appeals do not require a detailed review of the appellants' psychiatric histories or of the events which led to their committal to a psychiatric facility. Under s. 35c [en. 1987, c. 37, s. 12] of the Mental Health Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 262, as amended (the Act), the appellants are persons detained in a psychiatric facility pursuant to the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, and stand in the same position, and have the same rights, as other involuntary patients. Accordingly, the issues can be considered from the standpoint of involuntary patients generally.

4 The respondent, Dr. Russell Fleming, is the appellants' attending physician and, as such, is responsible for their observation, care and treatment. Dr. Fleming is a psychiatrist and the director of the Oak Ridge facility. In September 1987, he found the appellant Reid not competent to consent to psychiatric treatment which, in his view, would likely improve Mr. Reid's deteriorating mental condition. Dr. Fleming made a similar determination with regard to Mr. Gallagher in the spring of 1988. Dr. Fleming proposed to treat Messrs. Reid and Gallagher with neuroleptic drugs, a form of medication commonly used in the treatment of mental disorders such as schizophrenia. Both of the appellants have had previous experience with these drugs and believe them to be non-beneficial or harmful. While mentally competent, both have refused to take the drugs notwithstanding their doctor's opinion that it would be in their best interests to do so.

5 The appellants challenged Dr. Fleming's finding as to their competence, as they were entitled to do under a s. 35b [en. 1987, c. 37, s. 12] of the Mental Health Act. The matter accordingly came before the review board established by s. 30 [am. 1986, c. 64, s. 33(26)] of the Act. After a full hearing in each case, the board upheld Dr. Fleming's decision. The appellants' mental competence is no longer in issue and I shall proceed on the basis that they are incompetent within the meaning of ss. 1(g) and 35(1)(b) [s. 35 am. 1986, c. 64, s. 33; rep. & sub. 1987, c. 37, s. 11] of the Act -- that is, they lack the requisite ability to understand the nature of the illness for which the treatment was proposed and the treatment proposed, and are unable to appreciate the consequences of giving or withholding consent to the treatment. Equally, it is not disputed that the appellants were competent within the meaning of ss. 1(g) and 35(1)(b) on the occasions relied on by their substitute decision-maker, the Official Guardian, as expressions of their prior competent wishes when he refused to consent to their being treated with neuroleptic drugs.

6 Our concern in this appeal is with the constitutional validity of ss. 35(2)(b)(ii) and 35a of the Act. These sections, in essence, empower the review board to make an order, as it did here, authorizing the attending physician to administer neuroleptic drugs to an involuntary incompetent psychiatric patient notwithstanding the refusal of the patient's substitute decision-maker to consent to the proposed treatment on the basis that, while apparently competent, the patient had expressed a prior competent wish not to be treated with neuroleptics. The principal challenge raised on the appeal is that the statutory scheme created by the impugned provisions deprive the appellants, and persons in like circumstances, of their right to security of the person guaranteed by s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

7 An understanding of the statutory scheme pursuant to which the review board made the impugned orders is basic to an appreciation of the issues in this appeal. Accordingly, before turning to the merits, it is necessary to set out in some detail the relevant sections of the Act and the procedures designed to authorize this form of non-consensual medical treatment.

II

8 The Act is concerned essentially with two types of persons -- voluntary and involuntary patients. A voluntary patient admits and discharges himself or herself to a psychiatric facility upon his or her own volition; an involuntary patient has no such choice. The determination of a patient as voluntary or involuntary is independent of any assessment of a patient's mental competency. An involuntary patient is defined in s. 1(c) of the Act to be:

... a person who is detained in a psychiatric facility, under a certificate of involuntary admission or a certificate of renewal ...

"Mentally competent" is defined in s. 1(g) as:

... having the ability to understand the subject-matter in respect of which consent is requested and able to appreciate the consequences of giving or withholding consent ...

9 The latter definition of mental competency must be read in conjunction with s. 35(1)(b). That provision sets out the test for determining mental competency with respect to a patient's ability to consent to psychiatric treatment. Section 35(1)(b) reads:

35(1)(b) "having the ability to understand the subject matter in respect of which consent is requested" in the definition of "mentally competent" (i.e., s. 1(g)) means having the ability to understand the nature of the illness for which treatment is proposed and the treatment proposed ...

Section 35(2) of the Act provides that:

Fleming v. Reid, [1991] O.J. No. 1083

35(2) Psychiatric and other related medical treatment shall not be given to a patient,

(a) where the patient is mentally competent, without the voluntary, informed consent of the patient;

(b) where the patient is not mentally competent,

(i) without the consent of a person authorized by section 1a to consent on behalf of the patient,

(ii) unless the review board has made an order authorizing the giving of the specified psychiatric and other related medical treatment, or

(iii) unless a physician certifies in writing that there is imminent and serious danger to the life, a limb or a vital organ of the patient requiring immediate treatment and the physician believes that delay in obtaining consent would endanger the life, limb or a vital organ of the patient.

10 It will be observed that psychiatric treatment may not be given to a mentally competent patient without the patient's voluntary informed consent; and, further, that, apart from the emergency circumstances contemplated in s. 35(2)(b)(iii), once a patient is found to be incompetent, psychiatric treatment may not be given without the consent of the patient's substitute decision-maker unless, as s. 35(2)(b)(ii) provides, the review board authorizes the giving of the treatment. I should add that none of the emergency circumstances contemplated in s. 35(2)(b) (iii), or elsewhere in the Act, are present in this case. There is no suggestion that either appellant represents a threat of bodily harm to himself or anyone else in the facility. The orders requiring them to take anti-psychotic drugs were made solely in their best interests and not on any other ground.

11 The persons who may act as substitute decision-makers are enumerated in s. 1a(1) of the Act [s. 1a en. 1987, c. 37, s. 2]:

1a.(1) A person may give or refuse consent on behalf of a patient who is not mentally competent if the person has attained the age of sixteen years, is apparently mentally competent, is available and willing to give or refuse consent and is described in one of the following paragraphs:

1. The committee of the person appointed for the patient under the Mental Incompetency Act.
2. The patient's representative appointed under section 1b or 1c.
3. The person to whom the patient is married or the person of the opposite sex with whom the patient is living outside marriage in a conjugal relationship or was living outside marriage in a conjugal relationship immediately before being admitted to the psychiatric facility, if in the case of unmarried persons they,
 - i. have cohabited for at least one year,
 - ii. are together the parents of a child, or
 - iii. have together entered into a cohabitation agreement under section 53 of the Family Law Act, 1986.
4. A child of the patient.
5. A parent of the patient or a person who has lawful custody of the patient.
6. A brother or sister of the patient.
7. Any other next of kin of the patient.
8. The Official Guardian.

In this case, the Official Guardian was appointed pursuant to s. 1a(1) to consent to or refuse treatment on behalf of each of the appellants.

12 Section 1b [en. 1987, c. 37, s. 2] grants an apparently mentally competent person the right to personally appoint a representative to give or refuse consent for the purpose of para. 2 of s. 1a(1); s. 1c [en. 1987, c. 37, s. 2] similarly grants a patient who is not mentally competent the right to apply to the board for the appointment of a representative for this purpose. These sections contemplate that psychiatric patients may select representatives to determine the course of their treatment should they become mentally incompetent within the meaning of the Act. Where such an appointment is made by a competent patient, the patient is not precluded from directing the substitute decision-maker to grant or refuse consent to the administration of neuroleptic drugs to the patient. I shall reproduce s. 1b in part:

1b.(1) A person who has attained the age of sixteen years and is mentally competent to do so has the right to appoint a representative who has attained the age of sixteen years and is apparently mentally competent to give or refuse consent on behalf of the person for the purpose of paragraph 2 of subsection 1a(1).

(4) The attending physician shall inform the patient in writing of the patient's right under subsection (1) within forty-eight hours after the patient is admitted or registered to the psychiatric facility.

(5) As soon as practicable, the officer in charge shall inform all persons who are patients of the facility at the time of the coming into force of this section in writing of their rights under subsection (1).

13 A substitute decision-maker is obliged to give or refuse consent in accordance with s. 1a(6) of the Act. This section, which is critical to this appeal, reads:

1a(6) A person authorized to give or refuse consent on behalf of a patient shall do so in accordance with the wishes of the patient if the person knows that the patient expressed any such wishes when apparently mentally competent and in accordance with the best interests of the patient if the person does not know of any such wishes.

14 The latter part of s. 1a(6) makes it clear that in some cases the substitute must determine whether to give or refuse consent on the basis of the patient's "best interests". The factors governing that determination are set out in paras. (a) through (d) of s. 35(5):

35(5) A person authorized to give or refuse consent on behalf of a patient shall consider the following factors to determine whether a specified psychiatric treatment and other related medical treatment are in the best interests of a patient,

(a) whether the mental condition of the patient will be or is likely to be substantially improved by the specified psychiatric treatment;

(b) whether the mental condition of the patient will improve or is likely to improve without the specified psychiatric treatment;

(c) whether the anticipated benefit from the specified psychiatric treatment and other related medical treatment outweighs the risk of harm to the patient; and

(d) whether the specified psychiatric treatment is the least restrictive and least intrusive treatment that meets the requirements of clauses (a), (b) and (c).

15 However, where the patient, while apparently mentally competent, has expressed his or her wishes with respect to the proposed psychiatric treatment, the substitute is obliged by s. 1a(6) to give or refuse consent in accordance with those wishes. In short, the substitute must first determine the prior competent wishes of the patient and give or refuse consent accordingly. It is only when those wishes cannot be determined that the substitute may give or refuse consent on the basis of the patient's best interests.

16 Where a substitute refuses a consent to the proposed psychiatric treatment, the attending physician of an involuntary patient may apply under s. 35a(1) [s. 35a en. 1987, c. 37, s. 12] to the review board for an order authorizing the treatment. Under s. 35a(2), the application must be accompanied by statements of the attending physician and a psychiatrist who is not a member of the medical staff of the facility that they are of the opinion that proposed treatment is in the patient's best interests. In rendering that opinion, the physicians are similarly obliged to take into consideration the factors set out in s. 35(5). Section 35a(1) states:

35a.(1) The attending physician of an involuntary patient may apply to the review board for an order authorizing the giving of specified psychiatric and other related medical treatment to the patient where the patient is not mentally competent,

Fleming v. Reid, [1991] O.J. No. 1083

- (a) if a person authorized under section 1a to consent to such treatment on the patient's behalf has refused to consent; or
- (b) under the circumstances described in subsection 1a(4) (i.e., where there is a conflict as to whether consent should be given between persons claiming authority to act as substitutes).

17 It is significant that this review procedure is applicable only to decisions made by the substitutes of involuntary incompetent patients. The decisions of substitutes of voluntary incompetent patients are not subject to review and, it follows, those patients cannot be forced to take neuroleptic drugs contrary to their competently expressed wishes. As I have already noted, in the case of competent patients, whether voluntary or involuntary, no psychiatric treatment can be given to them without their voluntary informed consent.

18 In determining whether to grant an order authorizing the psychiatric treatment proposed by the attending physician on a s. 35a(1) application, the review board must be satisfied that the specified treatment is in accordance with the patient's best interests. Section 35a(4) sets out the criteria to be considered by the board in making this determination as follows:

35a(4) The review board by order may authorize the giving of the specified psychiatric and other related medical treatment if it is satisfied that,

- (a) the mental condition of the patient will be or is likely to be substantially improved by the specified psychiatric treatment;
- (b) the mental condition of the patient will not improve or is not likely to improve without the specified psychiatric treatment;
- (c) the anticipated benefit from the specified psychiatric treatment and other related medical treatment outweighs the risk of harm to the patient; and
- (d) the specified psychiatric treatment is the least restrictive and least intrusive treatment that meets the requirements of clauses (a), (b) and (c).

19 These factors are identical to those governing a substitute decision-maker's determination under ss. 1a(6) and 35(5) when the prior competent wishes of a patient are unknown. Significantly, however, where the patient's prior competent wishes are known, they are not a matter which may be considered by the board on a s. 35a(1) application. Under the scheme established by this legislation, it is the patient's "best interests", and not his or her "prior competent wishes", that must govern the review board in making its determination as to whether to authorize the treatment proposed by the attending physician.

20 Finally, a decision of the review board may, under s. 33f [en. R.S.O. 1980, c. 262, s. 67; am. 1986, c. 64, s. 33(43); am. 1987, c. 37, s. 10] be appealed to the District Court. Pending such an appeal, no treatment may be administered to a patient unless otherwise ordered by a judge of the court in which the appeal is pending (s. 35a(11)).

21 In the present case, the Official Guardian found that both Mr. Reid and Mr. Gallagher had, when apparently mentally competent, expressed the wish that they not receive psychiatric treatment in the nature of neuroleptic medication. Accordingly, pursuant to s. 1a(6), he refused to consent to the respondent's proposed treatment of either patient. It is agreed, as I indicated earlier, that the appellants were mentally competent at the time the wishes upon which the Official Guardian acted were expressed.

22 In light of the substitute's refusal, Dr. Fleming applied under s. 35a(1) for an order authorizing the proposed psychiatric treatment in each case. The review board granted the orders on the basis that the treatment was in the appellants' "best interests". The appellants then appealed to the District Court where Tobias D.C.J., in carefully considered reasons now reported at (1990), 73 O.R. (2d) 169, found no violation of the appellants' Charter rights and upheld the orders of the review board. The appellants, by their litigation guardian, the Public Trustee, now appeal the matter to this court.

23 It may be helpful to refer briefly to the nature and effects of neuroleptics. These "anti-psychotic drugs", "psychotropic drugs" or "major tranquilizers", as they are sometimes called, are the most common form of treatment for schizophrenia and related mental illnesses. Their medical efficacy stems from their ability to minimize or control psychotic episodes or the symptoms associated with schizophrenia. Not all patients are responsive to the drugs and some improve without them. However, there is no way to predict a patient's reaction to any particular medication within this class of drugs.

24 In general, anti-psychotic drugs influence chemical transmissions to the brain, affecting both activatory and inhibitory functions. Because the therapeutic effect of the drugs is to reduce the level of psychotic thinking, it is virtually undisputed that they are "mind-altering". Although neuroleptics are the drug of choice for treatment of patients diagnosed as schizophrenic, they are not a cure for the disorder but are said to work so as to have a beneficial effect on thought processes and the brain's ability to sort out and integrate perceptions and memory.

25 The use of neuroleptics in the treatment of various psychoses is generally effective in improving the mental condition of the patient by alleviating the symptoms of mental disorder. It is clear, however, that they may not be helpful in every case. Moreover, the efficacy of the drugs is complicated by a number of serious side effects which are associated with their use. These include a number of muscular side effects known as extra- pyramidal reactions: dystonia (muscle spasms, particularly in the face and arms, irregular flexing, writhing or grimacing and protrusion of the tongue); akathisia (internal restlessness or agitation, an inability to sit still); akinesia (physical immobility and lack of spontaneity); and Parkinsonisms (mask- like facial expression, drooling, muscle stiffness, tremors, shuffling gait). The drugs can also cause a number of non- muscular side effects, such as blurred vision, dry mouth and throat, weight gain, dizziness, fainting, depression, low blood pressure and, less frequently, cardiovascular changes and, on occasion, sudden death.

26 The most potentially serious side effect of anti-psychotic drugs is a condition known as tardive dyskinesia. This is a generally irreversible neurological disorder characterized by involuntary, rhythmic and grotesque movement of the face, mouth, tongue, and jaw. The patient's extremities, neck, back and torso can also become involved. Tardive dyskinesia generally develops after prolonged use of the drugs, but it may appear after short term treatment and sometimes appears even after treatment has been discontinued.

27 In short, it appears that although these drugs apparently operate so as to benefit many patients by alleviating their psychotic symptoms, they also carry with them significant, and often unpredictable, short term and long term risks of harmful side effects. See, generally, Donland's Illustrated Medical Dictionary, 26th ed. (Toronto: W.B. Sanders Co., 1981), at p. 887; Breggin, "Brain Damage Dementia and Persistent Cognitive Dysfunction Associated with Neuroleptic Drugs: Evidence, Etiology, Implications" (1990), 11 Journal of Mind and Behaviour 425; Moonasar, "Neuroleptic Malignant Syndrome" (1986), 79 *South Med. 28 With these observations in mind, I turn to the issues raised in this appeal.

IV

29 The appellants' principal submission is that ss. 35(2)(b)(ii) and 35a of the Mental Health Act, which empower the review board to compel involuntary incompetent patients, like the appellants, to take anti-psychotic drugs contrary to their competent wishes as expressed by them through their substitute decision-maker, are inconsistent with and a denial of their constitutional right to security of the person as guaranteed by s. 7 of the Charter.

30 In considering this issue, it is important to recall briefly some of the common law principles applicable to doctor-patient relationships which this court recently had occasion to consider in Malette v. Shulman (1990), 72 O.R. (2d) 417, 67 D.L.R. (4th) 321.

31 The right to determine what shall, or shall not, be done with one's own body, and to be free from non-consensual medical treatment, is a right deeply rooted in our common law. This right underlies the doctrine of informed consent. With very limited exceptions, every person's body is considered inviolate, and, accordingly, every competent adult has the right to be free from unwanted medical treatment. The fact that serious risks or consequences may result from a refusal of medical treatment does not vitiate the right of medical self-determination. The doctrine of informed consent ensures the freedom of individuals to make choices about their medical care. It is the patient, not the doctor, who ultimately must decide if treatment -- any treatment -- is to be administered.

32 A patient, in anticipation of circumstances wherein he or she may be unconscious or otherwise incapacitated and thus unable to contemporaneously express his or her wishes about a particular form of medical treatment, may specify in advance his or her refusal to consent to the proposed treatment. A doctor is not free to disregard such advance instructions, even in an emergency. The patient's right to forgo treatment, in the absence of some overriding societal interest, is paramount to the doctor's obligation to provide medical care. This right must be honoured, even though the treatment may be beneficial or necessary to preserve the patient's life or health, and regardless of how ill-advised the patient's decision may appear to others.

33 These traditional common law principles extend to mentally competent patients in psychiatric facilities. They, like competent adults generally, are entitled to control the course of their medical treatment. Their right of self-determination is not forfeited when they enter a psychiatric facility. They may, if they wish, reject their doctor's psychiatric advice and refuse to take psychotropic drugs, just as patients suffering other forms of illness may reject their doctor's advice and refuse, for instance, to take insulin or undergo chemotherapy. The fact that these patients, whether voluntarily or involuntarily, are hospitalized in a mental institution in order to obtain care and treatment for a mental disorder does not necessarily render them incompetent to make psychiatric treatment decisions. They may be incapacitated for particular reasons but nonetheless be competent to decide upon their medical care. The Act presumes mental competency, and implicitly recognizes that a mentally ill person may retain the capacity to function competently in all or many areas of everyday life.

34 Before psychiatric treatment can be administered without the consent of the patient, the Act requires a finding of incompetency, which is made on the basis of the patient's ability to understand (1) the nature of the illness for which the psychiatric treatment is proposed; (2) the nature of the treatment proposed; and (3) the patient's ability to appreciate the consequences of giving or withholding consent. More particularly, involuntary patients, including those who, like the appellants, are being held pursuant to the Criminal Code, are taken to have the capacity to decide for themselves whether or not to receive anti-psychotic drugs. Until they are found incompetent, they hold the same rights as any other competent patient in the facility. Indeed, they hold the same rights as competent persons elsewhere in the province whose consent must be obtained before they can be the subject of medical treatment. Mentally ill persons are not to be stigmatized because of the nature of their illness or disability; nor should they be treated as persons of lesser status or dignity. Their right to personal autonomy and self-determination is no less significant, and is entitled to no less protection, than that of competent persons suffering from physical ailments.

35 In this case, the court's concern is with the rights, in non-emergency situations, of involuntary patients whose mental incompetence has been established and who are, therefore, incapable of giving or refusing consent to the proposed use of psychotropic drugs. Their inability to make a decision concerning their psychiatric treatment does not, however, extinguish their right to be free from non-consensual invasions of their person. Nor does it mean that psychiatric treatment must automatically be withheld from them. There are obviously many cases in which such treatment may be highly beneficial and should not be withheld simply because a patient cannot competently consent to the proposed treatment. Our society recognizes that the state has an obligation in these circumstances to provide care for the mentally disabled and to act in its role as parens patriae for the protection and benefit of those who, through mental disability, are unable to take care of themselves.

36 The provisions of the Mental Health Act to which I have made reference are designed to provide a mechanism whereby psychiatric treatment may be administered to patients who may need such treatment but are not mentally competent to consent to it. At the same time, the Act recognizes the civil rights of mentally ill patients by permitting them, or their substitutes acting in accordance with the patients' competent wishes, to refuse psychiatric treatment in spite of the fact that the treatment may be viewed by the mental health community as beneficial or necessary. However, in the case of an involuntary incompetent patient, the Act empowers the review board to overrule the substitute consent-giver's decision and thus the patient's competent wishes if, in the board's opinion, the psychiatric treatment is in the patient's "best interests". It is the provisions allowing this result which are at the heart of the dispute in this appeal.

37 This brings me to the appellants' contention that ss. 35a and 35(2)(b)(ii) authorizing the review board to override an involuntary patient's competent refusal to take anti-psychotic drugs, as expressed by the patient through his or her substitute, violate the principles of fundamental justice and contravene s. 7 of the Charter.

38 Section 7 guarantees everyone the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived of that right except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. In determining whether the legislation is in breach of this section of the Charter, I adopt the approach set out by the Supreme Court of Canada in R. v. Beare; R. v. Higgins, [1988] 2 S.C.R. 387, 45 C.C.C. (3d) 57, at p. 401 S.C.R., p. 69 C.C.C.:

The analysis of s. 7 of the Charter involves two steps. To trigger its operation there must first be a finding that there has been a deprivation of the right to "life, liberty and security of the person" and, secondly, that that deprivation is contrary to the principles of fundamental justice.

39 On the first branch of the analysis, it is manifest that the impugned provisions of the Act operate so as to deprive the appellants of their right to "security of the person" as guaranteed by s. 7. The common law right to bodily integrity and personal autonomy is so entrenched in the traditions of our law as to be ranked as fundamental and deserving of the highest order of protection. This right forms an essential part of an individual's security of the person and must be included in the liberty interests protected by s. 7. Indeed, in my view, the common law right to determine what shall be done with one's own body and the constitutional right to security of the person, both of which are founded on the belief in the dignity and autonomy of each individual, can be treated as co-extensive.

40 Few medical procedures can be more intrusive than the forcible injection of powerful mind-altering drugs which are often accompanied by severe and sometimes irreversible adverse side effects. To deprive involuntary patients of any right to make competent decisions with respect to such treatment when they become incompetent, and force them to submit to such medication, against their competent wishes and without the consent of their legally appointed substitute decision-makers, clearly infringes their Charter right to security of the person. To that extent, I agree with Judge Tobias' conclusion at p. 189 O.R. of his judgment that "there can be no question that the security of (the appellants') person will be affected if an order is made under the provisions of s. 35a that (they) receive specified psychiatric treatment". Reference might also be made to R. v. Rogers (1990), 61 C.C.C. (3d) 481, 2 C.R. (4th) 192, at p. 488 C.C.C., p. 201 C.R., where the British Columbia Court of Appeal, in another context, held that "a probation order which compels an accused person to take psychiatric treatment or medication is an unreasonable restraint upon the liberty and security of the accused person".

41 The second issue which must be addressed is whether the scheme of the Mental Health Act which effectively deprives an involuntary patient of the right to security of the person is contrary to the principles of fundamental justice.

42 The appellants do not attack the substitute decision-making scheme established by the Act. To the contrary, in their submission the scheme is in full accord with the principles of fundamental justice in that it takes as its basis the wishes of the patient when competent and, through the mechanism of the substitute decision-maker, allows an incompetent patient to exercise the same rights as a competent patient. Their complaint is that, under this statute, the competent wishes of an involuntary patient who subsequently becomes incompetent are, in effect, rendered meaningless when the substitute's refusal to consent to specified treatment is challenged at the level of the review board. At that stage, to quote from the appellants' factum, "the primary criterion for the first-level decision-maker, namely, the patient's wishes expressed when competent, is no longer a criterion at all". In other words, when the attending physician makes an application under s. 35a, the only question for the board's determination is whether the proposed treatment is in accordance with the patient's best interests. In the appellants' submission, the legislative scheme vitiates the patient's right to security of the person in a manner which is inconsistent with the principles of fundamental justice insofar as it compels a patient to take neuroleptic drugs without any regard to his or her competent wishes, and also permits the patient's substitute decision-maker's refusal to consent to be overridden without regard to the patient's competent wishes.

43 Counsel for the intervener, the Attorney General, whose submissions were made also on behalf of Dr. Fleming, took the position that "the policy underlying the scheme of substituted consent and the authorization of treatment orders by the review board is not, in substance, inconsistent with the principles of fundamental justice". Counsel contended that the ultimate regard for the best interests of the patient reflected in the Act is consistent with the common law development of the parens patriae jurisdiction. In her submission, the issue is whether the prior competent wishes of the patient, as expressed through the substitute consent-giver, must govern or take precedence over the views of the attending physician and review board as to the patient's best interests. She argued that the selection of the "test" -- i.e., the "prior competent wishes" or "best interests" of the patient -- to be applied by either the substitute or the review board is a public policy matter for the legislature. The legislature made a choice between two standards, both of which have "desirable features", and either of which could have been applied in circumstances such as those presented in this case. In short, the Attorney General submitted that in selecting the "best interests" test over the "prior wishes" test, and in affording a "full array of procedural protections" to patients faced with an application for a treatment order, the legislature acted within its traditional parens patriae jurisdiction and not in violation of any of the basic tenets of our legal system.

44 In the court below, Judge Tobias accepted the position advanced by the intervener in this appeal. Although he found that the order of the review board deprives the appellants of the security of their person, he held that deprivation was not in violation of the principles of fundamental justice. The scheme of the Act permitting the review board to override prior competent wishes, the judge found, is in accord with the same common law principles that underlie the parens patriae jurisdiction of the courts. Although recognizing [p. 188 O.R.] that "the concept of individual self-determination is given priority in the Act", the judge went on to find it unreasonable to say that, because the Act does not treat consent as the "paramount issue" but chooses the alternative of considering the best interests of the patient, the impugned provisions therefore violate s. 7 of the Charter. On his view of the Act, the "paramount issue for the attending physician, for the official guardian as a substitute consent-giver, for the review board, and for this court ... is not whether ... (the patient) expressed a specific wish while he was apparently mentally competent but, rather, whether at this time ... that wish still accords with his best interests" [pp. 188-89 O.R.].

VI

45 The Mental Health Act is unquestionably consistent with the spirit underlying the state's role as parens patriae. It can readily be accepted that the scheme in issue was intended to provide beneficial care for mentally incompetent patients incapable of caring for themselves, and that ss. 35a and 35(2) (b)(ii) were enacted out of a concern for the well-being of involuntary incompetent patients. It can also be accepted, as the evidence in this appeal indicates, that the appellants are very troubled individuals and that providing care for them in the facility is a very difficult task. Nonetheless, I am compelled to the conclusion that, in authorizing the review board to override the competent wishes of such patients in the manner it does, the Act fails to meet the standards set by the Charter and violates the rights guaranteed to the appellants by s. 7.

46 In E. (Mrs.) v. Eve, [1986] 2 S.C.R. 388, 31 D.L.R. (4th) 1 sub nom. Re Eve -- a case which involved the question of whether the court might invoke its parens patriae jurisdiction to authorize the non-therapeutic sterilization of a mentally disabled woman -- the Supreme Court of Canada had occasion to examine the history and content of the parens patriae jurisdiction of the courts. La Forest J., writing for the court, makes it clear that this is a very broad, if not unlimited, inherent jurisdiction under which the court has the right and duty to protect those who are unable to take care of themselves, and in doing so, the court has a wide discretion to do what it considers in their best interests. But he also makes it clear that the discretion to invoke this jurisdiction is not unlimited and is to be exercised only in accordance with its underlying principle -- that is, to do what is necessary for the protection of the persons for whose benefit the discretion is exercised. At p. 427 S.C.R., p. 29 D.L.R., La Forest J. states:

Though the scope or sphere of operation of the parens patriae jurisdiction may be unlimited, it by no means follows that the discretion to exercise it is unlimited. It must be exercised in accordance with its underlying principle. Simply put, the discretion is to do what is necessary for the protection of the person for whose benefit it is exercised ...

... parens patriae jurisdiction exists for the benefit of those who cannot help themselves, not to relieve those who may have the burden of caring for them.

47 I do not read the judgment in Re Eve, or in Beson v. Director of Child Welfare (Newfoundland), [1982] 2 S.C.R. 716, 142 D.L.R. (3d) 20, another decision of the Supreme Court of Canada upon which the respondent and intervener relied, as supporting the proposition that the parens patriae jurisdiction can be invoked to deprive competent mentally ill patients of rights expressly granted by statute or to abrogate their Charter rights. The parens patriae jurisdiction was intended to operate only where a person is unable to take care of himself or herself. It cannot be exercised by the state to overrule a treatment decision made by a competent patient, who, by definition, is able to direct the course of his or her medical care, regardless of the fact that the decision may be considered, by objective standards, medically unsound or contrary to the patient's best interests. Nor, in my opinion, for the reasons I gave in Malette v. Shulman, supra, may resort be had to the parens patriae jurisdiction to authorize the medical treatment of an incompetent person who, while competent, had given instructions refusing to consent to the proposed treatment.

48 This Act acknowledges the fundamental individual rights asserted by these appellants. The legislature did not, as the intervener suggests, simply choose the "best interests" test over the "prior competent wishes" test to govern consent decisions made on behalf of involuntary incompetent patients. The Act explicitly recognizes the right of mental patients, voluntary and involuntary, to control their psychiatric treatment and, accordingly, their right to security of the person. Psychiatric treatment of competent patients without their voluntary informed consent is prohibited (s. 35(2)(a)), and the substitute consent-givers of incompetent patients are required to give or refuse consent on the basis of the patient's prior competent wishes (s. 1a(6)). Under this legislative scheme, the competent wishes of mentally disabled patients must be honoured regardless of whether or not the patients are competent when the psychiatric treatment for which consent is required is proposed. A competent patient's right to be free from non-consensual invasions of his or her person is not diminished by subsequent incompetency or subordinated to his or her "best interests" where the prior competent wishes of the patient are known. The legislature has given paramountcy to the "prior wishes" test and, in keeping with the patient's common law and constitutional rights, the "best interests" test comes into play only if the patient has no known competent wishes as to his or her psychiatric treatment.

49 In the case of involuntary incompetent patients, however, and in their case alone, the Act permits their competent wishes to be overridden by the review board on the basis that the proposed treatment order would be in the patient's best interests. Where the attending physician applies to reverse the substitute consent-giver's refusal to consent to psychiatric treatment on the basis of the patient's prior competent wishes, the review board is obliged under s. 35a to decide whether to authorize the treatment on entirely different criteria than that employed by the substitute. Whereas the substitute must apply a subjective test -- the patient's "prior competent wishes", the review board is precluded from considering any subjective criteria and must apply an objective test -- the patient's "best interests". These are separate and distinct tests founded on different values or standards, and, as such, necessarily raise different concerns or issues. The learned judge appealed from, in my respectful view, erred in merging the tests and defining the issue before the review board, as I noted earlier, as being, in effect, whether the patient's prior competent wishes still accord with his best interests. The Act is not capable of that interpretation. It was indeed common ground in this appeal, as counsel for the intervener aptly put it, that the tests are "mutually exclusive", and must accordingly be treated as such.

50 As the legislation stands, therefore, once the matter reaches the review board, these patients may be compelled to take anti- psychotic drugs regardless of the cogency and competency of their prior wishes. The review board is in no sense engaged in a "review" of the substitute's decision; its focus is exclusively on the "best interests" criterion set out in s. 35a(4). With respect to the board's determination, the patient's competent wishes are immaterial -- indeed, the board would exceed its statutory jurisdiction in considering the prior competent wishes of the patient. When the matter reaches the board, the substitute consent-giver scheme, for all practical purposes, is rendered nugatory with respect to these patients. While they, like other psychiatric patients, are entitled to appoint and direct a substitute to give or refuse consent to their psychiatric treatment and are effectively told that their competent wishes will govern the decision of whoever may be their substitute, when such a decision is challenged by the attending physician it is of no consequence in the board's considerations. At this stage, the whole of the exercise preceding the board hearing is of no force or effect.

51 In sum, after creating a substitute system which purports to recognize the prior known competent wishes of incompetent patients and to ensure that those wishes are respected, the Act proceeds to render those competent wishes, and the substitute's decision based thereon, entirely meaningless when a treatment order is sought from the review board. The patient's wishes can be overridden without any consideration as to their currency, validity or reliability. As a result, the appellants, and patients in a like position, are denied any right to have the issue of whether they should be compelled to take neuroleptic drugs determined on the basis of their competently expressed wishes.

52 A legislative scheme that permits the competent wishes of a psychiatric patient to be overridden, and which allows a patient's right to personal autonomy and self-determination to be defeated, without affording a hearing as to why the substitute consent-giver's decision to refuse consent based on the patient's wishes should not be honoured, in my opinion, violates "the basic tenets of our legal system" and cannot be in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice: Reference re s. 94(2) of the Motor Vehicle Act (British Columbia), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486, 23 C.C.C. (3d) 289, at p. 503 S.C.R., p. 302 C.C.C.

53 It is no answer to say that the patient has been afforded a full array of procedural protections with respect to the board's hearing when that hearing is not directed to the substitute consent-giver's decision, and the patient's competent wishes as expressed through the substitute consent-giver are irrelevant to the board's determination. In my opinion, it is plainly contrary to the principles of fundamental justice to force a patient to take anti-psychotic drugs in his or her best interests without providing the patient, or the patient's substitute, any opportunity to argue that it is not the patient's best interests but rather his or her competent wishes which should govern the course of the patient's psychiatric treatment.

54 In this case, the appellants' wishes were stated at a time when they were admittedly competent. It would appear that each of them has had extensive experience with anti-psychotic drugs and has in the past rejected this form of medication. However, it is not for this court to assess the validity of their wishes or the applicability of those wishes to their present psychiatric circumstances. No emergency is claimed here, and it is not suggested that the appellants are a threat to themselves or anyone else. In the context of this legislative scheme, the question of whether the decision of their substitute should be set aside is a matter to be determined after a hearing in which the effect or scope of the appellants' wishes, and not merely their best interests, can be properly considered in the light of all the existing circumstances.

55 In my view, no objection can be taken to procedural requirements designed to determine more accurately the intended effect or scope of an incompetent patient's prior competent wishes or instructions. As the Act now stands, the substitute consent-giver's decision must be governed by wishes which may range from an isolated or casual statement of refusal to reliable and informed instructions based on the patient's knowledge of the effect of the drug on him or her. Furthermore, there may be questions as to the clarity or currency of the wishes, their applicability to the patient's present circumstances, and whether they have been revoked or revised by subsequent wishes or a subsequently accepted treatment program. The resolution of questions of this nature is patently a matter for legislative action. But, in my respectful view, it is incumbent on the legislature to bear in mind that, as a general proposition, psychiatric patients are entitled to make competent decisions and exercise their right to self-determination in accordance with their own standards and values and not necessarily in the manner others may believe to be in the patients' best interests.

56 In this case, as I have stated, there was no hearing before the review board, nor could there be, on the question of the effect or scope of the appellants' prior competent wishes, or their substitute consent-giver's decision based on those wishes. Accordingly, the treatment orders made by the board must be seen as arbitrary and unfair, and must be set aside. It is not for the court to rewrite the Act and vest a tribunal with jurisdiction not given it by the legislature. Nor is it for the court to determine the procedure or criteria to be followed in making treatment decisions for mentally disabled patients. These are issues which involve governmental policy. Here, the substitute consent-giver, in compliance with the Act, refused consent to the use of neuroleptics. Since, as the Act is presently framed, no provision is made for a proper review of that decision, the decision must stand.

57 In the light of this conclusion, I find it unnecessary to consider the appellants' alternative argument that the Act violates their equality rights as guaranteed by s. 15(1) of the Charter. Nor do I find it necessary to consider the appellants' further contention that the Act is also contrary to s. 7 in that it permits a review of a substitute's decision on the application of the attending physician when consent is refused, but allows no review at the behest of the patient when the substitute consents to a proposed course of psychiatric treatment. This argument has no factual foundation in this case, and I think it inappropriate to deal with the issue on a hypothetical basis.

58 Having found that s. 35a and s. 35(2)(b)(ii) are inconsistent with s. 7 of the Charter to the extent that they empower the review board to authorize the psychiatric treatment of an involuntary incompetent patient contrary to the patient's competent refusal to accept such treatment as expressed through the patient's substitute consent-giver, the remaining question is whether the sections can be saved by s. 1 of the Charter. In my opinion, they cannot.

59 The impugned scheme under the Mental Health Act fails to meet the requirement of s. 7 that the principles of fundamental justice be observed with respect to involuntary incompetent patients. Those patients are arbitrarily deprived of their right to security of the person insofar as they are denied any hearing in which they may assert, through their substitute consent-givers, their competent wishes with respect to treatment and, thus, their right to be free of unwanted medical treatment. Such a violation of the principles of fundamental justice, in my opinion, can be neither "reasonable" nor "demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society".

60 The right to personal security is guaranteed as fundamental in our society. Manifestly, it should not be infringed any more than is clearly necessary. In my view, although the right to be free from non-consensual psychiatric treatment is not an absolute one, the state has not demonstrated any compelling reason for entirely eliminating this right, without any hearing or review, in order to further the best interests of involuntary incompetent patients in contravention of their competent wishes. To completely strip these patients of the freedom to determine for themselves what shall be done with their bodies cannot be considered a minimal impairment of their Charter right. Safeguards can obviously be formulated to balance their wishes against their needs and ensure that their security of the person will not be infringed any more than is necessary. Recognizing the important objective of state intervention for the benefit of mentally disabled patients, nonetheless, the overriding of a fundamental constitutional right by the means chosen in this Act to attain the objective cannot be justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

VIII

61 For these reasons, I would allow the appeal of each of the appellants and set aside the order of Tobias D.C.J. In place thereof, I would vacate the treatment orders of the review board in the case of each of the appellants. I would further declare ss. 35a and 35(2)(b)(ii) of the Mental Health Act inoperative insofar as these sections purport to empower the review board to authorize the psychiatric treatment of incompetent patients involuntarily confined in psychiatric facilities contrary to the refusal of the patient's substitute decision-maker to consent to such treatment on the basis of the patient's prior competent wishes.

62 The appellants are entitled to their costs in this court and in the court below.

Appeals allowed.

Case Summary

On appeal from the judgment of Justice Wailan Low dated January 26, 2001.

Counsel

James C. Morton, for the appellant. Ingrid Van Weert, for the respondent.

The following judgment was delivered by

THE COURT (endorsement)

1 We have found it necessary to vary paragraph 31 of the Court's reasons for judgment released on October 3, 2001 on the basis of submissions made by counsel following the release of the reasons.

2 Accordingly, paragraph 31, as varied, is to be substituted for the former paragraph, and reads as follows:

I would, therefore, allow the appeal, set aside the judgment dismissing the appellant's claim against Jenny Cormier-Grant and order that her motion for summary judgment be dismissed. The appeal with respect to the summary judgment in favour of Patricia Cormier was, in effect, abandoned and it is dismissed without costs. In addition, the appellant is granted leave to amend his statement of claim, if so advised. The appellant is entitled to his costs of the motion made on behalf of Jenny Cormier-Grant and the appeal from the judgment in her favour. The costs order of the motion judgment in so far as it relates to Patricia Cormier shall stand.

Hanson v. Bank of Nova Scotia et al.

Counsel

David Stockwood, Q.C., and Christopher H. Wirth, for appellant.

William E. Pepall, for respondent, Osler, Hoskin & Harcourt.

The judgment of the court was delivered by

1 FINLAYSON J.A.: — This is an appeal from an order striking out the statement of claim against the respondent Osler, Hoskin and Harcourt ("Osler") under rule 21.01(1)(b) on the ground that it disclosed no reasonable cause of action.

2 The facts as pleaded are that the plaintiff, in his capacity as a creditor of Telfer's Tower Club (Hotels) Limited ("Telfer's"), a bankrupt, sued the Bank of Nova Scotia and Osler for damages for breach of fiduciary duty, negligence, and negligent misrepresentation arising out of the circumstances leading to the bankruptcy of Telfer's. The claim for negligent misrepresentation has been abandoned as against Osler.

3 In 1989, Telfer's was indebted to the bank in an unstated but presumably substantial amount, for which the bank held security. Telfer's was in the process of putting together a private placement offering to raise money. The bank was aware of these efforts and professed to be supportive of this initiative along with a proposed joint venture with Thornbrook International Consultants Inc. ("Thornbrook"). The private placement was designed to raise 7.8 million dollars and Wood Gundy Inc. ("Wood Gundy") was retained by Telfer's to market the offering. By August 1989, Wood Gundy had prepared and issued an offering memorandum.

4 In the meantime, and without the knowledge of Telfer's, the bank had retained Laventhol and Horwath ("Laventhol") with a view to appointing it as receiver or as trustee in bankruptcy of Telfer's. Laventhol reported back to the bank on August 8, 1989 with an analysis and comments on a possible receivership. The bank had retained Osler as its solicitors to act for it in any matter relating to the receivership or bankruptcy. Also, during August, rumours circulated in the market that Telfer's was in serious financial difficulty and was likely to go into receivership or bankruptcy. These rumours seriously jeopardized the ongoing joint venture discussions between Telfer's and Thornwood. Telfer's contacted the bank and was told categorically and falsely that Laventhol had not been retained by the bank and was not involved with Telfer's in any way.

5 Michael Judge was a salesman at Wood Gundy and his father, a senior partner at Osler, was one of his customers. He solicited his father as a potential purchaser of the Telfer's issue and asked his permission to circulate the offering to other members of the Osler firm. A special presentation was arranged for Osler and another law firm for September 6, 1989. This date was cancelled because Judge Sr. advised his son that the Osler firm had been retained by the bank in the matter of Telfer's and that the bank would be acting on its security on September 15, 1989. Judge Sr. told his son that one of his partners had been a participant in meetings with the bank involving the retainer of Laventhol, and that he, Judge Sr., and his partners had been advised against making any investment in the Telfer's offering. This information was conveyed by Wood Gundy to Telfer's. When Telfer's contacted the bank for confirmation, the bank, once again and falsely, denied any involvement by Laventhol.

6 In overview, it is the position of the plaintiff that Osler became privy to confidential information about Telfer's financial circumstances through their retainer as solicitors for the bank, that they were aware of Telfer's vulnerability in the financial markets and that they disclosed this confidential information to the underwriters of Telfer's under circumstances in which it was foreseeable that Telfer's would suffer harm, thereby causing damage to Telfer's by undermining its efforts to raise public moneys.

7 The respondent Osler submits that the facts as pleaded do not create, as between Osler and Telfer's, a fiduciary relationship that is now known to the law and accordingly, Telfer's cannot assert a claim against Osler for breach of confidence. The respondent also submits that the facts as pleaded do not create a duty of care by Osler to Telfer's as would form the basis of an action in negligence. Further, with respect to both causes of action, it is submitted that there is no causal connection between the disclosure of the alleged confidential information and the ultimate failure of Telfer's.

8 In my opinion, none of the above conclusions should be made at this stage of the proceedings. The threshold for sustaining a pleading under rule 21.01(1)(b) is not a high one. Much of the argument before us was directed to the lack of a factual underpinning for the causes of action alleged, particularly as to the damages issue. This is a matter to be resolved on the evidence called at the trial: see Temilini v. Ontario Provincial Police (Commissioner) (1990), 73 O.R. (2d) 664, 38 O.A.C. 270 (C.A.). It is also accepted that the fact that a cause of action could be a novel one is not a bar to its proceeding to trial: see Hunt v. Carey Canada Inc., [1990] 2 S.C.R. 959, 74 D.L.R. (4th) 321. The categories of relationships giving rise to fiduciary duties are not closed nor are the categories of negligence in which a duty of care is owed: see Guerin v. R., [1984] 2 S.C.R. 335 at p. 383, 13 D.L.R. (4th) 321 at p. 341; International Corona Resources Ltd. v. LAC Minerals Ltd., [1989] 2 S.C.R. 574 at pp. 596-97, 61 D.L.R. (4th) 14 at p. 61, and 34 Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th ed. (1980), para. 5 at p. 8.

9 Accordingly, I would allow the appeal, set aside the order under appeal and dismiss the respondent's motion. The appellant is entitled to its costs here and below in any event of the cause.

Appeal allowed.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA (57 paras.)

* Chief Justice at the time of judgment.

Case Summary

Practice — Motion to strike — Action brought by person suffering from disease allegedly caused by exposure to asbestos fibres — Allegation of conspiracy to withhold information of potential health risks — Allegations of other nominate torts — Circumstances in which a statement of claim (or portions of it) could be struck out — Whether allegations based on the tort of [page960] conspiracy should be struck out — Rules of Court [British Columbia], Rule 19(24).

Respondent Hunt, a retired electrician, brought an action alleging that he had contracted mesothelioma because of exposure to asbestos fibres over the course of his employment. The defendants had been involved in the mining of asbestos and the production and supply of a variety of asbestos products between 1940 and 1967. It was alleged that they knew from 1934 that asbestos fibres could cause disease in those exposed to the fibres. Atlas Turner, Babcock, Caposite, Holmes, Johns-Manville and T & N, P.L.C. were sued not only in negligence but also for their alleged conspiracy to withhold information about the dangers associated with asbestos which ultimately resulted in Mr. Hunt's contracting mesothelioma. Flintkote Mines Limited and T & N, P.L.C. were named as respondents to the appeal in the Court of Appeal by order of the British Columbia Court of Appeal.

Carey Canada Inc. successfully applied to have the action against it struck for want of a reasonable claim. (The action had been based solely on allegations of conspiracy.) The Court of Appeal allowed an appeal from that decision. The issues here dealt with the circumstances in which a statement of claim (or portions of it) could be struck out, and whether the allegations based on the tort of conspiracy should be struck out.

Held: The appeals should be dismissed.

The test to be applied is whether it is "plain and obvious" that the plaintiff's statement of claim discloses no reasonable claim. Only if the action is certain to fail because it contains a radical defect ranking with the others listed in Rule 19(24) should the relevant portions of a plaintiff's statement of claim be struck out under Rule 19(24)(a).

Here, it was not "plain and obvious" that the plaintiff's statement of claim failed to disclose a reasonable claim, given this Court's most recent pronouncement on the circumstances in which the law of torts will recognize such a claim of conspiracy. Nor was it plain and obvious that allowing this action to proceed would amount to an abuse of process. Whether or not there is good reason to extend the tort to the present context is for the trial judge to consider in light of the evidence.

It is not for this Court on a motion to strike to reach a decision as to the plaintiff's chances of success. It is enough that the plaintiff has some chance of success. Whether or not a predominant purpose had been established and whether or not Quebec's Business Concerns Records Act limited the range of information that the defendants could produce at trial was not relevant to whether the plaintiff's statement of claim disclosed a reasonable claim. Striking out cannot be justified because a pleading reveals "an arguable, difficult or important point of law". On the contrary, it may well be critical that the action be allowed to proceed.

Alleging the tort of conspiracy is not precluded by the allegation of another tort. While it may be arguable that if one succeeds under a distinct nominate tort against an individual defendant, then an action in conspiracy should not be available against that defendant, it is far from clear that the mere fact that a plaintiff alleges that a defendant committed other torts is a bar to pleading the tort of conspiracy. Whether the plaintiff should be barred from recovery under the tort of conspiracy can only be determined when the question of whether it has established that the defendant did in fact commit the other alleged torts has been decided.

WILSON J.

1 The issue raised in these appeals is whether it is open to the respondent to proceed with an action against the appellants for the tort of conspiracy. In particular, the appeals raise the question whether those portions of the respondent [Hunt's] statement of claim in which he alleges that the appellants conspired to withhold information concerning the effects of asbestos fibres disclose a reasonable claim within the meaning of Rule 19(24)(a) of the British Columbia Rules of Court.

1. The Facts

2 The respondent, George Hunt, is a retired electrician who alleges that he was exposed to asbestos fibres over the course of his employment. Mr. Hunt has brought an action against Atlas Turner Inc., Asbestos Corporation Limited, The Asbestos Institute, Babcock & Wilcox Industries Ltd., Bell Asbestos Mines Limited, Caposite Insulations Ltd., Carey Canada Inc., Flintkote Mines Limited, Holmes Insulations Ltd., Johns-Manville Amiante Canada Inc., Lac d'amiante du Québec Ltée., National Asbestos Mines Limited, The Quebec Asbestos Mining Association and T & N, P.L.C. ("the defendants").

3 Mr. Hunt alleges that the defendants were involved in the mining of asbestos and the production and supply of a variety of asbestos products between 1940 and 1967. He alleges that after 1934 the defendants knew that asbestos fibres could cause disease in those exposed to the fibres. In addition to suing Atlas Turner, Babcock, Caposite, Holmes, Johns-Manville and T & N in negligence, Mr. Hunt alleges that all of the defendants conspired to withhold information about the dangers associated with asbestos and that as a result of that conspiracy he contracted mesothelioma.

4 The relevant portions of Mr. Hunt's statement of claim read as follows:

16. At various times, the particulars of which are well known to the defendants, including the period between 1940 and 1967, the defendants mined and processed asbestos and designed, manufactured, packaged, advertised, promoted, distributed and sold a variety of products containing asbestos fibres (the "Products"), the particulars of which are also well known to the defendants.

17. After about 1934 the defendants knew or ought to have known that the asbestos fibres contained in the Products could cause diseases, including cancer and asbestosis, in those who worked with or were otherwise exposed to those fibres.
18. After about 1934, some or all of the defendants conspired with each other with the predominant purpose of injuring the plaintiff [sic] and others who would be exposed to the asbestos fibres in the Products, by preventing this knowledge becoming public knowledge and, in particular, by preventing it reaching the plaintiff and others who would be exposed to the asbestos fibres in the Products.
19. Alternatively, after about 1934, some or all of the defendants conspired with each other to prevent by unlawful means this knowledge becoming public knowledge and, in particular, to prevent it reaching the plaintiff and others who would be exposed to the asbestos fibres in the Products, in circumstances where the defendants knew or ought to have known that injury to the plaintiff and others who would be exposed to the asbestos fibres in the Products would result from the defendants' acts.
20. The defendants' acts in furtherance of the conspiracy referred to in paragraphs 18 and 19 include:
 - (a) fraudulently, deceitfully or negligently suppressing, distorting and misrepresenting the results of medical and scientific research on the disease-causing effects of asbestos;
 - (b) fraudulently, deceitfully or negligently misrepresenting the disease-causing effects of asbestos by disseminating incorrect, incomplete, outdated, misleading and distorted information about those effects;
 - (c) fraudulently, deceitfully or negligently attempting to discredit doctors and scientists who claimed that asbestos caused disease;

[page965]

- (d) fraudulently, deceitfully or negligently marketing and promoting the Products without any or adequate warning of the dangers they posed to those exposed to them; and
- (e) fraudulently, deceitfully or negligently attempting to influence to their benefit government regulation of the use of asbestos and the Products.

5 Carey Canada Inc. brought an application before the Supreme Court of British Columbia under Rule 19(24)(a) of the British Columbia Rules of Court seeking to have the action against it, which was based solely on the allegations of conspiracy, dismissed on the basis that it disclosed no reasonable claim. Rule 19(24) provides:

19(24) At any stage of a proceeding the court may order to be struck out or amended the whole or any part of an endorsement, pleading, petition or other document on the ground that

- (a) it discloses no reasonable claim or defence as the case may be, or
- (b) it is unnecessary, scandalous, frivolous, or vexatious, or
- (c) it may prejudice, embarrass or delay the fair trial or hearing of the proceeding, or
- (d) it is otherwise an abuse of the process of the court, and may grant judgment or order the proceeding to be stayed or dismissed and may order the costs of the application to be paid as between solicitor and client.

2. The Courts Below

- (a) Supreme Court of British Columbia

6 Hollinrake J. accepted Carey Canada's submission that the only damage that could be the subject of a conspiracy action was "direct damage". Although counsels' memorandum summarizing Hollinrake J.'s oral reasons for judgment does not explain precisely what he understood the term "direct damage" to mean, it would appear that he meant damage suffered by a plaintiff that flows directly from acts aimed specifically at that plaintiff. Hollinrake J. stated:

[page966]

Dealing with the issue of direct or indirect damage, in the first kind of conspiracy Estey, J. refers to the "predominant purpose" of the defendants' conduct [see: Canada Cement LaFarge Ltd. v. British Columbia Lightweight Aggregate Ltd., [1983] 1 S.C.R. 452, at p. 471]. I think this does import direct damage. The second type of conspiracy refers to conduct "directed towards the plaintiff". I think this imports direct damage. I think these conclusions are justified by what happened in Canada Cement LaFarge Ltd.

Hollinrake J. therefore allowed the motion and dismissed the action against Carey Canada as disclosing no reasonable claim.

(b) British Columbia Court of Appeal

7 By order of the British Columbia Court of Appeal (dated March 30, 1989), Flintkote Mines Limited and T & N, P.L.C. were named as respondents to the appeal in the Court of Appeal.

8 Anderson J.A. (Macfarlane and Esson JJ.A. concurring) allowed the appeal and set aside Hollinrake J.'s order. Anderson J.A. explained his reasons:

- (1) The cases relied upon by counsel for the respondent Carey Canada Inc. and the learned trial judge to the effect that there is no such tort as a conspiracy to injure by unlawful means where the damage is indirect, all relate to the area of competition in the marketplace and to labour-management disputes. They may not be applicable to the very different circumstances alleged in this case and to very different social considerations.
- (2) The arguments as to law and fact are intricate and complex and should be dealt with at trial after all the evidence is adduced. At this stage of the proceedings it is impossible to reach the conclusion that there is no cause of action in fact or law. (See Minnes v. Minnes (1962), 39 W.W.R. 112 at 122).

9 Esson J.A. (Anderson and MacFarlane JJ.A. agreeing) gave additional reasons stressing that the "language of predominant purpose and direct damage" in Canada Cement LaFarge Ltd. had arisen in cases that involved competition and pure economic loss. In Mr. Hunt's case, however, the context was very different. Mr. Hunt had suffered [page967] personal injury and claimed that by conspiring to suppress information the defendants had created a foreseeable risk of causing him the harm which he in fact suffered. It was not possible at this stage in the proceedings to determine that the damage was not sufficiently direct to be able to support an action rooted in the tort of conspiracy. Esson J.A. specifically declined to embark upon a detailed consideration of the law of conspiracy, noting:

It has not generally been part of our tradition and, given the complexity and novelty of some of the issues raised in this case, it would I think be particularly undesirable to render such decisions [sic], as it were, in a vacuum. For those reasons, as well as the reasons given by Mr. Justice Anderson, I agree in allowing the appeal.

3. The Issues

10 The issues that arise in this appeal are:

1. In what circumstances may a statement of claim (or portions of it) be struck out?
2. Should Mr. Hunt's allegations based on the tort of conspiracy be struck out?

4. Analysis

- (1) In What Circumstances May a Statement of Claim be Struck Out?

11 Carey Canada's motion to have the action dismissed was made pursuant to Rule 19(24)(a) of the British Columbia Rules of Court. This rule stipulates that a court may strike out any part of a statement of claim that

"discloses no reasonable claim". The rules of practice with respect to striking out a statement of claim are similar in other provinces. In Ontario, for example, Rule 21.01 of the Rules of Civil Procedure, O. Reg. 560/84, states:

21.01 (1) A party may move before a judge,

- (a) for the determination, before trial, of a question of law raised by a pleading in an action where the determination of the question may dispose of all or part of the action, substantially shorten the trial or result in a substantial saving of costs; or
- (b) to strike out a pleading on the ground that it discloses no reasonable cause of action or defence, and the judge may make an order or grant judgment accordingly.

(2) No evidence is admissible on a motion,

- (a) under clause (1)(a), except with leave of a judge or on consent of the parties;
- (b) under clause (1)(b). [Emphasis added.]

12 Rule 19(24) of the British Columbia Rules of Court and analogous provisions in other provinces are the result of a "codification" of the court's power under its inherent jurisdiction to stay actions that are an abuse of process or that disclose no reasonable cause of action: see McLachlin and Taylor, British Columbia Practice (2nd. ed. 1979), vol. 1, pp. 19-71. This process of codification first took place in England shortly after the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, (Eng.) 36 & 37 Vict., c. 66, was enacted. It is therefore of some interest to review the interpretation the courts in England have given to their rules relating to the striking out of a statement of claim.

(a) England:

13 In Metropolitan Bank, Ltd. v. Pooley, [1881-85] All E.R. 949 (H.L.), the Lord Chancellor explained at p. 951 that before the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, courts were prepared to stay a "manifestly vexatious suit which was plainly an abuse of the authority of the court" even although there was no written rule stating that courts could do so. The Lord Chancellor noted, at p. 951, that "The power seemed to be inherent in the jurisdiction of every court of justice to protect itself from the abuse of its procedure". That is, it was open to courts to ensure that their process was [page969] not used simply to harass parties through the initiation of actions that were obviously without merit.

14 Before the advent of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873 and the new Rules of the Supreme Court (enacted in 1883) it had been open to parties to use a "demurrer" to challenge a statement of claim. That is, it had been open to a defendant to admit all the facts that the plaintiff's pleadings alleged and to assert that these facts were not sufficient in law to sustain the plaintiff's case. When a demurrer was pleaded the question of law that was thereby raised was immediately set down for argument and decision: see Halsbury's Laws of England (4th ed. 1981), vol. 36, para. 2, n. 7 and para. 35, n. 5; Milsom, Historical Foundations of the Common Law (2nd ed. 1981), at p. 72; and Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History (2nd ed. 1979), at p. 69. But a formal and technical practice eventually grew up around demurrer and judges were notoriously reluctant to provide definitive answers to the points of law that were thereby raised. As the Lord Chancellor explained in Pooley, it was eventually thought best to replace demurrers with an easier summary process for getting rid of an action that was on its face manifestly groundless. It was with this objective in mind that O. 25, r. 4 of the 1883 Rules of the Supreme Court came into force:

- 4. The court or a judge may order any pleading to be struck out, on the ground that it discloses no reasonable cause of action or answer, and in any such case or in case of the action or defence being shown by the pleadings to be frivolous or vexatious, the court or a judge may order the action to be stayed or dismissed, or judgment to be entered accordingly, as may be just.

Commenting on the relative merits of demurrers and the new rule, Chitty J. observed in Republic of Peru v. Peruvian Guano Co. (1887), 36 Ch. D. 489, at p. 496:

Having regard to the terms of rule 4, and to the decisions on it, I think that this rule is more favourable to the pleading objected to than the old procedure by demurrer. Under the new rule the pleading will not be struck out unless it is demurrable and something worse than demurrable. If, notwithstanding defects in the pleading, which would have been fatal on a demurrer, the Court sees that a substantial case is presented the Court should, I think, decline to strike out that pleading; but when the pleading discloses a case which the Court is satisfied will not succeed, then it should strike it out and put a summary end to the litigation.

15 One of the most important points advanced in the early decisions dealing with O. 25, r. 4 was the proposition that the rule was derived from the courts' power to ensure both that they remained a forum in which genuine legal issues were addressed and that they did not become a vehicle for "vexatious" actions without legal merit designed solely to harass another party. In Pooley, supra, at p. 954, Lord Blackburn asserted that the new rule "considerably extends the power of the court to act in such a manner as I have stated, and enables it to stay an action on further grounds than those on which it could have been stayed at common law." Nonetheless, as Chitty J. subsequently observed in Peruvian Guano Co., the rule was not intended to prevent a "substantial case" from coming forward. Its summary procedures were only to be used where it was apparent that allowing the case to go forward would amount to an abuse of the court's process.

16 In one of the better-known decisions concerning the circumstances in which resort should be had to the rule Lindley M.R. stated:

The second and more summary procedure is only appropriate to cases which are plain and obvious, so that any master or judge can say at once that the statement of claim as it stands is insufficient, even if proved, to entitle the plaintiff to what he asks. The use of the expression "reasonable cause of action" in rule 4 shews that the summary procedure there introduced is only intended to [page971] be had recourse to in plain and obvious cases. [Emphasis added.]

[See: Hubbuck & Sons, Ltd. v. Wilkinson, Heywood & Clark, Ltd., [1899] 1 Q.B. 86 (C.A), at p. 91.]

Lindley M.R.'s observations made clear that even if the rule expanded the court's power to stay actions, courts were to use the rule only in those exceptional instances where it was "plain and obvious" that, even if one accepted the version of the facts put forward in the statement of claim, the plaintiff's case did not disclose a reasonable cause of action. The question was not whether the plaintiff could succeed since this was a matter properly left for determination at trial. The question was simply whether the plaintiff was advancing a "reasonable" argument that could properly form the subject matter of a trial.

17 The Master of the Rolls had made this very point some six years earlier:

Then the Vice-Chancellor says: "The questions raised upon this application are of such importance and such difficulty that I cannot say that this pleading discloses no reasonable cause of action, or that there is anything frivolous or vexatious; therefore, I should let the parties plead in the usual way". It appears to me that this is perfectly right. To what extent is the Court to go on inquiring into difficult questions of fact or law in the exercise of the power which is given it under Order XXV., rule 4? It appears to me that the object of the rule is to stop cases which ought not to be launched -- cases which are obviously frivolous or vexatious, or obviously unsustainable; and if it will take a long time, as is suggested, to satisfy the Court by historical research or otherwise that the County Palatine has no jurisdiction, I am clearly of opinion that such a motion as this ought not to be made. There may be an application in Chambers to get rid of vexatious actions; but to apply the rule to a case like this appears to me to misapply it altogether. [Emphasis added.]

[See: Attorney-General of the Duchy of Lancaster v. London and North Western Railway Co., [1892] 3 Ch. 274 (C.A.), at pp. 276-77.]

Thus, the fact that the plaintiff's case was a complicated one could not justify striking out the statement of claim. Complex matters that disclosed substantive questions of law were most appropriately addressed at trial where evidence concerning the facts could be led and where arguments about the merits of a plaintiff's case could be made.

18 The requirement that it be "plain and obvious" that some or all of the statement of claim discloses no reasonable cause of action before it can be struck out, as well as the proposition that it is singularly inappropriate to use the rule's summary procedure to prevent a party from proceeding to trial on the grounds that the action raises difficult questions, has been affirmed repeatedly in the last century: see Dyson v. Attorney-General, [1911] 1 K.B. 410 (C.A.); Evans v. Barclays Bank and Galloway, [1924] W.N. 97 (C.A.); Kemsley v. Foot, [1951] 1 T.L.R. 197 (C.A.); and Nagle v. Feilden, [1966] 2 Q.B. 633 (C.A.). Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton's observations in Dyson, supra, at pp. 418-19, are particularly instructive:

Now it is unquestionable that, both under the inherent power of the Court and also under a specific rule to that effect made under the Judicature Act, the Court has a right to stop an action at this stage if it is wantonly brought without the shadow of an excuse, so that to permit the action to go through its ordinary stages up to trial would be to allow the defendant to be vexed under the form of legal process when there could not at any stage be any doubt that the action was baseless. But from this to the summary dismissal of actions because the judge in chambers does not think they will be successful in the end lies a wide region, and the Courts have properly considered that this power of arresting an action and deciding it without trial is one to be very sparingly used, and rarely, if ever, excepting in cases where the action is an abuse of legal procedure. They have laid down again and again that this process is not intended to take the place of the old demurrer by which the defendant challenged the validity of the plaintiff's claim as a matter of law. Differences of law, just as differences of fact, are normally to be decided by trial after hearing in Court, and not to be refused a hearing in Court by an order of the judge in chambers. Nothing more clearly indicates this to be the intention of the rule than the fact that the plaintiff has no appeal as of right from the decision of the judge at chambers in the case of [page973] such an order as this. So far as the rules are concerned an action may be stopped by this procedure without the question of its justifiability ever being brought before a Court. To my mind it is evident that our judicial system would never permit a plaintiff to be "driven from the judgment seat" in this way without any Court having considered his right to be heard, excepting in cases where the cause of action was obviously and almost incontestably bad. [Emphasis added.]

19 A more recent and no less instructive discussion of these principles may be found in Lord Pearson's reasons in Drummond-Jackson v. British Medical Association, [1970] 1 All E.R. 1094 (C.A.). I note that in Drummond-Jackson the Court of Appeal dealt with Rules of the Supreme Court, O. 18, r. 19 (the provision that replaced R.S.C. O. 25, r. 4 in 1962), a provision very similar to the rules that now govern the striking out of pleadings in Canada:

19. -- (1) The Court may at any stage of the proceedings order to be struck out or amended any pleading or the indorsement of any writ in the action, or anything in any pleading or in the indorsement, on the ground that --

- (a) it discloses no reasonable cause of action or defence, as the case may be; or
- (b) it is scandalous, frivolous or vexatious; or
- (c) it may prejudice, embarrass or delay the fair trial of the action; or
- (d) it is otherwise an abuse of the process of the court; and may order the action to be stayed or dismissed or judgment to be entered accordingly, as the case may be.

(2) No evidence shall be admissible on an application under paragraph (1)(a).

20 Responding to Lord Denning's suggestion that the potential length and complexity of a trial should be taken into account when considering whether to strike out a statement of claim, Lord Pearson (with whom Sir Gordon Willmer concurred in separate reasons) reaffirmed the proposition that Lord Justice Lindley had advanced some [page974] eighty years earlier in Attorney-General of the Duchy of Lancaster: length and complexity were not appropriate factors to consider when deciding whether a statement of claim should be struck out. Lord Pearson said at pp. 1101-02:

Over a long period of years it has been firmly established by many authorities that the power to strike out a statement of claim as disclosing no reasonable cause of action is a summary power which should be exercised only in plain and obvious cases.

In my opinion the traditional and hitherto accepted view -- that the power should only be used in plain and obvious cases -- is correct according to the evident intention of the rule for several reasons. First, there is in r 19 (1) (a) the expression 'reasonable cause of action' to which Sir Nathaniel Lindley MR called attention in Hubbuck & Sons Ltd v. Wilkinson, Heywood and Clark Ltd. No exact paraphrase can be given, but I think 'reasonable cause of action' means a cause of action with some chance of success, when (as required by r 19 (2)) only the allegations in the pleading are considered. If when those allegations are examined it is found that the alleged cause of action is certain to fail, the statement of claim should be struck out. In Nagle v Feilden Danckwerts LJ said:

'The summary remedy which has been applied to this action is one which is only to be applied in plain and obvious cases, when the action is one which cannot succeed or is in some way an abuse of the process of the court'.

Salmon LJ said:

'It is well settled that a statement of claim should not be struck out and the plaintiff driven from the judgment seat unless the case is unarguable'.

Secondly, r 19 (1) (a) takes some colour from its context in r 19 (1) (b) -- 'scandalous, frivolous and vexatious' -- r 19 (1) (c) -- 'prejudice, embarrass or delay the fair trial of the action' -- and r. 19 (1) (d) -- otherwise an abuse of the process of the court'. The defect referred to in r 19 (1) (a) is a radical defect ranking with those referred to in the other paragraphs. Thirdly, an application for the statement of claim to be struck out under this rule is made at a very early stage of the action when there is only the statement of claim without any other pleadings and without any evidence at all. The plaintiff should not [page975] be 'driven from the judgment seat' at this very early stage unless it is quite plain that his alleged cause of action has no chance of success. [Emphasis added.]

Lord Pearson concluded at p. 1102:

That is the basis of the rule and practice on which one has to approach the question whether the plaintiff's statement of claim in the present case discloses any reasonable cause of action. It is not permissible to anticipate the defence or defences -- possibly some very strong ones -- which the defendants may plead and be able to prove at the trial, nor anything which the plaintiff may plead in reply and seek to rely on at the trial. [Emphasis added.]

21 In England, then, the test that governs an application under R.S.C. O. 18, r. 19 has always been and remains a simple one: assuming that the facts as stated in the statement of claim can be proved, is it "plain and obvious" that the plaintiff's statement of claim discloses no reasonable cause of action? Is there a defect in the statement of claim that can properly be characterized as a "radical defect" ranking with the others listed in O. 18, r. 19? If it is plain and obvious that the action is certain to fail because it contains some such radical defect, then the relevant portions of the statement of claim may properly be struck out. To allow such an action to proceed, even although it was certain to fail, would be to permit the defendant to be "vexed" and would therefore amount to the very kind of abuse of the court's process that the rule was meant to prevent. But if there is a chance that the plaintiff might succeed, then that plaintiff should not be "driven from the judgment seat". Neither the length and complexity of the issues of law and fact that might have to be addressed nor the potential for the defendant to present a strong defence should prevent a plaintiff from proceeding with his or her case. Provided that the plaintiff can present a "substantive" case, that case should be heard.

- (b) Canada
- (c) Ontario and British Columbia Courts of Appeal

22 In Canada, provincial courts of appeal have long had to grapple with the very same issues concerning the rules with respect to statements of claim that courts in England have dealt with for over a century. As noted earlier, the rules of practice in this country are to a large extent modelled on England's rules of practice. It comes as no surprise, therefore, that the test Canadian courts of appeal have adopted is in essence the same one that the courts in England favour.

Ontario

23 In Ontario, for example, the Court of Appeal dealt with Rule 124 (the predecessor to Rule 21.01) in Ross v. Scottish Union and National Insurance Co. (1920), 47 O.L.R. 308 (C.A.). The rule followed closely the wording of England's R.S.C. 1883, O. 25, r. 4 and read as follows:

124. A judge may order any pleading to be struck out on the ground that it discloses no reasonable cause of action or answer, and in any such case, or in case of the action or defence being shown to be frivolous or vexatious, may order the action to be stayed or dismissed, or judgment to be entered accordingly.

24 In Ross, Magee J.A. embraced the "plain and obvious" test developed in England, stating at p. 316: That inherent jurisdiction is partly embodied in our Rule 124, which allows pleadings to be struck out if disclosing no reasonable cause of action or defence, and thereby, in such case, or if the action or defence is shewn to be vexatious or frivolous, the action may be stayed or dismissed or judgment be entered accordingly. The Rule has only been acted upon in plain and obvious cases, and it should only be so when the Court is satisfied that the case is one beyond doubt, and that there is no reasonable cause of action or defence. [Emphasis added.]

Magee J.A. went on to note at p. 317:

To justify the use of Rule 124, a statement of claim should not be merely demurrable, but it should be [page977] manifest that it is something worse, so that it will not be curable by amendment: Dadswell v. Jacobs (1887), 34 Ch. D. 278, 281; Republic of Peru v. Peruvian Guano Co. (1887), 36 Ch. D. 489; and it is not sufficient that the plaintiff is not likely to succeed at the trial: Boaler v. Holder (1886), 54 L.T.R. 298.

25 At an early date, then, the Ontario Court of Appeal had modelled its approach to Rule 124 on the approach that had been consistently favoured in England. And over time the Ontario Court of Appeal has gone on to show the same concern that statements of claim not be struck out in anything other than the clearest of cases. As Laidlaw J.A. put it in Rex ex rel. Tolfree v. Clark, [1943] O.R. 501 (C.A.), at p. 515:

The power to strike out proceedings should be exercised with great care and reluctance. Proceedings should not be arrested and a claim for relief determined without trial, except in cases where the Court is well satisfied that a continuation of them would be an abuse of procedure: Evans v. Barclay's Bank et al., [1924] W.N. 97. But if it be made clear to the Court that an action is frivolous or vexatious, or that no reasonable cause of action is disclosed, it would be improper to permit the proceedings to be maintained.

26 More recently, in Gilbert Surgical Supply Co. v. F. W. Horner Ltd., [1960] O.W.N. 289 (C.A.), at pp. 289-90, Aylesworth J.A. observed that the fact that an action might be novel was no justification for striking out a statement of claim. The court would still have to conclude that "the plaintiff's action could not possibly succeed or that clearly and beyond all doubt, no reasonable cause of action had been shown".

27 Thus, the Ontario Court of Appeal has firmly embraced the "plain and obvious" test and has made clear that it too is of the view that the test is rooted in the need for courts to ensure that their process is not abused. The fact that the case the plaintiff wishes to present may involve complex issues of fact and law or may raise a novel legal proposition should not prevent a plaintiff from proceeding with his action.

British Columbia

28 In British Columbia the Court of Appeal has approached the matter in a similar way. The predecessor to the rule that Carey Canada invokes in this appeal was worded in exactly the same way as England's R.S.C. 1883, O. 25, r. 4. Not surprisingly the British Columbia Court of Appeal's treatment of that rule has been similar to that taken in England and Ontario. For example, in Minnes v. Minnes (1962), 39 W.W.R. 112 (B.C.C.A.), Tysoe J.A. observed at p. 122:

In my respectful view it is only in plain and obvious cases that recourse should be had to the summary process under O. 25, R. 4, and the power given by the Rule should be exercised only where the case is absolutely beyond doubt. So long as the statement of claim, as it stands or as it may be amended, discloses some question fit to be tried by a judge or jury, the mere fact that the case is weak or not likely to succeed is no ground for striking it out. If the action involves investigation of serious questions of law or questions of general importance, or if facts are to be known before rights are definitely decided, the Rule ought not to be applied. [Emphasis added.]

For his part Norris J.A. noted at p. 116 (agreeing with Tysoe J.A.):

I might add that upon the motion, with respect, it was not for the learned trial judge as it is not for this court to consider the issues between the parties as they would be considered on trial. All that was required of the plaintiff on the motion was that she should show that on the statement of claim, accepting the allegations therein made as true, there was disclosed from that pleading with such amendments as might reasonably be made, a proper case to be tried. [Emphasis added.]

The law as stated in Minnes v. Minnes was recently reaffirmed in McNaughton and McNaughton v. Baker (1988), 25 B.C.L.R. (2d) 17 (C.A.), at p. 23, per McLachlin J.A. Similarly, Anderson and Esson J.J.A. relied on Minnes v. Minnes in this appeal.

29 Once again then the "plain and obvious" test has been firmly embraced. The British Columbia [page979] Court of Appeal has confirmed that the summary proceedings available under the rule in question do not afford an appropriate forum in which to engage in a detailed examination of the strengths and weaknesses of the plaintiff's case. The sole question is whether, assuming that all the facts the plaintiff alleges are true, the plaintiff can present a question "fit to be tried". The complexity or novelty of the question that the plaintiff wishes to bring to trial should not act as a bar to that trial taking place.

(ii) Supreme Court of Canada

30 While this Court has had a somewhat limited opportunity to consider how the rules regarding the striking out of a statement of claim are to be applied, it has nonetheless consistently upheld the "plain and obvious" test. Justice Estey, speaking for the Court in Attorney General of Canada v. Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, [1980] 2 S.C.R. 735, stated at p. 740:

As I have said, all the facts pleaded in the statement of claim must be deemed to have been proven. On a motion such as this a court should, of course, dismiss the action or strike out any claim made by the plaintiff only in plain and obvious cases and where the court is satisfied that "the case is beyond doubt": Ross v. Scottish Union and National Insurance Co.

31 I had occasion to affirm this proposition in Operation Dismantle Inc. v. The Queen, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 441. At pages 486-87 I provided the following summary of the law in this area (with which the rest of the Court concurred):

The law then would appear to be clear. The facts pleaded are to be taken as proved. When so taken, the question is do they disclose a reasonable cause of action, i.e. a cause of action "with some chance of success" (Drummond-Jackson v. British Medical Association, [1970] 1 All E.R. 1094) or, as Le Dain J. put it in Dowson v. Government of Canada (1981), 37 N.R. 127 (F.C.A.), at p. 138, is it "plain and obvious that the action cannot succeed?"

And at p. 477 I observed:

It would seem then that as a general principle the Courts will be hesitant to strike out a statement of claim as disclosing no reasonable cause of action. The fact that [page980] reaching a conclusion on this preliminary issue requires lengthy argument will not be determinative of the matter nor will the novelty of the cause of action militate against the plaintiffs. [Emphasis added.]

32 Most recently, in Dumont v. Canada (Attorney General), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 279, I made clear at p. 280 that it was my view that the test set out in Inuit Tapirisat was the correct test. The test remained whether the outcome of the case was "plain and obvious" or "beyond reasonable doubt".

33 Thus, the test in Canada governing the application of provisions like Rule 19(24)(a) of the British Columbia Rules of Court is the same as the one that governs an application under R.S.C. O. 18, r. 19: assuming that the facts as stated in the statement of claim can be proved, is it "plain and obvious" that the plaintiff's statement of claim discloses no reasonable cause of action? As in England, if there is a chance that the plaintiff might succeed, then the plaintiff should not be "driven from the judgment seat". Neither the length and complexity of the issues, the novelty of the cause of action, nor the potential for the defendant to present a strong defence should prevent the plaintiff from proceeding with his or her case. Only if the action is certain to fail because it contains a radical defect ranking with the others listed in Rule 19(24) of the British Columbia Rules of Court should the relevant portions of a plaintiff's statement of claim be struck out under Rule 19(24)(a).

34 The question therefore to which we must now turn in this appeal is whether it is "plain and obvious" that the plaintiff's claims in the tort of conspiracy disclose no reasonable cause of action or whether the plaintiff has presented a case that is "fit to be tried", even although it may call for a complex or novel application of the tort of conspiracy.

(2) Should Mr. Hunt's Allegations Based on the Tort of Conspiracy Be Struck from his Statement of Claim?

35 In the last decade the tort of conspiracy has received a considerable amount of attention. In [page981] England, for example, both the House of Lords and the Court of Appeal have recently had occasion to review the tort in some detail. These decisions have made clear that the tort of conspiracy may apply in at least two situations: (i) where the defendants agree to use lawful means to harm the plaintiff and (ii) where the defendants use unlawful means to harm the plaintiff. The law with respect to the first situation is not in doubt:

If A and B agree to commit acts which would be lawful if done by either of them alone but which are done in combination and cause damage to C, no tortious conspiracy actionable at the suit of C exists unless the predominant purpose of A and B in making the agreement and carrying out the acts which cause the damage is to injure C and not to protect the lawful commercial interests of A and B. This proposition is established by five decisions at the highest level: Mogul Steamship Co. Ltd. v. McGregor, Gow & Co. [1892] A.C. 25; Quinn v. Leathem, [1901] A.C. 495; Sorrell v. Smith, [1925] A.C. 700; Crofter Hand Woven Harris Tweed Co. Ltd. v. Veitch, [1942] A.C. 435 and Lonrho Ltd. v. Shell Petroleum Co. Ltd. (No. 2), [1982] A.C. 173. [See: Metall und Rohstoff A.G. v. Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette Inc., [1989] 3 W.L.R. 563, at p. 593, per Slade L.J.] [Emphasis added.]

Courts in England have, however, encountered greater difficulty in stating with precision the applicable principles governing situations in which unlawful means are employed. In particular, they have struggled to decide whether the plaintiff must establish, not just that the defendants used means that were unlawful and resulted in harm to the plaintiff, but also that the defendants actually intended to harm the plaintiff.

36 In Lonrho Ltd. v. Shell Petroleum Co. (No. 2), [1982] A.C. 173, the House of Lords dealt with a consultative case stated by arbitrators in which it was asked to consider whether the tort of conspiracy could be extended to embrace a situation where the agreement in question resulted in a contravention of penal law (unlawful means) but did not include an intention to injure the plaintiff. [page982] In the process of deciding whether the tort should be so extended Lord Diplock noted at pp. 188-89:

My Lords, conspiracy as a criminal offence has a long history. It consists of "the agreement of two or more persons to effect any unlawful purpose, whether as their ultimate aim, or only as a means to it, and the crime is complete if there is such agreement, even though nothing is done in pursuance of it." I cite from Viscount Simon L.C.'s now classic speech in Crofter Hand Woven Harris Tweed Co. Ltd. v. Veitch, [1942] A.C. 435, 439. Regarded as a civil tort, however, conspiracy is a highly anomalous cause of action. The gist of the cause of action is damage to [page983] the plaintiff; so long as it remains unexecuted the agreement which alone constitutes the crime of conspiracy, causes no damage; it is only acts done in execution of the agreement that are capable of doing that. So the tort, unlike the crime, consists not of agreement but of concerted action taken pursuant to agreement.

37 Lord Diplock went on to observe that he was of the view that the rationale that had apparently fuelled the development of the tort in the late-nineteenth and early-twentieth centuries, namely that "a combination may make oppressive or dangerous that which if proceeded only from a single person would be otherwise" (see: Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow & Co. (1889), 23 Q.B.D. 598, at p. 616, per Bowen L.J.) was somewhat anachronistic in light of modern commercial developments. Nevertheless he did not feel that this meant that the tort could now be dispensed with. He said at p. 189:

But to suggest today that acts done by one street-corner grocer in concert with a second are more oppressive and dangerous to a competitor than the same acts done by a string of supermarkets under a single ownership or that a multinational conglomerate such as Lonrho or oil company such as Shell or B.P. does not exercise greater economic power than any combination of small businesses, is to shut one's eyes to what has been happening in the business and industrial world since the turn of the century and, in particular, since the end of World War II. The civil tort of conspiracy to injure the plaintiff's commercial interests where that is the predominant purpose of the agreement between the defendants and of the acts done in execution of it which caused damage to the plaintiff, must I think be accepted by this House as too well-established to be discarded however anomalous it may seem today. It was applied by this House 80 years ago in Quinn v. Leatham, [1901] A.C. 495, and accepted as good law in the Crofter case [1942] A.C. 435, where it was made clear that injury to the plaintiff and not the self-interest of the defendants must be the predominant purpose of the agreement in execution of which the damage-causing acts were done.

38 Having set out this groundwork and having thereby confirmed that the tort of conspiracy was applicable in circumstances where the defendants entered into an agreement the predominant purpose of which was to injure the plaintiff, Lord Diplock turned to the question whether the tort should be extended beyond these confines. He concluded at p. 189:

This House, in my view, has an unfettered choice whether to confine the civil action of conspiracy to the narrow field to which alone it has an established claim or whether to extend this already anomalous tort beyond those narrow limits that are all that common sense and the application of the legal logic of the decided cases require.

My Lords, my choice is unhesitatingly the same as that of Parker J. and all three members of the Court of Appeal. I am against extending the scope of the civil tort of conspiracy beyond acts done in execution of an agreement entered into by two or more persons for the purpose not of protecting their own interests but of injuring the interests of the plaintiff.

39 Lord Diplock's observations made clear that in order to succeed with the tort of conspiracy in England a plaintiff would have to demonstrate that the purpose for which parties acted in accordance with their agreement was to harm the plaintiff. The English Court of Appeal has recently had an opportunity to consider Lord Diplock's judgment in Lonrho (see: Metall und Rohstoff A.G. v. Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette Inc., supra) and has confirmed at p. 604 that "the House plainly intended the presence of a predominant intention to injure to be the touchstone of an actionable conspiracy". The Court of Appeal continued:

Where the predominant intention to injure is absent but the defendants pursuant to agreement commit torts against the plaintiff, the House held, we conclude, that common sense and the legal logic of the decided cases are satisfied if the plaintiff is denied a remedy in conspiracy and left to sue on the substantive torts.

Thus, regardless of whether the alleged conspirators used lawful or unlawful means, the law in England required the plaintiff to establish that the defendants entered into the agreement with the predominant purpose of injuring the plaintiff.

40 Although Canadian jurisprudence has taken note of the developments in England, the law governing the tort of conspiracy in Canada is not in all respects the same as the law set out in Lonrho. Indeed, this Court had occasion to consider both the tort of conspiracy and Lord Diplock's observations in Lonrho in Canada Cement LaFarge Ltd. v. British Columbia Lightweight Aggregate Ltd., [1983] 1 S.C.R. 452. Justice Estey stated at p. 468:

The question which must now be considered is whether the scope of the tort of conspiracy in this country extends beyond situations in which the defendants' predominant purpose is to cause injury to the plaintiff, and includes cases in which this intention to injure is absent but the conduct of the defendants is by itself unlawful, and in fact causes damage to the plaintiff.

41 This passage made clear that this Court agreed with the House of Lords that where a plaintiff alleges that the defendants entered into an agreement whose predominant purpose was to injure the plaintiff and where the plaintiff alleges that he or she has in fact suffered damage as a result of the agreement, then regardless of the lawfulness of the means that the defendants are alleged to have used to implement the agreement the plaintiff will have made out a cognizable claim in the tort of conspiracy.

42 But what of situations in which the plaintiff alleges that there was an agreement that involved the use of unlawful means and that resulted in the plaintiff's suffering damage? Must the plaintiff also establish that the predominant purpose of the [page985] agreement was to injure him or her? It is in answering this question that Estey J. chose to follow a somewhat different path from Lord Diplock. Estey J. was of the view that it was not appropriate to go as far as the House of Lords had gone in precluding the action. He said at pp. 471-72:

Although the law concerning the scope of the tort of conspiracy is far from clear, I am of the opinion that whereas the law of tort does not permit an action against an individual defendant who has caused injury to the plaintiff, the law of torts does recognize a claim against them in combination as the tort of conspiracy if:

- (1) whether the means used by the defendants are lawful or unlawful, the predominant purpose of the defendants' conduct is to cause injury to the plaintiff; or,
- (2) where the conduct of the defendants is unlawful, the conduct is directed towards the plaintiff (alone or together with others), and the defendants should know in the circumstances that injury to the plaintiff is likely to and does result.

In situation (2) it is not necessary that the predominant purpose of the defendants' conduct be to cause injury to the plaintiff but, in the prevailing circumstances, it must be a constructive intent derived from the fact that the defendants should have known that injury to the plaintiff would ensue. In both situations, however, there must be actual damage suffered by the plaintiff. [Emphasis added.]

43 Estey J.'s summary of the law in Canada suggests that in cases falling into the second category it may not be necessary to prove actual intent. As Fridman has noted in The Law of Torts in Canada, vol. 2, at p. 265:

The difference between the English and Canadian formulations of the tort of conspiracy lies in the way the intent of the defendants is expressed. The language of Lord Diplock seems to indicate that the necessary intent should be actual. That of Estey J. suggests that it may be possible for a court to infer an intent to injure from the circumstances even if the defendants deny they acted with any such intent.

Fridman goes on to observe at pp. 265-66

In modern Canada, therefore, conspiracy as a tort comprehends three distinct situations. In the first place there will be an actionable conspiracy if two or more persons agree and combine to act unlawfully with the predominating purpose of injuring the plaintiff. Second, there will be an actionable conspiracy if the defendants combine to act lawfully with the predominating purpose of injuring the plaintiff. Third, an actionable conspiracy will exist if defendants combine to act unlawfully, their conduct is directed towards the plaintiff (or the plaintiff and others), and the likelihood of injury to the plaintiff is known to the defendants or should have been known to them in the circumstances.

In my view, this passage provides a useful summary of the current state of the law in Canada with respect to the tort of conspiracy. Whether it is "good law", it seems to me, it is not for the Court to consider in this proceeding where the issue is simply whether the plaintiff's pleadings disclose a reasonable cause of action. I agree completely with Esson J.A. that it is not appropriate at this stage to engage in a detailed analysis of the strengths and weaknesses of Canadian law on the tort of conspiracy.

44 I note that in this appeal Mr. Hunt was clearly fully aware of Estey J.'s observation in Canada Cement LaFarge Ltd. when he prepared paragraphs 18 and 19 of his statement of claim. Paragraph 18 of his statement of claim follows faithfully the first proposition that Estey J. put forward at p. 471, alleging that some or all of the defendants "conspired with each other with the predominant purpose of injuring" Mr. Hunt. Paragraph 19 of the statement of claim presents an alternative argument that is faithful to the wording of Estey J.'s second proposition, alleging that "some or all of the defendants conspired with each other to prevent by unlawful means this knowledge becoming public knowledge and, in particular, to prevent it reaching the plaintiff and others who would be exposed to the asbestos fibres in the Products, in circumstances where the defendants knew or ought to have known that injury to the plaintiff" would result. If there is a defect in Mr. Hunt's statement of claim, it is certainly not that paragraphs 18 or 19 fail to follow the language of this Court's most [page987] recent pronouncement on the conditions that must be met in order to ground a claim in the tort of conspiracy. In other words, given this Court's most recent pronouncement on the circumstances in which the law of torts will recognize such a claim, it is not "plain and obvious" that the plaintiff's statement of claim fails to disclose a reasonable claim.

45 The defendants contend, however, that this Court's recent pronouncements, as well as those of courts in England, make clear that the tort of conspiracy cannot be invoked outside a commercial law context and that it certainly cannot be invoked in personal injury litigation. They point out that in Lonrho, supra, at p. 189, Lord Diplock was not prepared to extend the tort to cover the facts of the case before him. They emphasize that Estey J. displayed a measure of sympathy for Lord Diplock's reluctance to extend the scope of the tort when he stated at p. 473 of Canada Cement LaFarge Ltd.:

The tort of conspiracy to injure, even without the extension to include a conspiracy to perform unlawful acts where there is a constructive intent to injure, has been the target of much criticism throughout the common law world. It is indeed a commercial anachronism as so aptly illustrated by Lord Diplock in Lonrho, supra, at pp. 188-89. In fact, the action may have lost much of its usefulness in our commercial world, and survives in our law as an anomaly. Whether that be so or not, it is now too late in the day to uproot the tort of conspiracy to injure from the common law world. No doubt the reaction of the courts in the future will be to restrict its application for the very reasons that some now advocate its demise.

46 Finally, the defendants point to my observations in Frame v. Smith, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 99, where I had occasion to consider whether the tort of conspiracy might be extended to cover a case in which [page988] a father was suing his former wife for denying him access to his children. Although I was in dissent in the final result, the Court agreed with my observations about the tort of conspiracy (see La Forest J. at p. 109). The defendants place a good deal of weight on my suggestion, at p. 124, that "the criticisms which have been levelled at the tort give good reason to pause before extending it beyond the commercial context". I concluded that even although the tort could in theory be extended to the facts of Frame, it was not desirable to extend the tort to the custody and access context.

47 Not surprisingly, the defendants contend that it would be equally inappropriate to extend the tort of conspiracy to cover the facts of this case. The difficulty I have, however, is that in this appeal we are asked to consider whether the allegations of conspiracy should be struck from the plaintiff's statement of claim, not whether the plaintiff will be successful in convincing a court that the tort of conspiracy should extend to cover the facts of this case. In other words, the question before us is simply whether it is "plain and obvious" that the statement of claim contains a radical defect.

48 Is it plain and obvious that allowing this action to proceed amounts to an abuse of process? I do not think so. While there has clearly been judicial reluctance to extend the scope of the tort beyond the commercial context, I do not think this Court has ever suggested that the tort could not have application in other contexts. While Estey J. expressed the view in Canada Cement LaFarge Ltd., supra, at p. 473, that the action had lost much of its usefulness, and while I noted in Frame v. Smith, supra, at pp. 124-25, that some have even suggested that consideration should be given to abolishing the tort entirely (see: Burns, "Civil Conspiracy: An Unwieldy Vessel Rides a Judicial Tempest" (1982), 16 U.B.C. L. Rev. 229, at p. 254), we both affirmed the ongoing existence of the tort at the date of these judgments. In my view, it would be highly inappropriate for this Court to deny a litigant who is capable of fitting his allegations into Estey J.'s two-pronged summary of the law on civil conspiracy the opportunity [page989] to persuade a court that the facts are as alleged and that the tort of conspiracy should be held to apply on these facts. While courts should pause before extending the tort beyond its existing confines, careful consideration might conceivably lead to the conclusion that the tort has a useful role to play in new contexts.

49 I note that in Frame v. Smith, supra, at p. 125, I was not prepared to extend the tort of conspiracy to the custody and access context both because such an extension was not in the best interests of children and because such an extension would not have been consistent with the rationale that underlies the tort of conspiracy: "namely that the tort be available where the fact of combination creates an evil which does not exist in the absence of combination". But in the appeal now before us it seems to me much less obvious that a similar conclusion would necessarily be reached. If the facts as alleged by the plaintiff are true, and for the purposes of this appeal we must assume that they are, then it may well be that an agreement between corporations to withhold information about a toxic product might give rise to harm of a magnitude that could not have arisen from the decision of just one company to withhold such information. There may, accordingly, be good reason to extend the tort to this context. However, this is precisely the kind of question that it is for the trial judge to consider in light of the evidence. It is not for this Court on a motion to strike out portions of a statement of claim to reach a decision one way or the other as to the plaintiff's chances of success. As the law that spawned the "plain and obvious" test makes clear, it is enough that the plaintiff has some chance of success.

50 The issues that will arise at the trial of the plaintiff's action in conspiracy will unquestionably be difficult. The plaintiff may have to make complex submissions about whether the evidence [page990] establishes that the defendants conspired either with a view to causing him harm or in circumstances where they should have known that their actions would cause him harm. He may well have to make novel arguments concerning whether it is enough that the defendants knew or ought to have known that a class of which the plaintiff was a member would suffer harm. The trial judge might conclude, as some of the defendants have submitted, that the plaintiff should have sued the defendants as joint tortfeasors rather than alleging the tort of conspiracy. But this Court's statements in Inuit Tapirisat of Canada and Operation Dismantle Inc., as well as decisions such as Dyson and Drummond-Jackson, make clear that none of these considerations may be taken into account on an application brought under Rule 19(24) of the British Columbia Rules of Court.

51 In my view, Anderson and Esson JJ.A. were entirely correct in suggesting that it should be left to the trial judge to ascertain whether the plaintiff can establish that the predominant purpose of the alleged conspiracy was to injure the plaintiff. It seems to me that they were also correct in suggesting that it should be left to the trial judge to consider the merits of any arguments that may be advanced to the effect that the "predominant purpose" test should be modified in the context of this case. Similarly, it seems to me that the argument that some of the defendants advanced, to the effect that Quebec's Business Concerns Records Act, R.S.Q. 1977, c. D-12, might limit the range of information that the defendants could produce at trial, is a matter that is not relevant to the question whether the plaintiff's statement of claim discloses a reasonable claim.

52 The fact that a pleading reveals "an arguable, difficult or important point of law" cannot justify striking out part of the statement of claim. Indeed, I would go so far as to suggest that where a statement of claim reveals a difficult and important point of law, it may well be critical that the action be allowed to proceed. Only in this way can [page991] we be sure that the common law in general, and the law of torts in particular, will continue to evolve to meet the legal challenges that arise in our modern industrial society.

53 Finally, the defendants also submit that a cause of action in conspiracy is not available when a plaintiff has available another cause of action. Since the plaintiff has alleged in paragraph 20 of his statement of claim that the defendants engaged in various tortious acts, the defendants contend that it is not open to the plaintiff to proceed with his claim in conspiracy.

54 In my view, there are at least two problems with this submission. First, while it may be arguable that if one succeeds under a distinct nominate tort against an individual defendant, then an action in conspiracy should not be available against that defendant, it is far from clear that the mere fact that a plaintiff alleges that a defendant committed other torts is a bar to pleading the tort of conspiracy. It seems to me that one can only determine whether the plaintiff should be barred from recovery under the tort of conspiracy once one ascertains whether he has established that the defendant did in fact commit the other alleged torts. And while on a motion to strike we are required to assume that the facts as pleaded are true, I do not think that it is open to us to assume that the plaintiff will necessarily succeed in persuading the court that these facts establish the commission of the other alleged nominate torts. Thus, even if one were to accept the appellants' (defendants) submission that "upon proof of the commission of the tortious acts alleged" in paragraph 20 of the plaintiff's statement of claim "the conspiracy merges with the tort", one simply could not decide whether this "merger" had taken place without first deciding whether the plaintiff had proved that the other tortious acts had been committed.

55 This brings me to the second difficulty I have with the defendants' submission. It seems to me totally inappropriate on a motion to strike out a [page992] statement of claim to get into the question whether the plaintiff's allegations concerning other nominate torts will be successful. This a matter that should be considered at trial where evidence with respect to the other torts can be led and where a fully informed decision about the applicability of the tort of conspiracy can be made in light of that evidence and the submissions of counsel. If the plaintiff is successful with respect to the other nominate torts, then the trial judge can consider the defendants' arguments about the unavailability of the tort of conspiracy. If the plaintiff is unsuccessful with respect to the other nominate torts, then the trial judge can consider whether he might still succeed in conspiracy. Regardless of the outcome, it seems to me inappropriate at this stage in the proceedings to reach a conclusion about the validity of the defendants' claims about merger. I believe that this matter is also properly left for the consideration of the trial judge.

56 In the result the appellants have not demonstrated that those portions of the respondent's statement of claim which allege the tort of conspiracy fail to disclose a reasonable claim. They should not therefore be struck out under Rule 19(24)(a) of the British Columbia Rules of Court.

JUDGMENT

A. PAZARATZ J.

- 1 When did it become illegal to ask questions? Especially in the courtroom?
- 2 And when did it become unfashionable for judges to receive answers? Especially when children's lives are at stake?
- 3 How did we lower our guard and let the words "unacceptable beliefs" get paired together? In a democracy? On the Scales of Justice?
- 4 Should judges sit back as the concept of "Judicial Notice" gets hijacked from a rule of evidence to a substitute for evidence
- 5 And is "misinformation" even a real word? Or has it become a crass, self-serving tool to pre-empt scrutiny and discredit your opponent? To de-legitimize questions and strategically avoid giving answers. Blanket denials are almost never acceptable in our adversarial system. Each party always has the onus to prove their case and yet "misinformation" has crept into the court lexicon. A childish - but sinister - way of saying "You're so wrong, I don't even have to explain why you're wrong."
- 6 What does any of this have to do with family court? Sadly, these days it has everything to do with family court.
- 7 Because when society demonizes and punishes anyone who disagrees - or even dares to ask really important questions - the resulting polarization, disrespect, and simmering anger can have devastating consequences for the mothers, fathers and children I deal with on a daily basis.

- 8 It's becoming harder for family court judges to turn enemies into friends -- when governments are so recklessly turning friends into enemies.
- 9 The motion before me is a typical - and frightening - example of how far we are drifting from cherished values.
- 10 The father wants two children ages 12 and 10 to receive COVID vaccinations. The mother is opposed.
- 11 Now, answer honestly. Did the previous paragraph give you enough information to form an opinion about how this case should turn out?
- 12 We're all weary. We all wish COVID would just go away. But pandemic fatigue is no excuse for short-cuts and lowering our standards. We all have to guard against the unconscious bias of thinking "Why won't these people just do what the government tells them to do?"
- 13 We have to decide on the basis of the best interests of each particular child in each particular fact situation.
- 14 We have to rely on - and insist upon - evidence.
- 15 In this case the evidence provided more questions than answers.
- a. The father filed two affidavits.
 - b. The mother filed one.
 - c. They both relied extensively on unsworn "exhibits", which were basically internet downloads.
 - d. In addition, the father relied on numerous downloads from the mother's social media accounts.
 - e. They both consented to my receiving these materials, to demonstrate the sources of information which each of them is relying on in formulating their respective parenting position.
- 16 The basic facts are not disputed:
- a. The mother is 34 years old. The father is 35.
 - b. They were married on November 24, 2007 and separated on June 1, 2014.
 - c. They have three children, a 14 year old son C.B.G.; a 12 year old daughter L.E.G.; and a ten year old son M.D.G..
 - d. C.B.G. resides primarily with the father. L.E.G. and M.D.G. reside primarily with the mother.
 - e. Pursuant to final order based on minutes of settlement signed October 5, 2021, the father has sole decision-making authority with respect to the oldest child. The mother has sole decision-making authority with respect to the two children who are the subject of this motion. The order requires the parties to consult with each other prior to making major decisions for the children.
 - f. When the parties signed the minutes of settlement, they already knew that they disagreed about the issue of vaccinations. The minutes of settlement specified: "The issue of the children L.E.G. and M.D.G. receiving a COVID-19 vaccine shall remain a live issue and shall be determined at a later date. The child C.B.G. can determine whether or not he wants to be vaccinated now."
 - g. In fact, earlier in the pandemic the father went to court complaining the mother was being too protective of the children when it came to COVID. In August 2020 the father brought a motion trying to compel the children to attend school in person for the 2020-2021 school year. The mother argued that the risk of COVID exposure was too high; she was particularly concerned about the oldest child's medical vulnerability as a result of his history of asthma; and she proposed remote learning for the children until the pandemic risk subsided. On September 23, 2020 Justice Bale issued a lengthy endorsement dismissing the father's motion, and confirming that the mother's position was appropriate and in the best interests of the children.

- h. In 2020 the father alleged the mother was being too protective about COVID. Now he's saying she's not protective enough. He brought a motion dated January 25, 2022 requesting that L.E.G. and M.D.G. receive the COVID vaccine and all recommended booster vaccines. He also asks that he be permitted to arrange the vaccinations and attend with the children, because he doesn't trust that the mother will comply even if she is ordered to do so.
- i. Meanwhile, soon after the parties signed Minutes in October 2021 the older child C.B.G. elected to be vaccinated. Both parents supported his decision. He's had two shots, and the parents agree he has exhibited no adverse effects.
- j. The mother insists the father is misrepresenting her position. She is not opposed to vaccines. She is offended by the pejorative term "anti-vaxxer". She has always ensured that the three children received all of their regular immunizations. She says she's open minded to vaccinating both younger children if safety concerns can be better addressed. But she says her extensive research has left her with well-founded concerns that the potential benefit of the current COVID vaccines for L.E.G. and M.D.G. is outweighed by the serious potential risks. She says there are too many unknowns, and she worries that "once children are vaxed, they can't be unvaxed."
- k. The mother notes that both children have already had COVID - with minimal symptoms - and they have recovered completely. She refers to medical research which says that since they have already recovered from COVID, the children now have greater protection from future infection.
- l. Both parents agree L.E.G. and M.D.G. are in excellent health, with no special medical needs or vulnerabilities.
- m. Neither parent provided any evidence from a medical professional about any potential positive or negative considerations with respect to these children receiving COVID vaccines.

17 The mother's evidence focused entirely on the medical and scientific issues.

18 In contrast, the father focussed extensively on labelling and discrediting the mother as a person, in a dismissive attempt to argue that her views aren't worthy of consideration.

- a. This odious trend is rapidly corrupting modern social discourse: Ridicule and stigmatize your opponent as a person, rather than dealing with the ideas they want to talk about.
- b. It seems to be working for politicians.
- c. But is this really something we want to tolerate in a court system where parental conduct and beliefs are irrelevant except as they impact on a parent's ability to meet the needs of a child?

19 For example, the father's affidavits included the following:

- a. "I am aware that the Applicant has political affiliations with the People's Party of Canada. The Applicant is entitled to her personal beliefs and ideologies, but I am very fearful that it is having a direct, negative impact on the children, especially when it comes to this vaccine issue."
- b. "I searched the Applicant's recent Facebook postings and was alarmed to see just how involved the Applicant is at perpetuating COVID-related conspiracy theories and vaccine hesitancy."
- c. He attached "a collection of some of the Applicant's Facebook postings which I believe are indicative of her personal views."

- d. "The Applicant is a self-proclaimed 'PPC founding member'. In my opinion, she is openly promoting very dangerous beliefs. Surely, these thoughts and feelings are also being promoted in her household, which is where L.E.G. and M.D.G. primarily reside."
- e. "I looked up what the PPC stance is on the COVID-19 vaccine and was not surprised to read under its website's "FACTS" section that "lockdowns, mask mandates, school closures and other authoritarian sanitary measures have not had any noticeable effect on the course of the pandemic." Unfortunately, no facts are actually provided."
- f. He attaches a copy of the PPC's COVID Policy taken from its website.
- g. "I am alarmed that the children are being exposed to the Applicant's unsupported views on the issue of the pandemic, and in particular the efficacy of the available and Government-recommended vaccines."
- h. "The Applicant's anti-vaccination stance is much more severe than that of a regular concerned parent, who is unsure whether or not she wants the children to receive a relatively new vaccine. Rather, the Applicant is leading the charge, attending anti-vaccine rallies and refusing to follow COVID protocols."
- i. He attaches a Facebook posting of the mother not wearing a mask "in a crowd of 10,000 people at a rally."
- j. He makes other references to the mother's Facebook account, and attaches numerous pictures of her social media pages.
- k. He attaches photographs of PPC leader Maxime Bernier addressing an audience.

20 Where to begin.

- a. How is any of this relevant?
 - b. Have we reached the stage where parental rights are going to be decided based on what political party you belong to?
 - c. Is being seen with Maxime Bernier - or anyone, for that matter - the kiss of death, as far as your court case is concerned?
 - d. Can you simply utter the words "conspiracy theorist" and do a mic drop?
 - e. If you allege that someone is "openly promoting very dangerous beliefs", shouldn't you provide a few details. A bit of proof, maybe?
 - f. And if you presume that a parent believes things they shouldn't believe - can you go one step further and also presume that the parent must be poisoning their children's minds with these horrible unspecified ideas? ("Surely, these thoughts and feelings are also being promoted in her household...")
 - g. The father criticizes the mother for something she didn't say. He presumes she doubts the effectiveness of school closures, and then criticizes her for providing no evidence. But on this motion she didn't raise the issue. And back in 2020 she was the one who wanted to keep the children out of school, and he fought (unsuccessfully) for them to attend. As with other allegations, the father provides no evidence of his own, and fails to address the fact that vigorous community debate led to school closures being abandoned.
 - h. How far are we willing to take "guilt by association"? If you visit a website, read a book, or attend a meeting -- are you permanently tarnished by something someone else wrote or said? At what point do the "thought police" move in?
 - i. And really, how fine is the line between "vaccine hesitancy" and "not taking any chances with your kid"? All of the caselaw says judges have to act with the utmost caution and consider all relevant evidence in determining the best interests of the child. How can we then impose a lesser standard on a demonstrably excellent parent?

21 It is of little consequence that an individual litigant chooses to advance such dubious and offensive arguments. Even though the father may not admit it, this is still a free country and people can say what they want. Including him.

22 But there's a bigger problem here. An uglier problem.

23 We're seeing more and more of this type of intolerance, vilification and dismissive character assassination in family court. Presumably we're seeing it inside the courtroom because it's rampant outside the courtroom. It now appears to be socially acceptable to denounce, punish and banish anyone who doesn't agree with you.

24 A chilling example: I recently had a case where a mother tried to cut off an equal-time father's contact with his children, primarily because he was "promoting anti-government beliefs." And in Communist China, that request would likely have been granted.

25 But this is Canada and our judicial system has an obligation to keep it Canada.

26 I won't belabor the point, because I still have to get to my real job: determining what's in the best interests of these two children. But the word needs to get out that while the court system won't punish intolerance, it certainly won't reward it either.

27 All parenting issues - including health issues - must be determined based upon the best interests of the child. Last year's amendments to the Divorce Act (applicable in this case) and the Children's Law Reform Act make it mandatory for the court to include consideration of a child's views and preferences to the extent that those views can be ascertained.

28 As Justice Mandhane stated in E.M.B. v. M.F.B. 2021 ONSC 4264 (SCJ):

60. The requirement in s. 16(3)(e) to consider the "child's views and preferences" is new and is consistent with Article 12 of the Child Rights Convention. In the Legislative Background to the Divorce Act amendments, the Department of Justice explains that:

Under Article 12 of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, children who are capable of forming their own views have the right to participate in a meaningful way in decisions that affect their lives, and parenting decisions made by judges and parents affect child directly. The weight to be given to children's views will generally increase with their age and maturity. However, in some cases, it may not be appropriate to involve the children, for example if they are too young to meaningfully participate.

See also: Official Report of Debates (Hansard), 42nd Parl., 1st Sess., No. 326 (26 September 2018) at p. 21866 (Hon. Jody Wilson-Raybould).

61. A human rights-based approach fundamentally recognizes children as subjects of law rather than objects of their parents. Making children more visible in legal proceedings that affect their rights is fundamentally important in Canada because children are not guaranteed legal representation in family law proceedings. Therefore, in my view, even where there is no direct evidence about the child's views and preferences, s. 16(3)(e) still requires the court should make a reasonable effort to glean and articulate the child's views and preferences wherever possible, considering the child's age and maturity and all the other evidence before it.

29 In this case, the children's views have been independently ascertained -- they both don't want to receive the COVID vaccines - but the father is asking me to ignore how they feel and force them to be vaccinated against their will. The background:

- a. In 2021, in an effort to resolve parenting issues, the parties enlisted a well-respected local social worker, Michelle Hayes, to prepare a "Voice of the Child Report". The father filed Hayes' comprehensive seven-page report dated June 22, 2021.
- b. For purposes of that report the children were each interviewed twice - once in the care of each parent.
- c. During the interview period the mother and father had clearly identified their respective positions on vaccination. The report specifically addressed each child's views on the topic.
- d. L.E.G. advised that she had discussed vaccinations with each parent privately. She knew her father favoured getting the shot and her mother didn't. L.E.G. specifically explained to Hayes the reasons why she didn't want to receive the COVID vaccines. She explained herself in some detail.
- e. Similarly, M.D.G. had discussed vaccinations with each parent privately. He also knew his father promoted vaccination and his mother didn't. M.D.G. not only told Hayes he didn't want to be vaccinated, but he said he was "fearful that his father would make him." Indeed, M.D.G. told Hayes that "he wanted the judge to know his thoughts about his parenting schedule as well as the vaccine."
- f. The mother says her children are mature and intelligent, and that they have come to their own conclusions without being pressured by either parent. She feels it is important to respect their clear wishes, comfort level and anxieties. She says she adopted the same position for her older son C.B.G., and when he decided he wanted to be vaccinated she was fully supportive.
- g. The father says at ages 12 and 10 the children are too young to make an informed decision about this. He admits both children have expressed fear of the COVID vaccine. He suggests the younger child's views are wavering. But he's opposed to either child being interviewed again. No matter what the children say, he doesn't think the court should listen, because he feels the mother has planted these ideas in their minds. But he offered no proof of any coaching, manipulation or inappropriate statement by the mother.
- h. Hayes' June 22, 2021 report was actually a follow-up to an earlier report she prepared on March 3, 2020. She has worked with the family for a long time and got to know the children quite well. The social worker expressed no concerns or suspicions about either child being manipulated or pressured by either parent. In her summary she stated: "As in the original report, each of the children presented confidently and thoughtfully for both interviews. As they reviewed their thoughts, they each showed consistency in their views and preferences in each interview."

30 While I agree with the father that these two children are not old enough to decide this complicated issue for themselves, I disagree with his suggestion that we should completely ignore how they feel about what they experience and what their bodies are subjected to. Rather than simplistically accept or reject what children say they want, the court must engage in a complex and sensitive analysis of the weight to be attributed to each child's stated views.

31 In Decaen v. Decaen, 2013 ONCA 218 the Court of Appeal set out the factors to consider when assessing a child's wishes:

- a. Whether both parents are able to provide adequate care;
- b. How clear and unambivalent the wishes are;
- c. How informed the expression is;
- d. The age of the child;
- e. The maturity level;

- f. The strength of the wish;
 - g. The length of time the preference has been expressed;
- h. Practicalities;
 - i. The influence of the parent(s) on the expressed wish or preference;
- j. The overall context; and
 - k. The circumstances of the preferences from the child's point of view.

32 With respect to L.E.G. and M.D.G.:

- a. They have received all their regular immunizations. At ages 12 and 10 they understand the experience of getting needles. And they understand the purpose of vaccinations is to create a long-term medical consequence in their body.
- b. They understand the magnitude of the COVID pandemic, and the personal and community health issues involved.
- c. They understand the extended and ongoing discussion about the COVID vaccine.
- d. They have both clearly and consistently stated their objection to receiving the COVID vaccine.
- e. They have both outlined very specific reasons for their decision. Those reasons do not appear to be frivolous, superficial or poorly thought out.
- f. Both children have sufficient age, intelligence, maturity and independence of thought to understand the issue and formulate their own views, feelings, comfort level, questions, and fears about what should or should not happen to their bodies.
- g. They hold these views very strongly.
 - h. They have maintained these views for an extended period of time.
 - i. Despite the father's speculation, there is no evidence that the mother has inappropriately drawn the children into any sort of personal or political agenda. Both parents have equally engaged in appropriate and necessary discussions with the children about the many aspects of the pandemic - including vaccinations. Both parents have answered the children's questions, provided information, and stated their own beliefs. The social worker's report gives no suggestion that either parent has pressured, manipulated, or unduly influenced either child. Nor did Hayes express any concern about internal inconsistencies or ambiguities with respect to either child's strongly stated views.

33 For the past two years all children have been bombarded with all sorts of information about the pandemic. It has become an inescapable, oppressive part of their daily lives. Mental health experts regularly warn us that we need to be mindful of the emotional impact of this scary new world on the young mind.

34 In this case, the father doesn't like what the children are saying, so he submits their views aren't worthy of consideration - just as he submits the mother's views aren't worthy of consideration. There's a bit of a pattern here.

35 But when a ten-year-old child says he's afraid he'll be forced to take the vaccine - and he specifically wants the judge to know it - I don't think that's something the court can or should ignore.

36 Children may not have wisdom. But they have Charter rights and undeniable emotions.

37 Any best interests analysis must take into account all relevant factors, including the impact on a child's mental health if their legitimate and powerful feelings and anxieties are ignored; and if they perceive they are being violated.

38 A number of recent court decisions have grappled with this new "COVID vaccine" issue, and in particular with the issue of the weight to be given to children's views on the subject. In most of those cases the children were younger than L.E.G. and M.D.G., so "views and preferences" were either unascertainable or less relevant because of the child's lack of maturity.

39 In McDonald v. Oates 2022 ONSC 394 (SCJ) the court disregarded a ten-year-old's views, concluding that the child was unable to make an informed choice due to the contradictory information the child was receiving from his parents.

- a. But unlike the situation with 10-year-old M.D.G., in McDonald there was no independent information as to the nature or strength of the child's views, and the court declined to order a Voice of the Child Report, to avoid delay.
- b. Here I had the benefit of a thorough and highly informative Voice of the Child Report.
- c. And unlike McDonald, as discussed below, I find that the objecting parent's concerns cannot be dismissed as frivolous or uninformed.
- d. More to the point I find that there is no evidence that either M.D.G. or L.E.G. have been unduly influenced by either their pro-vaccine or anti-vaccine parent. I am satisfied that they came to their own conclusions, for understandable reasons.

40 In Saint-Phard v. Saint-Phard 2021 ONSC 6910 (SCJ) the court overruled a 13-year-old's opposition to vaccinations, as conveyed through the child's lawyer.

- a. Again, the child's situation was quite different from L.E.G. and M.D.G..
- b. In Saint-Phard the child had made inconsistent and ambiguous statements; he had been misinformed by a physician; and the court concluded he was incapable of making an informed decision.

41 In Rouse v. Howard 2022 ONCJ 23 (OCJ) Justice Hilliard provided a thoughtful analysis of facts more similar to the case at bar - even though the child in question was only nine.

17 Although Fiona is only 9, there is evidence before me that she is, at present, opposed to receiving the COVID-19 vaccine. In A.C. v. L.L., [2021] O.J. No. 4992, Justice Charney considered section 4 of the Health Care Consent Act, 1996, S.O. 1996, c. 2 (HCCA), in his analysis as to whether the mother's consent was even required for the children to be vaccinated. Justice Charney noted that the HCCA does not provide any minimum age for capacity to make medical treatment decisions. That finding accords with the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in A.C. v Manitoba (Director of Child and Family Services), 2009 SCC 30, wherein Justice Abella explained the common law "mature minor" doctrine at paragraph 47:

The doctrine addresses the concern that young people should not automatically be deprived of the right to make decisions affecting their medical treatment. It provides instead that the right to make those decisions varies in accordance with the young person's level of maturity, with the degree to which maturity is scrutinized intensifying in accordance with the severity of the potential consequences of the treatment or of its refusal.

18 Unlike in A.C., where the children wanted to be vaccinated, and Saint-Phard where the child only expressed opposition to being vaccinated after the influence of the mother and her doctor, Fiona's views about vaccination appear to be long-standing and in accordance with her mother's beliefs about vaccines in general. An order granting Mr. Rouse decision-making authority would result in Mr. Rouse having the ability to override Fiona's right to withhold her consent to vaccination which may have negative emotional and/or psychological consequences.

42 The determination of any child's best interests is a fact-specific exercise, based on the evidence presented - and tested - in each case. As stated, an important - but not determinative - part of the analysis consideration of each child's views and preferences.

- a. In each of the recent cases where a child's stated opposition to being vaccinated was overridden, the court made unfavourable findings with respect to the objecting parent's rationale and their inappropriate influence over the child.
- b. The court concluded that the pro-vaccine parent had presented more reasonable information to the child, and more compelling arguments to the court in relation to the science.
- c. In each case the court was left with more confidence in the pro-vaccine parent's parental judgment and insight on the issue of vaccinations.

43 But that's not at all what I'm dealing with in this case.

- a. Despite the father's relentless campaign to dismiss the mother as some sort of lunatic, the reality is that the mother presented all her evidence and made all her oral submissions in a calm, mature, articulate, analytical, extensively researched, and entirely child-focussed manner. She is to be commended for her skillful and professional presentation as a self-represented party.
- b. In contrast, the father came across as somewhat dogmatic, intolerant and paternalistic. He focussed more on discrediting the mother's ideas rather than explaining his own. And his shameless efforts to vilify the mother by ridiculing her personal beliefs bordered on hysterical.
- c. I mention this to further explain why I have confidence that the mother has not inappropriately influenced the children to adopt their current views.
- d. If the mother explained herself to the children the way she explained herself to me...and if the father explained himself to the children the way he explained himself to me...then I have absolutely no doubt about which of the parents communicated with the children in a more responsible manner.

44 Finally, we have the other "evidence" filed by the parents. And here we have to think carefully about what constitutes proper or sufficient evidence - and how we should apply it.

45 As with all the other recent COVID vaccine cases, the mother and the father attached dozens of pages of internet downloads to their affidavits. The fact that they both consented to my receiving all this unsworn material doesn't make it properly admissible. But at the very least, it informs me as to the type and quality of research each parent conducted in formulating their respective positions.

46 Included among the father's downloads from the internet:

- a. November 23, 2021 seven page "Position Statement" from the Canadian Paediatric Society.

- b. January 2022 five page "Caring for Kids" information sheet from the Canadian Paediatric Society.

- c. December 17, 2021 nine-page "Vaccines for Children: COVID 19" information sheet from the Government of Canada.
A

- d. September 24, 2021 five-page "Post COVID-19 Condition" information sheet from the Government of Canada.
A

- e. May 18, 2021 seven-page "Vaccines for children: Deciding to Vaccinate" information sheet from the Government of Canada.

- f. A May 6, 2021 three-page "The Facts About COVID-19 Vaccines" information sheet from the Government of Canada.

- g. January 20, 2022 four-page article entitled "Vaccinated kids half as likely to get Omicron but protection fades fast" from The Times of Israel.

- h. January 14, 2022 five page article entitled "COVID-19 Cases and Hospitalizations Surge Among Children" from the Canada Communicable Disease Report.

47 Included among the mother's downloads from the internet:

- a. June 25, 2021 eight-page "Fact Sheet" issued by Pfizer, the manufacturer of one of the vaccines being proposed by the father.

- b. An August 26, 2021 three-page article from the journal "Science" entitled "Having SARS-CoV-2 once confers much greater immunity than a vaccine - but vaccination remains vital."

- c. January 31, 2012 13-page PLOS One peer-reviewed article entitled "Immunization with SARS Coronavirus Vaccines Leads to Pulmonary Immunopathology on Challenge with the SARS virus."

- d. July 10, 2021 five-page article in the medical journal "Total Health" entitled "Are people getting full facts on COVID vaccine risks?"
- e. September 26, 2018 15 page article in the medical journal "Contagion Live" entitled "High Rates of Adverse Events Linked with 2009 H1N1 Pandemic vaccine".
- f. A May 28, 2021 two-page article from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) entitled "Clinical Considerations: Myocarditis and Pericarditis after Receipt of mRNA COVID-19 Vaccines Among Adolescents and Young Adults."
- g. An August 1, 2020 29 page research paper published by eClinicalMedicine entitled "A country level analysis measuring the impact of government actions, country preparedness and socioeconomic factors on COVID -19 mortality and related health outcomes."
- h. June 9, 2021 10 page open letter from The Evidence-Based Medicine Consultancy Ltd. research organization entitled "Urgent Preliminary report of Yellow Card data up to May 26, 2021".
- i. A June 22, 2021 14 page article from the World Health Organization entitled "COVID-19 advise for the public: Get vaccinated".

48 Information obtained from the internet can be admissible if it is accompanied by indicia of reliability, including, but not limited to:

- a. Whether the information comes from an official website from a well-known organization;
- b. Whether the information is capable of being verified;
- c. Whether the source is disclosed so that the objectivity of the person or organization posting the material can be assessed.

ITV Technologies Inc. v. WIC Television Ltd. 2003 FC 1056; Sutton v. Ramos 2017 ONSC 3181 (SCJ)

49 Where the threshold of "admissibility" is met, it is still up to the trier of fact to weigh and assess the information to determine the relevance, if any, with respect to the issues to be decided.

50 And since this is a motion proceeding by affidavit, we have the further limitation that even to the extent that the internet downloads are admissible, there is no opportunity for cross-examination or testing.

51 To simplify matters, the mother does not deny the authenticity or integrity of the website information submitted by the father.

- a. It's mostly statements by the Government of Canada and the Canadian Pediatric Society recommending that children should receive COVID vaccinations.
- b. These are the same types of downloads which courts have considered in other recent COVID vaccine cases.
- c. The mother doesn't deny that these are reputable organizations. Nor does she deny that the statements and information have been prepared by qualified persons in a responsible, professional manner.
- d. She doesn't deny that the father has accurately presented one side of the story.
- e. All she asks is that the court equally consider the other side of the story. That the court allow both sides of the story to be equally presented, tested and considered. Before making an irreversible decision for her children.

52 Evidence and both sides of the story. We're in deep trouble if those become antiquated concepts.

53 In almost all cases where COVID vaccinations have been ordered the court has made a finding that, on the face of it, the internet materials presented by the objecting parent have been grossly deficient, unreliable and - at times - dubious. This lack of an equally credible counter-point to government recommendations may well have been determinative in those earlier cases.

54 But what if the objecting parent presents evidence which potentially raises some serious questions or doubts about the necessity, benefits or potential harm of COVID vaccines for children?

- a. Clearly we shouldn't be too quick to embrace the naysayers.
- b. But should we banish them? Without hearing from them?
- c. Should we stifle and forbid a reasonable opportunity to present and test evidence, and make submissions?
- d. There are obvious public policy reasons to avoid recklessly undermining confidence in public health measures.
- e. But that has to be weighed against our unbridled obligation to leave no stone unturned, when it comes to protecting children.

55 For example, the mother presented a detailed fact sheet from Pfizer. This isn't one of the fringe websites dismissed in the other cases. It's Pfizer! The people who make the vaccine.

56 Under the heading "What Are The Risks of the Pfizer-BioNTech COVID-19 Vaccine", the company says:

There is a remote chance that the Pfizer-BioNTech COVID-19 Vaccine could cause a severe allergic reaction. A severe allergic reaction would usually occur within a few minutes to one hour after getting a dose of the Pfizer-BioNTech COVID-19 Vaccine. For this reason, your vaccination provider may ask you to stay at the place where you received your vaccine for monitoring after vaccination. Signs of a severe allergic reaction can include:

- * Difficulty breathing
- * Swelling of your face and throat
- * A fast heartbeat
- * A bad rash all over your body

* Dizziness and weakness

Myocarditis (inflammation of the heart muscle) and pericarditis (inflammation of the lining outside the heart) have occurred in some people who have received the Pfizer-BioNTech COVID-19 Vaccine. In most of these people, symptoms began within a few days following receipt of the second dose of the Pfizer-BioNTech COVID-19 Vaccine. The chance of having this occur is very low. You should seek medical attention right away if you have any of the following symptoms after receiving the Pfizer-BioNTech COVID-19 Vaccine:

* Chest pain

* Shortness of breath

- * Feelings of having a fast-beating, fluttering, or pounding heart.

Side effects that have been reported with the Pfizer-BioNTech COVID-19 Vaccine include:

* severe allergic reactions

- * non-severe allergic reactions such as rash, itching, hives, or swelling of the face

* myocarditis (inflammation of the heart muscle)

- * pericarditis (inflammation of the lining outside the heart)

* injection site pain

* tiredness

* headache

* muscle pain

* chills

* joint pain

* fever

* injection site swelling

* injection site redness

* nausea

* feeling unwell

* swollen lymph nodes (lymphadenopathy)

* diarrhea

* vomiting

* arm pain

These may not be all the possible side effects of the Pfizer-BioNTech COVID-19 Vaccine. Serious and unexpected side effects may occur. Pfizer-BioNTech COVID-19 Vaccine is still being studied in clinical trials.

57 It's very hard to fault a parent for being worried about such an ominous list of potentially very serious side effects.

58 Several of the earlier decisions requiring children to be vaccinated have noted that the evidence presented by the objecting parent was not reliable because the authors' credentials were either not-established or non-existent.

59 But in this case, none of the materials presented by the mother are from fringe organizations or dubious authors. To the contrary, the mother quotes extensively from leaders in the medical and scientific community.

60 For example, the article submitted by the mother "Are People Getting Full Facts on COVID Vaccine Risks?" quotes Dr. Robert W. Malone, the inventor of the mRNA vaccine. Whether he is right or wrong about the current use of COVID vaccines is a matter for discussion and determination. But with his credentials, he can hardly be dismissed as a crackpot or fringe author. The mother referred to the following excerpt from the article:

The original inventor of the mRNA vaccine (and DNA vaccine) core platform technology currently used to create the vaccines is Dr Robert W Malone. Dr Malone has been expressing serious concerns about how therapeutic approaches that are still in the research phase are being imposed on an ill-informed public. He says that public health leadership has, "stepped over the line and is now violating the bedrock principles which form the foundation upon which the ethics of clinical research are built".

Dr Malone asks why health leaders seem to be so afraid of sharing the adverse event data. He says, "Why is it necessary to suppress discussion and full disclosure of information concerning mRNA reactogenicity and safety risks?"

He goes onto say that we should be analysing the safety data and risks vigorously. Again he asks, "Is there information or patterns that can be found, such as the recent finding of the cardiomyopathy signals, or the latent virus reactivation signals? We should be enlisting the best biostatistics and machine learning experts to examine these data, and the results should -- no must -- be made available to the public promptly".

For any drug it has always been important to have systems in place for monitoring adverse events. However, for an experimental, genetic modifying approach that has not been fully tested, and where the public are effectively the guinea pigs, this information should be immediately and readily available. As previously reported...the fact that it is so difficult to access and make sense of ...reporting systems - along with low reporting simply raises further concern about what is actually happening.

Dr Malone says, " .. what is being done by suppressing open disclosure and debate concerning the profile of adverse events associated with these vaccines violates fundamental bioethical principles for clinical research".

With regard to the use and abuse of misinformation, the inventor of these vaccines says that the public have to be given accurate information to allow informed consent. He says, "The suppression of information, discussion, and outright censorship concerning these current COVID vaccines which are based on gene therapy technologies cast a bad light on the entire vaccine enterprise. It is my opinion that the adult public can handle information and open discussion. Furthermore, we must fully disclose any and all risks associated with these experimental research products".

In short, it is simply not possible to arrive at a position of informed consent unless you have access to the full facts around your options and the associated risks and benefits.

61 The same article outlines other serious concerns about COVID vaccines expressed by Dr. Bret Weinstein, Dr. Peter McCullough, Dr. Tess Lawrie, Professor Stanley S. Levinson (medicine, endocrinology, diabetes and metabolism) and Professor Sucharit Bhakdi (awarded the Order of Merit for medical microbiology). These are well-known leaders in their fields.

62 Several other articles presented by the mother outline similar expressions of concern about the COVID vaccines from equally qualified and reputable sources worldwide.

63 For clarity:

- a. I am not for one moment suggesting that we should presume the mother's experts are right.
- b. But once we determine they're not crackpots and charlatans, how can we presume that they are wrong? Or that they couldn't possibly be right about any of their warnings?
- c. When children's lives are at stake, how can we ignore credible warnings?

64 The following paragraphs from Saint-Phard v. Saint-Phard 2021 ONSC 6910 (SCJ) illustrate the approach which has been taken in a number of cases in which COVID vaccinations were approved by the court.

4 The decision to be made is governed by the best interests of the child: A.C. v. L.L., 2021 ONSC 6530. It is required to be based on findings of fact made from admissible evidence before the court: O.M.S. v. E.J.S., 2021 CarswellSask 547 (Q.B.); B.C.J.B. v. E.-R.R.R., 2021 CarswellOnt 13242 (S.C.J.).

Judicial notice may be taken

5 Facts may be found by taking judicial notice: B.C.J.B. v. E.-R.R.R., A.P. v. L.K., 2021 ONSC 150, and A.C. v. L.L. Each of these cases include findings related to the safety and efficacy of publicly funded vaccines on the basis of judicial notice. For example, in A.C. v. L.L. at paragraphs 21, 23 and 25 the court made the following findings by taking judicial notice under the public documents' exception to the hearsay rule:

- * The COVID-19 vaccination has been approved for children aged 12-17.
- * All levels of government have been actively promoting vaccination against COVID-19 and expending significant resources to make it available to the public.
- * The safety and efficacy of the COVID-19 vaccine has been endorsed by governments and public health agencies.
- * The Ontario Ministry of Health website states that Pfizer-BioNTech vaccine is now licensed by Health Canada for adolescents aged 12 years and older, has been proven to be safe in clinical trials and provided excellent efficacy in adolescents, and that NACI continues to strongly recommend a complete series with an MNRA vaccine for all eligible individuals in Canada, including those 12 years of age and older, as the known and potential benefits outweigh the known and potential risks.

6 Elyon's father relied on statements made by Dr. Tam, Chief Officer of Health for Canada on the Canadian Government website recommending COVID-19 vaccinations for those between the ages of 12 and 17, stating that thorough testing has determined the vaccines to be safe and effective at preventing severe illness, hospitalization, and death from COVID-19. Dr. Kieran Moore is the Chief Medical Officer for Ontario. The father tendered his recommendation to vaccinate all youth ages 12 to 17 against COVID-19 as set out in a publication by the Ontario COVID-19 Science Advisory Table. Elyon's school is administered under the Ottawa Catholic School Board. That Board released a notice advising that all students over age 12 are eligible to be vaccinated for COVID-19 and stating that the vaccine is key in protecting schools from the virus.

7 Relying on these public documents and the authority of the court in A.C. v. L.L., I find that the applicable government authorities have concluded that the COVID-19 vaccination is safe and effective for children ages 12-17 to prevent severe illness from COVID-19 and have encouraged eligible children to be vaccinated.

65 And that's really what many of these cases come down to: After considering all the evidence - or often, the lack of evidence - can the court just fill in the blanks and take judicial notice of the fact that all children should get vaccinated?

- a. Because if the answer is "yes", then we're wasting a lot of time and judicial resources.
- b. If judges just "know" that all children should be vaccinated, then we should clearly say that that's what we're doing.
- c. But equally, if that's not what we're supposed to be doing....then we shouldn't do it.

66 In R.S.P. v. H.L.C. 2021 ONSC 8362 (SCJ) Justice Breithaupt Smith recently set out a timely warning about the danger of applying judicial notice to cases where expert opinion is unclear or in dispute. It's a warning I wholeheartedly adopt:

56 Unfortunately, the recent case of *Saint-Phard v. Saint-Phard*¹⁴ does not assist in navigating medical treatment for minors because of its fatal flaw regarding judicial notice. In that case, the Court wrote: "Facts may be found by taking judicial notice. [citations omitted] Each of these cases include findings related to the safety and efficacy of publicly funded vaccines on the basis of judicial notice." This shows a misunderstanding of the purpose of taking judicial notice, which, according to the Supreme Court's definitive decision in R. v. Find 2001 SCC 32 (CanLII) (at paragraph 48) is intended to avoid unnecessary litigation over facts that are:

...clearly uncontroversial or beyond reasonable dispute. Facts judicially noticed are not proved by evidence under oath. Nor are they tested by cross-examination. Therefore, the threshold for judicial notice is strict: a court may properly take judicial notice of facts that are either: (1) so notorious or generally accepted as not to be the subject of debate among reasonable persons; or (2) capable of immediate and accurate demonstration by resort to readily accessible sources of indisputable accuracy.

57 Judicial notice of the facts contained in government publications are "capable of immediate and accurate demonstration by resort to readily accessible sources of indisputable accuracy." Such facts could include, for example, that there are two time zones in the Province of Ontario or that there were two deaths and 39 Intensive Care Unit admissions among Ontario children from January 15, 2020 to June 30, 2021 connected with SARS-CoV-2.

58 Judicial notice cannot be taken of expert opinion evidence. Chief Justice McLachlin for the unanimous Court in R. v. Find underscored that: "Expert evidence is by definition neither notorious nor capable of immediate and accurate demonstration. This is why it must be proved through an expert whose qualifications are accepted by the court and who is available for cross-examination" (at paragraph 49).

59 The acceptance of government-issued statements as evidence renders the facts published by the government agency (presumed to be a source of indisputable accuracy) admissible. Public Health Ontario's statement that two children died of SARS-CoV-2 between January 15, 2020 and June 30, 2021 is therefore admissible as fact. Public Health Ontario's publicly accessible document is admissible as proof of the truth of its contents. In contrast, a statement concerning the safety and efficacy of any medication in the prevention or treatment of any condition is, in and of itself, an opinion. Judicial notice cannot be taken of the opinion of any expert or government official that a medical treatment is "safe and effective." As judicial notice cannot be taken of expert opinion evidence, it is illogical to reason, as was done at paragraph 12 of Saint-Phard , that an expert's "objections raised against the vaccine were directly countered by the judicial notice taken that the vaccine is safe and effective and provides beneficial protection against the virus to those in this age group." To compound the problem, this statement draws a conclusion that is overbroad (i.e. that the vaccine provides beneficial protection to all children and ought therefore to be received by the child in question) without having considered the comparative analysis of the factors in A.C. v. Manitoba 2009 SCC 30 (CanLII). As a result, reliance upon this reasoning would be misguided.

60 In submissions, I was also referred to the case of A.C. v. L.L. 2021 ONSC 6530 (SCJ) in which both parents agreed that each of their three teenage children would be permitted to make his or her own decision with respect to the COVID-19 vaccination. Two of the three children chose to have it administered and one did not. While the Court made many very concerning and overly broad comments, all are obiter dicta. None were relevant to the result ultimately reached, namely that both parents acknowledged each child's maturity in choosing whether or not to participate in the medical procedure and agreed to allow each child to make his or her own choice. With the parents having agreed upon that point, the Court was no longer obligated to make any finding as to whether receipt of the COVID-19 vaccine was in the best interests of any of the children. As the parents had agreed to respect the decisions made by their children, one of whom declined the COVID-19 vaccine, is that child now in breach of the Court's determination, at paragraph 32, that vaccination is in that child's best interests? Of what utility is the declaration in the Order portion of the decision that "[all three] children ... shall be entitled to receive the COVID-19 vaccine"? In family litigation, unsolicited judicial opinions on parenting questions already solved by the parents serve no one. I am reminded of Justice Abella's warning that: "[the analysis of a child's maturity in making medical decisions] does not mean ... that the standard is a license for the indiscriminate application of judicial discretion" A.C. v. Manitoba (paragraphs 90-91). Thus, while I commend the parents in A.C. v. L.L. for resolving the issue of each child's ability to make his or her own decision, the case itself does not assist this Court.

67 Why should we be so reluctant to take judicial notice that the government is always right?

- a. Did the Motherisk inquiry teach us nothing about blind deference to "experts"? Thousands of child protection cases were tainted - and lives potentially ruined - because year after year courts routinely accepted and acted upon substance abuse testing which turned out to be incompetent.
- b. What about the Residential School system? For decades the government assured us that taking Indigenous children away - and being wilfully blind to their abuse - was the right thing to do. We're still finding children's bodies.
- c. How about sterilizing Eskimo women? The same thing. The government knew best.
- d. Japanese and Chinese internment camps during World War Two? The government told us it was an emergency and had to be done. Emergencies can be used by governments to justify a lot of things that later turn out to be wrong.
- e. Few people remember Thalidomide. It was an experimental drug approved by Canada and countries throughout the world in the late 1950's. It was supposed to treat cancer and some skin conditions. Instead it caused thousands of birth defects and dead babies before it was withdrawn from the market. But for a period of time government experts said it was perfectly safe.
- f. On social issues the government has fared no better. For more than a century, courts took judicial notice of the fact that it was ridiculous to think two people of the same sex could get married. At any given moment, how many active complaints are before the courts across the Country, alleging government breaches of Charter Rights? These are vitally important debates which need to be fully canvassed.

- g. The list of grievous government mistakes and miscalculations is both endless and notorious. Catching and correcting those mistakes is one of the most important functions of an independent judiciary.
- h. And throughout history, the people who held government to account have always been regarded as heroes - not subversives.
- i. When our government serially pays out billions of dollars to apologize for unthinkable historic violations of human rights and security - how can we possibly presume that today's government "experts" are infallible?
- j. Nobody is infallible.
 - k. And nobody who controls other people's lives - children's lives - should be beyond scrutiny, or impervious to review.

68 As well, how can you take judicial notice of a moving target?

- a. During the past two years of the pandemic, governments around the world - and within Canada - have constantly changed their health directives about what we should or shouldn't be doing. What works and what doesn't.
- b. And the changes and uncertainty are accelerating with each passing newscast. Not a day goes by that we don't hear about COVID policies changing and restrictions being lifted.
- c. Government experts sound so sure of themselves in recommending the current vaccines.
- d. But they were equally sure when they told us to line up for AstraZeneca. Now they don't even mention that word.
- e. Even Pfizer has changed its mind. It recently approved vaccines for kids under five. Then more recently the company changed its mind.
- f. None of this is meant a criticism. Everyone is doing their best with a new and constantly evolving health crisis.
- g. But how can judges take judicial notice of "facts" where there's no consensus or consistency?

69 And then we have the issue of delegation.

- a. As with almost all these vaccine motions, the father asks for an order that his children receive the current COVID vaccine "and all recommended booster vaccines."
- b. Which recommended booster vaccines?
- c. When?
- d. How many?
- e. What will they contain?
- f. Who will decide?
 - g. Will there be any opportunity for future judicial oversight, or will this simply be a forever commitment controlled by the government.
 - h. What are the health implications if children receive the current vaccine, but skip some or all of the boosters?
 - i. What future COVID variant will the boosters guard against? We already seem to be using the Delta vaccine to fight the Omicron variant. Will future boosters continue our pattern of using old medicine to fight new viruses?
 - j. These are all valid questions, requiring answers which are currently unavailable.

- k. It is improper for the court to pre-determine future medical treatments at unknown times, in unknown circumstances, with decision making authority delegated to unknown persons.
- l. If you can't take judicial notice of the present, you can't take judicial notice of the future.

70 As well, there is a systemic issue common to most of these COVID vaccine cases.

- a. The father presented his expert evidence.
- b. The mother then presented her expert evidence.
 - c. The father responded that the mother's theories have already been "debunked" - so we shouldn't waste time talking about them.
 - d. Alleging that your opponent's position has already been debunked is a common tactic these days.
- e. And quite effective.
 - f. Because unlike stare decisis - the doctrine of precedent which requires judges to follow specifically cited earlier court decisions - there is no such formality to the concept of debunking.
 - g. All you have to do is make the blanket assertion that an opposing view has already been debunked - without providing any details - and hope that nobody asks for proof.
 - h. In this case, I reject the father's claim that all of the mother's concerns about COVID vaccines have already been properly considered and disproven, in a process adhering to natural justice, conducted by an appropriate judicial body.
 - i. Quite to the contrary, I have not been able to find any indication - in the father's evidence or in the body of COVID vaccine case law - that allegedly debunked theories have ever been properly considered or tested. In any court. Anywhere.

71 In a complex, important, and emotional case like this, it is important to remember the court's mandate:

- a. I am not being asked to make a scientific determination. I am being asked to make a parenting determination.
- b. I am not being asked to decide whether vaccines are good or bad.
- c. I am not being asked to decide if either parent is good or bad.
- d. My task is to determine which parent is to have decision-making authority over L.E.G. and M.D.G. with respect to the very specific and narrow issue of COVID vaccinations. Each parent has clearly identified how they would exercise such decision-making authority.

72 Pursuant to the recent, final, consent order, the two children reside primarily with the mother.

- a. She has sole decision-making authority on all issues - with the exception that the parties deferred the issue of decision-making in relation to COVID vaccinations.
- b. The father suggests there should be an inference that the mother was deliberately deprived of authority over this particular issue, because she could not be trusted to make the right decision.
- c. I am not prepared to make any such an inference.
 - d. Both parents showed commendable maturity and insight in negotiating comprehensive minutes of settlement on all but one of the issues.
- e. I interpret the minutes of settlement as leaving it open for the court to consider vaccinations as a stand-alone issue, to be determined solely based on the best interests of the children, and without either parent having any presumptive advantage or disadvantage in the determination.

73 With respect to the mother and father:

- a. I find that they are both excellent parents.
 - b. The father has shown excellent parenting skills and familiarity with respect to the oldest child C.B.G. who is doing well in his care.
 - c. The mother has shown excellent parenting skills and familiarity with respect to L.E.G. and M.D.G. who are doing well in her care.

74 With respect to the children L.E.G. and M.D.G.:

- a. I find that they are both intelligent, mature, articulate and insightful with respect to their place both within the family and within the community.
 - b. Both children are healthy. Their medical needs have always been properly addressed.
- c. I received no professional or other evidence to suggest that there are any specific medical condition or issue which either favours or disfavours vaccination.
- d. I find that both children have very specific, strongly held and independently formulated views about COVID vaccinations. Those views have been verified independently by an experienced social worker who would be alive to the possibility of parental influence or interference.
- e. While the mother has strongly held views on the subject, the father has equally strongly held views. It is both understandable and appropriate that each parent has discussed the issue with each child. I find that while each parent has expressed their preference and view on the topic, neither parent has pressured or manipulated the children.

- f. I am confident that each child's view has been clear, consistent, thoughtful, and entirely understandable in all the circumstances.

75 Section 16(1) of the Divorce Act provides that the court shall take into consideration only the best interests of a child when making a parenting order or a contact order.

76 Section 16(2) says when considering best interest factors, primary consideration is to be given to the child's physical, emotional and psychological safety, security and well-being. Pierre v. Pierre, 2021 ONSC 5650 (SCJ).

77 Section 16(3) sets out a list of factors for the court to consider in considering the circumstances of a child and determining best interests:

16(3) Factors to be considered

In determining the best interests of the child, the court shall consider all factors related to the circumstances of the child, including

- (a) the child's needs, given the child's age and stage of development, such as the child's need for stability;
- (b) the nature and strength of the child's relationship with each spouse, each of the child's siblings and grandparents and any other person who plays an important role in the child's life;
- (c) each spouse's willingness to support the development and maintenance of the child's relationship with the other spouse;
- (d) the history of care of the child;
- (e) the child's views and preferences, giving due weight to the child's age and maturity, unless they cannot be ascertained;
- (f) the child's cultural, linguistic, religious and spiritual upbringing and heritage, including Indigenous upbringing and heritage;
- (g) any plans for the child's care;
- (h) the ability and willingness of each person in respect of whom the order would apply to care for and meet the needs of the child;
- (i) the ability and willingness of each person in respect of whom the order would apply to communicate and cooperate, in particular with one another, on matters affecting the child;
- (j) any family violence and its impact on, among other things,
 - (i) the ability and willingness of any person who engaged in the family violence to care for and meet the needs of the child, and
 - (ii) the appropriateness of making an order that would require persons in respect of whom the order would apply to cooperate on issues affecting the child; and
- (k) any civil or criminal proceeding, order, condition, or measure that is relevant to the safety, security and well-being of the child.

78 I find that the combination of sections 16(2) ("the child's physical, emotional and psychological safety, security and well-being") and 16(3)(e) ("the child's views and preferences...") require that significant weight should be given to each child's stated views and requests. I would be very concerned that any attempt to ignore either child's views on such a deeply personal and invasive issue would risk causing serious emotional harm and upset.

79 With respect to the positions advanced by each parent.

- a. I respect the father's decision to be guided by government and health protocols.

- b. I think the father did himself a disservice by focussing so much of his case on dismissive personal attacks on the mother. Those attacks are not only misguided and mean-spirited. They raise doubts about his insight with respect to the vaccine issue - and they also raise doubts about his appreciation of the nature and quality of the important relationship between the mother (as primary resident parent) and the children.

- c. I equally respect the mother's decision to make exhaustive efforts to inform herself about the vaccination issue.

- d. I find that the mother took a reasonable approach in acknowledging the strengths of the pro-vaccine materials, while at the same time attempting to reconcile them with contrary viewpoints and warnings issued by equally competent and credible medical professionals.

- e. I find that the mother's position is more reasonable and helpful in that she invites discussion and exploration of both sides of the story, while the father seeks to suppress it.

- f. I find that the father has inaccurately and somewhat unfairly characterized both the mother's position and her evidence.

- g. The father has attempted to dismiss the mother as some sort of crazy anti-vaxxer. Nothing could be further from the truth. The mother's materials and submissions actually addressed the important and complex issues in more detail and with more comprehension than conveyed by the father. She has made it very clear that she has not completely rejected COVID vaccinations for L.E.G. and M.D.G.. She is simply concerned that in her view there is overwhelming evidence of unresolved safety concerns with respect to the current vaccines being administered. She has come to the conclusion that at this time the risks associated with the vaccines outweigh the benefits.

- h. As well, the mother's statement that she believes "in personal choice, knowledge, understanding and informed consent" is to be viewed in a reassuring context. She has gone to extraordinary lengths to inform herself, to maintain an open mind, and to discuss the issue with her children in a balanced, enlightened, and dispassionate manner.
- i. The father has attempted to dismiss the mother's supporting materials as unreliable and less persuasive than his own materials. Once again, I find his attack to be misguided and inaccurate.
- j. Pro-vaccine parents have consistently (and effectively) attempted to frame the issue as a contest between reputable government experts versus a lunatic fringe consisting of conspiracy theorists, and socially reprehensible extremists. This was absolutely the wrong case to attempt that strategy. The professional materials filed by the mother were actually more informative and more thought-provoking than the somewhat repetitive and narrow government materials filed by the father.

80 This is not the kind of case where the court can say that either side is necessarily correct. Nor that the same determinations should apply for every child, no matter the circumstances.

81 With the mother's materials satisfying me that a legitimate and highly complex debate exists on the efficacy and utilization of COVID vaccines, I am not prepared to apply judicial notice as a method of resolving the issue. Anyone reading even some of the articles presented by the mother would likely conclude that these are complicated and evolving issues, and there can be no simplistic presumption that one side is right and that the other side is comprised of a bunch of crackpots. That's why the court should require evidence rather than conclusory statements.

82 The father insists the mother's views have been debunked, but he provides no example of any such determination actually having been made. It would be helpful if, once and for all, the competing positions and science could be properly explored and tested in a public trial.

83 On balance, I am satisfied that that mother's request for a cautious approach is compelling, and reinforced by the children's views and preferences which are legitimate and must be respected. The mother has consistently made excellent decisions throughout the children's lives. Her current concerns about the vaccines are entirely understandable, given the credible warnings and commentary provided by reputable sources who are specifically acquainted with this issue.

84 The mother has consistently made excellent, informed, and child-focussed decisions. In every respect she is an exemplary parent, fully attuned to her children's physical and emotional needs. She has demonstrated a clear understanding of the science. She has raised legitimate questions and concerns. I have confidence that she will continue to seek out answers to safeguard the physical and emotional health of her children.

85 She is not a bad parent - and no one is a bad citizen - simply by virtue of asking questions of the government.

86 At a certain point, where you have absolute confidence in a parent's insight and decision-making, you have to step back and acknowledge that they love their child; they have always done the right thing for their child...and they will continue to do the right thing for their child.

87 The father's motion is dismissed.

88 The mother shall have sole decision-making authority with respect to the issue of administering COVID vaccines for the children L.E.G. and M.D.G.

89 If any issues other than costs need to be addressed, counsel should arrange with the Trial Co-ordinator a time for this matter to be spoken to. This should be arranged within 10 days.

90 If only costs need to be determined, the parties should serve and file written submissions on the following timelines:

- a. Mother's materials (not to exceed three pages of narrative, and not to be more than 12 pages in total including offers, with cases to be hyperlinked) by March 18, 2022.
- b. Father's materials (not to exceed three pages of narrative, and not to be more than 12 pages in total including offers, with cases to be hyperlinked) by April 1, 2022.
- c. Any reply by mother (not to exceed two pages) by April 11, 2022.

POSTSCRIPT:

91 It's irrelevant to my decision and it's none of anyone's business.

92 But I am fully vaccinated. My choice.

93 I mention this because I am acutely aware of how polarized the world has become.

94 We should all return to discussing the issues rather than making presumptions about one another.

Supreme Court of India

Jacob Puliyel vs Union Of India on 2 May, 2022

Author: L. Nageswara Rao

Bench: L. Nageswara Rao, B.R. Gavai

Reportable

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF INDIA
CIVIL ORIGINAL JURISDICTION
Writ Petition (Civil) No. 607 of 2021

JACOB PULIYEL

.. PETITIONER

Versus

UNION OF INDIA & ORS.

.. RESPONDENTS

L. NAGESWARA RAO, J.

1. The Petitioner was a member of the National Technical Advisory Group on Immunization (NTAGI) and was advising the Government of India on vaccines. He has filed this Writ Petition in public interest seeking the following reliefs:

(a) Direct the respondents to release the entire segregated trial data for each of the phases of trials that have been undertaken with respect to the vaccines being administered in India; and

(b) Direct the respondent No 2 to disclose the detailed minutes of the meetings of the Subject Expert Committee and the NTGAI with regard to the vaccines as directed by the 59th Parliamentary Standing Committee Report and the members who constituted 1 | Page the committee for the purpose of each approval meeting; and

(c) Direct the respondent No.2 to disclose the reasoned decision of the DCGI granting approval or rejecting an application for emergency use authorization of vaccines and the documents and reports submitted to the DCGI in support of such application; and

(d) Direct the respondents to disclose the post vaccination data regarding adverse events, vaccinees who got infected with Covid, those who needed hospitalization and those who died after such infection post vaccination and direct the respondents to widely publicize the data collection of such adverse event through the advertisement of toll free telephone numbers where such complaints can be registered; and

(e) Declare that vaccine mandates, in any manner whatsoever, even by way of making it a precondition for accessing any benefits or services, is a violation of rights of citizens and unconstitutional; and

(f) Pass any other orders as this Hon'ble Court deems fit.

2. In the Writ Petition, the Petitioner highlighted the adverse consequences of emergency approval of vaccines in India, the need for transparency in publishing segregated clinical trial data of vaccines, the need for disclosure of clinical data, lack of transparency in regulatory approvals, minutes and constitution of the expert bodies, imperfect evaluation of Adverse Events Following Immunisation (AEFIs) 2 | Page and vaccine mandates in the absence of informed consent being unconstitutional. The Petitioner further stated in the Writ Petition that coercive vaccination would result in interfering with the principle of informed self-determination of individuals, protected by Article 21 of the Constitution of India.

3. Notice was issued in the Writ Petition on 09.08.2021. An additional affidavit was filed by the Petitioner on 03.09.2021 raising additional grounds. It was averred in the additional affidavit that natural immunity is long-lasting and robust in comparison to vaccine immunity and that vaccines do not prevent infection or transmission of COVID-19. The Petitioner further stated that vaccines are not effective in preventing against infection from new variants of COVID-19. The Petitioner relied on news articles on the fourth nationwide serological survey conducted by Indian Council of Medical Research (ICMR) in June and July, 2021, according to which up to two-thirds of the Indian population above the age of 6 years had already been infected with COVID-19 and had antibodies specific to the SARS-CoV-2 virus. The Petitioner relied upon other news articles and research studies conducted to state that there had been breakthrough infections even amongst vaccinated people. Urging that 3 | Page research has shown that vaccinated people also transmit the virus, the Petitioner contended that vaccine mandates are meaningless.

4. The Petitioner filed an Interlocutory Application seeking a direction to restrain all authorities and institutions, public and private, from mandating the vaccine in any manner whatsoever, on a precondition of accessing any service or on pain of any penalty. The Petitioner has drawn the attention of this Court to various restrictions that were placed by State Governments, other employers and educational institutions on unvaccinated individuals. The Petitioner contended that mandating vaccination for access to resources, public places and means of earning livelihood would be in violation of their fundamental rights, especially so, when scientific studies have shown that unvaccinated persons do not pose more danger of transmission of the virus when compared to vaccinated persons.

5. Respondent No. 1, the Union of India, has raised a preliminary objection regarding the maintainability of the Writ Petition. The Union of India has further contended that the serious threat posed by the unprecedented pandemic which had devastating effects on the entire world called for emergency measures. It is accepted world over that 4 | Page vaccination for COVID-19 is necessary to avoid infection. India was one of the few countries in the world which succeeded in manufacturing vaccines for protection from COVID-19, one of which was COVAXIN, Indias indigenous vaccine and the other being COVISHIELD, which was manufactured by Serum Institute of India with technology transfer from AstraZeneca / Oxford University. The country started one of the largest inoculation programmes in the world in larger public interest, while tackling challenges of vaccine hesitancy, effect of the second wave of the pandemic and other such adverse circumstances. The Union of India expressed serious doubts about the intention of the Petitioner in filing this Writ Petition. As we have not seen the end of the pandemic caused due to the COVID-19 virus, any interference with the steps taken by the Union on the basis of the advice given by the NTAGI and other expert bodies would provide impetus to the already prevailing vaccine hesitancy in certain sections of the society. In their counter-affidavit, the Union of India reminded us that decisions of domain experts should not normally be interfered with in judicial review and that this Court should not sit in appeal over a scientific process undertaken by domain experts on a subject which is not the expertise of any judicial forum. The long-

5 | Page drawn procedure for making applications for issuance of licenses for manufacturing vaccines and the statutory regime governing the same have been referred to in the counter- affidavit to emphasize that the Union of India has not been remiss in grant of emergency licences. There is a detailed procedure for approval with checks at every stage which has been followed for grant of emergency approval. In so far as disclosure of clinical trial data is concerned, the Union of India referred to the National Ethical Guidelines for Biomedical and Health Research involving Human Participants published by the ICMR, which require privacy and confidentiality of human participants to be maintained. Accordingly, the Union of India contended that such details pertaining to identity and records of the participants in the clinical trial data cannot be disclosed to the public as per the prevailing statutory regime. It was asserted by the Union of India that the remaining data has already been made available in the public domain.

6. On the subject of monitoring of AEFIs, the Union of India brought to our attention established procedures and protocols in place for surveillance of AEFIs established under the National Adverse Event Following Immunisation Surveillance Guideline. Further, the multi-tier structure 6 | Page comprising AEFI Committees at the state and national levels, providing guidance, carrying out investigation and causality assessment was elaborated upon. Details of the procedures followed in accordance with globally accepted practices were highlighted in the counter-affidavit. According to the Union of India, all cases of serious and severe AEFI, including reported deaths, are subjected to scientific and technical review process with causality assessments done at the state and national levels by trained experts to ascertain whether a particular AEFI can be attributed to the vaccine. In the counter-affidavit, it was also made clear that COVID-19 vaccination is voluntary and that the Government of India encourages all individuals to take vaccination in the interest of public health, as the individuals ill health has a direct effect on the society. It was also made clear that COVID-19 vaccination is not linked to any benefits or services.

7. Counter-affidavits have been filed by other Respondents as well. The vaccine manufacturers, i.e., Respondents Nos. 4 and 5, have brought to the notice of this Court that approval to their vaccines was granted after strict compliance of the procedure prescribed. The States of Tamil Nadu, Maharashtra, Delhi and Madhya Pradesh have also filed counter-affidavits, justifying the restrictions that were 7 | Page placed on unvaccinated persons in public interest. The details of the restrictions have been discussed later.

8. We have heard Mr. Prashant Bhushan, learned counsel for the Petitioner, Mr. Tushar Mehta, learned Solicitor General of the Union of India, Mr. S. Guru Krishnakumar, learned Senior Counsel for Respondent No. 4, Mr. Amit Anand Tiwari, learned Additional Advocate General for the State of Tamil Nadu, Mr. Rahul Chitnis, learned counsel for the State of Maharashtra, Ms. Mrinal Gopal Elker, learned counsel for the State of Madhya Pradesh and Ms. Shyel Trehan, learned counsel for Respondent No. 5.

Preliminary Issues I. Maintainability

9. The learned Solicitor General raised a preliminary objection as to the maintainability of the Writ Petition which is filed in public interest. He stated that this Writ Petition, if entertained, would harm public interest, as any observation made by this Court against vaccination would result in potential threat of vaccine hesitancy.

10. The Petitioner is a paediatrician, who was a member of the NTAGI earlier. It has been stated in the Writ Petition that he has a number of publications in internationally peer-reviewed medical journals to his credit. The Petitioner 8 | Page strongly believes that there cannot be coercive vaccination, especially of inadequately tested vaccines, which amounts to an intrusion into the individuals personal autonomy. He is also of the firm opinion that an individual is deprived of the opportunity to give informed consent in the absence of availability of segregated data of clinical trials of the vaccines. He has also aired further grievances pertaining to poor evaluation and reporting of AEFIs.

11. This Court is entitled to entertain a public interest litigation moved by a person having knowledge in the subject-matter of the lis and, thus, having an interest therein, as contradistinguished from a busybody, in the welfare of people¹. The Union of India has objected to the maintainability of the Writ Petition on the ground that the questions raised by the Petitioner may result in raising doubts in the minds of the citizenry about the vaccination, adding to the already existing vaccine hesitancy in the country. The consequence would be a debilitating effect on public health and therefore, the petition cannot be said to be in public interest. In other words, the maintainability of the Writ Petition is raised on the ground that the sensitive issue of vaccination should not be dealt with by this Court, as it 1 Indian Banks Association, Bombay v. Devkala Consultancy Service (2004) 11 SCC 1 9 | Page has the propensity of fuelling doubts about the efficacy of the vaccines.

12. From the rejoinder affidavit submitted by the Petitioner, we note that a petition had been filed by the Petitioner earlier, during his tenure as a member of the NTAGI, with respect to the Rotavac vaccine claiming that adequate data from the clinical trials had not been provided to the NTAGI. The rejoinder affidavit further states that the petition was dismissed by this Court, on the ground that the Petitioner could not have filed the said petition while being a member of the NTAGI. The enthusiasm of the Petitioner in approaching this Court has not gone unobserved. However, as the issues raised by the Petitioner have a bearing on public health and pertain to the fundamental rights of the countrys populace, we are of the opinion that they warrant due consideration by this Court. Therefore, we are not inclined to entertain the challenge mounted by the Union of India to the maintainability of the Writ Petition. II. Judicial review of executive decisions based on expert opinion

13. Yet another ground taken by the Union of India is that this Court has to yield to executive decision and action in the matter of administration of drugs / vaccines. The existence of any other possible view cannot enable this Court to interfere in matters relating to opinion of domain experts by sitting in appeal over such decisions, while adjudicating a writ petition filed under Article 32 of the Constitution. The learned Solicitor General supported the stand of the Union of India with reference to the law laid down by this Court in Academy of Nutrition Improvement v. Union of India 2, G. Sundarrajan v. Union of India 3 and Shri Sitaram Sugar Company Ltd. v. Union of India 4. Further, the learned Solicitor General relied upon the judgments of the Supreme Court of the United States (hereinafter, the US Supreme Court) in Henning Jacobson v.

Commonwealth of Massachusetts 5, Zucht v. King 6 and in Docket No. 21A240 titled Joseph R. Biden v. Missouri dated 13.01.2022 and the judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales (hereinafter, the NSW Supreme Court) in Kassam v. Hazzard; Henry v. Hazzard 7 to bolster his submissions that courts should not lightly interfere with matters of policy concerning the safety and health of the people and it is not the courts function to determine the 2 (2011) 8 SCC 274 3 (2013) 6 SCC 620 4 (1990) 3 SCC 223 5 197 US 11 (1905) 6 260 US 174 (1922) 7 [2021] NSWSC 1320 11 | Page merits of the exercise of power by the executive. The learned Solicitor General was joined by Mr. Amit Anand Tiwari, learned Additional Advocate General for the State of Tamil Nadu, in emphasising the limited scope of judicial review in matters of policy framed on the basis of expert opinion.

14. In opposition, the Petitioner argued that matters of public importance involving invasion of fundamental rights of individuals cannot be brushed aside by this Court on the ground that they are beyond the jurisdiction of this Court. This Court has a duty to safeguard the fundamental rights of individuals and issues raised herein are of seminal importance which ought to be decided after assessing the relevant material placed before this Court by both sides. Mr. Bhushan referred to the judgement of the High Court of New Zealand in Ryan Yardley v. Minister for Workplace Relations and Safety 8 in support of his submission that the scientific data and evidence that was produced before the High Court of New Zealand was assessed to adjudge the efficacy of vaccines in preventing transmission of the COVID- 19 virus.

15. It was further argued by Mr. Bhushan that the judgments relied upon by the Union of India are not applicable to the facts of this case. He relied upon the judgments of this Court in Delhi Development Authority v. Joint Action Committee, Allottee of SFS Flats 9, Directorate of Film Festivals v. Gaurav Ashwin Jain 10 and an order of this Court in Distribution of Essential Supplies and Services During Pandemic, In re 11 and submitted that policy decisions taken by the executive are not beyond the scope of judicial review, if they are manifestly arbitrary or unreasonable.

16. Before examining the parameters of judicial review in this case, it is profitable to refer to judgments from beyond our borders which have dealt with the scope of judicial review in matters relating to public health and vaccinations, in particular. Compulsory vaccination against small pox was the subject-matter of Jacobson (supra) decided in 1905. The US Supreme Court was of the opinion that the mandate of the local government for compulsory vaccination was binding on every individual. The safety and health of the people has to be protected by the government and the judiciary is not competent to interfere with decisions taken in the interest of public health. The Court can interfere by way of judicial review of legislative action in matters of public health only when there is no real or substantial relation to the object of the legislation or when there is plain, palpable invasion of rights secured by fundamental law and thereby, give effect to the Constitution.

17. In the wake of the COVID-19 pandemic, restrictions on attendance at religious services in areas classified as red or orange zones were imposed by an executive order issued by the Governor of New York. The said restrictions were challenged on the ground that they violate the free exercise clause of the First Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. By a majority of 6:3, the US Supreme Court in *Roman Catholic Diocese v. Cuomo*¹² granted injunctive relief on being satisfied that the executive order struck at the very heart of the First Amendments guarantee of religious liberty. While doing so, the US Supreme Court observed that the members of the Court are not public health experts and they should respect the judgment of those with special expertise and responsibility in this area. However, the Constitution cannot be put away and forgotten even in a pandemic. Gorsuch, J., who wrote a concurring opinion, observed that Jacobson (supra) hardly supports cutting the Constitution loose during a pandemic. Jacobson (supra) was distinguished by Gorsuch, J., who held that the Court did not interfere with the challenged law in Jacobson (supra) only because it did not contravene the Constitution of the United States or infringe any right granted or secured by it. A word of caution sounded by Gorsuch, J. is to the effect that the Court cannot stay out of the way in times of crisis, when the Constitution is under attack. In his dissent, Roberts, C.J. held that the injunction sought would not be in public interest, especially when it concerns public health and safety needs which calls for swift government action in everchanging circumstances. He relied upon the earlier order passed by the US Supreme Court in *South Bay United Pentecostal Church v. Newsom*¹³ wherein it was recognised that courts must grant elected representatives broad discretion when they undertake to act in areas fraught with medical and scientific uncertainties.

18. Biden v. Missouri (supra) related to vaccine mandates for healthcare providers. The Secretary of Health and Human Services issued a rule on being convinced that vaccination of healthcare workers in facilities in the Medicare and Medicaid Programs against COVID-19 was necessary for the health and safety of individuals to whom care and services are furnished. The said rule was challenged and the US District Courts for the Western District of Louisiana and the Eastern District of Missouri each entered preliminary injunctions against its enforcement. The appeals filed against the said injunction were rejected by the Fifth Circuit in Louisiana and the Eighth Circuit in Missouri. Aggrieved thereby, the Government moved the US Supreme Court seeking for a stay on the preliminary injunctions passed by the US District Courts. While granting stay of the preliminary injunctions, by its plural opinion the US Supreme Court held that the role of courts in reviewing decisions taken by the executive should be to ensure that the executive has acted within a zone of reasonableness.

19. Having been aggrieved by certain orders of the Minister for Health and Medical Research that required people working in the construction, aged care and education sectors to be compulsorily vaccinated, Al-Munir Kassam and three others, along with Natasha Henry and five others, approached the NSW Supreme Court challenging the 16 | P a g e constitutional validity of the decision. While considering the grounds of challenge, the NSW Supreme Court in Kassam v. Hazzard (supra) was of the view that it is not the Courts function to determine the merits of the exercise of the power by the Minister to make the impugned orders, much less for the court to choose between plausible responses to the risks to the public health posed by the Delta variant . The NSW Supreme Court further observed that it is not the courts function to conclusively determine the effectiveness of some of the alleged treatments for those infected or the effectiveness of COVID-19 vaccines, especially their capacity to inhibit the spread of the disease, which are all matters of merits, policy and fact for the decision maker and not the court. The NSW Supreme Court emphasised that its only function is to determine the legal validity of the impugned orders. The said view of the NSW Supreme Court was approved by the New South Wales Court of Appeal in Kassam v. Hazzard; *Henry v. Hazzard*¹⁴.

20. The Minister for Workplace Relations and Safety passed COVID-19 Public Health Response (Specified Work Vaccinations) Order 2021, by which it was determined that work carried out by certain police and defence force 14 [2021] NSWCA 299 17 | P a g e personnel could only be undertaken by workers who have been vaccinated. Three police and defence force workers who did not wish to be vaccinated sought judicial review of the said order before the High Court of New Zealand (hereinafter, the NZ High Court). While adjudicating the dispute, the NZ High Court in Ryan Yardley (supra) expressed its opinion that the choices made by governments on their response to COVID-19 involve wide policy questions, including decisions on the use of border closures, lockdowns, isolation requirements, vaccine mandates and many other measures, which are decisions for the elected representatives to make. The NZ High Court made it clear that the Court addresses narrower legal questions and the Courts function is not to address the wider policy questions. While referring to the evidence of experts, the NZ High Court stressed on the institutional limitations on the Courts ability to reach definitive conclusions but clarified that the Court must exercise its constitutional responsibility to ensure that decisions are made lawfully. While relying upon a judgment of the Court of Appeal of New Zealand in *Ministry of Health v. Atkinson*¹⁵, the NZ High Court held that the Crown has the burden to demonstrate that a limitation of a fundamental 15 [2012] NZCA 184 18 | P a g e right is demonstrably justified. We have come to know that in the time since the judgment in this matter was reserved, the decision of the NZ High Court in Ryan Yardley (supra) has been appealed by the Government of New Zealand before the New Zealand Court of Appeal.

21. We shall now proceed to analyse the precedents of this Court on the ambit of judicial review of public policies relating to health. It is well settled that the Courts, in exercise of their power of judicial review, do not ordinarily interfere with the policy decisions of the executive unless the policy can be faulted on grounds of mala fide, unreasonableness, arbitrariness or unfairness etc. Indeed, arbitrariness, irrationality, perversity and mala fide will render the policy unconstitutional¹⁶. It is neither within the domain of the courts nor the scope of judicial review to embark upon an enquiry as to whether a particular public policy is wise or whether better public policy can be evolved. Nor are the courts inclined to strike down a policy at the behest of a petitioner merely because it has been urged that a different policy would have been fairer or wiser or more scientific or more logical¹⁷. Courts do not and cannot act as 16 Ugar Sugar Works Ltd. v. Delhi Administration (2001) 3 SCC 635 17 Villianur Iyarkkai Padukappu Maiyam v. Union of India (2009) 7 SCC 561 19 | Page appellate authorities examining the correctness, suitability and appropriateness of a policy, nor are courts advisors to the executive on matters of policy which the executive is entitled to formulate. The scope of judicial review when examining a policy of the Government is to check whether it violates the fundamental rights of the citizens or is opposed to the provisions of the Constitution, or opposed to any statutory provision or manifestly arbitrary ¹⁸.

22. This Court in a series of decisions has reiterated that courts should not rush in where even scientists and medical experts are careful to tread. The rule of prudence is that courts will be reluctant to interfere with policy decisions taken by the Government, in matters of public health, after collecting and analysing inputs from surveys and research. Nor will courts attempt to substitute their own views as to what is wise, safe, prudent or proper, in relation to technical issues relating to public health in preference to those formulated by persons said to possess technical expertise and rich experience¹⁹. Where expertise of a complex nature is expected of the State in framing rules, the exercise of that power not demonstrated as arbitrary must be presumed to 18 Directorate of Film Festivals v. Gaurav Ashwin Jain (2007) 4 SCC 737 19 Academy of Nutrition Improvement v. Union of India (2011) 8 SCC 274 20 | Page be valid as a reasonable restriction on the fundamental right of the citizen and judicial review must halt at the frontiers. The Court cannot re-weigh and substitute its notion of expedient solution. Within the wide judge-proof areas of policy and judgment open to the government, if they make mistakes, correction is not in court but elsewhere. That is the comity of constitutional jurisdictions in our jurisprudence. We cannot evolve a judicial policy on medical issues. All judicial thought, Indian and Anglo-American, on the judicial review power where rules under challenge relate to a specialised field and involve sensitive facets of public welfare, has warned courts of easy assumption of unreasonableness of subordinate legislation on the strength of half-baked studies of judicial generalists aided by the ad-hoc learning of counsel. However, the Court certainly is the constitutional invigilator and must act to defend the citizen in the assertion of his fundamental rights against executive tyranny draped in disciplinary power.²⁰

23. There is no doubt that this Court has held in more than one judgment that where the decision of the authority is in regard to a policy matter, this Court will not ordinarily interfere since decisions on policy matters are taken based 20 Pyrali K. Tejani v. Mahadeo Ramchandra Dange (1974) 1 SCC 167 21 | Page on expert knowledge of the persons concerned and courts are normally not equipped to question the correctness of a policy decision. However, this does not mean that courts have to abdicate their right to scrutinise whether the policy in question is formulated keeping in mind all the relevant facts and the said policy can be held to be beyond the pale of discrimination or unreasonableness, bearing in mind the material on record.²¹ In Delhi Development Authority (supra), this Court held that an executive order termed as a policy decision is not beyond the pale of judicial review. Whereas the superior courts may not interfere with the nitty-gritty of the policy, or substitute one by the other but it will not be correct to contend that the court shall lay its judicial hands off, when a plea is raised that the impugned decision is a policy decision. Interference therewith on the part of the superior court would not be without jurisdiction as it is subject to judicial review. It was further held therein that the policy decision is subject to judicial review on the following grounds:

a) if it is unconstitutional;

b) if it is dehors the provisions of the Act and the regulations;

21 Union of India v. Dinesh Engineering Corporation (2001) 8 SCC 491 22 | Page

c) if the delegatee has acted beyond its power of delegation;

d) if the executive policy is contrary to the statutory or a larger policy.

24. During the second wave of COVID-19 pandemic, this Court in Distribution of Essential Supplies & Services during Pandemic (supra), to which one of us was a party (L Nageswara Rao, J.), dealt with issues of vaccination policy, pricing and other connected issues. While doing so, this Court held that policy-making continues to be the sole domain of the executive and the judiciary does not possess the authority or competence to assume the role of the executive. It was made clear that the Court cannot second guess the wisdom of the executive when it chooses between two competing and efficacious policy measures. However, it continues to exercise jurisdiction to determine if the chosen policy measure conforms to the standards of reasonableness, militates against manifest arbitrariness and protects the right to life of all persons.

25. There can be no ambiguity in the principles of law relating to judicial review laid down by this Court. A perusal of the judgments referred to above would clearly show that this Court would be slow in interfering with matters of policy, 23 | Page especially those connected to public health. There is also no doubt that wide latitude is given to executive opinion which is based on expert advice. However, it does not mean that this Court will not look into cases where violation of fundamental rights is involved and the decision of the executive is manifestly arbitrary or unreasonable. It is true that this Court lacks the expertise to arrive at conclusions from divergent opinions of scientific issues but that does not prevent this Court from examining the issues raised in this Writ Petition, especially those that concern violation of Article 21 of the Constitution of India.

26. Identifying the issues in the present matter, they can be divided as follows:

I. Vaccine mandates being violative of Article 21 of the Constitution of India.

II. Non-disclosure of segregated clinical trial data in public domain.

III. Improper collection and reporting of AEFIs.

IV. Vaccination of children.

I. Vaccine Mandates

A. Submissions

27. Mr. Bhushan submitted that there is nothing wrong in the Government encouraging the people to get vaccinated. However, coercive vaccination from the pain of denial of essential services is plainly unconstitutional, being violative 24 | Page of the principle of bodily autonomy and the right to access ones means of livelihood. Though the Union of India has made a categorical submission that vaccines are voluntary, the State Governments have been placing restrictions on unvaccinated people by denying them access to public places and services. He referred to: (i) an order passed by the Government of NCT of Delhi on 08.10.2021 by which government employees, including frontline workers and healthcare workers, as well as teachers and staff working in schools and colleges were not to be allowed to attend their respective offices and institutions without the first dose of vaccination with effect from 16.10.2021; (ii) a directive issued by the Government of Madhya Pradesh on 08.11.2021 stating that it was mandatory to be vaccinated with two doses of the vaccine to get food grains at fair price shops;

(iii) an order passed by the Government of Maharashtra dated 27.11.2021 requiring persons to be fully vaccinated if they are connected with any program, event, shop, establishment, mall and for utilising public transport; (iv) an order issued by the Government of Tamil Nadu dated 18.11.2021 permitting only vaccinated people into open, public places, schools, colleges, hostels, boarding houses, factories and shops; and other instances where students in 25 | Page the age group of 15 to 18 years were not permitted to appear for their examinations without being vaccinated.

28. Mr. Bhushan contended that there is need to balance individuals rights with public interest concerning health. According to him, vaccine mandates can be on the basis of efficacy and safety of vaccination and prevention of transmission. He submitted that there is sufficient evidence to the effect that natural immunity acquired from a COVID-19 infection is long-lasting and robust in comparison to vaccine immunity. Studies also indicate that vaccines do not prevent infection from the virus or transmission amongst people. Vaccines are also ineffective in preventing infection from new variants. According to serological studies, 75 per cent of the Indian population has already been infected and is seropositive and, therefore, they have better immunity to infection than what is provided by the vaccines. The vaccines which are being administered in this country are only authorised for emergency use and the procedure for clinical trials of such vaccines has not been fully complied with. In view of the lack of transparency in disclosure of trial data resulting in absence of informed consent, any vaccine mandate would be unconstitutional. Mr. Bhushan contended that every individual has personal autonomy and cannot be 26 | Page forced to be vaccinated against his will. For the said proposition, he relied on the judgments of Common Cause (A Registered Society) v. Union of India 22, Aruna Ramachandra Shanbaug v. Union of India 23 and K. S. Puttaswamy v. Union of India 24. Imposing restrictions on the rights of persons who are unvaccinated is totally unwarranted as there is no basis for discriminating against unvaccinated persons. He relied upon scientific studies, opinions of experts and news articles to contend that vaccinated people are also prone to infection and there is no difference between a vaccinated individual and an unvaccinated person with respect to transmission of the virus. As there is no serious threat of spread of the virus by an unvaccinated person in comparison to a vaccinated person, placing restrictions on unvaccinated persons is meaningless.

29. Per contra, the learned Solicitor General of India contended that more than 180 crore doses had been administered, resulting in a substantial number of individuals in the country being vaccinated. He submitted that the vaccines have proved to be effective and safe and any indulgence by this Court would result in vaccine hesitancy. 22 (2018) 5 SCC 1 23 (2011) 4 SCC 454 24 (2017) 10 SCC 1 27 | Page The Government had taken extra care to appoint various committees to examine the efficacy, safety, immunogenicity, pharmacodynamics of the vaccines before granting approvals. Some of the material placed before this Court to bolster the Union of Indias submissions have been listed below:

(a) Science Brief: SARS-CoV-2 Infection-induced and Vaccine-induced immunity of the United States Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) updated as on 29.10.2021, which in its conclusion states that: Numerous immunologic studies and a growing number of epidemiologic studies have shown that vaccinating previously infected individuals significantly enhances their immune response and effectively reduces the risk of subsequent infection, including in the setting of increased circulation of more infectious variants. Although the Delta variant and some other variants have shown increased resistance to neutralization by both post-infection and post-vaccination sera in laboratory studies, observed reduction in effectiveness has been modest, with continued strong protection against hospitalization, severe disease and death. 28 | Page

(b) A study conducted by researchers of Christian Medical College, Vellore²⁵, wherein it has been concluded as follows: Among symptomatic COVID-19 patients, prior vaccination with either Covishield or Covaxin® impacted the severity of illness and reduced mortality when compared with unvaccinated patients. Full vaccination conferred a substantially higher protective effect over partial vaccination. The results of the study also indicate that compared with unvaccinated patients, partially vaccinated patients had milder disease, reduced requirement of oxygen, hospital admission, ICU admission and mortality. Again, when fully vaccinated patients were compared with unvaccinated individuals, full vaccination was associated with significantly less disease severity, requirement of respiratory supports, hospital admission, ICU admission and mortality. The study further showed that majority of the patients screened who required hospitalisation were unvaccinated.

(c) A study conducted by researchers of All India Institute of Medical Sciences (AIIMS), New Delhi²⁶, which states that: We evaluated the association between COVID-19 vaccination status (the number of vaccine shots received and time interval since the last dose) and the vaccines clinical efficacy in India in preventing the disease and its severity. This study has several noteworthy findings. Firstly, both the Indian vaccines provided a significant protective role in preventing the disease among people who had a clinical suspicion of COVID-19. Secondly, These vaccines protected from progression to a severe form of the disease among the patients who turned RT-PCR positive despite getting vaccinated. The probability of hospitalisation was about eight times less, and ICU admission/death was about fourteen times lesser among fully vaccinated patients in comparison to unvaccinated RT-PCR positive patients. Thirdly, the protective efficacy of the vaccines had a dose-dependent effect. The effectiveness is maximum among individuals who 26 Aakashneel Bhattacharya, Piyush Ranjan, Tamoghna Ghosh, Harsh Agarwal, Sukriti Seth, Ganesh Tarachand Maher, Ashish Datt Upadhyay, Arvind Kumar, Upendra Baitha, Gaurav Gupta, Bindu Prakash, Sada Nand Dwivedi, Naveet Wig Evaluation of the dose-effect association between the number of doses and duration since the last dose of COVID-19 vaccine, and its efficacy in preventing the disease and reducing disease severity: A single centre, cross-sectional analytical study from India Diabetes & Metabolic Syndrome: Clinical Research & Reviews Volume 15, Issue 5 (2021), 102238 30 | Page received both doses of vaccination at least two weeks before the onset of their symptoms.

(d) A study conducted by researchers of AIIMS, Patna 27, which concludes as follows: COVID-19 vaccination was found to be effective in infection prevention. One out of two and four out of five individuals were found to be protected against SARS-CoV-2 infection following partial and full vaccination, respectively. The vaccinated individuals had lesser LOS compared to unvaccinated ones. Additionally, the fully vaccinated individuals were less likely to develop severe disease. LOS herein refers to the length of hospital stays.

30. On behalf of the State of Tamil Nadu, Mr. Amit Anand Tiwari, learned Additional Advocate General, submitted that the restrictions placed by way of the circular dated 18.11.2021 are within the competence of the State in exercise of its powers under the Disaster Management Act, 2005 (hereinafter, the DM Act) and the Tamil Nadu Public Health Act, 1939. Section 76(2)(b) thereof empowers the State Government to make vaccinations compulsory, in the event of a declaration by the Government of an outbreak of a 27 Singh C, Naik BN, Pandey S, et al. Effectiveness of COVID-19 vaccine in preventing infection and disease severity: a case-control study from an Eastern State of India. Epidemiology and Infection. 2021;149:e224 31 | Page notified disease. He submitted that the restrictions placed by the circular dated 18.11.2021 are in larger public interest and cannot be said to be unreasonable restrictions, as these were an essential facet of the precautionary approach adopted by the State of Tamil Nadu in dealing with the unprecedented pandemic. According to Mr. Tiwari, these restrictions were in furtherance of the State realising the importance of curtailing the spread of COVID-19. The unchecked spread of the virus could lead to further dangerous mutations. While referring to opinions of experts in the field of health, including that of the World Health Organization (WHO), the United Nations International Childrens Emergency Fund (UNICEF) and the Oxford Vaccine group, as well as scientific studies published in the New England Journal of Medicine, the Lancet and the International Journal of Scientific Studies, it was submitted on behalf of the State of Tamil Nadu that vaccination prevents severe disease and significantly reduces hospitalisation and mortality and that vaccines continued to be highly effective in preventing severe disease and death. The measures were justified on the ground that they were not only aimed for the safety of a particular individual but also served a greater purpose of ensuring safety of the community at large.

31. Mr. Rahul Chitnis, learned counsel appearing for the State of Maharashtra, referred to the information provided by the WHO to contend that vaccines save infected individuals from life threatening complications, and consequential untimely death and therefore, vaccine mandate issued by the State of Maharashtra is in the interest of general public. The restrictions that are imposed are reasonable and cannot be said to manifestly arbitrary as they are issued only for a temporary period with exclusions and are reviewed periodically by the State to assess if relaxations can be granted. He submitted that there is no compulsion to get vaccinated, however, in view of the serious threat that not being vaccinated poses to the right of life and personal liberty of the larger population, certain unavoidable restrictions have been imposed, especially given that strict adherence to social distancing and masking is significantly compromised in bigger cities.

32. The complaint of the Petitioner in relation to prevention of access to essential resources in the State of Madhya Pradesh pertains to ration not being provided to unvaccinated persons through the public distribution system. We were informed by the learned counsel for the State of 33 | P a g e Madhya Pradesh that the order dated 08.11.2021, by which vaccination was made mandatory for receiving ration from fair price shops, was not implemented and was eventually withdrawn on 07.01.2022.

33. In the counter-affidavit filed on behalf of the Government of NCT of Delhi, it was submitted that the order dated 08.10.2021 was issued by the Delhi Disaster Management Authority after due application of mind, to control the spread of COVID-19 and mitigate its effects. Under Section 6(2)(i) of the DM Act, the National Disaster Management Authority has been issuing orders from time to time directing State Governments and Union Territories, amongst other authorities, to take effective measures to prevent the spread of COVID-19, and in furtherance of this, also permitted States to impose further local restrictions. The Delhi Disaster Management Authority, in a meeting held on 29.09.2021, decided to ensure 100 per cent vaccination of all Government employees, frontline workers, healthcare workers as well as teachers and staff working in schools and colleges, on the advice of medical and other experts. It was considered necessary as these individuals have frequent interaction with the general public and vulnerable sections of the society and therefore, pose greater risk of spreading the 34 | P a g e virus. While an individual may have a right to decide against getting vaccinated, the State, however, has a statutory duty to regulate the interaction of unvaccinated persons within the society in the interest of public health.

34. In his rejoinder, Mr. Bhushan, while reiterating his submissions, took exception to the contradictory stand taken by the Union of India on COVID-19 vaccination being voluntary and not mandatory. On one hand, the Union of India made it clear in the counter-affidavit that vaccination is voluntary and on the other, a series of advisories and material had been filed by the Union of India, supporting the claim of vaccination being mandatory. Mr. Bhushan submitted that the Union of India has not provided any material to the Court contrary to what has been supplied by the Petitioner furthering his scientific and legal contention that unvaccinated people pose no greater danger than vaccinated individuals in the matter of transmission of the COVID-19 virus, and therefore, there is no public health rationale in vaccine mandates. In addition to the various points raised in his submissions, the learned counsel for the Petitioner relied upon the opinion of Dr. Aditi Bhargava, who is a professor at University of California, San Francisco and a molecular biologist with 33 years of research experience, 35 | Page from her presentation made before the US Senate on 02.11.2021. Her opinion is to the effect that vaccines do not prevent infection and transmission. She is of the further belief that natural immunity is the gold standard. According to Dr. Bhargava, there has been no documented case of a naturally immune person getting reinfected with severe disease or hospitalised, despite the first case reported nearly two years ago, whereas, there have been thousands of cases of severe infection, hospitalisation, and deaths in fully vaccinated people. Mr. Bhushan concluded by submitting that any restrictions placed on personal autonomy of individuals would be violative of Article 21, unless the criteria laid down in K. S. Puttaswamy (supra) is met. B. Evolution of COVID-19 and vaccines

35. COVID-19 emerged in late 2019. The WHO officially declared the novel coronavirus outbreak as a pandemic on 11.03.2020. The virus was detected in the country in the last week of January, 2020 and spread rapidly. As the threat of infections from the virus loomed large, an unprecedented national lockdown was announced on 24.03.2020, which extended for a few months, with restrictions being removed thereafter in a phased manner. India was not alone in this;

36 | Page several countries imposed lockdowns to arrest the spread of the deadly disease, which has led to a drastic loss of human life worldwide and presented a threat of extraordinary proportions to public health, food systems, economic and social conditions. Scientific studies and research for manufacture of vaccines to prevent severe infections were undertaken on an emergency basis. Towards the end of 2020, emergency vaccines came to be administered in the western part of the world. However, by then, the spread of COVID-19 around the globe was considerable. Around the same period, a variant called B.1.1.7 was found in the United Kingdom. The said variant was renamed as Alpha, as per the naming scheme recommended by the expert group convened by the WHO, which also includes scientists from the WHO's Technical Advisory Group on Virus Evolution (TAG- VE). Another variant, called B.1.351 and later renamed as Beta, was found to be linked to a second wave of infections in South Africa. Both these variants were identified as Variants of Concern (VOC) by the WHO on 18.12.2020, meaning that they were variants with genetic changes that would affect virus characteristics such as transmissibility, disease severity or immune escape and through a comparative assessment, are found to be associated with an 37 | Page increase of transmission or increase in virulence or decrease in effectiveness of public health measures such as vaccines, therapeutics etc. Soon thereafter, the highly transmissible variant called Gamma was found in Brazil and was identified as a VOC by the WHO on 11.01.2021.28

36. In the first half of 2021, the Delta variant was identified as the predominant variant in India and was believed to be 60 per cent more transmissible than the Alpha variant. Thereafter, Delta rapidly spread beyond the borders to other countries. Another variant, Omicron, surfaced in November, 2021, whose spread was much more accelerated than earlier variants, including that of Delta. On the basis of the evidence available as on 21.01.2022, the WHO was of the opinion that the Omicron has a significant growth advantage over Delta, leading to rapid spread in the community with higher levels of incidence than previously seen in the pandemic. It was further observed that despite a lower risk of severe disease and death following infection, the very high levels of transmission nevertheless have resulted in significant increases in hospitalisation and continue to pose overwhelming demands on health care systems in most 28 Tracking SARS-CoV-2 variants, World

It was found that because of the 26-32 mutations that it has in the spike protein, Omicron has infected even those who have been previously infected or vaccinated. 29 Though the infections and transmission from Omicron at present within the country are not as serious as they were in the first two months of 2022, expert opinion is to the effect that Omicron might not be the last of the variants, as we have since witnessed.

37. The WHO established the Technical Advisory Group on COVID-19 Vaccine Composition (TAG-CO-VAC) in September, 2021. According to the statement made by the said group on 11.01.2022 in the context of circulation of the Omicron variant, the group reviews and assesses the public health implications of emerging VOCs on the performance of COVID- 19 vaccines and provides recommendations on COVID-19 vaccine composition. The said group is developing a framework to analyse the evidence on emerging VOCs in the context of criteria that would trigger a recommendation to change COVID-19 vaccine strain composition and will advise the WHO on updated vaccine compositions, as required. The group has spelt out in their statement that at present, with 29 Statement by Dr Hans Henri P. Kluge, WHO Regional Director for Europe, 11.01.2011, available at <https://www.euro.who.int/en/media-centre/sections/statements/2022/statement-update-on-covid-19-omicron-wave-threatening-to-overcome-health-workforce> (last accessed on 01.05.2022) 39 | P a g e the available COVID-19 vaccines, the focus is on reducing severe disease and death, as well as protecting health systems. According to the TAG-CO-VAC, vaccines, which have received WHO Emergency Use Listing across several vaccine platforms, provide a high level of protection against severe disease and death caused by VOCs. The group takes note of data which indicates that vaccine effectiveness will be reduced against symptomatic disease caused by the Omicron variant but at the same time, it was of the opinion that protection against severe disease is more likely to be preserved. Along with the Strategic Advisory Group of Experts on Immunization (SAGE) and its Working Group on COVID-19 vaccines, TAG-CO-VAC has recommended COVID- 19 vaccines for priority populations worldwide to provide protection against severe disease and death globally and, in the longer term, to mitigate the emergence and impact of new VOCs by reducing the burden of infection.30

38. With the outbreak of the devastating pandemic, as many as 5,23,843 lives have been lost in this country, as per the latest data available on the website of the Ministry of 30 Interim Statement on COVID-19 vaccines in the context of the circulation of the Omicron SARS-CoV-2 Variant from the WHO Technical Advisory Group on COVID-19 Vaccine Composition (TAG-CO-VAC), 11.01.2022, a v a i l a b l e a t <https://www.who.int/news/item/11-01-2022-interim-statement-on-covid-19-vaccines-in-the-context-of-the-circulation-of-the-omicron-sars-cov-2-variant-from-the-who-technical-advisory-group-on-covid-19-vaccine-composition> (last accessed on 01.05.2022) 40 | P a g e Health and Family Welfare (MoHFW). Initially, efforts made by the Government of India were to protect people by arresting serious infection. With treatment protocol and clinical management protocol for COVID-19 being revised periodically as more and more data and research on the virus came to be known, persons affected by the virus were treated with the information that was available at the point. Using whatever little was known about the virus in the initial stages, dedicated efforts have been made to save countless lives in this country. With the approval of vaccines on an emergency basis in January, 2021, there was some hope about preventing infections from the virus. Inoculation, which commenced slowly in view of the non-availability of sufficient doses of vaccines, gained pace with the increase in manufacture by Respondent Nos. 4 and 5. With the Government embarking upon extensive awareness drives encouraging vaccination, more than 189 crore doses of vaccine have been administered within the country till date, as per the data available on the website of the MoHFW.

39. With the introduction of vaccines, it was understood that vaccines would aid in preventing infections. To protect their populace from infection, countries worldwide promoted 41 | P a g e vaccination as, needless to say, an uninfected person will not transmit the disease. Thereafter, with the mutation of the virus eventually resulting in multiple VOCs, breakthrough infections were noticed. Vaccinated people were found to be infected with the virus and could also act as carriers, transmitting the virus to others. Even in such a situation, there is no question of whether vaccination for COVID-19 should be continued. The recommendations of the WHO's TAG-CO-VAC and SAGE make it amply clear that vaccines, which have received emergency use approvals, provide strong protection against serious illness, hospitalisation and death and getting vaccinated is one of the most crucial steps towards protecting oneself from COVID-19, stopping new variants from emerging and helping end the pandemic. It should be noted that the advice of the WHO with respect to COVID-19 has been consistent since the time vaccines became available, even after recognising that it was still possible to get infected and spread the infection to others despite being vaccinated, as is evident from the latest version of the WHO's COVID-19 advice for the public: Getting vaccinated as of 13.04.2022 31. The Union of India has placed considerable material on record in terms of 31 Available at <https://www.who.int/emergencies/diseases/novel-coronavirus-2019/covid-19-vaccines/advice> (last accessed on 01.05.2022) 42 | P a g e scientific briefs and published studies which stand testimony to the significance of vaccination as a crucial public health intervention in this pandemic and its continued benefits to individual health as well as public health infrastructure. Vaccination of a majority of the population of this country has undoubtedly been instrumental in preventing severe disease, hospitalisation and deaths, and benefited the community at large, especially those members with co-morbidities, the elderly and sick persons. Even the Petitioner is not opposed to the vaccination programme and does not challenge the vaccination drive of the Government of India, as has been reiterated by him during the course of his arguments. Exception to the vaccination programme taken by the Petitioner is only to coercive vaccination through vaccine mandates, which place unjustifiable restrictions on those who wish to not be vaccinated.

40. In light of the virulent mutations of the COVID-19 virus and advice of experts from the WHO as well as common findings of several studies on this subject, the vaccination drive that is being undertaken by the Government of India in the interest of public health cannot be faulted with. C. Personal autonomy and public health 43 | P a g e

41. Before dealing with the issue of coercive vaccination, it is necessary to consider whether the right of privacy of individuals can override public health, more so, when the submission on behalf of the Respondents is that steps taken to restrict the rights of individuals are in the larger interest of public health. It is true that to be vaccinated or not is entirely the choice of the individual. Nobody can be forcefully vaccinated as it would result in bodily intrusion and violation of the individuals right to privacy, protected under Article 21 of the Constitution of India. Personal autonomy was read into Article 21 by this Court in Common Cause (supra), by placing reliance on National Legal Services Authority v. Union of India³², and Aruna Ramachandra Shanbaug (supra). This Court, in Common Cause (supra), emphasized the right of an individual to choose how he should live his own life, without any control or interference by others. It recognised the right of an individual to refuse unwanted medical treatment and to not be forced to take any medical treatment that is not desired. In view of the categorical statement of the Union of India that vaccination of COVID-19 is voluntary, the question of any intrusion into bodily integrity does not arise for consideration in this case. ³² (2014) 5 SCC 438 44 | P a g e However, the Petitioner has asserted that limitations placed on access to public places and public resources for unvaccinated persons result in coercive vaccination, and therefore, limit the right of unvaccinated persons to refuse medical treatment.

42. Disclosure of data of a patient suffering from AIDS was the subject matter of a decision of this Court in *X v. Hospital Z*³³. Placing reliance on *Kharak Singh v State of U.P.*³⁴, *Gobind v. State of M.P.*³⁵ and a judgment of the US Supreme Court in *Jane Roe v. Henry Wade*³⁶, this Court held that though non-disclosure of medical information of an individual can be traced to the right to privacy protected under Article 21, it is not absolute and is subject to action lawfully taken for protection of health or morals or protection of rights and freedoms of others.

43. In *Association of Medical Super Speciality Aspirants and Residents v. Union of India*³⁷, to which one of us was a party (L Nageswara Rao, J.), this Court, while considering validity of service bonds to be executed at the time of admission to postgraduate and superspeciality courses in medical science, held as follows: ³³ (1998) 8 SCC 296 ³⁴ (1964) 1 SCR 332 ³⁵ (1975) 2 SCC 148 ³⁶ 410 US 113 (1973) ³⁷ (2019) 8 SCC 607 45 | P a g e ³³. The above discussion leads us to the conclusion that right to life guaranteed by Article 21 means right to life with human dignity. Communitarian dignity has been recognised by this Court. While balancing communitarian dignity vis-à-vis the dignity of private individuals, the scales must tilt in favour of communitarian dignity. The laudable objective with which the State Governments have introduced compulsory service bonds is to protect the fundamental right of the deprived sections of the society guaranteed to them under Article 21 of the Constitution of India. The contention of the appellants that their rights guaranteed under Article 21 of the Constitution of India have been violated is rejected.

44. Strong reliance was placed by the Petitioner on the judgment of the High Court of New Zealand in Ryan Yardley (supra). The principal contention of the applicants therein was that the impugned order, requiring police and defence force personnel to be vaccinated, placed unjustified limitation on the rights protected by the New Zealand Bill of Rights Act 1990 (hereinafter, the NZ Bill of Rights), particularly the right to refuse to undergo medical treatment, the right to manifest religion, the right to be free from discrimination and other rights under Section 28 of the said Act (including the right to work, and of minority groups to enjoy their culture and practice their religion). The purpose of ⁴⁶ | P a g e the order, as clarified by the Minister by way of an amendment order in February, 2022 is as below:

- (a) avoid, mitigate, or remedy the actual or potential adverse effects of the COVID-19 outbreak (whether direct or indirect); and
- (b) ensure continuity of services that are essential for public safety, national defence, or crisis response; and
- (c) maintain trust in public services.

45. Considering the submissions of the applicants therein that the order placed unjustified limitations on fundamental rights protected by the NZ Bill of Rights, the NZ High Court held that the impugned order limits the right of affected workers to refuse to undergo a medical treatment as well as the right (or significant interest) to retain employment. While examining the question of whether the limitation of the said rights was justified, the NZ High Court noted that the order mandating vaccinations for the police and defence personnel was imposed to ensure the continuity of services that are essential for public safety, national defence, or crisis response, and to promote public confidence in those services, rather than to stop the spread of COVID-19. The NZ High Court further took note of the fact that by October, 2021, 83.1 per cent of police personnel had received at least one or more doses of the vaccination, and 70.1 per cent had received both doses. By the time the order took effect on 47 | P a g e 17.01.2022, there were only 164 unvaccinated staff members in an overall workforce of 15,682 staff. It was found that the position within the New Zealand Defence Forces (NZDF) was similar. From a total of 15,480 NZDF personnel, 3,048 are civil staff. As on 01.02.2022, 99.2 per cent of the regular forces were fully vaccinated, leaving aside 75 members and 98.7 per cent of the civil staff were fully vaccinated, leaving 40 who were not. The NZ High Court was of the view that the relatively low number of unvaccinated police and NZDF personnel impacted by the order may not, by itself, mean that the order was not a reasonable limit on rights that can be demonstrably justified, if there was evidence to establish that the presence of unvaccinated personnel, even in small numbers, created a materially higher risk to the remaining workforce. While observing that the evidence on this issue is sparse, the NZ High Court referred to the evidence of Dr. Petrovsky, who deposed that vaccination has potential benefit in reducing the severity of disease, even with the Omicron variant. However, in his view, mandatory vaccination did not assist in preventing workers in affected roles from contracting COVID- 19, or transmitting it to others. The NZ High Court further considered the evidence of Dr. Town, the Ministrys Chief 48 | P a g e Science Adviser, who, according to the NZ High Court, did not directly respond to Dr. Petrovskys analysis of the effectiveness of the vaccine to inhibit the spread of COVID-19 in a workforce, but instead provided his more generalised opinions. In his evidence, Dr. Town stated that vaccines show reduced effectiveness compared with Delta in terms of becoming infected with and transmitting Omicron.

46. After weighing the evidence, the NZ High Court was of the view that vaccination may still be effective in limiting infection and transmission, but at a significantly lower level than was the case with the earlier variants. It was further concluded that vaccination does not prevent persons contracting and spreading COVID-19, particularly with the Omicron variant. The NZ High Court referred to an earlier judgment in Four Aviation Security Service Employees v. Minister of COVID-19 Response 38, where the precautionary principle had been applied, to make the point that even a modest vaccination protection on a modest number of personnel needs to be considered in the context of potential effects of a pandemic. The NZ High Court referred to a judgment of the Federal Court of Ontario in 38 [2021] NZHC 3012 49 | P a g e Spencer v. Attorney General of Canada 39 to elaborate on the precautionary principle, as a foundational approach to decision-making under uncertainty, that points to the importance of acting on the best available information to protect the health of the citizens. In Four Aviation Security Service Employees (supra), which dealt with restrictions placed on aviation security workers, the NZ High Court held that even though the applicants therein were not being forcibly treated, they were required to be vaccinated as a condition of their employment, refusal of which led to termination. Observing that a right does not need to be taken away in its entirety before it is regarded as having been limited, the NZ High Court opined that the level of pressure in that case was significant and amounted to coercion, and therefore, the applicants right to refuse to undergo medical treatment was limited. However, the said limitation was held to be justified. From the evidence adduced before the NZ High Court, it concluded that the vaccine was effective at reducing the transmission of the earlier variants of the virus and that it was also effective at reducing symptomatic infection and detrimental effects of the Delta variant. As the applicants were border workers 39 [2021] FC 361 50 | P a g e interacting with international travellers who may be carrying the virus and given the likelihood of vaccines contributing to preventing the risk of transmission, the NZ High Court held that a precautionary approach, in doing everything that can be reasonably done to minimise risk of the outbreak or spread in strong public interest, is justified. Further, the curtailment of the right to refuse to undergo medical treatment was found to be proportionate to the objective, as the applicants, who worked as aviation workers, were situated in a key location where COVID-19 might enter New Zealand.

47. In Ryan Yardley (supra), the NZ High Court held that the principle in Four Aviation Security Service Employees (supra) is not directly applicable as the order was not promulgated to contain the spread of the virus but for the purpose of ensuring continuity of, and confidence in, essential services. Additionally, there was no evidence of a threat to the continuity of the police and NZDF services, which would enable the NZ High Court to give the benefit of the doubt to the New Zealand Crown in imposing measures to address that risk. Placing reliance on the evidence adduced as well as the public health advice which was to the 51 | P a g e effect that vaccine mandates were not considered necessary for addressing the risk of the outbreak or spread of COVID- 19, the High Court made it clear that while vaccination significantly improved the prospects of avoiding illness and death even with the Omicron variant, given the variants propensity to break through vaccination barriers, it concluded that there was no real threat to the continuity of these essential services that the impugned order sought to address. Further, finding that suspension of the unvaccinated would address any potential problems, the terminations arising from the order in light of the temporary, albeit significant, period of peak impact of the infection, were found to be disproportionate and unjustified. While the Petitioner has sought support from this judgment to demonstrate how courts in other jurisdictions have struck down vaccine mandates taking into account Omicrons impact on the effectiveness of vaccines in addressing spread, we believe that this judgment may not be of much assistance to us for determining the issue at hand for two reasons. First, the judgment expressly recognised that the impugned vaccine mandate was not brought about to suppress the spread of the virus but to ensure continuity of, and confidence in, essential services, such as the police and the 52

| Page defence personnel, which we are not concerned with in the present case. Second, while the NZ High Court looked into depositions of expert witnesses to come to its own conclusion on efficacy of vaccines vis-à-vis the Omicron variant, the scope of our review does not entail assessment of competing scientific opinions, as the judiciary is not equipped to decide issues of medical expertise and epidemiology.

48. The crucial point that requires to be considered by us is whether limitations placed by the Government on personal autonomy of an individual can be justified in the interest of public health in the wake of the devastating COVID-19 pandemic. As stated, personal autonomy has been recognized as a critical facet of the right to life and right to self-determination under Article 21 of the Constitution, by this Court in Common Cause (supra). In K.S. Puttaswamy (supra), this Court laid down three requirements to be fulfilled by the State while placing restraints on the right to privacy to protect legitimate State interests. It was held:

310. The first requirement that there must be a law in existence to justify an encroachment on privacy is an express requirement of Article 21. For, no person can be deprived of his life or personal liberty except in accordance with the procedure established by law. The 53 | Page existence of law is an essential requirement. Second, the requirement of a need, in terms of a legitimate State aim, ensures that the nature and content of the law which imposes the restriction falls within the zone of reasonableness mandated by Article 14, which is a guarantee against arbitrary State action. The pursuit of a legitimate State aim ensures that the law does not suffer from manifest arbitrariness. Legitimacy, as a postulate, involves a value judgment. Judicial review does not reappreciate or second guess the value judgment of the legislature but is for deciding whether the aim which is sought to be pursued suffers from palpable or manifest arbitrariness. The third requirement ensures that the means which are adopted by the legislature are proportional to the object and needs sought to be fulfilled by the law. Proportionality is an essential facet of the guarantee against arbitrary State action because it ensures that the nature and quality of the encroachment on the right is not disproportionate to the purpose of the law. Hence, the threefold requirement for a valid law arises out of the mutual interdependence between the fundamental guarantees against arbitrariness on the one hand and the protection of life and personal liberty, on the other. The right to privacy, which is an intrinsic part of the right to life and liberty, and the freedoms embodied in Part III is subject to the same restraints which apply to those freedoms. While the judgment is in context of the right to privacy, the analysis with respect to the threefold requirement for curtailment of such right is on the anvil of the protection guaranteed to fundamental freedoms under Article 21, and 54 | Page therefore, would also be the litmus test for invasion of an individuals bodily autonomy under Article 21.

49. The upshot of the above discussion leads to the following conclusions:

a) Bodily integrity is protected under Article 21 of the Constitution of India and no individual can be forced to be vaccinated.

b) Personal autonomy of an individual involves the right of an individual to determine how they should live their own life, which consequently encompasses the right to refuse to undergo any medical treatment in the sphere of individual health.

c) Persons who are keen to not be vaccinated on account of personal beliefs or preferences, can avoid vaccination, without anyone physically compelling them to be vaccinated. However, if there is a likelihood of such individuals spreading the infection to other people or contributing to mutation of the virus or burdening of the public health infrastructure, thereby affecting communitarian health at large, protection of which is undoubtedly a legitimate State aim of paramount significance in this collective battle against the pandemic, the Government can regulate such public health concerns by imposing certain limitations on individual rights that are reasonable and proportionate to the object sought to be fulfilled.

50. The submission made on behalf of the Petitioner is that the Delta and Omicron variants have shown breakthrough infections and it is clear from the scientific data that, an unvaccinated person does not pose a greater risk than a vaccinated person in terms of transmission of the infection. While this submission has been dealt with subsequently, we believe that as long as there is a risk of spreading the disease, there can be restrictions placed on individuals rights in larger public interest. Further, extensive material from experts has been placed before this Court, which extol the benefits of vaccination in tackling the severe and life- threatening impact of the infection, specifically in terms of reduction in oxygen requirement, hospitalisation, ICU admissions and mortality, thereby easing the disproportionate burden from the upsurge of severe cases on the health infrastructure, which has already been witnessed by the country during the second wave of the pandemic where resources were woefully inadequate to stem the impact of the Delta variant on a then scarcely vaccinated population. We hasten to add that restrictions that are placed by the Government should not be unreasonable and are open to scrutiny by constitutional courts. It is difficult for us to envisage the myriad situations in dealing with the evolving pandemic that may call for restraint on individual rights in larger public interest and therefore, as and when such limitations are challenged, they can be assessed by constitutional courts to see whether they meet the threefold requirement laid down in K.S. Puttaswamy (supra). D. Assessment of the vaccine mandates imposed by State Governments

51. The grievance of the Petitioner pertains to the vaccine mandates imposed by various State Governments and private organisations, resulting in restrictions on fundamental freedoms of persons who have chosen not to be vaccinated. The Petitioner has alleged duality in the stand of the Respondents, as on one hand, the Union of India has categorically stated that vaccines are voluntary and on the other, the State Governments have imposed and defended restrictions on access to public places and resources for persons who are unvaccinated. The Petitioner contested the vaccine mandates on the following grounds:

(a) Natural immunity acquired from COVID-19 infection is more long-lasting and robust as compared to vaccine immunity.

(b) Serological studies show that more than 75 per cent of the Indian population has already been infected and is seropositive and therefore, has better immunity to the infection than that which can be provided by the vaccine.

(c) Vaccines do not prevent infection from or transmission of COVID-19 and are especially ineffective in preventing against infection from new variants.

52. In support of the above grounds, other than on the aspect of transmission of the virus, the Petitioner has relied on individual opinions of doctors and other advisors, news articles and findings from research studies, some of which are preprints meaning they have not been peer-reviewed and report new medical research which has yet to be evaluated and therefore, should not be used to guide clinical practice, as explained by medRxiv, a platform where several preprint articles in the field of health sciences are published. Some of the material relied on by the Petitioner has been listed below:

(a) An article in the scientific journal Nature⁴⁰, which states that studies have shown that memory plasma cells secreted antibody specific for the spike protein encoded in SARS-CoV-2 even 11 months after the infection and further that, immune memory to many viruses is stable over decades, if not for a lifetime.

(b) A study published in the European Journal of Epidemiology⁴¹, which has analysed data from 68 countries available as of 03.09.2021 and has found that at the country level, there appears to be no discernible relationship between percentage of population fully vaccinated and new COVID-19 cases. It is further stated therein that in fact higher percentage of population fully vaccinated have higher COVID-19 per 1 million people.

(c) The United Kingdoms COVID-19 vaccine surveillance report, Week 40, which appears to indicate negative efficacy against infection amongst all ages above 30 years, on the basis of data between week 36 and week 39 in 2021.

Increases in COVID-19 are unrelated to levels of vaccination across 68 countries and 2947 counties in the United States Eur J Epidemiol 36, 1237-1240 (2021) 59 | Page

53. While we are aware that courts cannot decide whether natural immunity is more resilient as compared to vaccine-acquired immunity and we do not seek to substitute our own views in matters of differences in scientific opinion, we cannot help but notice that in the first article referred to above, published in Nature, it has been noted that immunity in convalescent individuals (i.e., those who have recovered from COVID-19) can be boosted further by vaccinating them after a year. According to the said article, this results in the generation of more plasma cells, together with an increase in the level of SARS-CoV-2 antibodies that was up to 50 times greater than before vaccination. In the second article referred to above, published in the European Journal of Epidemiology, it has been mentioned therein that the interpretation of the findings should be as follows: The sole reliance on vaccination as a primary strategy to mitigate COVID-19 and its adverse consequences needs to be re-examined, especially considering the Delta (B.1.617.2) variant and the likelihood of future variants. Other pharmacological and non-pharmacological interventions may need to be put in place alongside increasing vaccination rates. We do not see how these conclusions and interpretations are in favour of an argument that natural immunity has proven to be better in protection against COVID-19 infection, as compared to vaccine-acquired immunity.

54. In any event, what we have to assess, in accordance with the law laid down by this Court, is whether the Union of India has taken note of scientific and medical inputs and research findings in putting together its policy advocating vaccination for the entire eligible population. Article 47 of the Constitution of India imposes an obligation on the Union of India to improve public health. It is the obligation of the State to ensure the creation and the sustaining of conditions congenial to good health. From the several obligations of the State enshrined in Part IV of the Constitution, maintenance and improvement of public health rank high as these are indispensable to the very physical existence of the community.⁴²

55. It should be noted that the submission made on behalf of the Petitioner championing natural immunity is from the perspective of a healthy person. Even the Petitioner does not dispute the fact that the same standard is not applicable to persons with co-morbidities, the sick and elderly people. A cursory glance at the data recorded in the India Fact Sheet 42 Vincent Panikurlangara v. Union of India (1987) 2 SCC 165 61 | Page on the basis of the National Family Health Survey 5 (2019-

21) shows that (i) in the age group of 15-49 years, 57 per cent of women and 25 per cent of men are anaemic, (ii) amongst individuals aged above 15 years, 13.5 per cent of women and 15.6 per cent of men have high or very high blood sugar level or take medicines to control blood sugar level, (iii) amongst individuals aged above 15 years, 21.3 per cent of women and 24 per cent of men have hypertension or elevated blood pressure or take medicines to control blood pressure. Further, as per the 75th Round National Sample Survey (NSS), conducted from July 2017 to June 2018, the average age of the elderly population in India was 67.5 years, with 67.1 per cent of India's elderly living in rural areas. A study was conducted⁴³ on the basis of the data from the NSS, aiming to highlight the vulnerability of the aged amidst the COVID-19 pandemic. According to the study, out of every 100 elderly, 27.7 persons reported ailments during the previous 15 days, with cardiovascular conditions including hypertension (32.0%), endocrine conditions including diabetes (22.5%), musculoskeletal conditions (13.9%), infectious diseases (10.0%), and⁴⁴ Ranjan, A., Muraleedharan, V.R. Equity and elderly health in India: reflections from 75th round National Sample Survey, 2017-18, amidst the COVID-19 pandemic Global Health 16, 93 (2020) 62 | Page respiratory ailments (7.3%) being the top five conditions for seeking outpatient care among the elderly in the preceding 15 days. The Constitution, through Article 41, mandates the State to make available to the elderly the right to live with dignity and to provide the elderly, ill and disabled with assistance, medical facilities and geriatric care⁴⁴.

56. Surely, the Union of India is justified in centering its vaccination policy around the health of the population at large, with emphasis on insulating the weaker and more vulnerable sections from the risk of severe infection and its consequences, as opposed to basing its decision keeping in mind the interests of a healthy few. Given the considerable material filed before this Court reflecting the near-unanimous views of experts on the benefits of vaccination in dealing with severe disease, reduction in oxygen requirement, hospital and ICU admissions and mortality and stopping new variants from emerging, this Court is satisfied that the current vaccination policy of the Union of India, formulated in the interest of public health, is informed by relevant considerations and cannot be said to be unreasonable. Whether there is contrasting scientific opinion supporting the argument of natural immunity offering better protection 44 Ashwani Kumar v. Union of India (2019) 2 SCC 636 63 | Page against infection from COVID-19 and whether these scientific opinions can be substantiated are not pertinent for determination of the issue before this Court.

57. We now come to the crux of the challenge against coercive vaccine mandates, with respect to which the Petitioner has argued that they amount to restrictions on the fundamental rights of unvaccinated individuals and cannot be said to be proportionate, as according to the Petitioner, with the prevalence of the Omicron variant, unvaccinated people pose no greater danger to the transmission of the virus in comparison to vaccinated persons. It was claimed by the Petitioner that even if the vaccines reduced the severity of the disease, it was up to the individual to decide whether they wanted to be the beneficiary of vaccines. The States lookout was the protection of larger public health and with both the vaccinated and unvaccinated posing nearly equal risks in transmission of the infection to others around them, the State cannot impose restrictions targeting only the unvaccinated and impeding their right to access public resources. The Petitioner has thus, alleged discrimination against the unvaccinated, who in the present situation, are placed more or less on the same footing as vaccinated individuals with respect to the transmission of the virus. In 64 | Page support of his submissions, the Petitioner has relied on scientific studies and reports, some of which are listed below:

(a) A letter published in the *Lancet, Regional Health*⁴⁵, which states: In the UK it was described that secondary attack rates among household contacts exposed to fully vaccinated index cases was similar to household contacts exposed to unvaccinated index cases (25% for vaccinated vs 23% for unvaccinated). 12 of 31 infections in fully vaccinated household contacts (39%) arose from fully vaccinated epidemiologically linked index cases. Peak viral load did not differ by vaccination status or variant type. The US Centres for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) identifies four of the top five counties with the highest percentage of fully vaccinated population (99.984.3%) as high transmission counties. Many decisionmakers assume that the vaccinated can be excluded as a source of transmission. It appears to be grossly negligent to ignore the vaccinated population as a possible and relevant source of transmission when deciding about public health control measures. 45 Gunter Kampf, Letter titled The Epidemiological relevance of the COVID-19 vaccinated population is increasing Lancet Regional Health Vol. 11, 100272, December 01, 2021 65 | Page

(b) A study conducted on breakthrough infection in Massachusetts in July, 2021 and reported in the *Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report*⁴⁶, which investigated 469 COVID-19 cases that had been identified among the Massachusetts residents who had travelled to a town where multiple large public events had been held and 346 cases, i.e., 74 per cent of the infections occurred in fully vaccinated individuals. Findings from the investigation suggest that even jurisdictions without substantial or high COVID-19 transmission might consider expanding prevention strategies, including masking in indoor public settings regardless of vaccination status, given the potential risk of infection during attendance at large public gatherings that include travelers from many areas with differing levels of transmission.

The Petitioner has also cited various news articles reporting instances of breakthrough infections in fully vaccinated people, carrying as much virus as those who were unvaccinated, abroad as well as within India. 46 Brown CM, Vostok J, Johnson H, et al. Outbreak of SARS-CoV-2 Infections, Including COVID-19 Vaccine Breakthrough Infections, Associated with Large Public Gatherings Barnstable County, Massachusetts, July 2021. MMWR Morb Mortal Wkly Rep 2021;70:1059-1062

58. We have already referred to the material placed by the Union of India and the States appearing before this Court. While there is abundant data to show that getting vaccinated continues to be the dominant expert advice even in the face of new variants, no submission nor any data has been put forth to justify restrictions only on unvaccinated individuals when emerging scientific evidence appears to indicate that the risk of transmission of the virus from unvaccinated individuals is almost on par with that from vaccinated persons. To put it differently, neither the Union of India nor the State Governments have produced any material before this Court to justify the discriminatory treatment of unvaccinated individuals in public places by imposition of vaccine mandates. No doubt that when COVID-19 vaccines came into the picture, they were expected to address, and were indeed found to be successful in dealing with, the risk of infection from the variants in circulation at the time. However, with the virus mutating, we have seen more potent variants surface which have broken through the vaccination barrier to some extent. While vaccination mandates in the era of prevalence of the variants prior to the Delta variant may have withstood constitutional scrutiny, in light of the data presented by the Petitioner, which has not been 67 | Page controverted by the Union of India as well as the State Governments, we are of the opinion that the restrictions on unvaccinated individuals imposed through vaccine mandates cannot be considered to be proportionate, especially since both vaccinated and unvaccinated individuals presently appear to be susceptible to transmission of the virus at similar levels.

59. Details of the vaccine mandates passed by the States of Maharashtra, Tamil Nadu, Madhya Pradesh and Delhi have been discussed earlier. It has come to our knowledge that since the judgment in this matter was reserved, the National Disaster Management Authority took a decision that there may not be any further need to invoke provisions of the DM Act for COVID-19 containment measures, taking into consideration the overall improvement in the situation. Further, the States of Maharashtra and Tamil Nadu, taking into account the present situation in which near-normalcy has been restored, have rolled back the restrictions placed on unvaccinated persons. The State of Madhya Pradesh had withdrawn the restrictions imposed on unvaccinated individuals in terms of withholding distribution of food grains from fair price shops and had notified this Court of the same during the hearing. Till the infection rate and spread 68 | Page remains low, as it is currently, and any new development or research finding comes to light which provides the Government due justification to impose reasonable and proportionate restrictions on the rights of unvaccinated individuals in furtherance of the continuing efforts to combat this pandemic, we suggest that all authorities in this country, including private organisations and educational institutions, review the relevant orders and instructions imposing restrictions on unvaccinated individuals in terms of access to public places, services and resources.

60. While we appreciate that it is the domain of the executive to determine how best to encourage vaccination without unduly encroaching into the fundamental rights of unvaccinated individuals, we wish to highlight the mechanism of the health pass employed in France, as an apt example of a proportionate measure intended to cope with the perils of the spread of the virus. We understand that a health pass may take the form of either the results of a viral screening test not concluding that a person has been infected with COVID-19, or proof of vaccination status, or a certificate of recovery following an infection. In a referral by the Prime Minister to review the law on managing the public health state of emergency, the Constitutional Council in France, in Decision no. 2021-824 DC dated 05.08.2021, determined that the health pass did not infringe the right to personal privacy guaranteed by Article 2 of the Declaration of Human and Civic Rights of 1789 as the requirement did not introduce an obligation to vaccinate.

61. Having expressed our opinion on the vaccine mandates in the prevailing context, we reiterate that vaccines effectively address severe disease arising from COVID-19 infections, are instrumental in reducing oxygen requirement, hospital and ICU admissions and mortality and continue to be the solution to stopping new variants from emerging, as per the advice of the WHO. Since the time arguments were heard in the matter, we have come to know of more variants that have now come into circulation. Given the rapidly- changing nature of the virus and the clear purpose served by the approved vaccines in terms of restoration and protection of public health, our suggestions with respect to review of vaccine mandates are limited to the present situation alone. This judgment is not to be construed as impeding, in any manner, the lawful exercise of power by the executive to take suitable measures for prevention of infection and transmission of the virus in public interest, which may also take the form of restrictions on unvaccinated people in the future, if the situation so warrants. Such restrictions will be subject to constitutional scrutiny to examine if they meet the threefold requirement for intrusion into rights of individuals, as discussed earlier.

II. Non-disclosure of segregated clinical trial data in public domain

62. It is the complaint of the Petitioner that the COVID-19 vaccines, manufactured by Respondent Nos. 4 and 5, have been given restricted emergency approval by the Drugs Controller General of India (DCGI) in a hurried and opaque manner. Mr. Bhushan argued that clinical trials in respect of the vaccines had not been completed and at present, the vaccines are only authorised for emergency use. According to the Petitioner, while clinical trials are scheduled to be completed in the year 2023, even the full dataset from the interim analysis conducted has not been made public. The disclosure of segregated data of clinical trials is essential to determine the adverse effects, if any, across various age groups and diverse populations and accordingly, enable individuals to make more informed decisions on whether to be vaccinated. Reliance was placed on an order of this Court in Aruna Rodrigues (4) v. Union of India 47 and a 47 (2011) 12 SCC 481 71 | Page judgment of the Delhi

High Court dated 15.01.2019 in W.P. (C) No. 343 of 2019 titled Master Hridaan Kumar (minor) v. Union of India with respect to the importance of disclosure of relevant technical data and informed consent. Additionally, the last amended version of the Declaration of Helsinki Ethical principles from medical research involving human subjects (hereinafter, the Declaration of Helsinki) and a statement by the WHO dated 09.04.2015 on public disclosure of clinical trial results (hereinafter, the WHO Statement on Clinical Trials) were pressed into service to establish the significance of disclosure of data of clinical trials, so as to enable the data to be assessed independently, and not only by the vaccine manufacturer who has a commercial interest in production of the vaccines. Mr. Bhushan submitted that there would be no invasion of privacy of individuals, if personal identification data and past medical history of the trial participants was redacted and the raw data pertaining to clinical trials is made public. The further grievance of the Petitioner pertained to lack of transparency in regulatory approvals, minutes of meetings and constitution of expert bodies. The Petitioner has sought for clear detailing of the information furnished before, and evidence relied on by, the expert bodies such as the NTAGI 72 | P a g e and the Subject Expert Committee (SEC), the body which sends recommendations to the Central Drugs Standard Control Organisation, while deliberating on the applications and data of the vaccine manufacturers, and the names and institutional relationships of the experts who participated in each of these meetings. Mr. Bhushan relied on the 59 th Report of the Parliamentary Standing Committee on Health and Family Welfare, in support of his submission on a need for transparency in the decision-making of the CDSCO and other regulatory authorities.

63. In response, the Union of India submitted that the procedure prescribed under the statutory regime was scrupulously followed before granting emergency approval of the vaccines manufactured by Respondent Nos. 4 and 5. As per the extant statutory regime, permission to import or manufacture new drugs including vaccines or to undertake clinical trials is granted by the Central Drugs Standard Control Organisation (CDSCO). The CDSCO, in consultation with the SEC, evaluates the applications for grant of such permission, which are to be accompanied with data as required under the Second Schedule to the New Drugs and Clinical Trials Rules, 2019 (hereinafter, the 2019 Rules) framed under the Drugs and Cosmetics Act, 1940. The SEC 73 | P a g e is a statutory body, constituted by the CDSCO under Rule 100 of the 2019 Rules, comprising group of experts with specialisation in relevant fields. According to the Union of India, the SEC looks into the details of trials and results presented before it and examines them, interacts with the developers of the vaccines and gives them appropriate directions and eventually makes recommendations in writing, by way of a resolution, reflecting the collective opinion of all the domain experts. We were informed that the trials have been registered on the database of the Clinical Trials Registry India, which is hosted at the ICMRs National Institute of Medical Statistics. The provisions in relation to Accelerated Approval Process under the Second Schedule to the 2019 Rules were pointed out to this Court, which stipulate that accelerated approval process may be allowed to a new drug for a disease or condition taking into account its severity, rarity, or prevalence and the availability or lack of alternative treatments, provided that there is a prima facie case of the product being of meaningful therapeutic benefit over the existing treatment. It is further stated that After granting accelerated approval for such drug, the post marketing trials shall be required to validate the anticipated clinical benefit . It was submitted that applying these provisions on 74 | P a g e Accelerated Approval Process, the CDSCO, in detailed consultation with the SEC and after examining the efficacy of the vaccine and its effects, granted permission for restricted emergency use of COVAXIN and COVISHIELD, as manufactured by Respondent Nos. 4 and 5, respectively.

64. As regards COVAXIN (Whole Virion Inactivated Corona Virus Vaccine), the Union of India stated that application for permission to manufacture the vaccine was made by Bharat Biotech on 23.04.2020. The CDSCO, in consultation with the SEC, granted permission to Bharat Biotech for conducting Phase I/II clinical trials on 29.06.2020 and Phase III clinical trials on 23.10.2020. Respondent No. 4 submitted interim safety and immunogenicity data of Phase I and Phase II clinical trials carried out in the country, along with safety data, including Serious Adverse Events data, of the ongoing Phase III clinical trial in the country. The data provided by Respondent No.4 from the various phases were evaluated and analysed by the SEC, which consisted of eminent experts from the fields of microbiology, medicine, pulmonary medicine, paediatrics and immunology and immunogenetics. The resolutions of the various meetings of the SEC, which also required the presence of the developer / manufacturer with the necessary information, have been put up on the 75 | P a g e website of the MoHFW at every stage. In its meeting dated 02.01.2021, observing that on receiving further updated data, justification and request for consideration of the proposal in the wake of a new mutation of the COVID-19 virus, and on recognising that the data generated till then showed that the vaccine had the potential to target mutated coronavirus strains, the SEC recommended for grant of permission for restricted use in emergency situation in public interest in clinical trial mode, as an abundant precaution. While granting such permission, Respondent No. 4 was directed to continue the ongoing Phase III clinical trial and submit data from the trial, as and when available. Approval for restricted use in emergency situation in clinical trial mode with various conditions / restrictions was granted by the CDSCO to Respondent No. 4 to manufacture COVAXIN on 03.01.2021.

65. Thereafter, Respondent No. 4 submitted the interim safety and efficacy data of Phase III clinical trial, which was reviewed by the SEC in meetings held periodically. In its meeting conducted on 10.03.2021, the SEC, after detailed deliberation on the updated interim safety and efficacy data of the phase III clinical trial, recommended omission of the condition of the use of the vaccine in clinical trial mode.

76 | P a g e However, it was recommended that the vaccine be continued to be used under restricted use in emergency situation condition. Following expansion of the Governments vaccination drive to include individuals in the age group of 18-45 years, in its meeting held on 23.04.2021, the SEC considered Bharat Biotechs proposal to unblind the trial participants in the said age group. After detailed deliberations, the SEC recommended the unblinding of the participants in the said age group, upon the request of the participants or the principal investigator after completion of two months from the second dose. Eventually, on consideration of relevant data of Phase I and Phase II clinical trials along with safety data of 6 months Phase III clinical trial, including data of serious adverse events till the date, the SEC in its meeting dated 19.01.2022 noted that there had been no safety issues and the vaccine maintained its efficacy, specially to avoid hospitalisation and severe infections in the existing situation as well. Accordingly, the SEC recommended that the status of approval of COVAXIN from the restricted use in emergency situation to the New Drug permission be updated, along with the condition that the firm shall continue to submit data of ongoing clinical trial and monitor AEFIs. The Union of India pointed out that 77 | P a g e Phase I and Phase II clinical trial reports were published in the Lancet Infectious Diseases Journal, which was publicly available. Further, to the knowledge of the Union of India, Phase III trial publication had been submitted to the Lancet journal by Respondent No. 4 on 02.07.2021, a copy of the manuscript of which has been provided to this Court.

66. COVISHIELD (ChAdOx1 nCoV-19 Corona Virus Vaccine (Recombinant)) manufactured by Respondent No. 5 was developed by the Serum Institute of India in collaboration with Oxford University and AstraZeneca under technology transfer. As the clinical development of the said vaccine, including Phase I clinical trial, was conducted in other countries, Phase II / III clinical trials were conducted by Respondent No. 5 in the country. Application for permission to manufacture COVISHIELD for test, examination and analysis was first made by Respondent No. 5 on 03.05.2020. The safety, immunogenicity and efficacy data of Phase II / III clinical trials of the AstraZeneca vaccine carried out in the United Kingdom, Brazil and South Africa were submitted to the SEC, along with the safety and immunogenicity data from the ongoing Phase II / III clinical trials in India. On reviewing this data as well as the approval dated 30.12.2020 granted by the United Kingdoms Medicines and Healthcare Products 78 | P a g e Regulatory Authority (hereinafter, the UK-MHRA) for the AstraZeneca vaccine along with its conditions / restrictions, the SEC, in its meeting dated 01.01.2021, noted that the safety and immunogenicity data from the Indian study was comparable with that of the overseas clinical trial data. After detailed deliberation and taking into account the emerging situation, the SEC recommended grant of permission for restricted emergency use of the vaccine, subject to various regulatory provisions and conditions, including requirement to submit relevant data from the ongoing clinical trials nationally and internationally at its earliest. Eventually, in its meeting dated 19.01.2022, the SEC considered the request of Respondent No. 5 to grant permission to manufacture the vaccine, excluding the conditions for restricted use in emergency situation and other conditions, on the lines of Marketing Authorisation by the UK-MHRA for the parent vaccine. After detailed deliberation and consideration of safety, immunogenicity and efficacy data from Indian and overseas clinical trials, amongst other data, the SEC recommended grant of New Drug permission or regular approval, with conditions that data of ongoing clinical trials and vaccine shall continue to be supplied and AEFIs shall continue to be monitored.

67. We were directed to Rule 25 of the 2019 Rules, framed under the Drugs and Cosmetics Act, 1940, which provides that the clinical trial shall be conducted in accordance with approved clinical trial protocol and other related documents as per the requirements of Good Clinical Practices (GCP) guidelines and the other rules. The expert committee set up by the CDSCO under Rule 25(vi) in consultation with clinical experts formulated the GCP guidelines for generation of data on drugs. The Ethical Principles, which are part of the said guidelines, protect principles of privacy and confidentiality of human subjects of research. The learned Solicitor General also relied upon para 2.4.4 of the GCP guidelines, which require safeguarding of the confidentiality of research data that might lead to identification of individual subjects. He further referred to the important role played by the Ethics Committee under Rule 11 of the 2019 Rules, which includes safeguarding the rights, safety and well-being of trial subjects in accordance with the said rules. The 2019 Rules also empower the Ethics Committee to discontinue or suspend the clinical trial in case it concludes that the trial is likely to compromise the right, safety or well-being of the trial subject. As per the ICMRs National Ethical Guidelines 80 | P a g e for Biomedical and Health Research involving Human Participants, the four basic ethical principles for conducting biomedical and health research are (i) respect for persons (autonomy), (ii) beneficence, (iii) non-maleficence and (iv) justice. These four basic principles have been expanded into 12 general principles, including the principle of ensuring privacy and confidentiality which requires maintaining the privacy of potential participants, her / his identity and records, with access given to only those authorised. As regards transparency of functioning of expert bodies, it was submitted by the Union of India that recommendations of the SEC in all its meetings are uploaded on the website of the CDSCO. Additionally, the detailed minutes of NTAGI meetings were already available in public domain, which can be downloaded from both the ICMR and the MoHFW websites.

68. The contention of Respondent No. 4 is that COVAXIN has undergone all clinical trials. In Phase III, trials revealed a 77.8% efficacy against symptomatic COVID-19 disease. The findings of the clinical trials have been published in reputed peer-reviewed journals and are readily available on the website of Respondent No.4. A reference was made by Respondent No. 4 to the WHO Statement on Clinical Trials, to submit that it is only the key outcomes and findings which 81 | P a g e are required to be made publicly available. It was contended that Respondent No. 4 is in compliance with the WHO Statement on Clinical Trials as the key outcomes and results of the Phase III clinical trial have been published in the Lancet. On behalf of Respondent No. 5, it was submitted that the clinical data generated during the trials had been submitted to the regulatory authorities for obtaining permissions / licences etc. Further, the peer-reviewed study of the partial clinical data of Phase II / III trials had already been published in reputed scientific journals, which included all the information necessary for safeguarding the public as well as informing them of the credibility and efficacy of the vaccine. According to Respondent No. 5, the raw data of the clinical trials served no greater public purpose than the data which was already available in the public domain. All applicable medico-legal, scientific and ethical requirements had been strictly adhered to by Respondent No. 5.

69. In rejoinder, the learned counsel for the Petitioner argued that there is no transparency in the process of approvals of vaccines and relevant data is not always placed before the NTAGI. He referred to a news article in The Wire, according to which Jayaprakash Muliyil, a member of the NTAGI had stated that the NTAGI had not recommended 82 | P a g e vaccination of children in the age group of 12-14 years. He also drew the attention of this Court to non-supply of relevant data to the NTAGI at the time of approval of the Rotavac vaccine against rotavirus. The Petitioner further complained of the haste shown in grant of emergency approval to Respondent No. 4. The Petitioner has sought support of a decision of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas dated 06.01.2022 in Public Health and Medical Professionals for Transparency v. Food and Drug Administration, which highlighted the need for transparency in disclosure of clinical trial data. It was reiterated by the Petitioner that privacy of individuals would not be at risk as their personal identification data can be redacted before disclosing segregated data of clinical trials.

70. It is settled law that courts cannot take judicial notice of facts stated in a news item published in a newspaper. A statement of fact contained in a newspaper is merely hearsay and therefore, inadmissible in evidence, unless proved by the maker of the statement appearing in court and deposing to have perceived the fact reported. 48 In the absence of anything on record in the present case to substantiate the statement made by Mr. Jayaprakash Muliyl, 48 Laxmi Raj Shetty v. State of Tamil Nadu (1988) 3 SCC 319 83 | P a g e member of the NTAGI, we are not inclined to take judicial notice of the news article reported in The Wire, even more so in light of the affidavit filed on behalf of the Union of India stating that the relevant data was examined by the expert bodies at all stages before granting emergency use approval to the vaccines. We are also of the opinion that the evidence relating to the approval process of the Rotavac vaccine has no relevance to the dispute in this case. On the basis of the said two incidents, it cannot be concluded that the emergency use approval to COVISHIELD and COVAXIN recommended by the SEC are not in accordance with the statutory regime.

71. At this stage, it is worthwhile to refer to the statutory regime in place. According to Rule 19 of the 2019 Rules, no person, institution or organisation shall conduct clinical trial of a new drug or investigational new drug, except in accordance with the permission granted by the Central Licensing Authority (i.e., the CDSCO) and without following the protocol approved by the Ethics Committee for clinical trial, registered in accordance with the provisions of Rule 8. Rule 19 (2) of the 2019 Rules provides that every person associated with the conduct of clinical trial of a new drug or investigational new drug shall follow the general principles 84 | P a g e and practices as specified in the First Schedule. The methodology to be adopted in a clinical trial is provided for in the First Schedule to the 2019 Rules, relevant clauses of which are as under: -

GENERAL PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICES FOR CLINICAL TRIAL

1. General Principles. (1) The principles and guidelines for protection of trial subjects as described in Third Schedule as well as Good Clinical Practices guidelines shall be followed in conduct of any clinical trial. xxx

4. Conduct of Clinical Trial. Clinical trial should be conducted in accordance with the principles as specified in Third Schedule. Adherence to the clinical trial protocol is essential and if amendment of the protocol becomes necessary the rationale for the amendment shall be provided in the form of a protocol amendment. Serious adverse events shall be reported during clinical trial in accordance with these Rules.

xxx

6. Reporting. Report of clinical trial shall be documented in accordance with the approaches specified in Table 6 of the Third Schedule. The report shall be certified by the principal investigator or if no principal investigator is designated then by each of the participating investigators of the study. It is clear from the above, that there are stringent statutory requirements which have to be complied with by the manufacturers of vaccines and other participants, during different stages of clinical trials of vaccines. Further, we also 85 | P a g e note that the GCP guidelines are statutorily required to be followed.

72. The GCP guidelines further elaborate on the role of the Ethics Committee. According to the GCP guidelines, the Ethics Committee is an independent review board or a committee comprising of medical / scientific and non-medical / non-scientific members, whose responsibility it is to verify the protection of the rights, safety and well-being of human subjects involved in a study. The independent review provides public reassurance by objectively, independently and impartially reviewing and approving the Protocol, the suitability of the investigator(s), facilities, methods and material to be used for obtaining and documenting Informed Consent of the study subjects and adequacy of confidentiality safeguards. Para 2.4 of the GCP guidelines deal with ethical and safety considerations, which provide that all research involving human subjects should be conducted in accordance with the ethical principles contained in the current version of the Declaration of Helsinki, as annexed to the guidelines. Amongst the principles to be followed, the GCP guidelines require adherence to the principles of accountability and transparency and principles of public domain:

86 | P a g e Principles of accountability and transparency, whereby the research or experiment will be conducted in a fair, honest, impartial and transparent manner, after full disclosure is made by those associated with the Study of each aspect of their interest in the Study, and any conflict of interest that may exist; and whereby, subject to the principles of privacy and confidentiality and the rights of the researcher, full and complete records of the research inclusive of data and notes are retained for such reasonable period as may be prescribed or considered necessary for the purposes of post-research monitoring, evaluation of the research, conducting further research (whether by the initial researcher or otherwise) and in order to make such records available for scrutiny by the appropriate legal and administrative authority, if necessary. xxx Principles of public domain, whereby the research and any further research, experimentation or evaluation in response to, and emanating from such research is brought into the public domain so that its results are generally made known through scientific and other publications subject to such rights as are available to the researcher and those associated with the research under the law in force at that time.

73. The GCP guidelines have been formulated following the Declaration of Helsinki. The relevant portion of the said Declaration is as follows: -

Privacy and Confidentiality

24. Every precaution must be taken to protect the privacy of research subjects and the confidentiality of their personal information.

87 | P a g e Research Registration and Publication and Dissemination of Results

36. Researchers, authors, sponsors, editors and publishers all have ethical obligations with regard to the publication and dissemination of the results of research. Researchers have a duty to make publicly available the results of their research on human subjects and are accountable for the completeness and accuracy of their reports. All parties should adhere to accepted guidelines for ethical reporting. Negative and inconclusive as well as positive results must be published or otherwise made publicly available. Sources of funding, institutional affiliations and conflicts of interest must be declared in the publication. Reports of research not in accordance with the principles of this Declaration should not be accepted for publication. It is profitable to refer to the relevant portion of the WHO Statement on Clinical Trials, which is as under: -

Reporting timeframes for clinical trials Clinical trial results are to be reported according to the timeframes outlined below. Reporting is to occur in BOTH of the following two modalities.

1. The main findings of clinical trials are to be submitted for publication in a peer reviewed journal within 12 months of study completion and are to be published through an open access mechanism unless there is a specific reason why open access cannot be used, or otherwise made available publicly at most within 24 months of study completion.

2. In addition, the key outcomes are to be made publicly available within 12 months of study completion by posting to the results section of the primary clinical trial 88 | P a g e registry. Where a registry is used without a results database available, the results should be posted on a free-to-access, publicly available, searchable institutional website of the Regulatory Sponsor, Funder or Principal Investigator.

74. The GCP guidelines are being scrupulously followed, according to the Union of India. The principles of public domain in the GCP guidelines provide for research, experimentation or evaluation in response to the research to be brought into the public domain. The results of the clinical trials are generally to be made known through scientific and other publications. The requirement of publication, according to the WHO, also relates to the main findings of clinical trials to be published in a peer-reviewed journal and the key outcomes to be made publicly available, within 12 months of study completion. The Petitioner complains of opaqueness in clinical trials as the general public do not have access to, and the opportunity to be aware of, all the necessary details by segregated clinical trial data (primary datasets) not being available. There is no challenge by the Petitioner to the GCP guidelines. As required by the WHO Statement on Clinical Trials and the GCP guidelines, findings of the clinical trials and the key outcomes of the trials have been published. In light of the existing statutory regime, we do not see it fit to 89 | P a g e mandate the disclosure of primary clinical trial data, when the results and key findings of such clinical trials have already been published.

75. After examining the judgment of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas (hereinafter, the US District Court), we are afraid that the said decision cannot be said to be relevant for adjudication of the dispute in the present case. The grievance of the plaintiff in the said case pertained to all data and information for the Pfizer vaccine, enumerated under the relevant provisions of the Freedom of Information Act, not being provided by the United States Food and Drug Administration. The US District Court referred to the Freedom of Information Act to hold that the citizenry has a right to be provided with the relevant information pertaining to the Pfizer vaccine and that such information is often useful only if it is timely. The US District Court directed expeditious completion of the plaintiffs request after concluding that the request under the Freedom of Information Act was of paramount importance. We note that with respect to COVAXIN and COVISHIELD, results of clinical trials have been published in accordance with our statutory regime in place. Reliance placed by the Petitioner on European Medicines Agency policy on 90 | P a g e publication of clinical data for medicinal products for human use is also not relevant as the GCP guidelines relating to the disclosure of clinical trial data, framed under the 2019 Rules, currently govern the field of disclosure of clinical trial data in India.

76. An analysis of the submissions made by the learned counsel appearing for the parties and a close scrutiny of the material placed on record would show that there is a strict statutory regime in force for grant of approvals to vaccines. Specialist bodies established under the provisions of the Drugs and Cosmetics Act, 1940 and the rules framed thereunder comprise of domain experts in the relevant field, who conduct a thorough scrutiny of the material produced by the manufacturers before granting approval. The information provided on behalf of the Union of India substantiates that the data provided by the vaccine manufacturers was considered by the SEC over a period of time and several conditions were imposed at the time of recommending approvals, which have been modified or lifted subsequently on availability of further data arising from the clinical trials before the SEC, as can be seen from the minutes of the meetings of the SEC, available on the website of the MoHFW.

91 | P a g e We do not agree with the submission on behalf of the Petitioner that emergency approvals to the vaccines were given in haste, without properly reviewing the data from clinical trials. We are also of the opinion that the Parliamentary Standing Committee report relied upon by Mr. Bhushan is not relevant and the lapses pointed out therein pertain to the year 2011, which have no obvious connection to the grant of approval to Respondent Nos. 4 and 5 for the restricted emergency use of their respective vaccines. As long as the relevant information relating to the minutes of the meetings of the regulatory bodies and the key outcomes and findings of the trials are available in public domain, the Petitioner cannot contend that every minute detail relating to clinical trials be placed in public domain to enable an individual to take an informed, conscious decision to be vaccinated or not. Given the widespread affliction caused by the virus, there was an imminent need of manufacturing vaccines which would keep the infection at bay. We would like to highlight that both the vaccines have been approved by the WHO as well. A perusal of the material placed on record would show that there is material compliance with the procedure prescribed under the Drugs and Cosmetics Act, 1940 and the 2019 Rules, before grant of approval for the 92 | P a g e emergency use of the two vaccines. However, it is made clear that subject to the protection of privacy of individual subjects and to the extent permissible by the 2019 Rules, the relevant data which is required to be published under the statutory regime and the WHO Statement on Clinical Trials shall be made available to the public without undue delay, with respect to the ongoing post-marketing trials of COVAXIN and COVISHIELD as well as ongoing clinical trials or trials that may be conducted subsequently for approval of other COVID- 19 vaccines / vaccine candidates.

III. Improper collection and reporting of AEFIs

77. The contention of the Petitioner is that there have been several adverse effects from vaccines, including deaths. The Petitioner has sought to fault the Governments mechanisms in place for handling of the adverse events. According to the Petitioner, during Phase III trials, where small controlled trials of a limited number of participants are conducted, a significant increase in adverse events may not be seen. But after licensure, when the vaccines are administered to the masses, rare reactions show up, which is why Phase IV post-marketing trials are legally mandated. It was pointed out by the Petitioner that there has been a 93 | P a g e revision of the rules by the WHO for classifying AEFIs in 2018. As per the revised mechanism, only reactions that are previously acknowledged to be caused by the vaccine are classified as vaccine-related reactions. Reactions observed during post-marketing surveillance are not considered as consistent with causal association with vaccine, if a significant increase in such reactions during Phase III trials had not been recorded. According to the Petitioner, this acquires significance in the context of trials conducted in this country, as the control trial in Phase III did not go on in the manner intended, with several members of the original control group prematurely unblinded and offered the vaccine. The Petitioner contends that owing to dilution of Phase III control trials prematurely, there are no controls to compare against, making it difficult to ascertain which adverse events are caused by the vaccine. Therefore, reactions which are not known reactions to the vaccine are not considered AEFIs. In light of this, it is necessary for the authorities to carefully monitor all vaccine recipients and publicly record all adverse events.

78. Taking this argument further, the Petitioner contended that the adverse events reporting system in India is not transparent, with obscure investigation and follow-up of 94 | P a g e deaths and other serious adverse events after COVID-19 vaccination. The Petitioner relied on a letter published in The Hindu on 17.03.2021, written by a group of experts in public health, ethics, medicine, law, and journalism to the Minister for Health & Family Welfare and the DCGI, appealing for time-bound and transparent investigation following deaths and serious adverse effects after COVID-19 vaccination. A presentation made by the National AEFI Committee in a meeting held on 31.03.2021 was referred to by the Petitioner to claim that complete documentation was not available for all the severe and serious adverse events (including deaths) that had occurred till the time. Additionally, it was contended that no data pertaining to the AEFIs already classified nor any analysis of the same had been published publicly till date. The Petitioner also drew the attention of this Court to the Vaccine Adverse Event Reporting System (VAERS) in place in the United States, which published all vaccine injury reports every Friday, received till about a week prior to the release date. It was brought to the notice of this Court that 77,314 adverse events have been reported in India as on 12.03.2022, amounting to 0.004% of the total vaccination. The Petitioner has pointed out that the percentage of adverse events 95 | P a g e reported in Europe is much larger than the percentage identified in India, which would show that correct figures are not being published by the Government.

79. On behalf of the Union of India, the procedures and protocols for monitoring of adverse event following immunisation under the National Adverse Event Following Immunisation Surveillance Guideline were elaborated upon. The National Adverse Event Following Immunisation Surveillance Secretariat, established in the Immunisation Technical Support Unit in 2012, had staff dedicated for managing Adverse Event Following Immunisation surveillance system. It was further strengthened by the National Adverse Event Following Immunisation Surveillance Technical Collaborating Centre, comprising of experts from Lady Hardinge Medical College and Allied Hospitals in New Delhi. Adverse Event Following Immunisation Committees were formed at the national and state levels to provide guidance to the National AEFI Surveillance and carry out documentation, investigation and causality assessment, besides training and orientation of health care workers and others involved in AEFI. According to the Union of India, a foolproof protocol for reporting and causality assessment for any AEFI with Universal Immunisation Program (UIP) and 96 | P a g e Non-UIP vaccines has been established. The National AEFI Committee gets periodical reports regarding minor AEFIs, severe AEFIs and serious AEFIs. Online reporting of all serious and severe AEFIs at the district level to be communicated to relevant authorities at the state / national level is done on a web-based portal, SAFEVAC (Surveillance and Action for Events Following Vaccination). All serious and severe adverse events following vaccination even at district level are uploaded online on SAFEVAC. It was submitted on behalf of the Union of India that case details, scanned copies of reports are uploaded on SAFEVAC, which also has facilities for generating dashboards and line-lists at different levels.

80. Further, a similar feature of reporting of all AEFIs (including minor) by the vaccinator was made available on the Co-WIN portal. District Immunisation Officers (DIOs) were given the facility to report AEFI cases about which they have information from such individuals who do not have access to Co-WIN. Departmental orders and standard operating procedures have been issued for further investigations and sharing of hospital records by the DIOs through Co-WIN. The Union of India has brought to the notice of this Court that an alignment with the Pharmacovigilance Programme of India (PvPI) under Indian 97 | P a g e Pharmacopoeia Commission has been developed for receipt of information regarding AEFI cases from around 300 Adverse Drug Reaction Monitoring Centers in medical colleges and large hospitals. The Union of India has highlighted that information from the PvPI and the CDSCO are collated and studied, in case of any new, previously unknown events identified through AEFI surveillance. A press release of the MoHFW dated 17.02.2017 titled Maximum Possible Marks to Indian NRA in WHO Assessment has been placed before this Court to state that the AEFI Surveillance System in India (which is in use for COVID-19 vaccination) has been approved by global experts in an assessment conducted by the WHO in 2017. Given the novel nature of the virus, membership of the National AEFI Committee has been expanded to include neurologists, cardiologists, respiratory medicine specialists and medical specialists, with even States / Union Territories requested to expand their AEFI Committees on a similar scale to strengthen AEFI surveillance for COVID-19 vaccines. Causality assessment of AEFI cases is conducted at the state and the national levels by experts trained as per the causality assessment checklist, based on the definition and algorithm developed by the WHO. Once approved by experts of the National AEFI Committee, results of causality 98 | P a g e assessment of AEFI cases are made available in the public domain and are shared with the CDSCO, amongst other authorities, for appropriate regulatory action.

81. As regards the present status of AEFI surveillance for COVID-19 vaccination, it was submitted that as the causality assessment of reported AEFI cases is a time-consuming process, a method of rapid review and assessment had been initiated at the national level to quickly review available information in each case and look for trends in reporting of specific events or unusual cases requiring further early investigation and assessment. All cases of serious and severe AEFIs, including reported deaths, are subjected to rapid reviews, analysis and causality assessment done by a team of trained subject experts. It was clarified that mere reporting of AEFI case should not be attributed to the vaccine unless proved by the causality assessment analysis. The National Expert Group on Vaccine Administration for COVID- 19 (NEGVAC), an additional body of experts, is also involved in providing guidance on vaccine safety and surveillance, thus, aiding in the prompt identification of AEFIs for the purpose of identifying and understanding evolving trends in the disease and taking prompt action. 2,116 serious and severe AEFIs have been reported from 1,19,38,44,741 doses 99 | P a g e of COVID-19 vaccine administered till 24.11.2021. While a report of rapid review and analysis completed for 495 cases had been submitted, a further report of 1,356 serious and severe AEFI cases had been presented to the NEGVAC and the rapid review and analysis of balance cases was underway. Press releases around a report on bleeding and clotting events following COVID-19 vaccination being submitted to the MoHFW by the National AEFI Committee and on clarification on deaths following vaccination and process of causality assessment were placed before this Court. Therefore, the Union of India submitted that there was continuous monitoring and examination of AEFI cases in India and there is no basis for the allegations around AEFIs not being properly collected and lack of transparency in their investigation.

82. From the material placed before us, we note that the National AEFI Surveillance Secretariat has been functioning for 10 years and as has been pointed out, there is a well- established protocol in place for identification and monitoring of AEFIs. The website of the MoHFW carries the results of causality assessment of AEFI cases, from which the public can obtain relevant information pertaining to AEFIs. We have been informed that a thorough causality assessment analysis 100 | P a g e of AEFIs is carried out by experts and not every severe disease and death can be attributed to vaccination. Reactions are examined by experts specifically trained to undertake causality analysis before notifying such reactions as adverse events arising from vaccination. There is a well- defined mechanism for collection of data relating to adverse events that occur due to COVID-19 vaccines and the Government of India has taken steps to direct all concerned medical professionals at the ground level to report adverse events. Even medical practitioners at private hospitals are associated with reporting of adverse events. Therefore, we are not inclined to accept the broad-strokes challenge mounted by the Petitioner that the surveillance system of AEFIs in this country is faulty and the correct figures of those who have suffered any side effects, severe reactions or deaths post-inoculation have not been disclosed.

83. As regards the contention of the Petitioner on abandoning of Phase III trials, we note that unblinding of participants during the Phase III trial was done on the recommendation of the SEC. The Union of India has emphasized that at every stage, the deliberations of domain experts, which involved discussions with the manufacturers, focused on safety and immunogenicity of the vaccines and it 101 | P a g e was only when there was consensus among domain experts that it was safe to extend the immunisation drive beyond the category of healthcare workers / frontline workers, the appropriate decisions were taken. In doing so, the available trial data, trajectory of the pandemic, evidence, future contingencies and several other factors have always been heeded. There is no challenge to the decision of the SEC, a body of domain experts, as being unreasonable or arbitrary, nor have we been called upon to determine whether adequate time was devoted to recognise all relevant reactions as vaccine-related reactions prior to such unblinding. What the Petitioner seeks is the monitoring of all adverse events and publication of the results of investigation. The Union of India has painstakingly taken this Court through the details of the procedure followed to closely monitor, review and escalate the incidence of AEFIs to appropriate authorities. As regards previously unknown / unidentified reactions seen during the monitoring of AEFIs at the time of vaccine administration, the Union of India has elaborated on the role of the PvPI and the CDSCO, which collate and study such reactions. We believe this adequately addresses the Petitioner's concerns, as this Court has been informed that previously unidentified events are also being taken into consideration and investigated. We trust the Union of India to have the appropriate authorities ensure that this leg of the AEFI surveillance system is not compromised while meeting the requirements of the rapid review and assessment system followed at the national level.

84. The Petitioner had taken issue with the present system to the extent it allows only DIOs or the vaccinators to report AEFIs. According to the Petitioner, the repository of AEFIs should be as detailed as the VAERS in the United State of America. The Petitioner further submitted that individuals and doctors must be able to report adverse events, with the reporter being given a unique identification number and the reports being openly accessible. The response of the Union of India on this issue is that the DIOs have been instructed to set up a network with private hospitals to report AEFIs. Training has been provided to state officers, medical officers, private practitioners and frontline health workers on their role in AEFI surveillance. Even auxiliary nurse midwives have been instructed to notify all AEFIs. However, we are in agreement with the suggestion made by the Petitioner that there should be a mechanism by which individuals and private doctors should be permitted to report suspected adverse events. Information relating to adverse effects following immunisation is crucial for the purpose of understanding the safety of the vaccines that are being administered, apart from being instrumental in further scientific studies around the pandemic. There is an imminent need for collection of requisite data of adverse events and wider participation of people in reporting the adverse events is necessary for the purpose of gathering correct information. Thus, the Union of India is directed to facilitate the reporting of suspected adverse events by individuals and private doctors on a virtual platform and the reports so made shall be publicly accessible after being given unique identification numbers, without listing any personal or confidential data of the persons reporting. All necessary steps to create awareness of, and to navigate, this platform for self-reporting shall be effectuated by the Government, roping in and training relevant participants right from the ground level of vaccine administration.

IV. Vaccination of Children

85. The opinion of the Petitioner is that children are at almost no risk from COVID-19 and instances of previously healthy children requiring hospitalisation due to COVID-19 are exceedingly rare. While referring to articles in the Nature and the Lancet, the Petitioner contended that scientific evidence shows that risk of administering vaccines to children outweigh the benefits offered by the vaccine in children. The Petitioner further submitted that serological studies would show that a large number of children have already acquired antibodies to COVID-19. The Petitioner has highlighted the risk of myocarditis associated with the mRNA vaccines, on the basis of which, several European countries have recently stopped the use of Moderna vaccines for those under the age of 30. He has also pointed out that these risks had not been identified in the initial vaccine trials as the trial size was too small to uncover rare risks, which were discovered after mass vaccination. The Petitioner has sought for results as well as the primary data of clinical trials conducted on the paediatric population to be made public.

86. In response thereto, the Union of India contended that paediatric vaccination is advised by global agencies such as the WHO, the UNICEF and the CDC. Expert opinion in India is in tune with global consensus in favour of vaccination of children. We are informed that 8,91,39,455 doses of COVAXIN have been administered to individuals in the age group of 15 to 18 years as on 12.03.2022. The AEFIs 105 | Page reported are 1,739 minor complaints, 81 serious complaints and 6 severe. According to the Union of India, the said data would show that the vaccine does not pose threat to the safety of children. As regards the clinical trials, para 2.4.6.2 of the GCP guidelines were relied on to show that children are not required to be involved in research that could be carried out equally well with adults and further that, for the clinical evaluation of a new drug, study in children should be carried out after the Phase III clinical trials in adults. It has been stated that paediatric vaccination was considered at a stage where more than substantial data on safety and immunogenicity of COVAXIN in adults was available. To avoid any risks, clinical trials were also conducted on a limited number of children as per the protocol approved by domain experts. Having found no serious adverse event in the said trials, paediatric vaccination was initiated in a phased manner, starting from the eldest paediatric age group of 15 to 18 years. On 12.05.2021, on the basis of recommendations of the SEC, the CDSCO granted permission to Respondent No. 4 to conduct Phase II / Phase III clinical trials of COVAXIN for the age group of 2 to 18 years. Thereafter, Respondent No. 4 had submitted an application for grant of permission to manufacture COVAXIN paediatric 106 | Page vaccines for emergency use, which was subsequently granted by the CDSCO. It was argued on behalf of the Union of India that expert opinion is to the effect that paediatric vaccinations are always preventive in nature and are administered to avoid any risk of infection and of prolonged clinical symptoms.

87. This Court cannot sit in judgment of leading scientific analysis relating to the safety of paediatric vaccination. Experts in science may themselves differ in their opinions while taking decisions on matters related to safety and allied aspects, but that does not entitle the Court to second-guess expert opinion, on the basis of which the Government has drawn up its policies. The decision taken by the Union of India to vaccinate paediatric population in this country is in tune with global scientific consensus and expert bodies like the WHO, the UNICEF and the CDC have also advised paediatric vaccination. It would not only be beyond our jurisdiction but also hazardous if this Court were to examine the accuracy of such expert opinion, based on competing medical opinions. As already stated, the scope of judicial review does not entail the Court embarking upon such misadventures. Therefore, we reject the contention of the 107 | Page Petitioner that this Court has to intervene in paediatric vaccination on the ground that it is unscientific.

88. With respect to results of clinical trials, we note that the Union of India has stated that the results of clinical trials of COVAXIN for paediatric population have already been published. We also note that for the age group of 12 to 14 years, Biological Es Corbevax is being administered. Keeping in line with the WHO Statement on Clinical Trials, the Declaration of Helsinki and the GCP guidelines, we direct the Union of India to ensure that key findings and results of the clinical trials of Corbevax be published at the earliest, if not already done. Neither vaccine is an mRNA vaccine and to this extent, the apprehensions of the Petitioner with respect to the associated risks of mRNA vaccines are unfounded in the present situation.

Conclusion

89. In conclusion, we have summarised our findings on the various issues considered by us, below:

(i) Given the issues urged by the Petitioner have a bearing on public health and concern the fundamental rights of individuals in this country, we are not inclined to 108 | P a g e entertain any challenge to the maintainability of the Writ Petition.

(ii) As far as judicial review of policy decisions based on expert opinion is concerned, there is no doubt that wide latitude is provided to the executive in such matters and the Court does not have the expertise to appreciate and decide on merits of scientific issues on the basis of divergent medical opinion. However, this does not bar the Court from scrutinising whether the policy in question can be held to be beyond the pale of unreasonableness and manifest arbitrariness and to be in furtherance of the right to life of all persons, bearing in mind the material on record.

(iii) With respect to the infringement of bodily integrity and personal autonomy of an individual considered in the light of vaccines and other public health measures introduced to deal with the COVID-19 pandemic, we are of the opinion that bodily integrity is protected under Article 21 of the Constitution and no individual can be forced to be vaccinated. Further, personal autonomy of an individual, which is a recognised facet of the protections guaranteed under Article 21, encompasses the right to refuse to undergo any medical treatment in 109 | P a g e the sphere of individual health. However, in the interest of protection of communitarian health, the Government is entitled to regulate issues of public health concern by imposing certain limitations on individual rights, which are open to scrutiny by constitutional courts to assess whether such invasion into an individuals right to personal autonomy and right to access means of livelihood meets the threefold requirement as laid down in K.S. Puttaswamy (supra), i.e., (i) legality, which presupposes the existence of law; (ii) need, defined in terms of a legitimate State aim; and (iii) proportionality, which ensures a rational nexus between the objects and the means adopted to achieve them.

(iv) On the basis of substantial material filed before this Court reflecting the near-unanimous views of experts on the benefits of vaccination in addressing severe disease from the infection, reduction in oxygen requirement, hospital and ICU admissions, mortality and stopping new variants from emerging, this Court is satisfied that the current vaccination policy of the Union of India is informed by relevant considerations and cannot be said to be unreasonable or manifestly arbitrary. Contrasting scientific opinion coming forth from certain quarters to 110 | P a g e the effect that natural immunity offers better protection against COVID-19 is not pertinent for determination of the issue before us.

(v) However, no data has been placed by the Union of India or the States appearing before us, controverting the material placed by the Petitioner in the form of emerging scientific opinion which appears to indicate that the risk of transmission of the virus from unvaccinated individuals is almost on par with that from vaccinated persons. In light of this, restrictions on unvaccinated individuals imposed through various vaccine mandates by State Governments / Union Territories cannot be said to be proportionate. Till the infection rate remains low and any new development or research finding emerges which provides due justification to impose reasonable and proportionate restrictions on the rights of unvaccinated individuals, we suggest that all authorities in this country, including private organisations and educational institutions, review the relevant orders and instructions imposing restrictions on unvaccinated individuals in terms of access to public places, services and resources, if not already recalled. It is clarified that in the context of the rapidly-evolving situation presented 111 | Page by the COVID-19 pandemic, our suggestion to review the vaccine mandates imposed by States / Union Territories, is limited to the present situation alone and is not to be construed as interfering with the lawful exercise of power by the executive to take suitable measures for prevention of infection and transmission of the virus. Our suggestion also does not extend to any other directions requiring maintenance of COVID-appropriate behaviour issued by the Union or the State Governments.

(vi) As regards non-disclosure of segregated clinical data, we find that the results of Phase III clinical trials of the vaccines in question have been published, in line with the requirement under the statutory regime in place, the GCP guidelines and the WHO Statement on Clinical Trials. The material provided by the Union of India, comprising of minutes of the meetings of the SEC, do not warrant the conclusion that restricted emergency use approvals had been granted to COVISHIELD and COVAXIN in haste, without thorough review of the relevant data. Relevant information relating to the meetings of the SEC and the NTAGI are available in public domain and therefore, challenge to the procedures adopted by the expert 112 | Page bodies while granting regulatory approval to the vaccines on the ground of lack of transparency cannot be entertained. However, we reiterate that subject to the protection of privacy of individual subjects, with respect to ongoing clinical trials and trials that may be conducted subsequently for COVID-19 vaccines, all relevant data required to be published under the extant statutory regime must be made available to the public without undue delay.

(vii) We do not accept the sweeping challenge to the monitoring system of AEFIs being faulty and not reflecting accurate figures of those with severe reactions or deaths from vaccines. We note that the role of the Pharmacovigilance Programme of India and the CDSCO, as elaborated upon by the Union of India, collates and studies previously unknown reactions seen during monitoring of AEFIs at the time of vaccine administration and we trust the Union of India to ensure that this leg of the AEFI surveillance system is not compromised with, while meeting the requirements of the rapid review and assessment system followed at the national level for AEFIs.

(viii) We are also of the opinion that information relating to adverse effects following immunisation is crucial for creating awareness around vaccines and their efficacy, apart from being instrumental in further scientific studies around the pandemic. Recognising the imperative need for collection of requisite data of adverse events and wider participation in terms of reporting, the Union of India is directed to facilitate reporting of suspected adverse events by individuals and private doctors on an accessible virtual platform. These reports shall be made publicly accessible, without compromising on protecting the confidentiality of the persons reporting, with all necessary steps to create awareness of the existence of such a platform and of the information required to navigate the platform to be undertaken by the Union of India at the earliest.

(ix) On paediatric vaccination, we recognise that the decision taken by the Union of India to vaccinate children in this country is in tune with global scientific consensus and expert bodies like the WHO, the UNICEF and the CDC and it is beyond the scope of review for this Court to second-guess expert opinion, on the basis of which the Government has drawn up its policy. Keeping in line with 114 | Page the WHO Statement on Clinical Trials and the extant statutory regime, we direct the Union of India to ensure that key findings and results of the relevant phases of clinical trials of vaccines already approved by the regulatory authorities for administration to children, be made public at the earliest, if not already done.

90. We express our gratitude to the learned counsel on either side for their able assistance in enabling this Court to reach the above conclusion.

91. The Writ Petition is disposed of accordingly.

ENDORSEMENT

E.M. MORGAN J.

1 Counsel for the Attorney General of Ontario has written to the Court asking for a ruling in writing for this Application to be dismissed as being frivolous and vexatious. The Applicants bring a Charter challenge against numerous public officials alleging that the formulation and implementation of various public health policies and measures relating to the ongoing COVID 19 pandemic violate the rights of Canadians.

2 I do not have before me a full record. I only have the Notice of Application issued April 9, 2021, setting out the grounds for the Application and the remedies sought.

3 The grounds described in the Notice are wide-ranging and, perhaps, a tad outlandish in content and tone. Without the benefit of a complete record and full legal argument, however, I would not want to opine on whether the Application promises to be a success or failure. Counsel for the Attorney General obviously believes that the entire litigation is problematic. But the Notice of Application does cite known grounds of Charter challenge while at the same time it seems to stretch existing legal concepts in an effort to perhaps make new law.

4 It strikes me that there are serious legal challenges awaiting the Applicants, not the least of which is that some of their claims at first blush appear to be potentially in the jurisdiction of Divisional Court rather than this Court. But those questions require the Court to have before it an Application Record, and not just a Notice. They also require the input of counsel. As it is, I only have a letter from counsel for the Attorney General and it does not appear that counsel for the Applicants has had notice of the Attorney General's request.

5 For the moment, I can only repeat the words of the Court of Appeal in Khan v. Krylov & Company, 2017 ONCA 625, at para. 12: "Rule 2.1 is an extremely blunt instrument. It is reserved for the clearest of cases, where the hallmarks of frivolous, vexatious, or abusive litigation are plainly evident on the face of the pleading. Rule 2.1 is not meant to be an easily accessible alternative to a pleadings motion, a motion for summary judgment, or a trial." The Notice of Application does not meet this test. I cannot say that the Application is frivolous and vexatious within the meaning of Rule 2.1.01 of the Rules of Civil Procedure.

6 This Application is in need of some case management, and the sooner the better. Counsel for the Attorney General and counsel for the Applicants are to be in touch with my assistant in order to schedule a case conference prior to any responding materials being served.

Civil procedure — Parties — Standing — Public interest standing — Manitoba Act, 1870, providing for individual land entitlements — Whether federation advancing collective claim on behalf of Métis people should be granted public interest standing.

Summary:

After Confederation, the first government of Canada embarked on a policy aimed at bringing the western territories within the boundaries of Canada, and opening them up to settlement. Canada became the titular owner of Rupert's Land and the Red River Settlement; however, the French-speaking Roman Catholic Métis, the dominant demographic group in the Red River Settlement, viewed with alarm the prospect of Canadian control leading to a wave of English-speaking Protestant settlers that would threaten their traditional way of life. In the face of armed resistance, Canada had little choice but to adopt a diplomatic approach. The Red River settlers agreed to become part of Canada, and Canada agreed to grant 1.4 million acres of land to the Métis children (subsequently set out in s. 31 of the Manitoba Act) and to recognize existing landholdings (subsequently set out in s. 32 of the Manitoba Act). The Canadian government began the process of implementing s. 31 in early [page625] 1871. The land was set aside, but a series of errors and delays interfered with dividing the land among the eligible recipients. Initially, problems arose from errors in determining who had a right to a share of the land promised. As a result, two successive allotments were abandoned; the third and final allotment was not completed until 1880. The lands were distributed randomly to the eligible Métis children living within each parish.

While the allotment process lagged, speculators began acquiring the Métis children's yet-to-be granted interests in the s. 31 lands, aided by a range of legal devices. During the 1870s and 1880s, Manitoba passed five statutes, now long spent and repealed, dealing with the technical requirements to transfer interests in s. 31 lands. Initially, Manitoba moved to curb speculation and improvident sales of the children's interests, but in 1877, it changed course, allowing sales of s. 31 entitlements.

Eventually, it became apparent that the number of eligible Métis children had been underestimated. Rather than starting a fourth allotment, the Canadian government provided that remaining eligible children would be issued with scrip redeemable for land. The scrip was based on 1879 land prices; however, when the scrip was delivered in 1885, land prices had increased so that the excluded children could not acquire the same amount of land granted to other children. In the decades that followed, the position of the Métis in the Red River Settlement deteriorated. White settlers soon constituted a majority in the territory and the Métis community began to unravel.

The Métis sought a declaration that (1) in implementing the Manitoba Act, the federal Crown breached fiduciary obligations owed to the Métis; (2) the federal Crown failed to implement the Manitoba Act in a manner consistent with the honour of the Crown; and (3) certain legislation passed by Manitoba affecting the implementation of the Manitoba Act was ultra vires. The trial judge dismissed the claim for a declaration on the ground that ss. 31 and 32 of the Manitoba Act gave rise to neither a fiduciary duty nor a duty based on the honour of the Crown. He also found that the challenged Manitoba [page626] statutes were constitutional, and, in any event, the claim was barred by limitations and the doctrine of laches. Finally, he found that the Manitoba Metis Federation Inc. ("MMF") should not be granted standing in the action, since the individual plaintiffs were capable of bringing the claims forward. A five-member panel of the Manitoba Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal.

Held (Rothstein and Moldaver JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be allowed in part. The federal Crown failed to implement the land grant provision set out in s. 31 of the Manitoba Act, 1870 in accordance with the honour of the Crown.

Per McLachlin C.J. and LeBel, Fish, Abella, Cromwell and Karakatsanis JJ.: The MMF should be granted standing. The action advanced is a collective claim for declaratory relief for the purposes of reconciling the descendants of the Métis people of the Red River Valley and Canada. It merits allowing the body representing the collective Métis interest to come before the court.

The obligations enshrined in ss. 31 and 32 of the Manitoba Act did not impose a fiduciary duty on the government. In the Aboriginal context, a fiduciary duty may arise in two ways. First, it may arise as a result of the Crown assuming discretionary control over specific Aboriginal interests. Where the Crown administers lands or property in which Aboriginal peoples have an interest, such a duty may arise if there is (1) a specific or cognizable Aboriginal interest, and (2) a Crown undertaking of discretionary control over that interest. The interest must be a communal Aboriginal interest in land that is integral to the nature of the Métis distinctive community and their relationship to the land. It must be predicated on historic use and occupation, and cannot be established by treaty or by legislation. Second, and more generally, a fiduciary duty may arise if there is (1) an undertaking by the alleged fiduciary to act in the best interests of the alleged beneficiary; (2) a defined person or class of persons vulnerable to a fiduciary's control; and (3) a legal or substantial practical interest of the beneficiary that stands to be adversely affected by the alleged fiduciary's exercise of discretion or control.

Although the Crown undertook discretionary control of the administration of the land grants under ss. 31 and 32 of the Manitoba Act, the Métis are Aboriginal, and they had an interest in the land, the first test for fiduciary duty is not made out because neither the words of s. 31 nor the evidence establish a pre-existing communal Aboriginal interest held by the Métis. Their interests in land arose from their personal history, not their shared distinct Métis identity. Nor was a fiduciary duty established on the basis of an undertaking by the Crown. While s. 31 shows an intention to benefit the Métis children, it does not demonstrate an undertaking to act in their best interests, in priority to other legitimate concerns. Indeed, the discretion conferred by s. 31 to determine "such mode and on such conditions as to settlement and otherwise" belies a duty of loyalty and an intention to act in the best interests of the beneficiary, forsaking all other interests. Section 32 simply confirmed the continuance of different categories of landholdings in existence shortly before or at the creation of the new province. It did not constitute an undertaking on the part of the Crown to act as a fiduciary in settling the titles of the Métis landholders.

However, the Métis are entitled to a declaration that the federal Crown failed to act with diligence in implementing the land grant provision set out in s. 31 of the Manitoba Act, in accordance with the honour of the Crown. The ultimate purpose of the honour of the Crown is the reconciliation of pre-existing Aboriginal societies with the assertion of Canadian sovereignty. Where this is at stake, it requires the Crown to act honourably in its dealings with the Aboriginal peoples in question. This flows from the guarantee of Aboriginal rights in s. 35(1) of the Constitution. The honour of the Crown is engaged by an explicit obligation to an Aboriginal group enshrined in the Constitution. The Constitution is not a mere statute; it is the very document by which the Crown asserted its sovereignty in the face of prior Aboriginal occupation. An explicit obligation to an Aboriginal group in the Constitution engages the honour of the Crown.

The honour of the Crown speaks to how obligations that attract it must be fulfilled, so the duties that flow from it vary with the situation. In the context of the implementation of a constitutional obligation to an Aboriginal people, the honour of the Crown requires that [page628] the Crown: (1) take a broad purposive approach to the interpretation of the promise; and (2) act diligently to fulfill it. The question is whether, viewing the Crown's conduct as a whole in the context of the case, it acted with diligence to pursue the fulfillment of the purposes of the obligation. The duty to act diligently is a narrow and circumscribed duty. Not every mistake or negligent act in implementing a constitutional obligation to an Aboriginal people brings dishonour to the Crown, and there is no guarantee that the purposes of the promise will be achieved. However, a persistent pattern of errors and indifference that substantially frustrates the purposes of a solemn promise may amount to a betrayal of the Crown's duty to act honourably in fulfilling its promise.

Section 31 of the Manitoba Act is a solemn constitutional obligation to the Métis people of Manitoba, an Aboriginal people, and it engaged the honour of the Crown. Its immediate purpose was to give the Métis children a head start over the expected influx of settlers from the east. Its broader purpose was to reconcile the Métis' Aboriginal interests in the Manitoba territory with the assertion of Crown sovereignty over the area that was to become the province of Manitoba. By contrast, s. 32 was a benefit made generally available to all settlers and did not engage the honour of the Crown.

Although the honour of the Crown obliged the government to act with diligence to fulfill s. 31, it acted with persistent inattention and failed to act diligently to achieve the purposes of the s. 31 grant. This was not a matter of occasional negligence, but of repeated mistakes and inaction that persisted for more than a decade, substantially defeating a purpose of s. 31. This was inconsistent with the behaviour demanded by the honour of the Crown: a government sincerely intent on fulfilling the duty that its honour demanded could and should have done better.

None of the government's other failures -- failing to prevent Métis from selling their land to speculators, issuing scrip in place of land, and failing to cluster family allotments -- were in themselves inconsistent with the honour of the Crown. That said, the impact of these measures was exacerbated by the delay inconsistent with [page629] the honour of the Crown: it increased improvident sales to speculators; it meant that when the children received scrip, they obtained significantly less than the 240 acres provided to those who took part in the initial distribution, because the price of land had increased in the interim; and it made it more difficult for Métis to trade grants amongst themselves to achieve contiguous parcels.

It is unnecessary to consider the constitutionality of the implementing statutes because they are moot.

The Métis claim based on the honour of the Crown is not barred by the law of limitations. Although claims for personal remedies flowing from unconstitutional statutes may be time-barred, the Métis seek no personal relief and make no claim for damages or for land. Just as limitations acts cannot prevent the courts from issuing declarations on the constitutionality of legislation, limitations acts cannot prevent the courts from issuing a declaration on the constitutionality of the Crown's conduct. So long as the constitutional grievance at issue here remains outstanding, the goals of reconciliation and constitutional harmony remain unachieved. In addition, many of the policy rationales underlying limitations statutes do not apply in an Aboriginal context. A declaration is a narrow remedy and, in some cases, may be the only way to give effect to the honour of the Crown.

Nor is the claim barred by the equitable doctrine of laches. Given the context of this case, including the historical injustices suffered by the Métis, the imbalance in power that followed Crown sovereignty, and the negative consequences following delays in allocating the land grants, delay on the part of the appellants cannot, by itself, be interpreted as some clear act which amounts to acquiescence or waiver. It is rather unrealistic to suggest that the Métis sat on their rights before the courts were prepared to recognize those rights. Furthermore, Canada has not changed its position as a result of the delay. This suffices to find that the claim is not barred by laches. However, it is difficult to see how a court, in its role as guardian of the Constitution, could apply an equitable doctrine to defeat a claim for a declaration that a Constitutional provision has not been fulfilled as required by the honour of the Crown.

Per Rothstein and Moldaver JJ. (dissenting): There is agreement with the majority that there was no fiduciary duty here, that no valid claims arise from s. 32 of the Manitoba Act, that any claims that might have arisen from the now repealed Manitoba legislation on the land grants are moot, that the random allocation of land grants was an acceptable means for Canada to implement the s. 31 land grants, and that the MMF has standing to bring these claims. However, the majority proposes a new common law constitutional obligation derived from the honour of the Crown. The courts below did not consider this issue and the parties did not argue it before this Court. This is an unpredictable expansion of the scope of the duties engaged under the honour of the Crown. The claim based on the honour of the Crown is also barred by both limitations periods and laches.

While a duty of diligent fulfillment may well prove to be an appropriate expansion of Crown obligations, and while a faster process would most certainly have been better, the duty crafted by the majority creates an unclear rule that is unconstrained by laches or limitation periods and immune from legislative redress, making the extent and consequences of the Crown's new obligations impossible to predict. It is not clear when an obligation rises to the "solemn" level that triggers the duty, what types of legal documents will give rise to solemn obligations, whether an obligation with a treaty-like character imposes higher obligations than other constitutional provisions, and whether it is sufficient for the obligation to be owed to an Aboriginal group. The idea that how the government is obliged to perform a constitutional obligation depends on how closely it resembles a treaty should be rejected. It would be a significant expansion of Crown liability to permit a claimant to seek relief so long as the promise was made to an Aboriginal group, without proof of an Aboriginal interest sufficient to ground a fiduciary duty, and based on actions that would not constitute a breach of fiduciary duty.

Even if the honour of the Crown was engaged and required the diligent implementation of s. 31, and even if this duty was not fulfilled, any claims arising from such a cause of action have long been barred by statutes of limitations and the equitable doctrine of laches. [page631] Limitations and laches cannot fulfill their purposes if they are not universally applicable. Limitations periods apply to the government as they do to all other litigants both generally and in the area of Aboriginal claims. This benefits the legal system by creating certainty and predictability, and serves to protect society at large by ensuring that claims against the Crown are made in a timely fashion so that the Crown is able to defend itself adequately.

Limitations periods have existed in Manitoba continuously since 1870, and, since 1931, Manitoba limitations legislation has provided a six-year limitation period for all causes of action, whether the cause of action arose before or after the legislation came into force. Manitoba has a 30-year ultimate limitation period. The Crown is entitled to the benefit of those limitations periods. The policy rationales underlying limitations periods do not support the creation of an exemption from those periods in this case. Manitoba legislation does not contain an exception from limitations periods for declaratory judgments and no such exception should be judicially created. In this case, the risk that a declaratory judgment will lead to additional remedies is fully realized: the Métis plan to use the declaration in extra-judicial negotiations with the Crown, so the declaration exposes the Crown to an obligation long after the time when the limitations period expired.

Moreover, this Court has never recognized a general exception from limitations for constitutionally derived claims. Rather, it has consistently held that limitations periods apply to factual claims with constitutional elements. While limitations periods do not apply to prevent a court from declaring a statute unconstitutional, the Métis' claim about unconstitutional statutes is moot. The remaining declaration sought concerns factual issues and alleged breaches of obligations which have always been subject to limitation periods. In suggesting that the goal of reconciliation must be given priority in the Aboriginal context, it appears that the majority has departed from the principle that the same policy rationales that support limitations generally should apply to Aboriginal claims.

These claims are also subject to laches. Laches can be used to defend against equitable claims that have [page632] not been brought in a sufficiently timely manner, and as breaches of fiduciary duty can be subject to laches, it would be fundamentally inconsistent to permit certain claims based on the honour of the Crown to escape the imputation of laches. Both branches of laches are satisfied: the Métis have knowingly delayed their claim by over a hundred years and in so doing have acquiesced to the circumstances and invited the government to rely on that, rendering the prosecution of this action unreasonable. As to acquiescence, the trial judge found that the Métis had the required knowledge in the 1870s, and that finding has not been shown to be an error. The suggestion that it is "unrealistic" to expect someone to have enforced their claim before the courts were prepared to recognize those rights is fundamentally at odds with the common law approach to changes in the law. Delay in making the grants cannot be both the wrong alleged and the reason the Crown cannot access the defence of laches: laches are always invoked as a defence by a party alleged to have wronged the plaintiff. If assessing conscientiousness is reduced to determining if the plaintiff has proven the allegations, the defence of laches is rendered illusory. The imbalance in power between the Métis and the government did not undermine their knowledge, capacity or freedom to the extent required to prevent a finding of acquiescence. The inference that delays in the land grants caused the vulnerability of the Métis was neither made by the trial judge nor supported by the record. In any event, laches are imputed against vulnerable people just as limitations periods are applied against them.

As to reliance, had the claim been brought promptly, the unexplained delays referred to as evidence for the Crown acting dishonourably may well have been accounted for, or the government might have been able to take steps to satisfy the Métis community.

Finally, while not doing so explicitly, the majority departs from the factual findings of the trial judge, absent a finding of palpable and overriding error, in two main areas: (1) the extent of the delay in distributing the land, and (2) the effect of that delay on the Métis. Manifestly, the trial judge made findings of delay. Nonetheless these findings and the evidence do not reveal a pattern of inattention, a lack of diligence, or that the purposes of the land grant were frustrated. That alone would nullify any claim the Métis might have based on a breach of duty [page633] derived from the honour of the Crown, assuming that any such duty exists.

I. Overview

1 Canada is a young nation with ancient roots. The country was born in 1867, by the consensual union of three colonies - United Canada (now Ontario and Quebec), Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Left unsettled was whether the new nation would be expanded to include the vast territories to the west, stretching from modern Manitoba to British Columbia. The Canadian government, led by Prime Minister John A. Macdonald, embarked on a policy aimed at bringing the western territories within the boundaries of Canada, and opening them up to settlement.

2 This meant dealing with the indigenous peoples who were living in the western territories. On the prairies, these consisted mainly of two groups - the First Nations, and the descendants of unions between white traders and explorers and Aboriginal women, now known as Métis.

3 The government policy regarding the First Nations was to enter into treaties with the various bands, whereby they agreed to settlement of their lands in exchange for reservations of land and other promises.

4 The government policy with respect to the Métis population - which, in 1870, comprised 85 percent of the population of what is now Manitoba - was less clear. Settlers began pouring into the region, displacing the Métis' social and political [page638] control. This led to resistance and conflict. To resolve the conflict and assure peaceful annexation of the territory, the Canadian government entered into negotiations with representatives of the Métis-led provisional government of the territory. The result was the Manitoba Act, 1870, S.C. 1870, c. 3 ("Manitoba Act"), which made Manitoba a province of Canada.

5 This appeal is about obligations to the Métis people enshrined in the Manitoba Act, a constitutional document. These promises represent the terms under which the Métis people agreed to surrender their claims to govern themselves and their territory, and become part of the new nation of Canada. These promises were directed at enabling the Métis people and their descendants to obtain a lasting place in the new province. Sadly, the expectations of the Métis were not fulfilled, and they scattered in the face of the settlement that marked the ensuing decades.

6 Now, over a century later, the descendants of the Métis people seek a declaration in the courts that Canada breached its obligation to implement the promises it made to the Métis people in the Manitoba Act.

7 More particularly, the appellants seek a declaration that (1) in implementing the Manitoba Act, the federal Crown breached fiduciary obligations owed to the Métis; (2) the federal Crown failed to implement the Manitoba Act in a manner consistent with the honour of the Crown; and (3) certain legislation passed by Manitoba affecting the implementation of the Manitoba Act was ultra vires.

8 It is not disputed that there was considerable delay in implementing the constitutional provisions. The main issues are (1) whether Canada failed to act in accordance with its legal obligations, and (2) whether the Métis' claim is too late and thus barred by the doctrine of laches or by any [page639] limitations law, be it the English limitations law in force at the time the claims arose, or the subsequent limitations acts enacted by Manitoba: The Limitation of Actions Act, 1931, S.M. 1931, c. 30; The Limitation of Actions Act, 1931, R.S.M. 1940, c. 121; The Limitation of Actions Act, R.S.M. 1970, c. L150; collectively referred to as "The Limitation of Actions Act".

9 We conclude that s. 31 of the Manitoba Act constitutes a constitutional obligation to the Métis people of Manitoba, an Aboriginal people, to provide the Métis children with allotments of land. The immediate purpose of the obligation was to give the Métis children a head start over the expected influx of settlers from the east. Its broader purpose was to reconcile the Métis' Aboriginal interests in the Manitoba territory with the assertion of Crown sovereignty over the area that was to become the province of Manitoba. The obligation enshrined in s. 31 of the Manitoba Act did not impose a fiduciary or trust duty on the government. However, as a solemn constitutional obligation to the Métis people of Manitoba aimed at reconciling their Aboriginal interests with sovereignty, it engaged the honour of the Crown. This required the government to act with diligence in pursuit of the fulfillment of the promise. On the findings of the trial judge, the Crown failed to do so and the obligation to the Métis children remained largely unfulfilled. The Métis claim based on the honour of the Crown is not barred by the law of limitations or the equitable doctrine of laches. We therefore conclude that the Métis are entitled to a declaration that Canada failed to implement s. 31 as required by the honour of the Crown.

10 We agree with the courts below that the s. 32 claim is not established, and find it unnecessary to consider the constitutionality of the implementing statutes.

II. The Constitutional Promises and the Legislation

11 Section 31 of the Manitoba Act, known as the children's grant, set aside 1.4 million acres of land to be given to Métis children:

31. And whereas, it is expedient, towards the extinguishment of the Indian Title to the lands in the Province, to appropriate a portion of such ungranted lands, to the extent of one million four hundred thousand acres thereof, for the benefit of the families of the half-breed residents, it is hereby enacted, that, under regulations to be from time to time made by the Governor General in Council, the Lieutenant-Governor shall select such lots or tracts in such parts of the Province as he may deem expedient, to the extent aforesaid, and divide the same among the children of the half-breed heads of families residing in the Province at the time of the said transfer to Canada, and the same shall be granted to the said children respectively, in such mode and on such conditions as to settlement and otherwise, as the Governor General in Council may from time to time determine.

12 Section 32 of the Manitoba Act provided for recognition of existing landholdings, where individuals asserting ownership had not yet been granted title:

32. For the quieting of titles, and assuring to the settlers in the Province the peaceable possession of the lands now held by them, it is enacted as follows:-

(1) All grants of land in freehold made by the Hudson's Bay Company up to the eighth day of March, in the year 1869, shall, if required by the owner, be confirmed by grant from the Crown.

(2) All grants of estates less than freehold in land made by the Hudson's Bay Company up to the eighth day of March aforesaid, shall, if required by the owner, be converted into an estate in freehold by grant from the Crown.

(3) All titles by occupancy with the sanction and under the license and authority of the Hudson's Bay Company up to the eighth day of March aforesaid, of land in that part of the Province in which the Indian Title has been extinguished, shall, if required by the owner, be converted into an estate in freehold by grant from the Crown.

(4) All persons in peaceable possession of tracts of land at the time of the transfer to Canada, in those parts of the Province in which the Indian Title has not been extinguished, shall have the right of pre-emption of the same, on such terms and conditions as may be determined by the Governor in Council.

(5) The Lieutenant-Governor is hereby authorized, under regulations to be made from time to time by the Governor General in Council, to make all such provisions for ascertaining and adjusting, on fair and equitable terms, the rights of Common, and rights of cutting Hay held and enjoyed by the settlers in the Province, and for the commutation of the same by grants of land from the Crown.

13 During the 1870s and 1880s, Manitoba passed five statutes, now long spent and repealed, dealing with the technical requirements to transfer interests in s. 31 lands. The appellants seek to have the statutes declared ultra vires pursuant to the Constitution Act, 1867. Alternatively, they argue that the statutes were inoperative by virtue of federal paramountcy.

III. Judicial Decisions

14 The trial judge, MacInnes J. (as he then was), engaged in a thorough review of the facts: 2007 MBQB 293, 223 Man. R. (2d) 42. He found that while dishonesty and bad faith were not established, government error and inaction led to lengthy delay in implementing ss. 31 and 32, and left 993 Métis children who were entitled to a grant with scrip instead of land. However, he dismissed the claim for a declaration on the ground that ss. 31 and 32 of the Manitoba Act gave rise to neither a fiduciary duty nor a duty based on the honour of the Crown. [page642] The trial judge took the view that a fiduciary duty required proof that the Aboriginal people held the land collectively prior to 1870. Since the evidence established only individual landholdings by the Métis, their claim was "fundamentally flawed". He said of the action that "[i]t seeks relief that is in essence of a collective nature, but is underpinned by a factual reality that is individual": para. 1197.

15 The trial judge concluded that, in any event, the claim was barred by The Limitation of Actions Act and the doctrine of laches. He also found that Manitoba's various legislative initiatives regarding the land grants were constitutional. Finally, he held that the Manitoba Metis Federation Inc. ("MMF") should not be granted standing in the action, since the individual plaintiffs were capable of bringing the claims forward.

16 A five-member panel of the Manitoba Court of Appeal, per Scott C.J.M., dismissed the appeal: 2010 MBCA 71, 255 Man. R. (2d) 167. It rejected the trial judge's view that collective Aboriginal title to land was essential to a claim that the Crown owed a fiduciary duty to Aboriginal peoples. However, the court found it unnecessary to determine whether the Crown in fact owed a fiduciary duty to the Métis, since the trial judge's findings of fact concerning the conduct of the Crown did not support any breach of such a duty.

17 The Court of Appeal also rejected the assertion that the honour of the Crown had been breached. The honour of the Crown, in its view, was [page643] subsidiary to the fiduciary claim and did not itself give rise to an independent duty in this situation.

18 Finally, the court held that the Métis' claim for a declaration was, in any event, statute-barred, and that the issue of the constitutional validity of the Manitoba legislation was moot. It also declined to interfere with the trial judge's discretionary decision to deny standing to the MMF.

IV. Facts

19 This appeal concerns events that occurred over a century ago. Despite the difficulties imposed by the lack of live witnesses and distant texts, the trial judge made careful and complete findings of fact on all the elements relevant to the legal issues. The Court of Appeal thoroughly reviewed these findings and, with limited exceptions, confirmed them.

20 The completeness of these findings, which stand largely unchallenged, make it unnecessary to provide a detailed narrative of the Métis people, the Red River Settlement, and the conflict that gave rise to the Manitoba Act and Manitoba's entry into Canada - events that have inspired countless tomes and indeed, an opera. We content ourselves with a brief description of the origins of the Red River Settlement and the events that give rise to the appellants' claims.

21 The story begins with the Aboriginal peoples who inhabited what is now the province of Manitoba - the Cree and other less populous nations. In the late 17th century, European adventurers and explorers passed through. The lands were claimed nominally by England which granted the Hudson's Bay Company, a company of fur traders operating out of London, control over a vast territory called Rupert's Land, which included modern Manitoba. Aboriginal peoples continued to occupy the territory. In addition to the original First Nations, a new Aboriginal group, the Métis, arose - people [page644] descended from early unions between European adventurers and traders, and Aboriginal women. In the early days, the descendants of English-speaking parents were referred to as half-breeds, while those with French roots were called Métis.

22 A large - by the standards of the time - settlement developed the forks of the Red and Assiniboine Rivers on land granted to Lord Selkirk by the Hudson's Bay Company in 1811. By 1869, the settlement consisted of 12,000 people, under the governance of the Hudson's Bay Company.

23 In 1869, the Red River Settlement was a vibrant community, with a free enterprise system and established judicial and civic institutions, centred on the retail stores, hotels, trading undertakings and saloons of what is now downtown Winnipeg. The Métis were the dominant demographic group in the Settlement, comprising around 85 percent of the population, and held leadership positions in business, church and government.

24 In the meantime, Upper Canada (now Ontario), Lower Canada (now Quebec), Nova Scotia and New Brunswick united under the British North America Act of 1867 (now Constitution Act, 1867) to become the new country of Canada. The country's first government, led by Sir John A. Macdonald, was intent on westward expansion, driven by the dream of a nation that would extend from the Atlantic to the Pacific and provide vast new lands for settlement. England agreed to cede Rupert's Land to Canada. In recognition of the Hudson's Bay Company's interest, Canada paid it GBP300,000 and allowed it to retain some of the land around its trading posts in the Northwest. In 1868, the Imperial Parliament cemented the deal with Rupert's Land Act, 1868 (U.K.), 31 & 32 Vict., c. 105.

25 Canada, as successor to the Hudson's Bay Company, became the titular owner of Rupert's Land and the Red River Settlement. However, the reality on the ground was more complex. The French-speaking Roman Catholic Métis viewed with alarm the prospect of Canadian control leading to a wave of English-speaking Protestant settlers that would threaten their traditional way of life. When two survey parties arrived in 1869 to take stock of the land, the matter came to a head.

26 The surveyors were met with armed resistance, led by a French-speaking Métis, Louis Riel. On November 2, 1869, Canada's proposed Lieutenant Governor of the new territory, William McDougall, was turned back by a mounted French Métis patrol. On the same day, a group of Métis, including Riel, seized Upper Fort Garry (now downtown Winnipeg), the Settlement's principle fortification. Riel called together 12 representatives of the English-speaking parishes and 12 representatives of the French-speaking Métis parishes, known as the "Convention of 24". At their second meeting, he announced the French Métis intended to form a provisional government, and asked for the support of the English. The English representatives asked for time to confer with the people of their parishes. The meeting was adjourned until December 1, 1869.

27 When the meeting reconvened, they were confronted with a proclamation made earlier that day by McDougall that the region was under the control of Canada. The group rejected the claim. The French Métis drafted a list of demands that Canada must satisfy before the Red River settlers would accept Canadian control.

28 The Canadian government adopted a conciliatory course. It invited a delegation of "at least two residents" to Ottawa to present the demands of the settlers and confer with Parliament. The provisional government responded by delegating [page646] a priest, Father Ritchot, a judge, Judge Black, and a local businessman named Alfred Scott to go to Ottawa. The delegates - none of whom were Métis, although Riel nominated them - set out for Ottawa on March 24, 1870.

29 Canada had little choice but to adopt a diplomatic approach to the Red River settlers. As MacInnes J. found at trial:

Canada had no authority to send troops to the Settlement to quell the French Métis insurrection. Nor did it have the necessary troops. Moreover, given the time of year, there was no access to the Settlement other than through the United States. But, at the time, there was a concern in Canada about possible annexation of the territory by the United States and hence a reluctance on the part of Canada to seek permission from the United States to send troops across its territory to quell the insurrection and restore authority. [para. 78]

30 The delegates arrived in Ottawa on April 11, 1870. They met and negotiated with Prime Minister Macdonald and the Minister of Militia and Defence, George-Étienne Cartier. The negotiations were part of a larger set of negotiations on the terms on which Manitoba would enter Canada as a province. It emerged that Canada wanted to retain ownership of public lands in the new province. This led to the idea of providing land for Métis children. The parties settled on a grant to Métis children of 1.4 million acres of land (s. 31) and recognition of existing landholdings (s. 32). Parliament, after vigorous debate and the failure of a motion to delete the section providing the children's grant, passed the Manitoba Act on May 10, 1870.

31 The delegates returned to the Red River Settlement with the proposal, and, on June 24, 1870, Father Ritchot addressed the Convention of 40, now called the Legislative Assembly of Assiniboia, to [page647] advocate for the adoption of the Manitoba Act. The Assembly was read a letter from Minister Cartier which promised that any existing land interest contemplated in s. 32 of the Manitoba Act could be converted to title without payment. Minister Cartier guaranteed that the s. 31 children's grants would "be of a nature to meet the wishes of the half-breed residents" and the division of grant land would be done "in the most effectual and equitable manner": A.R., vol. XI, at p. 196 (emphasis added). On this basis, the Assembly voted to accept the Manitoba Act, and enter the Dominion of Canada. Manitoba became part of Canada by Order in Council of the Imperial government effective July 15, 1870.

32 The Canadian government began the process of implementing s. 31 in early 1871. The first step was to set aside 1.4 million acres, and the second was to divide the land among the eligible recipients. A series of errors and delays interfered with accomplishing the second step in the "effectual" manner Minister Cartier had promised.

33 The first problem was the erroneous inclusion of all Métis, including heads of families, in the allotment, contrary to the terms of s. 31, which clearly provided the lands were to be divided among the children of the Métis heads of families. On March 1, 1871, Parliament passed an Order in Council declaring that all Métis had a right to a share in the 1.4 million acres promised in s. 31 of the Manitoba Act. This order, which would have created more grants of smaller acreage, was made over the objections raised by McDougall, then the former Lieutenant Governor of Rupert's Land, in the House of Commons. Nevertheless, the federal government began planning townships based on 140-acre lots, dividing the 1.4 million acres among approximately 10,000 recipients. This was the first allotment.

34 In 1873, the federal government changed its position, and decided that only Métis children would be entitled to s. 31 grants. The government also decided that lands traditionally used for haying by the Red River settlers could not be used to satisfy the children's land grant, as was originally planned, requiring additional land to be set aside to constitute the 1.4 million acres. The 1873 decision was clearly the correct decision. The problem is that it took the government over three years to arrive at that position. This gave rise to the second allotment.

35 In November 1873, the government of Sir John A. Macdonald was defeated and a new Liberal government formed in early 1874. The new government, without explanation, did not move forward on the allotments until early 1875. The Liberal government finally, after questions in Parliament about the delay and petitions from several parishes, appointed John Machar and Matthew Ryan to verify claimants entitled to the s. 31 grants. The process of verifying those entitled to grants commenced five years after the Manitoba Act was passed.

36 The next set of problems concerned the Machar/Ryan Commission's estimate of the number of eligible Métis children. Though a census taken in 1870 estimated 7,000 Métis children, Machar and Ryan concluded the number was lower, at 5,088, which was eventually rounded up to 5,833 to allow for even 240-acre plots. This necessitated a third and final allotment, which began in 1876, but was not completed until 1880.

37 While the allotment process lagged, speculators began acquiring the Métis children's yet-to-be granted interests in the s. 31 lands, aided by a range of legal devices. Initially, the Manitoba legislature moved to block sales of the children's interests to speculators, but, in 1877, it passed legislation [page649] authorizing sales of s. 31 interests once the child obtained the age of majority, whether or not the child had received his or her allotment, or even knew of its location. In 1878, Manitoba adopted further legislation which allowed children between 18 and 21 to sell their interests, so long as the transaction was approved by a judicial officer and the child's parents. Dr. Thomas Flanagan, an expert who testified at trial, found returns on judicial sales were the poorest of any type of s. 31 sale: C.A., at para. 152.

38 Eventually, it became apparent that the Acting Agent of Dominion Lands, Donald Codd had underestimated the number of eligible Métis children - 993 more Métis children were entitled to land than Codd had counted on. In 1885, rather than start the allotment yet a fourth time, the Canadian government provided by Order in Council that the children for whom there was no land would be issued with $240 worth of scrip redeemable for land. Fifteen years after the passage of the Manitoba Act, the process was finally complete.

39 The position of the Métis in the Red River Settlement deteriorated in the decades following Manitoba's entry into Confederation. White settlers soon constituted a majority in the territory and the Métis community began to unravel. Many Métis sold their promised interests in land and moved further west. Those left amounted to a small remnant of the original community.

V. Issues

40 The appellants seek numerous declarations, including: (1) in implementing the Manitoba Act, the federal Crown breached fiduciary obligations owed to the Métis; (2) the federal Crown failed to implement the Manitoba Act in a manner [page650] consistent with the honour of the Crown; and (3) certain legislation passed by Manitoba affecting the implementation of the Manitoba Act was ultra vires. These claims give rise to the following issues:

- A. Does the Manitoba Metis Federation have standing in the action?
- B. Is Canada in breach of a fiduciary duty to the Métis?
- C. Did Canada fail to comply with the honour of the Crown in the implementation of ss. 31 and 32 of the Manitoba Act?
- D. Were the Manitoba statutes related to implementation unconstitutional?
- E. Is the claim for a declaration barred by limitations?
- F. Is the claim for a declaration barred by laches?

VI. Discussion

- A. Does the Manitoba Metis Federation Have Standing in the Action?

41 Canada and Manitoba take no issue with the private interest standing of the individual appellants. However, they argue that the MMF has no private interest in the litigation and fails the established test for public interest standing on the third step of the test set out in Canadian Council of Churches v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 236, as the individual plaintiffs clearly demonstrate another reasonable and effective manner for the case to be heard.

42 The courts below denied the MMF public interest standing to bring this action. At trial, MacInnes J. found that the MMF would fail the third step of the test set out in Canadian Council of Churches, on the ground that the individual plaintiffs demonstrate another reasonable and effective manner for the case to be heard. The Court of Appeal declined to interfere with MacInnes J.'s discretionary standing ruling.

43 The courts below did not have the benefit of this Court's decision in Canada (Attorney General) v. Downtown Eastside Sex Workers United Against Violence Society, 2012 SCC 45, [2012] 2 S.C.R. 524. In that case, the Court rejected a strict approach to the third requirement for standing. The presence of other claimants does not necessarily preclude public interest standing; the question is whether this litigation is a reasonable and effective means to bring a challenge to court. The requirements for public interest standing should be addressed in a flexible and generous manner, and considered in light of the underlying purposes of setting limits on who has standing to bring an action before a court. Even if there are other plaintiffs with a direct interest in the issue, a court may consider whether the public interest plaintiff will bring any particularly useful or distinct perspective to the resolution of the issue at hand.

44 As discussed below, the action advanced is not a series of claims for individual relief. It is rather a collective claim for declaratory relief for the purposes of reconciliation between the descendants of the Métis people of the Red River Valley and Canada. The Manitoba Act provided for individual entitlements, to be sure. But that does not negate the fact that the appellants advance a collective claim of the Métis people, based on a promise made to them in return for their agreement to recognize Canada's sovereignty over them. This collective claim merits allowing the body representing the collective Métis [page652] interest to come before the Court. We would grant the MMF standing.

45 For convenience, from this point forward in these reasons, we will refer to both the individual plaintiffs and the MMF collectively as "the Métis".

B. Is Canada in Breach of a Fiduciary Duty to the Métis?

(1) When a Fiduciary Duty May Arise

46 The Métis say that Canada owed them a fiduciary duty to implement ss. 31 and 32 of the Manitoba Act as their trustee. This duty, they say, arose out of their Aboriginal interest in lands in Manitoba, or directly from the promises made in ss. 31 and 32.

47 Fiduciary duty is an equitable doctrine originating in trust. Generally speaking, a fiduciary is required to act in the best interests of the person on whose behalf he is acting, to avoid all conflicts of interest, and to strictly account for all property held or administered on behalf of that person. See Lac Minerals Ltd. v. International Corona Resources Ltd., [1989] 2 S.C.R. 574, at pp. 646-47.

48 The relationship between the Métis and the Crown, viewed generally, is fiduciary in nature. However, not all dealings between parties in a fiduciary relationship are governed by fiduciary obligations.

49 In the Aboriginal context, a fiduciary duty may arise as a result of the "Crown [assuming] discretionary control over specific Aboriginal interests": Haida Nation v. British Columbia (Minister of Forests), 2004 SCC 73, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 511, at para. 18. The focus is on the particular interest that [page653] is the subject matter of the dispute: Wewaykum Indian Band v. Canada, 2002 SCC 79, [2002] 4 S.C.R. 245, at para. 83. The content of the Crown's fiduciary duty towards Aboriginal peoples varies with the nature and importance of the interest sought to be protected: Wewaykum, at para. 86.

50 A fiduciary duty may also arise from an undertaking, if the following conditions are met:

- (1) an undertaking by the alleged fiduciary to act in the best interests of the alleged beneficiary or beneficiaries; (2) a defined person or class of persons vulnerable to a fiduciary's control (the beneficiary or beneficiaries); and (3) a legal or substantial practical interest of the beneficiary or beneficiaries that stands to be adversely affected by the alleged fiduciary's exercise of discretion or control.

(Alberta v. Elder Advocates of Alberta Society, 2011 SCC 24, [2011] 2 S.C.R. 261, at para. 36)

- (2) Did the Métis Have a Specific Aboriginal Interest in the Land Giving Rise to a Fiduciary Duty?

51 As discussed, the first way a fiduciary duty may arise is where the Crown administers lands or property in which Aboriginal peoples have an interest: Guerin v. The Queen, [1984] 2 S.C.R. 335, at p. 384. The duty arises if there is (1) a specific or cognizable Aboriginal interest, and (2) a Crown undertaking of discretionary control over that interest: Wewaykum, at paras. 79-83; Haida Nation, at para. 18.

52 There is little dispute that the Crown undertook discretionary control of the administration of the land grants under ss. 31 and 32 of the Manitoba Act, meeting the second requirement. The issue is whether the first condition is met - is there a "specific or cognizable Aboriginal interest"? The trial judge held that the Métis failed to establish a specific, cognizable interest in land. The Court of Appeal found it unnecessary to decide the point, in [page654] view of its conclusion that in any event, no breach was established.

53 The fact that the Métis are Aboriginal and had an interest in the land is not sufficient to establish an Aboriginal interest in land. The interest (title or some other interest) must be distinctly Aboriginal; it must be a communal Aboriginal interest in the land that is integral to the nature of the Métis distinctive community and their relationship to the land: see R. v. Powley, 2003 SCC 43, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 207, at para. 37. The key issue is thus whether the Métis as a collective had a specific or cognizable Aboriginal interest in the ss. 31 or 32 land.

54 The Métis argue that s. 31 of the Manitoba Act confirms that they held a pre-existing specific Aboriginal interest in the land designated by s. 31. Section 31 states that the land grants were directed "towards the extinguishment of the Indian Title to the lands in the Province", and that the land grant was for "the benefit of the families of the half-breed residents". This language, the Métis argue, acknowledges that the Métis gave the Crown control over their homeland in the Red River Settlement in exchange for a number of provisions in the Manitoba Act, a constitutional document. The Métis say speeches in the House of Commons by the framers of the Manitoba Act, Prime Minister Macdonald and George-Étienne Cartier, confirm that the purpose of s. 31 was to extinguish the "Indian Title" of the Métis. The Métis urge that the Manitoba Act must be read broadly in light of its purpose of bringing Manitoba peaceably into Confederation and assuring a future for the Métis as landholders and settlers in the new province: see R. v. Blais, 2003 SCC 44, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 236, at para. 17.

55 Canada replies that s. 31 does not establish pre-existing Aboriginal interest in land. It was an [page655] instrument directed at settling grievances, and the reference to "Indian Title" does not establish that such title actually existed. It was up to the Métis to prove that they held an Aboriginal interest in land prior to the Manitoba Act, and they have not done so, Canada argues. Canada acknowledges that individual Métis people held individual parcels of land, but it denies that they held the collective Aboriginal interest necessary to give rise to a fiduciary duty.

56 The trial judge's findings are fatal to the Métis' argument. He found as a fact that the Métis used and held land individually, rather than communally, and permitted alienation. He found no evidence that the Métis asserted they held Indian title when British leaders purported to extinguish Indian title, first in the Settlement belt and then throughout the province. He found that the Red River Métis were descended from many different bands. While individual Métis held interests in land, those interests arose from their personal history, not their shared Métis identity. Indeed the trial judge concluded Métis ownership practices were incompatible with the claimed Aboriginal interest in land.

57 The Métis argue that the trial judge and the Court of Appeal erred in going behind the language of s. 31 and demanding proof of a collective Aboriginal interest in land. They assert that Aboriginal title was historically uncertain, and that the Crown's practice was to accept that any organized Aboriginal group had title and to extinguish that title by treaty, or in this case, s. 31 of the Manitoba Act.

58 Even if this was the Crown's practice (a doubtful assumption in the absence of supporting evidence), it does not establish that the Métis held either Aboriginal title or some other Aboriginal interest in specific lands as a group. An Aboriginal interest in land giving rise to a fiduciary duty cannot be established by treaty, or, by extension, [page656] legislation. Rather, it is predicated on historic use and occupation. As Dickson J. stated in Guerin:

The "political trust" cases concerned essentially the distribution of public funds or other property held by the government. In each case the party claiming to be beneficiary under a trust depended entirely on statute, ordinance or treaty as the basis for its claim to an interest in the funds in question. The situation of the Indians is entirely different. Their interest in their lands is a pre-existing legal right not created by Royal Proclamation, by s. 18(1) of the Indian Act, or by any other executive or legislative provision. [Emphasis added; p. 379.]

59 In summary, the words of s. 31 do not establish pre-existing communal Aboriginal title held by the Métis. Nor does the evidence: the trial judge's findings of fact that the Métis had no communal Aboriginal interest in land are fatal to this contention. It follows that the argument that Canada was under a fiduciary duty in administering the children's land because the Métis held an Aboriginal interest in the land must fail. The same reasoning applies to s. 32 of the Manitoba Act.

(3) Did the Crown Undertake to Act in the Best Interests of the Métis, Giving Rise to a Fiduciary Duty?

60 This leaves the question of whether a fiduciary duty is established on the basis of an undertaking by the Crown. To recap, this requires:

- (1) an undertaking by the alleged fiduciary to act in the best interests of the alleged beneficiary or beneficiaries; (2) a defined person or class of persons vulnerable to a fiduciary's control (the beneficiary or beneficiaries); and (3) a legal or substantial practical interest of the beneficiary or beneficiaries that stands to be adversely [page657] affected by the alleged fiduciary's exercise of discretion or control.

(Elder Advocates, at para. 36)

61 The first question is whether an undertaking has been established. In order to elevate the Crown's obligations to a fiduciary level, the power retained by the Crown must be coupled with an undertaking of loyalty to act in the beneficiaries' best interests in the nature of a private law duty: Guerin, at pp. 383-84. In addition, "[t]he party asserting the duty must be able to point to a forsaking by the alleged fiduciary of the interests of all others in favour of those of the beneficiary, in relation to the specific legal interest at stake": Elder Advocates, at para. 31.

62 While s. 31 shows an intention to benefit the Métis children, it does not demonstrate an undertaking to act in their best interests, in priority to other legitimate concerns, such as ensuring land was available for the construction of the railway and opening Manitoba for broader settlement. Indeed, the discretion conferred by s. 31 to determine "such mode and on such conditions as to settlement and otherwise" belies a duty of loyalty and an intention to act in the best interests of the beneficiary, forsaking all other interests.

63 Nor did s. 32 constitute an undertaking on the part of the Crown to act as a fiduciary in settling the titles of the Métis landholders. It confirmed the continuance of different categories of landholdings in existence shortly before or at the creation of the new province (C.A., at paras. 673 and 717), and applied to all landholders (C.A., at para. 717; see also paras. 674 and 677).

(4) Conclusion on Fiduciary Duty

64 We conclude that Canada did not owe a fiduciary duty to the Métis in implementing ss. 31 and 32 of the Manitoba Act.

C. Did Canada Fail to Comply With the Honour of the Crown in the Implementation of Sections 31 and 32 of the Manitoba Act?

(1) The Principle of the Honour of the Crown

65 The appellants argue that Canada breached a duty owed to the Métis based on the honour of the Crown. The phrase "honour of the Crown" refers to the principle that servants of the Crown must conduct themselves with honour when acting on behalf of the sovereign.

66 The honour of the Crown arises "from the Crown's assertion of sovereignty over an Aboriginal people and de facto control of land and resources that were formerly in the control of that people": Haida Nation, at para. 32. In Aboriginal law, the honour of the Crown goes back to the Royal Proclamation of 1763, which made reference to "the several Nations or Tribes of Indians with whom We are connected, and who live under our Protection": see Beckman v. Little Salmon/Carmacks First Nation, 2010 SCC 53, [2010] 3 S.C.R. 103, at para. 42. This "Protection", though, did not arise from a paternalistic desire to protect the Aboriginal peoples; rather, it was a recognition of their strength. Nor is the honour of the Crown a paternalistic concept. The comments of Brian Slattery with respect to fiduciary duty resonate here:

The sources of the general fiduciary duty do not lie, then, in a paternalistic concern to protect a "weaker" or "primitive" people, as has sometimes been suggested, but rather in the necessity of persuading native peoples, at a time when they still had considerable military capacities, [page659] that their rights would be better protected by reliance on the Crown than by self-help.

("Understanding Aboriginal Rights" (1987), 66 Can. Bar Rev. 727, at p. 753)

The ultimate purpose of the honour of the Crown is the reconciliation of pre-existing Aboriginal societies with the assertion of Crown sovereignty. As stated in Taku River Tlingit First Nation v. British Columbia (Project Assessment Director), 2004 SCC 74, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 550, at para. 24:

The duty of honour derives from the Crown's assertion of sovereignty in the face of prior Aboriginal occupation. It has been enshrined in s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, which recognizes and affirms existing Aboriginal rights and titles. Section 35(1) has, as one of its purposes, negotiation of just settlement of Aboriginal claims. In all its dealings with Aboriginal peoples, the Crown must act honourably, in accordance with its historical and future relationship with the Aboriginal peoples in question.

67 The honour of the Crown thus recognizes the impact of the "superimposition of European laws and customs" on pre-existing Aboriginal societies: R. v. Van der Peet, [1996] 2 S.C.R. 507, at para. 248, per McLachlin J., dissenting. Aboriginal peoples were here first, and they were never conquered (Haida Nation, at para. 25); yet, they became subject to a legal system that they did not share. Historical treaties were framed in that unfamiliar legal system, and negotiated and drafted in a foreign language: R. v. Badger, [1996] 1 S.C.R. 771, at para. 52; Mitchell v. Peguis Indian Band, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 85, at pp. 142-43, per La Forest J. The honour of the Crown characterizes the "special relationship" that arises out of this colonial practice: Little Salmon, at para. 62. As explained by Brian Slattery:

... when the Crown claimed sovereignty over Canadian territories and ultimately gained factual control [page660] over them, it did so in the face of pre-existing Aboriginal sovereignty and territorial rights. The tension between these conflicting claims gave rise to a special relationship between the Crown and Aboriginal peoples, which requires the Crown to deal honourably with Aboriginal peoples.

("Aboriginal Rights and the Honour of the Crown" (2005), 29 S.C.L.R. (2d) 433, at p. 436)

(2) When Is the Honour of the Crown Engaged?

68 The honour of the Crown imposes a heavy obligation, and not all interactions between the Crown and Aboriginal people engage it. In the past, it has been found to be engaged in situations involving reconciliation of Aboriginal rights with Crown sovereignty. As stated in Badger:

... the honour of the Crown is always at stake in its dealing with Indian people. Interpretations of treaties and statutory provisions which have an impact upon treaty or aboriginal rights must be approached in a manner which maintains the integrity of the Crown. [para. 41]

69 This Court has also recognized that the honour of the Crown is engaged by s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. In R. v. Sparrow, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1075, the Court found that s. 35(1) restrains the legislative power in s. 91(24), in accordance with the "high standard of honourable dealing": p. 1109. In Haida Nation, this Court explained that "[i]t is a corollary of s. 35 that the Crown act honourably in defining the rights it guarantees": para. 20. Because of its connection with s. 35, the honour of the Crown has been called a "constitutional principle": Little Salmon, at para. 42.

70 The application of these precedents to this case indicates that the honour of the Crown is also engaged by an explicit obligation to an Aboriginal group that is enshrined in the Constitution. The [page661] Constitution is not a mere statute; it is the very document by which the "Crow[n] assert[ed its] sovereignty in the face of prior Aboriginal occupation": Taku River, at para. 24. See also Mitchell v. M.N.R., 2001 SCC 33, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 911, at para. 9. It is at the root of the honour of the Crown, and an explicit obligation to an Aboriginal group placed therein engages the honour of the Crown at its core. As stated in Haida Nation, "[i]n all its dealings with Aboriginal peoples, from the assertion of sovereignty to the resolution of claims and the implementation of treaties, the Crown must act honourably": para. 17 (emphasis added).

71 An analogy may be drawn between such a constitutional obligation and a treaty promise. An "intention to create obligations" and a "certain measure of solemnity" should attach to both: R. v. Sioui, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1025, at p. 1044; R. v. Sundown, [1999] 1 S.C.R. 393, at paras. 24-25. Moreover, both types of promises are made for the overarching purpose of reconciling Aboriginal interests with the Crown's sovereignty. Constitutional obligations may even be arrived at after a course of consultation similar to treaty negotiation.

72 The last element under this rubric is that the obligation must be explicitly owed to an Aboriginal group. The honour of the Crown will not be engaged by a constitutional obligation in which Aboriginal peoples simply have a strong interest. Nor will it be engaged by a constitutional obligation owed to a group partially composed of Aboriginal peoples. Aboriginal peoples are part of Canada, and they do not have special status with respect to constitutional obligations owed to Canadians as a whole. But a constitutional obligation explicitly directed at an Aboriginal group invokes its "special relationship" with the Crown: Little Salmon, at para. 62.

(3) What Duties Are Imposed by the Honour of the Crown?

73 The honour of the Crown "is not a mere incantation, but rather a core precept that finds its application in concrete practices" and "gives rise to different duties in different circumstances": Haida Nation, at paras. 16 and 18. It is not a cause of action itself; rather, it speaks to how obligations that attract it must be fulfilled. Thus far, the honour of the Crown has been applied in at least four situations:

- (1) The honour of the Crown gives rise to a fiduciary duty when the Crown assumes discretionary control over a specific Aboriginal interest (Wewaykum, at paras. 79 and 81; Haida Nation, at para. 18);
- (2) The honour of the Crown informs the purposive interpretation of s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, and gives rise to a duty to consult when the Crown contemplates an action that will affect a claimed but as of yet unproven Aboriginal interest (Haida Nation, at para. 25);
- (3) The honour of the Crown governs treaty-making and implementation (Province of Ontario v. Dominion of Canada (1895), 25 S.C.R. 434, at p. 512, per Gwynne J., dissenting; Mikisew Cree First Nation v. Canada (Minister of Canadian Heritage), 2005 SCC 69, [2005] 3 S.C.R. 388, at para. 51), leading to requirements such as honourable negotiation and the avoidance of the appearance of sharp dealing (Badger, at para. 41); and

- (4) The honour of the Crown requires the Crown to act in a way that accomplishes the intended purposes of treaty and statutory grants to Aboriginal peoples (R. v. Marshall, [1999] 3 S.C.R. 456, at para. 43, referring to The Case of The Churchwardens of St. Saviour in Southwark (1613), 10 Co. Rep. 66b, 77 E.R. 1025, [page663] and Roger Earl of Rutland's Case (1608), 8 Co. Rep. 55a, 77 E.R. 555; Mikisew Cree First Nation, at para. 51; Badger, at para. 47).

74 Thus, the duty that flows from the honour of the Crown varies with the situation in which it is engaged. What constitutes honourable conduct will vary with the circumstances.

75 By application of the precedents and principles governing this honourable conduct, we find that when the issue is the implementation of a constitutional obligation to an Aboriginal people, the honour of the Crown requires that the Crown: (1) takes a broad purposive approach to the interpretation of the promise; and (2) acts diligently to fulfill it.

76 The first branch, purposive interpretation of the obligation, has long been recognized as flowing from the honour of the Crown. In the constitutional context, this Court has recognized that the honour of the Crown demands that s. 35(1) be interpreted in a generous manner, consistent with its intended purpose. Thus, in Haida Nation, it was held that, unless the recognition and affirmation of Aboriginal rights in s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 extended to yet unproven rights to land, s. 35 could not fulfill its purpose of honourable reconciliation: para. 27. The Court wrote, at para. 33: "When the distant goal of proof is finally reached, the Aboriginal peoples may find their land and resources changed and denuded. This is not reconciliation. Nor is it honourable." A purposive approach to interpretation informed by the honour of the Crown applies no less to treaty obligations. For example, in Marshall, Binnie J. rejected a proposed treaty interpretation on the grounds that it was not "consistent with the honour and integrity of the Crown... . The trade arrangement must be interpreted in a manner which gives meaning and substance to the promises made by the Crown": para. 52.

77 This jurisprudence illustrates that an honourable interpretation of an obligation cannot be a legalistic one that divorces the words from their purpose. Thus, the honour of the Crown demands that constitutional obligations to Aboriginal peoples be given a broad, purposive interpretation.

78 Second, the honour of the Crown requires it to act diligently in pursuit of its solemn obligations and the honourable reconciliation of Crown and Aboriginal interests.

79 This duty has arisen largely in the treaty context, where the Crown's honour is pledged to diligently carrying out its promises: Mikisew Cree First Nation, at para. 51; Little Salmon, at para. 12; see also Haida Nation, at para. 19. In its most basic iteration, the law assumes that the Crown always intends to fulfill its solemn promises, including constitutional obligations: Badger, Haida Nation, at para. 20. At a minimum, sharp dealing is not permitted: Badger. Or, as this Court put it in Mikisew Cree First Nation, "the honour of the Crown [is] pledged to the fulfilment of its obligations to the Indians": para. 51. But the duty goes further: if the honour of the Crown is pledged to the fulfillment of its obligations, it follows then that the honour of the Crown requires the Crown to endeavour to ensure its obligations are fulfilled. Thus, in review proceedings under the James Bay and Northern Québec Agreement, the participants are expected to "carry out their work with due diligence": Quebec (Attorney General) v. Moses, 2010 SCC 17, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 557, at para. 23. As stated by Binnie J. in Little Salmon, at para. 12: "It is up to the parties, when treaty issues arise, to act diligently to advance their respective interests. Good government requires that decisions be taken in a timely way." This duty applies whether the obligation arises in a treaty, as in the precedents outlined above, or in the Constitution, as here.

80 To fulfill this duty, Crown servants must seek to perform the obligation in a way that pursues the purpose behind the promise. The Aboriginal group must not be left "with an empty shell of a treaty promise": Marshall, at para. 52.

81 It is a narrow and circumscribed duty, which is engaged by the extraordinary facts before us. This duty, recognized in many authorities, is not a novel addition to the law.

82 Not every mistake or negligent act in implementing a constitutional obligation to an Aboriginal people brings dishonour to the Crown. Implementation, in the way of human affairs, may be imperfect. However, a persistent pattern of errors and indifference that substantially frustrates the purposes of a solemn promise may amount to a betrayal of the Crown's duty to act honourably in fulfilling its promise. Nor does the honour of the Crown constitute a guarantee that the purposes of the promise will be achieved, as circumstances and events may prevent fulfillment, despite the Crown's diligent efforts.

83 The question is simply this: Viewing the Crown's conduct as a whole in the context of the case, did the Crown act with diligence to pursue the fulfillment of the purposes of the obligation?

(4) The Argument That Failure to Act Diligently in Implementing Section 31 Should Not Be Considered by This Court

84 Our colleague Rothstein J. asserts that the parties did not argue that lack of diligent implementation of s. 31 was inconsistent with the honour of the Crown, and that we should not therefore consider this possibility.

85 We agree with our colleague that new developments in the law must be approached with caution where they have not been canvassed by the parties to the litigation. However, in our view this concern does not arise here.

86 The honour of the Crown was at the heart of this litigation from the beginning. Before the courts below and in this Court, the Métis argued that the conduct of the government in implementing s. 31 of the Manitoba Act breached the duty that arose from the honour of the Crown. They were supported in this contention by a number of interveners. In oral argument, the intervener the Attorney General for Saskatchewan stated that the honour of the Crown calls for "a broad, liberal, and generous interpretation", and acts as "an interpretive guide post to the public law duties ... with respect to the implementation of Section 31": transcript, at p. 67. The intervener Métis Nation of Alberta argued that s. 31 is an unfulfilled promise here, which the honour of the Crown demands be fulfilled by reconciliation through negotiation. The intervener the Métis Nation of Ontario argued that s. 31 "could not be honoured by a process that ultimately defeated the purpose of the provision": transcript, at p. 28.

87 These submissions went beyond the argument that the honour of the Crown gave rise to a fiduciary duty, raising the broader issue of whether the government's conduct generally comported with the honour of the Crown. Canada understood this: it argued in its factum that while the Crown intends to fulfill its promises, the honour of the Crown in this case does not give rise to substantive obligations to do so.

88 In short, all parties understood that the issue of what duties the honour of the Crown might raise, [page667] apart from a fiduciary duty, was on the table, and all parties presented submissions on it.

89 It is true that the Métis and the interveners supporting them did not put the argument in precisely the terms of the reasons. While they argued that the government's conduct in implementing s. 31 did not comport with the honour of the Crown, they did not express this alleged failure in terms of failure to comply with a duty of diligent implementation. However, this was implicit in their argument, given that the failure to diligently implement s. 31 lay at the heart of their grievance.

90 For these reasons, we conclude that it is not inappropriate to consider and resolve the question of what duties the honour of the Crown gave rise to in connection with s. 31 of the Manitoba Act, not just as they impact on the argument that the government owed a fiduciary duty to the Métis, but more broadly.

(5) Did the Solemn Promise in Section 31 of the Manitoba Act Engage the Honour of the Crown?

91 As outlined above, the honour of the Crown is engaged by constitutional obligations to Aboriginal groups. Section 31 of the Manitoba Act is just such a constitutional obligation. Section 31 conferred land rights on yet-to-be-identified individuals - the Métis children. Yet the record leaves no doubt that it was a promise made to the Métis people collectively, in recognition of their distinct community. The honour of the Crown is thus engaged here.

92 To understand the nature of s. 31 as a solemn obligation, it may be helpful to consider its [page668] treaty-like history and character. Section 31 sets out solemn promises - promises which are no less fundamental than treaty promises. Section 31, like a treaty, was adopted with "the intention to create obligations ... and a certain measure of solemnity": Sioui, at p. 1044; Sundown. It was intended to create legal obligations of the highest order: no greater solemnity than inclusion in the Constitution of Canada can be conceived. Section 31 was conceived in the context of negotiations to create the new province of Manitoba. And all this was done to the end of reconciling the Métis Aboriginal interest with the Crown's claim to sovereignty. As the trial judge held:

... the evidence establishes that this [s. 31] grant, to be given on an individual basis for the benefit of the families, albeit given to the children, was given for the purpose of recognizing the role of the Métis in the Settlement both past and to the then present, for the purpose of attempting to ensure the harmonious entry of the territory into Confederation, mindful of both Britain's condition as to treatment of the settlers and the uncertain state of affairs then existing in the Settlement, and for the purpose of giving the children of the Métis and their families on a onetime basis an advantage in the life of the new province over expected immigrants. [Emphasis added; para. 544.]

93 Section 31, though, is not a treaty. The trial judge correctly described s. 31 as a constitutional provision crafted for the purpose of resolving Aboriginal concerns and permitting the creation of the province of Manitoba. When the Manitoba Act was passed, the Métis dominated the Red River provisional government, and controlled a significant military force. Canada had good reason to take the steps necessary to secure peace between the Métis and the settlers. Justice MacInnes wrote:

Canada, to the knowledge of Macdonald and Cartier, was in a difficult position having to complete the steps necessary for the entry of Rupert's Land into Canada. An insurrection had occurred at Red River such that, in the view of both Canada and Britain, a void in the lawful governance of the territory existed. Canada, as a result [page669] of McDougall's conduct on December 1, 1869, had in a practical sense claimed the territory for Canada, but the legal transfer of the territory from Britain had not yet occurred. Accordingly, Canada had no lawful authority to govern the area. Furthermore, there was neither the practical ability nor the will for Canada or the Imperial Government to enforce authority and in that sense, the purpose of the discussions or negotiations between the Red River delegates and Macdonald and Cartier was to bring about in a peaceful way the entry of the territory into Canada, thereby giving Canada the opportunity to peacefully take over the territory and its governance and be able to move forward with its goal of nation building. [para. 649]

94 Section 31 is a constitutional obligation to an Aboriginal group. In accordance with the principles outlined above, the honour of the Crown is engaged by s. 31 and gives rise to a duty of diligent, purposive fulfillment.

(6) Did Section 32 of the Manitoba Act Engage the Honour of the Crown?

95 We agree with the Court of Appeal that the honour of the Crown was not engaged by s. 32 of the Manitoba Act. Unlike s. 31, it was not a promise made specifically to an Aboriginal group, but rather a benefit made generally available to all settlers, Métis and non-Métis alike. The honour of the Crown is not engaged whenever an Aboriginal person accesses a benefit.

(7) Did the Crown Act Honourably in Implementing Section 31 of the Manitoba Act?

96 The trial judge indicated that, although they did not act in bad faith, the government servants may have been negligent in administering the s. 31 grant. He held that the implementation of the obligation was within the Crown's discretion and that it had a discretion to act negligently: "Mistakes, even negligence, on the part of those responsible for implementation of the grant are not sufficient to successfully attack Canada's exercise of discretion [page670] in its implementation of the grant" (para. 943 (emphasis added)). The Court of Appeal took a similar view: see para. 656.

97 Based on the arguments before them and the applicable precedents, the trial judge and the Court of Appeal did not focus on what we take as the central issue in the case: whether the government's implementation of s. 31 comported with the duty of the Crown to diligently pursue implementation of the provision in a way that would achieve its objectives. The question is whether the Crown's conduct, viewed as a whole and in context, met this standard. We conclude that it did not.

98 The broad purpose of s. 31 of the Manitoba Act was to reconcile the Métis community with the sovereignty of the Crown and to permit the creation of the province of Manitoba. This reconciliation was to be accomplished by a more concrete measure - the prompt and equitable transfer of the allotted public lands to the Métis children.

99 The prompt and equitable implementation of s. 31 was fundamental to the project of reconciliation and the entry of Manitoba into Canada. As the trial judge found, s. 31 was designed to give the Métis a head start in the race for land and a place in the new province. This required that the grants be made while a head start was still possible. Everyone concerned understood that a wave of settlement from Europe and Canada to the east would soon sweep over the province. Acknowledging the need for timely implementation, Minister Cartier sent a letter to the meeting of the Manitoba Legislature charged with determining whether to accept the Manitoba Act, assuring the Métis that the s. 31 grants would "be of a nature to meet the wishes of the half-breed residents" and that the division of land would be done "in the most effectual and equitable manner".

100 The Métis allege Canada failed to fulfill its duties to the Métis people in relation to the children's grant in four ways: (1) inexcusably delaying distribution of the s. 31 lands; (2) distributing lands via random selection rather than ensuring family members received contiguous parcels; (3) failing to ensure s. 31 grant recipients were not taken advantage of by land speculators; and (4) giving some eligible Métis children $240 worth of scrip redeemable at the Land Titles Office instead of a direct grant of land. We will consider each in turn.

(a) Delay

101 Contrary to the expectations of the parties, it took over 10 years to make the allotments of land to Métis children promised by s. 31. Indeed, the final settlement, in the form not of land but of scrip, did not occur until 1885. This delay substantially defeated a purpose of s. 31.

102 A central purpose of the s. 31 grant, as found by MacInnes J., was to give "families of the Métis through their children a head start in the new country in anticipation of the probable and expected influx of immigrants": para. 655. Time was then plainly of the essence, if the goal of giving the Métis children a real advantage, relative to an impending influx of settlers from the east, was to be achieved.

103 The government understood this. Prime Minister Macdonald, on May 2, 1870, just before addressing Parliament, wrote that the land was to be distributed as soon as practicable amongst the different heads of half breed families according to the number of children of both sexes then existing in each [page672] family under such legislative enactments, which may be found advisable to secure the transmission and holding of the said lands amongst the half breed families. - To extinguish Indian claims - ... [Emphasis added.]

And Minister Cartier, as we know, confirmed that the "guarantee" would be effected "in the most effectual and equitable manner".

104 Yet that was not what happened. As discussed earlier in these reasons, implementation was delayed by many government actions and inactions, including: (1) starting off with the wrong class of beneficiaries, contrary to the wording of s. 31 and objections in the House of Commons; (2) taking three years to rectify this error; (3) commissioning a report in 1875 that erroneously lowered the number of eligible recipients and required yet a third allotment; (4) completing implementation only in 1885 by giving scrip to eligible Métis denied land because of mistakes in the previous three iterations of the allotment process; (5) long delays in issuing patents; and (6) unexplained periods of inaction. In the meantime, settlers were pouring in and the Manitoba Legislature was passing various acts dealing in different and contradictory ways with how Métis could sell their yet-to-be-realized interests in land.

105 The delay was noted by all concerned. The Legislative Council and Assembly of Manitoba complained of the delay on February 8, 1872, noting that new settlers had been allowed to take up land in the area. In early 1875, a number of Métis parishes sent petitions to Ottawa complaining of the delay, saying it was having a "damaging effect upon the prosperity of the Province": C.A., at para. 123. The provincial government also in that year made a request to the Governor General that the process be expedited. In 1883, the Deputy Minister of the Interior, A. M. Burgess, said this: "I am every day grieved and heartily sick when I [page673] think of the disgraceful delay": A.R., vol. XXI, at pp. 123-24; see also C.A., at para. 160.

106 This brings us to whether the delay was inconsistent with the duty imposed by the honour of the Crown to act diligently to fulfill the purpose of the s. 31 obligation. The Court of Appeal did not consider this question. But like the trial judge, it concluded that inattention and carelessness were likely factors:

With respect to those known events that contributed to the delay (prominent among them the cancellation of the first two allotments, the slow pace of the allotment process in the third and final round, the erroneous inclusion of adults as beneficiaries for the s. 31 grants, and the long delays in the issuance of patents), mistakes were made and it is difficult to avoid the inference that inattention or carelessness may have been a contributing factor. [para. 656]

107 As discussed above, a negligent act does not in itself establish failure to implement an obligation in the manner demanded by the honour of the Crown. On the other hand, a persistent pattern of inattention may do so if it frustrates the purpose of the constitutional obligation, particularly if it is not satisfactorily explained.

108 The record and findings of the courts below suggest a persistent pattern of inattention. The government was warned of the initial error of including all Métis, yet took three years to cancel the first faulty allotment and start a second. An inexplicable delay lies between the first and second allotments, from 1873 to 1875. The government had changed, to be sure. But as the Court of Appeal found, there is no explanation in the record as to "why it took the new government over a year to address the continuing delays in moving ahead with the allotments": para. 126. The Crown's obligations cannot be suspended simply because there is a change in government. The second allotment, when [page674] it finally took place, was aborted in 1876 because of a report that underestimated eligible recipients. But there is no satisfactory explanation why a third and final allotment was not completed until 1880. The explanation offered is simply that those in charge did not have adequate time to devote to the task because of other government priorities, and they did not wish to delegate the task because information about the grants might fall into the hands of speculators.

109 We take no issue with the finding of the trial judge that, with one exception, there was no bad faith or misconduct on the part of the Crown employees: paras. 1208-9. However, diligence requires more than simply the absence of bad faith. The trial judge noted that the children's grants "were not implemented or administered without error or dissatisfaction": para. 1207. Viewing the matter through the lens of fiduciary duty, the trial judge found this did not rise to a level of concern. We take a different view. The findings of the trial judge indicate consistent inattention and a consequent lack of diligence.

110 We conclude that, viewing the conduct of the Crown in its entirety and in the context of the situation, including the need for prompt implementation, the Crown acted with persistent inattention and failed to act diligently to achieve the purposes of the s. 31 grant. Canada's argument that, in some cases, the delay secured better prices for Métis who sold is undermined by evidence that many Métis sold potential interests for too little, and, in any event, it does not absolve the Crown of failure to act as its honour required. The delay in completing the s. 31 distribution was inconsistent with the behaviour demanded by the honour of the Crown.

(b) Sales to Speculators

111 The Métis argue that Canada breached its duty to the children eligible for s. 31 grants by failing to protect them from land speculators. They say that Canada should not have permitted sales before the allotments were granted to the children or before the recipients attained the age of majority.

112 Canada responds that the Crown was not obliged to impose any restraint on alienation, and indeed would have been criticized had it done so. It says that the Métis already had a history of private landholding, including buying and selling property. They say that the desire of many Métis to sell was not the result of any breach of duty by the Crown, but rather simply reflected that the amount of land granted far exceeded Métis needs, and many Métis did not desire to settle down in Manitoba.

113 The trial judge held that restricting the alienability of Métis land would have been seen as patronizing and been met with disfavour amongst the Métis. The Court of Appeal agreed, and added that, "practically speaking, next to nothing could have been done to prevent sales of and speculation in s. 31 lands in the absence of an absolute prohibition against sales of any kind": para. 631. It added that some Métis received more land than they needed, and many were leaving the settlement to follow the buffalo hunt, making the ability to sell their interests valuable.

114 We see no basis to interfere with the finding that many eligible Métis were determined to sell their lots or the conclusion that a prohibition on sales would have been unacceptable. This said, we note that the 10-year delay in implementation of the land grants increased sales to speculators. Persons concerned at the time urged that information about [page676] the location of each child's individual allotment be made public as early as possible to give potential claimants a sense of ownership and avert speculative sell-offs. This did not happen: evidence of Dr. Thomas Flanagan, A.R., vol. XXVI, at p. 53. Dr. Flanagan concluded "[t]he Métis were already selling their claims to participate in the grant, and being able to sell the right to a particular piece of land rather than a mere right to participate in a lottery would indeed have enhanced the prices they received": p. 54. Until the Métis acquired their s. 31 grants, they provided no benefit to the children, and a cash offer from a speculator would appear attractive. Moreover, as time passed, the possibility grew that the land was becoming less valuable, as the Métis could not effectively protect any timber or other resources that might exist on the plots they might someday receive from exploitation by others.

115 In 1873, the Manitoba government, aware of the improvident sales that were occurring, moved to curb speculation by passing The Half-Breed Land Grant Protection Act, S.M. 1873, c. 44, which permitted vendors to repudiate sales. The preamble to that legislation recognized that "very many persons entitled to participate in the said grant in evident ignorance of the value of their individual shares have agreed severally to sell their right to the same to speculators, receiving therefor only a trifling consideration". However, with An Act to amend the Act passed in the 37th year of Her Majesty's reign, entitled "The Half-Breed Land Grant Protection Act", S.M. 1877, c. 5 (The Half-Breed Land Grant Amendment Act, 1877), Manitoba changed course, so that a Métis child who made a bad bargain was stuck with it. An Act to enable certain children of Half-breed heads of families to convey their land, S.M. 1878, c. 20 (The Half-Breed Land Grant Act, 1878), followed. It allowed Métis children between 18 and 21 years of age to sell their s. 31 entitlement with parental [page677] consent, so long as they appeared in front of one judge or two justices of the peace.

116 Dr. Flanagan found that 11 percent of the sample examined sold their lands prior to learning the location of their grant, and received "markedly lower prices" as a result: "Metis Family Study", A.R., vol. XXVII, at p. 53. The Court of Appeal concluded that the price received by Métis who sold after allotment was about twice that received by those who sold before allotment: para. 168.

117 The honour of the Crown did not demand that the grant lands be made inalienable. However, the facts on the ground, known to all, made it all the more important to complete the allotment without delay and, in the interim, to advise Métis of what holdings they would receive. By 1874, in their recommendations as to how the allotment process should be carried out, both Codd and Lieutenant Governor Alexander Morris implicitly recognized that delay was encouraging sales at lower prices; nevertheless, allotment would not be complete for six more years. Until allotments were known and completed, delay inconsistent with the honour of the Crown was perpetuating a situation where children were receiving artificially diminished value for their land grants.

(c) Scrip

118 Due to Codd's underestimation of the number of eligible children, 993 Métis were left out of the 1.4 million-acre allotment in the end. Instead, they received scrip redeemable for land at a land title office. Scrip could also be sold for cash on the open market, where it was worth about half its face value: C.A., at para. 168.

119 The Métis argue that Canada breached its duty to the children who received scrip because s. 31 demanded that land, not scrip, be distributed; and because scrip was not distributed until 1885, when at going land prices, Métis who received scrip could not acquire the 240 acres granted to other children.

120 We do not accept the Métis' first argument that delivery of scrip instead of land constituted a breach of s. 31 of the Manitoba Act. As long as the 1.4 million acres was set aside and distributed with reasonable equity, the scheme of the Manitoba Act was not offended. It was unavoidable that the land would be distributed based on an estimate of the number of eligible Métis that would be inaccurate to some degree. The issuance of scrip was a reasonable mechanism to provide the benefit to which the excluded children were entitled.

121 The Métis' second argument is that the value of scrip issued was deficient. The government decided to grant to each left-out child $240 worth of scrip, based on a rate of $1 per acre. While the Order in Council price for land was $1 an acre in 1879, by 1885, when the scrip was delivered, most categories of land were priced at $2 or $2.50 an acre at the land title office: A.R., vol. XXIV, at p. 8. The children who received scrip thus obtained a grant equivalent to between 96 and 120 acres, significantly less than the 240 acres provided to those who took part in the initial distribution. The delay resulted in the excluded children receiving less land than the others. This was a departure from the s. 31 promise that the land would be divided in a roughly equal fashion amongst the eligible children.

122 The most serious complaint regarding scrip is that Canada took too long to issue it. The process was marred by the delay and mismanagement that typified the overall implementation of the s. 31 grants. Canada recognized in 1884 that a significant number of eligible children would not receive the [page679] land to which they were entitled, yet it did nothing to provide a remedy to the excluded beneficiaries for almost a year. The trial judge observed:

By memorandum to the Minister of the Interior dated May 1884, Deputy Minister A.M. Burgess wrote that there were about 500 claimants whose applications had been approved but whose claims were unsatisfied because the land had been "exhausted". He was unable to explain the error, but recommended that scrip be issued to the children.

For whatever reason action was postponed until April 1885 when Burgess submitted another report in which he explained how this shortage occurred. Burgess recommended as equitable that the issue of scrip to each half-breed child who has since proved his or her claim should be for $240.00, the same to be accepted as in full satisfaction of such claim. The $240.00 was based upon 240 acres (being the size of the individual grant) at the rate of $1.00 per acre. [paras. 255-56]

123 We conclude that the delayed issuance of scrip redeemable for significantly less land than was provided to the other recipients further demonstrates the persistent pattern of inattention inconsistent with the honour of the Crown that typified the s. 31 grants.

(d) Random Allotment

124 The Métis assert that the s. 31 lands should have been allotted so that the children's lots were contiguous to, or in the vicinity of, their parents' lots. At a minimum, they say siblings' lands should have been clustered together. They say that this was necessary to facilitate actual settlement, rather than merely sale, of the s. 31 lands, so as to establish a Métis homeland.

125 Canada responds that it would not have been possible to settle all the Métis children on lots contiguous to their parents. Many families had a large number of children, and each child was entitled to a 240-acre lot. They argue that in the circumstances, a random allotment was reasonable.

126 The trial judge found there was no agreement to distribute the land in family blocks. He observed that while the French Métis generally wanted grants contiguous to where they were residing and were not overly concerned with the value of the land, the English Métis were interested in selecting the most valuable allotments available even if they were not adjacent to their family lots. He also observed that the lottery was not random throughout the province: each parish received an allotment of land in its area and then distributed land within that allotment randomly to the individual Métis children living in the parish. He concluded that it was difficult to conceive how the land could have been administered other than by random lottery without creating unfairness and divisiveness within each parish. Further, because of the size of the grants, it would be hard to give a family a series of 240-acre contiguous parcels without interfering with neighbouring families' ability to receive the same. Moreover, a random lottery gave each child within the parish an equal chance at receiving the best parcel available. Finally, there was little, if any, complaint about the random selection from those present at the time. The Court of Appeal agreed, noting that Lieutenant Governor Archibald attempted to accommodate Métis wishes for the placement of a parish's allotments.

127 Given the finding at trial that the grant was intended to benefit the individual children, not establish a Métis land base, we accept that random selection within each parish was an acceptable way to distribute the land consistent with the purpose of the s. 31 obligation. This said, the delay in [page681] distributing land, and the consequential sales prior to patent, may well have made it more difficult for Métis to trade grants amongst themselves to achieve contiguous parcels.

(8) Conclusion on the Honour of the Crown

128 The s. 31 obligation made to the Métis is part of our Constitution and engages the honour of the Crown. The honour of the Crown required the Crown to interpret s. 31 in a purposive manner and to diligently pursue fulfillment of the purposes of the obligation. This was not done. The Métis were promised implementation of the s. 31 land grants in "the most effectual and equitable manner". Instead, the implementation was ineffectual and inequitable. This was not a matter of occasional negligence, but of repeated mistakes and inaction that persisted for more than a decade. A government sincerely intent on fulfilling the duty that its honour demanded could and should have done better.

D. Were the Manitoba Statutes Related to Implementation Unconstitutional?

129 The Métis seek a declaration that the impugned eight statutes passed by Manitoba were ultra vires and therefore unconstitutional or otherwise inoperative by virtue of the doctrine of paramountcy.

130 Between 1877 and 1885, Manitoba passed five statutes that regulated the means by which sales of s. 31 lands could take place by private contract or court order. They dealt with the technical requirements to transfer interests in s. 31 lands. These included: permitting sales by a s. 31 allottee who was over 21 years of age (The Half-Breed Land Grant Amendment Act, 1877); allowing sales of grants by Métis between 18 and 21 years of age with parental consent and consent of the child supervised [page682] by a judge or two justices of the peace (The Half-Breed Land Grant Act, 1878); and settling issues as to the sufficiency of documentation necessary to pass good title in anticipation of the introduction of the Torrens system (An Act relating to the Titles of Half-Breed Lands, S.M. 1885, c. 30). The Manitoba statutes were consolidated in the Half-Breed Lands Act, R.S.M. 1891, c. 67, and eventually repealed by The Statute Law Revision and Statute Law Amendment Act, 1969, S.M. 1969 (2nd Sess.), c. 34, s. 31.

131 In Dumont v. Canada (Attorney General), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 279, a preliminary motion to strike was brought by Canada in respect of this litigation. Wilson J. stated:

The Court is of the view also that the subject matter of the dispute, inasmuch as it involves the constitutionality of legislation ancillary to the Manitoba Act, 1870 is justiciable in the courts and that declaratory relief may be granted in the discretion of the court in aid of extra-judicial claims in an appropriate case. [Emphasis added; p. 280.]

This statement is not a ruling or a pre-determination on whether the review of the repealed statutes in this action is moot. The Dumont decision recognizes that a declaration may be granted - in the discretion of the court - in aid of extra-judicial relief in an appropriate case. The Court simply decided that it was not "plain and obvious" or "beyond doubt" that the case would fail: p. 280.

132 These statutes have long been out of force. They can have no future impact. Their only significance is as part of the historic matrix of the Métis' claims. In short, they are moot. To consider their constitutionality would be a misuse of the Court's time. We therefore need not address this issue.

E. Is the Claim for a Declaration Barred by Limitations?

133 We have concluded that Canada did not act diligently to fulfill the specific obligation to the Métis contained in s. 31 of the Manitoba Act, as required by the honour of the Crown. For the reasons below, we conclude that the law of limitations does not preclude a declaration to this effect.

134 This Court has held that although claims for personal remedies flowing from the striking down of an unconstitutional statute are barred by the running of a limitation period, courts retain the power to rule on the constitutionality of the underlying statute: Kingstreet Investments Ltd. v. New Brunswick (Finance), 2007 SCC 1, [2007] 1 S.C.R. 3; Ravndahl v. Saskatchewan, 2009 SCC 7, [2009] 1 S.C.R. 181. The constitutionality of legislation has always been a justiciable question: Thorson v. Attorney General of Canada, [1975] 1 S.C.R. 138, at p. 151. The "right of the citizenry to constitutional behaviour by Parliament" can be vindicated by a declaration that legislation is invalid, or that a public act is ultra vires: Canadian Bar Assn. v. British Columbia, 2006 BCSC 1342, 59 B.C.L.R. (4th) 38, at paras. 23 and 91, citing Thorson, at p. 163 (emphasis added). An "issue [that is] constitutional is always justiciable": Waddell v. Schreyer (1981), 126 D.L.R. (3d) 431 (B.C.S.C.), at p. 437, aff'd (1982), 142 D.L.R. (3d) 177 (B.C.C.A.), leave to appeal refused, [1982] 2 S.C.R. vii (sub nom. Foothills Pipe Lines (Yukon) Ltd. v. Waddell).

135 Thus, this Court has found that limitations of actions statutes cannot prevent the courts, as guardians of the Constitution, from issuing declarations on the constitutionality of legislation. By extension, limitations acts cannot prevent the courts from issuing a declaration on the constitutionality of the Crown's conduct.

136 In this case, the Métis seek a declaration that a provision of the Manitoba Act - given constitutional authority by the Constitution Act, 1871 - was not implemented in accordance with the honour of the Crown, itself a "constitutional principle": Little Salmon, at para. 42.

137 Furthermore, the Métis seek no personal relief and make no claim for damages or for land. Nor do they seek restoration of the title their descendants might have inherited had the Crown acted honourably. Rather, they seek a declaration that a specific obligation set out in the Constitution was not fulfilled in the manner demanded by the Crown's honour. They seek this declaratory relief in order to assist them in extra-judicial negotiations with the Crown in pursuit of the overarching constitutional goal of reconciliation that is reflected in s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

138 The respondents argue that this claim is statute-barred by virtue of Manitoba's limitations legislation, which, in all its iterations, has contained provisions similar to the current one barring "actions grounded on accident, mistake or other equitable ground of relief" six years after the discovery of the cause of action: The Limitation of Actions Act, C.C.S.M. c. L150, s. 2(1)(k). Breach of fiduciary duty is an "equitable ground of relief". We agree, as the Court of Appeal held, that the limitation applies to Aboriginal claims for breach of fiduciary duty with respect to the administration of Aboriginal property: Wewaykum, at para. 121, and Canada (Attorney General) v. Lameman, 2008 SCC 14, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 372, at para. 13.

139 However, at this point we are not concerned with an action for breach of fiduciary duty, but with a claim for a declaration that the Crown did not [page685] act honourably in implementing the constitutional obligation in s. 31 of the Manitoba Act. Limitations acts cannot bar claims of this nature.

140 What is at issue is a constitutional grievance going back almost a century and a half. So long as the issue remains outstanding, the goal of reconciliation and constitutional harmony, recognized in s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 and underlying s. 31 of the Manitoba Act, remains unachieved. The ongoing rift in the national fabric that s. 31 was adopted to cure remains unremedied. The unfinished business of reconciliation of the Métis people with Canadian sovereignty is a matter of national and constitutional import. The courts are the guardians of the Constitution and, as in Ravndahl and Kingstreet, cannot be barred by mere statutes from issuing a declaration on a fundamental constitutional matter. The principles of legality, constitutionality and the rule of law demand no less: see Reference re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217, at para. 72.

141 Furthermore, many of the policy rationales underlying limitations statutes simply do not apply in an Aboriginal context such as this. Contemporary limitations statutes seek to balance protection of the defendant with fairness to the plaintiffs: Novak v. Bond, [1999] 1 S.C.R. 808, at para. 66, per McLachlin J. In the Aboriginal context, reconciliation must weigh heavily in the balance. As noted by Harley Schachter:

The various rationales for limitations are still clearly relevant, but it is the writer's view that the goal of reconciliation is a far more important consideration and ought to be given more weight in the analysis.

Arguments that provincial limitations apply of their own force, or can be incorporated as valid federal law, miss the point when aboriginal and treaty rights are at issue. They ignore the [page686] real analysis that ought to be undertaken, which is one of reconciliation and justification.

("Selected Current Issues in Aboriginal Rights Cases: Evidence, Limitations and Fiduciary Obligations", in The 2001 Isaac Pitblado Lectures: Practising Law In An Aboriginal Reality (2001), 203, at pp. 232-33)

Schachter was writing in the context of Aboriginal rights, but the argument applies with equal force here. Leonard I. Rotman goes even farther, pointing out that to allow the Crown to shield its unconstitutional actions with the effects of its own legislation appears fundamentally unjust: "Wewaykum: A New Spin on the Crown's Fiduciary Obligations to Aboriginal Peoples?" (2004), U.B.C. L. Rev. 219, at pp. 241-42. The point is that despite the legitimate policy rationales in favour of statutory limitations periods, in the Aboriginal context, there are unique rationales that must sometimes prevail.

142 In this case, the claim is not stale - it is largely based on contemporaneous documentary evidence - and no third party legal interests are at stake. As noted by Canada, the evidence provided the trial judge with "an unparalleled opportunity to examine the context surrounding the enactment and implementation of ss. 31 and 32 of the Manitoba Act": R.F., at para. 7.

143 Furthermore, the remedy available under this analysis is of a limited nature. A declaration is a narrow remedy. It is available without a cause of action, and courts make declarations whether or not any consequential relief is available. As argued by the intervener the Assembly of First Nations, it is not awarded against the defendant in the same sense as coercive relief: factum, at para. 29, citing Cheslatta Carrier Nation v. British Columbia, 2000 BCCA 539, 193 D.L.R. (4th) 344, at paras. 11-16. In some cases, declaratory relief may be the only way to give effect to the honour of the Crown: Assembly of First Nations' factum, at para. 31. Were the Métis in this action seeking personal remedies, the [page687] reasoning set out here would not be available. However, as acknowledged by Canada, the remedy sought here is clearly not a personal one: R.F., at para. 82. The principle of reconciliation demands that such declarations not be barred.

144 We conclude that the claim in this case is a claim for a declaration of the constitutionality of the Crown's conduct toward the Métis people under s. 31 of the Manitoba Act. It follows that The Limitation of Actions Act does not apply and the claim is not statute-barred.

F. Is the Claim for a Declaration Barred by Laches?

145 The equitable doctrine of laches requires a claimant in equity to prosecute his claim without undue delay. It does not fix a specific limit, but considers the circumstances of each case. In determining whether there has been delay amounting to laches, the main considerations are (1) acquiescence on the claimant's part; and (2) any change of position that has occurred on the defendant's part that arose from reasonable reliance on the claimant's acceptance of the status quo: M. (K.) v. M. (H.), [1992] 3 S.C.R. 6, at pp. 76-80.

146 As La Forest J. put it in M. (K.), at pp. 76-77, citing Lindsay Petroleum Co. v. Hurd (1874), L.R. 5 P.C. 221, at pp. 239-40:

Two circumstances, always important in such cases, are, the length of the delay and the nature of the acts done during the interval, which might affect either party and cause a balance of justice or injustice in taking the one course or the other, so far as relates to the remedy.

[page688]

La Forest J. concluded as follows:

What is immediately obvious from all of the authorities is that mere delay is insufficient to trigger laches under either of its two branches. Rather, the doctrine considers whether the delay of the plaintiff constitutes acquiescence or results in circumstances that make the prosecution of the action unreasonable. Ultimately, laches must be resolved as a matter of justice as between the parties, as is the case with any equitable doctrine. [Emphasis added; pp. 77-78.]

147 Acquiescence depends on knowledge, capacity and freedom: Halsbury's Laws of England (4th ed. 2003), vol. 16(2), at para. 912. In the context of this case - including the historical injustices suffered by the Métis, the imbalance in power that followed Crown sovereignty, and the negative consequences following delays in allocating the land grants - delay by itself cannot be interpreted as some clear act by the claimants which amounts to acquiescence or waiver. As explained below, the first branch of the Lindsay test is not met here.

148 The trial judge found that the delay in bringing this action was unexplained, in part because other constitutional litigation was undertaken in the 1890s: paras. 456-57. Two Manitoba statutes were challenged, first in the courts, and then by petition to the Governor General in Council: paras. 431-37. The trial judge inferred that many of the signatories to the petition would have been Métis: para. 435. While we do not contest this factual finding, we do question the legal inference drawn from it by the trial judge. Although many signatories were Métis, the petitioners were, in fact, a broader group, including many signatories and community leaders who were not Métis. For example, as noted by the trial judge, neither Archbishop Taché nor Father Ritchot - leaders in "the French Catholic/Métis community" - were Métis: para. 435. The actions of this large community say little, in law, about the ability of the Métis to seek a declaration based on the honour of the Crown. They do not [page689] establish acquiescence by the Métis community in the existing legal state of affairs.

149 Furthermore, in this rapidly evolving area of the law, it is rather unrealistic to suggest that the Métis sat on their rights before the courts were prepared to recognize those rights. As it is, the Métis commenced this claim before s. 35 was entrenched in the Constitution, and long before the honour of the Crown was elucidated in Haida Nation. It is difficult to see how this could constitute acquiescence in equity.

150 Moreover, a court exercising equitable jurisdiction must always consider the conscionability of the behaviour of both parties: see Pro Swing Inc. v. Elta Golf Inc., 2006 SCC 52, [2006] 2 S.C.R. 612, at para. 22. Canada was aware that there would be an influx of settlers and that the Métis needed to get a head start before that transpired, yet it did not work diligently to fulfill its constitutional promise to the Métis, as the honour of Crown required. The Métis did not receive the intended head start, and following the influx of settlers, they found themselves increasingly marginalized, facing discrimination and poverty: see, e.g., trial, at para. 541; C.A., at paras. 95, 244 and 638; A.F., at para. 200. Although bad faith is neither claimed nor needed here, the appellants point to a letter written by Sir John A. Macdonald, which suggests that this marginalization may even have been desired:

... it will require a considerable management to keep those wild people quiet. In another year the present residents will be altogether swamped by the influx of strangers who will go in with the idea of becoming industrious and peaceable settlers.

(October 14, 1869, A.R., vol. VII, at p. 65)

151 Be that as it may, this marginalization is of evidentiary significance only, as we cannot - and need not - unravel history and determine the precise causes of the marginalization of the Métis community in Manitoba after 1870. All that need be said (and all that is sought in the declaration) is that the central promise the Métis obtained from the Crown in order to prevent their future marginalization - the transfer of lands to the Métis children - was not carried out with diligence, as required by the honour of the Crown.

152 The second consideration relevant to laches is whether there was any change in Canada's position as a result of the delay. The answer is no. This is a case like M. (K.), where La Forest J. observed that it could not be seen how the "plaintiff ... caused the defendant to alter his position in reasonable reliance on the plaintiff's acceptance of the status quo, or otherwise permitted a situation to arise which it would be unjust to disturb": p. 77, quoting R. P. Meagher, W. M. C. Gummow and J. R. F. Lehane, Equity Doctrines and Remedies (2nd ed. 1984), at p. 755.

153 This suffices to answer Canada's argument that the Métis claim for a declaration that the Crown failed to act in accordance with the honour of the Crown is barred by laches. We add this, however. It is difficult to see how a court, in its role as guardian of the Constitution, could apply an equitable doctrine to defeat a claim for a declaration that a provision of the Constitution has not been fulfilled as required by the honour of the Crown. We note that, in Ontario Hydro v. Ontario (Labour Relations Board), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 327, at p. 357, Lamer C.J. noted that the doctrine of laches does not apply to a constitutional division of powers question. (See also Attorney General of Manitoba v. Forest, [1979] 2 S.C.R. 1032.) The Constitution is the supreme law of our country, and it demands that courts be empowered to protect its substance and uphold its promises.

VII. Disposition

154 The appeal is allowed in part. We conclude that the appellants are entitled to the following declaration:

That the federal Crown failed to implement the land grant provision set out in s. 31 of the Manitoba Act, 1870 in accordance with the honour of the Crown.

155 The appellants are awarded their costs throughout.

I. Introduction

156 In this case, the majority has created a new common law constitutional obligation on the part of the Crown - one that, they say, is unaffected by the common law defence of laches and immune from the legislature's undisputed authority to create limitations periods. They go this far notwithstanding that the courts below did not consider the issue, and that the parties did not argue the issue before this Court. As a result of proceeding in this manner, the majority has fashioned a vague rule that is unconstrained by laches or limitation periods and immune from legislative redress, making the extent and consequences of the Crown's new obligations impossible to predict.

157 While I agree with several of the majority's conclusions, I respectfully disagree with their conclusions on the scope of the duty engaged by the honour of the Crown and the applicability of limitations and laches to this claim.

158 The appellants, herein referred to collectively as the "Métis" made four main claims before this Court. Their primary claim was that [page692] the Crown owed the Métis a fiduciary duty arising from s. 31 of the Manitoba Act, 1870, S.C. 1870, c. 3 ("Manitoba Act"), and that this duty had been breached. As evidence of the breach of fiduciary duty, the Métis pointed to several factors: the random allocation of the land grants, the delay in allocation of the land, and the allocation of scrip instead of land to some Métis children. These claims make up the bulk of the argument in the Métis' factum.

159 The Métis also raised three other claims in less detail. First, they claimed that provincial statutes were ultra vires or inoperative due to the doctrine of paramountcy. Second, they claimed that the Crown did not fulfill its fiduciary duty under, or simply did not properly implement, s. 32 of the Manitoba Act. Finally, they claimed a failure to fulfill constitutional obligations, obligations that they state engaged the honour of the Crown. However, they did not elaborate on what duties the honour of the Crown should trigger on these facts.

160 The bulk of these claims were dismissed by the Chief Justice and Justice Karakatsanis and I am in agreement with them on those claims. I agree with their conclusion that there was no fiduciary duty here and therefore the claim for breach of fiduciary duty must fail. I agree that there are no valid claims arising from s. 32 of the Manitoba Act and that any claims that might have arisen from the now repealed Manitoba legislation on the land grants are moot, as those acts have long since been out of force. I agree with the majority that the random allocation of land grants was an acceptable means for Canada to implement the s. 31 land grants. Finally, I accept that the Manitoba Metis Federation has standing to bring these claims.

161 However, in my view, after correctly deciding all of these issues and consequently dismissing the vast majority of the claims raised on this appeal, my colleagues nonetheless salvage one aspect of the Métis' claims by expanding the scope of the duties that are engaged under the honour of the Crown. These issues were not the [page693] focus of the parties' submissions before this Court or the lower courts. Moreover, the new duty derived from the honour of the Crown that my colleagues have created has the potential to expand Crown liability in unpredictable ways. Finally, I am also of the opinion that any claim based on honour of the Crown was, on the facts of this case, barred by both limitations periods and laches. As a result, I would find for the respondents and dismiss the appeal.

II. Facts

162 While I agree with my colleagues' broad outlines of the facts of this case, I take issue with a number of the specific inferences or conclusions that they draw from the record.

163 As in all appellate reviews, the trial judge's factual findings should not be interfered with absent palpable and overriding error (Housen v. Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235, at para. 10). While the majority does not do so explicitly, aspects of their review and use of the facts depart from the findings of fact made by the trial judge.

However, at no point do they show that the trial judge made any palpable and overriding error in reaching his conclusions. Nor did the Métis claim that the findings I describe below were based on palpable and overriding error.

164 There are two main areas in which the majority reasons have departed from the factual findings of the trial judge, absent a finding of palpable and overriding error: (1) the extent of the delay in distributing the land, and (2) the effect of that delay on the Métis. In my view, the majority's departure from the appropriate standard of appellate review in these areas calls their analysis into question.

A. Extent and Causes of the Delay

165 The majority concludes that the record and findings of the courts below suggest a "persistent pattern of inattention". This pattern leads them to find that the duty of diligent fulfillment of solemn promises derived from the honour of the Crown [page694] was breached. In their view, there was a significant delay in implementing the land grants and this delay substantially defeated the purpose of s. 31. I respectfully disagree.

(1) Historical Evidence

166 Historical evidence was presented at trial and the bulk of it was accepted by the trial judge. Based on that evidence and on the reasons of the trial judge, I have summarized the process of how the land grants were distributed below. Though I accept the finding of the trial judge that there was a lengthy delay in the distribution of the land grants, this history reveals a steady and persistent effort to distribute the land grants in the face of significant administrative challenges and an unstable political environment. While a faster process would most certainly have been better, I cannot accept the majority's conclusion that this evidence reveals a pattern of inattention - a finding that is nowhere to be found in the reasons of the trial judge.

(a) The Census

167 The first Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba, A. G. Archibald, conducted a census which was completed on December 9, 1870. It would have been impossible to begin the allocation process without a reasonable estimate of how many Métis were owed land.

(b) The Survey

168 While the census was in progress, the Lieutenant Governor was also instructed to advise the government on a system for surveying the province. An order in council on April 25, 1871, adopted the survey method that Lieutenant Governor Archibald had proposed. The land needed to be surveyed before it was allocated and the Dominion lands survey was a formidable administrative challenge. The Court of Appeal acknowledged that "the evidence makes it clear that selection of the 1.4 million acres, all of which Canada was obliged [page695] to grant, would have been unworkable in the absence of a survey". The survey of the settlement belt was completed in the years 1871-74.

(c) Selection of the Townships

169 Once enough of the survey was complete, the Lieutenant Governor was able to take the next step in the process by selecting which townships would be distributed to the Métis. Lieutenant Governor Archibald received instructions to begin this process on July 17, 1872. The process of selecting the townships required the Lieutenant Governor to consult with the Métis of each parish to determine which areas should be selected. This consultation process took several months. Such consultation cannot be characterized as persistent inattention to the situation of the Métis.

170 While this process was taking place, there was a change in Lieutenant Governor. On December 31, 1871, Lieutenant Governor Archibald had resigned, realizing that he had lost Prime Minister Macdonald's confidence. He was not replaced, however, until the fall of 1872 when Lieutenant Governor Alexander Morris was sworn in. Archibald continued to serve until Morris took over. These types of changes in government inevitably lead to time being lost. Any such delay cannot, without more, be attributed to inattention.

171 By February 22, 1873, the preparatory work was sufficiently advanced that Lieutenant Governor Morris was able to begin drawing lots for the individual grants of 140 acres. He was able to draw lots at the rate of about 60 per hour.

(d) Events Giving Rise to the Second Allotment

172 Early in 1873, concern was expressed about whether it was proper for the heads of Métis families to share in the land grant. As a result, in April 1873, the federal government determined that a stricter interpretation of s. 31 should be adopted. Participation in the land grant was limited to the "children of half-breed heads of families" (trial, at [page696] para. 202). As a result of this change, the number of recipients was significantly reduced, which meant that larger allotments would be required to distribute the entire 1.4 million acres. On August 5, 1873, Lieutenant Governor Morris was instructed to cancel the previous allotments. On August 16, 1873, Morris began the second allotment.

173 This change meant that all of the drawing of the allotments up until that point had to be discarded. However, this was not the result of inattention. Rather, the federal government was taking care to make sure that the land grant was distributed correctly, to the right beneficiaries. The government had originally received advice from Lieutenant Governor Archibald that, in order to achieve the purposes of the land grant, it would be necessary to include the heads of the Métis families. While the Lieutenant Governor's interpretation was not consistent with the text of s. 31, it was an interpretation that was based on an effort to understand the purpose of the text and give meaning to the phrase "towards the extinguishment of the Indian Title to the lands". While the necessity of starting over no doubt resulted in some delay, it was not caused by inattention.

(e) The Fall of Sir John A. Macdonald's Government

174 On November 5, 1873, Sir John A. Macdonald's government resigned. On January 22, 1874, an election was held. The opening of Parliament under Prime Minister Alexander Mackenzie was on March 26, 1874. David Laird became Minister of the Interior responsible for Dominion Lands. In the fall of 1874, Minister Laird went to Manitoba to gather information on all phases of the land question. According to Dr. Flanagan, Laird's notebook shows that he considered the appointment of a commission "to enumerate those entitled to land rights under the Manitoba Act, including the children's grant under s. 31" (evidence of Dr. Thomas Flanagan, A.R., vol. XXVI, at p. 11).

(f) The Machar/Ryan Commission

175 An April 26, 1875 order in council established a commission to take applications for patents from those entitled to participate in the land grants under the Manitoba Act. By order in council on May 5, 1875, John Machar and Matthew Ryan were appointed commissioners and went to Manitoba in the summer of 1875. By the end of 1875, the commissioners had prepared returns for all parishes. These returns were approved and constituted what was seen as an authoritative list of those entitled to share in the land grant. However, because there was a concern that this list was not in fact complete, Ryan, having become a magistrate in the North-West Territories, and Donald Codd in the Dominion Lands Office, were authorized to receive further applications by Métis children or heads of families who had not been able to appear before the commission in 1875 because they had emigrated from Manitoba.

(g) The Patents

176 On August 31, 1877, the first batch of patents arrived in Winnipeg. After completion of the drawings for a parish, issue of patents usually took one to two years. In the interim, posters were prepared within a few weeks of the approval of the allotment to inform recipients as to the location of their allotments. Most of the patents were issued by 1881, however allotments continued to be approved for some years thereafter. Over 6,000 patents had to be issued under s. 31 of the Manitoba Act, on top of over 2,500 under s. 32.

(h) The Late Applications

177 In order to get their share of the land grant, the Métis had to file claims with the government. Because of the migration that was already underway, a certain number of these claims were filed late. While the government had anticipated some late claims, the number had been underestimated. As a [page698] result, claims continued to be filed after the 1.4 million acres had already been allocated. On April 20, 1885, an order in council granted the Métis children scrip rather than land, for those children who had submitted late applications.

178 The deadline for filing claims to the $240 scrip for children was May 1, 1886. However, it was not strictly enforced and the late applications continued to trickle in. The government extended the deadline at least four times. In the end, 993 scrips for $240 (worth $238,320) were issued to the Métis children or their heirs.

(2) Evidence of Delay

179 My colleagues point to a number of delays including errors in determining the class of beneficiaries, errors in estimating the number of beneficiaries, long delays in issuing patents and "unexplained periods of inaction". However, these administrative issues must be placed in their proper historical context. At the time, Manitoba was a thinly settled frontier province. There was limited transportation and communications infrastructure and the federal civil service was small. The evidence of Dr. Flanagan was that

[e]ven with an omniscient, omnicompetent government, it would have taken years to implement the Manitoba Act. The objective requirements of carrying out surveys, sorting out claims, and responding to political protests could not be satisfied instantaneously. But, of course, the government of Canada was neither omniscient nor omnicompetent. [p. 171]

Given this context, some "delays" in fulfilling the Manitoba Act appear to have been inevitable.

180 The trial judge, at para. 1055, observed that Manitoba was "a fledgling province [that] had just come into existence". Manitoba was far removed from Ottawa, which was the source of the authority for administration of the grant. The trial judge noted, at paras. 155-56, that those involved in [page699] the land grants, including the Lieutenant Governor and the Manitoba legislature, had many challenges to contend with in the establishment of the new province:

Amongst other things, [the Lieutenant Governor] was to form a government on an interim basis which included selecting and appointing members of his Executive Council, selecting heads of departments of the government, and appointing the members of the Legislative Council. He was to organize electoral divisions, both provincially and federally. He was to undertake a census. He was to provide reports to the Federal Government as to the state of the laws and the system of taxation then existing in the province, and as to the state of the Indian tribes, their numbers, wants and claims, along with any suggestions he might have with reference to their protection and to improvement of their condition. He was to report generally on all aspects of the welfare of the province.

Aside from the foregoing, he also received extensive instructions as to the undertakings which he should fulfill as Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories.

181 The majority attributes a three-year delay to the erroneous inclusion of the parents of the Métis children. However, much of the time before the cancellation of the first allotment was devoted to a survey that was used for all subsequent allotments. It is inappropriate to characterize this time as a delay. In my view, the delay stemming from the mistake about the beneficiaries amounts to less than a year, since the actual allocation under the first allotment did not begin until February 1873 and the allotment was cancelled on August 5, 1873.

182 My colleagues also point to an "inexplicable delay" from 1873 and 1875. This period included the time after the fall of Sir John A. Macdonald's government in November 1873. In my view, the change in government followed by the decision to proceed by way of a commission accounts for this time period. This Court must recognize the implications of such a change. Even today, changes in government have policy and practical impacts that delay implementation of government programs. Moreover, it does not [page700] constitute inattention to decide to proceed by way of commission in order to determine who was eligible to share in the land grant.

183 My colleagues criticize the failure of government officials to devote adequate time to the distribution of the allotments. However, there was no evidence tendered regarding the size of the civil service in Manitoba or in Ottawa during the 1870s and 1880s. We do not know how many federal or provincial civil servants there were or the extent of the work and functions they were required to perform. We do know that Lieutenant Governor Morris "wanted to move faster but was hampered by the limited time [Dominion Lands Agent] Donald Codd could devote to the enterprise" (Flanagan, at p. 58). Codd was only able to assist in drawing lots two days a week, until Ottawa sent someone to relieve him at the Lands Office. We have no evidence of what other obstacles there may have been impeding this process.

184 There was another changeover in the Lieutenant Governor from Morris to Joseph-Édouard Cauchon in 1877. While there was no doubt time lost as a result of the change itself, drawing of lots was also delayed as Cauchon was concerned about reports of dissatisfaction he had received. Unfortunately, over a hundred years later, the details of those reports are unclear. It is quite possible that they account for the second delay from 1878 to 1880.

185 The trial judge did not make a finding of negligence. There was also no finding of bad faith. Indeed, the trial judge concluded that there was little evidence of complaint at the time the process was being conducted. The trial judge also made no finding that the relevant government officials lacked diligence or acted with a "pattern of inattention".

186 The majority states, at para. 107, that a negligent act does not in itself establish failure to implement an obligation in the manner demanded by [page701] the honour of the Crown. On the other hand, a persistent pattern of inattention may do so if it frustrates the purpose of the constitutional obligation, particularly if it is not satisfactorily explained.

187 I agree, as my colleagues state, that a finding of lack of diligence requires a party to show more than just a negligent act. Here, the trial judge did not even find negligence. Despite this, the majority concludes that there was a lack of diligence. In my respectful opinion, that conclusion is inconsistent with the factual findings of the trial judge.

188 There are gaps in the record. My colleagues appear to rely on these gaps to support their view that the government failed to fulfill the obligations set out in s. 31. In my view, the government cannot, at this late date, be called upon to explain specific delays. This is an insurmountable challenge due to the passage of time and the paucity of the historical record.

189 If this land grant obligation had been made today, we would have expected a more expeditious procedure. However, the obligation was not undertaken by the present day federal government. It was undertaken by the government over 130 years ago, at a time when the government and the country were newly formed and struggling to become established. We cannot hold that government to today's standards when considering circumstances that arose under very different conditions. Indeed the need to avoid the application of a modern standard of conduct to historical circumstances has been noted by this Court in the past: Wewaykum Indian Band v. Canada, 2002 SCC 79, [2002] 4 S.C.R. 245, at para. 121. To the extent there was delay, on a fair review of the available evidence and findings of the trial judge, it cannot be said to be the result of inattention, much less a persistent pattern of inattention.

B. Effect of the Delay on the Métis

190 The majority attributes a number of negative consequences to the length of time that it took for the land grants to be made. In my respectful [page702] view, in so doing they have departed from the factual findings made by the trial judge and drawn inferences that are not supported by the evidence. While the length of time that it took for the land to be distributed may have been frustrating for some of the Métis, it was not the cause of every negative experience that followed for them.

(1) Departure From the Red River Settlement

191 The majority suggests that the marginalization of the Métis and their departure from the Red River Settlement may have been caused by the length of time it took to issue the land grants. This is not supported by the findings of the trial judge or the record. There were other factors at play.

192 The trial judge considered the historical evidence on this point and concluded:

As the buffalo robe trade was developing strength, agriculture experienced several years of bad crops. From 1844 to 1848, only once, 1845, was the harvest sufficient to feed the Settlement. By the fall of 1848, the Settlement was bordering on starvation. The 1850s brought better crops, but the 1860s were again very poor. The combination of a strong buffalo robe market and very poor crops led to increased abandonment of agriculture by the Métis and some emigration from the Settlement to points west following the buffalo. By 1869, the buffalo were so far west and south of Red River that the buffalo hunt no longer originated in the Settlement. [Emphasis added; para. 50.]

193 Thus, it is clear that emigration from the Red River Settlement began before the s. 31 land grants were contemplated due to the economic forces of declining agriculture and location of the buffalo hunt. The westward retreat of the buffalo herds was a critical factor. The buffalo robe trade was the Métis' primary livelihood and one of the backbones of their economy. This indicates that the Métis' migration was motivated by economic forces, and that the government's actions or inactions were not the sole or even the predominant cause of this phenomenon.

194 The majority also attributes to the delay the Métis' inability to trade land to obtain contiguous parcels. With respect, the trial judge concluded that there was no general intention to create a Métis land base and thus, the ability to trade land to obtain contiguous parcels was never one of the objectives of the land grant. The trial judge concluded that only some Métis wanted to obtain contiguous parcels; others preferred to obtain the best land possible. This factual finding is entitled to deference.

195 Finally, my colleagues quote Deputy Minister of the Interior, A. M. Burgess in an effort to suggest that there was general agreement about the existence of the delay and its supposed harmful consequences. Contrary to the majority's suggestions, Burgess's statements cannot be read as a general commentary on the entire land grant process in order to indict the federal government for inattention. Mr. Burgess stated that he was "heartily sick" of the "disgraceful delay which is taking place in issuing patents" (A.R., vol. XXI, at pp. 123-24 (emphasis added)). The issuing of the patents, and any delay that occurred in that process, represented only one aspect of the administrative challenge posed by the land grants. Mr. Burgess also wrote that he had been working night and day on those patents, hardly evidence of a pattern of inattention.

(2) Price Obtained for the Land

196 My colleagues conclude that what they say was a 10-year delay in implementation of the land grants increased sales to speculators. They imply that sales to speculators were harmful to Métis interests. While I accept the finding of the trial judge that some sales were made to speculators for improvident prices, not all sales were bad bargains for the Métis.

197 The trial judge also found that there was evidence of sales which occurred at market prices, sales to people who were not speculators and sales [page704] which were not the result of pressure or conduct of speculators. The trial judge held:

Overall, while there are many examples of what appear to be individuals having been taken advantage of, it is difficult to assess at this late date whether that was so or whether the price obtained was a fair price given the vagaries of what it was that was being sold and the consequent market value of that. [para. 1057]

It appears that some Métis got higher prices and some Métis got lower prices for their land. For the Métis community as a whole, this may have been a "zero sum game". At this stage it would be entirely speculative to conclude that there was adverse impact on the Métis community as a whole as a result of land sales.

198 My colleagues suggest that as time passed, the possibility grew that the land was becoming less valuable. In my view, this conclusion is not supported by the evidence. In fact, 1880 to 1882 were boom years, where the land would have become even more valuable. The Court of Appeal noted that the vast majority of sales took place between 1877 and 1883. It is incongruous for the Métis descendants as a group to come forward ostensibly on behalf of some of their ancestors who may have benefitted from the delay.

(3) Scrip

199 The majority acknowledges that it was unavoidable that the land would be distributed based on an estimate of the number of eligible Métis and that the estimate would be inaccurate to some degree. They also acknowledge that the issuance of scrip was a reasonable mechanism to provide the benefit to which the excluded children were entitled. However, they find that the delayed issuance of scrip redeemable for significantly less land than was provided to the other recipients further demonstrates the persistent pattern of inattention [para. 123]

200 I cannot agree that the delayed issuance of scrip demonstrates a persistent pattern of inattention by the government. Rather, the issuance of scrip [page705] was equally if not more consistent with the late filing of applications - over which the government had little control - and the corresponding underestimate in the number of eligible recipients. That is hardly evidence of government inattention.

201 If there had been no delay and the accurate number of Métis children had been known from the outset, each child would have received less land than they actually did because the recipients of scrip would have been included in the original division. In this sense, then, Canada overfulfilled its obligations under the Manitoba Act by providing scrip after the 1.4 million acres were exhausted. The issuance of scrip reflected Canada's commitment to meaningful fulfillment of the obligation, not inattention.

C. Conclusion on the Facts

202 Manifestly, the trial judge made findings of delay. Nonetheless these findings and the evidence do not reveal a pattern of inattention. They do not reveal a lack of diligence. Nor do they reveal that the purposes of the land grant were frustrated. That alone would nullify any claim the Métis might have based on a breach of duty derived from the honour of the Crown, assuming that any such duty exists a matter to which I now turn.

III. Analysis

A. Honour of the Crown

203 In their reasons, my colleagues develop a new duty derived from the honour of the Crown: a duty to diligently fulfill solemn obligations. Earlier cases spoke mostly to the manner in which courts should interpret treaties and statutory provisions and not to the manner in which governments should execute them. While Haida Nation v. British Columbia (Minister of Forests), 2004 SCC 73, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 511, explicitly leaves the door open to finding additional new Crown duties in the [page706] future, this is not an appropriate case to develop such a duty.

204 A duty of diligent fulfillment may well prove to be an appropriate expansion of Crown obligations. However, the duty crafted in the majority reasons is problematic. The threshold test for what constitutes a solemn obligation is unclear. More fundamentally, however, the scope and definition of this new duty created by the majority were not explored by the parties in their submissions in this Court nor were they canvassed in the courts below, making the expansion of the common law in this way inappropriate on appeal to this Court.

(1) Ambiguity as to What Constitutes a Solemn Obligation

205 In order to trigger this new duty of diligent fulfillment, there must first be a "solemn obligation". But no clear framework is provided for when an obligation rises to this "solemn" level such that it triggers the duty of diligent implementation. Furthermore, the majority reasons are unclear as to what types of legal documents will give rise to solemn obligations: Is it only provisions in the Constitution or does it also include treaties? In para. 75, the majority appears to restrict their conclusion on diligence to constitutional obligations to Aboriginal peoples. But, in para. 79, they note that the duty applies whether the obligation arises in a treaty or in the Constitution. This further reflects the inappropriateness of fashioning new common law rights and obligations without the benefit of consideration by the trial judge or Court of Appeal and in particular without the benefit of argument before this Court.

206 This difficulty is manifested in other aspects of the majority reasons. My colleagues accept that s. 31 was a constitutional provision (para. 94). Adopting the narrowest reading of their holding as to what documents trigger solemn obligations - [page707] one limited to constitutional provisions - it would seem such obligations would be triggered here. The majority nonetheless proceeds to consider how s. 31 of the Manitoba Act is similar to a treaty (para. 92). It thus appears that s. 31 engages the honour of the Crown, not just because of its constitutional nature, but also because of its treaty-like character.

207 The idea that certain sections of the Constitution should be interpreted differently or should impose higher obligations on the government than other sections because some of these sections can be analogized to treaties is novel to say the least. I reject the notion that when the government undertakes a constitutional obligation, how it must perform that obligation depends on how closely it resembles a treaty.

208 Setting aside the issue of what types of legal documents might contain solemn obligations, there is also uncertainty in the majority's reasons as to which obligations contained in those documents will trigger this duty. My colleagues assert that for the honour of the Crown to be engaged, the obligation must be specifically owed to an Aboriginal group. While I agree that this is clearly a requirement for engaging the honour of the Crown, this alone cannot be sufficient. As the majority notes, in the Aboriginal context, a fiduciary duty can arise as the result of the Crown assuming discretionary control over a specific Aboriginal interest. Reducing honour of the Crown to a test about whether or not an obligation is owed simply to an Aboriginal group risks making claims under the honour of the Crown into "fiduciary duty-light". This new watered down cause of action would permit a claimant who is unable to prove a specific Aboriginal interest to ground a fiduciary duty, to still be able to seek relief so long as the promise was made to an Aboriginal group. Moreover, as the majority acknowledges at para. 108, this new duty can be breached as a result of actions that would not rise to the level required to constitute a breach of fiduciary duty. This new duty, with a broader scope [page708] of application and a lower threshold for breach, is a significant expansion of Crown liability.

(2) Absence of Submissions or Lower Court Decisions on This Issue

209 Even if one were not concerned with the issues identified above, this case was never argued based on this specific duty of diligent fulfillment of solemn obligations arising from the honour of the Crown. The parties made no submissions on a duty of diligent implementation of solemn obligations. The Métis never provided argument as to why the honour of the Crown should be engaged here, what duty it should impose on these facts or how that duty was not fulfilled. As a result, Canada and Manitoba have not had an opportunity to respond on any of these points. This Court does not have the benefit of the necessary opposing perspectives which lie at the heart of our adversarial system.

210 While there is no doubt that the phrase "honour of the Crown" was used in argument before this Court, no submissions of any substance were made as to what duty the honour of the Crown should have engaged on these facts beyond a fiduciary duty, nor were there any submissions on a duty of diligent implementation.

211 During the pleadings phase, honour of the Crown was not mentioned in the Métis' statement of claim and was mentioned only once in passing in their response to particulars (A.R., vol. IV, at p. 110). Before this Court, the Métis referred to honour of the Crown four times in their factum, but never alleged that there was a duty of diligent fulfillment of solemn obligations. Instead, two of the references to the honour of the Crown are contained in their summary of the points in issue and in their [page709] requested order. They also briefly assert that the honour of the Crown required the government to take a liberal approach to interpreting s. 32 and that the honour of the Crown could be used to show one of the elements of a fiduciary obligation under s. 32. They never provided submissions as to what constitutes a solemn obligation nor did they allege specifically that the honour of the Crown required due diligence in the implementation of such solemn obligations. In oral argument before this Court, the only submissions made on honour of the Crown were supplied by the Métis Nation of Alberta and the Attorney General for Saskatchewan. Neither of these interveners, nor the Métis themselves, made submissions about diligence, a new legal test based on patterns of inattention, or solemn obligations.

212 Delineating the boundaries of new legal concepts is prudently done with the benefit of a full record from the courts below and submissions from both parties. Absent these differing perspectives and analysis by the courts below, it is perilous for this Court to embark upon the creation of a new duty under the common law. I believe this concern is manifestly made apparent by the ambiguity in the majority reasons about what legal documents can give rise to solemn obligations.

213 Moreover, it is particularly unsatisfactory to impose a new duty upon a litigant without giving that party an opportunity to make submissions as to the validity or scope of the duty. This inroad on due process is no less concerning when the party to the proceedings is the government. As a result of the majority's reasons, the government's liability to Aboriginal peoples has the potential to be expanded in unforeseen ways. The Crown has not had the opportunity to address what impact this new duty might have on its ability to enter into treaties or make commitments to Aboriginal peoples. It is inappropriate to impose duties on any party, including the government, without giving that party an opportunity to make arguments about the impact that such liability might have. In the case of the government, where the new duty is constitutionally derived and therefore cannot be refined or modified [page710] through ongoing dialogue with Parliament, it is of very serious concern.

214 This Court has always been wary of dramatic changes in the law: see Watkins v. Olafson, [1989] 2 S.C.R. 750, at p. 760. In that case, this Court concluded that courts are not well placed to know all of the problems with the current law and more importantly are not able to predict what problems will be associated with the proposed expansion. Courts are not always aware of all of the policy and economic consequences that might flow from the proposed expansion. While this is not a case about the appropriate role for the courts to play relative to the legislature, these same problems are apparent on the facts of this case. Without substantive submissions from the parties, it is difficult for this Court to know how this new duty will operate and what consequences might flow from it. For all these reasons, it is inappropriate to create this new duty as a result of this appeal.

B. Limitations

215 Even if one accepts that the honour of the Crown was engaged, that it requires the diligent implementation of s. 31, and that this duty was not fulfilled, any claims arising from such a cause of action have long been barred by statutes of limitations. The majority has attempted to circumvent the application of these limitations periods by characterizing the claim as a fundamental constitutional grievance arising from an "ongoing rift in the national fabric" (para. 140). With respect, there is no legal or principled basis for this exception to validly enacted limitations statutes adopted by the legislature. In my view, these claims must be rejected on the basis that they are time-barred.

(1) Decisions of the Courts Below

216 The present action was commenced on April 15, 1981. The trial judge held that, except for the claims related to the constitutional validity of the Manitoba statutes, there was no question that the [page711] Métis' action was outside the statutorily mandated limitation period and he would have dismissed the action on that basis.

217 The trial judge noted the applicable limitations legislation would have captured these claims. He held that the Métis at the time had knowledge of their rights under s. 31 of the Manitoba Act and were engaged in litigation to enforce other rights. From that he inferred that the Métis "chose not to challenge or litigate in respect of s. 31 and s.

32 knowing of the sections, of what those sections were to provide them, and of their rights to litigate" (para. 446). The trial judge concluded that the limitations legislation applied and barred the claims.

218 In the Court of Appeal, Scott C.J.M. noted the trial judge's finding that the Métis knew of their rights and their entitlement to sue more than six years prior to April 15, 1981. The Court of Appeal concluded that the trial judge's factual findings regarding the Métis' knowledge of their rights were entitled to deference. Scott C.J.M. affirmed the trial judge's ruling that the Métis' claim for breach of fiduciary duty with respect to both s. 31 and s. 32 of the Act was statute-barred on the basis that the Métis had not demonstrated that the trial judge misapplied the law or committed palpable and overriding error in arriving at this conclusion.

(2) Limitations Legislation in Manitoba

219 While limitations periods have existed in Manitoba continuously since 1870 by virtue of the application of the laws of England, Manitoba first enacted its own limitations legislation in 1931. The Limitation of Actions Act, 1931, S.M. 1931, c. 30, provided for a six-year limitation period for "actions grounded on accident, mistake or other equitable ground of relief" (s. 3(1)(i)).

220 There was also a six-year limitation period for any other action not specifically provided for in [page712] that Act or any other act (s. 3(1)(j)). The Limitation of Actions Act, 1931 provided that it applied to "all causes of action whether the same arose before or after the coming into force of this Act" (s. 42). Similar provisions have been contained in every subsequent limitations statute enacted in Manitoba.

221 In my view, the effect of these provisions is that the Métis' claim, whether framed as a breach of fiduciary duty or as breach of some duty derived from honour of the Crown, has been statute-barred since at least 1937.

222 My colleagues are of the view that since this claim is no longer based on breach of fiduciary duty, s. 3(1)(i) of The Limitation of Actions Act, 1931 does not apply to bar these claims. Regardless of how the claims are classified, however, the basket clause of The Limitation of Actions Act, 1931 contained in s. 3(1)(j) would apply to bar the claim since that section is intended to ensure that the six-year limitation period covers any and all causes of action not otherwise provided for by the Act.

223 This claim for a breach of the duty of diligent fulfillment of solemn obligations is a "cause of action" and therefore s. 3(1)(j) bars it.

(3) Limitations and Constitutional Claims

224 My colleagues assert that limitations legislation cannot apply to declarations on the constitutionality of Crown conduct. They also state that limitations acts cannot bar claims that the Crown did not act honourably in implementing a constitutional obligation. With respect, these statements are novel. This Court has never recognized a general exception from limitations legislation for constitutionally derived claims. Rather, this Court has consistently held that limitations periods apply to factual claims with constitutional elements.

[page713]

225 The majority notes that limitations periods do not apply to prevent a court from declaring a statute unconstitutional, citing Kingstreet Investments Ltd. v. New Brunswick (Finance), 2007 SCC 1, [2007] 1 S.C.R. 3; Ravndahl v. Saskatchewan, 2009 SCC 7, [2009] 1 S.C.R. 181; and Thorson v. Attorney General of Canada, [1975] 1 S.C.R. 138. While I agree, the constitutional validity of statutes is not at issue in this case. Instead, this is a case about factual issues and alleged breaches of obligations which have always been subject to limitations periods, including on the facts of Ravndahl and Kingstreet.

226 Kingstreet and Ravndahl make clear that there is an exception to the application of limitations periods where a party seeks a declaration that a statute is constitutionally invalid. Here, my colleagues have concluded that the Métis' claim about unconstitutional statutes is moot. The remaining declaration sought by the Métis has nothing to do with the constitutional validity of a statute.

227 Instead, what the Métis seek in this case is like the personal remedies that the applicants sought in Kingstreet and Ravndahl. The Métis are asking this Court to rule on a factual dispute about how lands were distributed over 130 years ago. While they are not asking for a monetary remedy, they are asking for their circumstances and the specific facts of the land grants to be assessed. As this Court said in Ravndahl:

Personal claims for constitutional relief are claims brought as an individual qua individual for a personal remedy. As will be discussed below, personal claims in this sense must be distinguished from claims which may enure to affected persons generally under an action for a declaration that a law is unconstitutional.
[para. 16]

These claims are made by individual Métis and their organized representatives. The claims do not arise from a law which is unconstitutional. Rather, they arise from individual factual circumstances. As [page714] a result, the rule in Kingstreet and Ravndahl that individual factual claims are barred by limitations periods applies to bar suit in this case.

(4) Policy Rationale for Limitations Periods Applies to These Claims

228 The majority finds that the issue in this case is of such fundamental importance to the reconciliation of the Métis peoples with Canadian sovereignty that invoking a limitations period would be inappropriate. They further conclude that unless this claim is resolved there will be an "ongoing rift in the national fabric".

229 In my view, it is inappropriate to judicially eliminate statutory limitations periods for these claims. Limitations periods are set by the legislatures and are not discretionary. While limitations periods do not apply to claims that seek to strike down statutes as unconstitutional, as I noted above, this is not such a claim.

230 Limitations statutes are driven by specific policy choices of the legislatures. The exceptions in such statutes are also grounded in policy choices made by legislatures. To create a new judicial exception for those fundamental constitutional claims that arise from rifts in the national fabric is to engage directly in social policy, which is not an appropriate role for the courts.

231 Limitations acts have always been guided by policy. In M. (K.) v. M. (H.), [1992] 3 S.C.R. 6, this Court identified three groups of policies underlying limitations statutes: those concerning certainty, evidentiary issues, and diligence.

232 The certainty rationale is connected with the concept of repose: "There comes a time, it is said, when a potential defendant should be secure in his reasonable expectation that he will not be held to account for ancient obligations" (M. (K.) v. M. (H.), at p. 29).

233 The evidentiary issues were further expanded upon in Wewaykum, at para. 121:

Witnesses are no longer available, historical documents are lost and difficult to contextualize, and expectations of fair practices change. Evolving standards of conduct and new standards of liability eventually make it unfair to judge actions of the past by the standards of today.

234 Finally, the diligence rationale encourages plaintiffs to not sleep on their rights. An aspect of this concept is the idea that "claims, which are valid, are not usually allowed to remain neglected" (Riddlesbarger v. Hartford Insurance Co., 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 386 (1868), at p. 390, cited in United States v. Marion, 404 U.S. 307 (1971), at p. 322, footnote 14).

235 From these three rationales, limitations law has evolved to include a variety of exceptions which reflect further refinements in the policies that find expression in statutes of limitations. Older limitations acts contained few exceptions but modern statutes recognize certain situations where the strict application of limitations periods would lead to unfairness. For instance, while limitations acts have always included exceptions for minors, exceptions based on capacity have been expanded to recognize claimants with a variety of disabilities. Exceptions have also been created based on the principle of discoverability. However, even as those exceptions have been broadened or added, legislatures have created a counterbalance in the form of ultimate limitations periods which operate to provide final certainty and clarity. None of the legislatively created exceptions, nor their rationales, apply to this case.

(a) Discoverability

236 The discoverability principle has its origins in judicial interpretations of when a cause of action "accrues". Discoverability was described [page716] in the English case of Sparham-Souter v. Town and Country Developments (Essex) Ltd., [1976] 1 Q.B. 858 (C.A.), at p. 868, where Lord Denning, M.R. stated:

... when building work is badly done and covered up the cause of action does not accrue, and time does not begin to run, until such time as the plaintiff discovers that it has done damage, or ought, with reasonable diligence, to have discovered it.

237 While this judicial discoverability rule was subsequently rejected by the House of Lords, Canadian legislatures moved to amend their limitations acts to take into account the fact that plaintiffs might not always be aware of the facts underlying a claim right away. This evolution was described by this Court in Kamloops v. Nielsen, [1984] 2 S.C.R. 2, at pp. 40-42, where it was noted that the British Columbia legislature had amended its limitations legislation to give effect to an earlier judicial decision which postponed "the running of time until the acquisition of knowledge or means of knowledge of the facts giving rise to the cause of action".

238 The discoverability principle is grounded in the idea that, even if there is no active concealment on the part of the defendant giving rise to other ways of tolling limitations periods, the facts underlying a cause of action may still not be accessible to the plaintiff for some time. There is a potential injustice that can arise where a claim becomes statute-barred before a plaintiff was aware of its existence (M. (K.) v. M. (H.), at p. 33).

239 The discoverability principle has been applied in a variety of contexts. In Kamloops, the claim arose from negligent construction of the foundation of a house, where there was evidence that the defect was not visible until long after the house was completed. In M. (K.) v. M. (H.), discoverability was used to toll the limitation period until such time as the victim of childhood incest was able to discover "the connection between the harm she has suffered and her childhood history" (p. 35). In Peixeiro v. Haberman, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 549, [page717] at para. 43, this Court delayed the start of a limitation period under Ontario's no-fault insurance scheme until the plaintiff had knowledge of the extent of injuries that would allow him to make a claim within the scheme.

240 The link in these cases is that the plaintiffs were unaware of the specific damage or were not aware of the link between the damage and the actions of the defendant. Limitations law permits exceptions grounded in lack of knowledge of the facts underlying the claim and the connection between those facts, the actions of the defendant and the harm suffered by the plaintiff.

241 The Métis can make no such claim. They were not unaware of the length of time that it took for the land to be distributed at the time that the distribution was occurring. The trial judge found that representations to the federal government by the Legislative Council and Assembly of Manitoba were made about the length of time the process was taking as early as 1872. At the time, a significant proportion of the Manitoba legislature was Métis. Nor can they claim that they were unaware of the connection between the length of time that the distribution was taking and the actions of the government, since the trial judge found that the federal government responded to this 1872 complaint by reiterating that the selection and allocation of land was within the sole control of Canada. Thus, the exception that the majority has created is not consistent even at the level of public policy with the discoverability exceptions that have been created by legislatures.

242 I would also note that while the history of the discoverability exception indicates that there is room for judicial interpretation in limitations law, that interpretation must be grounded in the actual words of the statute. In this case, the majority has not linked their new exception to any aspect of the text of the Act.

(b) Disability

243 Tolling limitations periods for minors or those with disabilities is another long-standing exception to the general limitation rules. Section 6 of The Limitation of Actions Act, 1931 provided that for certain types of claims, a person under a disability had up to two years after the end of that disability to bring an action. These provisions have grown over time. The Limitation of Actions Act, C.C.S.M. c. L150, currently in force in Manitoba provides for tolling where a person is a minor or where a person is "in fact incapable of the management of his affairs because of disease or impairment of his physical or mental condition" (s. 7).

244 Incapacity due to disability has also been used as the legislative framework for tolling limitations periods for victims of sexual assault by a trusted person or person in authority. The Ontario Limitations Act, 2002, S.O. 2002, c. 24, Sch. B, s. 10(2), creates a presumption that the person claiming to have been assaulted was "incapable of commencing the proceeding earlier than it was commenced if at the time of the assault one of the parties to the assault had an intimate relationship with the person or was someone on whom the person was dependent, whether financially or otherwise". This presumption can be rebutted.

245 A victim who suffered sexual assault at the hands of a person in a position of trust, is said to be incapable of bringing a claim because of a variety of factors including the nature of the act (personal violation), the perpetrator's position of power over the victim and the abuse of that position act effectively to silence the victim. Moreover, until recently, many victims of sexual assault were subject to social disapproval based on the perception that they were somehow to blame.

(Ontario, Limitations Act Consultation Group, Recommendations for a New Limitations Act: Report of the Limitations Act Consultation Group (1991), at p. 20)

246 If the discoverability rule has its origins in incapacity to litigate because of lack of knowledge of particular facts underlying the claim such as the damage or the relationship between the damage and the defendant, the exceptions for disability and minors are grounded in a broader view of incapacity:

Those under legal disability are presumed not to know their rights and remedies and it would be unfair to expect them to proceed diligently in such matters.

247 The Métis were never in a position where they were under a legal disability. As the trial judge found, the Métis were full citizens of Manitoba who wanted to be treated the same as other Canadians. While some sought to entail the s. 31 lands to prevent the children from selling, this view was by no means unanimous. The Métis had always owned land individually and been free to sell it. It is paternalistic to suggest from our modern perspective that the Métis of the 1870s did not know their rights and remedies. This type of paternalism would have been an anathema to the Métis of the time who sought to be treated as equals.

248 The power imbalance that justifies the presumption of incapacity for victims of certain types of sexual assaults is also inapplicable here. Section 31 was enacted because of the strength of the Métis community, not because the community was weak or vulnerable or subject to government abuse. While their power in Manitoba declined with the influx of settlers, it is revisionist to suggest that they were in such a weak position in relation to the federal government that the government was able to "silence" them (as described above in para. 245). While many of the recipients of the land grants [page720] were minors, the findings of the trial judge make clear that the children's parents, adults who could have acted on their children's behalf, knew of their rights. The policy that underlies the exception for minors and those with disabilities does not track onto the experience of the Métis.

(c) Ultimate Limitations Periods

249 As a counterweight to newer exceptions like discoverability and expanded disability provisions, legislatures have also adopted ultimate limitations periods. The purpose of these ultimate limitations periods is to provide true repose for defendants, even against undiscovered claims. Even if a claim is not discovered, meaning that the basic limitations period has not been engaged, an ultimate limitation period can bar a claim. While basic limitations periods are often in the range of two to six years, ultimate limitations periods are usually 10 to 30 years long.

250 Manitoba has had an ultimate limitations period of 30 years since 1980 (An Act to Amend The Limitation of Actions Act, S.M. 1980, c. 28, s. 3). This ultimate limitation period continues in the current act as s. 14(4). Ultimate limitations periods are also in force in many other provinces. The purpose of these ultimate limitations periods was described by the Manitoba Law Reform Commission in their 2010 report on limitations:

In order to address the important repose aspect of limitations, there must be some ability to ensure that, after a certain period of time, no action may be brought regardless of the claim's discoverability of late occurring damage.

(Limitations (2010), at p. 26)

251 As ultimate limitations periods were introduced, many provincial legislatures chose to effectively exempt certain types of Aboriginal claims from them by grandfathering Aboriginal claims into the former acts, which did not contain ultimate limitations periods. This was done in [page721] Alberta and Ontario, and will soon be done in British Columbia: Limitations Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. L-12, s. 13; Ontario Limitations Act, 2002, s. 2; Limitation Act, S.B.C. 2012, c. 13, s. 2 (not yet in force). In my view, this is evidence that legislatures are alive to the issues posed by Aboriginal claims and limitations periods and the choice of whether or not to exempt such claims from basic and ultimate limitations periods is one that belongs to the legislature.

252 There is a fine balance to be struck between expanded ways to toll limitations periods through discovery and incapacity and a strict ultimate limitations period. It is not the place of the courts to tamper with the selection that each of the legislatures and Parliament have chosen by creating a broad general exception for claims that courts find to be fundamental or serious. The type of exception proposed by my colleagues is antithetical to the careful policy development that characterizes this area of the law. The courts are ill-suited for doing this type of work which must be grounded in a clear understanding of how each aspect of the limitations regime works together to produce a fair result.

253 If Parliament or provincial legislatures wanted to exclude factual claims with a constitutional component from limitations periods, then they could do so by statute. As they have not chosen to make an exception for the type of declaration that the Métis seek in this case, it is inappropriate for this Court to do so.

(d) Role of Reconciliation

254 My colleagues suggest that the above rationales have little role to play in an Aboriginal context, where the goal of reconciliation must [page722] be given priority. In so doing, the majority's reasons call into question this Court's decisions in Wewaykum, at para. 121, and more recently in Canada (Attorney General) v. Lameman, 2008 SCC 14, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 372. In Lameman, this Court specifically stated that policy rationales that support limitations periods "appl[y] as much to Aboriginal claims as to other claims" (para. 13 (emphasis added)). Without doing so explicitly, it appears that the majority has departed from the legal certainty created by Wewaykum and Lameman, in favour of an approach where "reconciliation" must be given priority.

255 Moreover, the legal framework of this claim is very different from a claim based on an Aboriginal right.

Aboriginal rights are protected from extinguishment under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. Aboriginal rights, therefore, constitute ongoing legal entitlements. By contrast, the claims in this case concern a constitutional obligation that was fulfilled over 100 years ago.

(5) Manitoba Legislation Does Not Exempt Declarations From Limitation Periods

256 My colleagues assert that limitations periods should not apply to claims for failure to diligently fulfill solemn obligations arising from the Constitution where the only remedy sought is a declaration. Respectfully, this is a choice to be made by the legislature. In Manitoba, limitations legislation has never contained an exception for declarations. This Court is not empowered to create one.

257 In some other provinces the legislation governing limitations periods provides for specific exceptions where the only remedy sought is a declaration without any consequential relief: Alberta Limitations Act, s. 1(i)(i); Ontario Limitations Act, 2002, s. 16(1)(a); British Columbia Limitation Act, s. 2(1)(d) (not yet in force).

258 These exceptions are contained within the finely tailored legislative schemes as described above. In those provinces where recent amendments have provided for declaratory judgments to be exempt from limitations periods, the limitations legislation also contains provisions that restrict the retroactive application of those exemptions. For example, in Ontario, if a claim was not started before the exemption was enacted and the limitation period under the former act had elapsed, the creation of the new exemption from limitation periods for declaratory judgments would not revive those previously barred claims, even if the only remedy sought was a declaration: Ontario Limitations Act, 2002, s. 24. Thus, even where the legislature has seen fit to exempt declarations from limitation periods, it has not done so retroactively.

259 This is unsurprising since changes to limitations periods are rarely made retroactively, because to do so would prejudice those who relied upon those limitations periods in organizing their affairs. Retroactive changes to limitations law mean that potential defendants who were under the impression that claims against them were time-barred would be again exposed to the threat of litigation. In contrast, when a limitations period is changed prospectively, potential defendants were never in a position to rely on a limitation period and would always be on notice as to the possibility of litigation. In effect, if limitations periods were changed retroactively, the certainty rationale would be significantly compromised by depriving defendants of the benefit of limitations protection that they had relied upon up until the change in the law.

260 The issue of whether to exempt declaratory judgments from limitations periods is one that has been canvassed recently in Manitoba. In 2010, the Manitoba Law Reform Commission recommended that an exception be created for declaratory judgments, but this recommendation has not been implemented. In making that recommendation, the Manitoba Law Reform Commission recognized that, while declaratory judgments do not compel [page724] the Crown to act in a particular way, there is still a risk that an exception for declaratory remedies might "undermin[e] the principles that support the establishment of limitations" (Limitations, at p. 33). This is because obtaining a declaration can be the first step in obtaining an additional remedy, one that would otherwise be barred by a limitation period.

261 The Manitoba Law Reform Commission noted that this risk was particularly acute in the case of declarations made in respect of the Crown, since there is authority to support the proposition that the Crown does not generally ignore a court declaration (p. 32). While the Crown response to a declaration is not always satisfactory to everyone, the possibility that the declaration will lead to some additional extra-judicial remedy is real. This means that while a declaratory order without consequential relief might appear to have little impact on the certainty created by limitations periods, the result for litigants is not necessarily as benign. There is a risk that a declaratory judgment will lead to additional remedies, even when not ordered by the courts.

262 In my view, that risk is fully realized in this case. As my colleagues note, the Métis do not seek a declaration as an end in itself. Rather, they plan to use the declaration to obtain redress in extra-judicial negotiations with the Crown. This result undermines the certainty rationale for limitation periods by exposing the Crown to an obligation long after the limitation period expired. By exempting the declaration sought by the Métis from limitation periods, the majority has inappropriately stepped into the shoes of the Manitoba legislature.

(6) Effect of Exempting These Claims From Limitations Periods

263 The majority has removed these claims by the Métis from the ordinary limitations regime by arguing that these claims are fundamental [page725] and that a failure to address them perpetuates an "ongoing rift in the national fabric". With respect, the determination that a particular historical injustice amounts to a rift in the national fabric is a political or sociological question. It is not a legally cognizable reason to exempt a claim from the application of limitations periods. Moreover, it leaves the courts in the position of having to assess whether any claim made is sufficiently fundamental to permit them to address it on its merits despite its staleness.

264 Over the course of Canadian history, there have been instances where the Canadian government has acted in ways that we would now consider inappropriate, offensive or even appalling. The policy choice of how to handle these historical circumstances depends on a variety of factors and is therefore one that is best left to Parliament or the government, which have in recent years acted in a variety of ways, including apologies and compensation schemes, to make amends for certain historical wrongs.

265 The reasons of the majority would now have the courts take on a role in respect of these political and social controversies. Where the parties ask for a declaration only and link it to some constitutional principle, the courts will now be empowered to decide those cases no matter how long ago the actions and facts that gave rise to the claim occurred. In my view, this has the potential to open the court system to a whole host of historical social policy claims. While the resolution of historical injustice is clearly an admirable goal, the creation of a judicial exemption from limitations periods for such claims is not an appropriate solution.

266 This exception creates the possibility of indeterminate liability for the Crown, since claims under this new duty will apparently be possible forever. Courts have always been wary of the possibility of indeterminate liability. In Ultramares Corp. v. Touche, 174 N.E. 441 (N.Y. 1931), at p. 444, Cardozo C.J. expressed concern about the creation of "liability in an indeterminate amount for an indeterminate time to an indeterminate class". This [page726] concern was recognized, albeit more with respect to indeterminate amounts and classes, by this Court in Design Services Ltd. v. Canada, 2008 SCC 22, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 737, at paras. 59-66. In my view, as this exception from limitations periods creates liability for an indeterminate time, it is not an appropriate step for this Court to take.

267 The exemption proposed by my colleagues is not aligned with any of the principles that underlie the limitations scheme. It is instead an exception that is virtually limitless in scope, relying, as it does, on a social policy appeal to restore our national fabric rather than accepted legal principles. It cannot be characterized as the type of incremental change that supports the development and evolution of the common law and it is therefore not an appropriate change for the courts to make.

(7) The Crown Is Entitled to the Benefit of Limitations Periods

268 Limitations periods apply to the government as they do to all other litigants. At common law, limitations periods could be used by the Crown to defend against actions, but could not be used by defendants pursued by the Crown (P. W. Hogg, P. J. Monahan and W. K. Wright, Liability of the Crown (4th ed. 2011), at pp. 98-99). This is no longer the case as the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-50, s. 32, specifically provides that provincial limitations periods apply to claims by and against the Crown:

32. Except as otherwise provided in this Act or in any other Act of Parliament, the laws relating to prescription and the limitation of actions in force in a province between subject and subject apply to any proceedings by or against the Crown in respect of any cause of action arising in that province, and proceedings by or against the Crown in respect of a cause of action arising otherwise than in a province shall be taken within six years after the cause of action arose.

The effect of this section is that the provincial limitations legislation in Manitoba applies to the federal Crown. Moreover, even absent this Act, the common law provided that it was possible for the Crown to rely on a limitations period to defend against claims (Hogg, Monahan and Wright, at p. 99).

269 The application of limitations periods to claims against the Crown is clear from the cases generally and also specifically in the area of Aboriginal claims. For example, in both Wewaykum and Lameman, this Court applied a limitations period to bar an Aboriginal claim against the government.

270 Application of limitations periods to the Crown benefits the legal system by creating certainty and predictability. It also serves to protect society at large by ensuring that claims against the Crown are made in a timely fashion so that the Crown is able to defend itself adequately.

271 The relevance of limitations periods to claims against the Crown can clearly be seen on the facts of this case. My colleagues rely on "unexplained periods of inaction" and "inexplicable delay" to support their assertion that there is a pattern of indifference. In my view, it cannot reasonably be ruled out that, had this claim been brought in a timely fashion, the Crown might have been able to explain the length of time that it took to allocate the land to the satisfaction of a court. The Crown can no longer bring evidence from the people involved and the historical record is full of gaps. This case is the quintessential example of the need for limitations periods.

C. Laches

272 In addition to being barred by the limitation period, these claims are subject to laches. Laches is an equitable doctrine that requires a claimant in equity to prosecute his or her claim without undue delay. In Canada, there are two recognized branches to the doctrine of laches: delays that result from [page728] acquiescence or delays that result in circumstances that make prosecution of the action unreasonable (M. (K.) v. M. (H.), at pp. 76-77, citing Lindsay Petroleum Co. v. Hurd (1874), L.R. 5 P.C. 221, at pp. 239-40).

273 The majority finds that the Métis cannot have acquiesced because of their marginalized position in society and the government's role in bringing about that marginalization. They further find that the government did not alter its position in reasonable reliance on the status quo, nor would disturbing the current situation give rise to an injustice. Finally, they conclude that given the constitutional aspect of the Métis' claim, it would be inappropriate in any event to apply the doctrine of laches.

274 Respectfully, I cannot agree. The Métis have knowingly delayed their claim by over a hundred years and in so doing have acquiesced to the circumstances and invited the government to rely on that, rendering the prosecution of this action unreasonable. As a result, their claim cannot succeed because it is barred by both branches of the doctrine of laches.

(1) Decisions of the Courts Below

275 The trial judge held that the doctrine of laches acted as a defence to all of the Métis claims. He found that those entitled to benefits under ss. 31 and 32 of the Manitoba Act were, at the material time, aware of their rights under the Act and of their right to sue if they so wished. The trial judge held that there was "grossly unreasonable delay" in bringing this action in respect of those rights and the breaches that the Métis now claimed (para. 454). The majority have identified no palpable and overriding error with this conclusion.

276 There is some irony in the majority in this Court crafting its approach around the government's delay and at the same time excusing the Métis' delay in bringing their action for over 100 years.

277 The trial judge observed that there was no evidence to explain the delay in making the claim. The only explanations offered came from counsel for the Métis and none of them provided "a justifiable explanation at law for those entitled under s. 31 and s. 32, whether individually or collectively, to have sat on their rights as they did until 1981" (para. 457). Nor, in the trial judge's view, did this delay in the exercise of their rights square with the evidence of Métis individuals and the larger community pursuing legal remedies throughout the 1890s for other claims arising from the Manitoba Act. The trial judge held that this amounted to acquiescence in law. Both Canada and Manitoba were prejudiced by the claim not being advanced in a timely fashion due to the incomplete nature of the evidence that was available at trial.

278 The Court of Appeal concluded that laches "may be applied to claims seeking declaratory relief whether declaratory judgments are viewed as equitable in nature or sui generis" (para. 342). The Court of Appeal then considered whether laches can operate to bar constitutional claims. It concluded that, while laches cannot be applied to claims based on the division of powers, the claims advanced by the Métis were not of that type. The Court of Appeal decided that it was unnecessary to determine whether laches could be applied to the types of constitutional claims advanced by the Métis because it determined that those claims were moot.

(2) Acquiescence

279 My colleagues suggest, at para. 149, that no one can acquiesce where the law has changed, since it is "unrealistic" to expect someone to have enforced their claim before the courts were prepared to recognize those rights. With respect, this conclusion is at odds with the common law approach to changes in the law. While there is no doubt that the law on Crown duties to Aboriginal people has evolved since the 1870s, defences of general application, including laches, have always applied to claimants despite such changes in the [page730] law (In re Spectrum Plus Ltd. (in liquidation), 2005 UKHL 41, [2005] 2 A.C. 680, at para. 26). The applicability of general defences like limitations periods to evolving areas of the law was also recognized by this Court in Canada (Attorney General) v. Hislop, 2007 SCC 10, [2007] 1 S.C.R. 429, at para. 101. My colleagues' approach to acquiescence is a significant change in the law of laches in Canada with potentially significant repercussions.

280 Turning to the specific requirements for the application of acquiescence, I agree with my colleagues that it depends on knowledge, capacity and freedom (Halsbury's Laws of England (4th ed. 2003), vol. 16(2), at para. 912). In my view, all three were present on the facts of this case.

281 Justice La Forest, in M. (K.) v. M. (H.), described the required level of knowledge to apply laches:
 ... an important aspect of the concept is the plaintiff's knowledge of her rights. It is not enough that the plaintiff knows of the facts that support a claim in equity; she must also know that the facts give rise to that claim: Re Howlett, [1949] Ch. 767. However, this Court has held that knowledge of one's claim is to be measured by an objective standard; see Taylor v. Wallbridge (1879), 2 S.C.R. 616, at p. 670. In other words, the question is whether it is reasonable for a plaintiff to be ignorant of her legal rights given her knowledge of the underlying facts relevant to a possible legal claim. [Emphasis deleted; pp. 78-79.]

282 Given the trial judge's findings, the Métis had this required knowledge in the 1870s. This conclusion amounts to a finding of fact and cannot be set aside absent palpable and overriding error. The majority has not identified any such error.

283 Instead of confronting this conclusion on knowledge, my colleagues conclude that the Métis could not acquiesce for three reasons: (1) historical injustices suffered by the Métis; (2) the imbalance in power that followed Crown sovereignty; and (3) the negative consequences following delays in allocating the land grants. I cannot agree with these conclusions.

(a) Historical Injustices

284 The main historical injustice discussed by the majority is the very issue of this case: delay in making the land grants. They conclude that the Métis did not receive the benefit that was intended by the land grants, and they imply that this was a cause of the Métis' subsequent marginalization. They suggest that, because laches is an equitable construct, the conscionability of both parties must be considered. While this is no doubt true, they then rely on the facts of the claim to conclude that equity does not permit the government to benefit from a laches defence. Effectively, they conclude that the very wrong that it is alleged the government committed resulted in a level of unconscionability that means they cannot access the defence of laches. With respect, this cannot be so. Laches is always invoked as a defence by a party alleged to have, in some way, wronged the plaintiff. If assessing conscionability is reduced to determining if the plaintiff has proven his or her allegations against the defendant, the defence of laches is rendered illusory.

(b) Imbalance in Power Following Crown Sovereignty

285 The evidence is not such that any imbalance in power between the Métis and the government was enough to undermine the knowledge, capacity and freedom of the Métis to the extent required to prevent a finding of acquiescence.

[page732]

286 At the start of the relevant time period, the Métis were a political and military force to be reckoned with. The majority notes, at para. 23 that "[t]he Métis were the dominant demographic group in the Settlement, comprising around 85 percent of the population, and held leadership positions in business, church and government." They also note that

[w]hen the Manitoba Act was passed, the Métis dominated the Red River provisional government, and controlled a significant military force. Canada had good reason to take the steps necessary to secure peace between the Métis and the settlers. [para. 93]

287 Furthermore, while the power and influence of the Métis declined in the following years, there is no evidence that the Métis reached a point where the imbalance in power was so great that they lost the knowledge, capacity or freedom required to acquiesce. Indeed, throughout the 1890s, applications were brought to the courts regarding disputes over individual allotments governed by s. 31. The Attorney General of Manitoba cites three examples of such litigation: Barber v. Proudfoot, [1890-91] 1 W.L.T.R. 144 (Man. Q.B. en banc) (a Métis individual sought to have a sale set aside), Hardy v. Desjarlais (1892), 8 Man. R. 550 (Q.B.) (the deed of sale was executed prior to the court order approving it, the money was not paid into court until the land was sold at a higher price), and Robinson v. Sutherland (1893), 9 Man. R. 199 (Q.B.) (a Métis minor alleged that her father forced her to sell her land contrary to the wishes of her husband). This litigation demonstrates that individual Métis had knowledge of their rights under s. 31 during this time period and had knowledge that they could apply to court in order to enforce their rights.

288 While the power of the Métis had declined by the 1890s, there is no evidence that this prevented them from organizing in such a way as to avail themselves of the courts when they felt their rights were being threatened. Throughout the 1890s [page733] Métis individuals were involved in a series of cases related to the "Manitoba Schools Question".

289 Catholic members of the Métis community collectively appealed to the courts regarding legislation involving denominational schools and twice pursued these issues all the way to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (City of Winnipeg v. Barrett, [1892] A.C. 445; and Brophy v. Attorney-General of Manitoba, [1895] A.C. 202). As these cases were not successful, Archbishop Taché organized a petition, which contained 4,267 signatures, that was submitted to the Governor General. This led to a reference to this Court and a subsequent appeal to the Privy Council.

290 From this evidence the trial judge inferred "that many of the 4,267 signatories [to the petition] would have been Métis" and that it was "clear that those members of the community including their leadership certainly were alive to [their] rights ... and of the remedies they had in the event of an occurrence which they considered to be a breach"

(para. 435). My colleagues reject the second inference drawn by the trial judge, again without identifying any palpable and overriding error, stating that the actions of a larger community do not provide evidence of the Métis' ability to seek a declaration based on the honour of the Crown (para. 148). I cannot accept that conclusion. In my view, the evidence demonstrates that, when the rights of the Métis under the Manitoba Act were infringed by government action, the Métis were well aware of and able to access the courts for remedies.

291 The trial judge did not conclude that Archbishop Taché and Father Ritchot were Métis; he merely noted that they were leaders of a group that included some Métis and that group had accessed the courts to enforce rights contained in the Manitoba Act. This conclusion did not demonstrate any palpable and overriding error. It was reasonable for the trial judge to infer that by signing the petition and being aware of the litigation on denominational schools individual Métis had the [page734] knowledge required under the test described by La Forest J. in M. (K.) v. M. (H.). Both the cases of individual claims under the Manitoba legislation and the cases about the denominational schools show that members of the Métis community had the capacity and freedom to pursue litigation when they saw their rights being affected. In respect of any delay in making land grants, they chose not to do anything until 100 years later. As a result, the Métis acquiesced and laches should be imputed against them.

(c) Negative Consequences Created by Delays in Allocating the Land Grants

292 The reasons of the majority suggest that the fact that there was delay in distributing the land is sufficient to lead to the conclusion that the Métis were rendered so vulnerable as to be unable to acquiesce. In my view, this conclusion is untenable as a matter of law. It suggests that no party that suffered injury could ever acquiesce and thus renders the first part of the laches test meaningless. While laches requires consideration of whether the plaintiff had the capacity to bring a claim, this has never been extended to except from laches all who are vulnerable. Laches is imputed against vulnerable people just as limitations periods are applied against them. These doctrines cannot fulfill their purposes if they are not universally applicable.

293 Moreover, I do not accept the implication that the marginalization of the Métis was caused by delays in the distribution of the land grants. As noted above, the Métis community was under pressure for a number of reasons during the 1870s and 1880s. To suggest, as my colleagues do, that delays in the land grants caused the vulnerability of the Métis is to make an inference that was not made by the trial judge and is not supported by the record.

294 In my view, the trial judge was correct in finding that the Métis had acquiesced and that laches could be imputed against them on that basis.

(3) Circumstances That Make the Prosecution Unreasonable

295 Though my conclusion on acquiescence would be sufficient to result in imputing laches against the Métis, I am also of the view that the Métis' delay resulted in circumstances that make the prosecution of their claim unreasonable.

296 The majority finds that the delay did not result in circumstances that make prosecution of the claim unreasonable since they do not find that the government reasonably relied on the Métis' acceptance of the status quo. I cannot agree. The delay in commencing this suit was some 100 years. This delay has resulted in an incomplete evidentiary record. The unexplained delays that my colleagues refer to as evidence for the Crown acting dishonourably may well have been accounted for had the claim been brought promptly. The effect of this extraordinary delay on the evidentiary record, in a case dependent on establishing the actions of Crown officials over 100 years ago, constitutes circumstances that would make the prosecution unreasonable.

297 Moreover, we cannot know whether, if the claims had been brought at the time, the government might have been able to reallocate resources to allow the grants to be made faster or to take other steps to satisfy the Métis community. It cannot be said that the government did not alter or refrain from altering its position in reliance on the failure of the Métis to bring a claim in a timely manner.

(4) Laches Applies to Equitable Claims Against the Crown

298 The doctrine of laches can be used by all parties, including the Crown, to defend against equitable claims that have not been brought in a sufficiently timely manner. In Wewaykum, this Court considered the application of laches to an Aboriginal claim against the Crown and concluded [page736] that laches could act to bar a claim for breach of fiduciary duty. The delay at issue in that case was at least 45 years. The Court in Wewaykum, at para. 110, stated that

[t]he doctrine of laches is applicable to bar the claims of an Indian band in appropriate circumstances: L'Hirondelle v. The King (1916), 16 Ex. C.R. 193; Ontario (Attorney General) v. Bear Island Foundation (1984), 49 O.R. (2d) 353 (H.C.), at p. 447 (aff'd on other grounds (1989), 68 O.R. (2d) 394 (C.A.), aff'd [1991] 2 S.C.R. 570); Chippewas of Sarnia Band v. Canada (Attorney General) (2000), 51 O.R. (3d) 641 (C.A.). There are also dicta in two decisions of this Court considering, without rejecting, arguments that laches may bar claims to aboriginal title: Smith v. The Queen, [1983] 1 S.C.R. 554, at p. 570; Guerin, supra, at p. 390.

299 As discussed above in relation to limitations periods, the application of the defence of laches to the Crown is beneficial for the legal system and society generally. The rationales that justify the application of laches for private litigants apply equally to the Crown.

(5) Laches Applies to Claims Under Honour of the Crown

300 The majority concludes that claims for a declaration that a provision of the Constitution was not fulfilled as required by the honour of the Crown ought never to be subject to laches. This is a broad and sweeping declaration, especially considering the conclusion of this Court in Wewaykum that breaches of the fiduciary duty could be subject to laches. A fiduciary duty is one duty derived from the honour of the Crown. It is fundamentally inconsistent to permit certain claims (e.g. those based on "solemn obligations" contained in Constitutional documents) derived from the honour of the Crown to escape the imputation of laches while other claims (e.g. those based on the more well-established and narrowly defined fiduciary obligation) are not given such a wide berth. Moreover, this holding will encourage litigants to reframe claims in order to bring themselves within the scope of this new, more [page737] generous exception to the doctrine of laches, which - particularly in light of the ambiguities associated with the new duty - creates uncertainty in the law.

301 My colleagues rely on the holding in Ontario Hydro v. Ontario (Labour Relations Board), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 327, to support their position. In my view, reference to that case is inapposite. Division of powers claims, such as the one considered in Ontario Hydro, are based on ongoing legal boundaries between federal and provincial jurisdiction. This claim based on the honour of the Crown is grounded in factual circumstances that occurred over 100 years ago. Just as Kingstreet and Ravndahl distinguish claims based on factual circumstances from those based on ongoing statutory issues in the context of limitations statutes, so too should this case be distinguished from Ontario Hydro.

(6) Conclusion on Laches

302 In my view, both branches of laches are satisfied. The Crown is entitled to the benefit of this equitable defence generally and specifically in relation to claims arising from the honour of the Crown in implementing constitutional provisions. As La Forest J. stated in M. (K.) v. M. (H.), at p. 78, "[u]ltimately, laches must be resolved as a matter of justice as between the parties". Both the Métis and the government are entitled to justice. As a matter of justice, laches applies and precludes granting the equitable remedy sought here.

(7 pp.)

Case Summary

Practice — Pleadings — Striking out pleadings — Grounds, failure to disclose a cause of action or defence.

This was an application to strike a claim and a cross-claim. The respondent, Miller, was injured in a snowmobile accident. Miller was a passenger on a snowmobile operated by Wiwchairyk. Prior to the accident, the applicant police officer, Carscadden, discovered that Wiwchairyk did not have a license to use the machine. Wiwchairyk was given a warning by Carscadden. He was not charged with operating the snowmobile without a license. Miller brought a claim against Carscadden in negligence. Miller's insurer, the respondent Halifax, brought a cross-claim against Carscadden on the same basis. Carscadden sought to strike the claims. He argued that the claims did not disclose a reasonable cause of action. He argued that there was no causal connection between his failure to charge Wiwchairyk and the accident.

HELD: The application was dismissed.

Although Miller and Halifax faced a difficult burden in proving causation, there was a valid cause of action. The complexity and difficulty of the case did not preclude the case from proceeding. Carscadden was entitled to later move for summary judgement if Miller and Halifax did not set out a genuine issue for trial.

Introduction

WHALEN J.

1 The defendant Carscadden (hereafter "C") and the other police defendants moved to strike the plaintiffs' claim and the cross-claim of the defendant Halifax Insurance Company pursuant to Rule 21.01(1)(b) of the Rules of Practice. The plaintiffs and Halifax responded to the motion. The defendant Wiwchairyk (hereafter "W") did not appear.

2 For the reasons that follow, the motion will be denied.

Facts

3 On February 19, 1996, the plaintiff, Derek Miller (hereafter "M"), was catastrophically injured in an accident while a passenger on a snow machine owned and operated by W. It is alleged W was driving the snow machine carelessly and at high speed, causing M to be thrown from the vehicle.

4 A month or two before the accident, C (a constable with the Michipicoten Police Service) encountered W who was operating a snow machine without a valid licence or insurance coverage, as required by the Motorized Snow Vehicles Act, R.S.O. 1990, Chapter M-44. It is alleged C advised W "of the possible ramifications to passengers who would be riding with the said defendant, if the said defendant did not have insurance...". C gave W a warning, although it is alleged he told him he should be charged. The plaintiff's say if C had charged W, rather than simply warning him, W would not "in all probability" have driven the snow machine, thereby avoiding the accident in which M was subsequently injured. Therefore, it is claimed C was negligent in failing to charge W and he thus breached a duty of care in respect of a reasonably foreseeable consequence he had in fact warned W about. It is claimed the other police defendants are vicariously liable for C's negligence. These are the facts pleaded in the impugned statement of claim.

The Law

5 Rule 21.01(1)(b) provides:

21.01(1) A party may move before a judge,...

(b) to strike out a pleading on the ground that it discloses no reasonable cause of action or defence, and the judge may make an order or grant a judgement accordingly.

6 The parties appearing agreed on the applicable test, namely: assuming the facts pleaded in the statement of claim can be proved, is it "plain and obvious" that the pleading discloses no reasonable cause of action? Hunt v. Carey Canada Inc., [1990] 2 S.C.R. 959; adopted and applied in R.D. Belanger & Associates Limited v. Stadium Corp. (1991), 5 O.R. (3d) 778 (Ont. C.A.) at page 780. The same test was articulated a little differently, but with same effect in Doe v. Metro Toronto Police (1990), 74 O.R. (2d) 225 (Div. Ct.) at page 229, T-D Bank v. Deloitte, Haskens and Sells (1992), 5 O.R. (3d) 417 (O.C.G.D.) at page 419, and Sun Life Trust Co. V. Scarborough (City), [1994] O.J. No. 2447 (O.C.G.D.) at pages 4 and 5.

7 In Sun Life Trust Co., supra, it was observed the threshold for sustaining a pleading under Rule 20.01 is not a high one, and in T-D Bank v. Deloitte Haskens and Sells, supra, it was suggested the statement of claim in question should be read "generously" for the plaintiff. The action should be struck only if it is certain to fail because it contains a radical defect. Potential length and complexity, the novelty of the cause of action or an apparently strong defence should not be a bar.

8 In Hanson v. Bank of Nova Scotia (1994), 19 O.R. (3d) 142 (Ont. C.A.) at page 145, the court warned of the danger of imposing too high a threshold too early in the process by reminding that the law is a dynamic, ever-evolving process, where categories of relationships giving rise to fiduciary duties and categories of negligence in which a duty of care is owed, are never closed.

Analysis

9 The moving defendants' argument for dismissal rests heavily on the apparent lack of causal connection and proximity between C's act (or failure to act) and the accident itself. They disagreed strongly that C could or ought to have foreseen that charging W might have avoided the accident, or alternatively, that failing to charge him could have led to the accident. They contended the accident was causally too remote from C's contact with W and lacking in contemporaneity. They forcefully argued that M's injuries were the direct cause of the manner in which W had operated the snow machine, and that the injuries would have been the same whether or not W had insurance or a licence at the time. In other words, it was assumptive or speculative to conclude the accident would not have occurred had C charged W by issuing him a ticket, rather than simply giving a warning. The defendants further submitted that the private law duty of care owed by the police to individuals is very limited in such circumstances, and that foreseeability of risk must coexist with a special relationship of proximity: Doe v. Metro Toronto Police, supra, at page 230.

10 At this stage it appears the plaintiffs face a very difficult task establishing the necessary causal connection, proximity and duty of care. I am sceptical of their chances of success and find the moving defendants' submissions very compelling. The court ultimately disposing of the claim will also likely be concerned with the potential negative impact of its decision on the already difficult task of policing, not to mention a concern that police effectively and indirectly be made insurers for those whose remedies may be otherwise limited. There are large policy issues at stake. However, at this early stage in the litigation process, the court should not look beyond the pleadings to determine whether the action has any chance of success: Prete v. Ontario (1994), 16 O.R. (3d) 161 (Ont. C.A.) at pages 170 and 171. The facts in the Doe case exemplify an unusual situation in which the police did not seem at first glance to owe a private duty of care. Yet the plaintiff convinced the court of a potentially valid cause of action. So the cause exists, albeit perhaps narrow and difficult to prove.

11 If I read the pleaded allegation that W would not probably have driven the snow machine in the manner he did on the day in question as a statement of material fact, rather than as a conclusion (ie. if I read it "generously" for the plaintiffs), then it becomes a question of whether the fact can be proven, and once proven, whether it is sufficient in all of the circumstances to establish that the police defendants owed a private duty of care to M. Causation, proximity, remoteness and the existence of a special relationship will necessarily be resolved in the same context.

12 I cannot at this point imagine what the evidence may be, but that detail is not a matter for pleading, and in any event Rule 21.01(2)(b) prohibits the admission of evidence on a motion under Rule 21.01(1)(b).

13 The same may be said of the allegation concerning W's reputation as a snow machine operator, although this may also weigh against the plaintiffs in considering assumption of risk.

14 The claim may be difficult, novel, complex and reaching, but that does not disqualify it from being made.

15 Under Rule 20 the defendants may move for summary Judgment if it is determined there is no genuine issue for trial. It is in such a motion that a court may look beyond the pleadings to ascertain "chance of success". It would be dangerous at the present stage to dismiss the claim without the parties being able to offer sworn testimony so that the court might be in a position to look beyond the pleadings and therefore also assess whether there is a genuine issue for trial.

Order

16 For these reasons I conclude the plaintiffs have met the threshold required in their statement of claim, though barely so, and although I am sceptical of what lies ahead. The motion is therefore dismissed.

17 Given the closeness of the decision and the reservations expressed, this is a case where costs are best left to the discretion of the court finally disposing of the matter.

Nash et al. v. The Queen in Right of Ontario et al. Nash et al. v. CIBC Trust Corporation et al. Falloncrest Financial Corporation et al. v. The Queen in Right of Ontario

Counsel

Alan J. Lenczner, Q.C., and Ronald G. Chapman, for all appellants except Falloncrest Financial Corp. and Peter Fallon, Sr.

Adrian Hill, for Peter Fallon, Sr.

Joan M. Haberman, for respondents, Attorney General of Ontario and Brian Cass.

Paul B. Schabas and Kathryn M.E. Podrebarac, for respondent, CIBC Trust Corp.

1 BY THE COURT: -- These three appeals, Nash v. Ontario (C22206), Nash v. CIBC Trust Corp. (C22998) and Falloncrest Financial Corp. v. Ontario (C22185), were heard together. They are all from the orders of the Honourable Mr. Justice Ground, wherein he stayed all three actions and struck out portions of the statements of claim in Nash v. Ontario and Falloncrest v. Ontario. While the statements of claim plead three separate and distinct causes of action, the actions arise from the same failed investment in a shopping mall.

Facts

2 The appellants in the Nash actions ("Nash appellants") were investors in Mater's Management Limited ("Mater's"), a business property development company which raised funds by means of syndicated mortgages. The principal of Mater's was Alberto DoCouto. The appellants in the Falloncrest action ("Falloncrest appellants") are Falloncrest Financial Corp. and Falloncrest Properties Inc. ("Falloncrest Companies"), and Peter Fallon, Sr. and Peter Fallon, Jr. The two Fallons were the "directing minds" of the Falloncrest Companies, which acted as mortgage brokers for Mater's projects. The respondent in Nash v. CIBC Trust Corp. was, at material times, Morgan Trust Company of Canada ("Morgan Trust"), a trustee of funds to be invested in mortgages on properties owned or controlled by Mater's. The Nash appellants advanced moneys to Mater's through Morgan Trust.

3 On January 15, 18 and 23, 1990, the Director of the Consumer Protection Division of the Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Relations ("Director") made a series of directions under s. 26(1)(a) of the Mortgage Brokers Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. M.39 ("M.B.A."). The effect of these directions was to freeze the assets of Falloncrest Financial Corp., Peter Fallon, Jr. and Mater's. The Director also appointed Peat Marwick Thorne Inc. to investigate possible contraventions of the M.B.A. by Falloncrest Financial Corp., Peter Fallon, Jr. and Mater's, among others.

4 On January 19, 1990, Morgan Trust brought an application before the Ontario Court (General Division) seeking the appointment of a receiver and manager of Mater's assets. It is pleaded in the Nash actions that this application was instituted on the instructions of the Director. Later in 1990, Mater's was placed in bankruptcy.

5 On January 2, 1992 and at a later date, Peter Fallon, Sr., Peter Fallon, Jr. and Alberto DoCouto were each charged with 26 criminal offences including various counts of fraud, theft and conspiracy in relation to the operations of Falloncrest Financial Corp. These charges were laid following investigations by the Ministry of Financial Institutions under the M.B.A. and by the Ontario Provincial Police. The charges are still outstanding.

6 On September 27, 1994, the Falloncrest appellants commenced an action against the Crown alleging various forms of improper conduct on the part of the Crown. On November 9, 1994, the Nash appellants also commenced an action against the Crown making similar allegations. In the latter action, Dr. Lawrence Nash is acting in three capacities: on his own behalf as an investor in mortgages; as the representative plaintiff under the Class Proceedings Act, 1992, S.O. 1992, c. 6; and as an assignee, pursuant to an order of the Registrar in Bankruptcy, of whatever claim was maintainable by Mater's. On December 14, 1994, the Nash appellants commenced a separate action against Morgan Trust, now CIBC Trust Corporation ("CIBC Trust"), for breach of duty as trustee and for breach of certain terms of the trust agreements.

7 On June 28, 1995, Ground J. struck various paragraphs from the statements of claim in Falloncrest v. Ontario and Nash v. Ontario, ordered particulars with respect to a few other paragraphs in those statements of claim, and stayed both civil actions pending the completion of criminal proceedings against the Fallons and DoCouto. On October 23, 1995, Ground J. also stayed the action Nash v. CIBC Trust Corp. The appellants appeal these rulings.

Issues on Appeal

8 The following issues were raised in this appeal:

1. in both actions against the Crown, whether Ground J. erred in striking claims for breach of statutory duty, negligent performance of a statutory duty or power, and negligent investigation;
2. in both actions against the Crown, whether Ground J. erred in striking claims for unlawful disclosure of confidential information;
3. in the Nash action against the Crown, whether Ground J. erred in striking claims based on the Crown's role and its effect with respect to Morgan Trust's motion for the appointment of a receiver; and
4. whether Ground J. erred in staying the Falloncrest action and the two Nash actions pending the completion of the criminal proceedings against Peter Fallon, Sr., Peter Fallon, Jr. and Alberto DoCouto.

9 The Falloncrest appellants raised other issues, but those are either not contested by the Crown, or were decided in the appellants' favour by Ground J. and are not cross-appealed. During the course of argument before this court, counsel for the Nash and Falloncrest appellants abandoned issue (2) relating to unlawful disclosure of confidential information.

10 With respect to all issues affecting the Nash appellants, the Crown submitted that, as an assignee of Mater's through the bankruptcy process, the Nash appellants' rights are no better than those of Mater's. The effect of this would be to tar the investor plaintiffs with whatever wrongdoing can be attributed to Mater's by reason of the alleged criminality of DoCouto, and also to restrict the plaintiffs to the same defences and arguments that Mater's could raise. Whatever merit this argument may have at trial when there is a factual underpinning to the activities of Mater's, it should not be given effect to at this stage of the proceedings. For our present purposes, we accept the allegations in the pleadings as true. This means that the Nash appellants are entitled to be treated as victims of Mater's and the Falloncrest companies. In any event, Dr. Lawrence Nash is also suing in his personal capacity and as a representative under the Class Proceedings Act, 1992, although the class has not yet been certified, and it is too early to deal with his status as a litigant.

11 We are all of the opinion that the appeals with respect to issues (1) and (3), both involving the striking of claims, should be allowed. The test for determining whether a pleading should be struck was stated by the Supreme Court of Canada in Hunt v. Carey Canada Inc., [1990] 2 S.C.R. 959 at p. 980, 74 D.L.R. (4th) 321 at p. 336:

[T]he test in Canada governing the application of provisions like Rule 19(24)(a) of the British Columbia Rules of Court is the same as the one that governs an application under R.S.C., O. 18, r. 19: assuming that the facts as stated in the statement of claim can be proved, is it "plain and obvious" that the plaintiff's statement of claim discloses no reasonable cause of action? As in England, if there is a chance that the plaintiff might succeed, then the plaintiff should not be "driven from the judgment seat". Neither the length and complexity of the issues, the novelty of the cause of action, nor the potential for the defendant to present a strong defence should prevent the plaintiff from proceeding with his or her case.

On a motion to strike out a pleading, the court must accept the facts alleged in the statement of claim as proven unless they are patently ridiculous or incapable of proof, and must read the statement of claim generously with allowance for inadequacies due to drafting deficiencies: Toronto-Dominion Bank v. Deloitte Haskins & Sells (1991), 5 O.R. (3d) 417 at p. 419, 8 C.C.L.T. (2d) 322 (Gen. Div.). Also, the court should not, at this stage of the proceedings, dispose of matters of law that are not fully settled in the jurisprudence: R.D. Belanger & Associates Ltd. v. Stadium Corp. of Ontario Ltd. (1991), 5 O.R. (3d) 778 at p. 782 (C.A.).

12 With respect to issue (1), the law relating to breach of statutory duty, negligent performance of a statutory duty or power, and negligent investigation is not so clear that we are prepared to say that these actions must fail. Even the Crown conceded that the law in this area is "muddy". Accordingly, the motions court judge erred in holding that "it is plain, obvious and beyond doubt" that these actions cannot succeed.

13 With respect to issue (3), accepting that the Crown directed Morgan Trust to apply for the appointment of a receiver and that the Crown knew or ought to have known that Mater's would suffer loss as a result, it is not plain and obvious that no reasonable cause of action can be grounded on these facts. The cause of action may or may not be a weak one, but that should be determined at trial. The Nash appellants' claim of improper Crown influence on Morgan Trust should proceed to trial, especially since other issues arising from the same facts will be litigated in any event: Belanger, supra, at p. 782.

14 As to issue (4), no general rule in this jurisdiction requires a stay of civil cases merely because criminal charges relating to the same matter are pending. In fact, a court will normally deny a stay unless the applicant demonstrates that his or her case is an extraordinary or an exceptional one: see Stickney v. Trusz (1973), 2 O.R. (2d) 469 at p. 471, 45 D.L.R. (3d) 275 (H.C.J.), affirmed (1974), 3 O.R. (2d) 538 at p. 538, 46 D.L.R. (3d) 80 (Div. Ct.), affirmed (1974), 3 O.R. (2d) 538 at 539, 46 D.L.R. (3d) 80 at 82 (C.A.), leave to appeal refused [1974] S.C.R. xii, 28 C.R.N.S. 127n.

15 Several reported cases have suggested that the rationale underlying a stay of a civil action pending the conclusion of a related criminal prosecution is the protection of the accused's right to a fair trial: see, for example, Seaway Trust Co. v. Kilderkin Investments Ltd. (1986), 55 O.R. (2d) 545, 29 D.L.R. (4th) 456 (H.C.J.); Belanger v. Caughell (1995), 22 O.R. (3d) 741 (Gen. Div.). In the present case, however, the party moving for the stay is the Crown, and the accused's rights are not at issue. The Crown must, then, show that other extraordinary or exceptional circumstances justify a stay.

16 The cases are clear that the threshold test to be met before a stay is granted is high. The mere fact that criminal proceedings are pending at the same time as civil proceedings is not sufficient ground for a stay of the latter: Stickney v. Trusz, supra. Even the potential disclosure through the civil proceedings of the nature of the accused's defence or of self-incriminating evidence is not necessarily exceptional: see Belanger v. Caughell, supra; Stickney v. Trusz, supra; Seaway Trust Co. v. Kilderkin Investments Ltd., supra. This high threshold test should not be relaxed merely because it is the Crown that requests the stay. An applicant, whether it is the Crown or the accused, must meet the same burden of proving extraordinary or exceptional circumstances. The test is not on a balance of convenience for the Crown and something higher for the accused. To the extent that the motions court judge held that it is, he erred.

17 In our opinion, neither Nash v. Ontario nor Nash v. CIBC Trust Corp. involve circumstances so extraordinary or exceptional as to warrant the stays of these actions. The Nash appellants and CIBC Trust are not parties in the pending criminal proceedings and the issues involved in these two actions are quite distinct from those the criminal charges raise. Falloncrest Financial Corp. v. Ontario, on the other hand, is different. The Falloncrest appellants' allegations are such that their civil claims would have little merit if the Crown successfully convicts the Fallons and DoCouto. The civil action is the reciprocal of the criminal prosecution. Furthermore, the Falloncrest appellants' motivation for instituting their action against the Crown, shortly after their committal for trial, is suspect. The appearance is that their objective in maintaining the civil action is to interfere with the criminal process and to have pre-trial access to Crown witnesses beyond that afforded on the preliminary hearing. We would not interfere with the exercise of the trial judge's discretion in this instance where he stayed these civil proceedings until the conclusion of the prosecutions.

Conclusion

18 For the above reasons, we would dispose of the issues in this appeal as follows:

1. both of the Nash and Falloncrest appellants' appeals from the striking of their claims based on the Crown's breach of statutory duty, negligent performance of a statutory duty or power and negligent investigation are allowed;
2. the Nash appellants' appeal from the striking of their claim based on the Crown's role in Morgan Trust's motion for the appointment of a receiver is allowed;
3. the Nash appellants' appeals from the stays of their actions against the Crown and CIBC are allowed; and
4. the Falloncrest appellants' appeal from the stay of their action against the Crown is dismissed.

The various orders of Ground J. are varied in order to give effect to the above dispositions.

19 The Nash appellants shall receive their costs of appeals C22206 and C22998 in any event of the cause. No other party is entitled to costs.

Order accordingly.

Case Summary

Crown — Immunity — Civil action — Malicious prosecution — Whether Crown, Attorney General and Crown Attorneys are immune from suit for malicious prosecution — Whether a ruling on the issue of prosecutorial immunity should be made on an appeal of a preliminary motion — Proceedings against the Crown Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 393, s. 5(6) — Rules of Practice and Procedure, R.R.O. 1980, Reg. 540, Rule 126.

The appellant was charged with the murder of four infants and was discharged on all counts at the conclusion of the preliminary inquiry. She then brought an action against the Crown in right of Ontario, the Attorney General for Ontario, and several police officers, alleging that the Attorney General and his agents, the Crown Attorneys, counselled, aided and abetted the police in charging and prosecuting her and that the Attorney General and the Crown Attorneys were actuated by malice. Proceedings were later discontinued against the police officers and the Crown Attorneys were not named as defendants. Before trial, the respondents moved to have the action dismissed under Rule 126 of the Ontario Rules of Practice on the ground that the pleadings disclosed no reasonable cause of action and, in the alternative, for leave under Rule 124 to set down a point of law raised in the pleadings and to argue it on the return of the motion. The Supreme Court of Ontario allowed the motion and struck out the statement of claim. The Court of Appeal upheld the judgment. Both the Supreme Court of Ontario and the Court of Appeal [page171] seemed to have acted under Rule 126. This appeal is to determine whether the Crown, the Attorney General and the Crown Attorneys enjoy an absolute immunity from a suit for malicious prosecution.

Held (L'Heureux-Dubé J. dissenting in part): The appeal should be dismissed as against the Crown. The appeal should be allowed as against the Attorney General and the matter returned to the Supreme Court of Ontario for trial of the claim against the Attorney General.

The Crown enjoys absolute immunity from a suit for malicious prosecution. Section 5(6) of the Ontario Proceedings Against the Crown Act exempts the Crown from any proceedings in respect of anything done or omitted to be done by a person while discharging or purporting to discharge responsibilities of a judicial nature or responsibilities that he has in connection with the execution of judicial process. The decision to prosecute is a judicial decision vested in the Attorney General and executed on his behalf by his agents, the Crown Attorneys. The Crown Attorneys and the Attorney General in deciding to prosecute the appellant came within s. 5(6) of the Act and the Crown is thus immune from liability to the appellant.

Per Dickson C.J. and Lamer and Wilson JJ.: There is no need for a trial to permit a conclusion on the question of prosecutorial immunity. This issue, disposed of in the courts below upon a pre-trial motion under Rule 124 or Rule 126 of the Ontario Rules of Practice, should be addressed by this Court. The issue has been given careful consideration in the Court of Appeal and in argument before this Court. To send the matter back for trial without resolving the issue would not be expeditious and would add both time and cost to an already lengthy case. The rules of civil procedure should not act as obstacles to a just and expeditious resolution of a case.

The Attorney General and Crown Attorneys are not immune from suits for malicious prosecution. A review of the authorities on the issue of prosecutorial immunity reveals that the matter ultimately boils down to a question of policy. In the interests of public policy, an absolute immunity for the Attorney General and his agents, the Crown Attorneys, is not justified. An absolute immunity has the effect of negating a private right of action and in some cases may bar a remedy under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. As such, the existence of absolute immunity is a threat to the [page172] individual rights of citizens who have been wrongly and maliciously prosecuted. While the policy considerations in favour of absolute immunity have some merit, these considerations must give way to the right of a private citizen to seek a remedy when the prosecutor acts maliciously in fraud of his duties with the result that he causes damage to the victim. The tort of malicious prosecution requires not only proof of an absence of reasonable and probable cause for commencing the proceedings but also proof of an improper purpose or motive, a motive that involves an abuse or perversion of the system of criminal justice for ends it was not designed to serve and as such incorporates an abuse of the office of the Attorney General and his agents the Crown Attorneys. The inherent difficulty in proving a case of malicious prosecution combined with the mechanisms available within the system of civil procedure to weed out meritless claims is sufficient to ensure that the Attorney General and Crown Attorneys will not be hindered in the proper execution of their important public duties. Finally, attempts to qualify prosecutorial immunity in the United States by the so-called functional approach and its many variations have proven to be unsuccessful.

Per La Forest J.: The common law position as set out by Lamer J. is accepted. The Charter implications need not be considered.

Per McIntyre J.: The state of the law relating to the immunity of the Attorney General is far from clear and a ruling on a point of this importance should not be made on an appeal of a preliminary motion. Before laying down any proposition to the effect that the Attorney General and his agents enjoy absolute immunity from civil suit, there should be a trial to permit a conclusion on the question of prosecutorial immunity and to provide -- in the event that it is decided that the immunity is not absolute -- a factual basis for a determination of whether or not in this case the conduct of the prosecution was such that the appellant is entitled to a remedy.

Furthermore, the Attorney General's immunity from judicial review, which is based on the exercise of a judicial function, does not equate with immunity from civil suit for damages for wrongful conduct in the performance of prosecutorial functions which do not involve the exercise of a judicial function. Indeed, most of the functions and acts performed by Crown Attorneys as agents of the Attorney General would fall into this category and, accordingly, the immunity may not extend [page173] to claims for damages as a result of a prosecution, however instituted, that is carried out with malice. A ruling on a preliminary motion to the effect that Attorneys General and their agents are absolutely immune from all liability for suits for malicious prosecution may be too expansive and even ill-founded.

This case, therefore, should not have been disposed of upon a pre-trial motion under Rule 126 of the Ontario Rules of Practice. Under that rule, it is only in the clearest of cases that an action should be struck out. This is not such a case.

Per L'Heureux-Dubé J. (dissenting in part): Appellant's action is completely dependent upon whether or not Attorneys General and Crown Attorneys are immune from civil suit and, as such, the matter can and should be decided by this Court in the present appeal. While, in general, important questions should not be disposed of in interlocutory fashion, this rule does not apply where the defence offered at the outset is one of law only -- namely, that the right of action is barred independently of the facts alleged. There is every advantage, in terms of saving the time and cost of a trial, to decide a question of law at the outset. This, in fact, is the very reason for the existence of Rule 126 of the Ontario Rules of Practice.

Adopting the reasons of the Ontario Court of Appeal, the Attorneys General and Crown Attorneys enjoy an absolute immunity from civil suit when they are acting within the bounds of their authority. The role of absolute immunity is not to protect the interests of the individual holding the office but rather to advance the greater public good. The Attorneys General and Crown Attorneys are often faced with difficult decisions as to whether to proceed in matters which come before them and their freedom of action is vital to the effective functioning of our criminal justice system.

The judgment of Dickson C.J. and Lamer and Wilson JJ. was delivered by LAMER J.

1 I have read the reasons for judgment of my colleague McIntyre J. and I agree with his disposition of the appeal but I do so for somewhat different reasons. McIntyre J. in his reasons for judgment concludes that there must be a trial to permit a conclusion on the question of [page176] prosecutorial immunity. I am in respectful disagreement with him in this regard. I am of the opinion that the question of immunity should be addressed by this Court in this case, and that nothing prevents the Court from so doing. I set out the relevant rules of the Ontario Rules of Practice as they were at the time of the case for ease of reference:

124. Either party is entitled to raise by his pleadings any point of law, and by consent of the parties or by leave of a judge, the point of law may be set down for hearing at any time before the trial, otherwise it shall be disposed of at the trial.

126. A judge may order any pleading to be struck out on the ground that it discloses no reasonable cause of action or answer, and in any such case, or in the case of the action or defence being shown to be frivolous or vexatious, may order the action to be stayed or dismissed, or judgment to be entered accordingly.

2 As McIntyre J. points out the respondents moved to have the action dismissed under Rule 126 on the ground that the pleadings disclosed no reasonable cause of action and, in the alternative, for leave under Rule 124 to set down a point of law raised in the pleadings and to argue the same on the return of the motion. Both Fitzpatrick J. of the Supreme Court of Ontario and the Court of Appeal for Ontario (1985), 51 O.R. (2d) 513, in allowing the motion to strike out the statement of claim, seemed to have acted under Rule 126.

3 A review of the cases dealing with the application of Rule 124 and Rule 126 reveals the following. The difference between the two rules lies in the summary nature of Rule 126 as opposed to the more detailed consideration of issues under Rule 124. A court should strike a pleading under Rule 126 only in plain and obvious cases where the pleading is bad beyond argument. Rule 124 is designed to provide a means of determining, without deciding the issues of fact raised by the pleadings, a question of law that goes to the root of the action. I would like to point out that what is at issue here is not whether malicious [page177] prosecution is a reasonable cause of action. A suit for malicious prosecution has been recognized at common law for centuries dating back to the reign of Edward I. What is at issue is whether the Crown, Attorney General and Crown Attorneys are absolutely immune from suit for the well-established tort of malicious prosecution. This particular issue has been given careful consideration both by the Court of Appeal and in argument before this Court. The Court of Appeal for Ontario undertook a thorough review of authorities in the course of a lengthy discussion of arguments on both sides of the issue. As such it matters not in my view whether the matter was disposed of under Rule 124 or 126. To send this matter back for trial without resolving the issue of prosecutorial immunity would not be expeditious and would add both time and cost to an already lengthy case.

4 Furthermore I am of the view that the rules of civil procedure should not act as obstacles to a just and expeditious resolution of a case. Rule 1.04(1) of the Rules of Civil Procedure in Ontario confirms this principle in stating that "[t]hese rules shall be liberally construed to secure the just, most expeditious and least expensive determination of every civil proceeding on its merits."

5 In terms of whether the Crown enjoys absolute immunity from a suit for malicious prosecution, McIntyre J. concludes that s. 5(6) of the Proceedings Against the Crown Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 393, exempts the Crown from any proceedings in respect of anything done or omitted to be done by a person while discharging or purporting to discharge responsibilities of a judicial nature or responsibilities that he has in connection with the execution of judicial process. I am of the opinion that McIntyre J. was correct in holding that the Crown is rendered immune from liability by the express terms of s. 5(6) of the Act, for the action by the Crown Attorney and the Attorney General in deciding to prosecute the appellant. I would like to point out, however, that for the reasons set out below, I am of the view that a functional approach to prosecutorial immunity at common law is inadequate. [page178] In this case the applicable legislation requires the Court to draw a distinction between prosecutorial functions in so far as Crown immunity under s. 5(6) is not available unless the function is "judicial" in nature. Therefore, although I agree with McIntyre J. that in this case the decision to prosecute is a "judicial" function for the purposes of s. 5(6), I hasten to add that in dealing with the policy considerations governing the availability of absolute immunity at common law for the Attorney General and Crown Attorneys the functional approach is not the proper test. In addition it should be noted that the constitutionality of the section was not an issue and was not addressed by counsel in this appeal. As such this issue is not before this Court, and therefore the constitutionality of s. 5(6) of the Act is still an open question.

6 Consequently, the remaining issue at hand is whether the Attorney General and his agents, the Crown Attorneys, are absolutely immune from civil liability in a suit for malicious prosecution. In resolving this question, a brief review of the situation prevailing in a few jurisdictions could be helpful and useful. While McIntyre J. in his reasons provides a detailed review of the authorities, I would like to add some further observations.

I. Different Approaches to Immunity

7 The situation in Canada is unclear and does not seem to be uniform throughout the country.

1. Absolute Immunity -- the Ontario Position

8 The Ontario Court of Appeal in the case at bar found that an absolute immunity exists, and in reaching this conclusion relied extensively on the decision by the Supreme Court of the United States in Imbler v. Pachtman, 424 U.S. 409 (1976). The Court of Appeal found the idea of an absolute immunity "troubling" but determined that it was justified by the following policy concerns. First, the rule encourages public trust in the fairness and impartiality of those who act and exercise discretion in the bringing and conducting [page179] of criminal prosecution; the rule is designed for the benefit of the public not the benefit of the individual prosecutor. Second, the threat of personal liability for tortious conduct would have a chilling effect on the prosecutor's exercise of discretion and third, to permit civil suits against prosecutors would invite a flood of litigation which would deflect a prosecutor's energies from the discharge of his public duties. In short, the absence of an absolute immunity would open the door to unmeritorious claims and would be a threat to prosecutorial independence. The Court also relied on two decisions of the Ontario High Court, Owsley v. The Queen in right of Ontario (1983), 34 C.P.C. 96 and Richman v. McMurtry (1983), 41 O.R. (2d) 559. Both these decisions rely extensively on the American position as found in Imbler, supra. The case law in Ontario therefore, uniformly stands for the proposition that the Attorney General and Crown Attorneys enjoy absolute immunity from civil liability for malicious prosecution. Outside of Ontario, the issue is somewhat more ambiguous.

2. Elsewhere in Canada -- Absolute Immunity Questioned

9 In Levesque v. Picard (1985), 66 N.B.R. (2d) 87, the New Brunswick Court of Appeal held on the authority of the Ontario cases, especially the case at bar, that an absolute immunity shielded a provincial Crown prosecutor from suit for malicious prosecution. By contrast the appellate courts of Nova Scotia and Alberta have cast some doubts on the existence of an absolute immunity. First, in Curry v. Dargie (1984), 28 C.C.L.T. 93 (N.S.C.A.), the Crown was sued as being vicariously liable for the action of a residential tenancy officer. Hart J.A. held that while the Proceedings Against the Crown Act, R.S.N.S. 1967, c. 239, might absolve the provincial Crown from civil liability, a Crown servant could still be personally liable for misconduct. In the course of his decision [page180] Hart J.A. considered the Ontario decisions especially that of Galligan J. in Richman, supra (at p. 110):

I am not prepared to go as far as Galligan J. in holding that an officer of the Crown cannot be liable for a proceeding commenced maliciously, but it is not necessary to consider that issue at the moment. I do not believe that in the case at bar it can be said that the respondent in laying the information against the appellant was in fact carrying out a judicial function similar to those carried out by Attorneys General and prosecutors.

10 In German v. Major (1985), 39 Alta. L.R. (2d) 270, a Crown prosecutor was sued for alleged misconduct in the preferment of a charge of tax evasion, a charge on which the accused was acquitted. Kerans J.A. speaking for the Alberta Court of Appeal assumes throughout that a suit for malicious prosecution is possible and disposes of the case on the ground that there had been "reasonable and probable cause" to initiate the prosecution. The case was dismissed pursuant to Rule 129 of the Alberta Rules of Civil Procedure, a rule similar to the old Ontario Rule 126. In this context Kerans J.A. said the following (at p. 276):

The rule upon which I rely has much to commend it. It falls short of the absolute immunity suggested by Major and accepted by the Supreme Court of the United States in Imbler v. Pachtman ... but offers some protection from the harassment which he says would otherwise afflict prosecuting counsel because suit would not be permitted to proceed if utterly without merit. It would indeed be a curious thing if we chose a stern immunity rule in preference to an effective striking-out rule.

11 Further support for the view that Kerans J.A. is not inclined to accept the existence of an absolute immunity for prosecutors can be found in the following statements (at pp. 277 and 286):

I will assume, for the sake of argument, that, if counsel, with malice, continues a prosecution he once thought sound but now knows is unsound, he may be sued.

...

Counsel for the Attorney General who acts as his agent in the prosecution of a criminal case is not accountable in civil proceedings to the accused except possibly to the extent that it is alleged against him that he has not acted in good faith, and to that extent the allegation falls within the nominative tort of malicious prosecution ... [Emphasis added.]

12 Therefore the Canadian position ranges from a strong assertion of absolute immunity in Ontario to an acceptance of the possibility of suing the Attorney General and Crown Attorneys if bad faith or malice can be proven as evidenced by the cases from Nova Scotia and Alberta. The situation in Quebec differs in that since 1966 the Code of Civil Procedure, R.S.Q., c. C-25, specifically provides for claims against the Crown in the following terms:

94. Any person having a claim to exercise against the Crown, whether it be a revendication of moveable or immovable property, or a claim for the payment of moneys on an alleged contract, or for damages, or otherwise, may exercise it in the same manner as if it were a claim against a person of full age and capacity, subject only to the provisions of this chapter.

13 No provisions in this chapter prevent a suit for malicious prosecution against the Crown. However, the substantive issue of immunity of Crown prosecutors has not been finally determined.

3. Immunity in the United States

14 A consideration of the position in respect of prosecutorial immunity in the United States is vital both because it is relied extensively upon by the Court of Appeal in the case at bar, and because it has been the source of a healthy debate in courts and among academics in that country. This position is furthermore interesting since a variety of approaches have been proposed and many critical comments have been made.

i) The Functional Approach -- Imbler v. Pachtman: "The Powell Judgment"

15 In 1972 Paul Imbler filed a claim under 42 U.S.C. s. 1983 alleging that the prosecutor and various members of the police force conspired to [page182] cause him loss of liberty by allowing a witness to give false testimony, suppressing evidence, prosecuting with knowledge of an exculpatory lie-detector test and introducing an altered police artist's sketch. Section 1983 of the Civil Rights Act creates a federal damage action against anyone who acts under colour of state law to deprive a person of his civil rights as protected by the U.S. Constitution. Powell J., speaking for five members of the Supreme Court, held that a prosecutor is absolutely immune from s. 1983 actions when the actions arise out of the prosecutor's initiation of prosecution and presentation of the State's case. In addition, the Court seemed to suggest that absolute immunity also attached to activities that "were intimately associated with the judicial phase of the criminal process" (p. 430). The Court then adopted what has become known as the "functional approach" of prosecutorial immunity.

16 The Imbler decision recognizes that prosecutors perform many functions in the course of fulfilling their duties, among them being the decision to initiate a prosecution, which witnesses to call, what other evidence to present, and obtaining, reviewing and evaluating evidence. The Court accepts that drawing a line between these functions is a difficult task but concludes that prosecutorial functions of a quasi-judicial or advocatory nature should be afforded absolute immunity. The Court refused to comment on whether a similar immunity attaches to what it called the "administrative" or "investigative" role of the prosecutor. In the course of justifying its position, the Court noted that the same policy considerations that afford absolute immunity to judges acting within the scope of their duties support a prosecutor's common law absolute immunity. The Court simply extended that line of reasoning to s. 1983 claims.

17 The policy considerations canvassed by the Court are familiar ones and can be summarized as follows:

1. Public Confidence

"The public trust of the prosecutor's office would suffer if he were constrained in making every decision by the consequences in terms of his own potential liability in a suit for damages."

2. Diversion from Duties

"... if the prosecutor could be made to answer in court each time such a person charged him with wrongdoing, his energy and attention would be diverted from the pressing duty of enforcing the criminal law."

3. Balancing of Evils

"... we find ourselves in agreement with Judge Learned Hand, who wrote of the prosecutor's immunity from actions for malicious prosecution:

"... it has been thought in the end better to leave unredressed the wrongs done by dishonest officers than to subject those who try to do their duty to the constant dread of retaliation." Gregoire v. Biddle, 177 F. (2d) 579, 581 (CA2 1949) cert. denied, 339 U.S. 949 (1950)."

4. Other Available Remedies

"Even judges ... could be punished criminally for willful deprivations of constitutional rights ... The prosecutor would fare no better for his willful acts ... Moreover, a prosecutor stands perhaps unique, among officials whose acts could deprive persons of constitutional rights, in his amenability to professional discipline by an association of his peers."

(Imbler, supra, at pp. 424-29)

18 Therefore, Powell J. affirmed the judgment of the Court of Appeal for the Ninth Circuit and held that a prosecutor is absolutely immune from suit in initiating a prosecution and in presenting the State's case.

[page184]

ii) The Functional Approach -- Imbler v. Pachtman: "The White Judgment"

19 While concurring with the judgment of Powell J. and much of his reasoning, White J. (Brennan and Marshall JJ. joining) would carve out an exception to the rule of absolute immunity for the unconstitutional suppression of evidence. In doing so White J. examined the rationale for granting absolute immunity to prosecutors at common law (at p. 442):

The absolute immunity ... is designed to encourage [the prosecutors] to bring information to the court which will resolve the criminal case Lest they withhold valuable but questionable evidence or refrain from making valuable but questionable arguments, prosecutors are protected from liability for submitting before the court information later determined to have been false to their knowledge.

20 According to White J. immunity from suit based on the unconstitutional suppression of evidence would "stand this immunity rule on its head" (p. 442) by discouraging precisely the disclosure of evidence sought to be encouraged by the rule (at p. 443):

A prosecutor seeking to protect himself from liability for failure to disclose evidence may be induced to disclose more than is required. But this will hardly injure the judicial process. Indeed, it will help it. Accordingly, lower courts have held that unconstitutional suppression of exculpatory evidence is beyond the scope of "duties constituting an integral part of the judicial process" and have refused to extend absolute immunity to suits based on such claims. Hilliard v. Williams, 465 F. 2d 1212, 1218 (CA6), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1029 (1972)

21 White J.'s position then would limit the scope of absolute immunity but would not eliminate the theoretical underpinning of the Powell majority judgment, namely the functional approach to absolute immunity.

22 The functional approach has been criticized on a number of grounds. First, there is the ever present problem of line-drawing between functions that are quasi-judicial and those that are administrative [page185] or investigative. Drawing the line is made more difficult by multi-faceted functions, functions that simultaneously serve quasi-judicial, administrative and investigative functions. (See Anthony Luppino, "Supplementing the Functional Test of Prosecutorial Immunity" (1982), 34 Stan. L. Rev. 487, at pp. 493-94.) Aside from the problem of distinguishing between [page187] prosecutorial functions, there is the conceptual difficulty in justifying differential treatment of malicious acts based on the criterion of function. If a prosecutor acts maliciously in the course of the prosecution of an accused, does it really matter whether the function being carried out is characterized as "quasi-judicial" or "administrative"?

23 An example of the difficulty with the functional approach is the disagreement in the lower courts in the United States over whether quasi-judicial absolute immunity extends to investigative functions of a prosecutor. In addition, and in light of the White concurring judgment in Imbler, there is disagreement over whether leaks of information and destruction or alteration of evidence are acts that are protected by absolute immunity: see cases cited by J. C. Filosa, "Prosecutorial Immunity: No Place for Absolutes," [1983] U. Ill. L. Rev. 977, at pp. 985-86. In my view, these disagreements demonstrate the futility of attempting to differentiate between functions of a prosecutor in a principled way. The result is often arbitrary line-drawing which leads to seemingly unresolvable conflict and the diversion of attention from the central issue, namely whether or not a prosecutor has acted maliciously.

24 Second, it has been argued that the policy rationales supporting absolute immunity for prosecutors, derived as they are from judicial immunity, rely on an inaccurate reading of history. Filosa in his article challenges the derivation of the prosecutor's quasi-judicial immunity from s. 1983 [page186] claims from the absolute immunity of judges at common law (at pp. 980-81):

In the sixteenth century, English judges were typically liable for their torts. Throughout the nineteenth century, judges remained liable for malicious conduct done without reasonable and probable cause. In America before Bradley v. Fisher [80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 335 (1872)], courts held many judicial officers liable for their wrongful acts Of the thirty-seven states in existence in 1871, thirteen had judicial immunity, six states held judges liable for malicious actions, nine had not taken a clear position, and nine had not faced the question.

25 Filosa goes on to argue that Congress could not have meant to incorporate a doctrine of absolute immunity into s. 1983 because Bradley, which firmly entrenched judicial immunity in the common law, was not decided until 1872, one year after the Civil Rights Act of 1871 that contained s. 1983.

4. Alternatives to Imbler

i) The Functional Approach Reapproached

26 The difficulties in applying the functional test have led American courts and academic commentators to suggest alternatives or reassessments of the test. One such attempt has been described by its proponent as the "functional approach reapproached". (See Note, "Delimiting the Scope of Prosecutorial Immunity from Section 1983 Damage Suits" (1977), 52 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 173, at pp. 190-91.) This approach seeks to avoid a judicial hearing to determine whether a prosecutor's action is quasi-judicial. As such the test states that "the only duties clearly not entitled to quasi-judicial immunity are those so divorced from the judicial process that they could readily be assigned to another official who could be completely independent of the prosecutor" (see Note, loc. cit., at p. 191). This approach seeks to grant to the prosecutor absolute immunity in a wider sphere of activities in the hopes of clarifying the distinction between quasi-judicial and investigative activities. In my view, this modification still has the drawback of requiring a line to be drawn between [page187] prosecutorial functions, a difficult task in itself. The modification, in seeking to make that task easier, errs on the side of including more activities within the realm of absolute prosecutorial immunity, a modification that, with respect, offers an immunity considerably wider than that given to judges from which prosecutorial immunity is allegedly derived.

ii) General Features Test: Wilkinson v. Ellis

27 In Wilkinson v. Ellis, 484 F. Supp. 1072 (E.D. Pa. 1980), the plaintiff alleged that a prosecutor destroyed a tape recorded interview with a man who admitted involvement in the alleged criminal activity, thereby exonerating the plaintiff. The prosecutor moved to dismiss the action, arguing that the destruction of evidence is a quasi-judicial act shielded by absolute immunity. The Wilkinson court refused to characterize the destruction as either investigative or quasi-judicial. Rather, it resolved the difficulty of classifying activities by asking whether the activity contained features "which generally characterize quasi-judicial activity" (p. 1083). In deciding that the destruction did not have the "general features" of quasi-judicial activity, the court identified three factors to be taken into account: (1) the activity's physical and temporal proximity to the judicial process; (2) the degree of dependence upon legal opinions and prosecutorial discretion involved in the conduct; and (3) whether the activity is primarily advocatory (p. 1080). This approach in my view, does little to get away from the inherent problems involved in categorizing prosecutorial actions.

iii) The Imbler "Umbrella"

28 This variation of the functional approach involves limiting the scope of the prosecutor's quasi-judicial function to conduct that falls within the [page188] narrowest confines of the Imbler test: in other words within the "umbrella" of coverage defined by the language of Imbler. Acts that are under the "umbrella" attract absolute immunity; all others receive at most qualified immunity. (See Marrero v. City of Hialeah, 625 F.2d 499 (5th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 913 (1981).) This approach merely re-states the categorization problem found in Imbler. The test requires a determination of what constitutes the coverage of the so-called "Imbler umbrella" and thereby takes us back to the original problem of line-drawing.

iv) The Harm Test

29 This variation of Imbler construes that decision broadly by granting absolute immunity to prosecutorial conduct that causes a defendant to "face prosecution, or to suffer imprisonment or pretrial detention". (See Taylor v. Kavanagh, 640 F.2d 450 (2d Cir. 1981), at p. 453.) The test denies absolute immunity to prosecutorial conduct that inflicts harm independent of the prosecution itself. This approach looks to the effects of prosecutorial conduct and as such purports to reduce the issue to a factual determination of harms. If the harm is unrelated to the judicial phase of the criminal justice process then the prosecutorial act causing the harm is not quasi-judicial.

v) The Supplemental Functional Approach

30 This approach involves a two-step process: first, determining what conduct normally merits absolute or qualified immunity and second, in the remaining cases, identifying the substantive values affected by conduct that is not susceptible to traditional categorization. (See Luppino, loc. cit., at p. 505.) This variation recognizes that there will be occasions when conduct does not clearly fall into one of the two traditional categories: quasi-judicial and non-quasi-judicial. When conduct does not fall into either category explicit balancing of competing interests becomes necessary. In this respect, [page189] courts should weigh the cost to the judicial system resulting from the unredressed civil wrong against the cost to the efficiency of the criminal justice system. This approach recognizes that the Imbler functional approach cannot account for all prosecutorial functions; there will be some conduct that is multi-faceted and uncategorizable. As a result the approach resorts to a consideration of first principles, namely a balancing of the policy considerations both in favour and opposed to prosecutorial immunity in the first place. In short, we have come full circle.

31 The American position, in any of its forms, demonstrates the impracticality of the functional approach to prosecutorial immunity. In my view, the functional approach leads to arbitrary line drawing between prosecutorial functions. This line drawing exercise is made nearly impossible by the reality that many prosecutorial functions are multi-faceted and cannot be neatly categorized. Further, it must be noted that however one categorizes a prosecutor's function it is still that of the prosecutor. If it can be demonstrated that a prosecutor has acted without reasonable cause and has acted with malice then does it really matter which functions he was carrying out? In my view to decide the scope of immunity on the basis of categorization of functions is an unprincipled approach that obscures the central issue, namely whether the prosecutor has acted maliciously. If immunity is to be qualified it should be done in a manner other than by the drawing of lines between quasi-judicial and other prosecutorial functions.

5. The English Position

32 The position in respect of prosecutorial immunity in England is somewhat unique in that jurisdiction owing in part to the tradition of private prosecution. Private prosecutors have always been liable to suit for malicious prosecution though few, if any, reported cases exist. The Director of Public Prosecutions, who performs the same or similar [page190] function as a Canadian provincial Attorney General, was not created until 1879. In Riches v. Director of Public Prosecutions, [1973] 2 All E.R. 935 (C.A.), the Court said the following in respect of suits against the D.P.P. (at p. 941):

I do not wish to be taken as saying that there may never be a case where a prosecution has been initiated and pursued by the Director of Public Prosecutions in which it would be impossible for an acquitted defendant to succeed in an action for malicious prosecution, or as saying, that the existence of the Attorney General's fiat where required conclusively negates the existence of malice and conclusively proves that there was reasonable and probable cause for the prosecution. There may be cases where there has been, by even a responsible authority, the suppression of evidence which has led to a false view being taken by those who carried on a prosecution and by those who ultimately convicted.

33 The English position then, at the very least, leaves the door open for suits against the equivalent of our Attorneys General and Crown Attorneys when what is at issue is the suppression of evidence. It is apposite to note that this position is reflective of White J.'s concurring opinion in Imbler, supra, wherein he carved out an exception to the rule of absolute immunity for the unconstitutional suppression of evidence.

6. Scotland

34 It would appear that in Scotland the equivalent of our Attorney General and Crown Attorneys are absolutely immune from civil liability. In Hester v. MacDonald, [1961] S.C. 370, the court said at p. 377:

It is, therefore, an essential element in the very structure of our criminal administration in Scotland that the Lord Advocate is protected by an absolute privilege in respect of matters in connexion with proceedings brought before a Scottish Criminal Court by way of indictment Never in our history has a Lord Advocate been sued for damages in connexion with such proceedings. On the contrary, our Courts have consistently affirmed the existence of such immunity on his part.

[page191]

35 The rationale underlying this comment has been disputed by Professor Edwards in The Attorney General, Politics and the Public Interest (1984) in which he argues that the Scottish rationale is based upon the idea that the Lord Advocate and his agents enjoy a constitutional trust which assumes good faith in commencing a prosecution, a rationale far removed from that invoked by the Ontario courts.

7. Australia and New Zealand

36 The position in respect of prosecutorial immunity in Australia and New Zealand is not clear. As far as I can determine, there does not seem to be any reported case on the issue.

37 Although the situation prevailing in European civil law jurisdictions is interesting, its application to the case at bar is of limited usefulness because of the wide differences between the civil law system and our common law tradition.

II. The Preferred Canadian Position

1. The Role of the Attorney General and Crown Attorney

38 Historically the Attorney General's role was that of legal adviser to the Crown and to the various departments of government. More specifically the principal function was and still is the prosecution of offenders. The appointment of Crown Attorneys as agents of the Attorney General, arose from the increasing difficulty of the Attorney General to attend effectively to all of his duties amid increases in population, and the expansion of settlement.

39 The office of the Crown Attorney has as its main function the prosecution of and supervision over indictable and summary conviction offences. The Crown Attorney is to administer justice at a local level and in so doing acts as agent for the Attorney General. Traditionally the Crown Attorney has been described as a "minister of justice" and "ought to regard himself as part of the Court rather than as an advocate". (Morris Manning, "Abuse of Power by Crown Attorneys," [1979] L.S.U.C. Lectures 571, at p. 580, quoting Henry Bull, Q.C.) As regards the proper role of the [page192] Crown Attorney, perhaps no more often quoted statement is that of Rand J. in Boucher v. The Queen, [1955] S.C.R. 16, at p. 23-24:

It cannot be over-emphasized that the purpose of a criminal prosecution is not to obtain a conviction, it is to lay before a jury what the Crown considers to be credible evidence relevant to what is alleged to be a crime. Counsel have a duty to see that all available legal proof of the facts is presented: it should be done firmly and pressed to its legitimate strength but it must also be done fairly. The role of prosecutor excludes any notion of winning or losing; his function is a matter of public duty than which in civil life there can be none charged with greater personal responsibility. It is to be efficiently performed with an ingrained sense of the dignity, the seriousness and the justness of judicial proceedings.

40 Among the many powers of a prosecutor are the following: the power to detain in custody, the power to prosecute, the power to negotiate a plea, the power to charge multiple offences, the power of disclosure/non-disclosure of evidence before trial, the power to prefer an indictment, the power to proceed summarily or by indictment, the power to withdraw charges, and the power to appeal. (For a fuller description of the genesis and operation of these powers see Manning, op. cit., at pp. 586-608, and P. Béliveau, J. Bellemare and J.-P. Lussier, On Criminal Procedure (1982), at pp. 69-83.)

41 With this background in mind, it is now necessary to turn to a consideration of the tort at issue, malicious prosecution, and the policy rationales in favour of an absolute immunity for the Attorney General and Crown Attorneys in respect of that tort.

2. The Tort of Malicious Prosecution

42 There are four necessary elements which must be proved for a plaintiff to succeed in an action for malicious prosecution: [page193] a) the proceedings must have been initiated by the defendant;

- b) the proceedings must have terminated in favour of the plaintiff;
- c) the absence of reasonable and probable cause;
- d) malice, or a primary purpose other than that of carrying the law into effect.

(See J. G. Fleming, The Law of Torts (5th ed. 1977), at p. 598.)

43 The first two elements are straightforward and largely speak for themselves. The latter two elements require explicit discussion. Reasonable and probable cause has been defined as "an honest belief in the guilt of the accused based upon a full conviction, founded on reasonable grounds, of the existence of a state of circumstances, which, assuming them to be true, would reasonably lead any ordinarily prudent and cautious man, placed in the position of the accuser, to the conclusion that the person charged was probably guilty of the crime imputed" (Hicks v. Faulkner (1878), 8 Q.B.D. 167, at p. 171, Hawkins J.)

44 This test contains both a subjective and objective element. There must be both actual belief on the part of the prosecutor and that belief must be reasonable in the circumstances. The existence of reasonable and probable cause is a matter for the judge to decide as opposed to the jury.

45 The required element of malice is for all intents, the equivalent of "improper purpose". It has according to Fleming, a "wider meaning than spite, ill-will or a spirit of vengeance, and includes any other improper purpose, such as to gain a private collateral advantage" (Fleming, op. cit., at p. 609). To succeed in an action for malicious prosecution against the Attorney General or Crown Attorney, the plaintiff would have to prove both the absence of reasonable and probable cause in commencing the prosecution, and malice in the form of a deliberate and improper use of the office of the Attorney General or Crown Attorney, a use inconsistent with the status of "minister of justice". [page194] In my view this burden on the plaintiff amounts to a requirement that the Attorney General or Crown Attorney perpetrated a fraud on the process of criminal justice and in doing so has perverted or abused his office and the process of criminal justice. In fact, in some cases this would seem to amount to criminal conduct. (See for example breach of trust, s. 122, conspiracy re: false prosecution s. 465(1)(b), obstructing justice s. 139(2) and (3) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46.)

46 Further, it should be noted that in many, if not all cases of malicious prosecution by an Attorney General or Crown Attorney, there will have been an infringement of an accused's rights as guaranteed by ss. 7 and 11 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

47 By way of summary then, a plaintiff bringing a claim for malicious prosecution has no easy task. Not only does the plaintiff have the notoriously difficult task of establishing a negative, that is the absence of reasonable and probable cause, but he is held to a very high standard of proof to avoid a non-suit or directed verdict (see Fleming, op. cit., at p. 606, and Mitchell v. John Heine and Son Ltd. (1938), 38 S.R. (N.S.W.) 466, at pp. 469-71). Professor Fleming has gone so far as to conclude that there are built-in devices particular to the tort of malicious prosecution to dissuade civil suits (at p. 606):

The disfavour with which the law has traditionally viewed the action for malicious prosecution is most clearly revealed by the hedging devices with which it has been surrounded in order to deter this kind of litigation and protect private citizens who discharge their public duty of prosecuting those reasonably suspected of crime.

3. Policy Considerations

48 In light of what I have said regarding the role of the prosecutor in Canada, and the tort of malicious [page195] prosecution, it now is necessary to assess the policy rationales. I would begin by noting that even those decisions that have come out firmly in favour of absolute immunity have described the rule as "troubling", a "startling proposition", "strained and difficult to sustain" (see Nelles v. The Queen in right of Ontario (1985), 51 O.R. (2d) 513 (Ont. C.A.), at p. 531, and Bosada v. Pinos (1984), 44 O.R. (2d) 789 (H.C.), at p. 794).

49 It is said by those in favour of absolute immunity that the rule encourages public trust and confidence in the impartiality of prosecutors. However, it seems to me that public confidence in the office of a public prosecutor suffers greatly when the person who is in a position of knowledge in respect of the constitutional and legal impact of his conduct is shielded from civil liability when he abuses the process through a malicious prosecution. The existence of an absolute immunity strikes at the very principle of equality under the law and is especially alarming when the wrong has been committed by a person who should be held to the highest standards of conduct in exercising a public trust. (See Filosa, op. cit., at p. 982, and Marilyn L. Pilkington, "Damages as a Remedy for Infringement of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms" (1984), 62 Can. Bar. Rev. 517, at pp. 560-61.)

50 Regard must also be had for the victim of the malicious prosecution. The fundamental flaw with an absolute immunity for prosecutors is that the wrongdoer cannot be held accountable by the victim through the legal process. As I have stated earlier, the plaintiff in a malicious prosecution suit bears a formidable burden of proof and in those cases where a case can be made out, the plaintiff's Charter rights may have been infringed as well. Granting an absolute immunity to prosecutors is akin to granting a license to subvert individual rights. Not only does absolute immunity negate a private right of action, but in addition, it seems to me, it may be that it would effectively bar the seeking of a remedy pursuant to s. 24(1) of the Charter. It seems clear that in using his office to maliciously prosecute an accused, the prosecutor would be depriving an individual of the right to [page196] liberty and security of the person in a manner that does not accord with the principles of fundamental justice. Such an individual would normally have the right under s. 24(1) of the Charter to apply to a court of competent jurisdiction to obtain a remedy that the court considers appropriate and just if he can establish that one of his Charter rights has been infringed. The question arises then, whether s. 24(1) of the Charter confers a right to an individual to seek a remedy from a competent court. In my view it does. When a person can demonstrate that one of his Charter rights has been infringed, access to a court of competent jurisdiction to seek a remedy is essential for the vindication of a constitutional wrong. To create a right without a remedy is antithetical to one of the purposes of the Charter which surely is to allow courts to fashion remedies when constitutional infringements occur. Whether or not a common law or statutory rule can constitutionally have the effect of excluding the courts from granting the just and appropriate remedy, their most meaningful function under the Charter, does not have to be decided in this appeal. It is, in any case, clear that such a result is undesirable and provides a compelling underlying reason for finding that the common law itself does not mandate absolute immunity.

51 It is also said in favour of absolute immunity that anything less would act as a "chilling effect" on the Crown Attorney's exercise of discretion. It should be noted that what is at issue here is not the exercise of a prosecutor's discretion within the proper sphere of prosecutorial activity as defined by his role as a "minister of justice". Rather, in cases of malicious prosecution we are dealing with allegations of misuse and abuse of the criminal process and of the office of the Crown Attorney. We are not dealing with merely second-guessing a Crown Attorney's judgment in the prosecution of a case but rather with the deliberate and malicious [page197] use of the office for ends that are improper and inconsistent with the traditional prosecutorial function.

52 Therefore it seems to me that the "chilling effect" argument is largely speculative and assumes that many suits for malicious prosecution will arise from disgruntled persons who have been prosecuted but not convicted of an offence. I am of the view that this "flood-gates" argument ignores the fact that one element of the tort of malicious prosecution requires a demonstration of improper motive or purpose; errors in the exercise of discretion and judgment are not actionable. Furthermore, there exist built-in deterrents on bringing a claim for malicious prosecution. As I have noted, the burden on the plaintiff is onerous and strict. The fact that the absence of reasonable cause is a matter of law to be decided by a judge means that an action for malicious prosecution can be struck before trial as a matter of substantive inadequacy (see Rule 21.01 of the Ontario Rules of Civil Procedure for example). In fact this was the approach adopted by Kerans J.A. in German v. Major, supra. I agree with Kerans J.A. that "[i]t would indeed be a curious thing if we chose a stern immunity rule in preference to an effective striking-out rule" (p. 276). In addition most jurisdictions, including Ontario, have provisions that allow a defendant to move for summary judgment before a full-fledged trial takes place (see for example Rule 20 in Ontario). Finally, the potential that costs will be awarded to the defendant if an unmeritorious claim is brought acts as financial deterrent to meritless claims. Therefore, ample mechanisms exist within the system to ensure that frivolous claims are not brought. In fact, the difficulty in proving a claim for malicious prosecution itself acts as a deterrent. This high threshold of liability is evidenced by the small number of malicious prosecution suits brought against police officers each year. In addition, since 1966, the province of Quebec permits suits against the Attorney General and Crown prosecutors without any evidence [page198] of a flood of claims. Therefore, I find unpersuasive the claim that absolute immunity is necessary to prevent a flood of litigation.

53 As for alternative remedies available to persons who have been maliciously prosecuted, none seem to adequately redress the wrong done to the plaintiff. The use of the criminal process against a prosecutor who in the course of a malicious prosecution has committed an offence under the Criminal Code, addresses itself mainly to the vindication of a public wrong not the affirmation of a private right of action. Of special interest in this regard is s. 737 of the Criminal Code which deals with the making of a probation order. Section 737(2) stipulates that certain conditions may be prescribed in a probation order, one of them being that the convicted person "make restitution or reparation to any person aggrieved or injured by the commission of the offence for the actual loss or damage sustained by that person as a result thereof" (s. 737(2)(e)). This section would seem to be an indirect method of at least partially remedying a wrong done to an individual as a result of a malicious prosecution. However the section is only operative when an accused has been convicted of an offence and when a probation order is made. In addition, the Court's power to award compensation to a victim is limited to damages that are relatively concrete and ascertainable. (See R. v. Groves (1977), 37 C.C.C. (2d) 429 (Ont. H.C.)) As such it would seem a rather inadequate substitute for a private right of action. I do however pause to note that many cases of genuine malicious prosecution will also be offences under the Criminal Code, and it seems rather odd if not incongruous for reparation to be possible through a probation order but not through a private right of action.

54 Further, the use of professional disciplinary proceedings, while serving to some extent as punishment and deterrence, do not address the central issue of making the victim whole again. And as has already been noted, it is quite discomfoting to realize that the existence of absolute immunity may bar a person whose Charter rights have been [page199] infringed from applying to a competent court for a just and appropriate remedy in the form of damages.

III. Conclusion

55 A review of the authorities on the issue of prosecutorial immunity reveals that the matter ultimately boils down to a question of policy. For the reasons I have stated above I am of the view that absolute immunity for the Attorney General and his agents, the Crown Attorneys, is not justified in the interests of public policy. We must be mindful that an absolute immunity has the effect of negating a private right of action and in some cases may bar a remedy under the Charter. As such, the existence of absolute immunity is a threat to the individual rights of citizens who have been wrongly and maliciously prosecuted. Further, it is important to note that what we are dealing with here is an immunity from suit for malicious prosecution; we are not dealing with errors in judgment or discretion or even professional negligence. By contrast the tort of malicious prosecution requires proof of an improper purpose or motive, a motive that involves an abuse or perversion of the system of criminal justice for ends it was not designed to serve and as such incorporates an abuse of the office of the Attorney General and his agents the Crown Attorneys.

56 There is no doubt that the policy considerations in favour of absolute immunity have some merit. But in my view those considerations must give way to the right of a private citizen to seek a remedy when the prosecutor acts maliciously in fraud of his duties with the result that he causes damage to the victim. In my view the inherent difficulty in proving a case of malicious prosecution combined with the mechanisms available within the system of civil procedure to weed out meritless claims is sufficient to ensure that the Attorney General and Crown Attorneys will not be hindered in the proper execution of their important public duties. Attempts to qualify prosecutorial immunity in the United States by the so-called functional approach and its many variations have proven to be unsuccessful and unprincipled as I have previously [page200] noted. As a result I conclude that the Attorney General and Crown Attorneys do not enjoy an absolute immunity in respect of suits for malicious prosecution. I would therefore dismiss the appeal as against the Crown, there being no order as to costs. I would allow the appeal as against the Attorney General with costs and direct that the matter be returned to the Supreme Court of Ontario for trial of the claim against the Attorney General.

The following are the reasons delivered by

McINTYRE J.

57 This appeal concerns the question of the liability of the Crown and the Attorney General of the province in a suit for malicious prosecution arising out of the institution of criminal proceedings, charges of murder, brought against the appellant.

58 In March, 1981, the appellant, then a nurse at the Toronto Hospital for Sick Children, was charged with the murder of four infant patients. At the conclusion of her preliminary hearing, the Provincial Court Judge who conducted the proceedings discharged the appellant upon a finding of an absence of evidence: (1982), 16 C.C.C. (3d) 97. The appellant later commenced an action against the Crown in right of Ontario, the Attorney General for Ontario, and several police officers, alleging that the Attorney General and his agents, the Crown Attorneys, counselled, aided and abetted the police in charging and prosecuting the plaintiff, and that in so doing the Attorney General, the Crown Attorneys, and police were acting as agents for the Crown in right of Ontario. It was also alleged that in the prosecution the Attorney General and the Crown Attorneys were actuated by malice while acting as agents for the Crown. Proceedings were later discontinued against the police officers and the Crown Attorneys were not named as defendants. The Crown and the Attorney General remained the only defendants and are the respondents in this Court.

59 Before trial, the respondents moved to have the action dismissed under Rule 126 of the Ontario Rules of Practice, on the ground that the pleadings disclosed no reasonable cause of action and, in the alternative, for leave under Rule 124 to set down a point of law raised in the pleadings and to argue the same on the return of the motion. Rule 124 and Rule 126 are set out hereunder:

124. Either party is entitled to raise by his pleadings any point of law, and by consent of the parties or by leave of a judge, the point of law may be set down for hearing at any time before the trial, otherwise it shall be disposed of at the trial.

126. A judge may order any pleading to be struck out on the ground that it discloses no reasonable cause of action or answer, and in any such case, or in case of the action or defence being shown to be frivolous or vexatious, may order the action to be stayed or dismissed, or judgment to be entered accordingly.

The question of law for which leave was sought was in these terms:

A defendant in a preliminary inquiry held under the provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada and discharged thereof has no cause of action based in malicious prosecution or negligence against the Crown Attorneys conducting such proceedings or as against those in law responsible for their conduct.

60 Fitzpatrick J., of the Supreme Court of Ontario, allowed the motion and struck out the statement of claim. In doing so, he seems to have acted under Rule 126. He concluded on the basis of two decisions of the Supreme Court of Ontario (Owsley v. The Queen in right of Ontario (1983), 34 C.P.C. 96 (Ont. H.C.), and Richman v. McMurtry (1983), 41 O.R. (2d) 559 (Ont. H.C.)), that the Attorney General for Ontario has an absolute immunity from civil action while performing his duties as a public prosecutor, even if he acted maliciously. He concluded that the immunity had not been removed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and allowed the motion and struck out the statement of claim.

61 An appeal was dismissed in the Ontario Court of Appeal: (1985), 51 O.R. (2d) 513. At the outset, Thorson J.A., speaking for the Court (Houlden, Thorson and Robins JJ.A.) said, at pp. 514-15:

This Court reserved its judgment on the appeal following lengthy argument on whether, as a matter of law, any action can be asserted against the Crown or the Attorney-General, or both, in the circumstances which are found to be present in this case. My conclusion is that as a matter of law it cannot, and that the plaintiff's appeal must therefore be dismissed. The reasons for this conclusion follow.

From the foregoing, it may be somewhat doubtful whether the Court of Appeal acted under Rule 124 or 126. The record, however, does not disclose any consent by the parties or any grant of leave for the hearing of the point of law under Rule 124. Furthermore, in answer to arguments raised in the Court of Appeal in this form, at p. 518:

At the outset of his submissions counsel for the appellant, Mr. Sopinka, contended that on an application to a judge under Rule 126 of the Rules of Practice, the judge hearing the application ought not to strike out a plaintiff's statement of claim unless he was persuaded that the claim could have no hope of succeeding, even if the facts alleged in the statement of claim were proved. In considering such an application, the facts must be taken to be as they are alleged in the statement of claim. Moreover, where the statement of claim raises a "substantial issue of law" it ought not to be struck out under Rule 126, and where an allegation is made that an executive of ministerial act has been performed in bad faith or for an improper purpose, that issue should not be dealt with on a summary application under Rule 126 but should be left to be determined by the judge at trial. Similarly, where an issue arises as to whether any conduct is unconstitutional, it is important to have the kind of factual underpinning which is needed to determine that issue and which can only be brought out at a trial in the ordinary course.

Thorson J.A. said, at pp. 518-19:

With respect I cannot agree that Fitzpatrick J. erred in dealing with this application as one properly brought under Rule 126, albeit that the power conferred on a judge under that rule is one that ought to be used "sparingly", as noted by Dupont J. in Owsley v. The Queen in right of Ontario (1983), 34 C.P.C. 96 at p. [page203] 102. Nor can I agree with the assertion that merely because the statement of claim raises a "substantial issue of law" it ought not to be dealt with on an application under that rule. If the latter assertion were correct, it seems to me that the purpose of the rule would be largely defeated. That purpose, surely, is to make it possible for a person who has been named in an action to avoid having to go to the considerable trouble and expense of defending himself in court against a claim made in that action which has no reasonable expectation of succeeding against him, even if all the facts alleged are proved. If, in this case, the learned motions court judge had concluded that the Attorney-General, and thus by extension the Crown, did not enjoy an absolute immunity in law, it might well have been improper to decide the issue before him on an application under Rule 126 since in that event, and for the reasons explained by Linden J. in King v. Liquor Control Board of Ontario (1981), 33 O.R. (2d) 816 at p. 825, ... a "factual underpinning" for the claim would then have been necessary for its disposition, but where, as here, he concluded that the immunity was absolute, the same kind of factual underpinning was not needed, for even if the facts as alleged were proved the claim could not succeed. Accordingly, I find no error on the part of Fitzpatrick J. in acting on the application as one which could be properly considered and dealt with by him under Rule 126

....

Therefore, I will proceed on the basis that the Court of Appeal reached its determination by the application of Rule 126. In so doing, the court concluded that there existed an absolute immunity for the Crown and the Attorney General and the Crown Attorneys against suit for all acts done in relation to criminal proceedings, even though malice be shown. If this Court should hold that the immunity asserted for the Crown and the Attorney General is clearly absolute, the action would be at an end. If, however, it should conclude that the immunity is in any way limited or qualified or that its existence is doubtful, the matter would have to go to trial in the usual way, so that evidence could be heard on the matters of fact and the issues raised in order to provide a factual underpinning for the determination of any possible liability. In approaching the matter at this stage, it must be borne in mind that in proceedings under Rule 126 the facts alleged must be taken as true and this [page204] motion must be disposed of on the basis that the Crown Attorneys and the Attorney General acted with malice in the initiation and conduct of these proceedings.

62 There are four necessary elements which must be proved for success in an action for malicious prosecution:

- A. The proceedings must have been initiated by the defendant.
- B. The proceedings must have terminated in favour of the plaintiff.
- C. The plaintiff must show that the proceedings were instituted without reasonable cause, and
- D. The defendant was actuated by malice.

This appeal must therefore be approached on the footing that all these elements are shown.

63 It was argued on behalf of the Crown that it enjoyed a complete immunity from liability for malicious prosecution, on the basis of a common law immunity of the Attorney General and the Crown Attorneys. Any liability on the part of the Crown arising from the conduct of its servants would be vicarious. Therefore, it was contended that because the common law accorded a full immunity to the Crown's servants, the Crown itself would not be liable. It was also contended that the Crown had an absolute immunity under the provisions of the Proceedings Against the Crown Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 393 (the Act).

64 Any consideration of Crown liability must now be based upon the Act and I do not find it necessary for the purposes of this case to consider the common law position respecting Crown immunity. The purpose of the Act, clearly discernible from its form and structure, was to remove Crown immunities and place the Crown upon the same footing as any other person before the courts, save for the exceptions which are set out in the Act. The [page205] effective sections for this purpose are ss. 2 and 5. Section 2(2)(d) was relied upon by the Crown. It provides:

2. ...

(2) Nothing in this Act

...

(d) subjects the Crown to proceedings under this Act in respect of anything done in the due enforcement of the criminal law or of the penal provisions of any Act of the Legislature;

It may be argued that commencing and conducting proceedings with malice against the object of the proceedings could not be considered as the "due" enforcement of the criminal law. But any opening in the wall of immunity found by the Court of Appeal would be, in my view, effectively closed by s. 5(6) of the Act, which provides:

5. ...

(6) No proceedings lie against the Crown under this section in respect of anything done or omitted to be done by a person while discharging or purporting to discharge responsibilities of a judicial nature vested in him or responsibilities that he has in connection with the execution of judicial process.

Section 5 expresses the general rule which subjects the Crown to all liabilities in tort to which, if it were a person of full age and capacity, it would be subject. Subsections (2) to (5) provide interpretative guides while subs. (6), excepts from the general rule Crown liability in respect of anything done or omitted to be done by a person, while discharging or purporting to discharge responsibilities of a judicial nature vested in him or responsibilities that he has in connection with the execution of the judicial process.

65 The claim asserted here depends upon the actions of the Crown Attorneys and the Attorney General, specifically the decision to prosecute the appellant for murder. The decision to prosecute is a judicial decision and is obviously vested in the Attorney General and executed on his behalf by his agents, the Crown Attorneys: see The Queen v. Comptroller-General of Patents, Designs, and [page206] Trade Marks, [1899] 1 Q.B. 909 (C.A.). A.L. Smith L.J. said, at pp. 913-14:

I wish to say a word or two about the position of the Attorney-General, because in my judgment it is of importance in this case, and his position appears likely to be lost sight of. Everybody knows that he is the head of the English Bar. We know that he has had from the earliest times to perform high judicial functions which are left to his discretion to decide. For example, where a man who is tried for his life and convicted alleges that there is error on the record, he cannot take advantage of that error unless he obtains the fiat of the Attorney-General, and no Court in the kingdom has any controlling jurisdiction over him. That perhaps is the strongest case that can be put as to the position of the Attorney-General in exercising judicial functions. Another case in which the Attorney-General is pre-eminent is the power to enter a nolle prosequi in a criminal case. I do not say that when a case is before a judge a prosecutor may not ask the judge to allow the case to be withdrawn, and the judge may do so if he is satisfied that there is no case; but the Attorney-General alone has power to enter a nolle prosequi, and that power is not subject to any control. Another case is that of a criminal information at the suit of the Attorney-General -- a practice which has, I am sorry to say, fallen into disuse. The issue of such an information is entirely in the discretion of the Attorney-General, and no one can set such an information aside. There are other cases to which I could refer to be found in old and in recent statutes, but I have said enough to shew the high judicial functions which the Attorney-General performs

The Crown Attorneys and the Attorney General in deciding to prosecute the appellant would therefore come within s. 5(6) of the Act, and the Crown would have its statutory immunity despite any uncertainty which might arise because of an argument under s. 2(2)(d) of the Act, based on the concept of "due" enforcement of the criminal law. The Attorney General and his agents, whatever the motives underlying their conduct, were surely, in the words of s. 5(6), "discharging or purporting" to discharge responsibilities of a judicial nature. In my view, the Crown is rendered immune by the express terms of s. 5(6) of the Act from liability to the appellant.

66 The fact of Crown immunity in this case does not necessarily mean that a similar immunity for the Attorney General and his agents follows. Any immunity that they might enjoy must find its own independent footing and the fact that the Act extends an immunity to the Crown in this case, therefore, cannot be understood as conferring or evidencing an immunity for the Attorney General and the Crown Attorneys. This point was made by Hart J.A. in the case of Curry v. Dargie (1984), 28 C.C.L.T. 93 (N.S.C.A.), where he held that, while the Proceedings Against the Crown Act, R.S.N.S. 1967, c. 239, at p. 107, might absolve the provincial Crown from liability, a Crown servant, in that case a residential tenancy officer, could still be personally liable for misconduct:

It seems to me that we are dealing here, once again, with the immunity of the Crown and not that of a tortfeasor.

It has been pointed out that the Proceedings Against the Crown Act was passed to give citizens the right to sue the Crown for the tortious acts of its officers and servants. The Act also prevents suits against the Crown for acts of its officers or servants carried out in the due enforcement of valid legislation. The Act was not designed, however, to protect the officers and servants of the Crown personally from actions arising out of torts committed by them against members of the public, whether during the course of their employment or not, which were not done solely for the due enforcement of the criminal law or the provisions of any act of the Legislature

What then is the nature of the immunity, if any, enjoyed by the Attorney General at common law?

67 There is clear authority in the jurisprudence of most common law, and some civil law, jurisdictions for the proposition that public officers and officials discharging or purporting to discharge the duties and powers of their offices may be personally liable in damages for wrongful conduct. The leading case in Canada on this point is Roncarelli v. Duplessis, [1959] S.C.R. 121. The facts are well known. Roncarelli was a restaurant owner in [page208] Quebec. He was a member of a religious group, the Jehovah's Witnesses, and he supported their cause financially and in assisting members of the group who from time to time ran afoul of the law. Duplessis was the Premier of Quebec and, as well, Attorney General of the province. The policy of the Government was opposed to the Jehovah's Witnesses and Duplessis sought to eliminate Roncarelli as an opponent in his efforts to curb the Jehovah's Witnesses. He ordered the General Director of the Quebec Liquor Commission, which had the legislative authority to "grant, refuse or cancel permits for the sale of alcoholic liquors," to revoke Roncarelli's liquor licence and to forever bar him from obtaining another. This ruined his business and he brought action for damages against Duplessis for the wrongful revocation of his licence and the prohibition against his obtaining a further licence. A majority in this Court held that Duplessis was liable. The judgment of Rand J. (with whom Judson J. concurred) has been regarded as the leading judgment in the case. He saw the issue in these terms, at p. 137:

In these circumstances, when the de facto power of the Executive over its appointees at will to such a statutory public function is exercised deliberately and intentionally to destroy the vital business interests of a citizen, is there legal redress by him against the person so acting?

He concluded that there was legal redress in the form of damages. He expressed the view that there existed a general presumption in legislation and regulation that powers given by the legislation will be exercised in good faith and without improper motives. At page 140, he said:

In public regulation of this sort there is no such thing as absolute and untrammelled "discretion", that is that action can be taken on any ground or for any reason that can be suggested to the mind of the administrator; no legislative Act can, without express language, be taken to contemplate an unlimited arbitrary power exercisable for any purpose, however capricious or irrelevant, regardless of the nature or purpose of the statute. Fraud and corruption in the Commission may not be mentioned in such statutes but they are always implied as exceptions. "Discretion" necessarily implies good faith [page209] in discharging public duty; there is always a perspective within which a statute is intended to operate; and any clear departure from its lines or objects is just as objectionable as fraud or corruption.

In this context, it should be noted that in commencing and prosecuting criminal offences the Attorney General and his agents, the Crown Attorneys, are exercising statutory powers: see Ministry of the Attorney General Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 271; Crown Attorneys Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 107; and the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, s. 504. Rand J. was also of the view that the acts shown to have been done by the respondent put him beyond the protection of any immunity which could attach to his office. He added, at pp. 141-42:

The act of the respondent [Duplessis] through the instrumentality of the Commission brought about a breach of an implied public statutory duty toward the appellant; it was a gross abuse of legal power expressly intended to punish him for an act wholly irrelevant to the statute, a punishment which inflicted on him, as it was intended to do, the destruction of his economic life as a restaurant keeper within the province. Whatever may be the immunity of the Commission or its member from an action for damages, there is none in the respondent. He was under no duty in relation to the appellant and his act was an intrusion upon the functions of a statutory body. The injury done by him was a fault engaging liability within the principles of the underlying public law of Quebec: Mostyn v. Fabrigas, and under art. 1053 of the Civil Code. That, in the presence of expanding administrative regulation of economic activities, such a step and its consequences are to be suffered by the victim without recourse or remedy, that an administration according to law is to be superseded by action dictated by and according to the arbitrary likes, dislikes and irrelevant purposes of public officers acting beyond their duty, would signalize the beginning of disintegration of the rule of law as a fundamental postulate of our constitutional structure.

68 It will be observed that Duplessis in the Roncarelli case purported to act not only as the Premier of Quebec but also as the Attorney General. It would appear to be clear from the majority judgments in Roncarelli that the principle that public officers of the highest rank in Canada who exercise the powers of their office in excess or in abuse of those powers will be liable in damages for injuries resulting. This principle has been well founded in English authority: see Mostyn v. Fabrigas (1774), 1 Cowp. 161, 98 E.R. 1021, where the Governor of Minorca was held to be liable in damages in a civil action for false imprisonment of a native Minorcan. Lord Mansfield rejected the Governor's claim for immunity at p. 175 Cowp., p. 1029 E.R.:

Therefore to lay down in an English Court of Justice such a monstrous proposition, as that a governor acting by virtue of letters patent under the Great Seal, is accountable only to God, and his own conscience; that he is absolutely despotic, and can spoil, plunder, and affect His Majesty's subjects, both in their liberty and property, with impunity, is a doctrine that cannot be maintained.

See, as well, Henly v. Mayor of Lyme (1828), 5 Bing. 91, 130 E.R. 995.

69 Another case expressing the same or a similar proposition is Asoka Kumar David v. Abdul Cader, [1963] 3 All E.R. 579 (P.C.). In that case, a licensing authority had refused a licence for the operation of a cinema and the appellant brought action alleging a malicious refusal of licence. The action was struck out in a pre-trial motion and the Court of Appeal of Ceylon supported the respondent. In the judicial committee, Viscount Radcliffe expressed the view that the case was not one which should have been the subject of a pre-trial disposition, and said, at p. 582:

Since then [1907] the English courts have had to give much consideration to the general question of the rights of the individual dependent on the exercise of statutory powers by a public authority In their lordships' opinion it would not be correct today to treat it as establishing any wide general principle in this field: certainly it would not be correct to treat it as sufficient to found the proposition, as asserted here, that an applicant for a statutory licence can in no circumstances have a right to damages if there has been a malicious misuse [page211] of the statutory power to grant the licence. Much must turn in such cases on what may prove to be the facts of the alleged misuse and in what the malice is found to consist. The presence of spite or ill-will may be insufficient in itself to render actionable a decision which has been based on unexceptionable grounds of consideration and has not been vitiated by the badness of the motive. But a "malicious" misuse of authority, such as is pleaded by the appellant in his plaint, may cover a set of circumstances which go beyond the mere presence of ill-will, and in their lordships' view it is only after the facts of malice relied on by a plaintiff have been properly ascertained that it is possible to say in a case of this sort whether or not there has been any actionable breach of duty.

70 It would appear on the basis of the authorities cited that in general terms public officers are entitled to no special immunities or privileges when they act beyond the powers which are accorded to them by law in their official capacities. It would follow, then, that where a public officer, a servant of the Crown, exceeds the powers of his office or acts improperly in fraud of his duties and powers, or acts with malice in the discharge of his duties, he does not have immunity from civil suit and where, by reason of such excess of power or improper motive, he causes damage he may be civilly liable in damages. This, indeed, seems clear as far at least as it may concern public servants who act in administrative capacities. However, the question before us involves a consideration of the position of the Attorney General, acting in his capacity as the chief law officer of the Crown concerned with the commencement and prosecution of criminal proceedings against accused persons.

71 The Court of Appeal, as has been said, found an absolute immunity from civil liability on the part of the Attorney General and the Crown Attorneys, and in reaching this conclusion they placed special emphasis on Owsley v. The Queen in right of Ontario and Richman v. McMurtry, supra, in the Ontario High Court and, as well, on Imbler v. Pachtman, 424 U.S. 409 (1976). They formed the view that the absolute immunity was a clearly established feature of the common law. This issue has been considered in many Canadian cases in recent years: see Unterreiner v. Wilson (1982), 40 O.R. (2d) 197 (H.C.), per Gray J., affirmed [page212] (1983), 41 O.R. (2d) 472 (C.A.); Owsley v. The Queen in right of Ontario, supra; Richman v. McMurtry, supra; Bosada v. Pinos (1984), 44 O.R. (2d) 789 (H.C.), per Pennell J.; Curry v. Dargie, supra; German v. Major (1985), 39 Alta. L.R. (2d) 270 (C.A.); and Levesque v. Picard (1985), 66 N.B.R. (2d) 87 (C.A.), leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada granted May 22, 1986, [1986] 1 S.C.R. x, notice of discontinuance filed January 7, 1987, [1987] 1 S.C.R. x.

72 These cases do not offer complete support for the position taken in the Court of Appeal. The cases decided in the Ontario courts, which are noted above, reach the conclusion that the prosecutorial immunity is absolute. In reaching a similar conclusion in the case at bar, Thorson J.A. relied extensively on American authority with particular emphasis on the judgments of Learned Hand J. in Gregoire v. Biddle, 177 F.2d 579 (2d Cir. 1949), and of Powell and White JJ., of the U.S. Supreme Court, in Imbler v. Pachtman, supra. These cases adopt the view that the social need to have prosecutors who are charged with the prosecution of criminal cases freed from the threat of civil action, so that they may fearlessly and objectively conduct the prosecutions justifies the adoption of the absolute rule. Powell J. in Pachtman, supra, at p. 428, expressed agreement with the words of Learned Hand J. in Gregoire, supra, at p. 581, where he said:

As is so often the case, the answer must be found in a balance between the evils inevitable in either alternative. In this instance it has been thought in the end better to leave unredressed the wrongs done by dishonest officers than to subject those who try to do their duty to the constant dread of retaliation

73 But the position respecting prosecutorial immunity is not unanimous. Other courts in other jurisdictions have indicated that they would not necessarily extend absolute immunity to those executing prosecutorial functions. In Riches v. Director of Public Prosecutions, [1973] 2 All E.R. 935 (C.A.), the plaintiff had been acquitted of a criminal charge and sought damages for malicious [page213] prosecution against the Director of Public Prosecutions. I observe, that in respect of the institution of prosecutions against individuals, the Director of Public Prosecutions is effectively performing the same function as a Canadian provincial Attorney General. In that case, although Stephenson L.J. held that the material before the Court disclosed that there had been a basis in evidence for the plaintiff's prosecution and that there was no cause of action disclosed by the statement of claim, he rejected the proposition that the Director of Public Prosecutions could never be found liable for malicious prosecution. He said, at p. 941:

I do not wish to be taken as saying that there may never be a case where a prosecution has been initiated and pursued by the Director of Public Prosecutions in which it would be impossible for an acquitted defendant to succeed in an action for malicious prosecution, or as saying that the existence of the Attorney-General's fiat where required conclusively negates the existence of malice and conclusively proves that there was reasonable and probable cause for the prosecution. There may be cases where there has been, by even a responsible authority, the suppression of evidence which has led to a false view being taken by those who carried on a prosecution and by those who ultimately convicted. But that case is, as it seems to me, many miles from this one. There is nothing in the judgment of the Court of Criminal Appeal in this particular case which lends any support to the view that there was no case for the plaintiff to answer; and I cannot find in anything that he has said to us or in any document that has been put before us anything to suggest that there was in existence material showing that there was no basis in evidence for a prosecution of him on the conspiracy charge or on any of the three substantive charges which he had to meet at the Suffolk Assizes. In those circumstances, as it seems to me, he has failed to show that the defendant put the facts unfairly before prosecuting counsel, that there was anything like a lack of reasonable or probable cause, or malice, on the defendant's part or that there is any possibility of such material being produced.

74 In Canada, decisions in the Alberta and Nova Scotia courts cast doubt on the existence of the complete immunity. In German v. Major, supra, the plaintiff had been prosecuted under the Income Tax Act. The trial judge acquitted on the basis of [page214] a doubt as to guilt and the defendant taxpayer then sued the prosecutor for malicious prosecution. Though Kerans, J.A. considered that the material before the court disclosed that the plaintiff's case was "doomed beyond doubt to fail", for absence of proof of malice, and because there were reasonable grounds for the prosecution he also considered that the prosecutor's immunity to prosecution was not absolute. In the closing paragraph of his judgment, at p. 286, he said:

Counsel for the Attorney General who acts as his agent in the prosecution of a criminal case is not accountable in civil proceedings to the accused except possibly to the extent that it is alleged against him that he has not acted in good faith, and to that extent the allegation falls within the nominative tort of malicious prosecution, and that cause of action has been dealt with [see p. 282]. I would therefore strike those portions of the statement of claim which deal with the remaining claims by German against Major. [Emphasis added.]

It would follow that had the prosecutor proceeded solely or principally on an improper motive: for example, malice, then coming within Kerans J.A.'s conception there would be no immunity against malicious prosecution. In Curry v.

Dargie, supra, it was held that a residential tenancy officer who had instituted proceedings against a tenant could not claim an absolute prosecutorial immunity. Relying in part on the earlier case of Warne v. Province of Nova Scotia (1969), 1 N.S.R. (2d) 27 (S.C.T.D.), where Gillis J. refused to strike out a personal claim against the provincial Minister of Agriculture, Hart J.A. explained that he was not willing to go as far as the Ontario cases had gone in extending prosecutorial immunity. Although he distinguished the case before him from a case where the Attorney General or a Crown Attorney had instituted a prosecution, he made it clear that he was not deciding the issue as to the immunity of Attorneys General and Crown Attorneys. He said, at p. 110:

I am not prepared to go as far as Galligan J. [in Richman, supra] in holding that an officer of the Crown cannot be liable for a proceeding commenced maliciously, [page215] but it is not necessary to consider that issue at the moment. I do not believe that in the case at Bar it can be said that the respondent in laying the information against the appellant was in fact carrying out a judicial function similar to those carried out by Attorneys General and prosecutors. An information can be laid by any person and there is no obligation under the Residential Tenancies Act requiring that it be laid by the respondent. Surely a person who undertakes to swear that she has reasonable and probable cause to believe that an offence has been committed must take personal responsibility for the results of that act and cannot simply say that she was merely following instructions of her superiors. Nor can it be said that she was by her act enforcing the criminal law or the provisions of any statute. She was simply setting in motion the forces of the justice system which would enable the persons charged with its administration to perform their duties. She was in no different position from the police informant or other person who lays an information in a criminal case without reasonable and probable cause for believing that the offence had been committed and with some malicious intent. Such a person is always liable to an action for malicious prosecution. [Emphasis added.]

75 The basis upon which Hart J.A. draws the distinction between the residential tenancy officer and the Attorney General, and which erases any doubt as to the non-existence of an immunity for the residential tenancy officer, is the fact that the Attorney General exercises a "judicial function" in commencing a prosecution, whereas the residential tenancy officer does not. I have already referred to the "judicial" nature of the Attorney General's decision to prosecute: see the discussion of The Queen v. Comptroller-General of Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks, supra. But can it be said that the mere fact of the Attorney General's decision being "judicial" confers an absolute immunity? I do not think the law is decided on this point.

76 The "judicial" nature of the Attorney General's decision to prosecute does not in any way render him a "court", that is, an adjudicative entity. See on this point, Re Van Gelder's Patent (1888), 6 R.P.C. 22 (C.A.), where Lord Esher, M.R., said, at p. 27:

If what I have said is true, after all the Attorney-General is not a Court. He may have a judicial function to perform, but he is not a Court, and prohibition does not lie to him [Emphasis added.]

What is meant by the words "prohibition does not lie to him" is that the Attorney General's decision to prosecute is not reviewable by any court. As A.L. Smith L.J. noted in Comptroller-General of Patents, supra, at p. 914:

The issue of such an [a criminal] information is entirely in the discretion of the Attorney-General, and no one can set such an information aside [Emphasis added.]

Hence, the law is settled that the Attorney General's exercise of his "judicial" functions, such as the commencement of criminal proceedings, the entering of a nolle prosequi, the entering of a stay under s. 579(1) of the Criminal Code, or the preferring of direct indictments in the absence of a committal for trial after a preliminary hearing, are all incapable of judicial review and to that extent, the Attorney General enjoys an absolute and total immunity on the basis that he is performing a judicial function.

77 Immunity from judicial review, however, does not equate to immunity from civil suit for damages incurred as a result of a maliciously instituted and executed prosecution. This Court has held that, in respect of adjudicative judicial decisions, there is a complete immunity from civil suit: Morier v. Rivard, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 716. In light of the reservations expressed by learned justices of the Alberta, Nova Scotia and English Courts of Appeal, however, I am loath to make a ruling on an appeal of a preliminary motion that a similar absolute immunity exists for the benefit of the Attorney General and his agents in respect of suits for malicious prosecution. If the Court were to make such a ruling on a point of this importance in a total absence of evidence, it would, in my view, be adopting a dangerous course. Let us not forget that, when Lord Mansfield was faced with the bleak reality of a colonial governor gone awry, imprisoning innocent people without proper trials and in contravention of the law, "absolutely despotic" [page217] and "accountable only to God, and his own conscience", he felt compelled to reject any notion of immunity by virtue of the Governor's office: see Mostyn v. Fabrigas, supra. The state of the law relating to the immunity of the Attorney General is, as has been shown, far from clear. Before laying down any proposition to the effect that the Attorney General and his agents enjoy absolute immunity from civil suit, there must be a trial to permit a conclusion on the question of prosecutorial immunity and to furnish -- in the event that it is decided that the immunity is not absolute -- a factual basis for a determination of whether or not in this case the conduct of the prosecution was such that the appellant is entitled to a remedy.

78 Furthermore, the Attorney General's immunity from judicial review, based on the exercise of a judicial function, does not equate with immunity from civil suit for damages for wrongful conduct in the performance of prosecutorial functions which do not involve the exercise of a judicial function. Indeed, most of the functions and acts performed by Crown Attorneys, as agents of the Attorney General, would fall into this category and, accordingly, the immunity may not extend to claims for damages as a result of a prosecution, however instituted but carried out with malice. A ruling on a preliminary motion to the effect that Attorneys General and their agents are absolutely immune from all liability for suits for malicious prosecution may therefore be too expansive and even ill-founded.

79 Therefore, my view is that this case is not one which should have been disposed of upon a pre-trial motion under Rule 126. The law has long been settled that it is only in the clearest of cases that actions will be struck out, and this is not such a clear case. Of interest in this connection are the comments made in an unreported case in the British Columbia Court of Appeal (Barrisove v. McDonald, B.C.C.A., No. 490/74, November 1, 1974 (McFarlane, Robertson and Carrothers J.J.A.)) where an action was commenced against a county court judge for alleged misconduct in the [page218] course of the plaintiff's trial. The pleadings were struck out in the Supreme Court of British Columbia as alleging no reasonable cause of action, but an appeal was allowed, holding, in effect, that the allegations against the judge were cognizable in a civil action for damages. This case cannot now be considered as authoritative in view of the judgment in this Court in Morier v. Rivard, supra, but the comments made by Robertson J.A. in agreeing with the disposition made of the appeal are significant. He said (at p. 10):

I agree with the disposition proposed by my brother [McFarlane] and agree substantially with what he has said. I wish, however, to guard myself against being said to have made a pronouncement on the law which will be binding on the trial judge or upon this Court if following a trial, there should be an appeal to the Court. Rather than saying categorically that the endorsement on the writ and the Statement of Claim discloses a cause of action to which there can be no defence, I prefer to put my reasons on the ground that the question is not one which should have been decided in a proceeding of the sort that was taken here. It is so far from clear that no cause of action is disclosed that, as I have indicated, that stage of the proceedings was not one at which the question should have been decided.

In view of the uncertainty of the law upon this question, it is not possible, in my view, to conclude that the appellant has not alleged a reasonable cause of action in her pleadings and, therefore, the move to strike out the pleadings and dismiss the action as against the Attorney General must fail.

80 I would therefore dismiss the appeal as against the Crown. There is no order as to costs. I would allow the appeal as against the Attorney General with costs, and direct that the matter be returned to the Supreme Court of Ontario for trial of the claim against the Attorney General.

The following are the reasons delivered by

LA FOREST J.

81 I agree with my colleague Lamer J. except that I prefer to rely solely on the common law position as set forth by him, leaving [page219] consideration of Charter implications to another day when it becomes necessary to deal with them.

The following are the reasons delivered by

L'HEUREUX-DUBÉ J. (dissenting in part)

82 While I agree with my colleague, Justice McIntyre, that the Crown enjoys absolute immunity from suit even for malicious prosecution, I respectfully disagree with his conclusion that the Attorney General and, by extension, Crown Attorneys, may not. Consequently, I would dismiss the appeal.

83 My colleague McIntyre J. is of the view that the lower courts erred in striking out the appellant's statement of claim under Rule 126 of the Ontario Rules of Practice under circumstances where there was sufficient doubt as to the actual state of the law on the question. He finds that the law in Canada is somewhat ambiguous as to the question of the degree of immunity of Attorneys General and Crown Attorneys. For that reason, he orders the matter to proceed to trial. My point of divergence from the reasons of McIntyre J. concerns the appropriate response of this Court under the circumstances. Since, in my view, strong policy reasons exist for granting Attorneys General and Crown Attorneys absolute immunity from prosecution for actions taken in the proper exercise of their powers, I see no reason to prolong this matter any further by remitting it to trial to decide this very same issue.

84 I would like to make it clear at the outset that I am proceeding from the premise that any decisions taken or acts performed by the respondents in this case were done within the scope of their authority. I perceive the claim of the appellant to be founded on the idea that her prosecution by the respondents, though carried out within the bounds of their authority, was malicious. In this respect, I would distinguish the situation from that which arose in Roncarelli v. Duplessis, [1959] S.C.R. 121. In that case, the claim was brought on the basis that the respondent had acted outside the scope of his legitimate authority. The civil action was brought [page220] against Maurice Duplessis in his capacity as an individual, and not against Duplessis in either of his official roles as Premier of the province or as Attorney General. As Rand J. stated, at pp. 142-43:

The office of Attorney-General traditionally and by statute carries duties that relate to advising the Executive, including here, administrative bodies, enforcing the public law and directing the administration of justice. In any decision of the statutory body in this case, he had no part to play beyond giving advice on legal questions arising. In that role his action should have been limited to advice on the validity of a revocation for such a reason or purpose and what that advice should have been does not seem to me to admit of any doubt. To pass from this limited scope of action to that of bringing about a step by the Commission beyond the bounds prescribed by the legislature for its exclusive action converted what was done into his personal act. [Emphasis added.]

And at p. 144:

Was the act here, then, done by the respondent in the course of that exercise [of his functions]? The basis of the claim, as I have found it, is that the act was quite beyond the scope of any function or duty committed to him, so far so that it was one done exclusively in a private capacity, however much in fact the influence of public office and power may have carried over into it.

85 It may well be that a governmental authority who acts with malice acts outside of the scope of his authority. However, this is not the issue which was put before us. It is to be noted that the appellant chose to proceed against the Attorney General in his official, rather than personal, capacity. In her factum, the appellant also maintains that all of the respondents were acting, "at all material times" as agents of the Attorney General for Ontario, who "acted as an agent" of Her Majesty the Queen in right of Ontario.

86 For the purposes of Rule 126, as McIntyre J. has indicated, we must assume that all the facts alleged by the appellant in her submissions are true. The question then, to be decided before the matter is allowed to go to trial, is simply: does the appellant's claim disclose a reasonable cause of [page221] action? This is a pure question of law, and no evidence is required for its determination. In fact, there is every advantage, in terms of saving the time and cost of a trial, to decide a question of law at the outset. This, in fact, is the very reason for the existence of Rule 126.

87 In the present case, a determination that the Attorney General and Crown Attorneys enjoy absolute immunity would settle the question definitively. Both the judge at first instance and the Court of Appeal of Ontario proceeded on this basis. I intend to do so as well. This is also the course followed in Morier v. Rivard, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 716, which came to this Court on an interlocutory question similar to the one in this case.

88 This, of course, does not mean that I disagree with McIntyre J. when he proposes that, in general, important questions should not be disposed of in interlocutory fashion. However, this, in my view, does not apply in cases such as the one before us, where the defense offered at the outset is one of law only, namely that the right of action is barred independently of the facts alleged.

89 The action brought by Nelles is completely dependent upon the answer to the question of whether Attorneys General and Crown Attorneys are immune from civil suit. As such, the matter can and should be decided by this Court in the present appeal. My answer to the question is that the immunity from civil suit enjoyed by Attorneys General and Crown Attorneys is absolute when they are acting within the bounds of their authority. I rest my reasons on the very carefully considered judgment of the unanimous Ontario Court of Appeal: Nelles v. The Queen in right of Ontario (1985), 51 O.R. (2d) 513. The Court of Appeal (Houlden, Thorson and Robins J.J.A.) undertook a thorough review of the authorities in the course of a lengthy and well reasoned discussion of the arguments on either side of the issue.

90 As Thorson J.A. put it, at p. 531:

... the concept that the Attorney-General and Crown Attorneys should enjoy an absolute immunity from civil suit for their conduct in initiating and conducting criminal prosecutions is a troubling one. That it confronts thoughtful and fair-minded persons with the need to make what cannot be other than a difficult choice, is obvious.

91 Ultimately, however, "[a]s is so often the case, the answer must be found in a balance between the evils inevitable in either alternative" (Gregoire v. Biddle, 177 F.2d 579 (2d Cir. 1949), at p. 581).

92 While there are significant differences between the role of prosecutors in the American legal system, and the role of Crown Attorneys in Canada, it is my view that the basic principles underlying the grant of immunity to these agents are the same. These principles have been clearly elucidated in American case law. For example, in Gregoire, supra, Learned Hand J. expanded on the underlying rationale for the immunity of officials, at p. 581:

The justification for doing so is that it is impossible to know whether the claim is well founded until the case has been tried, and that to submit all officials, the innocent as well as the guilty, to the burden of a trial and to the inevitable danger of its outcome, would dampen the ardour of all but the most resolute, or the most irresponsible, in the unflinching discharge of their duties. Again and again the public interest calls for action which may turn out to be founded on a mistake, in the face of which an official may later find himself hard put to it to satisfy a jury of his good faith. There must indeed be means of punishing public officers who have been truant to their duties; but that is quite another matter from exposing such as have been honestly mistaken to suit by anyone who has suffered from their errors.

93 Similarly, Powell J. in Imbler v. Pachtman, 424 U.S. 409 (1976), observed, at pp. 422-23:

The common-law immunity of a prosecutor is based upon the same considerations that underlie the common-law immunities of judges and grand jurors acting within the scope of their duties. These include concern that harassment by unfounded litigation would cause a deflection [page223] of the prosecutor's energies from his public duties, and the possibility that he would shade his decisions instead of exercising the independence of judgment required by his public trust.

94 The role of absolute immunity is not to protect the interests of the individual holding the office, rather it is to advance the greater public good. Absolute immunity is based upon principles of public policy. In Yaselli v. Goff, 12 F.2d 396 (2d Cir. 1926), Rogers J. wrote, at p. 406:

The public interest requires that persons occupying such important positions and so closely identified with the judicial departments of the government should speak and act freely and fearlessly in the discharge of their important official functions. They should be no more liable to private suits for what they say and do in the discharge of their duties than are the judges and jurors, to say nothing of the witnesses who testify in a case.

95 Attorneys General and Crown Attorneys are often faced with difficult decisions as to whether to proceed in matters which come before them. It is unfortunate that, like all human beings, they cannot be immune from error. However, the holders of such offices can and should be immune from prosecution for any such errors which occur in the course of the exercise of their functions. The freedom of action of Attorneys General and Crown Attorneys is vital to the effective functioning of our criminal justice system. In my view, the greater public interest is best served by giving absolute immunity to these agents.

96 I would dismiss the appeal.

Case Summary

Appeal From:

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO

Catchwords:

Practice — Motion to strike — Police officers involved in fatal shooting — Actions brought by estate and family of victim — Statement of claim alleging misfeasance in public office against police officers and chief of police and negligence against chief of police, police services board and province — Actions based on failure of police officers to cooperate in SIU investigation — Whether portions of statement of claim should be struck out as disclosing no reasonable cause of action — Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, r. 21.01(1)(b).

Catchwords:

Torts — Tort of misfeasance in public office — Chief of police and police officers — Victim killed by police — Police officers involved in shooting not complying with statutory duty to cooperate with SIU investigation — Plaintiffs bringing actions in misfeasance in public office against police officers and chief of police — Whether tort of misfeasance in public office can arise from misconduct involving breaches of statutory duty — Whether tort limited to unlawful exercises of statutory or prerogative powers.

Catchwords:

Torts — Negligence — Duty of care — Victim killed by police — Police officers involved in shooting not complying with statutory duty to cooperate with SIU investigation — Plaintiffs bringing actions in negligence against chief of police, police services board and province — Whether they owed plaintiffs duty to take reasonable care to ensure that police officers cooperated with investigation.

Catchwords:

Costs — Court of Appeal's costs award — Plaintiffs submitting that they are public interest litigants and should not have been required to pay costs — Actions involving public authorities and raising issues of public interest insufficient to alter essential nature of litigation — Plaintiffs not falling within definition of public interest litigants — No clear and compelling reasons to interfere with Court of Appeal's decision to award costs in [page265] accordance with usual rule that successful party is entitled to costs.

Summary:

O was fatally shot by police officers. The Special Investigation Unit ("SIU") began an investigation. The police officers involved in the incident did not comply with SIU requests that they remain segregated, that they attend interviews on the same day as the shooting, and that they provide shift notes, on-duty clothing, and blood samples in a timely manner. Under s. 113(9) of the Ontario Police Services Act, members of the force are under a statutory obligation to cooperate with SIU investigations and, under s. 41(1), a chief of police is required to ensure that members of the force carry out their duties in accordance with the provisions of the Act. The SIU cleared the officers of any wrongdoing. O's estate and family commenced a variety of actions. The statement of claim alleged that the lack of a thorough investigation into the shooting incident had caused them to suffer mental distress, anger, depression and anxiety. They claimed that the officers' failure to cooperate with the SIU gave rise to actions for misfeasance in a public office against the officers and the Chief of Police, and to actions for negligence against the Chief, the Metropolitan Toronto Police Services Board, and the Province. The defendants brought motions under rule 21.01(1)(b) of the Ontario Rules of Civil Procedure to strike out the claims on the ground that they disclose no reasonable cause of action. The motions judge and the Court of Appeal struck out portions of the statement of claim. In this Court, the plaintiffs appeal against the Court of Appeal's decision to strike the claims for misfeasance in a public office against the officers and the Chief, and the claims for negligence against the Board and the Province. The Chief cross-appeals against the Court of Appeal's decision to allow an action for negligence against him to proceed.

Held: The appeal should be allowed in part and the cross-appeal dismissed. The actions in misfeasance in a public office against the police officers and the Chief and the action in negligence against the Chief should be allowed to proceed. The actions in negligence against the Board and the Province should be struck from the statement of claim.

Under rule 21.01(1)(b), a court may strike out a statement of claim for disclosing no reasonable cause of action when it is plain and obvious that the action is [page266] certain to fail because the statement of claim contains a radical defect. In this case, if the facts of the motion to strike are taken as pleaded, it is not plain and obvious that the actions for misfeasance in a public office against the police officers and the Chief must fail.

The failure of a public officer to perform a statutory duty can constitute misfeasance in a public office. Misfeasance is not limited to unlawful exercises of statutory or prerogative powers. It is an intentional tort distinguished by (1) deliberate, unlawful conduct in the exercise of public functions; and (2) awareness that the conduct is unlawful and likely to injure the plaintiff. The requirement that the defendant must have been aware that his or her unlawful conduct would harm the plaintiff establishes the required nexus between the parties. A plaintiff must also prove the requirements common to all torts, specifically, that the tortious conduct was the legal cause of his or her injuries, and that the injuries suffered are compensable in tort law.

Here, the statement of claim pleads each of the constituent elements of the tort. The officers' alleged failure to cooperate with the SIU investigation and the Chief's alleged failure to ensure that they did cooperate both constitute unlawful breaches of statutory duties under the Police Services Act. The allegation that the officers' acts and omissions "represented intentional breaches of their legal duties as police officers" satisfies the requirement that the officers were aware that their conduct was unlawful and that it was intentional and deliberate. The allegation that the Chief deliberately failed to segregate the officers satisfies the requirement that he intentionally breached his legal obligation to ensure compliance with the Police Services Act. However, the same cannot be said of his alleged failures to ensure that the officers produced timely and complete notes, attended interviews, and provided accurate and complete accounts. A mere failure to discharge obligations of an office cannot constitute misfeasance in a public office and the plaintiffs must prove the failures were deliberate. The allegation that the officers and the Chief "ought to have known" that their misconduct would cause the plaintiffs to suffer must be struck from the statement of claim because misfeasance in a public office is an intentional tort requiring subjective awareness that harm to the plaintiff is a likely consequence of the alleged misconduct. Lastly, at the pleadings stage, it is sufficient with respect to damages that the statement of claim alleges mental distress, anger, depression and anxiety as a consequence of the alleged misconduct, but the plaintiffs [page267] will have to prove at trial that the alleged misconduct caused anxiety or depression of sufficient magnitude to warrant compensation.

To succeed with their actions in negligence against the Chief, the Board, and the Province, the plaintiffs must first establish that these defendants owed the plaintiffs a duty to take reasonable care to ensure that the police officers cooperated with the SIU investigation. To do so, the plaintiffs must demonstrate that: (1) the harm complained of is a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the alleged breach; (2) there is sufficient proximity between the parties that it would not be unjust or unfair to impose a duty of care on the defendants; and (3) there exist no policy reasons to negative or otherwise restrict that duty.

The circumstances of this case raise a prima facie duty of care owed by the Chief to the plaintiffs. First, it is reasonably foreseeable that the officers' failure to cooperate with the SIU investigation would harm the plaintiffs. As the Chief was responsible for ensuring that cooperation, it is reasonably foreseeable that his failure to do so would harm the plaintiffs. Second, a finding of proximity is supported by the relatively direct causal link between the alleged misconduct -- negligent supervision -- and the complained of harm, and by the fact that members of the public reasonably expect a chief of police to be mindful of the injuries that might arise as a consequence of police misconduct. The public expectation is consistent with the statutory obligations the Police Services Act imposes on the Chief. No broad policy considerations exist that ought to negative the prima facie obligation of the Chief to prevent the misconduct. With respect to damages, the same principles set out in the context of the actions in misfeasance in a public office are applicable.

The relationship between the plaintiffs and the Board and the Province, however, are not such that a duty of care may rightly be imposed. The Board is not under a private law duty to ensure that police officers, as a matter of general practice, cooperate with the SIU. There is no close causal connection between the misconduct alleged against the Board and the alleged harm. The [page268] Board does not supervise officers and is not involved in their day-to-day conduct. This weakens substantially the nexus between the Board and members of the public injured as a consequence of police misconduct. Further, the Board has no statutory obligation to ensure that police officers cooperate with the SIU. Courts should be loath to interfere with the Board's broad discretion to determine what objectives and priorities to pursue or what policies to enact, and a decision not to enact additional policies or training procedures for the purpose of ensuring cooperation under s. 113(9) does not constitute a breach of its obligation to provide adequate and effective police services.

Similarly, the Province does not have a private law obligation to institute policies and training procedures for the purpose of ensuring that police officers, as a matter of general policy, cooperate with the SIU. There is insufficient proximity between the parties to conclude that the Province is under a private law obligation to ensure that members of the force comply with an SIU investigation. The Province is too far removed from the day-to-day conduct of members of the force and the Solicitor General is not under a statutory obligation to ensure that police officers cooperate with the SIU. The Solicitor General's decision not to enact additional policies or training procedures in respect of s. 113(9) does not constitute a breach of his duty to ensure that the Board provides adequate and effective police services.

1 This appeal concerns actions for misfeasance in a public office and negligence within the context of motions to strike the actions as disclosing no reasonable cause of action. Unlike the Court of Appeal, I would permit the actions for misfeasance in a public office to proceed. Like the Court of Appeal, I would permit the action against Metropolitan Toronto Chief of Police David Boothby to proceed, but would strike the actions for negligence against the Metropolitan Toronto Police [page271] Services Board and Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Ontario.

I. Facts

2 On September 26, 1997, Manish Odhavji was fatally shot by officers of the Metropolitan Toronto Police Service while running from his vehicle subsequent to a bank robbery. Within 25 minutes of the shooting, an assistant to Metropolitan Toronto Chief of Police David Boothby (the "Chief") notified the Special Investigations Unit of the Ministry of the Solicitor General (the "SIU") of the incident.

3 The SIU is a civilian agency statutorily mandated to conduct independent investigations of police conduct in cases of death or serious injury caused by the police. The SIU began its investigation immediately. It requested that the defendant officers remain segregated, that they make themselves available for same-day interviews, and that they provide their shift notes, on-duty clothing, and blood samples. Under s. 113(9) of the Police Services Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.15, members of the force are under a statutory obligation to cooperate with members of the SIU in the conduct of the investigation. Under s. 41(1) of the Police Services Act, a chief of police is required to ensure that members of the force carry out their duties in accordance with the provisions of the Act.

4 The estate of Mr. Odhavji and the members of his immediate family (the "plaintiffs") allege that the defendant officers intentionally breached their statutory obligation to cooperate fully with the SIU investigation. In particular, the plaintiffs allege that the defendant officers did not attend for interviews with the SIU until September 30, that they did not comply with the request to remain segregated, and that they failed to comply with the request for shift notes, on-duty clothing, and blood samples in a timely manner -- and that when statements were eventually given to the SIU, they were both inaccurate and misleading. In the plaintiffs' statement of claim, the lack of a thorough investigation into the [page272] shooting incident has caused the plaintiffs to suffer mental distress, anger, depression and anxiety. The plaintiffs further allege that these damages are consequences that the defendant officers and the Chief knew or ought to have known would result from an inadequate investigation into the shooting incident.

5 The actions at issue in this appeal are not related to the allegedly wrongful death of Mr. Odhavji, but, rather, to the defendant officers' alleged failure to cooperate with the SIU. It is the plaintiffs' submission that the foregoing facts give rise to an action for misfeasance in a public office against the defendant officers and the Chief, and actions for negligence against the Chief, the Metropolitan Toronto Police Services Board (the "Board") and Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Ontario (the "Province"). More specifically, this appeal concerns: (i) the plaintiffs' appeal against the Court of Appeal's decision to strike the actions for misfeasance in a public office, and the actions for negligence against the Board and the Province, on the basis that they disclose no reasonable cause of action; and (ii) the Chief's cross-appeal against the Court of Appeal's decision to allow the action for negligence against the Chief to proceed.

III. Judicial History

A. Ontario Court (General Division), [1998] O.J. No. 5426 (QL)

7 According to Day J., misfeasance in a public office can be established in one of two ways: either by proof of malice with intent to injure, or by proof that the public officer intentionally engaged in acts that were ultra vires the scope of his or her office and that she or he could foresee with a degree of certainty that harm would be caused to the plaintiff. As applied to the facts of this case, Day J. concluded that the action against the defendant officers could proceed, but only if the cause of action for misfeasance was framed in malice. He held that it was plain and obvious that the action for misfeasance in a public office against the Chief would fail, owing to the fact that he was not directly and consciously involved in the breach of the obligation to cooperate with the SIU investigation.

8 Day J. allowed the action for negligent supervision against the Chief to proceed on the basis that he made no submissions in respect of this issue. In respect of the actions for negligent supervision against the Board and the Province, Day J. found that there was sufficient proximity between the parties to conclude that the defendants owed a duty of care to the appellants. Nonetheless, Day J. struck the action against the Board, on the basis that a duty of care is negated in situations in which the agency's involvement was limited to establishing policy. He found that the action for negligent supervision against the Province could succeed, on the basis that a cause of action for negligence lies where the [page275] responsible Minister fails to take sufficient steps to implement a particular policy decision, in this instance the decision to establish the SIU.

B. Ontario Court of Appeal (2000), 52 O.R. (3d) 181

9 Borins J.A., for the majority of the court, held that the defining element of misfeasance in a public office is the unlawful exercise of a statutory or prerogative power that adheres to the defendant's office. On this view, the failure of a public officer to perform a statutory duty cannot constitute misfeasance in a public office. Consequently, Borins J.A. found it plain and obvious that neither action for misfeasance in a public office could succeed, owing to the fact that the defendants had not been engaged in the exercise of a statutory or prerogative power that adhered to their respective offices. The most that could be said was that the defendants failed to comply with the obligations imposed upon them by the Police Services Act.

10 In respect of the actions for negligent supervision, Borins J.A. held that the action against the Chief was based on s. 41(1)(b) of the Police Services Act, which imposes a duty on a chief of police to ensure that members of the police force carry out their duties in accordance with the Act and its regulations. Borins J.A. concluded that it was not plain and obvious that the action for negligent supervision against the Chief must fail. It was, however, plain and obvious that the actions against the Board and the Province must fail. With respect to the Board, Borins J.A. agreed with Day J. that the Board's involvement was limited to establishing policy. With respect to the Province, Borins J.A. held that the Police Services Act does not impose a duty on the Province to control the operational conduct of the municipal police officers or to ensure that police officers comply with [page276] their obligation to cooperate with an SIU investigation.

11 Feldman J.A., dissenting, did not agree that it was plain and obvious that the actions for misfeasance in a public office must fail. In her view, the essence of the tort is the misfeasance in or misuse of the office itself; its purpose is to prevent the deliberate injuring of members of the public by the intentional disregard of official duty. Feldman J.A. thus held that there is no principled reason to distinguish between a public officer who improperly exercises a power and a public officer who deliberately fails to carry out a duty where they know or are recklessly indifferent to the fact that injury to the plaintiff is the likely result. Applied to the facts of this case, Feldman J.A. would have found that the actions for misfeasance in a public office should have been allowed to proceed.

12 Feldman J.A. also was of the view that each of the actions for negligent supervision should have been allowed to proceed. She agreed with Borins J.A. that the Province is not under an obligation to ensure that individual officers comply with their statutory obligation to cooperate with the SIU, but noted that the nature of the claim was that the Province failed to implement training procedures or other policies in order to ensure that officers, as a matter of general practice, cooperated with the SIU. Feldman J.A. was uncertain whether the Police Services Act imposes a statutory duty on the Province in respect of these operational matters, and thus felt it inappropriate to strike the claim at this stage of the action. In respect of the Board, Feldman J.A. found that it was not immediately clear whether the Board is under an obligation to establish policies and monitor their implementation for the purpose of ensuring that police officers comply with their statutory obligations. Thus, Feldman J.A. would have found that it was not plain and obvious that the actions for negligent supervision could not succeed.

IV. Analysis

13 In discussing the issues in this appeal, I will begin by stating the test for striking a statement of claim on the basis that it discloses no reasonable cause of action. I will then consider that test within the context of the actions for misfeasance in a public office, and then within the context of the actions for negligence.

A. Striking Out a Statement of Claim

14 The defendants' motions to have the actions dismissed were made pursuant to rule 21.01(1)(b) of the Ontario Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194. Rule 21.01(1)(b) stipulates that a court may strike out a statement of claim that discloses no reasonable cause of action. The rules with respect to striking out a statement of claim are much the same in other provinces. In British Columbia, for example, rule 19(24)(a) of the Rules of Court, B.C. Reg. 221/90, states that a court may strike out a pleading on the ground that it discloses no reasonable claim.

15 An excellent statement of the test for striking out a claim under such provisions is that set out by Wilson J. in Hunt v. Carey Canada Inc., [1990] 2 S.C.R. 959, at p. 980:

... assuming that the facts as stated in the statement of claim can be proved, is it "plain and obvious" that the plaintiff's statement of claim discloses no reasonable cause of action? As in England, if there is a chance that the plaintiff might succeed, then the plaintiff should not be "driven from the judgment seat". Neither the length and complexity of the issues, the novelty of the cause of action, nor the potential for the defendant to present a strong defence should prevent the plaintiff from proceeding with his or her case. Only if the action is certain to fail because it contains a radical defect ... should the relevant portions of a plaintiff's statement of claim be struck out

The test is a stringent one. The facts are to be taken as pleaded. When so taken, the question that must then be determined is whether there is "plain and obvious" that the action must fail. It is only if the statement of claim is certain to fail because it contains a "radical defect" that the plaintiff should [page278] be driven from the judgment. See also Attorney General of Canada v. Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, [1980] 2 S.C.R. 735.

B. The Actions for Misfeasance in a Public Office

16 The essence of the Court of Appeal's decision is that the "radical defect" from which the actions for misfeasance in a public office suffer is their failure to plead the constituent elements of the tort. In particular, the Court of Appeal held that the defining element of the tort is the unlawful exercise of the statutory or prerogative powers that adhere to the defendant's office. Because the alleged misconduct involved the breach of a statutory duty rather than the improper or unlawful exercise of a statutory or prerogative power, it is "plain and obvious", on this view, that the actions for misfeasance in a public office cannot succeed.

17 Consequently, I begin by considering the Court of Appeal's conclusion that the unlawful exercise of a statutory or prerogative power is a constituent element of the tort. With respect, a review of the leading cases clearly reveals that the tort is not limited to circumstances in which the defendant officer is engaged in the unlawful exercise of a particular statutory or prerogative power. As I will discuss, the class of conduct at which the tort is targeted is not as narrow as the unlawful exercise of a particular statutory or prerogative power, but more broadly based on unlawful conduct in the exercise of public functions generally.

(1) The Defining Elements of the Tort

18 The origins of the tort of misfeasance in a public office can be traced to Ashby v. White (1703), 2 Ld. Raym. 938, 92 E.R. 126, in which Holt C.J. found that a cause of action lay against an elections officer who maliciously and fraudulently deprived Mr. White of the right to vote. Although the defendant possessed the power to deprive certain persons from participating in the election, he did not have the power to do so for an improper purpose. Although the original judgment suggests that he was [page279] simply applying the principle ubi jus ibi remedium, Holt C.J. produced a revised form of the judgment in which he stated that it was because fraud and malice were proven that the action lay: J. W. Smith, A Selection of Leading Cases on Various Branches of the Law (13th ed. 1929), at p. 282. Thus, in its earliest form it is arguable that misfeasance in a public office was limited to circumstances in which a public officer abused a power actually possessed.

19 Subsequent cases, however, have made clear that the ambit of the tort is not restricted in this manner. In Roncarelli v. Duplessis, [1959] S.C.R. 121, this Court found the defendant Premier of Quebec liable for directing the manager of the Quebec Liquor Commission to revoke the plaintiff's liquor licence. Although Roncarelli was decided at least in part on the basis of the Quebec civil law of delictual responsibility, it is widely regarded as having established that misfeasance in a public office is a recognized tort in Canada. See for example Powder Mountain Resorts Ltd. v. British Columbia (2001), 94 B.C.L.R. (3d) 14, 2001 BCCA 619; and Alberta (Minister of Public Works, Supply and Services) v. Nilsson (2002), 220 D.L.R. (4th) 474, 2002 ABCA 283. In Roncarelli, the Premier was authorized to give advice to the Commission in respect of any legal questions that might arise, but had no authority to involve himself in a decision to revoke a particular licence. As Abbott J. observed, at p. 184, Mr. Duplessis "was given no statutory power to interfere in the administration or direction of the Quebec Liquor Commission". Martland J. made a similar observation, at p. 158, stating that Mr. Duplessis' conduct involved "the exercise of powers which, in law, he did not possess at all". From this, it is clear that the tort is not restricted to the abuse of a statutory or prerogative power actually held. If that were the case, there would have been no grounds on which to find Mr. Duplessis liable.

20 This understanding of the tort is consistent with the widespread consensus in other common law jurisdictions that there is a broad range of misconduct that can found an action for misfeasance in a public office. For example, in Northern Territory of Australia v. Mengel (1995), 129 A.L.R. 1 (H.C.), Brennan J. wrote as follows, at p. 25:

The tort is not limited to an abuse of office by exercise of a statutory power. Henly v. Mayor of Lyme [(1828), 5 Bing. 91, 130 E.R. 995] was not a case arising from an impugned exercise of a statutory power. It arose from an alleged failure to maintain a sea wall or bank, the maintenance of which was a condition of the grant to the corporation of Lyme of the sea wall or bank and the appurtenant right to tolls. Any act or omission done or made by a public official in the purported performance of the functions of the office can found an action for misfeasance in public office. [Emphasis added.]

In Garrett v. Attorney-General, [1997] 2 N.Z.L.R. 332, the Court of Appeal for New Zealand considered an allegation that a sergeant failed to investigate properly the plaintiff's claim that she had been sexually assaulted by a police constable. Blanchard J. concluded, at p. 344, that the tort can be committed "by an official who acts or omits to act in breach of duty knowing about the breach and also knowing harm or loss is thereby likely to be occasioned to the plaintiff".

21 The House of Lords reached the same conclusion in Three Rivers District Council v. Bank of England (No. 3), [2000] 2 W.L.R. 1220. In Three Rivers, the plaintiffs alleged that officers with the Bank of England improperly issued a licence to the Bank of Credit and Commerce International and then failed to close the bank once it became evident that such action was necessary. Forced to consider whether the tort could apply in the case of omissions, the House of Lords concluded that "the tort can be constituted by an omission by a public officer as well as by acts on his part" (per Lord Hutton, at p. 1267). In Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom, it is equally clear that the tort of misfeasance is not limited to the unlawful [page281] exercise of a statutory or prerogative power actually held.

22 What then are the essential ingredients of the tort, at least insofar as it is necessary to determine the issues that arise on the pleadings in this case? In Three Rivers, the House of Lords held that the tort of misfeasance in a public office can arise in one of two ways, what I shall call Category A and Category B. Category A involves conduct that is specifically intended to injure a person or class of persons. Category B involves a public officer who acts with knowledge both that she or he has no power to do the act complained of and that the act is likely to injure the plaintiff. This understanding of the tort has been endorsed by a number of Canadian courts: see for example Powder Mountain Resorts, supra; Alberta (Minister of Public Works, Supply and Services) (C.A.), supra; and Granite Power Corp. v. Ontario, [2002] O.J. No. 2188 (QL) (S.C.J.). It is important, however, to recall that the two categories merely represent two different ways in which a public officer can commit the tort; in each instance, the plaintiff must prove each of the tort's constituent elements. It is thus necessary to consider the elements that are common to each form of the tort.

23 In my view, there are two such elements. First, the public officer must have engaged in deliberate and unlawful conduct in his or her capacity as a public officer. Second, the public officer must have been aware both that his or her conduct was unlawful and that it was likely to harm the plaintiff. What distinguishes one form of misfeasance in a public office from the other is the manner in which the plaintiff proves each ingredient of the tort. In Category B, the plaintiff must prove the two ingredients of the tort independently of one another. In Category A, the fact that the public officer has acted for the express purpose of harming the plaintiff is sufficient to satisfy each ingredient of the tort, owing to the fact that a public officer does not have the authority to exercise his or her powers for an improper purpose, such [page282] as deliberately harming a member of the public. In each instance, the tort involves deliberate disregard of official duty coupled with knowledge that the misconduct is likely to injure the plaintiff.

24 Insofar as the nature of the misconduct is concerned, the essential question to be determined is not whether the officer has unlawfully exercised a power actually possessed, but whether the alleged misconduct is deliberate and unlawful. As Lord Hobhouse wrote in Three Rivers, supra, at p. 1269:

The relevant act (or omission, in the sense described) must be unlawful. This may arise from a straightforward breach of the relevant statutory provisions or from acting in excess of the powers granted or for an improper purpose.

Lord Millett reached a similar conclusion, namely, that a failure to act can amount to misfeasance in a public office, but only in those circumstances in which the public officer is under a legal obligation to act. Lord Hobhouse stated the principle in the following terms, at p. 1269: "If there is a legal duty to act and the decision not to act amounts to an unlawful breach of that legal duty, the omission can amount to misfeasance [in a public office]." See also R. v. Dytham, [1979] Q.B. 722 (C.A.). So, in the United Kingdom, a failure to act can constitute misfeasance in a public office, but only if the failure to act constitutes a deliberate breach of official duty.

25 Canadian courts also have made a deliberate unlawful act a focal point of the inquiry. In Alberta (Minister of Public Works, Supply and Services) v. Nilsson (1999), 70 Alta. L.R. (3d) 267, 1999 ABQB 440, at para. 108, the Court of Queen's Bench stated that the essential question to be determined is whether there has been deliberate misconduct on the part of a public official. Deliberate misconduct, on this view, consists of: (i) an intentional illegal act; and (ii) an intent to harm an individual or class [page283] of individuals. See also Uni-Jet Industrial Pipe Ltd. v. Canada (Attorney General) (2001), 156 Man. R. (2d) 14, 2001 MBCA 40, in which Kroft J.A. adopted the same test. In Powder Mountain Resorts, supra, Newbury J.A. described the tort in similar terms, at para. 7:

... it may, I think, now be accepted that the tort of abuse of public office will be made out in Canada where a public official is shown either to have exercised power for the specific purpose of injuring the plaintiff (i.e., to have acted in "bad faith in the sense of the exercise of public power for an improper or ulterior motive") or to have acted "unlawfully with a mind of reckless indifference to the illegality of his act" and to the probability of injury to the plaintiff. (See Lord Steyn in Three Rivers, at [1231].) Thus there remains what in theory at least is a clear line between this tort on the one hand, and what on the other hand may be called negligent excess of power -- i.e., an act committed without knowledge of (or subjective recklessness as to) its unlawfulness and the probable consequences for the plaintiff. [Emphasis in original.]

Under this view, the ambit of the tort is limited not by the requirement that the defendant must have been engaged in a particular type of unlawful conduct, but by the requirement that the unlawful conduct must have been deliberate and the defendant must have been aware that the unlawful conduct was likely to harm the plaintiff.

26 As is often the case, there are a number of phrases that might be used to describe the essence of the tort. In Garrett, supra, Blanchard J. stated, at p. 350, that "[t]he purpose behind the imposition of this form of tortious liability is to prevent the deliberate injuring of members of the public by deliberate disregard of official duty." In Three Rivers, supra, Lord Steyn stated, at p. 1230, that "[t]he rationale of the tort is that in a legal system based on the rule of law executive or administrative power 'may be exercised only for the public good' and not for ulterior and improper purposes." As each passage makes clear, misfeasance in a public office is not directed at a public officer who inadvertently or negligently fails adequately to discharge the obligations of his or her office: see Three Rivers, at p. 1273, per Lord [page284] Millett. Nor is the tort directed at a public officer who fails adequately to discharge the obligations of the office as a consequence of budgetary constraints or other factors beyond his or her control. A public officer who cannot adequately discharge his or her duties because of budgetary constraints has not deliberately disregarded his or her official duties. The tort is not directed at a public officer who is unable to discharge his or her obligations because of factors beyond his or her control but, rather, at a public officer who could have discharged his or her public obligations, yet wilfully chose to do otherwise.

27 Another factor that may remove an official's conduct from the scope of the tort of misfeasance in a public office is a conflict with the officer's statutory obligations and his or her constitutionally protected rights, such as the right against self-incrimination. Should such circumstances arise, a public officer's decision not to comply with his or her statutory obligation may not amount to misfeasance in a public office. I need not decide that question here except that it could be argued. A public officer who properly insists on asserting his or her constitutional rights cannot accurately be said to have deliberately disregarded the legal obligations of his or her office. Under this argument, an obligation inconsistent with the officer's constitutional rights is not itself lawful.

28 As a matter of policy, I do not believe that it is necessary to place any further restrictions on the ambit of the tort. The requirement that the defendant must have been aware that his or her conduct was unlawful reflects the well-established principle that misfeasance in a public office requires an element of "bad faith" or "dishonesty". In a democracy, public officers must retain the authority to make decisions that, where appropriate, are adverse to the interests of certain citizens. Knowledge of harm is thus an insufficient basis on which to conclude that the defendant has acted in bad faith or dishonestly. A [page285] public officer may in good faith make a decision that she or he knows to be adverse to interests of certain members of the public. In order for the conduct to fall within the scope of the tort, the officer must deliberately engage in conduct that he or she knows to be inconsistent with the obligations of the office.

29 The requirement that the defendant must have been aware that his or her unlawful conduct would harm the plaintiff further restricts the ambit of the tort. Liability does not attach to each officer who blatantly disregards his or her official duty, but only to a public officer who, in addition, demonstrates a conscious disregard for the interests of those who will be affected by the misconduct in question. This requirement establishes the required nexus between the parties. Unlawful conduct in the exercise of public functions is a public wrong, but absent some awareness of harm there is no basis on which to conclude that the defendant has breached an obligation that she or he owes to the plaintiff, as an individual. And absent the breach of an obligation that the defendant owes to the plaintiff, there can be no liability in tort.

30 In sum, I believe that the underlying purpose of the tort is to protect each citizen's reasonable expectation that a public officer will not intentionally injure a member of the public through deliberate and unlawful conduct in the exercise of public functions. Once these requirements have been satisfied, it is unclear why the tort would be restricted to a public officer who engaged in the unlawful exercise of a statutory power that she or he actually possesses. If the tort were restricted in this manner, the tort would not extend to a public officer, such as Mr. Duplessis, who intentionally exceeded his powers for the express purpose of interfering with a citizen's economic interests. Nor would it extend to a public officer who breached a statutory obligation for the same purpose. But there is no principled reason, in my view, why a public officer who wilfully injures a member of the public [page286] through intentional abuse of a statutory power would be liable, but not a public officer who wilfully injures a member of the public through an intentional excess of power or a deliberate failure to discharge a statutory duty. In each instance, the alleged misconduct is equally inconsistent with the obligation of a public officer not to intentionally injure a member of the public through deliberate and unlawful conduct in the exercise of public functions.

31 I wish to stress that this conclusion is not inconsistent with R. v. Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, [1983] 1 S.C.R. 205, in which the Court established that the nominate tort of statutory breach does not exist. Saskatchewan Wheat Pool states only that it is insufficient that the defendant has breached the statute. It does not, however, establish that the breach of a statute cannot give rise to liability if the constituent elements of tortious responsibility have been satisfied. Put a different way, the mere fact that the alleged misconduct also constitutes a breach of statute is insufficient to exempt the officer from civil liability. Just as a public officer who breaches a statute might be liable for negligence, so too might a public officer who breaches a statute be liable for misfeasance in a public office. Saskatchewan Wheat Pool would only be relevant to this motion if the appellants had pleaded no more than a failure to discharge a statutory obligation. This, however, is not the case. The principle established in Saskatchewan Wheat Pool has no bearing on the outcome of the motion on this appeal.

32 To summarize, I am of the opinion that the tort of misfeasance in a public office is an intentional tort whose distinguishing elements are twofold: (i) deliberate unlawful conduct in the exercise of public functions; and (ii) awareness that the conduct is unlawful and likely to injure the plaintiff. Alongside deliberate unlawful conduct and the requisite knowledge, a plaintiff must also prove the other requirements common to all torts. More specifically, [page287] the plaintiff must prove that the tortious conduct was the legal cause of his or her injuries, and that the injuries suffered are compensable in tort law.

(2) Application to the Case at Hand

33 As outlined earlier, on a motion to strike on the basis that the statement of claim discloses no reasonable cause of action, the facts are taken as pleaded. Consequently, the primary question that arises on this appeal is whether the statement of claim pleads each of the constituent elements of the tort.

34 In respect of the first constituent element, namely, unlawful conduct in the exercise of public functions, the statement of claim alleges that the defendant officers did not cooperate with the SIU investigation, but, rather, took positive steps to frustrate the investigation. As described above, police officers are under a statutory obligation to cooperate fully with members of the SIU in the conduct of investigations, pursuant to s. 113(9) of the Police Services Act. On the face of it, the decision not to cooperate with an investigation constitutes an unlawful breach of statutory duty. Similarly, the alleged failure of the Chief to ensure that the defendant officers cooperated with the investigation also would seem to constitute an unlawful breach of duty. Under s. 41(1)(b) of the Police Services Act, the duties of a chief of police include ensuring that members of the police force carry out their duties in accordance with the Act. A decision not to ensure that police officers cooperate with the SIU is inconsistent with the statutory obligations of the office.

35 As discussed above, an obligation inconsistent with a public officer's constitutional rights cannot give rise to misfeasance in a public office. It is arguable that the statutory obligation to cooperate fully with the members of the SIU cannot trump a police officer's constitutional right against self-incrimination. I do not need to answer this question because it has not been argued that the SIU's requests were inconsistent with the officers' [page288] constitutional rights. Nor has it been argued that the alleged misconduct, which includes submitting inaccurate and misleading shift notes and disobeying an order to remain segregated, is privileged by the right against self-incrimination. As a consequence, it is not "plain and obvious" that the officers were faced with a stark choice between complying with the SIU's requests and abandoning their right against self-incrimination, either as a matter of fact or law. The potential conflict between the duty to cooperate with the SIU and the right against self-incrimination cannot be relied on to dismiss the action at this stage of the proceedings.

36 Insofar as the second requirement is concerned, the statement of claim alleges that the acts and omissions of the defendant officers "represented intentional breaches of their legal duties as police officers". This plainly satisfies the requirement that the officers were aware that the alleged failure to cooperate with the investigation was unlawful. The allegation is not simply that the officers failed to comply with s. 113(9) of the Police Services Act, but that the failure to comply was intentional and deliberate. Insofar as the Chief is concerned, the statement of claim alleges as follows:

- (i) Chief Boothby, through his legal counsel, was directed by S.I.U. officers to segregate the defendant officers and he deliberately failed to do so;
- (ii) Chief Boothby failed to ensure that defendant police officers produced timely and complete notes;
- (iii) Chief Boothby failed to ensure that the defendant police officers attended for requested interviews by S.I.U. in a timely manner; and
- (iv) Chief Boothby failed to ensure that the defendant police officers gave accurate and complete accounts of the specifics of the shooting incident.

37 Although the allegation that the Chief deliberately failed to segregate the officers satisfies the requirement that the Chief intentionally breached [page289] his legal obligation to ensure compliance with the Police Services Act, the same cannot be said of his alleged failure to ensure that the defendant officers produced timely and complete notes, attended for interviews in a timely manner, and provided accurate and complete accounts of the incident. As above, inadvertence or negligence will not suffice; a mere failure to discharge the obligations of the office cannot constitute misfeasance in a public office. In light of the allegation that the Chief's failure to segregate the officers was deliberate, this is not a sufficient basis on which to strike the pleading. Suffice it to say, the failure to issue orders for the purpose of ensuring that the defendant officers cooperated with the investigation will only constitute misfeasance in a public office if the plaintiffs prove that the Chief deliberately failed to comply with the standard established by s. 41(1)(b) of the Police Services Act.

38 The statement of claim also alleges that the defendant officers and the Chief "knew or ought to have known" that the alleged misconduct would cause the plaintiffs to suffer physically, psychologically and emotionally. Although the allegation that the defendants knew that a failure to cooperate with the investigation would injure the plaintiffs satisfies the requirement that the alleged misconduct was likely to injure the plaintiffs, misfeasance in a public office is an intentional tort that requires subjective awareness that harm to the plaintiff is a likely consequence of the alleged misconduct. At the very least, according to a number of cases, the defendant must have been subjectively reckless or wilfully blind as to the possibility that harm was a likely consequence of the alleged misconduct: see for example Three Rivers, supra; Powder Mountain Resorts, supra; and Alberta (Minister of Public Works, Supply and Services) (C.A.), supra. This, again, is not a sufficient basis on which to strike the pleading. It is clear, however, that the phrase "or ought to have known" must be struck from the statement of claim.

39 The final factor to be considered is whether the damages that the plaintiffs claim to have suffered as a consequence of the aforementioned misconduct are compensable. In the defendant officers' submission, the alleged damages are non-compensable. Consequently, it is their submission that even if the plaintiffs could prove the other elements of the tort, it still would be plain and obvious that the actions for misfeasance in a public office must fail.

40 In the defendant officers' submission, the essence of the plaintiffs' claim is that they were deprived of a thorough, competent and credible investigation. And owing to the fact that no individual has a private right to a thorough, competent and credible criminal investigation, the plaintiffs have suffered no compensable damages. If this were an accurate assessment of the plaintiffs' claim, I would agree. Individual citizens might desire a thorough investigation, or even that the investigation result in a certain outcome, but they are not entitled to compensation in the absence of a thorough investigation or if the desired outcome fails to materialize. This, however, is not an accurate assessment of the plaintiffs' submission. In their statement of claim, the plaintiffs also allege that they have suffered physically, psychologically and emotionally, in the form of mental distress, anger, depression and anxiety as a direct result of the defendant officers' failure to cooperate with the SIU.

41 Although courts have been cautious in protecting an individual's right to psychiatric well-being, compensation for damages of this kind is not foreign to tort law. As the law currently stands, that the appellant has suffered grief or emotional distress is insufficient. Nevertheless, it is well established that compensation for psychiatric damages is available in instances in which the plaintiff suffers from a "visible and provable illness" or "recognizable physical or psychopathological harm": see for example Guay v. Sun Publishing Co., [1953] 2 S.C.R. 216, and Frame v. Smith, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 99. Consequently, even if the plaintiffs could prove that they had suffered psychiatric damage, in the form of anxiety or [page291] depression, they still would have to prove both that it was caused by the alleged misconduct and that it was of sufficient magnitude to warrant compensation. But the causation and magnitude of psychiatric damage are matters to be determined at trial. At the pleadings stage, it is sufficient that the statement of claim alleges that the plaintiffs have suffered mental distress, anger, depression and anxiety as a consequence of the alleged misconduct.

42 In the final analysis, I would allow the appeal in respect of the actions for misfeasance in a public office. If the facts are taken as pleaded, it is not plain and obvious that the actions for misfeasance in a public office against the defendant officers and the Chief must fail. The plaintiffs may well face an uphill battle, but they should not be deprived of the opportunity to prove each of the constituent elements of the tort.

C. The Actions for Negligence

43 In addition to the actions for misfeasance in a public office, the statement of claim includes actions for negligence against the Chief, the Board and the Province. The essence of these claims is that the Chief, the Board and the Province are liable as a consequence of their failure to ensure that the defendant officers complied with s. 113(9) of the Police Services Act.

44 In order for an action in negligence to succeed, a plaintiff must be able to establish three things: (i) that the defendant owed the plaintiff a duty of care; (ii) that the defendant breached that duty of care; and (iii) that damages resulted from that breach. The primary question that arises on this appeal is in respect of the first element, namely, whether the defendants owed to the appellants a duty to take reasonable care to ensure that the defendant officers cooperated with the SIU investigation. If the defendants are under no such obligation, the actions for negligence cannot [page292] succeed. After discussing the general principles applicable to the duty of care analysis, I will go on to discuss this approach in the context of the negligence actions against the Chief, the Board and the Province. I will also address the defendants' submission that complained of harm is non-compensable.

(1) The Duty of Care

45 It is a well-established principle that a defendant is not liable in negligence unless the law exacts an obligation in the circumstances to take reasonable care. As Lord Esher concluded in Le Lievre v. Gould, [1893] 1 Q.B. 491 (C.A.), at p. 497, "[a] man is entitled to be as negligent as he pleases towards the whole world if he owes no duty to them." Duty may therefore be defined as an obligation, recognised by law, to take reasonable care to avoid conduct that entails an unreasonable risk of harm to others.

46 It is now well established in Canada that the existence of such a duty is to be determined in accordance with the two-step analysis first enunciated by the House of Lords in Anns v. Merton London Borough Council, [1978] A.C. 728, at pp. 751-52:

First one has to ask whether, as between the alleged wrongdoer and the person who has suffered damage there is a sufficient relationship of proximity or neighbourhood such that, in the reasonable contemplation of the former, carelessness on his part may be likely to cause damage to the latter -- in which case a prima facie duty of care arises. Secondly, if the first question is answered affirmatively, it is necessary to consider whether there are any considerations which ought to negative, or to reduce or limit the scope of the duty or the class of person to whom it is owed or the damages to which a breach of it may give rise.

47 The first stage of analysis, then, demands an inquiry into whether there is a sufficiently close relationship between the plaintiff and defendant that the defendant owes to the plaintiff a prima facie duty of care. The question of when such a duty arises is one with which this Court and others have repeatedly grappled since Lord Atkin enunciated the neighbour principle in Donoghue v. Stevenson, [1932] A.C. 562 (H.L.), at p. 580 :

The rule that you are to love your neighbour becomes in law, you must not injure your neighbour; and the lawyer's question, Who is my neighbour? receives a restricted reply. You must take reasonable care to avoid acts or omissions which you can reasonably foresee would be likely to injure your neighbour. Who, then, in law is my neighbour? The answer seems to be -- persons who are so closely and directly affected by my act that I ought reasonably to have them in contemplation as being so affected when I am directing my mind to the acts or omissions which are called in question.

As eloquently observed by Professor J. G. Fleming, this passage is a sacrosanct preamble to judicial disquisitions on duty, yet contains a fateful ambiguity: The Law of Torts (9th ed. 1998), at p. 151. More specifically, does the reference to persons so closely and directly affected by the conduct in question that the defendant ought reasonably to have had them in contemplation conflate foreseeability of harm and duty? Or does it require something in addition to foreseeability of harm?

48 In Cooper, supra, the Court clearly stated that the latter approach is the correct one. At para. 29 of their joint reasons, McLachlin C.J. and Major J. stated that there must be reasonable foreseeability of harm "plus something more". At para. 31, they concluded that this "something more" is proximity: in order to establish that the defendant owed the plaintiff a duty of care, the reasonable foreseeability of harm must be supplemented by proximity. It is only if harm is a [page294] reasonably foreseeable consequence of the conduct in question and there is a sufficient degree of proximity between the parties that a prima facie duty of care is established. The question that thus arises is what precisely is meant by the term proximity.

49 McLachlin C.J. and Major J. concluded, at para. 32, that the term "proximity" , in the context of negligence law, is used to describe the type of relationship in which a duty of care to guard against foreseeable harm may rightly be imposed. As this Court stated in Hercules Managements Ltd. v. Ernst & Young, [1997] 2 S.C.R. 165, at para. 24:

The label "proximity", as it was used by Lord Wilberforce in Anns, supra, was clearly intended to connote that the circumstances of the relationship inhering between the plaintiff and the defendant are of such a nature that the defendant may be said to be under an obligation to be mindful of the plaintiff's legitimate interests in conducting his or her affairs.

50 Consequently, the essential purpose of the inquiry is to evaluate the nature of that relationship in order to determine whether it is just and fair to impose a duty of care on the defendant. The factors that are relevant to this inquiry depend on the circumstances of the case. As stated by McLachlin J. (as she then was) in Norsk, supra, at p. 1151, "[p]roximity may be usefully viewed, not so much as a test in itself, but as a broad concept which is capable of subsuming different categories of cases involving different factors" (cited with approval in Hercules Managements, supra, at para. 23, and Cooper, supra, at para. 35). Examples of factors that might be relevant to the inquiry include the expectations of the parties, representations, reliance and the nature of the property or interest involved.

51 The second stage of the Anns test requires the trial judge to consider whether there exist any residual policy considerations that ought to negate or reduce the scope of the duty or the class of persons to whom it is owed. In Cooper, McLachlin C.J. [page295] and Major J. wrote, at para. 37, that this stage of the analysis is not concerned with the relationship between the parties but, rather, with the effect of recognizing a duty of care on other legal obligations, the legal system and society more generally. At this stage of the analysis, the question to be asked is whether there exist broad policy considerations that would make the imposition of a duty of care unwise, despite the fact that harm was a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the conduct in question and there was a sufficient degree of proximity between the parties that the imposition of a duty would not be unfair.

(2) Application of the Anns Test

52 The essence of the appellants' claim is that the Chief, the Board and the Province breached a duty to take reasonable care to ensure that the defendant officers complied with their legal obligation to cooperate with the SIU investigation. In order for this to give rise to an action in negligence, it must first be true that the defendants owed the appellants a duty to take such care. On the analysis above, this requires the Odhavji family to establish each of the following: (i) that the harm complained of is a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the alleged breach; (ii) that there is sufficient proximity between the parties that it would not be unjust or unfair to impose a duty of care on the defendants; and (iii) that there exist no policy reasons to negate or otherwise restrict that duty. If the defendants did not owe such a duty to the appellants, it is plain and obvious that the actions for negligence cannot succeed.

(i) Police Chief Boothby

53 The conclusion that the harm complained of is a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the Chief's conduct is dependent on the prior conclusion that it is a reasonably foreseeable consequence of an inadequate investigation into the shooting incident. [page296] If it is not reasonably foreseeable that the plaintiffs would suffer psychiatric harm as a consequence of an inadequate investigation into the incident, it is not reasonably foreseeable that the Chief's failure to ensure that the defendant officers' failure to cooperate with the SIU would injure the plaintiffs.

54 It is not immediately clear, in my view, that this initial threshold has been satisfied. Although it is to be expected that an inadequate investigation would distress or anger the close relatives of Mr. Odhavji, it is less obvious that this distress or anger would rise to the level of compensable psychiatric harm. Nevertheless, I do not think it "plain and obvious" that such harm is an unforeseeable consequence of the defendant officers' failure to cooperate with the investigation. The task might be a difficult one, but the appellants should not be deprived of the opportunity to prove that the complained of harm is a reasonably foreseeable consequence of a truncated or otherwise inadequate investigation into the shooting incident. It is reasonably foreseeable that the officers' failure to cooperate with the SIU investigation would harm the appellants. As the Chief was responsible for ensuring that the officers cooperated with the SIU investigation, it is reasonably foreseeable that the Chief's failure to do so would also harm the appellants.

55 The next question that arises is whether there is sufficient proximity between the parties that a duty of care may rightly be imposed on the Chief. It may be that the appellants can show that it was reasonably foreseeable that the alleged misconduct would result in psychiatric harm, but foreseeability alone is an insufficient basis on which to establish a prima facie duty of care. In addition to showing foreseeability, the appellants must establish that it is just and fair to impose on the Chief a private law obligation to ensure that the defendant officers cooperated with the SIU. A broad range of factors may be relevant to this inquiry, including a close causal connection, the parties' expectations and any assumed or imposed obligations. See for example Norsk, supra, at p. 1153; Martel Building Ltd. v. Canada, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 860, [page297] 2000 SCC 60, at paras. 51-52; and Cooper, supra, at para. 35.

56 In the present case, one factor that supports a finding of proximity is the relatively direct causal link between the alleged misconduct and the complained of harm. As discussed above, the duties of a chief of police include ensuring that the members of the force carry out their duties in accordance with the provisions of the Police Services Act. In those instances in which a member of the public is injured as a consequence of police misconduct, there is an extremely close causal connection between the negligent supervision and the resultant injury: the failure of the chief of police to ensure that the members of the force carry out their duties in accordance with the provisions of the Police Services Act leads directly to the police misconduct, which, in turn, leads directly to the complained of harm. The failure of the Chief to ensure the defendant officers cooperated with the SIU is thus but one step removed from the complained of harm. Although a close causal connection is not a condition precedent of liability, it strengthens the nexus between the parties.

57 A second factor that strengthens the nexus between the Chief and the Odhavjis is the fact that members of the public reasonably expect a chief of police to be mindful of the injuries that might arise as a consequence of police misconduct. Although the vast majority of police officers in our country exercise their powers responsibly, members of the force have a significant capacity to affect members of the public adversely through improper conduct in the exercise of police functions. It is only reasonable that members of the public vulnerable to the consequences of police misconduct would expect that a chief of police would take reasonable care to prevent, or at least to discourage, members of the force from injuring members of the public through improper conduct in the exercise of police functions.

58 Finally, I also believe it noteworthy that this expectation is consistent with the statutory obligations [page298] that s. 41(1)(b) of the Police Services Act imposes on the Chief. Under s. 41(1)(b), the Chief is under a freestanding statutory obligation to ensure that the members of the force carry out their duties in accordance with the provisions of the Police Services Act and the needs of the community. This includes an obligation to ensure that members of the police force do not injure members of the public through misconduct in the exercise of police functions. The fact that the Chief already is under a duty to ensure compliance with an SIU investigation adds substantial weight to the position that it is neither unjust nor unfair to conclude that the Chief owed to the plaintiffs a duty of care to ensure that the defendant officers did, in fact, cooperate with the SIU investigation.

59 In light of the above factors, I conclude that the circumstances of the case satisfy the first stage of the Anns test and raise a prima facie duty of care. If it is reasonably foreseeable that the defendant officers' decision not to cooperate with the SIU would injure the plaintiffs, a private law obligation to ensure that the officers cooperate with the SIU is rightly imposed on the Chief. Consequently, the only issue that is left to consider is whether there exist any broad policy considerations that ought to negative the prima facie obligation of the Chief to prevent the misconduct.

60 Counsel for the Chief submits that imposing a private law duty on the Chief to ensure that the officers cooperate with the investigation would compromise the independence of the SIU. It is difficult to see how this is the case, particularly as the Chief already is under a statutory obligation to ensure such cooperation. Imposing a duty of care on the Chief to ensure that members of the force cooperate with the SIU would have no bearing on the capacity of the SIU to determine how or in what circumstances to conduct such an investigation. Counsel for the Chief also submits that another factor to consider is the availability of alternative remedies, namely, the public complaints process that allows members of the public to complain in respect of the conduct of [page299] a police officer. What the appellants seek, though, is not the opportunity to file a complaint that might result in the imposition of disciplinary sanctions but, rather, compensation for the psychological harm that they have suffered as a consequence of the Chief's inadequate supervision. The public complaints process is no alternative to liability in negligence.

61 In short, I believe that it would be inappropriate to strike the action for negligent supervision against the Chief on the basis that he did not owe the plaintiffs a duty of care. If the plaintiffs can establish that the complained of harm is a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the Chief's failure to ensure that the defendant officers cooperated with the SIU, the Chief was under a private law duty of care to take reasonable care to prevent such misconduct. The cross-appeal against the Court of Appeal's decision to allow the action in negligence against Police Chief Boothby to proceed is therefore dismissed.

(ii) Metropolitan Toronto Police Services Board

62 The plaintiffs do not allege that the Board was under a private law obligation to ensure that the defendant officers in this appeal cooperated with the SIU investigation into the allegedly wrongful death of Mr. Odhavji. Rather, the basis of the action is that the Board breached a duty of care to ensure that police officers, as a matter of general practice, cooperate with SIU investigations. The duty of care is owed not to the Odhavjis in particular, but to the family of a person harmed by the police.

63 The first question to answer is whether it is reasonably foreseeable that the family of a person harmed by the police would suffer acute anxiety or depression as a consequence of the Board's failure to enact additional policies or training procedures for the purpose of ensuring that police officers cooperate with the SIU. But, once again, foreseeability [page300] alone is insufficient. Even if it is reasonably foreseeable that the Board's decision not to enact additional procedures would exacerbate the allegedly systematic failure of the police officers to cooperate with the SIU, and that this, in turn, would cause the families of persons harmed by the police to suffer psychiatric harm, it still must be determined whether the Board is under a private law duty to ensure that members of the force, as a matter of general practice, cooperate with the SIU. For the reasons that follow, I am of the view that the Board is under no such duty.

64 The first factor that I consider is the lack of a close causal connection between the alleged misconduct and the complained of harm. As discussed earlier, the fact that a chief of police is in a direct supervisory relationship with members of the force gives rise to a certain propinquity between the Chief and the Odhavjis; the close connection between the Chief's inadequate supervision and the officers' subsequent failure to cooperate with the SIU establishes a nexus between the Chief and the individuals who are injured as a consequence of the officers' misconduct. The Board, however, is much further in the background than the Chief. Unlike the Chief, the Board does not directly involve itself in the day-to-day conduct of police officers, but, rather, implements general policy and monitors the performance of the various chiefs of police. The Board does not supervise members of the force, but, rather, supervises the Chief (who, in turn, supervises members of the force). This lack of involvement in the day-to-day conduct of the police force weakens substantially the nexus between the Board and members of the public injured as a consequence of police misconduct.

65 A second factor that distinguishes the Board from the Chief is the absence of a statutory obligation to ensure that members of the police force cooperate with the SIU. As discussed earlier, the express duties of the Chief include ensuring that members of the force comply with s. 113(9) of the Police Services Act. Under s. 31(1), the Board is responsible for the provision of adequate and effective police services, but is not under an express [page301] obligation to ensure that members of the force carry out their duties in accordance with the Police Services Act. The absence of such an obligation is consistent with the general tenor of s. 31(1), which provides the Board with a broad degree of discretion to determine the policies and procedures that are necessary to provide adequate and effective police services. A few enumerated exceptions aside, the Board is free to determine what objectives to pursue, and what policies to enact in pursuit of those objectives.

66 It is possible, I concede, that circumstances might arise in which the Board is required to address a particular problem in order to discharge its statutory obligation to provide adequate and effective police services. If there was evidence, for example, of a widespread problem in respect of the excessive use of force in the detention of visible minorities, the Board arguably is under a positive obligation to combat racism and the resultant use of excessive force. But as a general matter, courts should be loath to interfere with the Board's broad discretion to determine what objectives and priorities to pursue, or what policies to enact in pursuit of those objectives. Suffice it to say, the Board's decision not to enact additional policies or training procedures in respect of s. 113(9) does not constitute a breach of its obligation to provide "adequate and effective" police services.

67 Considered against this backdrop, I conclude that the circumstances of the relationship inhering between the plaintiff and the defendant are not such that a duty of care to ensure that members of the police force cooperate with the SIU may rightly be imposed. The appeal against the Court of Appeal's decision to strike the action against the Board is dismissed.

(iii) The Province

68 As with the Board, the plaintiffs do not allege that the Province, through the Solicitor General, was under a private law obligation to ensure that [page302] the defendant officers in this appeal cooperated with the investigation into the allegedly wrongful death of Mr. Odhavji. Rather, the basis of the action is that the Province breached a private law obligation to institute policies and training procedures for the purpose of ensuring that members of the force, as a matter of general practice, cooperate with the SIU. Owing to the fact that my conclusions in respect of the action against the Province mirror my conclusions in respect of the action against the Board, the following analysis is fairly brief.

69 As above, I am not certain that it is reasonably foreseeable that the Solicitor General's decision not to institute further policies and training procedures in respect of s. 113(9) would cause the families of persons harmed by the police to suffer compensable psychiatric harm. This, however, is a matter that is properly addressed at trial. But even if it is reasonably foreseeable that the failure of the Solicitor General to institute further policies and training procedures in respect of s. 113(9) would cause the families of persons harmed by the police to suffer compensable psychiatric harm, there is insufficient proximity between the parties to conclude that the Province is under a private law obligation to ensure that members of the force comply with s. 113(9) of the Police Services Act.

70 Like the Board, the Province is not directly involved in the day-to-day conduct of members of the police force. Whereas the Police Chief is in a direct supervisory relationship with members of the force, the Solicitor General's involvement in the conduct of police officers is limited to a general obligation to monitor boards and police forces to ensure that adequate and effective police services are provided and to develop and promote programs to enhance professional police practices, standards and training. Like the Board, the Province is very much in the background, perhaps even more so. The lack of any direct involvement in the day-to-day conduct of members of the force substantially weakens the nexus between the Province and the [page303] plaintiffs. The Province simply is too far removed from the day-to-day conduct of members of the force to be under a private law obligation to ensure that members of the force cooperate with the SIU.

71 This lack of any direct involvement in the day-to-day conduct of police officers is compounded by the fact that the responsible minister is not under a statutory obligation to ensure that police officers cooperate with the SIU. Under s. 3(2) of the Police Services Act, the Solicitor General is under a general duty to monitor police forces to ensure that adequate and effective police services are provided. It is not, however, under an obligation to ensure that members of the force carry out their duties in accordance with the Police Services Act and the needs of the community. Although I do not foreclose the possibility that s. 3(2) might give rise to a statutory obligation to address widespread or systemic misconduct of a particularly serious nature, the circumstances of this case do not give rise to such an obligation. The Solicitor General's decision not to enact additional policies or training procedures in respect of s. 113(9) does not constitute a breach of his duty to ensure that the Board provides "adequate and effective" police services in the municipality.

72 For the above reasons, it is my conclusion that the Province does not owe to the plaintiffs a duty of care. Absent a more direct involvement in the day-to-day conduct of police officers or a statutory obligation to ensure that members of the force comply with s. 113(9), it would be improper to impose on the Province a private law obligation to ensure that members of the police force cooperate with the SIU. The appeal against the Court of Appeal's decision to strike the action against the Province is dismissed.

(3) Damages

73 The final factor to consider is the defendants' submission that the alleged injuries are non-compensable. Consequently, it is their submission [page304] that even if it is established that the defendants owed the plaintiffs a duty of care, it is still plain and obvious that the actions for negligence must fail.

74 As discussed in the context of the actions for misfeasance in a public office, courts have been cautious in protecting an individual's right to psychiatric well-being, but it is well established that compensation for psychiatric damages is available in instances in which the plaintiff suffers a "visible and provable illness" or "recognizable physical or psychopathological harm". At the pleadings stage, it is sufficient that the statement of claim alleges mental distress, anger, depression and anxiety as a consequence of the defendant's negligence. Causation and the magnitude of psychiatric damage are matters to be determined at trial.

D. The Court of Appeal's Costs Award

75 A final issue to consider is the Court of Appeal's decision to follow the usual rule that the successful party is entitled to costs. In the plaintiffs' submission, it was improper for the Court of Appeal to award costs to the defendant officers and the Province. By the consent of the parties, a "no-costs" order was made in respect of the actions against the Chief and the Board. The plaintiffs submit that they are public interest litigants and should not have been required to pay costs.

76 Although circumstances might arise in which there are cogent arguments for departing from the normal cost rules, I have difficulty conceptualizing the plaintiffs in the present appeal as public interest litigants. In the plaintiffs' own submissions, there are typically two types of public interest litigants: (i) litigants who have no direct pecuniary or other material interest in the proceedings (e.g., a non-profit organization); and (ii) litigants who do have a pecuniary interest, but whose interest is modest in comparison to the cost of the proceedings. The plaintiffs in the present case do not fit into either [page305] category -- and thus do not fit their own definition of a public interest litigant. Indeed, it is difficult to regard a plaintiff who is seeking several millions of dollars in damages as a public interest litigant. The fact that the actions involve public authorities and raise issues of public interest is insufficient to alter the essential nature of the litigation.

77 Moreover, under rule 57.01(1) of the Rules of Civil Procedure, costs awarded in a proceeding are a matter of discretion for the court. Consequently, this Court should not interfere with a lower court's exercise of that discretion unless there is a clear and compelling reason for doing so. See for example B. (R.) v. Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, [1995] 1 S.C.R. 315. In the present case, there is no such basis on which to interfere with the Court of Appeal's decision to award costs in accordance with the usual rule that the successful party is entitled to costs.

V. Disposition

78 In the result, the appeal against the Court of Appeal's decision to strike the actions for misfeasance in a public office is allowed. The judgment of the Court of Appeal is set aside, and an order will issue striking the phrase "or ought to have known" from the amended statement of claim. The cross-appeal against the Court of Appeal's decision to allow the action in negligence in respect of the SIU investigation against the Chief to proceed is dismissed, as is the appeal against the Court of Appeal's decision to strike the actions in negligence in respect of the SIU investigation against the Board and the Province. Although success has been divided, the plaintiffs have achieved a significant success in respect of the actions against the defendant officers and the Chief. Accordingly, I would award costs to the plaintiffs in this Court.

ON APPEAL FROM THE FEDERAL COURT OF APPEAL

* Ritchie J. took no part in the judgment.

Case Summary

Constitutional law — Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms — Right to life, liberty and security of person — U.S. cruise missile testing in Canada — Testing alleged to increase risk of nuclear war in violation of that right — Motion to strike out — Whether or not facts as alleged in violation of Charter — Canadian [page442] Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 1, 7, 24(1), 32(1)(a) — Constitution Act, 1982, s. 52(1).

Jurisdiction — Judicial review — Cabinet decision relating to national defence and external affairs — Whether or not decision reviewable by courts.

Practice — Motion to strike — U.S. cruise missile tests alleged to increase risk of nuclear war in violation of s. 7 of Charter — Whether or not statement of claim should be struck out — Whether or not statement of claim can be amended before statement of defence filed — Federal Court Rules, Rules 419(1), 421, 1104, 1723.

This appeal is from a judgment of the Federal Court of Appeal which allowed respondents' appeal from a judgment dismissing their motion to strike out the appellants' statement of claim.

Appellants alleged that a decision made by the Government of Canada to allow the United States to test cruise missiles in Canada violated s. 7 of the Charter. The development of the cruise missile, it was argued, heightened the risk of nuclear war and the increased American military presence and interest in Canada as a result of the testing allegedly made Canada more likely to be a target for nuclear attack. Declaratory relief, an injunction and damages were sought.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

Per Dickson C.J., Estey, McIntyre, Chouinard and Lamer JJ.: The appellants' statement of claim should be struck out and their cause of action dismissed. The statement of claim does not disclose facts which, if taken as true, would prove that the Canadian government's decision to permit the testing of the cruise missile in Canada could cause a violation or a threat of violation of their rights under s. 7 of the Charter.

The principal allegation of the statement of claim is that the testing of the cruise missile in Canada poses a threat to the lives and security of Canadians by increasing the risk of nuclear conflict and thereby violates the right to life, liberty and security of the person. This alleged violation of s. 7 turns upon an actual increase in the risk of nuclear war resulting from the federal cabinet's decision to permit the testing. This allegation is premised upon assumptions and hypotheses about how independent and sovereign nations, operating in an international arena of uncertainty and change, will react to the Canadian government's decision to permit the testing of the cruise. Since the foreign policy decisions of independent nations are not capable of prediction on the [page443] basis of evidence to any degree of certainty approaching probability, the nature of the reaction to the federal cabinet's decision to permit the testing can only be a matter of speculation. The appellants could never prove the causal link between the decision to permit the testing and the increase in the threat of nuclear conflict.

Cabinet decisions are reviewable by the Courts under s. 32(1)(a) of the Charter and the executive branch of the Canadian government bears a general duty to act in accordance with the dictates of the Charter. The decision to permit the testing of the cruise missile cannot be considered contrary to the duties of the executive since the possible effects of this government action are matters of mere speculation. Section 7 could only give rise to a duty on the part of the executive to refrain from permitting the testing if it could be said that a deprivation of life or security of the person could be proven to result from the impugned government act.

Per Wilson J.: The government's decision to allow the testing of the U.S. cruise missile in Canada, even although an exercise of the royal prerogative, was reviewable by the courts under s. 32(1)(a) of the Charter. It was not insulated from review because it was a "political question" since the Court had a constitutional obligation under s. 24 of the Charter to decide whether any particular act of the executive violated or threatened to violate any right of the citizen.

On a motion to strike out a statement of claim as disclosing no reasonable cause of action, the court must take the allegations of fact therein as proved. If such allegations raise a justiciable issue the court cannot abdicate its responsibility for review on the basis of anticipated problems of proof.

This statement of claim was struck, notwithstanding the general hesitancy of the courts to strike, because the facts disclosed no reasonable cause of action (1) under s. 24(1) of the Charter, (2) under s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 or (3) under the common law power to grant declaratory relief. To succeed in their claim for relief under s. 24 of the Charter the plaintiffs would have to establish a violation or threat of violation of their right under s. 7 of the Charter. To obtain a declaration of unconstitutionality under s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, the plaintiffs would have to show that the government's decision to test the cruise missile in Canada was inconsistent with their right [page444] under s. 7. To obtain declaratory relief at common law, they would have to establish a violation or threatened violation of their right under s. 7.

The government's decision to test the cruise missile in Canada does not give rise to a violation or threatened violation of the plaintiffs' right under s. 7. Even an independent, substantive right to life, liberty and security of the person cannot be absolute. It must take account of the corresponding rights of others and of the right of the state to protect the collectivity as well as the individual against external threats. The central concern of the section is direct impingement by government upon the life, liberty and personal security of individual citizens. It does not extend to incidental effects of governmental action in the field of inter-state relations.

There is at the very least a strong presumption that governmental action concerning the relation of the state with other states, and not directed at any member of the immediate political community, was never intended to be caught by s. 7 even although such action may incidentally increase the risk of death or injury that individuals generally have to face.

Section 1 of the Charter was not called into operation here given the finding that the facts as alleged could not constitute a violation of s. 7.

Since the application to amend the statement of claim was filed after the Crown instituted its appeal, the application was made "during the pendency of an appeal" to which the Rules of the Federal Court of Appeal applied. Appellants' right under Rule 421 had therefore expired and their only recourse was to proceed under Rule 1104.

The judgment of Dickson C.J., Estey, McIntyre, Chouinard and Lamer JJ. was delivered by

DICKSON J.

1 This case arises out of the appellants' challenge under s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms to the decision of the federal cabinet to permit the testing of the cruise missile by the United States of America in Canadian territory. The issue that must be addressed is whether the appellants' statement of claim should be struck out, before trial, as disclosing no reasonable cause of action. In their statement of claim, the appellants seek: (i) a declaration that the decision to permit the testing of the cruise missile is unconstitutional; (ii) injunctive relief to prohibit the testing; and (iii) damages. Cattanaach J. of the Federal Court, Trial Division, refused the respondents' motion to strike. The Federal Court of Appeal unanimously allowed the respondents' appeal, struck out the statement of claim and dismissed the appellants' action.

2 The facts and procedural history of this case are fully set out and discussed in the reasons for judgment of Madame Justice Wilson. I agree with Madame Justice Wilson that the appellants' statement of claim should be struck out and this appeal dismissed. I have reached this conclusion, however, on the basis of reasons which differ somewhat from those of Madame Justice Wilson.

3 In my opinion, if the appellants are to be entitled to proceed to trial, their statement of claim must disclose facts, which, if taken as true, would show that the action of the Canadian government could cause an infringement of their rights under s. 7 of the Charter. I have concluded that the causal link between the actions of the Canadian government, and the alleged violation of appellants' rights under the Charter is simply too uncertain, speculative and hypothetical to sustain a cause of action. Thus, although decisions of the federal cabinet are reviewable by the courts under the Charter, and the government bears a general [page448] duty to act in accordance with the Charter's dictates, no duty is imposed on the Canadian government by s. 7 of the Charter to refrain from permitting the testing of the cruise missile.

4 The relevant portion of the appellants' statement of claim is found in paragraph 7 thereof. The deprivation of s. 7 Charter rights alleged by the appellants and the facts they advance to support this deprivation are described as follows:

7. The plaintiffs state and the fact is that the testing of the cruise missile in Canada is a violation of the collective rights of the Plaintiffs and their members and all Canadians, specifically their right to security of the person and life in that:
 - (a) the size and eventual dispersion of the air-launched cruise missile is such that the missile cannot be detected by surveillance satellites, thus making verification of the extent of this nuclear weapons system impossible;
 - (b) with the impossibility of verification, the future of nuclear weapons' control and limitation agreements is completely undermined as any such agreements become practically unenforceable;
 - (c) the testing of the air-launched cruise missiles would result in an increased American military presence and interest in Canada which would result in making Canada more likely to be the target of a nuclear attack;
 - (d) as the cruise missile cannot be detected until approximately eight minutes before it reaches its target, a "Launch on Warning" system would be necessary in order to respond to the cruise missile thereby eliminating effective human discretion and increasing the likelihood of either a pre-emptive strike or an accidental firing, or both;
 - (e) the cruise missile is a military weapon, the development of which will have the effect of a needless and dangerous escalation of the nuclear arms race, thus endangering the security and lives of all people.

Section 7 of the Charter provides in English:

7. Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof [page449] except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

and in French:

7. Chacun a droit à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de sa personne; il ne peut être porté atteinte à ce droit qu'en conformité avec les principes de justice fondamentale.

5 Before turning to an examination of the appellants' allegations concerning the results of the decision to permit testing and its consequences on their rights under s. 7, I think it would be useful to examine the principles governing the striking out of a statement of claim and dismissal of a cause of action.

- (a) Striking Out a Statement of Claim

6 The respondents, by a motion pursuant to Rule 419(1)(a) of the Federal Court Rules, moved for an order to strike out the appellants' statement of claim as disclosing no reasonable cause of action. Rule 419(1)(a) reads as follows:

Rule 419.(1) The Court may at any stage of an action order any pleading to be struck out, with or without leave to amend, on the ground that

- (a) it discloses no reasonable cause of action or defence, as the case may be, ...

7 The most recent and authoritative statement of the principle applicable to determine when a statement of claim may be struck out is that of Estey J. in Attorney General of Canada v. Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, [1980] 2 S.C.R. 735, at p. 740:

As I have said, all the facts pleaded in the statement of claim must be deemed to have been proven. On a motion such as this a court should, of course, dismiss the action or strike out any claim made by the plaintiff only in plain and obvious cases and where the court is satisfied that "the case is beyond doubt": Ross v. Scottish Union and National Insurance Co. (1920), 47 O.L.R. 308 (App. Div.)

8 Madame Justice Wilson in her reasons in the present case summarized the relevant principles as follows:

The law then would appear to be clear. The facts pleaded are to be taken as proved. When so taken, the [page450] question is do they disclose a reasonable cause of action, i.e. a cause of action "with some chance of success" (Drummond-Jackson v. British Medical Association, [1970] 1 All E.R. 1094) or, as Le Dain J. put it in Dowson v. Government of Canada (1981), 37 N.R. 127 (F.C.A.), at p. 138, is it "plain and obvious that the action cannot succeed".

9 I agree with Madame Justice Wilson that, regardless of the basis upon which the appellants advance their claim for declaratory relief -- whether it be s. 24(1) of the Charter, s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982, or the common law - they must at least be able to establish a threat of violation, if not an actual violation, of their rights under the Charter.

10 In short then, for the appellants to succeed on this appeal, they must show that they have some chance of proving that the action of the Canadian government has caused a violation or a threat of violation of their rights under the Charter.

(b) The Allegations of the Statement of Claim

11 The principal allegation of the statement of claim is that the testing of the cruise missile in Canada poses a threat to the lives and security of Canadians by increasing the risk of nuclear conflict, and thus violates the right to life, liberty and security of the person guaranteed by s. 7 of the Charter.

12 As a preliminary matter, it should be noted that the exact nature of the deprivation of life and security of the person that the appellants rely upon as the legal foundation for the violation of s. 7 they allege is not clear. There seem to be two possibilities. The violation could be the result of actual deprivation of life and security of the person that would occur in the event of a nuclear attack on Canada, or it could be the result of general insecurity experienced by all people in Canada as a result of living under the increased threat of nuclear war.

13 The first possibility is apparent on a literal reading of the statement of claim. The second possibility, however, appears to be more consistent with the appellants' submission at p. 31 of their factum, that:

[page451]

... at the minimum, the above allegations show [in paragraph 7 of the statement of claim] that there is a "threat" to the life and security of the Appellants which "threat", depending upon the construction of the concept "infringe" or "deny" in Section 7 [sic], could arguably constitute an infringement of the person. The amendment to the Statement of Claim, rejected by the Court of Appeal, would have made the infringement or denial more explicit when it states: "The very testing of the cruise missile per se in Canada endangers the Charter of Rights and Freedoms Section 7:(sic) Rights".

14 I believe that we are obliged to read the statement of claim as generously as possible and to accommodate any inadequacies in the form of the allegations which are merely the result of drafting deficiencies.

15 Thus, I am prepared to accept that the appellants intended both of these possible deprivations as a basis for the violation of s. 7. It is apparent, however, that the violation of s. 7 alleged turns upon an actual increase in the risk of nuclear war, resulting from the federal cabinet's decision to permit the testing of the cruise missile. Thus, to succeed at trial, the appellants would have to demonstrate, inter alia, that the testing of the cruise missile would cause an increase in the risk of nuclear war. It is precisely this link between the Cabinet decision to permit the testing of the cruise and the increased risk of nuclear war which, in my opinion, they cannot establish. It will not be necessary therefore to address the issue of whether the deprivations of life and security of the person advanced by the appellants could constitute violations of s. 7.

16 As I have noted, both interpretations of the nature of the infringement of the appellants' rights are founded on the premise that if the Canadian government allows the United States government to test the cruise missile system in Canada, then there will be an increased risk of nuclear war. Such a claim can only be based on the assumption that the net result of all of the various foreign powers' reactions to the testing of the cruise missile in Canada will be an increased risk of nuclear war.

17 The statement of claim speaks of weapons control agreements being "practically unenforceable", Canada being "more likely to be the target of a nuclear attack", "increasing the likelihood of either a pre-emptive strike or an accidental firing, or both", and "escalation of the nuclear arms race". All of these eventualities, culminating in the increased risk of nuclear war, are alleged to flow from the Canadian Government's single act of allowing the United States to test the cruise missile in Canada.

18 Since the foreign policy decisions of independent and sovereign nations are not capable of prediction, on the basis of evidence, to any degree of certainty approaching probability, the nature of such reactions can only be a matter of speculation; the causal link between the decision of the Canadian government to permit the testing of the cruise and the results that the appellants allege could never be proven.

19 An analysis of the specific allegations of the statement of claim reveals that they are all contingent upon the possible reactions of the nuclear powers to the testing of the cruise missile in Canada. The gist of paragraphs (a) and (b) of the statement of claim is that verification of the cruise missile system is impossible because the missile cannot be detected by surveillance satellites, and that, therefore, arms control agreements will be unenforceable. This is based on two major assumptions as to how foreign powers will react to the development of the cruise missile: first, that they will not develop new types of surveillance satellites or new methods of verification, and second, that foreign powers will not establish new modes of co-operation for dealing with the problem of enforcement. With respect to the latter of these points, it is just as plausible that lack of verification would have the effect of enhancing enforceability than of undermining it, since an inability on the part of nuclear powers to verify systems like the cruise could precipitate a system of enforcement [page453] based on co-operation rather than surveillance.

20 As for paragraph (c), even if it were the case that the testing of the air-launched cruise missile would result in an increased American military presence and interest in Canada, to say that this would make Canada more likely to be the target of a nuclear attack is to assume certain reactions of hostile foreign powers to such an increased American presence. It also makes an assumption about the degree to which Canada is already a possible target of nuclear attack. Given the impossibility of determining how an independent sovereign nation might react, it can only be a matter of hypothesis whether an increased American presence would make Canada more vulnerable to nuclear attack. It would not be possible to prove it one way or the other.

21 Paragraph (d) assumes that foreign states will not develop their technology in such a way as to meet the requirements of effective detection of the cruise and that there will therefore be an increased likelihood of pre-emptive strike or an accidental firing, or both. Again, this assumption concerns how foreign powers are likely to act in response to the development of the cruise. It would be just as plausible to argue that foreign states would improve their technology with respect to detection of missiles, thereby decreasing the likelihood of accidental firing or pre-emptive strike.

22 Finally, paragraph (e) asserts that the development of the cruise will lead to an escalation of the nuclear arms race. This again involves speculation based on assumptions as to how foreign powers will react. One could equally argue that the cruise would be the precipitating factor in compelling the nuclear powers to negotiate agreements that would lead to a de-escalation of the nuclear arms race.

23 One final assumption, common to all the paragraphs except (c), is that the result of testing of the cruise missile in Canada will be its development [page454] by the United States. In all of these paragraphs, the alleged harm flows from the production and eventual deployment of the cruise missile. The effect that the testing will have on the development and deployment of the cruise can only be a matter of speculation. It is possible that as a result of the tests, the Americans would decide not to develop and deploy the cruise since the very reason for the testing is to establish whether the missile is a viable weapons system. Similarly, it is possible that the Americans would develop the cruise missile even if testing were not permitted by the Canadians.

24 In the final analysis, exactly what the Americans will decide to do about development and deployment of the cruise missile, whether tested in Canada or not, is a decision that they, as an independent and sovereign nation, will make for themselves. Even with the assistance of qualified experts, a court could only speculate on how the American government may make this decision, and how important a factor the results of the testing of the cruise in Canada will be in that decision.

25 What can be concluded from this analysis of the statement of claim is that all of its allegations, including the ultimate assertion of an increased likelihood of nuclear war, are premised on assumptions and hypotheses about how independent and sovereign nations, operating in an international arena of radical uncertainty, and continually changing circumstances, will react to the Canadian government's decision to permit the testing of the cruise missile.

26 The point of this review is not to quarrel with the allegations made by the appellants about the results of cruise missile testing. They are, of course, entitled to their opinion and belief. Rather, I wish to highlight that they are raising matters that, in my opinion, lie in the realm of conjecture, rather than fact. In brief, it is simply not possible for a court, even with the best available evidence, to do more than speculate upon the likelihood of the federal cabinet's decision to test the cruise missile resulting in an increased threat of nuclear war.

(c) The Rule that Facts in a Statement of Claim Must be Taken as Proven

27 We are not, in my opinion, required by the principle enunciated in Inuit Tapirisat, supra, to take as true the appellants' allegations concerning the possible consequences of the testing of the cruise missile. The rule that the material facts in a statement of claim must be taken as true for the purpose of determining whether it discloses a reasonable cause of action does not require that allegations based on assumptions and speculations be taken as true. The very nature of such an allegation is that it cannot be proven to be true by the adduction of evidence. It would, therefore, be improper to accept that such an allegation is true. No violence is done to the rule where allegations, incapable of proof, are not taken as proven.

II

The Cabinet's Decision to Permit the Testing of the Cruise Missile and the Application of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms

(a) Application of the Charter to Cabinet Decisions

28 I agree with Madame Justice Wilson that cabinet decisions fall under s. 32(1)(a) of the Charter and are therefore reviewable in the courts and subject to judicial scrutiny for compatibility with the Constitution. I have no doubt that the executive branch of the Canadian government is duty bound to act in accordance with the dictates of the Charter. Specifically, the cabinet has a duty to act in a manner consistent with the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

(b) The Absence of a Duty on the Government to Refrain from Allowing Testing

29 I do not believe the action impugned in the present case can be characterized as contrary to the duties of the executive under the Charter. Section 7 of the Charter cannot reasonably be read as imposing a duty on the government to refrain [page456] from those acts which might lead to consequences that deprive or threaten to deprive individuals of their life and security of the person. A duty of the federal cabinet cannot arise on the basis of speculation and hypothesis about possible effects of government action. Such a duty only arises, in my view, where it can be said that a deprivation of life and security of the person could be proven to result from the impugned government act.

30 The principles governing remedial action by the courts on the basis of allegations of future harm are illustrative of the more general principle that there is no legal duty to refrain from actions which do not prejudice the legal rights of others. A person, whether the government or a private individual, cannot be held liable under the law for an action unless that action causes the deprivation, or threat of deprivation, of legal rights. And an action cannot be said to cause such deprivation where it is not provable that the deprivation will occur as a result of the challenged action. I am not suggesting that remedial action by the courts will be inappropriate where future harm is alleged. The point is that remedial action will not be justified where the link between the action and the future harm alleged is not capable of proof.

31 The reluctance of courts to provide remedies where the causal link between an action and the future harm alleged to flow from it cannot be proven is exemplified by the principles with respect to declaratory relief. According to Eager, The Declaratory Judgment Action (1971), at p. 5:

3. The remedy [of declaratory relief] is not generally available where the controversy is not presently existing but merely possible or remote; the action is not maintainable to settle disputes which are contingent upon the happening of some future event which may never take place.

4. Conjectural or speculative issues, or feigned disputes or one-sided contentions are not the proper subjects for declaratory relief.

Similarly, Sarna has said, "The court does not deal with unripe claims, nor does it entertain proceedings [page457] with the sole purpose of remedying only possible conflicts": (The Law of Declaratory Judgments (1978), at p. 179).

32 None of this is to deny the preventative role of the declaratory judgment. As Madame Justice Wilson points out in her judgment, Borchard, Declaratory Judgments (2nd ed. 1941), at p. 27, states that,

... no "injury" or "wrong" need have been actually committed or threatened in order to enable the plaintiff to invoke the judicial process; he need merely show that some legal interest or right of his has been placed in jeopardy or grave uncertainty...

33 Nonetheless, the preventative function of the declaratory judgment must be based on more than mere hypothetical consequences; there must be a cognizable threat to a legal interest before the courts will entertain the use of its process as a preventive measure. As this Court stated in Solosky v. The Queen, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 821, a declaration could issue to affect future rights, but not where the dispute in issue was merely speculative. In Solosky, supra, one of the questions was whether an order by a director of a prison to censor correspondence between the appellant inmate and his solicitor could be declared unlawful. The dispute had already arisen as a result of the existence of the censorship order and the declaration sought was a direct and present challenge to this order. This Court found that the fact that the relief sought would relate to letters not yet written, and thereby affect future rights, was not in itself a bar to the granting of a declaration. The Court made it clear, however, at p. 832:

... that a declaration will not normally be granted when the dispute is over and has become academic, or where the dispute has yet to arise and may not arise.

(Emphasis added)

34 A similar concern with the problems inherent in basing relief on the prediction of future events is found in the principles relating to injunctive relief. Professor Sharpe, Injunctions and Specific [page458] Performance (1983), clearly articulates the difficulties in issuing an injunction where the alleged harm is prospective, at pp. 30-31:

All injunctions are future looking in the sense that they are intended to prevent or avoid harm rather than compensate for an injury already suffered....

Where the harm to the plaintiff has yet to occur the problems of prediction are encountered. Here, the plaintiff sues quia timet -- because he fears -- and the judgment as to the propriety of injunctive relief must be made without the advantage of actual evidence as to the nature of harm inflicted on the plaintiff. The court is asked to predict that harm will occur in the future and that the harm is of a type that ought to be prevented by injunction.

35 The general principle with respect to such injunctions appears to be that "there must be a high degree of probability that the harm will in fact occur": (Sharpe, supra, at p. 31). In Redland Bricks Ltd. v. Morris, [1970] A.C. 652, at p. 665, per Lord Upjohn, the House of Lords laid down four general propositions concerning the circumstances in which mandatory injunctive relief could be granted on the basis of prospective harm. The first of these stated [at p. 665]:

1. A mandatory injunction can only be granted where the plaintiff shows a very strong probability upon the facts that grave damage will accrue to him in the future.... It is a jurisdiction to be exercised sparingly and with caution but in the proper case unhesitatingly.

36 It is clearly illustrated by the rules governing declaratory and injunctive relief that the courts will not take remedial action where the occurrence of future harm is not probable. This unwillingness to act in the absence of probable future harm demonstrates the courts' reluctance to grant relief where it cannot be shown that the impugned action will cause a violation of rights.

37 In the present case, the speculative nature of the allegation that the decision to test the cruise missile will lead to an increased threat of nuclear war makes it manifest that no duty is imposed on the [page459] Canadian government to refrain from permitting the testing. The government's action simply could not be proven to cause the alleged violation of s. 7 of the Charter and, thus, no duty can arise.

III

Justiciability

38 The approach which I have taken is not based on the concept of justiciability. I agree in substance with Madame Justice Wilson's discussion of justiciability and her conclusion that the doctrine is founded upon a concern with the appropriate role of the courts as the forum for the resolution of different types of disputes. I have no doubt that disputes of a political or foreign policy nature may be properly cognizable by the courts. My concerns in the present case focus on the impossibility of the Court finding, on the basis of evidence, the connection, alleged by the appellants, between the duty of the government to act in accordance with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the violation of their rights under s. 7. As stated above, I do not believe the alleged violation -- namely, the increased threat of nuclear war -- could ever be sufficiently linked as a factual matter to the acknowledged duty of the government to respect s. 7 of the Charter.

IV

Section 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982 and Section 1 of the Charter

39 I would like to note that nothing in these reasons should be taken as the adoption of the view that the reference to "laws" in s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982 is confined to statutes, regulations and the common law. It may well be that if the supremacy of the Constitution expressed in s. 52 is to be meaningful, then all acts taken pursuant to powers granted by law will fall within s. 52. Equally, it is not necessary for the resolution of this case to express any [page460] opinion on the application of s. 1 of the Charter or the appropriate principles for its interpretation.

V

Conclusion

40 I would accordingly dismiss the appeal with costs.
The following are the reasons delivered by

WILSON J.

41 This litigation was sparked by the decision of the Canadian government to permit the United States to test the cruise missile in Canada. It raises issues of great difficulty and considerable importance to all of us.

1. The Facts

42 The appellants are a group of organizations and unions claiming to have a collective membership of more than 1.5 million Canadians. They allege that a decision made by the Canadian government on July 15, 1983 to allow the United States to test cruise missiles within Canada violates their constitutional rights as guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. More specifically, quoting from their statement of claim:

7. The Plaintiffs state and the fact is that the testing of the cruise missile in Canada is a violation of the collective rights of the Plaintiffs and their members and all Canadians, specifically their right to security of the person and life in that:
- (a) the size and eventual dispersion of the air-launched cruise missile is such that the missile cannot be detected by surveillance satellites, thus making verification of the extent of this nuclear weapons system impossible;
 - (b) with the impossibility of verification, the future of nuclear weapons' control and limitation agreements is completely undermined as any such agreements become practically unenforceable;
 - (c) the testing of the air-launched cruise missiles would result in an increased American military presence and interest in Canada which would result in making Canada more likely to be the target of a nuclear attack;

[page461]

- (d) as the cruise missile cannot be detected until approximately eight minutes before it reaches its target, a "Launch on Warning" system would be necessary in order to respond to the cruise missile thereby eliminating effective human discretion and increasing the likelihood of either a pre-emptive strike or an accidental firing, or both;
- (e) the cruise missile is a military weapon, the development of which will have the effect of a needless and dangerous escalation of the nuclear arms race, thus endangering the security and lives of all people.

43 The plaintiffs, in addition to declaratory relief, seek consequential relief in the nature of an injunction and damages. The defendants, by a motion pursuant to Rule 419(1) of the Federal Court Rules moved to strike out the plaintiffs' statement of claim and to dismiss it as disclosing no reasonable cause of action. Cattanach J. dismissed the defendants' motion to strike on the grounds that the Charter applied to the Government of Canada, including executive acts of the cabinet, and that the statement of claim contained "the germ of a cause of action" and raised a "justiciable issue". The Federal Court of Appeal unanimously allowed the defendants' appeal.

2. The Judgment Appealed From

44 Each of the five judges who sat on the appeal to the Federal Court of Appeal delivered separate reasons for allowing the appeal. Four of the five (Pratte, Le Dain, Marceau and Hugessen JJ.) held that a breach of s. 7 of the Charter must involve a failure to comply with the principles of fundamental justice and the appellants had not alleged any such failure.

45 Three of the justices (Pratte, Marceau and Hugessen JJ.) were of the opinion that the facts as alleged did not constitute a violation of the right to life, liberty and security of the person as guaranteed by s. 7. Pratte and Hugessen JJ. thought that any breach of s. 7 would only occur as the result of actions by foreign powers who were not bound by the Charter. Pratte J. went further and stated that the only "liberty and security of the person" that was protected by s. 7 was security against arbitrary [page462] arrest or detention. Marceau J. felt that s. 7 could never have "any higher mission than that of protecting the life and the freedom of movement of the citizens against arbitrary action and despotism by people in power".

46 Two of the justices (Ryan and Le Dain JJ.) would have allowed the appeal on the fundamental ground that the issue was inherently non-justiciable and therefore incapable of adjudication by a court. Ryan J. thought that the question whether national security was impaired, and hence whether the plaintiffs' own personal security had been affected, was not triable because it was not susceptible of proof. Le Dain J. took the central issue to be the effect of testing cruise missiles on the risk of nuclear conflict, a matter which he asserted to be non-justiciable as involving factors either inaccessible to a court or incapable of being evaluated by it. The other three judges did not directly address this point.

47 Marceau J. would have allowed the appeal on the additional ground that the Charter did not give the courts a power to interfere with an exercise of the royal prerogative, especially when issues of defence and national security were involved. However, a majority of the Court (Pratte, Le Dain and Ryan JJ.) was of the opinion that the Charter did apply to decisions taken in the exercise of the royal prerogative. Hugessen J. did not deal with this question.

48 None of the five judges was prepared to say that the cabinet's decision to test the cruise missile was unreviewable because it involved a "political question". Pratte and Marceau JJ. expressly rejected this argument, Le Dain and Hugessen JJ. did not consider it necessary to deal with it, and Ryan J. did not mention it.

3. The Issues

49 The issues to be addressed on the appeal to this Court may be conveniently summarized as follows:

[page463]

(1) Is a decision made by the government of Canada in relation to a matter of national defence and foreign affairs unreviewable on any of the following grounds:

- (a) it is an exercise of the royal prerogative;
- (b) it is, because of the nature of the factual questions involved, inherently non-justiciable;
- (c) it involves a "political question" of a kind that a court should not decide?

(2) Under what circumstances can a Statement of Claim seeking declaratory relief concerning the constitutionality of a law or governmental decision be struck out as disclosing no cause of action?

(3) Do the facts as alleged in the statement of claim, which must be taken as proven, constitute a violation of s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms? and

(4) Do the plaintiffs have a right to amend the statement of claim before the filing of a statement of defence?

(1) Is the Government's Decision Reviewable?

- (a) The Royal Prerogative

50 The respondents submit that at common law the authority to make international agreements (such as the one made with the United States to permit the testing) is a matter which falls within the prerogative power of the Crown and that both at common law and by s. 15 of the Constitution Act, 1867 the same is true of decisions relating to national defence. They further submit that since by s. 32(1)(a) the Charter applies "to the Parliament and government of Canada in respect of all matters within the authority of Parliament", the Charter's application must, so far as the government is concerned, be restricted to the exercise of powers which derive directly from statute. It cannot, therefore, apply to an exercise of the royal prerogative which is a source of power existing independently of Parliament; otherwise, it is argued, the limiting phrase "within the authority of Parliament" would be deprived of any effect. The answer to this argument seems to me to be that those words of limitation, like the corresponding words "within the authority of the legislature [page464] of each province" in s. 32(1) (b), are merely a reference to the division of powers in ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867. They describe the subject matters in relation to which the Parliament of Canada may legislate or the government of Canada may take executive action. As Le Dain J. points out, the royal prerogative is "within the authority of Parliament" in the sense that Parliament is competent to legislate with respect to matters falling within its scope. Since there is no reason in principle to distinguish between cabinet decisions made pursuant to statutory authority and those made in the exercise of the royal prerogative, and since the former clearly fall within the ambit of the Charter, I conclude that the latter do so also.

(b) Non-Justiciability

51 Le Dain and Ryan JJ. in the Federal Court of Appeal were of the opinion that the issues involved in this case are inherently non-justiciable, either because the question whether testing the cruise missile increases the risk of nuclear war is not susceptible of proof and hence is not triable (per Ryan J.) or because answering that question involves factors which are either inaccessible to a court or are of a nature which a court is incapable of evaluating (per Le Dain J.). To the extent that this objection to the appellants' case rests on the inherent evidentiary difficulties which would obviously confront any attempt to prove the appellants' allegations of fact, I do not think it can be sustained. It might well be that, if the issue were allowed to go to trial, the appellants would lose simply by reason of their not having been able to establish the factual basis of their claim but that does not seem to me to be a reason for striking the case out at this preliminary stage. It is trite law that on a motion to strike out a statement of claim the plaintiff's allegations of fact are to be taken as having been proved. Accordingly, it is arguable that by dealing with the case as they have done Le Dain and Ryan JJ. have, in effect, made a presumption against the appellants which they are not entitled, on a preliminary motion of this kind, to make.

52 I am not convinced, however, that Le Dain and Ryan JJ. were restricting the concept of non-justiciability to difficulties of evidence and proof. Both rely on Lord Radcliffe's judgment in Chandler v. Director of Public Prosecutions, [1962] 3 All E.R. 142 (H.L.), and especially on the following passage at p. 151:

The disposition and equipment of the forces and the facilities afforded to allied forces for defence purposes constitute a given fact and it cannot be a matter of proof or finding that the decisions of policy on which they rest are or are not in the country's best interests. I may add that I can think of few issues which present themselves in less triable form. It would be ingenuous to suppose that the kind of evidence that the appellants wanted to call could make more than a small contribution to its final solution. The facts which they wished to establish might well be admitted: even so, throughout history men have had to run great risk for themselves and others in the hope of attaining objectives which they prize for all. The more one looks at it, the plainer it becomes, I think, that the question whether it is in the true interests of this country to acquire, retain or house nuclear armaments depends on an infinity of considerations, military and diplomatic, technical, psychological and moral, and of decisions, tentative or final, which are themselves part assessments of fact and part expectations and hopes. I do not think that there is anything amiss with a legal ruling that does not make this issue a matter for judge or jury.

(Emphasis added.)

In my opinion, this passage makes clear that in Lord Radcliffe's view these kinds of issues are to be treated as non-justiciable not simply because of evidentiary difficulties but because they involve moral and political considerations which it is not within the province of the courts to assess. Le Dain J. maintains that the difficulty is one of judicial competence rather than anything resembling the American "political questions" doctrine. However, in response to that contention it can be pointed out that, however unsuited courts may be for the task, they are called upon all the time to decide questions [page466] of principle and policy. As Melville Weston points out in "Political Questions" 38 Harv. L. Rev. 296 (1925), at p. 299:

The word "justiciable"... is legitimately capable of denoting almost any question. That is to say, the questions are few which are intrinsically incapable of submission to a tribunal having an established procedure, with an orderly presentation of such evidence as is available, for the purpose of an adjudication from which practical consequences in human conduct are to follow. For example, when nations decline to submit to arbitration or to the compulsory jurisdiction of a proposed international tribunal those questions of honor or interest which they call "non-justiciable", they are really avoiding that broad sense of the word, but what they mean is a little less clear. Probably they mean only that they will not, or deem they ought not, endure the presentation of evidence on such questions, nor bind their conduct to conform to the proposed adjudications. So far as "non-justiciable" is for them more than an epithet, it expresses a sense of a lack of fitness, and not of any inherent impossibility, of submitting these questions to judicial or quasi-judicial determination.

53 In the 1950's and early 1960's there was considerable debate in Britain over the question whether restrictive trade practices legislation gave rise to questions which were subject to judicial determination: see Marshall, "Justiciability," in Oxford Essays in Jurisprudence (1961), ed. A.G. Guest; Summers, "Justiciability" (1963), 26 M.L.R. 530; Stevens "Justiciability: The Restrictive Practices Court Re-Examined", (1964) Public Law 221. I think it is fairly clear that the British restrictive trade practices legislation did not involve the courts in the resolution of issues more imponderable than those facing American courts administering the Sherman Act. Indeed, there is significantly less "policy" content in the decisions of the courts in those cases than there is in the decisions of administrative tribunals such as the Canadian Transport Commission or the CRTC. The real issue there, and perhaps also in the case at bar, is not the ability of judicial tribunals to make a decision on the questions presented, but the appropriateness [page467] of the use of judicial techniques for such purposes.

54 I cannot accept the proposition that difficulties of evidence or proof absolve the Court from making a certain kind of decision if it can be established on other grounds that it has a duty to do so. I think we should focus our attention on whether the courts should or must rather than on whether they can deal with such matters. We should put difficulties of evidence and proof aside and consider whether as a constitutional matter it is appropriate or obligatory for the courts to decide the issue before us. I will return to this question later.

(c) The Political Questions Doctrine

55 It is a well established principle of American constitutional law that there are certain kinds of "political questions" that a court ought to refuse to decide. In Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962), at pp. 210-11, Brennan J. discussed the nature of the doctrine in the following terms:

We have said that "In determining whether a question falls within (the political question) category, the appropriateness under our system of government of attributing finality to the action of the political departments and also the lack of satisfactory criteria for a judicial determination are dominant considerations." Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433, 454-455. The nonjusticiability of a political question is primarily a function of the separation of powers. Much confusion results from the capacity of the "political question" label to obscure the need for case-by-case inquiry. Deciding whether a matter has in any measure been committed by the Constitution to another branch of government, or whether the action of that branch exceeds whatever authority has been committed, is itself a delicate exercise in constitutional interpretation, and is a responsibility of this Court as ultimate interpreter of the Constitution.

At p. 217 he said:

It is apparent that several formulations which vary slightly according to the settings in which the questions arise may describe a political question, although each has one or more elements which identify it as essentially a function of the separation of powers. Prominent on the surface of any case held to involve a political question is [page468] found a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department; or a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving it; or the impossibility of deciding without an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for nonjudicial discretion; or the impossibility of a court's undertaking independent resolution without expressing lack of the respect due coordinate branches of government; or an unusual need for unquestioning adherence to a political decision already made; or the potentiality of embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question.

While one or two of the categories of political question referred to by Brennan J. raise the issue of judicial or institutional competence already referred to, the underlying theme is the separation of powers in the sense of the proper role of the courts vis-a-vis the other branches of government. In this regard it is perhaps noteworthy that a distinction is drawn in the American case law between matters internal to the United States on the one hand and foreign affairs on the other. In the area of foreign affairs the courts are especially deferential to the executive branch of government: see e.g. Atlee v. Laird, 347 F. Supp. 689 (1972) (U.S. Dist. Ct.), at pp. 701 ff.

56 While Brennan J.'s statement, in my view, accurately sums up the reasoning American courts have used in deciding that specific cases did not present questions which were judicially cognizable, I do not think it is particularly helpful in determining when American courts will find that those factors come into play. In cases from Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137 (1803), to United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683 (1974), the Court has not allowed the "respect due coordinate branches of government" to prevent it from rendering decisions highly embarrassing to those holding executive or legislative office. In Baker v. Carr itself, supra, Frankfurter J., in dissent, expressed concern that the judiciary could not find manageable standards for the problems presented by the reapportionment of political districts. Indeed, some would say that the enforcement of the desegregation decision in Brown v. Board of Education of [page469] Topeka, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), gave rise to similar problems of judicial unmanageability. Yet American courts have ventured into these areas undeterred.

57 Academic commentators have expended considerable effort trying to identify when the political questions doctrine should apply. Although there are many theories (perhaps best summarized by Professor Scharpf in his article "Judicial Review and the Political Question: A Functional Analysis," 75 Yale L.J. 517 (1966)), I think it is fair to say that they break down along two broad lines. The first, championed by scholars such as Weston "Political Questions", supra, and Wechsler, Principles, Politics, and Fundamental Law (1961); Wechsler, Book Review, 75 Yale L.J. 672 (1966), define political questions principally in terms of the separation of powers as set out in the Constitution and turn to the Constitution itself for the answer to the question when the Courts should stay their hand. The second school, represented by Finkelstein "Judicial Self-Limitation", 37 Harv. L.R. 338 (1924), and Bickel, The Least Dangerous Branch (1962), especially chapter 4, "The Passive Virtues," roots the political questions doctrine in what seems to me to be a rather vague concept of judicial "prudence" whereby the courts enter into a calculation concerning the political wisdom of intervention in sensitive areas. More recently, commentators such as Tigar, "Judicial Power, the Political Question Doctrine, and Foreign Relations", 17 U.C.L.A. L.R. 1135 (1970), and Henkin, "Is There a Political Question Doctrine?", 85 Yale L.J. 597 (1976), have doubted the need for a political questions doctrine at all, arguing that all the cases which were correctly decided can be accounted for in terms of orthodox separation of powers doctrine.

58 Professor Tigar in his article suggests that the political questions doctrine is not really a doctrine at all but simply "a group of quite different legal rules and principles, each resting in part upon deference to the political branches of government" (p. 1163). He sees Justice Brennan's formulation [page470] of the doctrine in Baker v. Carr, supra, as an "unsatisfactory effort to rationalize a collection of disparate precedent" (p. 1163).

59 In the House of Lords in Chandler, supra, Lord Devlin expressed a similar reluctance to retreat from traditional techniques in the interpretation of the phrase "purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the state..." in the Official Secrets Act, 1911. His colleagues, in particular Lord Radcliffe and Lord Reid, seem to have been of the view that in matters of defence the Crown's opinion as to what was prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State was conclusive upon the courts. Lord Devlin agreed with the result reached by his colleagues on the facts before him, and with the observation of Lord Parker on the Court of Criminal Appeal ([1962] 2 All E.R. 314, at pp. 319-20) that "the manner of the exercise of... [the Crown's] prerogative powers [over the disposition and armament of the military] cannot be inquired into by the courts, whether in a civil or a criminal case..." ([1962] 3 All E.R. 142 at p. 157) but went on to make three observations in clarification of his position.

60 Lord Devlin's first observation was that the principle that the substance of discretionary decisions is not reviewable in the courts is one basic to administrative law and is not confined to matters of defence or the exercise of the prerogative. The second point was that even though review on the merits of a discretionary decision was excluded, that did not mean that judicial review was excluded entirely. The third comment was that the nature and effect of the principle of judicial review is "[to limit] the issue which the court has to determine..." ([1962] 3 All E.R. 142, at p. 158).

61 Lord Devlin then proceeded to apply these propositions to the case before him and asked what it was that the jury was required to determine. In his view "the fact to be proved is the existence of a purpose prejudicial to the state -- not a purpose which "appears to the Crown" to be prejudicial to [page471] the state" ([1962] 3 All E.R. 142, at p. 158). He accordingly went on to conclude at p. 159:

Consequently, the Crown's opinion as to what is or is not prejudicial in this case is just as inadmissible as the appellants'. The Crown's evidence about what its interests are is an entirely different matter. They can be proved by an officer of the Crown wherever it may be necessary to do so. In a case like the present, it may be presumed that it is contrary to the interests of the Crown to have one of its airfields immobilised just as it may be presumed that it is contrary to the interests of an industrialist to have his factory immobilised. The thing speaks for itself, as the Attorney-General submitted. But the presumption is not irrebuttable. Men can exaggerate the extent of their interests and so can the Crown. The servants of the Crown, like other men animated by the highest motives, are capable of formulating a policy ad hoc so as to prevent the citizen from doing something that the Crown does not want him to do. It is the duty of the courts to be as alert now as they have always been to prevent abuse of the prerogative. But in the present case there is nothing at all to suggest that the Crown's interest in the proper operation of its airfields is not what it may naturally be presumed to be or that it was exaggerating the perils of interference with their effectiveness.

62 It seems to me that the point being made by Lord Devlin, as well as by Tigar and Henkin in their writings, is that the courts should not be too eager to relinquish their judicial review function simply because they are called upon to exercise it in relation to weighty matters of state. Equally, however, it is important to realize that judicial review is not the same thing as substitution of the court's opinion on the merits for the opinion of the person or body to whom a discretionary decision-making power has been committed. The first step is to determine who as a constitutional matter has the decision-making power; the second is to determine the scope (if any) of judicial review of the exercise of that power.

63 It might be timely at this point to remind ourselves of the question the Court is being asked to decide. It is, of course, true that the federal legislature has exclusive legislative jurisdiction in relation to defence under s. 91(7) of the Constitution [page472] Act, 1867 and that the federal executive has the powers conferred upon it in ss. 9 - 15 of that Act. Accordingly, if the Court were simply being asked to express its opinion on the wisdom of the executive's exercise of its defence powers in this case, the Court would have to decline. It cannot substitute its opinion for that of the executive to whom the decision-making power is given by the Constitution. Because the effect of the appellants' action is to challenge the wisdom of the government's defence policy, it is tempting to say that the Court should in the same way refuse to involve itself. However, I think this would be to miss the point, to fail to focus on the question which is before us. The question before us is not whether the government's defence policy is sound but whether or not it violates the appellants' rights under s. 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. This is a totally different question. I do not think there can be any doubt that this is a question for the courts. Indeed, s. 24(1) of the Charter, also part of the Constitution, makes it clear that the adjudication of that question is the responsibility of "a court of competent jurisdiction". While the court is entitled to grant such remedy as it "considers appropriate and just in the circumstances", I do not think it is open to it to relinquish its jurisdiction either on the basis that the issue is inherently non-justiciable or that it raises a so-called "political question": see Martin H. Redish "Abstention, Separation of Powers, and the Limits of the Judicial Function," 94 Yale L.J. 71 (1984).

64 I would conclude, therefore, that if we are to look at the Constitution for the answer to the question whether it is appropriate for the courts to "second guess" the executive on matters of defence, we would conclude that it is not appropriate. However, if what we are being asked to do is to decide whether any particular act of the executive violates the rights of the citizens, then it is not only appropriate that we answer the question; it is our obligation under the Charter to do so.

65 One or two hypothetical situations will, I believe, illustrate the point. Let us take the case of [page473] a person who is being conscripted for service during wartime and has been ordered into battle overseas, all of this pursuant to appropriate legislative and executive authorization. He wishes to challenge his being conscripted and sent overseas as an infringement of his rights under s. 7. It is apparent that his liberty has been constrained and, if he is sent into battle, his security of the person and, indeed, his life are put in jeopardy. It seems to me that it would afford the conscriptee a somewhat illusory protection if the validity of his challenge is to be determined by the executive. On the other hand, it does not follow from these facts that the individual's rights under the Charter have been violated. Even if an individual's rights to life and liberty under s. 7 are interpreted at their broadest, it is clear from s. 1 that they are subject to "such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society". If the Court were of the opinion that conscription during wartime was a "reasonable limit" within the meaning of s. 1, a conscriptee's challenge on the facts as presented would necessarily fail.

66 By way of contrast, one can envisage a situation in which the government decided to force a particular group to participate in experimental testing of a deadly nerve gas. Although the government might argue that such experiments were an important part of our defence effort, I find it hard to believe that they would survive judicial review under the Charter. Equally we could imagine a situation during wartime in which the army began to seize people for military service without appropriate enabling legislation having been passed by Parliament. Such "press gang" tactics would, one might expect, be subject to judicial review even if the executive thought they were justified for the prosecution of the war.

67 Returning then to the present case, it seems to me that the legislature has assigned to the courts as a constitutional responsibility the task of determining whether or not a decision to permit the testing of cruise missiles violates the appellants' rights under the Charter. The preceding illustrations indicate why the legislature has done so. It is [page474] therefore, in my view, not only appropriate that we decide the matter; it is our constitutional obligation to do so.

(2) In What Circumstances May a Statement of Claim Seeking Declaratory Relief Be Struck Out?

68 In order to put this issue in context it is necessary to review the procedural history of the case.

69 On July 20, 1983 the appellants filed a statement of claim seeking a declaration that their constitutional rights had been violated and consequential relief in the form of an injunction, damages and costs. The respondents moved on August 11, 1983 under Rule 419(1) of the Federal Court Rules to strike out the statement of claim primarily on the ground that it disclosed no reasonable cause of action. The statement was also alleged to be frivolous and vexatious and an abuse of the process of the Court. Cattanach J. denied the motion on September 15, 1983. He noted the requirement under Rule 408 that a statement of claim contain a precise statement of the material facts upon which the plaintiff relies and must stand or fall on the allegations of fact. He said that a statement of claim would not be struck out if the facts alleged were capable of constituting "the scintilla of a cause of action". He noted that by virtue of s. 32(1)(a) the Charter applies to the Parliament and government of Canada and by virtue of s. 24(1) the Court has jurisdiction to administer and provide appropriate remedies. He concluded that the statement of claim contained sufficient allegations to raise a justiciable issue and analogised the alleged liability of the respondents to liability for extra-hazardous activities contemplated by the rule in Rylands v. Fletcher, [1861-73] All E.R. 1 (H.L.). He concluded that there was a "germ of a cause of action" disclosed in the statement of claim.

70 On September 19, 1983 the respondents appealed to the Federal Court of Appeal. On October 7, 1983 the appellants sought leave from the Court of Appeal to amend their statement of [page475] claim under Rule 1104 to include an allegation that the testing of the cruise missile in Canada per se violated the appellants' rights under s. 7 of the Charter. Pratte J. dismissed the application without reasons on October 11, 1983. The Federal Court of Appeal heard the case on November 28, 1983 and allowed the respondents' appeal for the reasons outlined earlier.

71 The appeal to this Court was heard on February 14 and 15, 1984. On March 6, 1984 the appellants applied to Muldoon J. for an injunction under Rule 469 of the Federal Court Rules to prevent testing until the case was decided. Muldoon J. concluded that until this Court decreed differently the law applicable to the matter was that the appellants' claim was non-justiciable. He held that in order to get an interlocutory injunction "cogent" evidence of a violation of a right had to be presented. The evidence presented was speculative only and could not establish a "real and proximate jeopardy" to the appellants' rights. There was nothing therefore to support the issue of an injunction.

72 The procedural issue before the Court then is: did the appellants' statement of claim disclose a reasonable cause of action within the meaning of Rule 419 of the Federal Court Rules?

(a) The Applicable Principle

73 Estey J. stated the applicable principle in Attorney General of Canada v. Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, [1980] 2 S.C.R. 735, at p. 740:

As I have said, all the facts pleaded in the statement of claim must be deemed to have been proven. On a motion such as this a court should, of course, dismiss the action or strike out any claim made by the plaintiff only in plain and obvious cases and where the court is satisfied that "the case is beyond doubt": Ross v. Scottish Union and National Insurance Co. (1920), 47 O.L.R. 308 (App. Div.)

74 In Shawn v. Robertson (1964), 46 D.L.R. (2d) 363, a declaration was sought against a ministerial exercise of discretion. An application for striking out on the basis of no reasonable cause of action [page476] was made under the Ontario Rules. Grant J. stated, at p. 365:

The principles to be applied by the Court in determining whether to exercise jurisdiction conferred by Rule 126 or not are set out in the following cases; in Ross v. Scottish Union & National Insurance Co. (1920), 53 D.L.R. 415 at pp. 421-2, 47 O.L.R. 308 at p. 316, Magee, J.A., states:

That inherent jurisdiction is partly embodied in our Rule 124 (now R. 126)... The Rule has only been acted upon in plain and obvious cases, and it should only be so when the Court is satisfied that the case is one beyond doubt, and that there is no reasonable cause of action or defence.

And at p. 423 D.L.R., p. 317 O.L.R.: "To justify the use of Rule 124... it is not sufficient that the plaintiff is not likely to succeed at the trial."

In Gilbert Surgical Supply Co. and Gilbert v. Frank W. Horner Ltd., 34 C.P.R. 17, [1960] O.W.N. 289, 19 Fox Pat. C. 209, Aylesworth, J.A., speaking for himself, Porter C.J.O., and LeBel, J.A., states as follows at p. 289 O.W.N.:

He said that the action was novel and he could not agree that the defendant had shown the case to be one within the Rule. At this stage of litigation the Court could not conclude that the plaintiff's action could not possibly succeed or that clearly and beyond all doubt, no reasonable cause of action had been shown.

75 A case analogous to the present case, not in the nature of the issues involved but in the novelty of the alleged cause of action and the absence of precedent, is McKay v. Essex Area Health Authority, [1982] 2 All E.R. 771. In that case a pregnant mother contracted German measles in the early months of her pregnancy. Her doctor took blood samples from her which were tested by the defendant Health Authority but the infection was not diagnosed and the child was born severely disabled. The mother and child sued the doctor and the Health Authority for negligence, the child claiming damages for her "entry into a life in which her injuries are highly debilitating". The Master struck out the child's claim on the basis it disclosed no reasonable cause of action. His order [page477] was set aside on appeal, the judge holding that the defendants owed a duty of care to the child and her real claim was not that she had suffered damage by reason of "wrongful entry into life" but by reason of having been born deformed. This gave rise to a reasonable cause of action. An appeal to the Court of Appeal was allowed and the order of the Master striking out the claim restored.

76 Stephenson L.J. had to struggle with the question whether a child had a right not to be born deformed which in the case of a child deformed or disabled before birth by disease meant a right to be aborted. Counsel for the child submitted that this could not be viewed as a plain and obvious case susceptible of only one result, nor could it be viewed as frivolous or vexatious; although it might be novel, it raised issues of real substance which ought to go to trial. His Lordship disagreed. He said at p. 778:

Here the court is considering not "ancient law" but a novel cause of action, for or against which there is no authority in any reported case in the courts of the United Kingdom or the Commonwealth. It is tempting to say that the question whether it exists is so difficult and so important that it should be argued out at a trial and on appeal up to the House of Lords. But it may become just as plain and obvious, after argument on the defendants' application to strike it out, that the novel cause of action is unarguable or unsustainable or has no chance of succeeding.

(Emphasis added.)

77 It would seem then that as a general principle the courts will be hesitant to strike out a statement of claim as disclosing no reasonable cause of action. The fact that reaching a conclusion on this preliminary issue requires lengthy argument will not be determinative of the matter nor will the novelty of the cause of action militate against the plaintiffs.

78 It has been suggested, however, that the plaintiffs' claim should be struck out because some of the allegations contained in it are not matters of fact but matters of opinion and that matters of opinion, being to some extent speculative, do not fall within the principle that the allegations of fact in the statement of claim must be taken as proved. I cannot accept this proposition since it appears to me to imply that a matter of opinion is not subject to proof. What we are concerned with for purposes of the application of the principle is, it seems to me, "evidentiary" facts. These may be either real or intangible. Real facts are susceptible of proof by direct evidence. Intangible facts, on the other hand, may be proved by inference from real facts or through the testimony of experts. Intangible facts are frequently the subject of opinion. The question of the probable cause of a certain result is a good illustration and germane to the issues at hand. An allegation that the lack of shower facilities at a defendant's brickworks probably resulted in a plaintiff employee's skin disease may in lay language appear to be merely an expression of medical opinion, but it is also in law a determination which the courts can properly infer from the surrounding facts and expert opinion evidence: see McGhee v. National Coal Board, [1972] 3 All E.R. 1008 (H.L.). Indeed, even a finding that an event "would cause" a certain result in the future is a finding of intangible fact. For example, in Fleming v. Hislop (1886), 11 A.C. 686, it was necessary to determine whether or not the finding "that the ignition of any other heap or bing of blaes on said farm or in the vicinity of the pursuers' land would cause material discomfort and annoyance to the pursuers," was a finding of fact or a finding of law. It was argued that it could not be a finding of fact because it related to something that was "prospective, future, not actually in existence". The Earl of Selborne agreed that, since the thing had not actually happened, a finding of fact as a thing past was impossible. But it was nevertheless a finding of fact and "there is a fallacy in saying that, because the word "would" is a word of futurity, the words "would cause" do not mean something which is properly a fact" (p. 690). See also on causation as an issue of fact: Alphacell Ltd [page479] v. Woodward, [1972] 2 All E.R. 475 per Lord Salmon, at pp. 489-90:

The nature of causation has been discussed by many eminent philosophers and also by a number of learned judges in the past. I consider, however, that what or who has caused a certain event to occur is essentially a practical question of fact which can best be answered by ordinary common sense rather than abstract metaphysical theory.

79 In my view, several of the allegations contained in the statement of claim are statements of intangible fact. Some of them invite inferences; others anticipate probable consequences. They may be susceptible to proof by inference from real facts or by expert testimony or "through the application of common sense principles": see Leyland Shipping Co. v. Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society, [1918] A.C. 350, at p. 363, per Lord Dunedin. We may entertain serious doubts that the plaintiffs will be able to prove them by any of these means. It is not, however, the function of the Court at this stage to prejudge that question. I agree with Cattanach J. that the statement of claim contains sufficient allegations to raise a justiciable issue.

(b) Declaratory Relief

80 This may be an appropriate point at which to consider the appellants' submission that in order to establish a reasonable cause of action in relation to their claim for declaratory relief as opposed to their claim for an injunction and damages, they do not have to allege in their statement of claim the violation of a right or the threat of a violation of a right. It is sufficient, they submit, that the plaintiff have standing, that a "serious constitutional issue" is raised, and that the declaration sought serves a useful purpose. In support of this contention the appellants rely on Minister of Justice of Canada v. Borowski, [1981] 2 S.C.R. 575, and Thorson v. Attorney General of Canada, [1975] 1 S.C.R. 138. Thorson involved an alleged excess of legislative [page480] power by the Parliament of Canada as did the later case of Nova Scotia Board of Censors v. McNeil, [1976] 2 S.C.R. 265. Given the nature of such questions it is undoubtedly true that no violation of a right need necessarily be involved.

81 Borchart, Declaratory Judgments (2nd ed. 1941), at p. 27, suggests that declaratory relief in cases which are not susceptible of any other relief is distinctive in that:

... no "injury" or "wrong" need have been actually committed or threatened in order to enable the plaintiff to invoke the judicial process; he need merely show that some legal interest or right of his has been placed in jeopardy or grave uncertainty, by denial, by the existence of a potentially injurious instrument, by some unforeseen event or catastrophe the effect of which gives rise to dispute, or by the assertion of a conflicting claim by the defendant....

Borchard then goes to expand upon the concept of a "legal interest" at pp. 48-49:

It is an essential condition of the right to invoke judicial relief that the plaintiff have a protectible interest. The fact that under declaratory procedure so many types of legal issues are presentable for determination which are incapable of any other form of relief, has imposed upon the courts at the outset the function of determining whether the facts justify the grant of judicial relief, and more particularly, whether the plaintiff has a "legal interest" in the relief he seeks. In the more familiar executory action, the legal interest is sought in the "cause of action," but, as already observed, the narrow scope often given to this ambiguous term has served to conceal from view the many occasions and situations in which a plaintiff not yet physically injured or one seeking escape from dilemma and uncertainty by a clarification of his legal position has need for judicial relief not of the traditional kind. The wider opportunity and necessity for judicial usefulness disclosed by the declaratory judgment make necessary either a more flexible and comprehensive connotation of the term "cause of action" or the employment of a less chameleonic term to indicate when the petitioner may be accorded judicial protection. Without losing sight of the necessity for jurisdictional facts, it is suggested that the term "legal interest" meets the need.

82 Where, however, the unconstitutionality of a law or an act is founded upon its conflict with a right, then the right must be alleged to have been violated. Such was the case in Borowski where a declaration was being sought to the effect that the abortion provisions in the Criminal Code contravened the right to life guaranteed by s. 1(a) of the Canadian Bill of Rights R.S.C. 1970, Appendix III. It was alleged in Borowski that rights were being violated even although they were the rights of human fetuses and not the rights of the plaintiff. It seems to me that whenever a litigant raises a "serious constitutional issue" involving a violation of the Charter or the Canadian Bill of Rights then, since what is being complained of is an alleged violation of a right, it follows almost by definition that the nature of the alleged violation must be asserted. Moreover, as the respondents point out, s. 24(1) of the Charter makes the infringement or denial of a right a pre-condition to obtaining relief in the courts under that section. That being so, it seems to follow that the infringement or denial complained of must be specifically pleaded.

83 The appellants submit, however, that while their consequential relief in the form of an injunction and damages is made pursuant to s. 24(1) of the Charter, their claim for declaratory relief is at large. It is not sought pursuant to that section in paragraph 9(c) of their statement of claim which merely seeks a declaration of unconstitutionality. It is, they submit, a separate cause of action at common law and also under s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982 and can stand alone even if they fail in their claim for consequential relief under s. 24(1). They cite Rule 1723 of the Federal Court Rules which provides:

Operation Dismantle Inc. v. Canada, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 441

Rule 1723. No action shall be open to objection on the ground that a merely declaratory judgment or order is sought thereby, and the Court may make binding declarations of right whether or not any consequential relief is or could be claimed.

84 The appellants acknowledge that a declaration of unconstitutionality is a discretionary remedy (Solosky v. The Queen, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 821) but [page482] say that the discretion lies with the trial court and is exercisable only after a trial on the merits. Accordingly, their claim for this relief should not have been struck out at the preliminary stage regardless of the fate of their other claims. However, as the respondents point out, declaratory relief is only discretionary in the sense that a court may refuse it even if the case for it has been made out: see Zamir, The Declaratory Judgment (1962), at p. 193. The court, therefore, on a motion to strike on the basis that no reasonable cause of action has been disclosed in the statement of claim is not in any sense usurping the discretionary power of the trial court.

(i) Inconsistency with the Constitution Act, 1982, s. 52(1)

85 Section 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides:

52.(1) The Constitution of Canada is the supreme law of Canada, and any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect.

86 Section 52 would appear to have the same role in terms of imposing a constitutional limitation on law-making power in Canada as its predecessors, s. 2 of the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, 28 & 29 Vict., c. 63 and s. 7 of the Statute of Westminster, 1931, 22 Geo. 5, c. 4 (R.S.C. 1970, Appendix II, no. 26): see La Forest, "The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms: An Overview" (1983), 61 Can. Bar Rev., 19, at p. 28. Section 2 of the Colonial Laws Validity Act 1865 provides:

2. Any Colonial Law which is or shall be in any respect repugnant to the Provisions of any Act of Parliament extending to the Colony to which such Law may relate, or repugnant to any Order or Regulation made under Authority of such Act of Parliament, or having in the Colony the Force and Effect of such Act, shall be read subject to such Act, Order or Regulation, and shall, to the Extent of such Repugnancy, but not otherwise, be and remain absolutely void and inoperative.

Section 7 of the Statute of Westminster, 1931 provides:

[page483]

7.(1) Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to apply to the repeal, amendment or alteration of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1930, or any order, rule or regulation made thereunder.

(2) The provisions of section two of this Act shall extend to laws made by any of the Provinces of Canada and to the powers of the legislatures of such Provinces.

(3) The powers conferred by this Act upon the Parliament of Canada or upon the legislatures of the Provinces shall be restricted to the enactment of laws in relation to matters within the competence of the Parliament of Canada or of any of the legislatures of the Provinces respectively.

Accordingly, Dickson C.J.C. is unquestionably correct when he states in The Queen v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd. [1985], 1 S.C.R. 295 at p. 313:

Section 52 sets out the fundamental principle of constitutional law that the Constitution is supreme.

The Chief Justice then goes on to note that where a declaration is sought under s. 52 to the effect that legislation is unconstitutional the standing requirements for constitutional litigation must of course be met.

87 If the appellants are relying on s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 as the source of their right to a declaration of unconstitutionality, which it would appear from their factum that they are, it is noted that that provision is directed to "laws" which are inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution.

88 Counsel for the appellants submitted in oral argument that they should not be prejudiced in the relief sought by the absence of any law authorizing, ratifying or implementing the agreement between Canada and the United States since legislation, they submitted, should have been passed. The government should not therefore be allowed to immunize itself against judicial review under s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982 by its own omission to do that which it ought to have done.

89 This argument assumes, of course, that legislation was required and this does not appear to be so. [page484] The law in relation to treaty-making power was definitively established for Canada and the rest of the Commonwealth in Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for Ontario (Labour Conventions), [1937] A.C. 326 where Lord Atkin stated at pp. 347-48:

It will be essential to keep in mind the distinction between (1) the formation, and (2) the performance, of the obligations constituted by a treaty, using that word as comprising any agreement between two or more sovereign States. Within the British Empire there is a well-established rule that the making of a treaty is an executive act, while the performance of its obligations, if they entail alteration of the existing domestic law, requires legislative action. Unlike some other countries, the stipulations of a treaty duly ratified do not within the Empire, by virtue of the treaty alone, have the force of law. If the national executive, the government of the day, decide to incur the obligations of a treaty which involve alteration of law they have to run the risk of obtaining the assent of Parliament to the necessary statute or statutes. To make themselves as secure as possible they will often in such cases before final ratification seek to obtain from Parliament an expression of approval. But it has never been suggested, and it is not the law, that such an expression of approval operates as law, or that in law it precludes the assenting Parliament, or any subsequent Parliament, from refusing to give its sanction to any legislative proposals that may subsequently be brought before it. Parliament, no doubt, as the Chief Justice points out, has a constitutional control over the executive: but it cannot be disputed that the creation of the obligations undertaken in treaties and the assent to their form and quality are the function of the executive alone.

(Emphasis added.)

90 A treaty, therefore, may be in full force and effect internationally without any legislative implementation and, absent such legislative implementation, it does not form part of the domestic law of Canada. Legislation is only required if some alteration in the domestic law is needed for its implementation: see R. St J. Macdonald: "The Relationship between International Law and Domestic Law in Canada," in Canadian Perspectives on International Law and Organization (1974), eds. Macdonald, Morris and Johnston, p. 88.

91 The agreement in this case took the form of an "exchange of notes" between Allan Gotlieb, Canadian Ambassador to the United States and Kenneth W. Dam, Acting Secretary of State, The United States State Department. As Mr. Gotlieb points out in an article entitled "Canadian Treaty-Making: Informal Agreements and Interdepartmental Arrangements," in Canadian Perspectives on International Law and Organization, supra, at p. 230, Canadian treaty-making practice has been characterized by a movement away from formal, full-fledged governmental "treaties" and towards informal "exchange of notes" arrangements. There is nothing unusual, therefore, in the procedure adopted in relation to the cruise testing agreement.

92 Although little, if any, argument has been addressed in this case to the question whether the government's decision to permit testing of the cruise missile in Canada falls within the meaning of the word "law" as used in s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982, I am prepared to assume, without deciding, that it does. I am also prepared to assume that the appellants could establish their standing to bring an action under s. 52. The question remains, however, whether the appellants' claim raises a serious question of constitutional inconsistency. This in turn depends on the answer to the question whether the government's decision violates the appellants' rights under s. 7. If it does not, there is no inconsistency with the provisions of the Constitution.

(ii) At common law

93 If the appellants' claim for declaratory relief is a claim at common law of the type upheld in Dyson v. Attorney-

General, [1911] 1 K.B. 410, no issue arises as to whether or not there is a "law" implementing the cruise testing agreement. The common law action affords a means of attack on the acts of public officials who have allegedly exceeded their powers. However, in order to have standing to bring such an action a plaintiff must, as noted from Borchard, supra, be able to show that he or she will suffer injury to a right or legally protected interest from the conduct of such officials. [page486] The same point is made in de Smith, Constitutional and Administrative Law (4th ed.), at p. 604:

The declaratory judgment is basically a twentieth-century judicial remedy and has come to be used for a great variety of purposes in public and private law. Declarations can be awarded in almost every situation where an injunction will lie -- the most important exception is that interim relief cannot be granted by way of a declaration -- and they extend to a number of situations where an injunction would be inappropriate (for example, because there is nothing to prohibit) or could not be obtained for other reasons (for example, because the prospective defendant was the Crown). The rules governing locus standi are in a state of confusion. In Gouriet v. Union of Post Office Workers [[1977] 3 All E.R. 70 (H.L.)] Mr. Gouriet eventually amended his claim to an application for a declaration that the Union of Post Office Workers was acting unlawfully in blocking mail from this country to South Africa. He was refused such a declaration. Lord Wilberforce said: "... there is no support for the proposition that declaratory relief can be granted unless the plaintiff, in proper proceedings, in which there is a dispute between the plaintiff and defendant concerning their legal respective rights and liabilities, either asserts a legal right which is denied or threatened, or claims immunity from some claim of the defendant against him, or claims that the defendant is infringing or threatens to infringe some public right so as to inflict special damage on the plaintiff."

I believe, therefore, that the appellants, even on the common law action for a declaration, must establish at least a threat of violation, if not an actual violation, of their rights under s. 7 of the Charter in order to bring a viable claim for declaratory relief against governmental action.

94 The law then would appear to be clear. The facts pleaded are to be taken as proved. When so taken, the question is do they disclose a reasonable cause of action, i.e. a cause of action "with some chance of success" (Drummond-Jackson v. British Medical Association, [1970] All E.R. 1094) or, [page487] as Le Dain J. put it in Dowson v. Government of Canada (1981), 37 N.R. 127 (F.C.A.) at p. 138, is it "plain and obvious that the action cannot succeed?" Is it plain and obvious that the plaintiffs' claim for declaratory or consequential relief cannot succeed?

(3) Could the Facts as Alleged Constitute a Violation of Section 7 of the Charter?

95 Section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms provides as follows:

7. Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

96 Whether or not the facts that are alleged in the appellants' statement of claim could constitute a violation of s. 7 is, of course, the question that lies at the heart of this case. If they could not, then the appellants' statement of claim discloses no reasonable cause of action and the appeal must be dismissed. The appellants submit that on its proper construction s. 7 gives rise to two separate and presumably independent rights, namely the right to life, liberty and security of the person, and the right not to be deprived of such life, liberty and security of the person except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. In their submission, therefore, a violation of the principles of fundamental justice would only have to be alleged in relation to a claim based on a violation of the second right. As Marceau J. points out in his reasons, the French text of s. 7 does not seem to admit of this two-rights interpretation since only one right is specifically mentioned. Moreover, as the respondents point out, the appellants' suggestion does not accord with the interpretation that the courts have placed on the similarly structured provision in s. 1(a) of the Canadian Bill of Rights: see e.g. Miller v. The Queen, [1977] 2 S.C.R. 680, per Ritchie J., at pp. 703-04.

97 The appellants' submission, however, touches upon a number of important issues regarding the proper interpretation of s. 7. Even if the section gives rise to a single unequivocal right not to be [page488] deprived of life, liberty or security of the person except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice, there nonetheless remains the question whether fundamental justice is entirely procedural in nature or whether it has a substantive aspect as well. This, in turn, leads to the related question whether there might not be certain deprivations of life, liberty or personal security which could not be justified no matter what procedure was employed to effect them. These are among the most important and difficult questions of interpretation arising under the Charter but I do not think it is necessary to deal with them in this case. It can, in my opinion, be disposed of without reaching these issues.

98 In my view, even an independent, substantive right to life, liberty and security of the person cannot be absolute. For example, the right to liberty, which I take to be the right to pursue one's goals free of governmental constraint, must accommodate the corresponding rights of others. The concept of "right" as used in the Charter postulates the inter-relation of individuals in society all of whom have the same right. The aphorism that "A hermit has no need of rights" makes the point. The concept of "right" also premises the existence of someone or some group against whom the right may be asserted. As Mortimer J. Adler expressed it in Six Great Ideas (1981), at p. 144:

Living in organized societies under effective government and enforceable laws, as they must in order to survive and prosper, human beings neither have autonomy nor are they entitled to unlimited liberty of action. Autonomy is incompatible with organized society. Unlimited liberty is destructive of it.

99 The concept of "right" as used in the Charter must also, I believe, recognize and take account of the political reality of the modern state. Action by the state or, conversely, inaction by the state will frequently have the effect of decreasing or increasing the risk to the lives or security of its citizens. It may be argued, for example, that the failure of government to limit significantly the speed of traffic [page489] on the highways threatens our right to life and security in that it increases the risk of highway accidents. Such conduct, however, would not, in my view, fall within the scope of the right protected by s. 7 of the Charter.

100 In the same way, the concept of "right" as used in the Charter must take account of the fact that the self-contained political community which comprises the state is faced with at least the possibility, if not the reality, of external threats to both its collective well-being and to the individual well-being of its citizens. In order to protect the community against such threats it may well be necessary for the state to take steps which incidentally increase the risk to the lives or personal security of some or all of the state's citizens. Such steps, it seems to me, cannot have been contemplated by the draftsman of the Charter as giving rise to violations of s. 7. As John Rawls states in A Theory of Justice (1971), at p. 213:

The government's right to maintain public order and security is... a right which the government must have if it is to carry out its duty of impartially supporting the conditions necessary for everyone's pursuit of his interests and living up to his obligations as he understands them.

101 The rights under the Charter not being absolute, their content or scope must be discerned quite apart from any limitation sought to be imposed upon them by the government under s. 1. As was pointed out by the Ontario Court of Appeal in Re Federal Republic of Germany and Rauca (1983), 41 O.R. (2d) 225, at p. 294:

... the Charter was not enacted in a vacuum and the rights set out therein must be interpreted rationally having regard to the then existing laws....

There is no liberty without law and there is no law without some restriction of liberty: see Dworkin, Taking Rights Seriously (1977), p. 267. This paradox caused Roscoe Pound to conclude:

There is no more ambiguous word in legal and juristic literature than the word right. In its most general sense [page490] it means a reasonable expectation involved in civilized life. [See Jurisprudence, vol. 4, (1959), p. 56.]

102 It is not necessary to accept the restrictive interpretation advanced by Pratte J., which would limit s. 7 to protection against arbitrary arrest or detention, in order to agree that the central concern of the section is direct impingement by government upon the life, liberty and personal security of individual citizens. At the very least, it seems to me, there must be a strong presumption that governmental action which concerns the relations of the state with other states, and which is therefore not directed at any member of the immediate political community, was never intended to be caught by s. 7 even although such action may have the incidental effect of increasing the risk of death or injury that individuals generally have to face.

103 I agree with Le Dain J. that the essence of the appellants' case is the claim that permitting the cruise missile to be tested in Canada will increase the risk of nuclear war. But even accepting this allegation of fact as true, which as I have already said I think we must do on a motion to strike, it is my opinion for the reasons given above that this state of affairs could not constitute a breach of s. 7. Moreover, I do not see how one can distinguish in a principled way between this particular risk and any other danger to which the government's action vis-à-vis other states might incidentally subject its citizens. A declaration of war, for example, almost certainly increases the risk to most citizens of death or injury. Acceptance of the appellants' submissions, it seems to me, would mean that any such declaration would also have to be regarded as a violation of s. 7. I cannot think that that could be a proper interpretation of the Charter.

104 This is not to say that every governmental action that is purportedly taken in furtherance of national defence would be beyond the reach of s. 7. If, for example, testing the cruise missile posed a direct threat to some specific segment of the populace -- as, for example, if it were being tested with live warheads -- I think that might well raise different [page491] considerations. A court might find that that constituted a violation of s. 7 and it might then be up to the government to try to establish that testing the cruise with live warheads was justified under s. 1 of the Charter. Section 1, in my opinion, is the uniquely Canadian mechanism through which the courts are to determine the justiciability of particular issues that come before it. It embodies through its reference to a free and democratic society the essential features of our constitution including the separation of powers, responsible government and the rule of law. It obviates the need for a "political questions" doctrine and permits the court to deal with what might be termed "prudential" considerations in a principled way without renouncing its constitutional and mandated responsibility for judicial review. It is not, however, called into operation here since the facts alleged in the statement of claim, even if they could be shown to be true, could not in my opinion constitute a violation of s. 7.

(4) Can the Statement of Claim be Amended?

105 The appellants were denied leave by Pratte J. to amend their statement of claim by adding the following:

The very testing of the cruise missiles per se in Canada endangers the Charter of Rights and Freedoms
Section 7: Rights.

106 Since this is a conclusion of law, not fact, it cannot in my view affect the factual allegations which the Court must accept as proved in order to decide whether the statement of claim should be struck out. We do not know the basis on which Pratte J. refused the amendment. He gave no reasons, nor was he obliged to. The matter was purely discretionary under Rule 1104. Certainly conclusions of law may be pleaded: see Famous Players Canadian Corporation Ltd. v. J.J. Turner and Sons Ltd. [1948] O.W.N. 221, per Gale J. at pp. 221-22 but they do not form part of the factual allegations which must be taken as proved for [page492] purposes of a motion to strike. No appeal was taken from the order of Pratte J.

107 Counsel for the appellants submit that prior to the filing of a statement of defence they were entitled to amend as of right under Rule 421 and that they should not be prejudiced with respect to this right because they invoked the discretion of the court under Rule 1104. It may, however, be of significance in this connection that their application for amendment to the statement of claim was filed after the Crown had instituted its appeal to the Federal Court of Appeal. In my view, their application was therefore one made "during the pendency of an appeal" to which the Rules of the Federal Court of Appeal would apply. This means, in my view, that the appellants' right under Rule 421 had expired and their only recourse was to proceed under Rule 1104.

108 The point, however, may be academic. The proposed amendment amounts to no more than an assertion of the conclusion which the appellants submit the Court ought to come to on the main issue in the case. Since the Court must address that issue in any event, the addition of the suggested amendment could, it seems to me, make no difference one way or the other to the appellants' case.

Conclusions

109 In summary, it seems to me that the issues raised on the appeal are to be disposed of as follows:

- (1) The government's decision to permit testing of the cruise missile in Canada cannot escape judicial review on any of the grounds advanced;
- (2) The statement of claim may be struck out if the facts as alleged do not disclose a reasonable cause of action which in this case could be either
 - (a) a cause of action under s. 24(1) of the Charter; or
 - (b) a cause of action for declaratory relief at common law on the principle of Dyson v. Attorney-General, supra; or
 - (c) a cause of action under s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 for a declaration of unconstitutionality.
- (3) Taking the facts alleged as proven, they could not constitute a violation of s. 7 of the Charter so as to give rise to a cause of action under s. 24(1);
- (4) The appellants could not establish their status to sue at common law for declaratory relief for the same reason that they could not establish a cause of action under s. 24(1); and
- (5) The appellants could not establish a cause of action for declaratory relief under s. 52(1) since the facts as alleged could not constitute a violation of s. 7 and therefore no inconsistency with the provisions of the Constitution could be established.

[page493]

110 I would accordingly dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Action No. 303/91

5 O.R. (3d) 778 | [1991] O.J. No. 1962

Case Summary

Civil procedure — Commencement of proceedings — Statement of claim — Striking out statement of claim — Test to be applied whether it was plain and obvious that claim disclosed no reasonable cause of action — Rules of Civil Procedure, O. Reg. 560/84, rule 21.01.

The plaintiffs sued the defendants both in contract (seeking a declaration that a provision in a licence agreement that food and beverage services be provided at "cost" meant reasonable cost) and in tort (claiming that the defendants conspired amongst themselves with the object of injuring the economic or business interests of the plaintiffs and that the defendants conspired amongst themselves to further their own objects by unlawful means). The defendants moved under rule 21.01(1)(a) and (b) of the Rules of Civil Procedure, seeking the determination of certain questions of law and the dismissal of the action. The action was dismissed and the plaintiffs appealed.

Held, the appeal should be allowed.

The test to be applied on motions of this kind was whether it was plain and obvious that the claim disclosed no reasonable cause of action. The appellate court was under no obligation to decide each and every question of law posed by the defendants; it merely had to decide whether the motions judge was correct in his decision to dismiss the action. This case should be decided under rule 21.01(1)(b), which requires that the court decide whether the statement of claim, when read as a whole, fails to disclose any reasonable cause of action. Although portions of the statement of claim could well be struck out as frivolous or vexatious, the basic contractual and tortious reliefs sought were supportable. Matters of law which have not been settled fully in our jurisprudence should not be disposed of at this stage of the proceedings.

APPEAL from an order of the General Division, Hoilett J., June 3, 1991, dismissing the appellants' action. W.L.N. Somerville, Q.C., and R.S. Russell, for appellants/ respondents.

Alan H. Mark and David A. Shiller, for the Bitove Corporation, respondent/applicant.

John A. Campion and Stephanie Brown, for Stadium Corp. of Ontario Ltd., respondent/applicant.

The judgment of the court was delivered by

FINLAYSON J.A. (orally)

FINLAYSON J.A. (orally):— This is an appeal from that part of the order of the Honourable Mr. Justice Hoilett, dated June 3, 1991, in which he dismissed the appellants' action with costs fixed at $12,000.

The corporate appellants are licensees under licence agreements with the respondent, Stadium Corporation of Ontario Limited (Stadco). The individual appellants are officers of the appellant corporations. The licence agreements are for what are called skybox suites at the Skydome Stadium in Toronto. A dispute has arisen as to the cost of food and beverage services supplied to the suites, for which the licensees are obliged under the licence agreements to pay to Stadco or to the caterer designated by it, the respondent, the Bitove Corporation (Bitove). We are asked here to consider if Hoilett J., on a motion under rule 21.01 of the Rules of Civil Procedure, O. Reg. 560/84, was correct in dismissing the appellants' action.

Stripped to its essentials, the statement of claim alleges a cause of action in contract and separate causes of action in tort. The cause of action in contract relates to the contention that the provision in the licence agreement that food and beverage services are to be supplied at "cost" means that they are to be supplied at a reasonable cost or, alternatively, that it is an implied term of the licence agreement that the food and beverages are to be supplied at a reasonable price. Declarations are sought to this effect. It is pleaded that the prices charged for the supply of unprocessed food and beverages amounted to a multiple of several times the cost of these items to the respondents. Additionally, it is alleged that Stadco unilaterally added an automatic 15 per cent service charge to these prices. Whether these allegations are factual or not can only be established at trial.

The statement of claim also alleges two torts of common law conspiracy, one, that the respondents have conspired, combined, agreed or arranged amongst themselves with the object of injuring the economic or business interests of the appellants, and the other, that they have conspired, combined, agreed or arranged amongst themselves to further their own objects by unlawful means.

Sufficient particulars, which if proved would establish both causes of action, are set out. The court heard extensive argument as to the sufficiency of these particulars in law, but in the light of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Hunt v. Carey Canada Inc., [1990] 2 S.C.R. 959, 74 D.L.R. (4th) 321, we do not think it is necessary to go into them. In affirming that the test to be applied on motions of this kind was whether the outcome of the case was "plain and obvious" or "beyond reasonable doubt", Wilson J., in delivering the judgment of the court, stated at p. 980 S.C.R., p. 336 D.L.R.:

R.D. Belanger & Associates Ltd., Belanger, Buttcon Ltd., Butt, Crashley, Leitch, Scepter Manufacturing Co. and Larue v. Stadium Corp. of Ontario Ltd. and Bitove C....

Thus, the test in Canada governing the application of provisions like Rule 19(24)(a) of the British Columbia Rules of Court is the same as the one that governs an application under R.S.C. O. 18, r. 19: assuming that the facts as stated in the statement of claim can be proved, is it "plain and obvious" that the plaintiff's statement of claim discloses no reasonable cause of action? As in England, if there is a chance that the plaintiff might succeed, then the plaintiff should not be "driven from the judgment seat". Neither the length and complexity of the issues, the novelty of the cause of action, nor the potential for the defendant to present a strong defence should prevent the plaintiff from proceeding with his or her case. Only if the action is certain to fail because it contains a radical defect ranking with the others listed in Rule 19(24) of the British Columbia Rules of Court should the relevant portions of a plaintiff's statement of claim be struck out under Rule 19(24)(a).

The question therefore to which we must now turn in this appeal is whether it is "plain and obvious" that the plaintiff's claims in the tort of conspiracy disclose no reasonable cause of action or whether the plaintiff has presented a case that is "fit to be tried", even although it may call for a complex or novel application of the tort of conspiracy.

Later, in commenting on a passage on the law of conspiracy quoted from vol. 2, pp. 265-66 of G.H.L. Fridman, The Law of Torts in Canada (Toronto: Carswell, 1990), Wilson J. stated at p. 986 S.C.R., p. 340 D.L.R.:

In my view, this passage provides a useful summary of the current state of the law in Canada with respect to the tort of conspiracy. Whether it is "good law", it seems to me, it is not for the court to consider in this proceeding where the issue is simply whether the plaintiff's pleadings disclose a reasonable cause of action. I agree completely with Esson J.A. that it is not appropriate at this stage to engage in a detailed analysis of the strengths and weaknesses of Canadian law on the tort of conspiracy.

Counsel for both Stadco and Bitove sought to distinguish Hunt v. Carey on the basis that it was determined under the British Columbia equivalent of Ontario rule 21.01(1)(b), whereas they maintained they had moved under rule 21.01(1)(a) which imposes a less onerous burden on the respondents. Rule 21.01(1) reads as follows:

21.01 (1) A party may move before a judge,

(a) for the determination, before trial, of a question of law raised by a pleading in an action where the determination of the question may dispose of all or part of the action, substantially shorten the trial or result in a substantial saving of costs; or

(b) to strike out a pleading on the ground that it discloses no reasonable cause of action or defence, and the judge may make an order or grant judgment accordingly.

In point of fact, both Stadco and Bitove had moved under both clauses (a) and (b) of rule 21.01(1), Stadco asking under clause (a) that eight questions of law be decided and Bitove asking that ten issues be decided. Both parties, however, then asked that the paragraphs of the statement of claim corresponding to the points of law that they wanted decided be struck out. This is a power that is exercised under clause (b). Counsel now maintain that this court is under an obligation to decide each and every one of these questions of law, some of which require substantial research, and that we are not entitled to consider only whether Hoilett J. was correct in his decision to dismiss the action. I do not agree. An examination of the statement of claim does not reveal a discrete question or questions of law such as that in Nelles v. Ontario, [1989] 2 S.C.R. 170, 60 D.L.R. (4th) 609, which can be clearly isolated from the contested issues of fact in the case. In Nelles, the Supreme Court of Canada held that a trial was not necessary to permit a conclusion on the question of prosecutorial immunity. In such circumstances, the court should exercise its jurisdiction under rule 21.01(1)(a).

This case, on the other hand, should not have its multiple questions determined under rule 21.01(1)(a). The respondents are not entitled to have their case tried by inches. They may have achieved greater success before Hoilett J. than they anticipated, but in dismissing the appellants' action, he gave them no more than they asked for. This case should be decided under rule 21.01(1)(b) which requires that the court decide whether the statement of claim, when read as a whole, fails to disclose any reasonable cause of action.

In addition to the two conspiracy torts, the appellants plead that the respondents by unlawful means have tortiously interfered with the appellants' economic interests and they claim damages therefor. Finally, they plead the statutory cause of action conferred by s. 36 [am. R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (4th Supp.), s. 11] of the Competition Act, R.S.C.

R.D. Belanger & Associates Ltd., Belanger, Buttcon Ltd., Butt, Crashley, Leitch, Scepter Manufacturing Co. and Larue v. Stadium Corp. of Ontario Ltd. and Bitove C....

1985, c. C-34, alleging that they have suffered loss or damage as a result of the conduct of at least some of the respondents, that conduct being contrary to the provisions of Part VI of the Competition Act, in particular s. 45 [am. R.S.C. 1985, c. 19 (2nd Supp.), s. 30] thereof.

Injunctive relief and an accounting are also claimed in addition to damages.

Counsel for Stadco submitted that there were more than 12 causes of action pleaded, but, on analysis, most of the causes of action that he listed were refinements of the broad categories that I have set out above. Counsel went through the prayer for relief and submitted that most of the declarations sought were not proper as a matter of law. He also questioned whether there was such a tort as interference with the appellants' economic interests or that s. 36 of the Competition Act could found a civil cause of action on the facts as pleaded.

All this may well be true. The statement of claim does reveal a "scatter gun" approach to the issues. Portions of the statement of claim could well be struck out under rule 25.11 as frivolous or vexatious, but we are not concerned here with niceties of pleading. Given that the basic contractual and tortious reliefs sought are supportable, it will be up to the trial judge to determine what relief, if any, is appropriate.

This lack of concern about neatness extends further to the respondents' objections to the manner in which the appellants pleaded the legal issues in this case. Matters of law which have not been settled fully in our jurisprudence should not be disposed of at this stage of the proceedings. Reference should again be made to Hunt v. Carey, where Wilson J. stated at p. 977 S.C.R., p. 334 D.L.R.:

More recently, in Gilbert Surgical Supply Co. v. F.W. Horner Ltd., [1960] O.W.N. 289 (C.A.), at pp. 289-90, Aylesworth J.A. observed that the fact that an action might be novel was no justification for striking out a statement of claim. The court would still have to conclude that "the plaintiff's action could not possibly succeed or that clearly and beyond all doubt, no reasonable cause of action had been shown".

Thus the Ontario Court of Appeal has firmly embraced the "plain and obvious" test and has made clear that it too is of the view that the test is rooted in the need for courts to ensure that their process is not abused. The fact that the case the plaintiff wishes to present may involve complex issues of fact and law or may raise a novel legal proposition should not prevent a plaintiff from proceeding with his action.

Accordingly, for the reasons given, I would allow the appeal, set aside the order of Hoilett J. and in its place issue an order dismissing the motions of the two respondents. The appellants are entitled to their costs against both respondents here and below to be paid forthwith after assessment.

Appeal allowed.

IN THE MATTER OF Section 53 of the Supreme Court Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. S-26 AND IN THE MATTER OF a Reference by the Governor in Council concerning certain questions relating to the secession of Quebec from Canada, as set out in Order in Council P.C. 1996-1497, dated the 30th day of September, 1996

Case Summary

Constitutional law — Supreme Court of Canada — Reference jurisdiction — Whether Supreme Court's reference jurisdiction constitutional — Constitution Act, 1867, s. 101 — Supreme Court Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. S-26, s. 53.

Courts — Supreme Court of Canada — Reference jurisdiction — Governor in Council referring to Supreme Court three questions relating to secession of Quebec from Canada — Whether questions submitted fall outside scope of reference provision of Supreme Court Act — Whether questions submitted justiciable — Supreme Court Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. S-26, s. 53.

Constitutional law — Secession of province — Unilateral secession — Whether Quebec can secede unilaterally from Canada under Constitution.

International law — Secession of province of Canadian federation — Right of self-determination — Effectivity principle — Whether international law gives Quebec right to secede unilaterally from Canada.

Pursuant to s. 53 of the Supreme Court Act, the Governor in Council referred the following questions to this Court:

1. Under the Constitution of Canada, can the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally?
2. Does international law give the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec the right to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally? In this regard, is there a right to self-determination under international law that would give the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec the right to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally?
3. In the event of a conflict between domestic and international law on the right of the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally, which would take precedence in Canada?

Issues regarding the Court's reference jurisdiction were raised by the amicus curiae. He argued that s. 53 of the Supreme Court Act was unconstitutional; that, even if the Court's reference jurisdiction was constitutionally valid, the questions submitted were outside the scope of s. 53; and, finally, that these questions were not justiciable.

Held: Section 53 of the Supreme Court Act is constitutional and the Court should answer the reference questions.

(1) Supreme Court's Reference Jurisdiction

Section 101 of the Constitution Act, 1867 gives Parliament the authority to grant this Court the reference jurisdiction provided for in s. 53 of the Supreme Court Act. The words "general court of appeal" in s. 101 denote the status of the Court within the national court structure and should not be taken as a restrictive definition of the Court's functions. While, in most instances, this Court acts as the exclusive ultimate appellate court in the country, an appellate court can receive, on an exceptional basis, original jurisdiction not incompatible with its appellate jurisdiction. Even if there were any conflict between this Court's reference jurisdiction and the original jurisdiction of the provincial superior courts, any such conflict must be resolved in favour of Parliament's exercise of its plenary power to establish a "general court of appeal". A "general court of appeal" may also properly undertake other legal functions, such as the rendering of advisory opinions. There is no constitutional bar to this Court's receipt of jurisdiction to undertake an advisory role.

The reference questions are within the scope of s. 53 of the Supreme Court Act. Question 1 is directed, at least in part, to the interpretation of the Constitution Acts, which are referred to in s. 53(1)(a). Both Questions 1 and 2 fall within s. 53(1)(d), since they relate to the powers of the legislature or government of a Canadian province. Finally, all three questions are "important questions of law or fact concerning any matter" and thus come within s. 53(2). In answering Question 2, the Court is not exceeding its jurisdiction by purporting to act as an international tribunal. The Court is providing an advisory opinion to the Governor in Council in its capacity as a national court on legal questions touching and concerning the future of the Canadian federation. Further, Question 2 is not beyond the competence of this Court, as a domestic court, because it requires the Court to look at international law rather than domestic law. More importantly, Question 2 does not ask an abstract question of "pure" international law but seeks to determine the legal rights and obligations of the legislature or government of Quebec, institutions that exist as part of the Canadian legal order. International law must be addressed since it has been invoked as a consideration in the context of this Reference.

The reference questions are justiciable and should be answered. They do not ask the Court to usurp any democratic decision that the people of Quebec may be called upon to make. The questions, as interpreted by the Court, are strictly limited to aspects of the legal framework in which that democratic decision is to be taken. Since the reference questions may clearly be interpreted as directed to legal issues, the Court is in a position to answer them. The Court cannot exercise its discretion to refuse to answer the questions on a pragmatic basis. The questions raise issues of fundamental public importance and they are not too imprecise or ambiguous to permit a proper legal answer. Nor has the Court been provided with insufficient information regarding the present context in which the questions arise. Finally, the Court may deal on a reference with issues that might otherwise be considered not yet "ripe" for decision.

(2) Question 1

The Constitution is more than a written text. It embraces the entire global system of rules and principles which govern the exercise of constitutional authority. A superficial reading of selected provisions of the written constitutional enactment, without more, may be misleading. It is necessary to make a more profound investigation of the underlying principles animating the whole of the Constitution, including the principles of federalism, democracy, constitutionalism and the rule of law, and respect for minorities. Those principles must inform our overall appreciation of the constitutional rights and obligations that would come into play in the event that a clear majority of Quebecers votes on a clear question in favour of secession.

The Court in this Reference is required to consider whether Quebec has a right to unilateral secession. Arguments in support of the existence of such a right were primarily based on the principle of democracy. Democracy, however, means more than simple majority rule. Constitutional jurisprudence shows that democracy exists in the larger context of other constitutional values. Since Confederation, the people of the provinces and territories have created close ties of interdependence (economic, social, political and cultural) based on shared values that include federalism, democracy, constitutionalism and the rule of law, and respect for minorities. A democratic decision of Quebecers in favour of secession would put those relationships at risk. The Constitution vouchsafes order and stability, and accordingly secession of a province "under the Constitution" could not be achieved unilaterally, that is, without principled negotiation with other participants in Confederation within the existing constitutional framework.

Our democratic institutions necessarily accommodate a continuous process of discussion and evolution, which is reflected in the constitutional right of each participant in the federation to initiate constitutional change. This right implies a reciprocal duty on the other participants to engage in discussions to address any legitimate initiative to change the constitutional order. A clear majority vote in Quebec on a clear question in favour of secession would confer democratic legitimacy on the secession initiative which all of the other participants in Confederation would have to recognize.

Quebec could not, despite a clear referendum result, purport to invoke a right of self-determination to dictate the terms of a proposed secession to the other parties to the federation. The democratic vote, by however strong a majority, would have no legal effect on its own and could not push aside the principles of federalism and the rule of law, the rights of individuals and minorities, or the operation of democracy in the other provinces or in Canada as a whole. Democratic rights under the Constitution cannot be divorced from constitutional obligations. Nor, however, can the reverse proposition be accepted: the continued existence and operation of the Canadian constitutional order could not be indifferent to a clear expression of a clear majority of Quebecers that they no longer wish to remain in Canada. The other provinces and the federal government would have no basis to deny the right of the government of Quebec to pursue secession should a clear majority of the people of Quebec choose that goal, so long as in doing so, Quebec respects the rights of others. The negotiations that followed such a vote would address the potential act of secession as well as its possible terms should in fact secession proceed. There would be no conclusions predetermined by law on any issue. Negotiations would need to address the interests of the other provinces, the federal government and Quebec and indeed the rights of all Canadians both within and outside Quebec, and specifically the rights of minorities.

The negotiation process would require the reconciliation of various rights and obligations by negotiation between two legitimate majorities, namely, the majority of the population of Quebec, and that of Canada as a whole. A political majority at either level that does not act in accordance with the underlying constitutional principles puts at risk the legitimacy of its exercise of its rights, and the ultimate acceptance of the result by the international community.

The task of the Court has been to clarify the legal framework within which political decisions are to be taken "under the Constitution" and not to usurp the prerogatives of the political forces that operate within that framework. The obligations identified by the Court are binding obligations under the Constitution. However, it will be for the political actors to determine what constitutes "a clear majority on a clear question" in the circumstances under which a future referendum vote may be taken. Equally, in the event of demonstrated majority support for Quebec secession, the content and process of the negotiations will be for the political actors to settle. The reconciliation of the various legitimate constitutional interests is necessarily committed to the political rather than the judicial realm precisely because that reconciliation can only be achieved through the give and take of political negotiations. To the extent issues addressed in the course of negotiation are political, the courts, appreciating their proper role in the constitutional scheme, would have no supervisory role.

(3) Question 2

The Court was also required to consider whether a right to unilateral secession exists under international law. Some supporting an affirmative answer did so on the basis of the recognized right to self-determination that belongs to all "peoples". Although much of the Quebec population certainly shares many of the characteristics of a people, it is not necessary to decide the "people" issue because, whatever may be the correct determination of this issue in the context of Quebec, a right to secession only arises under the principle of self-determination of people at international law where "a people" is governed as part of a colonial empire; where "a people" is subject to alien subjugation, domination or exploitation; and possibly where "a people" is denied any meaningful exercise of its right to self-determination within the state of which it forms a part. In other circumstances, peoples are expected to achieve self-determination within the framework of their existing state. A state whose government represents the whole of the people or peoples resident within its territory, on a basis of equality and without discrimination, and respects the principles of self-determination in its internal arrangements, is entitled to maintain its territorial integrity under international law and to have that territorial integrity recognized by other states. Quebec does not meet the threshold of a colonial people or an oppressed people, nor can it be suggested that Quebecers have been denied meaningful access to government to pursue their political, economic, cultural and social development. In the circumstances, the "National Assembly, the legislature or the government of Quebec" do not enjoy a right at international law to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally.

Although there is no right, under the Constitution or at international law, to unilateral secession, the possibility of an unconstitutional declaration of secession leading to a de facto secession is not ruled out. The ultimate success of such a secession would be dependent on recognition by the international community, which is likely to consider the legality and legitimacy of secession having regard to, amongst other facts, the conduct of Quebec and Canada, in determining whether to grant or withhold recognition. Even if granted, such recognition would not, however, provide any retroactive justification for the act of secession, either under the Constitution of Canada or at international law.

(4) Question 3

In view of the answers to Questions 1 and 2, there is no conflict between domestic and international law to be addressed in the context of this Reference.

THE COURT

I. Introduction

1 This Reference requires us to consider momentous questions that go to the heart of our system of constitutional government. The observation we made more than a decade ago in Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 721 (Manitoba Language Rights Reference), at p. 728, applies with equal force here: as in that case, the present one "combines legal and constitutional questions of the utmost subtlety and complexity with political questions of great sensitivity". In our view, it is not possible to answer the questions that have been put to us without a consideration of a number of underlying principles. An exploration of the meaning and nature of these underlying principles is not merely of academic interest. On the contrary, such an exploration is of immense practical utility. Only once those underlying principles have been examined and delineated may a considered response to the questions we are required to answer emerge.

2 The questions posed by the Governor in Council by way of Order in Council P.C. 1996-1497, dated September 30, 1996, read as follows:

1. Under the Constitution of Canada, can the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally?
2. Does international law give the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec the right to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally? In this regard, is there a right to self-determination under international law that would give the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec the right to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally?
3. In the event of a conflict between domestic and international law on the right of the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally, which would take precedence in Canada?

3 Before turning to Question 1, as a preliminary matter, it is necessary to deal with the issues raised with regard to this Court's reference jurisdiction.

II. The Preliminary Objections to the Court's Reference Jurisdiction

4 The amicus curiae argued that s. 101 of the Constitution Act, 1867 does not give Parliament the authority to grant this Court the jurisdiction provided for in s. 53 of the Supreme Court Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. S-26. Alternatively, it is submitted that even if Parliament were entitled to enact s. 53 of the Supreme Court Act, the scope of that section should be interpreted to exclude the kinds of questions the Governor in Council has submitted in this Reference. In particular, it is contended that this Court cannot answer Question 2, since it is a question of "pure" international law over which this Court has no jurisdiction. Finally, even if this Court's reference jurisdiction is constitutionally valid, and even if the questions are within the purview of s. 53 of the Supreme Court Act, it is argued that the three questions referred to the Court are speculative, of a political nature, and, in any event, are not ripe for judicial decision, and therefore are not justiciable.

5 Notwithstanding certain formal objections by the Attorney General of Canada, it is our view that the amicus curiae was within his rights to make the preliminary objections, and that we should deal with them.

A. The Constitutional Validity of Section 53 of the Supreme Court Act

6 In Re References by Governor-General in Council (1910), 43 S.C.R. 536, affirmed on appeal to the Privy Council, [1912] A.C. 571 (sub nom. Attorney-General for Ontario v. Attorney-General for Canada), the constitutionality of this Court's special jurisdiction was twice upheld. The Court is asked to revisit these decisions. In light of the significant changes in the role of this Court since 1912, and the very important issues raised in this Reference, it is appropriate to reconsider briefly the constitutional validity of the Court's reference jurisdiction.

7 Section 3 of the Supreme Court Act establishes this Court both as a "general court of appeal" for Canada and as an "additional court for the better administration of the laws of Canada". These two roles reflect the two heads of power enumerated in s. 101 of the Constitution Act, 1867. However, the "laws of Canada" referred to in s. 101 consist only of federal law and statute: see Quebec North Shore Paper Co. v. Canadian Pacific Ltd., [1977] 2 S.C.R. 1054, at pp. 1065-66. As a result, the phrase "additional courts" contained in s. 101 is an insufficient basis upon which to ground the special jurisdiction established in s. 53 of the Supreme Court Act, which clearly exceeds a consideration of federal law alone (see, e.g., s. 53(2)). Section 53 must therefore be taken as enacted pursuant to Parliament's power to create a "general court of appeal" for Canada.

8 Section 53 of the Supreme Court Act is intra vires Parliament's power under s. 101 if, in "pith and substance", it is legislation in relation to the constitution or organization of a "general court of appeal". Section 53 is defined by two leading characteristics -- it establishes an original jurisdiction in this Court and imposes a duty on the Court to render advisory opinions. Section 53 is therefore constitutionally valid only if (1) a "general court of appeal" may properly exercise an original jurisdiction; and (2) a "general court of appeal" may properly undertake other legal functions, such as the rendering of advisory opinions.

(1) May a Court of Appeal Exercise an Original Jurisdiction?

9 The words "general court of appeal" in s. 101 denote the status of the Court within the national court structure and should not be taken as a restrictive definition of the Court's functions. In most instances, this Court acts as the exclusive ultimate appellate court in the country, and, as such, is properly constituted as the "general court of appeal" for Canada. Moreover, it is clear that an appellate court can receive, on an exceptional basis, original jurisdiction not incompatible with its appellate jurisdiction.

10 The English Court of Appeal, the U.S. Supreme Court and certain courts of appeal in Canada exercise an original jurisdiction in addition to their appellate functions. See De Demko v. Home Secretary, [1959] A.C. 654 (H.L.), at p. 660; Re Forest and Registrar of Court of Appeal of Manitoba (1977), 77 D.L.R. (3d) 445 (Man. C.A.), at p. 453; United States Constitution, art. III, sec. 2. Although these courts are not constituted under a head of power similar to s. 101, they certainly provide examples which suggest that there is nothing inherently self-contradictory about an appellate court exercising original jurisdiction on an exceptional basis.

11 It is also argued that this Court's original jurisdiction is unconstitutional because it conflicts with the original jurisdiction of the provincial superior courts and usurps the normal appellate process. However, Parliament's power to establish a general court of appeal pursuant to s. 101 is plenary, and takes priority over the province's power to control the administration of justice in s. 92(14). See Attorney-General for Ontario v. Attorney-General for Canada, [1947] A.C. 127 (P.C.). Thus, even if it could be said that there is any conflict between this Court's reference jurisdiction and the original jurisdiction of the provincial superior courts, any such conflict must be resolved in favour of Parliament's exercise of its plenary power to establish a "general court of appeal" provided, as discussed below, advisory functions are not to be considered inconsistent with the functions of a general court of appeal.

(2) May a Court of Appeal Undertake Advisory Functions?

12 The amicus curiae submits that

[Translation] [e]ither this constitutional power [to give the highest court in the federation jurisdiction to give advisory opinions] is expressly provided for by the Constitution, as is the case in India (Constitution of India, art. 143), or it is not provided for therein and so it simply does not exist. This is what the Supreme Court of the United States has held. [Emphasis added.]

13 However, the U.S. Supreme Court did not conclude that it was unable to render advisory opinions because no such express power was included in the United States Constitution. Quite the contrary, it based this conclusion on the express limitation in art. III, sec. 2 restricting federal court jurisdiction to actual "cases" or "controversies". See, e.g., Muskrat v. United States, 219 U.S. 346 (1911), at p. 362. This section reflects the strict separation of powers in the American federal constitutional arrangement. Where the "case or controversy" limitation is missing from their respective state constitutions, some American state courts do undertake advisory functions (e.g., in at least two states -- Alabama and Delaware -- advisory opinions are authorized, in certain circumstances, by statute: see Ala. Code 1975 sec. 12-2-10; Del. Code Ann. tit. 10, sec. 141 (1996 Supp.)).

14 In addition, the judicial systems in several European countries (such as Germany, France, Italy, Spain, Portugal and Belgium) include courts dedicated to the review of constitutional claims; these tribunals do not require a concrete dispute involving individual rights to examine the constitutionality of a new law -- an "abstract or objective question" is sufficient. See L. Favoreu, "American and European Models of Constitutional Justice", in D. S. Clark, ed., Comparative and Private International Law (1990), 105, at p. 113. The European Court of Justice, the European Court of Human Rights, and the Inter-American Court of Human Rights also all enjoy explicit grants of jurisdiction to render advisory opinions. See Treaty establishing the European Community, Art. 228(6); Protocol No. 2 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Europ. T.S. No. 5, p. 36; Statute of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights, Art. 2. There is no plausible basis on which to conclude that a court is, by its nature, inherently precluded from undertaking another legal function in tandem with its judicial duties.

15 Moreover, the Canadian Constitution does not insist on a strict separation of powers. Parliament and the provincial legislatures may properly confer other legal functions on the courts, and may confer certain judicial functions on bodies that are not courts. The exception to this rule relates only to s. 96 courts. Thus, even though the rendering of advisory opinions is quite clearly done outside the framework of adversarial litigation, and such opinions are traditionally obtained by the executive from the law officers of the Crown, there is no constitutional bar to this Court's receipt of jurisdiction to undertake such an advisory role. The legislative grant of reference jurisdiction found in s. 53 of the Supreme Court Act is therefore constitutionally valid.

B. The Court's Jurisdiction Under Section 53

16 Section 53 provides in its relevant parts as follows:

53. (1) The Governor in Council may refer to the Court for hearing and consideration important questions of law or fact concerning

(a) the interpretation of the Constitution Acts;

- (d) the powers of the Parliament of Canada, or of the legislatures of the provinces, or of the respective governments thereof, whether or not the particular power in question has been or is proposed to be exercised.

(2) The Governor in Council may refer to the Court for hearing and consideration important questions of law or fact concerning any matter, whether or not in the opinion of the Court ejusdem generis with the enumerations contained in subsection (1), with reference to which the Governor in Council sees fit to submit any such question.

(3) Any question concerning any of the matters mentioned in subsections (1) and (2), and referred to the Court by the Governor in Council, shall be conclusively deemed to be an important question.

17 It is argued that even if Parliament were entitled to enact s. 53 of the Supreme Court Act, the questions submitted by the Governor in Council fall outside the scope of that section.

18 This submission cannot be accepted. Question 1 is directed, at least in part, to the interpretation of the Constitution Acts, which are referred to in s. 53(1)(a). Both Question 1 and Question 2 fall within s. 53(1)(d), since they relate to the powers of the legislature or government of a Canadian province. Finally, all three questions are clearly "important questions of law or fact concerning any matter" so that they must come within s. 53(2).

19 However, the amicus curiae has also raised some specific concerns regarding this Court's jurisdiction to answer Question 2. The question, on its face, falls within the scope of s. 53, but the concern is a more general one with respect to the jurisdiction of this Court, as a domestic tribunal, to answer what is described as a question of "pure" international law.

20 The first contention is that in answering Question 2, the Court would be exceeding its jurisdiction by purporting to act as an international tribunal. The simple answer to this submission is that this Court would not, in providing an advisory opinion in the context of a reference, be purporting to "act as" or substitute itself for an international tribunal. In accordance with well accepted principles of international law, this Court's answer to Question 2 would not purport to bind any other state or international tribunal that might subsequently consider a similar question. The Court nevertheless has jurisdiction to provide an advisory opinion to the Governor in Council in its capacity as a national court on legal questions touching and concerning the future of the Canadian federation.

21 Second, there is a concern that Question 2 is beyond the competence of this Court, as a domestic court, because it requires the Court to look at international law rather than domestic law.

22 This concern is groundless. In a number of previous cases, it has been necessary for this Court to look to international law to determine the rights or obligations of some actor within the Canadian legal system. For example, in Reference re Powers to Levy Rates on Foreign Legations and High Commissioners' Residences, [1943] S.C.R. 208, the Court was required to determine whether, taking into account the principles of international law with respect to diplomatic immunity, a municipal council had the power to levy rates on certain properties owned by foreign governments. In two subsequent references, this Court used international law to determine whether the federal government or a province possessed proprietary rights in certain portions of the territorial sea and continental shelf (Reference re Ownership of Offshore Mineral Rights of British Columbia, [1967] S.C.R. 792; Reference re Newfoundland Continental Shelf, [1984] 1 S.C.R. 86).

23 More importantly, Question 2 of this Reference does not ask an abstract question of "pure" international law but seeks to determine the legal rights and obligations of the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec, institutions that clearly exist as part of the Canadian legal order. As will be seen, the amicus curiae himself submitted that the success of any initiative on the part of Quebec to secede from the Canadian federation would be governed by international law. In these circumstances, a consideration of international law in the context of this Reference about the legal aspects of the unilateral secession of Quebec is not only permissible but unavoidable.

C. Justiciability

24 It is submitted that even if the Court has jurisdiction over the questions referred, the questions themselves are not justiciable. Three main arguments are raised in this regard:

- (1) the questions are not justiciable because they are too "theoretical" or speculative;
- (2) the questions are not justiciable because they are political in nature;
- (3) the questions are not yet ripe for judicial consideration.

25 In the context of a reference, the Court, rather than acting in its traditional adjudicative function, is acting in an advisory capacity. The very fact that the Court may be asked hypothetical questions in a reference, such as the constitutionality of proposed legislation, engages the Court in an exercise it would never entertain in the context of litigation. No matter how closely the procedure on a reference may mirror the litigation process, a reference does not engage the Court in a disposition of rights. For the same reason, the Court may deal on a reference with issues that might otherwise be considered not yet "ripe" for decision.

26 Though a reference differs from the Court's usual adjudicative function, the Court should not, even in the context of a reference, entertain questions that would be inappropriate to answer. However, given the very different nature of a reference, the question of the appropriateness of answering a question should not focus on whether the dispute is formally adversarial or whether it disposes of cognizable rights. Rather, it should consider whether the dispute is appropriately addressed by a court of law. As we stated in Reference re Canada Assistance Plan (B.C.), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 525, at p. 545:

While there may be many reasons why a question is non-justiciable, in this appeal the Attorney General of Canada submitted that to answer the questions would draw the Court into a political controversy and involve it in the legislative process. In exercising its discretion whether to determine a matter that is alleged to be non-justiciable, the Court's primary concern is to retain its proper role within the constitutional framework of our democratic form of government. . . . In considering its appropriate role the Court must determine whether the question is purely political in nature and should, therefore, be determined in another forum or whether it has a sufficient legal component to warrant the intervention of the judicial branch. [Emphasis added.]

Thus the circumstances in which the Court may decline to answer a reference question on the basis of "non-justiciability" include:

- (i) if to do so would take the Court beyond its own assessment of its proper role in the constitutional framework of our democratic form of government or
- (ii) if the Court could not give an answer that lies within its area of expertise: the interpretation of law.

27 As to the "proper role" of the Court, it is important to underline, contrary to the submission of the amicus curiae, that the questions posed in this Reference do not ask the Court to usurp any democratic decision that the people of Quebec may be called upon to make. The questions posed by the Governor in Council, as we interpret them, are strictly limited to aspects of the legal framework in which that democratic decision is to be taken. The attempted analogy to the U.S. "political questions" doctrine therefore has no application. The legal framework having been clarified, it will be for the population of Quebec, acting through the political process, to decide whether or not to pursue secession. As will be seen, the legal framework involves the rights and obligations of Canadians who live outside the province of Quebec, as well as those who live within Quebec.

28 As to the "legal" nature of the questions posed, if the Court is of the opinion that it is being asked a question with a significant extralegal component, it may interpret the question so as to answer only its legal aspects; if this is not possible, the Court may decline to answer the question. In the present Reference the questions may clearly be interpreted as directed to legal issues, and, so interpreted, the Court is in a position to answer them.

29 Finally, we turn to the proposition that even though the questions referred to us are justiciable in the "reference" sense, the Court must still determine whether it should exercise its discretion to refuse to answer the questions on a pragmatic basis.

30 Generally, the instances in which the Court has exercised its discretion to refuse to answer a reference question that is otherwise justiciable can be broadly divided into two categories. First, where the question is too imprecise or ambiguous to permit a complete or accurate answer: see, e.g., McEvoy v. Attorney General for New Brunswick, [1983] 1 S.C.R. 704; Reference re Waters and Water-Powers, [1929] S.C.R. 200; Reference re Goods and Services Tax, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 445; Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 3 (Provincial Judges Reference), at para. 256. Second, where the parties have not provided sufficient information to allow the Court to provide a complete or accurate answer: see, e.g., Reference re Education System in Island of Montreal, [1926] S.C.R. 246; Reference re Authority of Parliament in relation to the Upper House, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 54 (Senate Reference); Provincial Judges Reference, at para. 257.

31 There is no doubt that the questions posed in this Reference raise difficult issues and are susceptible to varying interpretations. However, rather than refusing to answer at all, the Court is guided by the approach advocated by the majority on the "conventions" issue in Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution, [1981] 1 S.C.R. 753 (Patriation Reference), at pp. 875-76:

If the questions are thought to be ambiguous, this Court should not, in a constitutional reference, be in a worse position than that of a witness in a trial and feel compelled simply to answer yes or no. Should it find that a question might be misleading, or should it simply avoid the risk of misunderstanding, the Court is free either to interpret the question . . . or it may qualify both the question and the answer. . . .

The Reference questions raise issues of fundamental public importance. It cannot be said that the questions are too imprecise or ambiguous to permit a proper legal answer. Nor can it be said that the Court has been provided with insufficient information regarding the present context in which the questions arise. Thus, the Court is duty bound in the circumstances to provide its answers.

III. Reference Questions

A. Question 1

Under the Constitution of Canada, can the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally?

(1) Introduction

32 As we confirmed in Reference re Objection by Quebec to a Resolution to amend the Constitution, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 793, at p. 806, "The Constitution Act, 1982 is now in force. Its legality is neither challenged nor assailable." The "Constitution of Canada" certainly includes the constitutional texts enumerated in s. 52(2) of the Constitution Act, 1982. Although these texts have a primary place in determining constitutional rules, they are not exhaustive. The Constitution also "embraces unwritten, as well as written rules", as we recently observed in the Provincial Judges Reference, supra, at para. 92. Finally, as was said in the Patriation Reference, supra, at p. 874, the Constitution of Canada includes the global system of rules and principles which govern the exercise of constitutional authority in the whole and in every part of the Canadian state.

These supporting principles and rules, which include constitutional conventions and the workings of Parliament, are a necessary part of our Constitution because problems or situations may arise which are not expressly dealt with by the text of the Constitution. In order to endure over time, a constitution must contain a comprehensive set of rules and principles which are capable of providing an exhaustive legal framework for our system of government. Such principles and rules emerge from an understanding of the constitutional text itself, the historical context, and previous judicial interpretations of constitutional meaning. In our view, there are four fundamental and organizing principles of the Constitution which are relevant to addressing the question before us (although this enumeration is by no means exhaustive): federalism; democracy; constitutionalism and the rule of law; and respect for minorities. The foundation and substance of these principles are addressed in the following paragraphs. We will then turn to their specific application to the first reference question before us.

(2) Historical Context: The Significance of Confederation

33 In our constitutional tradition, legality and legitimacy are linked. The precise nature of this link will be discussed below. However, at this stage, we wish to emphasize only that our constitutional history demonstrates that our governing institutions have adapted and changed to reflect changing social and political values. This has generally been accomplished by methods that have ensured continuity, stability and legal order.
